His words were heavy with magic, and Neville gasped softly. Harry set down his wand, laying his free hand on top of Nott's. "I appreciate your vow, and will honour your debt." His own magic sealed the deal.

If Nott planned to betray him, he was going to have a bloody hard time of it.

"Talk to Daphne," he repeated, then offered a small smile. "I'll see you in class."

Recognising the dismissal for what it was, Nott nodded, pulling back and reaching for his wand. "Potter, Longbottom. Sorry for disturbing you," he said, as if he'd just asked about borrowing a book or something equally mundane. Then he was gone.

Harry looked at Neville, who was wide-eyed in shock. "I think I just made a new friend," he said, and grinned.

.-. .

Through the whisper network, Harry heard enough to be prepared by the next heirs study group meeting. He wasn't as shocked as the others when Theodore Nott walked in beside Daphne and Blaise. The tall boy still looked like a cornered animal, but there was a glimmer of hope in his eyes that Harry recognised painfully well.

He'd spoken to Snape, the same day Nott had come to him for help. The man had confirmed that Theodore Nott Sr was exactly the violent, odious piece of shit that Theodore Jr made him out to be. Snape had not been at all surprised to hear that his student was being threatened with the Cruciatius into joining Voldemort, only resigned. He had been earnest in his request for Harry to hold firm to his promise of sanctuary, even if Nott didn't get along so well with his other friends.

With that in mind, for this first meeting Harry had suggested that Cassius, Draco and the girls skip this one. If Nott got cold feet, they didn't want him to have the knowledge that four more children of Death Eaters were not loyal.

At least the other heirs seemed to have been similarly forewarned; they eyed Nott warily, but none looked shocked to see him there.

"Welcome," Harry greeted, beckoning him further into the room. "Can I call you Theodore? Or do you prefer something else?"

"Uh— Theo. Theo's fine," the boy stuttered, caught off-guard by Harry's lack of hesitation.

"Great. Call me Harry, Theo," he urged. "I don't know how much Blaise and Daphne have told you, but this is our study group."

"They said you're all planning on overthrowing both Fudge and Dumbledore, once Potter — Harry, sorry — once Harry kills the Dark Lord." Theo sounded deeply impressed, and also quite skeptical. "That you're going to completely rebuild the Ministry from the ground up, starting with the Wizengamot." Then he grinned, a predatory, gleaming-eyed thing. "I want in."

Across the table, Susan smirked. "Then well met, Heir Nott," she greeted, offering an open-palmed bow. "Sit down. We'll catch you up."

.-. .

Harry spent more nights than he probably should down in the Chamber of Secrets. He knew it was inadvisable — when added to the nights he spent with Draco, he was coming back past curfew often enough to be incredibly suspect should any of his dorm-mates notice. He was lucky that Ron was such a sound sleeper, or Dumbledore would surely know by now that Harry was up to something.

He couldn't help himself; he was learning so much from Salazar. The founder was more than happy to teach him about the history of his life and the school, regaling Harry with stories of his travels from Persia to England in his early teens, and meeting the other three founders. While Harry browsed the office library looking for books on horcruxes, Salazar explained to him the truth behind the story of the 'tragic fight' between himself and the other three founders. Apparently, Salazar had left the school not because of his disgust at them allowing muggleborns, but because his cousin had become a Dark Lord back in Persia and he felt it his duty to go and bring him to heel. The other founders, and his own wife and children, had not wanted him to leave, and that was what they had fought over. Salazar had gone back to Persia, and died there in the fight against his cousin.

It was an awful tale, made all the worse by how Harry knew time had twisted it.

When Salazar wasn't telling him about the founding of Hogwarts, he was guiding Harry through his library, recommending books he thought the boy might be interested in. Harry didn't have the free time to get stuck in to any of them really, with his busy schedule, but one day when things were calmer he was going to devour those bookshelves.

And some nights, like this one, Salazar sat and watched Harry work on his magic, occasionally offering advice. Mostly he was silent on those nights, especially when Harry was working on his animagus form.

He was getting closer and closer to achieving the final transformation. The book Sirius had given him said that after the partial transformations there would be a sort of wall, where the body's magic was trying to figure out how to get the whole form to shift at once. Harry had hit that wall, and just knew he was close to pushing past it.

He sat on the sofa, deep in his magic, chasing down the sneaky little fox within him. It was getting more and more wily, like it was aware how close Harry was and wanted to make him really work for it. He raced through his own mindscape, focus entirely on the dark red creature, the white tail-tip bobbing along in front of him. Putting on an extra burst of energy, he lurched forward, and pounced.

And opened his eyes.

The world was different. He was much lower down, for one, but even without that everything was... sharper. The colours were muted, but somehow it all felt so much more.

He cocked his head, looking down at his paws. His tail twitched.

“Oho! You’ve done it, lad!” He looked up — he could understand the hissing language, but had no hope of speaking it back.

He stood on four wobbly legs, jumping down from the sofa and landing in a sprawled heap. Above him, he heard Salazar chuckle.

There was no mirror in the room, and Harry wished he’d known how successful he would be so he could have conjured one. All he could do was turn a tight circle trying to get a good look at himself; his tail waved in the corner of his vision, and he chased it for a few moments, before tripping over his own feet and rolling into the side of the desk.

He sat back on his haunches, pushing away all the curious smells and sounds around him. He had to change back. He couldn’t be a fox forever.

It was almost as hard as the initial transformation. This time in his mind he was chasing down his own memories, trying to remember the feel of hands and feet and human skin, of a bipedal body, of wearing clothes. It seemed foolish that he should forget such a thing when he’d inhabited a human body for fifteen and a half years, but right now all he could think were fox thoughts, and all he could feel were fox feelings.

It took time. But eventually, Harry was himself again, sat on the floor of the office with his glasses askew.

“Well done, lad!” Salazar enthused, applauding politely from his portrait. Harry beamed at him.

It would take practice before he could switch between forms as effortlessly as Sirius did, but he’d done it.

He was an animagus, now.

He couldn’t wait to show his godfathers.

.-.-.-.

Arriving to set up the Room for the last HA meeting before Christmas, Harry did not expect the place to be decorated. At first, he wondered if it was the castle getting cheeky with him — then he took a closer look at the baubles hanging from the ceiling, realised they all had his face on them, and knew it must have been a gesture from Dobby instead. A quick wave of his wand transfigured them into regular golden baubles, just in time for the first group of people to arrive.

“Putting up mistletoe, hmm?” Susan remarked, looking up at the white berries hung in the centre of the room. “Something you’re trying to tell us?”

Harry blushed, and Susan cackled at him.

She wasn't the only one who spotted the mistletoe. The twins thought it was a grand idea to charm it to float around the room, and each time two people stood beneath it they couldn't move until they kissed.

"It's to practice being aware of your surroundings," Fred declared brightly, looking far too devious when his brother ended up stuck under the mistletoe with Blaise Zabini. George got him back for that one, still blushing from the soft peck Blaise had given him — Fred was abruptly rooted to the spot right beside Zacharias Smith, when he'd been creeping past the boy trying to slip some kind of rubber worm down the back of his robes.

No one seemed truly bothered by the antics, so Harry let it slide; it was only a review lesson, as he didn't want to start anything new right before a three week break.

It was amazing, seeing how far they had all come since the first session, just a couple of months ago. Everyone in the room was capable of stunning, disarming and blocking even while dodging spells, and they were racing through the OWL curriculum. Harry wouldn't be surprised if he had even the fourth years up to NEWT level by the time exams rolled around.

He hoped Umbridge had been exposed as a shit teacher by then, or people might think her methods had actually worked.

"I've got a bit of homework for you all," Harry declared as the session came to a close. A chorus of groans rang through the room. "Don't worry, it's nothing difficult." Merlin knew they all had enough actual homework to do over the break. "I want each of you over Christmas to think of one spell you don't know that you think would be handy to have in a fight. Doesn't have to be an offensive spell," he added, as they had learned over the weeks that with some creative usage, practically anything could be an offensive spell, "any spell, as long as you can give me a reason you think it'll be useful. Whether it's something you read in a book, or heard about from someone you know — first meeting after Christmas, you'll share the spells you found, and we'll all learn it." Unless they found some very obscure sources, the chances were either Harry would know the spell already, or either Snape or Remus would and could teach it to him.

That seemed to be the kind of homework everyone could get on board with, so it was a cheerful group that dispersed when Harry called it a night, wishing Harry a Merry Christmas on their way out. As the group began to thin out, Harry noticed Cho stood alone off to one side. He frowned, and when Neville gestured for them to leave, Harry waved him on ahead.

"You alright, Cho?" he asked, approaching her once it was just the two of them left.

She was by the section of the mirror that had turned into the group's informal message board. It had started with a request for tutoring help in other subjects, stuck to the mirror by a stressed-out Parvati who was convinced she was going to fail all her exams. Since then it had evolved into other requests, as well as little notes of encouragement and support, even a few anonymous love notes among the mix. There were photos, too, thanks to Colin Creevey; pictures of members of the group casting spells, or laughing together, or suffering the hilarious results of a Weasley Twins prank.

And at the top, like a reminder of what it was all for, was a picture of Cedric Diggory. He was in his Triwizard uniform, but it wasn't the picture from the paper. It was of him before the third task, his friends crowding around him like he'd already won. The last picture taken before he'd died. And Harry knew Cho had taken it.

"He would've loved all this," Cho said, finally breaking the silence. She turned, gesturing to the room at large. "Everyone coming together like this. Last year, it made him so happy when people started studying outside of their house groups. And when you and Viktor and Fleur and him all worked together for the tasks." Her smile quivered, heartbreakingly sad.

"He was a Hufflepuff," Harry said, and a sharp laugh burst from her lips.

"Such a fucking Hufflepuff. Wanted everyone to be friends and stand together, stand up for each other." She shook her head, tears now trailing down her cheeks. "Like I said. He would've loved this."

Harry reached out an arm, tucking her into his side, and together they stood and watched the picture of Cedric laugh and smile and blow kisses at the camera. "I got a letter from Fleur the other day. She asked if I was going home over the holidays, wondered if I wanted to meet up. She... she said Cedric told her, last year, that Christmas was his favourite time of the year. That he loved the Yule Ball, because it felt like Hogwarts was finally having the celebration that Christmas deserved." She sniffled, and Harry squeezed her tighter. "Fleur thought I might want something to look forward to instead of just sitting at home and thinking about how much Cedric turned into a giant puppy at Christmas and how quiet it is without him,"

"Did you reply?" Harry asked, his heart constricting. He couldn't imagine being in Cho's position, being surrounded by people who had moved on when your heart still felt like it was torn apart.

"Yeah. We're going to get coffee on Boxing Day. Some muggle place in France; she's sending a portkey for me that may or may not be legal." Cho managed a weak grin, and Harry snorted. That sounded like Fleur. "She said there will be coffee and croissants and possibly snow, and an ice skating rink where we can both make fools of ourselves because neither of us knows how to skate. So then I can look back on this Christmas and know that I wasn't sad all the time. Because Cedric wouldn't want me to be sad."

"I'm sure you'll both have a wonderful time," Harry said sincerely. "She's right. He'd want you to be happy."

"I know." Cho sniffled again. "He'd be so proud of you, y'know." She turned to look at him, smiling through her tears. "Protecting everyone like this. Finding ways to keep everyone positive even when there's Umbridge and You-Know-Who and everything." Her smile widened. "He'd say you're being quite Hufflepuff yourself."

"From him, I'd take that as the highest compliment." He looked back at the picture, feeling a stab of pain in his chest, that gaping hole from the summer starting to feel raw around the edges again.

"Hey, Harry?"

“Yeah?”

“Do you... are you still seeing whoever it is you were snogging at the Yule Ball last year?”
The question was quiet, and made Harry tense. “You don’t have to tell me who.”

“Yeah, I am,” he admitted, unable to stop his smile when he thought about Draco. Cho wiped at her eyes, nodding decisively.

“Good. I’m glad.” She looked back to Cedric’s picture, and took a deep breath. “You hold onto him, yeah? Because... because you never know how long you’ve got with the people you love.”

Harry felt something wet slide down the side of his nose, and he realised that he was crying, too. “I will,” he promised, pulling Cho into a tight hug, lips pressed to her forehead. “Cho, I’m so sorry.”

Her whole body shook with a sob. “It’s okay,” she said. “It’ll be okay. These spells you’re teaching us all will keep us safe, and hopefully — hopefully no one else will end up like Cedric.”

That wasn’t a guarantee Harry could make, and they both knew it, but he nodded all the same, his tears dripping onto her hair.

He couldn’t say how long they stood there, hugging and crying silently, both lost in their memories of a Hufflepuff boy with so much love in his heart and so much life left to live. Eventually, Cho pulled back with an awkward, wet chuckle. “I didn’t mean to cry all over you,” she admitted.

“We’ll call it even,” Harry replied, wiping at his own face.

“Alright. I’m gonna go back to Ravenclaw, I think. Have a good Christmas, Harry.”

“Have a good Christmas, Cho. Give Fleur a hug from me.”

Cho smiled, then stepped up to the mirror. She kissed her fingertips, reaching up to press them tenderly to Cedric’s photographic cheek. Then, with one last attempt at a smile in Harry’s direction, she disappeared through the Ravenclaw door.

Harry let out a long, shaky breath in the silence of the room. He looked at the photograph, the boy still beaming. “I’m trying, Cedric,” he murmured. “I’m trying.”

And then he too left the room. But not to go back to his common room.

There was still forty minutes or so until curfew — Harry had ended the session early, in the spirit of the season — and he ducked into an alcove to pull the Marauders’ Map from his bag, his heart hammering in his chest. “I solemnly swear that I am up to no good.”

Spidery lines spilled across the map’s surface. Harry scanned them desperately, looking for one dot in particular. There. Draco Malfoy, in the library, with Theo and Pansy.

Harry set off at a brisk pace.

He donned his invisibility cloak before he reached the library, carefully sneaking through the doors when a Gryffindor second year sped through them. He dodged the students hard at work, not making even a whisper of sound, until he found the trio of Slytherins. They were all reading silently, and Harry crept up, placing an invisible hand on Draco's arm. He felt the blond tense.

"Come with me," he breathed, hardly louder than a whisper, his lips right next to Draco's ear. The Slytherin immediately relaxed, then leaned forward and shut his book.

"I'm going to head back. I'll see you two later."

Neither of his companions offered to go with him, which Harry was grateful for. He walked close behind the blond on the way out of the library, then reached out to grab the sleeve of his robe.

They didn't go far; there was a hidden room behind a tapestry that they had used for heirs meetings in the past, and Harry ducked into it, pulling Draco along and warding the entrance. Then he dropped the cloak. "Hey."

Draco, who had been wearing a sultry smile, immediately frowned in concern. "Harry? What's the matter?" He stepped forward, cupping Harry's face with both hands. "Have you been crying?"

"I love you," Harry blurted, watching the blond's face go slack. "I—I was just talking with Cho, about Cedric, and something she said—I love you," he repeated, slower this time, words full of emotion. His heart pounded hard against his ribs, blood rushing in his ears. "I need you to know that. In case—I just need you to know."

The words that had been filling his heart for so long still felt small when said aloud, like such a simple thing as love could not describe the depth of his feelings for this beautiful boy, but it would have to do for now.

"You daft Gryffindor," Draco said eventually, his face lighting up with the most incredibly fond look, his arms moving to wrap loosely around Harry. "Nothing's going to happen to me. I'll be right here in the castle all Christmas," he promised. "But I love you too, of course I do, surely you've guessed by now. I'm not exactly subtle."

Harry's rabbiting heart suddenly felt lighter than air and huge inside his chest, his thoughts all vanishing in favour of hearing those words in Draco's voice directed at him, echoing in every corner of his mind.

"I'd hoped," he admitted sheepishly, and Draco chuckled, kissing him, achingly tender.

"I love you, Harry Potter," he declared, grey eyes bright. "Merlin help me, but I love you."

Had every dementor in Azkaban appeared right then, Harry was sure he could have powered a patronus strong enough to send them all right back where they belonged.

Draco loved him.

.-.-.-.

His body was small; sleek, powerful. Was he a fox again?

No. That wasn't right. He was... lower. His belly sliding along stone, his eyes peering through darkness. He was in a corridor, alone.

Not alone.

A man sat ahead of him. Asleep, or at least most of the way there. Entirely unaware of Harry's approach. Harry continued forward, tongue flicking out to taste the scent of the man. His Master had warned him there might be someone there, had said only to bite if necessary.

What was necessary, when Harry felt the urge to hunt ?

He tried to resist it, hoping to move unnoticed past the man. But something startled him, and he jerked awake. Suddenly, his wand was out, and fear flooded Harry's system. He reared back, baring his fangs, and struck .

Hot, coppery blood spilled between his lips, his fangs sinking deeper into the man's flesh, aiming to crush, to destroy . The man cried out, then didn't cry at all, slumping to the cold floor. Harry looked at his face.

He knew that face.

Something was wrong. Something was very wrong.

“HARRY!”

He woke with a gasp like a drowning man, lurching into an upright position, pain searing through his body. Neville was at his side, chalk-white with fear. Behind him, Harry's other three dorm-mates stood wary-eyed. Even Ron looked concerned, behind his scowl.

Suddenly, the dream — not a dream, his mind insisted — flashed behind his eyes, and he tensed. “Someone get McGonagall,” he rasped, chest still heaving. Then he rolled to the side, and vomited over the edge of the bed.

He vaguely heard the thud of rapid footsteps, his eyes squeezed shut as he tried not to vomit again; he felt like his scar was trying to melt itself off his face, the pain radiating down his neck and spine, making every breath agony.

“Harry, you’re shaking,” Neville said worriedly. “What do I do? What happened?”

“Dream,” Harry muttered, sweat cooling on his body. His legs were tangled in the sheets and it felt far too constricting, so he kicked them away the best he could. “Voldemort. Attack.”

Vaguely, he heard a lilted murmuring that had to be Seamus — if the Irish boy hadn’t thought Harry was insane before, he probably did now.

Harry's heart was pounding, and he reached out to grip Neville's forearm. "McGonagall," he insisted. He had to tell someone, he had to get help, fast, before it was too late.

"She's coming. Dean's gone to get her," Neville assured. "Harry, what do you mean, attack?"

He was saved having to answer by the sound of two sets of footsteps, and suddenly a tall figure in a tartan dressing gown was striding across the dorm. Neville pressed Harry's glasses onto his face, and when Harry looked up the Gryffindor housemistress' face was pinched, her eyes full of concern. "What's going on up here?" she asked, studying Harry's wrecked form. "What's the matter, Potter?"

"Mr Weasley was attacked," Harry blurted, seeing Ron freeze out of the corner of his eye. "Voldemort's snake. She got him. I—I need to see the headmaster. He has to help him." He never thought he'd be volunteering to go see Dumbledore, but needs must when the devil drives, and the devil had definitely been driving Harry right into that snake's body.

McGonagall's lips pursed. For a moment Harry worried she wouldn't believe him, would insist he was only dreaming. He hated himself for being so foolish, for not telling anyone but his guardians about the dreams — surely no one would take him seriously now!

But perhaps she knew something he didn't, because after a moment she gave one single, sharp nod.

"Yes, I believe you do. Come on, Potter, up you get."

A wave of her wand had the vomit on the floor vanishing, and Harry scrambled to shove his feet into his slippers.

"I'm coming too," Ron declared stubbornly, stepping forward. "It's my dad he's talking about."

There wasn't time to argue, and McGonagall seemed to know it, so she merely huffed and started walking. Harry squeezed Neville's hand in assurance, then followed the stern woman out of the dorm, hurrying down the stairs with Ron hot on his heels.

For an older woman, McGonagall could move quickly when she wanted to; they were at Dumbledore's office within minutes, the gargoyle moving aside. Harry's heart raced as he stood on the moving staircase, trying frantically to pull together enough brain cells to figure out what to say to the headmaster. He had to make him see how important this was, how much Mr Weasley was in danger, but he couldn't give away what he knew about his connection to Voldemort.

For the first time since the Triwizard Tournament, Harry stepped into Dumbledore's office.

It was past midnight, but Dumbledore had clearly been up for a while; wearing a truly lurid dressing gown, he sat at his desk while the portraits of previous heads of school chattered at him. They all fell silent at the intrusion.

“Oh my,” Dumbledore greeted, frowning, leaning forward in his chair. “Whatever is the matter?”

“Potter’s had a nightmare,” McGonagall said, and had Harry been paying attention he would’ve seen the brief flash of triumph pass through Dumbledore’s gaze. As it was he was trying his best not to look the man in the eye, sure his Occlumency shields would be scrambled to all hell.

“Not a nightmare,” he insisted. “It was real. Sir, Mr Weasley’s been attacked by a snake, he needs help.” He’s dying, he thought desperately, heart clenched.

“How did you see this?” Dumbledore asked, and for a second Harry thought the man was just outright asking Harry about his connection with Voldemort.

“In a dream, but it wasn’t a dream, more like a- a vision?” He stuttered, only half faking his confusion.

“You misunderstand me,” Dumbledore pressed. “Where were you, in the dream? Watching from above, perhaps?”

Oh, Harry thought, followed by, he knows.

He knew exactly what had caused Harry to travel outside his own mind that night.

“I was the snake,” he admitted, and suddenly a horrifying thought occurred to him.

He had been within the snake’s mind, just like he was sometimes inside Voldemort’s. And it had felt comfortable. More comfortable than he anticipated an animal being possessed would feel.

The snake was a horcrux.

His lips pressed tightly together as he tried not to react to this realisation — thankfully, Dumbledore at least seemed to care about Mr Weasley’s life more than his own academic curiosity; he was talking to a couple of the paintings, telling them to raise the alarm. The two disappeared from their framed immediately.

“But he could be anywhere!” Ron burst out in a panic, and Harry’s jaw clenched.

Dumbledore knew exactly where Mr Weasley was, because he’d sent him there.

The Department of Mysteries. Guarding that fucking prophecy.

Did Voldemort really think his snake would be able to get to it? Or was he just using her to scope the place out?

“You’re still shaking, Potter. Sit down,” McGonagall urged softly, nudging Harry towards one of the chintz armchairs opposite the desk.

Dumbledore, meanwhile, was doing something daft and flashy with one of his silver instruments, clearly trying to make Harry curious as he muttered to himself and waved his wand through a puff of smoke shaped like a rearing snake's head. But Harry didn't care; he knew more than Dumbledore thought he did, more than perhaps Dumbledore himself, and he just wanted to make sure Mr Weasley was okay before he went and passed out again. He was exhausted, utterly drained of energy, head pounding.

After what felt like an age, the two painted ex-heads returned to their portraits. The man assured that Mr Weasley had been found, and soon after the woman relayed his arrival at St Mungo's — in quite an awful state, from the sounds of it. Ron shuddered violently, and Dumbledore pursed his lips.

"Right, then. Minerva, if you would please wake the rest of the Weasley children and bring them here..."

"Of course." With one last worried look at Harry, McGonagall hurried to the door. She paused in the threshold. "Headmaster, what about Molly?"

Ron let out a quiet moan, and Dumbledore's face drew tighter. "I will send Fawkes, once he has returned from keeping watch. Though she may already know, with that excellent clock of hers..."

McGonagall left, and Dumbledore began to rummage through a cupboard until he found an old tea kettle. That kettle became a portkey in short order, and Harry was vaguely aware of the headmaster shouting for Phineas Nigellus Black, his resident painted spy in Grimmauld Place. A weak smile twitched at his lips; was the man's portrait even still in the house, after Sirius' decorating spree?

His hands clenched over the arms of the chair like it was the only thing keeping him upright. Harry had done his bit, he'd raised the alarm, now he just wanted to sleep. But he didn't think Dumbledore was going to let him go back to Gryffindor Tower.

At least it sounded like he would be seeing Sirius, soon.

McGonagall returned with Ginny and the twins, all dressed in pyjamas and pale with fear. Dumbledore explained what had happened in a very vague and unhelpful sort of way. Harry knew he'd be giving a proper explanation when they were alone, but they didn't seem to be able to focus on anything past the fact that their dad was hurt, regardless.

There would be time for explanations once Mr Weasley was okay.

Fawkes flashed in with a warning that was apparently about Umbridge, and McGonagall was off again. Dumbledore bid them all gather around the portkey, and Harry did so, his body aching with every movement.

Then the headmaster called his name, and instinctively Harry looked up. Green eyes met blue, dead on, and he only had a brief moment to panic — but instead of the prod of Legilimency, Harry merely felt a wave of hatred, and suddenly he had fangs once more and would very much like to sink them into Dumbledore's neck, and his scar was on fire—

And then the portkey pulsed with magic, and he was gone.

Chapter 59

Chapter Notes

I hope this makes up for last week's cliffhanger, pals ;)

They appeared in the dimly-lit kitchen at Twelve Grimmauld Place, Harry's knees buckling the second he touched down. The only reason he didn't fall right to the floor was through a quick save by Fred, whose strong arm wrapped around his middle. "Easy does it, kid," the tall redhead murmured, keeping Harry upright.

"Harry."

The next thing Harry knew he was bundled against a familiar-smelling chest, large hands pressing at his shoulders. Sirius. He choked back a sob, leaning into his godfather's embrace.

"What happened? Phineas Nigellus said Arthur's been injured." Sirius' question was directed at the Weasley children.

"He had some sort of mad vision, woke up screaming, saying Dad had been attacked by a snake," Ron declared viciously.

When Harry looked up, all eyes were on him.

"Harry, what happened?" Ginny asked gently. Harry sighed.

"I'll make some tea," Sirius announced, depositing Harry on one of the kitchen chairs and hurrying towards the kettle. "You can explain everything then."

Harry didn't wait for the tea to be ready; with his gaze firmly on the wooden tabletop, he relayed the events of his dream.

At some point while he was talking, Bill and Charlie arrived. Harry wasn't sure who sent word to them, but he was glad when they appeared, Bill immediately gathering Ginny in a hug, turning his anxious blue gaze on Harry.

Harry thought about altering his story, about telling them he watched from outside the snake rather than from within; not letting on that he had felt the way the fangs had sunk into warm flesh. But he'd already said it to Dumbledore, and he trusted all of them — except Ron, but at this point Harry couldn't give a fuck about Ron Weasley's opinions.

"Does Mum know?" Charlie asked urgently. Sirius approached the table with a tray covered in cups of tea, and he squeezed Charlie's shoulder gently.

“I expect Dumbledore is warning her now.”

Ginny had to be talked down from haring off to St Mungo’s, reminded that if even Mrs Weasley hadn’t been informed by the hospital yet, it would look mighty suspicious if all her kids showed up with Harry Potter in tow.

“Let’s all just settle down,” Bill said, his low voice calm, and his siblings reluctantly took seats at the table. “Even if we went to St Mungo’s, there’s nothing we can do to help. Dad’s being seen by the healers, they’ll be doing everything they can. Better for us to wait here than over there. Hospital tea is shit,” he added with a weak laugh, raising his cup towards Sirius. Only Charlie snorted at the joke.

The younger Weasleys didn’t seem convinced, but none dared argue with their eldest brother.

Harry sipped at his tea, hands trembling around his cup. Sirius took the seat beside him, leaning close until their shoulders were pressed together. “You alright, pup?”

A jerky nod. Then, smaller, a shake of his head. How could he be alright after seeing something like that?

It was a thousand times worse than the endless corridor running of his usual Department of Mysteries dreams. It was even worse than the occasional time he got a direct line into one of the Death Eater meetings, watching — feeling — Voldemort torture his loyal subjects.

This was a visceral attack on a man Harry had known since he was twelve, a man who had always treated him with kindness. If Mr Weasley died...

Harry clenched his jaw tight. He wouldn’t think like that. He couldn’t.

Fawkes flashed in with a note from Mrs Weasley, telling them her husband was still alive and she was on her way to the hospital. Far from reassuring them, it just made the Weasley children realise how dire their father’s situation was. Harry’s stomach roiled, and he jumped to his feet. “I need the loo,” he declared, practically sprinting from the kitchen.

He vaguely noticed that Mrs Black’s portrait was no longer on the wall, tearing past it and heading for the small toilet just beneath the stairs. He retched into the sink, bringing up the tea he’d just drank, hot tears leaking from his eyes.

“Easy, kid.” It was Bill, and for a moment Harry was struck by how similar he and Fred had sounded that he almost laughed. The curse-breaker’s hand rubbed soothingly at his back. “Any more coming up?”

Harry shook his head. “Don’t think so.” He turned, meeting Bill’s gaze intently. “Bill. The vision— being inside the snake felt like being inside Voldemort’s head. Exactly like it.”

The redhead’s tanned face was pale and waxy. “I had a feeling you might say that,” he sighed. “She’s another, then?”

“She’s got to be.” A fourth horcrux. How many had the man even made??

“Right. Fuck.” Bill ran a hand over his face. “At least we know. Bugger all we can do about that one, with how close he keeps her.”

That was definitely a problem for a future night. “Do you think he wanted me to see it?” If Voldemort knew he could see into the snake as well as his own head, would he start suspecting the truth?

Bill shrugged. “No way to tell. But if it helps, I don’t think so. He might not even know you’ve seen it. In fact, you’d probably know if he did. Didn’t you say you can feel it when he’s pissed off?” A ghost of a smile crossed Bill’s face. “I’d say raising the alarm in time to get Dad to St Mungo’s would probably piss him off, if he knew it was you.”

That made sense, and Harry finally felt like he could breathe.

“Come on,” Bill urged. “Let’s go back to the kitchen. Unless — you didn’t actually need the loo, did you?”

Harry snorted, shaking his head, and let Bill gently corral him back to the gathering in the kitchen. Now he was looking properly, he realised Sirius had redecorated in here, too — not massively, but where there had once been dark wallpaper there was now cheery duck-egg blue paint, and he’d replaced the grimy old tiles with fresh white ones. The floor, too, had been cleaned until the dark grey stone gleamed.

Sirius offered him another cup of tea. They all sat in silence for a long, long time.

Harry didn’t know what to do. There was nothing he could say to make it better, especially not when anything he might say would likely be of the vein that when he felt his fangs going in, he didn’t feel any bones break, so that was probably good.

That wouldn’t be reassuring to anyone.

Sirius kept a hand on the back of his neck for a while, a soothing weight, and absently Harry wondered if Remus was around. He didn’t ask, though. It didn’t seem appropriate.

At around three, Bill got a message from his mother; a request to come to the hospital. Apparently, someone had been sent to his flat, but he obviously wasn’t there.

The note didn’t say anything about Mr Weasley’s status. Bill was grey-faced when he floored out of the kitchen.

It was ten past five by the time anything else happened; all of them were beginning to doze off around the table, but stubbornly refused to go to bed. Harry didn’t feel he could go up, even though he felt like he’d been hit by the Hogwarts Express, not when his friends were worrying. Not when they didn’t know if Mr Weasley would make it.

When Mrs Weasley finally strode through the door, Harry was jostled abruptly as his pillow — George’s shoulder — moved, the redhead turning to look at his mum.

“He’s going to be alright,” she announced, exhaustion threading her voice. “Bill’s sitting with him now. We can all go see him later.”

It was like a plug had been pulled in the room, the tension draining visibly. "Thank Merlin," Charlie said hoarsely. Then he pushed his chair back, eyes a little too wide. "Breakfast, then? I'll get the eggs on." He reached for the frying pan on the stove, fumbling and nearly dropping it. In an instant, Sirius was up beside him, hands on the redhead's shoulders.

"Let me take care of it," the animagus said, voice soft. "Go hug your mum."

Charlie looked back at his mum and siblings, nodding jerkily. "If you're sure."

Harry eagerly approached the stove to help, desperate to have something to do that wasn't sitting in the miasma of grief and relief that surrounded the Weasley family. They might call him their brother, but he was not one of them. And with his feelings still very mixed regarding Mrs Weasley, he didn't want to intrude.

Between the pair of them, he and Sirius managed to cook enough breakfast for everyone. But when Harry went to get plates to dish it all up, he found himself wrapped in a rib-crushing embrace. "Thank you, Harry," Mrs Weasley breathed emphatically. "If not for you, they might not have found Arthur for hours. By then... well, I don't like to think what would've happened."

His stomach squirmed guiltily — even now, he wanted to yell at the woman, to ask if this too was a lie, to demand why she had stolen from his vaults and helped Dumbledore manipulate him and whatever else she might know. But at the same time he wanted to sink into her hug, overjoyed that Mr Weasley was going to be okay, that he'd managed to help.

"I'm just glad he's alright," he said wearily, stepping awkwardly out of her embrace. "I— I need to get the plates."

He wasn't even that hungry, nor was he particularly in the mood to celebrate, but everyone else was so high on relief and lack of sleep that Harry couldn't get away. So he sat there, picking at his eggs, trying to rid himself of the taste of blood in his mouth.

. . .

Harry had never been to St Mungo's before.

He had expected the wizarding hospital to be somewhere by Diagon Alley, but instead it was just past Bond Street station. Seeing the bustling crowd of muggles out Christmas shopping was jarring, and Harry stopped for a moment just to stare — until Moody grabbed him firmly by the shoulder and shoved him forward.

He'd managed to sleep, some; with visiting hours not until the afternoon, Sirius had suggested everyone get some rest. Harry hadn't expected to be able to do so after the vision he'd had, but as soon as he was in his bed in his room surrounded by familiar things, he dropped off quite quickly. Luckily, Voldemort had not disturbed him further.

So now he was with the cluster of redheads, as well as Tonks and Moody, headed for St Mungo's. They turned a corner, stopping outside a run-down department store that all the muggles were walking straight past. Harry was only a little surprised when the mannequin beckoned them forward, and he was nudged to step straight through the sheet glass shop front.

Being inside a magical hospital reception was about as chaotic as Harry might have imagined. He hardly knew where to look, seeing people with all sorts of bizarre ailments and injuries. He tried not to stare too hard at any one of them, following Mrs Weasley as she asked the Welcome Witch for directions.

The number of people in lime-green robes was almost blinding, and privately Harry much preferred the muggles with their white coats. Though at least you could find the healers easily, if you needed one. Those robes looked like they would glow in the dark!

An image popped into his head; Draco, older than he was now, wearing one of the vibrant robes and looking down at it as if it was a personal offence to be on his body. His lips twitched with a smile — even the bright green would probably look good on Draco. Attractive bastard.

Harry tried to linger back with Moody and Tonks, but the Weasleys were having none of that, and so he let himself be strong-armed into the ward. Mr Weasley looked to be in good spirits, propped up on several pillows and reading the Daily Prophet. He positively beamed at them all, setting the newspaper aside. “Oh, hello! Bill just left, had to pop into work. Shouldn’t you be at work, too, Charlie?”

“Don’t be daft, Dad,” Charlie said, voice thick with emotion. “Called in sick, didn’t I?”

Mr Weasley’s gaze was an attempt at being scolding, but he was clearly just happy to see his son. He held his good arm out for a hug. “Go on, I won’t break. Just be gentle with me; I’m not one of your dragons, you know!”

Charlie didn’t waste any time, hugging his father as tight as he dared. “Merlin, Dad,” he sighed, pulling back with a strained smile on his face. “Of everyone in the family, I thought it’d be me ending up in the Creature Injuries ward, one of these days.”

“Well, don’t take this as a challenge,” Mrs Weasley muttered roughly, leaning in to kiss her husband’s cheek. “You look peaky, dear.”

Harry hung at the back of the group, letting the Weasleys greet their injured family member, listening to Mr Weasley babble on about the ward and his fellow patients and how his wound was healing. He kept insisting he felt fine, but Harry could see the strain around his eyes, the wrinkles that were a little deeper than usual. He had the look of a man hiding how much pain he was in.

Fred and George began to ask questions; what their dad had been doing in the Ministry, how the snake got in, who had sent it. Really, they needn’t have bothered — Harry had all those answers, thereabouts, and would be happy to tell them most of it later. But it made Mrs Weasley cross, them asking about Order business, so the kids were soon shoved out and told to send Mad-Eye and Tonks in.

That was not going to stop the twins, who pulled a pair of Extendable Ears from their pockets, and set up to listen.

“Dumbledore seems to have been waiting for Harry to see something like this...”

“...Always been something funny about that Potter lad...”

“—Well, if You-Know-Who’s possessing him—“

Harry pulled out his own Extendable Ear, but the damage had been done; the rest of them were looking at him with wary, alarmed gazes.

Harry looked at the twins and Ginny, trying to silently assure them that he knew what was going on. Ron, on the other hand, was staring at Harry like he was Voldemort himself.

They didn’t get a chance to talk further — Mr Weasley needed his bandages checked, and Mrs Weasley decided that was enough for one day. Charlie stayed with his dad, but the rest of them were shuffled off back to Grimmauld. Harry was silent for the whole journey, to the point where even Mrs Weasley noticed.

“Why don’t you all go up to the small drawing room?” she suggested once they were inside the house. In the light of day, Sirius’ renovation efforts were entirely visible; the entrance hall was now a bright, welcoming place, with no screaming portraits or creepy taxidermied house elves in sight. “Or perhaps get a few more hours sleep — especially you, Harry dear, you look like you could use it.”

He nodded, but when he went upstairs he didn’t go to his room. He went with the others to the small drawing room; now a cosy little living room, with squashy sofas and a landscape painting of a forest on the wall above the mantle.

“So are you going to tell us what the hell that was all about, then?” Ron spat, and Harry should’ve known he wouldn’t be able to hold it in much longer.

“I’ve already told you what happened,” Harry sighed, running a hand through his hair. “If Dumbledore knows something about it, that’s news to me.” But wasn’t it telling that the headmaster had apparently been expecting such a thing, even with Harry keeping his previous visions a secret.

“You heard what Moody said,” Ron retorted. “What if You-Know-Who really is possessing you? Are we supposed to just get on with things, let him see all our secrets through your eyes?”

“Don’t think Old Voldie cares much about your secrets, Ronnikins,” Fred remarked wryly.

“Besides, Harry’s not possessed.” Ginny’s voice was sharp. “As the only person in this room who has been possessed by You-Know-Who, I can assure you of that.” She turned to Harry, one red eyebrow raised. “You’re not missing chunks of time, are you? Finding yourself somewhere with no idea how you got there?”

“No.”

“Exactly,” Ginny huffed, glaring at Ron. “Whatever it is, it’s not that.”

“But it is something!” Ron argued. “He wakes up screaming bloody murder about a snake, and a hundred miles away our dad is dying! You heard what he said; he was inside the snake. He bit Dad!”

“That’s enough!”

Harry whipped around — Remus was in the doorway, his eyes flashing gold. “Harry is not a danger,” he declared. “I understand it’s been an emotional twenty-four hours, but yelling about it isn’t going to solve everything.” He paused, giving the barest of frowns. “The headmaster is aware of things, Ron. If he was worried about Harry or anyone else’s safety, he would’ve said something.”

As much as Harry hated it, that was probably the best thing to say to reassure Ron Weasley — Dumbledore was taking care of it. Indeed, it seemed to take the wind out of the redhead’s sails. Harry scowled.

“I’m going to bed,” he muttered, squeezing past Remus and heading for the stairs. He wasn’t surprised to hear the werewolf following him; neither of them spoke until they were in Harry’s room, the door warded. Then, Remus opened his arms, and Harry sank into them gratefully.

“It’s good to see you, cub,” he said, running a hand through Harry’s hair. He leaned down, kissing Harry’s scar tenderly. “Are you alright?”

Harry scoffed. “Really?”

“Fine, stupid question,” Remus agreed, brows drawing together in amusement. He nudged Harry towards the bed, both of them sitting on the edge of the mattress. “What happened? I only got bits and pieces. Arthur is in St Mungo’s?”

Harry relayed the events of the night before, going into more detail with the vision than he had with the Weasley children. “I spoke to Bill — I think the snake is another horcrux.”

Remus’ frown deepened. “That does seem to be the case. I’ll need to speak with Severus to confirm it, but...” He didn’t need to say the rest; if anyone knew what Voldemort’s horcruxes felt like, it was Harry.

“I— there’s something else,” Harry admitted. Slowly, he confessed what had happened when he’d taken the portkey; when he’d looked Dumbledore in the eye by accident.

“You think he knows what you are?” Remus asked, worried. Harry nodded.

“If he didn’t before, he likely does now.” Having Voldemort lunge at him through Harry’s mind was a bit of a giveaway. “But... I’ve been thinking. I bet he’s known since summer, if not beforehand. He’s been avoiding me all term.” He’d thought at first that the lack of eye contact was his own doing, keeping himself safe from the man’s wandering Legilimency, but the more he thought back on it the more he realised that Dumbledore had been the one not even looking anywhere near Harry. “I think he’s worried about what Voldemort can see through me. I think... I think he’s worried Voldemort can do Legilimency from within my mind.”

Remus ran a hand through his hair, letting out a slow breath. “That would explain some of the things Albus has said through Order meetings. Nothing blatant,” he added at Harry’s alarmed look. “Just cryptic comments about making sure you don’t know too much. Sirius and I thought he was just trying to keep you oblivious because he was worried you might piece things together about him, now you’ve broken free of the compulsions.”

“But he’s worried Voldemort can get into my mind, properly.” A bolt of fear shot through Harry. “He can’t, can he?”

“Absolutely not,” Remus said firmly. “Severus has checked for himself; your Occlumency shields are good, and the connection doesn’t work that way. He can access your dreams, draw you into his own mind, but he can’t get at your thoughts or memories.” He gave a wry, bitter smile. “If Voldemort knew what you knew, a lot more people would be dead; Severus likely at the top of the list.”

That was true. The tension eased from Harry’s shoulders. “But the longer he has to research the connection, the higher the chance of him figuring out I’m a horcrux.” Suddenly, he wished he’d been able to stay at Hogwarts for Christmas — the three weeks of break would have been a perfect time to scour Salazar’s library. “I want it out of me, Moony.”

Wiry arms wrapped around him. “I know, cub. Bill’s working on it, I promise you. But as awful as it is, it did allow you to save Arthur’s life last night.” He kissed the crown of Harry’s head. “And look on the bright side; at least Albus will keep out of your head, if he thinks you’ve got company in there.”

A weak smile tugged at Harry’s cheeks. That was a small victory, all things considered; but he’d take it.

He just worried what Dumbledore might do to try and get Voldemort out.

.-.-.-.

To the delight of mostly just Ron and Mrs Weasley, Hermione showed up at Grimmauld Place the next evening; Hogwarts had finished for Christmas, and apparently she had changed her mind about skiing with her parents.

Harry didn’t really care either way; he was keeping to himself for the most part, regardless. The twins and Ginny had mostly accepted his explanation that he knew why he’d seen through the snake’s eyes but he couldn’t tell them, but no one was really in the mood to do anything.

Sirius tried to keep them all busy with hanging Christmas decorations, saying that now he was done with his refurbishment of the house, it deserved to get dressed up for the occasion. Mostly it seemed a way to keep Ron and Hermione away from Harry, as they were all separated into the same pairs they’d been in for the summer’s cleaning efforts.

The animagus had stripped the wallpaper from Harry's room while he was away, but the rest he had waited for Harry to help with. At first, Harry had considered using the same decorating scheme as his room back at Seren Du, but that just made him miss his real home even more. So instead he changed it to a muted red and gold decor, liking the way it made Sirius light up with glee, to see such a Gryffindor room in his family's house.

That evening after dinner, Harry went up to his room to write a letter for Draco, apologising for not being able to say goodbye. He didn't write too much about his vision, just in case, but he wished the blond a good Christmas and promised to write again soon when he could. Signing the letter 'love, Harry' made his stomach flutter. Next time he saw Remus, he would give him the letter to give to Snape; with luck, it would make it to Hogwarts before Christmas Day. Along with it, he passed on the green-wrapped stack of trashy wizarding romance novels he'd had George owl-order for him, wishing he could watch Draco's face when he opened that particular Christmas present.

It took an entire day of hanging around Grimmauld Place, stringing tinsel from every possible surface, before Harry remembered the enormous surprise he had for his godfathers. A devious grin crossed his face. That would cheer them up, for sure!

He managed to get them both to come up to his room without alerting Mrs Weasley, who never liked Harry spending too much time with Sirius. When the door was shut, Sirius eyed him worriedly. "What's the matter, pup? Did you have another vision?"

Harry shook his head, beaming. "No, nothing like that. I need to show you something." Then, without hesitation, he closed his eyes and became a fox.

He'd practiced a lot since the first transformation, and it was much easier now; he still couldn't change mid-stride like Sirius, but it didn't take ten minutes of meditation anymore.

Both men gasped, and Harry cocked his head, sitting on his haunches and watching their faces fill with pride. "Little Red!" Sirius cooed, and Harry hissed at the nickname. They were not calling him that!

Suddenly, Sirius was a huge shaggy dog. Harry's initial fox instinct was to run, but he pushed past it, bounding over to his canine godfather. They bumped noses, sniffing each other, and then Harry was treated to the delight of a big doggy tongue licking right across his muzzle, all the way up to his ear. He glared, feeling the slobber stick to his fur, and swiped out halfheartedly with a paw. Above them, Remus chuckled.

"That's amazing, Harry." Knees cracking with the effort, Remus sank down to sit cross-legged on the floor, holding his arms out expectantly. Harry bounded over, getting right in the man's lap so Remus could study his form. The werewolf smelled different to his keen fox senses, the predator in him obvious — but then he started scratching behind Harry's ear, and Harry melted.

"Gets them every time." Sirius had become human again, and was watching in amusement. "Pretty little thing, aren't you, pup? Let's get a proper look at you."

Remus stopped scratching his head, so Harry shook himself off and hopped between the men, showing off his fluffy tail and needle-sharp teeth. “You’ve done so well, Harry. I didn’t expect you to get it so quickly!”

“It took Jamie and I almost a whole year, and Peter nearly eighteen months.” Sirius was awed, stroking gently down Harry’s back. “Oh, he’s so soft, Moony!” A grin of childlike glee filled his face. “I always wanted a pet fox when I was little, y’know.” He swooped down to grab Harry in a cuddle, careful not to squish him. Harry yowled in mock-annoyance.

“Can you change back?” Remus asked. Harry screwed up his nose in concentration, and the next moment he was human-shaped once more, still in Sirius’ lap. If anything, Sirius just hugged him harder.

“So proud,” he declared, smacking a loud kiss to Harry’s cheek. “Our little prodigy, Moons!”

Harry blushed, unused to such blatant praise.

“Very impressive,” Remus agreed. “We’re incredibly proud.”

“Could I— this summer, if we’re back home...” Harry bit his lip, hesitant. “Could I run with you on the full moon? I’ll be really careful, I promise. I just... I want to be part of it.” It was something his father had done, something that felt like the greatest expression of family he could offer. Remus sucked in a quiet breath.

“We’ll take precautions,” he said eventually, and Harry’s heart soared. “If there’s even a hint of something going wrong, Sirius will get you out of there. But if, by summer, you still want to... we’ll try.” Then, he smiled, tears in his eyes. “I’d love to have you out there with us, Harry.”

Harry beamed at him.

“We’ll have to get you something really special for Christmas,” Sirius enthused. “Something to celebrate. Merlin, if Prongs could see you now!” There was a beat of heavy silence, and Harry swallowed thickly.

“I wish he was here. I wish they both were.” It still felt entirely selfish of Harry, to be pulling together his family when his parents could no longer be part of it. Especially in moments like now, something that was so wrought with echoes of the past. His father should have been the one teaching him his animagus transformation, the one bursting with pride at his success. He never got that chance.

“They are, pup,” Sirius insisted, squeezing him tight, one hand over Harry’s heart. “They’re right here. Always.”

A lump rose in Harry’s throat, and he swallowed past it thickly.

It wasn’t the same, but it would have to be enough.

.-. .

He should have known he couldn't successfully avoid Ron and Hermione forever. They ambushed him while he was in the library, doing his Christmas homework, having just sent a letter off to Susan with Hedwig. She was his best bet for finding out if he'd missed anything important in the last couple days of school, and he wanted to know how her aunt was doing with the Dumbledore case.

The pair walked right up to him, and Harry set his quill down, dread building. What did they want now? Was Ron still mad about the snake thing?

"So are you done being mad at us, yet?" Ron asked. Harry blinked.

"Sorry, what?"

"You've been awful to us since the summer," Hermione burst out. "I know it upset you that we didn't write to you, but Dumbledore told us not to say anything about the Order or where we were."

"Even if we had written to you it would've just pissed off your relatives," Ron added mulishly. "You can't be angry at us for that, mate."

"I know you had a bad summer, and we're really sorry, but honestly, Harry, you've been ignoring us all term and it's just not fair! We might have made mistakes, but we don't deserve the cold shoulder from you." Hermione spoke very quickly, like she'd rehearsed what she was going to say and wanted to get it all out before she was interrupted.

Harry stared at them both incredulously. What??

"I'm not ignoring you because you didn't write to me over the summer," he said flatly. They both looked taken-aback. "I'm ignoring you because I don't want to be friends with you anymore."

Ron's face went red with anger. "You just decided that, did you?" he snarled. "What, you're too good for us now?"

"You made it pretty clear how little our friendship meant when you decided to believe I'd put my own name in the Goblet of Fire, and spend half the year talking shit about me behind my back because of it!" Harry retorted sharply.

"Harry, he apologised for that," Hermione huffed, but Harry just rolled his eyes.

"Because you made him. And it didn't stop him saying things when he thought I wouldn't hear them." With Lavender and Parvati as his friends, Harry had heard every awful thing Ron had said about him. There was no way the redhead could come back from that, even if he wasn't spying for Dumbledore.

"But what about all the things we've gone through?" Hermione was tearful now. "The troll, and the stone, and everything with the Heir of Slytherin! Third year when you thought Sirius was trying to kill you. The Triwizard Tournament!"

“Shared trauma doesn’t mean I’m obliged to be friends with you, Hermione. Besides; you didn’t go through half of those! I was alone when I faced Quirrell, I was alone when I killed the basilisk, and seeing as I hardly spoke to either of you last year, you can’t say you were with me for the tournament either?”

“So you’re just going to throw it all away?” Hermione sobbed. “Four years of friendship?” She wiped at her eyes, then grew serious. “Harry, if this is about your vision — if you’re trying to push us away because you think Voldemort is in your head, that’s ridiculous.” She reached out to grab his hand, but he pulled back. “We’re here for you, Harry.”

“Now, when it suits you. When there’s things happening to me that you want to know about,” Harry shot back. “You always want to know everything, Hermione; where I’m going, what I’m doing — for the longest time I thought that was how friendship was supposed to go! But I know better, now. I’ve got real friends, now. Honest friends, who let me have my space and my secrets, and don’t treat me like I’m incapable of doing my own bloody homework without help.”

“Don’t talk to her like that,” Ron growled.

“I’ll talk to her how I want; she does the same to me!” Harry shouted. He got to his feet, grabbing his schoolwork in a haphazard bundle. “I’m sick of you two treating me like a child, and I understand that with things the way they are we’ll end up being around each other more often than not, but we’re not friends, alright? Friends don’t treat each other the way you’ve treated me. So just leave me alone.”

Before they could argue further, Harry stormed from the room — he hated the knot in his chest, hated that there was still a small part of him that wanted to rush back in there and apologise and smooth everything over, until they could all go back to the way things were. But he had seen too much of their true colours by now, and he knew there was no place for them in the life he was building for himself.

That didn’t mean it didn’t hurt to say it.

.-. .

Utterly oblivious to his godson’s emotional turmoil happening downstairs, Sirius was in one of the little-used upstairs parlours, a Bowie record spinning on the player, enjoying a bit of peace — and avoiding Molly Weasley.

He’d grown used to being mostly alone in the house outside Order meetings. Since the kids had gone to school, pretty much the only visitors he had were Remus, the two Weasley boys, Tonks and Kingsley. He had liked it that way.

Now the house was full again, and while he was delighted to have Harry back... it was a lot. Molly was a lot. While she was grateful he was allowing them to stay for the holidays, given the house’s proximity to St Mungo’s, she had gone right back into the mindset she’d had in the summer; namely, forgetting it was Sirius’ house and not her own. She had more opinions than he cared for about his decorating choices, and had entirely re-arranged his kitchen cupboards to her liking without so much as a by-your-leave. Sirius didn’t have it in him to argue, not when he knew it would just end in another disappointed lecture from Albus about doing his part for the cause.

Because obviously letting Molly Weasley run roughshod over his silverware was absolutely vital to the war effort.

At least she couldn't throw out his family heirlooms in the name of cleaning anymore. Indeed, she didn't seem to know what to do with herself, now the house was in decent shape. It gave her less to needle him over in Order meetings, too; he was no longer the ragged escaped convict living in a disgusting, Dark hovel — a terrible role model for poor young Harry.

Sirius chuckled to himself. She didn't have much of a leg to stand on, anymore.

So lost in his thoughts, Sirius didn't notice the door creeping open.

"Is this a private party, or can anyone join in?" The smooth, lightly amused voice made the hair on the back of his neck stand on end, and Sirius looked up as Charlie Weasley snuck inside, shutting the door in his wake.

"Not just anyone, but I suppose you're alright," Sirius teased, winking. Charlie laughed, the sound tripping over Sirius' quickening pulse. "Thought you were with your dad."

"Just got back. They had to change his bandages again, and he hates us watching that." Charlie grimaced, and Sirius frowned; Arthur was having an awful lot of bandage changes, from the sounds of it. Was the venom still so potent?

Charlie sat down on the sofa beside Sirius, rather than in the armchair opposite. Sirius tried not to tense. "Harry's on the warpath again, by the way," the redhead remarked ruefully. "Heard him yelling at Ron and Hermione in the library on my way up. Sounds like they tried to tell him to get over himself and be friends with them again."

Sirius rolled his eyes. "Bet Harry loved that." He was surprised he hadn't heard the yelling from all the way up here. Harry had Lily's lungs on him when he truly got going.

"Gonna make for an interesting Christmas, that mix," Charlie mused. "Can't say I'm sad we're spending it here, though."

His blue eyes met Sirius' with a pointed kind of heat, and Sirius felt his breath catch, his tongue sticking to the roof of his mouth.

He hadn't thought Charlie's flirting would go on this long. He'd fully expected the redhead to laugh him off after a while; get bored, switch targets. Instead, he only seemed to get bolder. More serious.

Sirius was beginning to wonder if the flirting had ever been a joke to begin with.

"You won't miss your dragons over Christmas, then?" he asked lightly. A syrup-smooth chuckle spilled from Charlie's lips.

"I'll still see them plenty. But they're not much for the winter; half of them are snuggled up in their nests 'til spring." He gave the full force of that dimpled smile in Sirius' direction, and the animagus felt the urge to press his thumbs into the divots of those cheeks — preferably as he got up close and personal with the inside of Charlie's mouth.

He swallowed hard. "That's good, then. The more the merrier, round here."

"All we need is Dad healed up and back home, and it'll be a proper party," Charlie agreed. His eyes sparkled, the sapphire blue catching the light beautifully. "Maybe if I'm a good boy I'll get my Christmas wish early."

"Oh?" Sirius shouldn't, he should get up, walk away— this was wrong, he couldn't, he shouldn't.

And yet as the dragon tamer leaned in, his intentions clear, Sirius could do nothing but tilt his chin up and accept the kiss.

It was short, and relatively chaste, but it rattled Sirius right down to his very bones. He hadn't kissed someone in years — since before Azkaban — and he wasn't sure if the dementors had tarnished his memories or if Charlie was just that good, but it felt incredible.

Charlie didn't push his luck, and pulled back after a few moments. But there was a pleased light in his eyes and a flush across his lightly tanned cheeks. His hand rested on Sirius' knee, palm like a brand through the denim of Sirius' jeans. "That wasn't a good idea," Sirius whispered weakly. Charlie's lips twitched, amused.

"Wasn't it? Felt pretty good to me."

Sirius felt his own cheeks redden. "Charlie, I— I'm flattered. But we can't. We shouldn't. I'm too old for you, for Merlin's sake; I'm an escaped convict. Your mother would kill me."

"None of those reasons are that you don't fancy me back," Charlie said knowingly. Sirius stayed silent; he couldn't argue that. Charlie would know it was a lie.

"We shouldn't," he repeated instead. Charlie darted forward to press a kiss to the corner of his mouth, his nose pressing briefly against Sirius' cheek.

"I'm old enough to know what I want, Sirius," he breathed. "And I want you, very much. I think we'd go well together." Then he grinned roguishly, and Sirius' stomach flared with heat. "But if you need a bit of convincing, I'm happy to oblige."

Getting up from the chair with catlike grace, he passed in front of Sirius — giving the animagus an eyeful of those powerful thighs and shapely arse in very tight jeans — and trailed his fingers across the line of Sirius' shoulder. "I'll see you at dinner." A flutter of a smirk. "Great album choice, by the way. I'm more of a Diamond Dogs fan myself. Maybe we can compare collections sometime."

He strode confidently from the room, leaving Sirius alone once more; feeling very much like he might be in over his head.

Chapter 60

Even with the minor upset of Percy Weasley's returned Christmas present, and the still-stewing anger of Ron and Hermione, Harry still managed to have an excellent Christmas morning. The pile of presents at the end of his bed was even larger than it had been the year before — and somehow, someone had snuck in his present from Draco, which was a gorgeous blown-glass fox figurine that made his heart ache fondly. He wondered how the blond was doing, back at Hogwarts.

At least he wasn't at home, with Voldemort.

Harry hoped Narcissa Malfoy was doing okay.

"Merry Christmas, Harry!" Ginny called as he headed down the stairs. "Thanks for the book!" He had given her a book all about the best female quidditch players in history, most of whom were Harpies players. Harry grinned at her, returning the sentiment.

"Merry Christmas, kiddo!" Sirius beamed, wrapping him in a tight hug. He'd been acting odd the last couple of days, but he seemed to be fine now, and Harry hugged him back.

"Thanks for everything. Merry Christmas." Harry had been truly spoiled by his godfather — both of them, in fact.

With Mrs Weasley commandeering the kitchen for an enormous Christmas lunch, they were all kicked out of the basement room; except Bill, who was trusted enough to help with the preparations.

Instead, they gathered in the bigger living room; Fred and George had a new board game from Bill, one that spewed brightly coloured smoke every time a player made a bad move, and they were delighting in playing that with Ginny, Charlie and Ron — the redhead couldn't be properly furious on Christmas, so he was just avoiding Harry. Hermione was sat nearby, reading one of her new books.

Harry made himself comfortable on the sofa between Sirius and Remus, relishing in the joy of being with his family at Christmas.

If only he could have all of them there. Next year, perhaps.

He wriggled round on the sofa, leaning his head on Remus' shoulder and peering at the pages of the book the man was reading. "I wish Snape could be here," he murmured quietly. Remus looked down at him, shocked.

"I— really?"

"Of course. He's family." He might be a grouchy bastard, but the worst of that was for show. Remus deserved to spend Christmas with the man he loved.

The werewolf's face softened, and he dropped a quick kiss to Harry's forehead. "I'm glad you think so, cub. I wish he could be here too, but he's got Slytherins to take care of. He's with Draco." Harry was glad for that; glad his boyfriend had his godfather with him.

"Are you going to see him later?" Remus had been living at Grimmauld since Harry had returned.

"Tomorrow, I think. We'll both be busy today. I want to give that poor fellow in the ward with Arthur a bit of company."

Harry knew the one; the recently turned werewolf, who never said a word but always watched the family gather around Mr Weasley with sad, yearning eyes. Harry had never seen him have a visitor. "That'll be nice." Perhaps Remus could put him in touch with one of the packs.

Christmas lunch was exactly the chaos he expected, with the twins trying to sneak pranks into the food, aided by Sirius — and Charlie, though Mrs Weasley didn't seem to notice that child of hers getting involved. Harry ate until he was fit to burst, and regretted that slightly when he found himself clambering into the back of a magically-expanded car between Remus and Ginny. He was grateful when Remus discreetly slipped a vial of Stomach-Settling potion his way, labelled with Snape's spidery handwriting.

St Mungo's was appropriately festive when they arrived, heading straight for the Llewellyn ward. Mr Weasley accepted his pile of gifts with a bright smile — that quickly faltered under the keen eye of his wife, when she began to question his off-schedule bandage change.

The rest of them sensed the brewing argument, and Harry began to wonder if he could slip off and join Remus by the werewolf man's bedside, when Ginny gripped him by the wrist. "Let's go for a walk, yeah?" she hissed, dragging him backwards out of the ward.

"Where are we going?" Harry asked, once they were safely out of Mrs Weasley's explosion radius. Ginny shrugged.

"Bill said something about a drink. Should we go find the tearoom?"

It was as good a suggestion as any, so they set off for the stairs. "Neville's around here, somewhere," Ginny commented offhandedly. Harry's stride faltered.

"Yeah?" Harry knew only one reason why his blond friend would be in the hospital on Christmas.

"His gran doesn't let him visit too often. But they come every year on Christmas Day." Ginny sounded sad. Harry, very much out of his depth with this sort of thing, cleared his throat awkwardly.

"He's, uh, told you a bit about his parents, then?" He knew Ginny and Neville hung out when he wasn't around — sometimes with Luna, sometimes not — but he had absolutely no clue what they talked about, considering Ginny was dating Michael Corner and Neville was pretending to be fine with that. It sounded unbearably awkward to him, but whenever he was brave enough to ask Neville about it, the other Gryffindor just said that his feelings weren't going to stop him being friends with Ginny.

Harry was very glad his own love life wasn't that complicated, threat of Lucius Malfoy aside.

"Yeah, he's told me. It's so sad."

Harry hummed in agreement. There wasn't much else to say on the matter. "And, ah, what's Michael up to, this Christmas?"

Ginny's face hardened. "I wouldn't know," she muttered angrily. "We broke up."

That was brand new information to Harry, and his eyes went wide. "What? Why didn't you tell me?" Why hadn't Neville told him? Did Neville even know?

"Never had the chance." Ginny glanced at the floor evasively, and Harry narrowed his eyes. There was a story, there; perhaps he could get her to spill it over a cup of terrible hospital tea.

But all thoughts of pestering Ginny for details flew from his head when they reached the fourth floor landing, and came face to face with the subject of their conversation. One of them, at least.

"Ginny!" Neville blinked, startled. "Harry! What are you doing here?"

"Visiting Dad," Ginny explained. Her cheeks gained the faintest red flush. "It's, uh, good to see you."

Neville blushed too, and then a throat cleared pointedly behind him. Harry looked past his friend, seeing a woman in a rather impressive vulture-topped hat that could only be Mrs Longbottom herself. "Neville. Introduce me."

Harry took a half-step forward, palms open. "Well met, Dowager Longbottom," he greeted, bowing in respect, hoping desperately he had the correct form of address.

A keen-eyed smile crossed the woman's age-weathered face. "Ah, of course. Well met indeed, Heir Potter." She held out a hand, and Harry kissed the back of it. "A pleasure to finally meet you."

"The pleasure is all mine," Harry assured her earnestly. "I know it's quite late, but I'd like to thank you in person for all the help you gave me in my third year."

Her smile widened, something like approval in her eyes. "The Potter-Longbottom alliance has stood strong for generations," she said. "I am glad to help it flourish for another."

Neville looked a mix of pleased and petrified, shuffling awkwardly from foot to foot. "Um, Gran," he stuttered. "This is Ginny Weasley. My friend."

Ginny's face coloured further, but she managed a slightly clumsy half-curtsey. "Nice to meet you, Mrs Longbottom."

“Indeed,” Mrs Longbottom said. “I’ve heard quite a bit about you.”

Neville blushed brightly, making Harry wonder exactly what his friend had told his grandmother about the Weasley girl. “Come along, Neville. Visiting hours won’t last forever.”

Neville nodded, then paused, turning back to the pair of them. “Would you—I mean—do you want to come meet my parents?” He looked hopeful, and Harry’s chest squeezed.

“We’d love to,” he said immediately, and Ginny nodded at her side. “If—if it’s alright, of course, Lady Longbottom.” Harry added hesitantly, not wanting to overstep. Neville’s time with his parents was precious; he didn’t want to intrude.

“If Neville is happy with it, then that is alright by me. This way.”

She led them in the direction of the Janus Thickey ward, and Harry stayed respectfully half a step behind her.

“How are you faring, Mr Potter?” she questioned, glancing his way. “I have heard some from Neville, of course — he’s told me all about how enterprising young Miss Bones is.” There was the faintest smile flickering at her wrinkled cheeks. “But with things the way they are at school, correspondance has been rather sparse. I have to make do with what I see in the papers, and I can’t say I’m overly impressed.”

By the look on her face, there were several things she’d like to say to Dolores Umbridge, and Harry wished he could sit in on the next Wizengamot session where both women were present.

“I’m preparing for my OWLs as best I can,” he replied, not wanting to say too much in such a public place. “And helping my friends with their studies, too.”

“Glad to hear it. Getting on well with your teachers? The headmaster?” Her gaze was shrewd. Again, Harry nodded.

“They’re all rather busy, though, with the inspections happening. Especially Professor Dumbledore.”

Mrs Longbottom harrumphed, removing her wand to unlock the door of the ward. Harry glanced over his shoulder — behind them, Neville and Ginny were walking close together; so close their hands were brushing. When Neville realised his gran was watching, he cleared his throat and put his hands in his pockets.

“They’re, uh, over here,” he said, leading the way towards two curtained-off beds in the back corner. Harry tried not to stare at the rest of the patients — though he did a double-take at the sight of Gilderoy Lockhart, sat writing his name over and over with a peacock feather quill, smiling happily to himself.

He didn’t have long to think about it, though; Neville stopped in front of the beds and pulled the curtain back carefully, a shaky smile on his face. “Hi, Mum. Hi, Dad. Merry Christmas.”

He reached into his grandmother's large handbag, pulling out a pair of squishy packages in shiny paper. "I brought you these. And, uh, I've got some friends with me, too. They'd like to meet you."

Harry shuffled closer, peering over Neville's shoulder. Mr and Mrs Longbottom were a far cry from the happy, rosy-cheeked couple Harry had seen in Moody's picture of the original Order of the Phoenix. They were worn and gaunt-faced, bodies frail and hair pure white. But when they looked at Neville, even though their eyes were unfocused, they both beamed.

Neville set a present each on their laps, leaning in to kiss them on the cheek one at a time, heartbreakingly soft. Harry stepped forward, clearing his throat. "Hello, Mrs Longbottom," he greeted in a hoarse almost-whisper, stood beside the woman's bed. She looked at him, though her eyes were blank. "I'm Harry Potter. I think you knew my mum." He knew from stories that Alice Hopkins, as she had been before she married, was one of Lily Evans' Gryffindor roommates, and best friends.

Alice Longbottom continued to stare at him, her fingers digging weakly into the paper-wrapped present.

"I just wanted to say," he continued, speaking loud enough for Frank Longbottom to hear, too — he was looking over, curious in a sort of dazed way. "Your son is the best friend I've ever had, and you both should be very proud of him." He heard Neville gasp softly, but didn't look away from Alice's vacant gaze. She reached up, patting him on the cheek.

"James," she muttered, letting out a feeble little giggle, then turned to focus on opening her Christmas present.

Harry stood there, shocked, for several moments. Eventually, an aged hand curled around his shoulder. "That was a very fine thing to say, Mr Potter," Mrs Longbottom said quietly. The pair of them watched as Neville introduced Ginny to his dad, and Harry wondered if Ginny saw the adoration in Neville's eyes as she didn't hesitate to begin chattering to the man like an old friend.

"It's the truth," he said, looking up at the woman with challenge in his eyes. "Neville's brilliant. And you should see how well he's doing in our defence club."

The old woman sighed. "Sometimes I fear in trying to teach him how wonderful his parents were, I put far too much expectation on that boy's shoulders. He's lucky to have a friend like you, Mr Potter."

"I'm the lucky one," he insisted. "And— I know it's not my place, so please excuse my impertinence, but Neville needs a new wand." He had to take his chance, while Neville was distracted. "His father's wand isn't suited to him at all, and it's holding him back. I know you want to honour your son's memory, but... being friends with me is dangerous. I wouldn't want Neville to get into trouble and have a spell fail him because his wand isn't truly his."

It was mean, perhaps, to play on the old woman's fear for her grandson like that — but it was also the truth. In the last few months, Harry had seen Neville's spells go awry for no reason whatsoever, even when he was doing everything right. It was the wand's fault, and that could get him killed.

Mrs Longbottom's mouth tightened, and Harry wondered if he had gone too far. Then, she nodded tersely. "I shall look into it. Thank you for the recommendation." She looked down at him, grey-blue eyes betraying her amusement. "That impertinence of yours could make life difficult, when you come of age."

Harry grinned back. "Sometimes, difficult is necessary."

"As is impertinence," Mrs Longbottom agreed knowingly.

Harry suspected that had been some sort of test, and he hoped he passed muster. Mrs Longbottom was a very intimidating woman, even without all the stories Neville had told him. But Harry would not be cowed, not when his friend's life was at stake.

"It never gets easier, seeing them like this," Mrs Longbottom sighed.

"Harry, come meet my dad," Neville urged bright-eyed, and so Harry didn't reply, instead smiling at his friend as he went to gently shake Frank Longbottom's hand.

He thought, perhaps, that the reason Mrs Longbottom did not allow her grandson to visit his parents often was not because she wanted to keep them separated, but because it was too painful a reminder for herself.

.-. .

He and Ginny didn't stay too long with the Longbottom family, not wanting to intrude on their entire Christmas visit. Frank seemed far more entertained with the shiny paper of his present than the soft cardigan inside, but Alice immediately wrapped herself in her brand new yellow shawl with a sunny smile.

When they left, Ginny kissed Neville on the cheek, and Harry squeezed his shoulder. "I'll see you back at school," he said, and Neville nodded.

"Thanks for this. It's nice, I think, for them to meet new people."

"Thank you for letting us meet them," Ginny returned. She, likely even more than Harry, knew how important Neville's parents were to him, even though he rarely spoke of them at school.

"I hope your dad gets better soon. I'll write to you, yeah?"

Harry let Neville and Ginny smile and blush at each other for a bit, and then he gently took Ginny by the arm, leading her out of the ward and back to the stairs.

"His parents are so sweet," Ginny murmured sadly once they were alone. Harry nodded. He could only imagine what Frank and Alice Longbottom had been like before the Lestranges had stolen their minds. "What was all that weird formal stuff with you and Mrs Longbottom, though?"

Harry froze — with all the secrets she did know, Harry forgot that Ginny was still mostly unaware of Harry's political standing. She knew that Dumbledore had blocked his family magics, but she didn't know what that meant in the context of the wizarding world. She didn't know anything about what he and Neville were up to with Susan and the other heirs.

"I'll tell you later," he promised; they were getting closer to Mr Weasley's ward. "I think we've got a lot to talk about, anyway." He gave her a pointed look, and she flushed and clenched her jaw.

"Don't know what you're talking about," she lied weakly. Harry let it slide, as they returned to the Llewellyn ward where Mrs Weasley seemed to be done yelling about stitches.

They could talk back at Grimmauld.

.-. .

With most of the occupants of Grimmauld Place out at the hospital visiting Arthur, it was the perfect chance for Sirius to go to Seren Du for a bit of fresh air. The Welsh countryside was blanketed in thick snow, and there was nothing he loved more than running through it as Padfoot before coming indoors and warming up by a nice toasty fire. It would have been better with Harry, but he was happy enough alone.

He was in high spirits when he returned to Grimmauld — though they sank immediately when Tonks hurried into the kitchen. "There you are! I've been looking everywhere for you." Her eyes narrowed suspiciously. "You didn't go out, did you?"

Sirius gave her a considering look. His little cousin was proving herself to be a fine member of the Black family — what the family had once been, before the darkness and madness. What Sirius wanted the family to be again. She had kept all his secrets so far... perhaps it was time to trust her with a little more.

"Has your mum ever told you about the Black family summer home?" he asked casually. Tonks looked bewildered.

"You what?"

"The family summer home. We used to spend a lot of time there as children. It's really quite something." He met her eyes, bright purple today, and drew his eyebrows together. "You should really ask her about it sometime. Remind her of the teas we used to have. Four o'clock, every Sunday afternoon." His smile was perfectly innocent, as if he was just reminiscing on a fond childhood memory. But he could tell from the way Tonks' shoulders shifted that she'd caught on.

"I'll do that," she promised. "Sounds like a fun place to be."

Sirius smirked. "It certainly was," he agreed.

Remus might get angry at him for being too hasty, but Sirius knew what Black family loyalty was like. If he could trust Cissa, he could trust Andi.

And maybe in time he could get them to trust each other once more.

.-.-.-

To her credit, Ginny didn't try too hard to avoid Harry in the days that followed. He let her have Christmas, and Boxing Day, but on the 27th he shot her a loaded glance over lunch, and when he went up to the little-used parlour on the family floor, she came with him.

He warded the room discreetly, not wanting Ginny to realise he was using magic outside of school. Then he gestured to the sofa, a hand-knitted blanket draped over the back. "So," he began, once they were both sat down. "Tell me about Michael."

That didn't seem to be what Ginny was expecting. She blinked, thrown off-guard, then bit her lip. "I... I did like him, at first. Not as much as... I did like him." Harry wasn't sure if she was trying to convince him or herself, and stayed silent. "He was sweet, and he wasn't expecting any promises or anything. But it was nice, y'know? At least at first. Then... When I was with him, I just started feeling this awful guilt. Like I was cheating even though I wasn't. And sometimes I would see Neville look at me..."

She shuddered. Harry knew the looks she was speaking of.

"I talked to Nev a couple of times, and he said I should just do what made me happy. That he could wait for me to figure out what I wanted. But even just sitting and studying with him made me feel ten times better than anything I did with Michael."

"Please don't go into detail," Harry urged, looking a bit nauseous, and Ginny giggled.

"Ask me no questions, I'll tell you no lies," she teased. Then she sobered once more, tugging at her braid. "I think Michael could tell something was off. He started getting... weird. All possessive, wanting to know way too much about who I was with and what I was doing all day. Trying to tell me who I could and couldn't hang out with." Her brown eyes flashed angrily. "Then about a week before we came here, Michael and I had this horrible fight. He got really jealous about how much time I spent with you and Neville. Said that he hated when I was in my common room instead of in the library or wherever because he couldn't keep an eye on me, that he couldn't trust me when I wasn't with him. I yelled at him about it — we agreed when we got together that it wouldn't be anything serious. We both said terrible things, but he said some really gross things about me and I just couldn't take it anymore, so I dumped him."

Her eyes began to water, and suddenly she let out a sob. "The worst part, though, was when he said I'd been leading him on, and I couldn't even deny it because fuck, I was."

Ginny started to cry, and Harry shuffled closer to wind an arm around her. She fell into him, tears seeping into his t-shirt. "You said you told him it wasn't serious," Harry pointed out.

"Yeah but I still agreed to be his girlfriend knowing it wasn't going to go anywhere! Knowing I didn't feel about him like I was supposed to."

"Maybe that wasn't the smartest idea," Harry agreed, wincing. "But that doesn't give him the right to be a prick about it. That stuff about keeping an eye on you in the common room is way out of order."

"He was right, though," Ginny sniffed. "I mean, Neville and I never did anything, not while I was with Michael. But I wanted to. Isn't that bad enough?"

"I'm not gonna sit here and tell you you're a bad person, Gin," Harry sighed. "I think you've done some stupid things, but that doesn't mean you deserve to be treated like that by anyone. Get George to give you his lecture about consent sometime; it's a doozy." Ginny giggled weakly.

"I never should've dated Michael in the first place."

Well, Harry wasn't going to argue about that. "Why did you?" he blurted. "I mean, I know it's none of my business, but... I thought you and Neville really had something, after the Yule Ball."

"We did," Ginny groaned, shaking her head against Harry's chest. "Merlin, Harry, Neville is... I'm in love with him. I know I am. I think I've known since the Yule Ball, deep down. But I've definitely known since I kissed him on the Express at the end of last year."

Harry went wide-eyed. "Nev didn't tell me about that."

"Really?" Ginny looked up at him with red-rimmed eyes. "Oh. Well, yeah. I kissed him, before the train pulled in to the platform. And I spent all summer thinking about him and I just got so scared because I am way too young to be in love. Like, I always dreamed when I was a kid about finding Prince Charming, y'know? The one man who would sweep me off my feet and that would be it, forever. All those fairytales mum would tell me — the ones where the prince would have black hair and green eyes."

Harry made a face, and Ginny stuck her tongue out at him.

"But I always thought I'd find him, y'know, when I'm twenty-five and playing for the Harpies or whatever. When I've got my life together. When I've had the chance to fail at dating and make stupid decisions about boys for a few years. Not at the age of bloody thirteen."

"Well, I don't know about having your life together, but I'd say you've managed the whole 'fail at dating and make stupid decisions about boys' part," Harry said dryly, earning a whack to the shoulder. "Look, Gin... if Neville is your Prince Charming, then that's that. Maybe he is, and you'll never date anyone but him. Maybe he isn't and you'll break up when he graduates and then when you're twenty-five and playing for the Harpies you'll find some other Prince Charming. But is it really fair on either of you to keep pushing him away and dating boys you don't even care about just because you're too scared of your own feelings? I thought you were a Gryffindor."

The redhead snarled at the insinuation she wasn't meeting house standards, but then her face fell. "It doesn't matter anymore, anyway. I've been such a shit to Neville, dating Michael, flirting with all those other boys right in front of him. Just telling him to wait until I was ready. He's probably sick of waiting by now, after me stringing him along for almost a year."

Privately, Harry doubted Neville would ever be sick of waiting for Ginny Weasley. But he didn't deserve that treatment, and he would never say that himself. So Harry would do it for him. "Yeah, you have been a shit to him," he agreed. "And if he's not interested anymore, that's just something you'll have to live with." Ginny looked heartbroken at the prospect. "But dating more random guys isn't going to help that. It's not going to make you any less in love with him. And it's certainly not going to convince him that you're ready to give things a try."

"I know," Ginny agreed plaintively. "I'm done, with all that. After Michael... I don't want a boyfriend just for the sake of having one. Just to try things out. I want a boyfriend that matters, or none at all." She took a shaky breath. "I want Neville," she admitted in a small voice.

"Then when we get back after Christmas, you go and apologise to him, and grovel if you have to, and tell him how you feel. All of how you feel. Or write it in a letter, if telling him is too scary."

Ginny's hand gripped his, knuckles turning white. "I didn't mean for things to get this complicated," she insisted quietly. "I just — it felt so big, so much, and I thought for sure it couldn't be that so I flirted with all those other boys to try and prove that I wasn't some silly little girl who falls arse-over-teakettle for the first boy to actually pay attention to me. I thought I'd start feeling for them like I felt for Neville and it might get a little less scary."

Harry pursed his lips, thinking it over. "Gin," he said slowly. "You remember the Yule Ball, when I disappeared for a bit?"

"And came back looking like you'd been ravished?" she teased. He nodded, and her eyes widened. "Is this about your secret boyfriend that the twins and Neville know about but you won't tell me?"

"You can't tell anyone, I mean it," he said seriously. "He could be killed if anyone finds out."

"I won't tell a soul. Not even Charlie." Considering the dragon tamer was her favourite brother, that was a strong promise.

"I've been dating Draco Malfoy since the first task," he admitted, getting the familiar happy butterflies in his belly when he remembered their first kiss, over a year ago now. Ginny gaped.

"Malfoy? But— oh my God, him coming to talk to you on the train makes so much more sense now." Harry nodded.

"We started being friends in my third year. In secret, obviously. His dad's an absolute piece of shit, and he'd kill Draco if he knew we were even civil, let alone how important he is to me."

"And you've kept it secret, all this time?"

He nodded again. “You’re now the fourth person at school to know.” He didn’t count Snape. “Sirius and Remus know, too. Sirius is cousins with his mum, Narcissa. She knows; she’s really nice, she’s just stuck married to a Death Eater.”

“That’s awful,” Ginny murmured sadly.

“The point is,” Harry continued, “I’m in love with Draco. Completely besotted, absolutely embarrassingly in love with him. And yeah, it terrifies me,” he said freely. “I’ve never kissed anyone but him, and if I have my way, I never will. But I don’t think I’m missing out. I can’t talk for what it’s like to do anything with anyone else. And I’m not saying you should only date people you’re in love with, or whatever. But knowing how amazing it feels, just being with him... I don’t understand why you’re denying yourself that.” He gave a rueful smile. “We could both be killed if the wrong person finds out about us. Hell, I might get killed by Voldemort before I graduate. So maybe the fear of losing him is greater than the fear of loving him. But, look at it this way — you’re gonna feel the way you do about Neville whether you’re dating him or not. Isn’t it better to just... accept it, and be happy?”

The redhead was silent for a long time, leaning gently against Harry’s shoulder, her fingers twisting in the edge of the blanket on the sofa. “I think I’ve fucked it all up, Harry,” she said in a heartbroken whisper.

“I don’t know about that,” Harry mused. “Nev’s a good bloke. And he cares a lot about you. Hell, the fact that he didn’t even blink when you dated Michael proves that. Maybe the two of you need a bit of time to straighten out some hurt feelings, but I don’t think it’s ruined. It might be, if you keep acting like he’s always going to be there, though. Like he’s your back-up choice, or your afterthought.”

She looked horrified. “I don’t think that!”

“Well it looks like it, sometimes,” Harry said bluntly. She needed to know how much she’d hurt Neville. Even if it hurt her in the process. “It looks like you’re gonna go off and have your fun and when you’re bored of all the other boys you’ll come back and settle for Neville.”

Ginny looked like she was going to be sick at the very idea of it. Harry squeezed her gently, kissing her head. “If you love him, tell him. It’ll eat you up inside if you don’t.” He knew that from experience. “I’m gonna leave you to think for a bit — we’ve been up here long enough, and if your mum figures it out she’ll either castrate me or start planning the wedding,” he said with a grimace. “But I’m always around if you need to talk, yeah? And if not me, you’ve got four other brothers in this house who are probably less useless with relationship advice and have way more experience.”

“You’re not useless, Harry,” Ginny insisted. “I—I think I needed to hear all that. Even the hard bits. Go on, I’ll be fine. Might just have a cry for a bit,” she said, wiping at her eyes. Then she managed a grin that was a shadow of its usual cheeky self. “But later you’re gonna tell me all the juicy gossip about Draco Malfoy, yeah? And whatever you didn’t want to tell me at St Mungo’s.”

Harry grinned — it would be nice, having a new person to gush about Draco to. Everyone else was a bit sick of it. “Deal,” he agreed, getting to his feet and leaving her in the parlour by herself.

He just wanted both her and Neville to be happy. Whether it was together, or not.

.-.-.-.

Severus had been expecting the summons from the moment he’d heard about Arthur Weasley’s attack.

“You wanted to see me, Headmaster?”

Albus smiled genially at him across the desk. “Ah, Severus. Come in, come in. Lemon drop?”

Severus resisted the urge to roll his eyes, sending the bowl of sweets a disparaging glance. Albus just chuckled. “I have a request to make of you, my boy. A rather necessary one, I’m afraid.” The man’s twinkling gaze grew serious behind his glasses. “I must ask you to teach Harry Potter Occlumency.”

Severus let his face twist in outrage. “Albus, you cannot believe Potter has the brain capacity for such a thing? The boy is barely more intelligent than a flobberworm.”

“Now, now, Severus; Harry has been doing remarkably well in his classes, lately.” Severus hid his smirk; a little too well, for Albus’ liking. “Regardless, it is imperative that he learn to close off his mind. This vision he suffered, from Nagini’s mind... it speaks of dark forces at work. I’m afraid I have recognised Voldemort behind Harry’s eyes, and we must make sure he is not able to get a proper foothold. Harry has seen too much — Headquarters, the faces of the Order members, even beyond that. We cannot allow that information to get into the wrong hands.”

“Albus, you can’t be serious,” Severus continued to protest. “Why don’t you teach the boy? He will trust you far more.”

That made Albus smile, false concern hiding his satisfaction with Harry’s perceived loyalty. “I would if I could, but I’m afraid the Dark Lord’s anger at my person is enough to bring him to the surface. I attempted Legilimency on young Harry after his vision — to try and see for myself, of course, to find a way to help him — but the mind that rose to fight me was not his. I fear my presence within Harry’s mind will merely draw Voldemort through even stronger. It must be you, Severus.”

Severus did not point out that, should Voldemort actually be residing in Harry Potter’s mind, having him — a spy, supposedly loyal to the Dark Lord — enter it with the intention of doing anything helpful was as good as signing his own death warrant. Perhaps Albus was finally trying to dispose of him.

“I know it will be difficult to get Harry to trust you, but you must try. He needs to learn to close off his mind. And... you, my boy, need to learn how far Voldemort has his claws into the boy.”

Severus’ spine tingled. Ah; now they were reaching the heart of the matter. “Pardon?”

“Harry has been... unlike himself, this year. Withdrawing himself from Miss Granger and young Mr Weasley. Spending a lot of time alone. Improving extraordinarily quickly in his classes. Quick to anger, and convinced of his own correctness. He is, perhaps... a little too mature, for his age. I worry about the side-effects of the Dark Lord’s resurrection ritual. If there was any backlash.”

...Albus was trying to make Severus believe that Harry Potter was some sort of shade of Tom Riddle, a puppet walking around the school.

How stupid did he think Severus was?

“That would be concerning,” he agreed, frowning. He played out his anger, though he knew he had no choice. He never did, when it came to this man. “If you insist, Albus, I will attempt to teach the boy. And I will check his mind for outside influence, while I’m there.” He would not crack the child like an egg and take those secrets straight to the headmaster, as Albus so clearly hoped.

“Excellent. Thank you, Severus; your dedication is, as always, greatly appreciated. You will go to Harry with the news the day before he is due to return to school. No need to dampen his festivities with such things, after all.” The twinkle was back. “I would not ask this if it were not of utmost importance — we must stay abreast of Voldemort’s plans, especially if they involve Harry.”

Yes, because then they might interfere with your own, Severus sneered in his own mind, while his face stayed passive.

“If the boy is hiding anything, Albus, rest assured I will find it.”

And there was that smile, that twinkle that Severus so hated. The one that said everyone was playing perfectly into Albus Dumbledore’s hands and they didn’t even realise it.

“Thank you, my boy. I knew I could count on you.”

Severus bowed his head to disguise the hatred twisting his lips. One day, the old fool would get what was coming to him. Severus longed to be there to see it.

Chapter 61

Shortly after Christmas, Harry received a reply from Susan that had him roaring with laughter in the privacy of his bedroom. Apparently, Umbridge had been furious to find Harry and the four Weasleys had fled the school in the middle of the night, but according to the rumour mill — AKA something Parvati heard from one of Ginny's dorm-mates — the High Inquisitor had been told that Harry had ingested some sort of hallucinogenic, and the Weasley children had been called out of bed to check it was not of their doing, accidentally or otherwise. Since the twins were well-known for their prank substances, and Ginny was equally well-known for being happy to accompany them, it was a fairly solid alibi.

That it coincided with Mr Weasley's attack was just a funny happenstance of timing, everyone maintained. And those who suspected otherwise knew better than to ask for details.

But the part of the letter that really had him laughing was Umbridge's newest Educational Decree, implemented on the last day of term. It was now against the rules for any student tutoring to take place without approval of the High Inquisitor. She was clearly looking to catch anyone learning defensive magic unsupervised now that Harry was out of the castle, but according to Susan — whose letter had been sent via the post office in Hogsmeade, to avoid detection — Umbridge had spent the entire Christmas break being constantly hounded by students wanting permission to help their friends with their homework, or teach them a basic household charm, claiming that they weren't sure what the definition of 'student tutoring' entailed and they didn't want to get in trouble.

It seemed to be making Umbridge absolutely regret putting such measures in place, and Harry couldn't wait to see how the situation escalated once everyone was back at school.

He'd had a letter from Draco, too, passed through Snape and Remus. He was doing well, if bored, and he missed Harry. Harry spent longer than he would care to admit trailing his fingers over the neat 'Love, Draco' at the end of the letter.

He hated that he hadn't got to say a proper goodbye to his boyfriend. Or any of his friends, really. Or Salazar; the portrait was probably worried about him, considering what Harry had told him of his life. He would have to apologise for the abrupt departure when he got back.

It was only a week or so away, now. The Christmas holidays had flown by.

It was strange, he thought to himself, reading through the Ancient Runes worksheet Remus had given him — he was simultaneously eager to get back to school, and absolutely dreading having to face Umbridge again. He hadn't realised how suffocating her very presence was until he was free of it.

His door opened, and Sirius snuck in, pressing a finger to his lips. "I need you to come with me," he said. "The twins are covering for us, we've got about three hours."

"Three hours for what?" Harry asked, confused. His godfather grinned at him.

“To go home.”

Harry’s breath caught in his throat, and then Sirius had grabbed him by the hand, and he was being squeezed by the familiar sensation of side-along apparition.

They appeared on the snow-covered lawn of Seren Du, and Harry grinned so wide his cheeks hurt.

“Sirius!” he exclaimed happily. “What if we get found out?”

“I told you, the twins have us covered. They didn’t ask questions.” The animagus smirked. “Marauder privilege.”

Harry laughed; of course Fred and George would bend over backwards to help their idol in mischief-making.

“Brilliant. Why today? Or did you just want someone to throw your toy for you,” he teased. A bark of laughter escaped Sirius’ lips.

“Maybe later, if there’s time. We’re actually waiting on someone.”

Harry paused — he wouldn’t sound so nervous if it was just Remus or Snape. Perhaps... Narcissa, maybe?

A crack of apparition sounded, and Harry turned to look. It was not Narcissa Malfoy, though the resemblance was certainly there. This woman was equally tall and graceful, with long, wavy dark hair and familiar high cheekbones and grey eyes. The bright, open smile on her face was much more like Sirius than Narcissa, though.

Beside her was Tonks — but different. A boy version of Tonks, with spiky bright white hair. Tonks, who took one look at Harry and cursed, going wide eyed and immediately beginning to shift into a more feminine figure. “Didn’t realise Harry would be here!”

“It’s fine,” Harry insisted. “I— Sirius explained. About your boy days. You can— you don’t have to change back because I’m here.” The explanation had been a bit confusing, but as per usual, Remus had been more helpful and informative, explaining that not everyone felt their insides matched their outsides, and for some people what they felt like inside changed from day to day, or didn’t fit with what would usually be considered ‘male’ or ‘female’. He had also given Harry a rather dog-eared book that was definitely of muggle origin, detailing the spectrum of gender and the many ways in which people lived on that spectrum.

If, some days, Tonks felt more like a boy than a girl, Harry certainly wasn’t going to kick up a fuss.

Hesitantly, Tonks transformed back into the form he’d arrived in, and Harry grinned at him, offering a thumbs up. “You look like Sirius,” he commented, and Tonks laughed.

“Don’t know if I’m flattered or insulted.” Then he looked up at the house ahead of them, and let out a low whistle. “Blimey. Bit flash, eh?”

“Wait ‘til you see the inside,” Sirius replied. He stepped forward, beckoning Harry with him. “Pup, I’d like to introduce you to someone. This is my cousin, Andromeda Tonks. Andi, this is Harry Potter, Heir Black.”

Andromeda Tonks smiled widely, her eyes glowing warmly. “It’s very good to meet you, Heir Black. Please, call me Andi.”

“I— it’s nice to meet you, Andi,” he stuttered, not used to adults giving him their first name so freely. “You can call me Harry.” He looked back to Sirius. “What’s this about, Padfoot?”

“I thought it was about time we start repairing family ties,” Sirius declared. “And we needed a place to speak freely. Come on in, everyone; Ceri’s got tea ready.”

“Oh, Ceri’s still here? Wonderful!” Andi enthused. She and Sirius led the way, chattering like long-lost family — which, Harry supposed, they were.

He fell into step beside Tonks, kicking at the snow as they walked. “This place is the best,” he declared happily. “It’s got everything.”

“How well do you know it?” Tonks asked, frowning. “You’ve hardly had time to come here, I mean.”

Harry looked at him, stomach twisting. If Sirius had brought them both here, that meant he intended to let them in on their secrets. And he did trust Tonks; he had written back and forth with the auror quite a bit over the term, and he seemed trustworthy. Bill and Charlie liked him, too.

“I spent most of the summer after my third year here,” he confessed. “And the first half of last summer. Before the dementor attack.”

Tonks gaped at him. “Really? Right under Dumbledore’s nose?”

They stepped inside the entrance hall, and Harry grinned. “We’ve got a whole lot to catch you up on,” he said, hearing Sirius bark with laughter.

“An understatement if I’ve ever heard one,” he agreed. “But it’ll all make sense in a bit.”

To Harry’s surprise, Remus was waiting for them in the kitchen, where the table was already set with tea for five. “Andi, lovely to see you,” he greeted, kissing the woman on the cheek. “It’s been far too long.”

“I should’ve known you’d be involved in whatever trouble this one’s up to, Remus Lupin,” she sighed exasperatedly, making Sirius grin.

“You know Moony, always the brains of the operation,” he joked. “Now, pup. I think you’d best start at the beginning.” His face turned serious. “Don’t worry about leaving anything out. You can trust them. And Tonks’ Occlumency is solid.”

“Okay, then.” Harry was happy to take Sirius’ word for it. “Well, it all started after I blew up my aunt...”

....

The full story took the better part of an hour, and Tonks' hair was red with anger by the end of it. "I'd like to wring that old man's neck," he muttered. "Blocking family magics! Sending you to those people, after all he's told us about making sure you have as normal a childhood as possible?" He shook his head. Beside him, Andi too was seething.

"I always knew he was slippery as any snake. All that 'Greater Good' rubbish." She shared a knowing look with Sirius and Remus. "I don't know how much Ted or I can help, but you have us, regardless."

"Don't worry; I'm not expecting you take up arms or anything, though I do remember how lethal you can be with a Cutting curse," Sirius said to his cousin, smirking briefly. "I just wanted you to know because one day, as soon as I can, I'm going to reinstate you into the Black family proper. Or Harry will, if I can't."

Andromeda's jaw slackened. "Sirius..."

"It's long overdue, Andi," Sirius insisted. "You're a better example of a Black than half the family we've still got." The woman's face shuttered, and Sirius paused. "And... that's another thing I wanted to talk about. Narcissa's on our side."

Harry, in his storytelling, had focused on the important parts like Dumbledore's manipulations and Molly Weasley's thievery, rather than his love life. He hadn't said anything about Draco.

Andi went chalk-white, and even Tonks looked astonished. "She is? Truly?"

"She'd been here twice in the last two years," Sirius confirmed. "Practically a hostage in her own marriage, but she just wants her son to be safe and happy. And considering the little blighter is disgustingly in love with our Harry, here — that means they're both on our side."

Harry blushed bright red as both Tonks' gazes moved to him. "Draco's my boyfriend," he confirmed, grinning despite his embarrassment. "And his mum's nice. Lucius is still a prick, though."

"Language, Harry," Remus scolded mildly. Tonks snickered.

"She'd love to hear from you, Andi," Sirius said earnestly. "She misses you. She's laying low right now because of Lucius' position — and the fact that they're housing the Dark Lord himself at Malfoy Manor — but I've got ways of getting messages to her."

Harry knew he was talking about Snape.

"I... this is all a lot to take in," Andi said, looking lost. She had hardly blinked at Harry's explanation of how deep Dumbledore's plotting went, but the idea that her sister may not be as lost as she had feared had thrown her.

"Harry, cub, why don't you take Tonks and give him the grand tour," Remus suggested gently. "I think Sirius and Andromeda have some catching up to do."

Harry looked to Tonks, who wiggled his eyebrows in response. “Go on, kid. Show me around this best place ever.”

On their way out, Tonks squeezed his mother’s shoulder comfortingly. The pair of them stood in the grand entrance hall, and Harry looked around. “What do you want to see first?”

“What’s your favourite bit?” Tonks asked in return. Harry thought about it — he liked the quidditch pitch and the pool, but it was a bit cold outside for those, and he didn’t have his broom. With that in mind... “My room,” he said decisively. “And the library.”

“Lead the way, then,” Tonks declared grandly, flinging an arm out towards the staircase. “And tell me how you fell for my little cousin.”

Considering Harry had recently told the whole story to Ginny, it was remarkably easy to find his words. “He was an absolute stuck-up prat for the first two years of school,” he explained, giving context that Ginny had but Tonks wouldn’t. “Trying to be just like his father. But something changed in our third year... he started to learn to think for himself. And since I wasn’t under the compulsions, I started to see past the Slytherin tie.”

Harry led the way up the stairs, into the expansive library. “We met in secret, after curfew.”

“To snog?” Tonks asked gleefully, and Harry blushed.

“Not at first. We were friends through my third year. We’d just, y’know, talk. Play cards. He taught me a lot about the Wizengamot and pureblood stuff; things that Neville didn’t really know about, since his gran didn’t raise him in the traditional pureblood way. He came here on my birthday that summer and according to Sirius we were really obviously fancying each other, but we hadn’t figured it out yet. That didn’t change until I had to face a dragon in the first task.”

Tonks mock-swooned at the story of Harry and Draco’s first kiss, dramatically falling into an armchair. “Ah, young love,” he cried out, clutching his heart.

“Do I get to know about your secret boyfriend?” Harry asked teasingly. “Now that you know about mine?” Tonks’ letters had alluded to a romantic partner several times, but never given a name.

With how pale Tonks’ skin was today, it was easy to set him blushing. “If we’re dishing secrets, I suppose I’d better,” he sighed. “It’s Kingsley.”

Harry’s jaw dropped. “Kingsley Shacklebolt?”

“Don’t know any other Kingsleys, do you?” Tonks retorted. “Gotta keep it hushed up, though — technically he’s my superior, which makes the relationship not exactly up to auror regs. But with a face like that, I couldn’t help myself.” He was now the one looking lovestruck.

Harry tried to imagine it; the exuberant, clumsy junior auror with the staid, intimidating bald-headed man. It was certainly an interesting pairing.

He shrugged; no weirder than Remus and Snape.

"Isn't he like, loads older than you?" he asked, brows furrowed. Tonks shrugged.

"Eighteen years; it's nothing in wizarding terms. When I'm seventy and he's eighty-eight, no one will give a toss."

Harry, used to thinking in muggle lifespans, supposed that made sense. "Fair enough."

"You don't see it, do you?" Tonks asked knowingly. Harry shrugged.

"Not really," came his apologetic response. Far from being offended, Tonks laughed.

"S'Alright. Lots of people don't. Took Charlie a while, and he's always been into older blokes, so I figured he'd be the easiest to convince. But... Kings is different, when he's off duty. Not much different," he added at Harry's doubtful face. "I know he and I are chalk and cheese, but we like it that way. He keeps me grounded, and I remind him to loosen up a bit. He's got a wicked sense of humour once he stops being all stoic and unmoving and whatnot." He waved a hand. "You only see him for Order business, he's in work-mode then."

"I'll take your word for it." Kingsley had no reason to show anything but his usual stoic auror self to Harry, after all. "If you trust him, you can tell him what we've told you," he offered. "It'll be good to have another auror on board if Dumbledore escalates things. And — he's on the Wizengamot isn't he?"

"Yup," Tonks said, popping the P. "All that politics stuff goes over my head, but he loves it. He'll get a right kick out of Amelia's little niece planning to take over the whole thing; he's been saying for years they need a shake-up. Always ends up coming down to Lucius Malfoy versus Albus Dumbledore."

"I'd like to talk to him about it all sometimes, if he's willing." Harry had heard plenty from his friends, but none of the adults in his life had actual experience of sitting in a Wizengamot seat. Harry wanted to know what he was preparing himself for.

"I'll let him know," Tonks assured. Then he jumped clumsily to his feet, hair turning bright purple. "Let's see this brilliant bedroom of yours, then. Make me feel less bad about that dump at your muggles' place."

Harry grimaced at the reminder. "It's this way." He had missed his room more than he'd expected, though his room at Grimmauld was nice. Maybe he could move some of his posters over, now Sirius had taken that awful wallpaper down...

.-. .

With the twins in charge of distractions, no one noticed Sirius and Harry had been gone for hours — when they got back, it was to see that the twins had turned the entire stairway into one giant slide. Sirius laughed, eyes bright. "I love it," he declared, and without hesitation he sat down, whooping as he went flying down the spiral slide.

The twins got a dressing down from their mother, but since no one had gotten hurt it was considered a minor incident, and life in Grimmauld moved on.

"You do what you need to do?" George asked in an undertone at the dinner table, glancing between Harry and Sirius. Harry nodded.

"Yeah, thanks."

George winked, ruffling his hair and ducking away.

With the stairs actually stairs again, Harry went back up to his room, and was surprised to see an unfamiliar owl waiting patiently on his window-sill. Harry took the letter from the owl, unfolding it in trepidation.

Harry,

Hope you're having a good Christmas. I need to talk to you when you get back to school. It's about that thing you promised Theo—he might have a few fellows there.

Warning you now so you can make any arrangements necessary. Still expecting summer at the earliest.

Best,

Blaise

Straight to the point, much like the Italian boy himself. Harry frowned — there were more Slytherins wanting sanctuary?

Harry sighed to himself, offering the owl a treat for the journey home, and then reached for his parchment and quill.

He hadn't yet written to Farlig about the matter; he had best do it now before he was back at school and it was too late.

There had to be a Potter property somewhere that he could access before he was of age, and use to house people hiding from Voldemort — and from Dumbledore. Or a Peverell property. There were too many Blacks on the dark side to risk any properties from that side of the family, as Sirius said that anything other than the two they were already using was too weakly warded to be any good.

Farlig would know. The goblin hadn't failed him yet.

. . .

The last week of the Christmas holidays rolled by in a rather repetitive cycle of visiting Mr Weasley, avoiding Ron and Hermione, doing homework and trying to spend as much time with Sirius and Remus before he had to go back to school.

It was fun, especially on the days when the oldest Weasley boys and Tonks would turn up. One afternoon, Kingsley stayed for a while after an Order meeting, and he winked at Harry when he saw the boy staring. Harry assumed Tonks had told him everything. He watched the pair, trying to see any signs of them dating now that he knew, but they were very good at keeping it subtle. Other than Tonks teasing the older man — which she also did to just about everyone else in the house — there was no real sign of them being any closer than colleagues, or friends.

But at last, it was the day before they were all due to go back. Harry's trunk was packed, his Christmas homework done and a pile of notes for the HA that Remus had helped him with hidden away beneath his school robes.

Sirius was hiding his sadness well, but Harry could tell his godfather wasn't looking forward to seeing him go. "You'll be alright," Harry assured him, squeezing him around the waist. "You know Bill and Charlie will come visit loads. And Tonks, too."

For some reason, Sirius blushed at that. Harry eyed him weirdly. Then he shook his head to himself; whatever that was about, he wasn't getting involved.

"Harry, dear?" Mrs Weasley stuck her head into the living room, where Harry was playing gobstones with Fred. "Can you come down to the kitchen, please? Professor Snape's here to see you."

The gobstone went flying out of Harry's hand. "Sorry?" Snape? What did he want?

"Professor Snape, dear. In the kitchen."

"What did you do?" Fred whispered, equal parts terror and awe. Harry shot him a helpless look, shrugging.

"Nothing! I don't think?"

There was only one way to find out. Harry jogged down to the kitchen, where Professor Snape was indeed waiting for him. The man was in his usual black teaching robes, and looked like he'd rather be anywhere else.

Sirius was sat at the table opposite him, which probably had something to do with it. The pair were glaring at each other hatefully, and Harry pursed his lips. Were they being watched?

"You asked to see me, Professor?"

"Sit down, Potter." Snape's tone was cold. Sirius sneered.

"Don't you give him orders in my house, Snape."

Harry ignored the byplay between the two, taking a seat. Eventually, Snape turned to look at him. "The headmaster has sent me to tell you, Potter, that he wishes for me to begin instructing you in the art of Occlumency."

Harry stared blankly at Snape. The man's black eyes flashed warningly. "What's Occlumency, sir?" he asked dumbly, playing along. Whether Snape was merely worried about Extendable Ears, or something more sinister, Harry wasn't sure.

“It is an obscure branch of magic, used to defend one’s mind against external penetration,” Snape drawled. “You will have private instruction once a week, and should anyone else ask — even your little friends — you will tell them I am giving you Remedial Potions classes, to better your chance in scraping a passing OWL result.” He smirked cruelly. “No one who has seen your performance in my class will doubt that.”

That would have hurt, if Harry hadn’t known he was making straight Os in Potions, despite what the grade record said.

“Why do I have to learn this thing?” he asked, projecting a heavy amount of teenage sullenness.

“Because the headmaster believes it is a good idea,” Snape retorted. Harry clenched his jaw.

Dumbledore was worried about people getting into Harry’s head, was he? Well, that was a change of pace.

“Now listen here, Snape,” Sirius snarled. “Why do you have to be the one to teach him? Why can’t Dumbledore do it.”

“Because the headmaster has better things to do, Black, than try and get any form of complex instruction through Potter’s thick skull.”

Harry read between the lines; Dumbledore was too worried about encountering Voldemort, to go messing about in Harry’s brain. That worked in his favour — this way, Harry wouldn’t have to pretend not to know it.

The shouting match that brewed between Sirius and Snape grew loud enough that Harry was surprised they hadn’t drawn an audience. That was explained, however, when the door burst open and the entire Weasley family plus Hermione spilled in — Mr Weasley in the very centre, wearing striped pyjamas and a raincoat. “Cured!” he announced happily. “Completely cured. Oh, I say,” he added, taking in the scene in front of him. “Sorry to interrupt.”

Both Sirius and Snape lowered their wands, though they continued to snarl at each other.

“What’s going on here?” Mrs Weasley asked, frowning at the pair of them.

“Snivellus was just leaving,” Sirius growled. Snape’s eyes flashed.

“Something I’m sure you’re dying to do, Mutt,” he retorted. “Do us all a favour and give it a try.”

The crowd of redheads watched in alarm, and Harry wondered how he was the only one who seemed to see how much both of them were enjoying goading each other.

Truly, their teenage years must have been awful, if this is what they were like when they were supposed to be ‘tolerating each other’. How had Remus survived it?

Thankfully, the introduction of witnesses seemed to be enough for their little show. Snape pocketed his wand, sweeping towards the door. “Six o’clock, Monday evening, Potter,” he snapped, and then he was gone.

"Blimey. What was that about?" Charlie asked, watching Sirius with concern.

"Nothing important," Sirius dismissed, a false smile still on his face, eyes shining with contempt at the doorway Snape had left through. When he looked to the dragon tamer, he softened a little, and turned his gaze to the Weasley patriarch. "Welcome back, Arthur. Glad to hear you're all healed up!"

.-. .

The Weasley parents tried their best to make that evening's dinner a celebratory one, but considering half the house was dreading facing Umbridge the next day, it was not quite as cheerful as it could have been. Sirius was preparing his finest sulk at the prospect of Harry leaving — and failing to hold it, with Bill and Charlie nudging him into laughter whenever he looked too morose.

Charlie didn't dare flirt with him too blatantly in front of his own mother, not wanting to hear the utter tirade she would go on if she realised how he felt about Sirius. That didn't stop him from watching fondly, and bumping the older man's knee beneath the table whenever he saw him staring wistfully at Harry, who was sat with Fred and George and looked to be planning some mischief or another.

"It'll be quieter without him," he said softly into the man's ear, when Mum was busy at the stove. "But you won't be lonely."

He loved watching the tips of Sirius' ears flush red.

Further up the table, Bill looked to be having a serious conversation with their father. Charlie wondered what it was about, and strained his ears to listen in. All he caught was the word Wizengamot, but that was enough.

He and Bill had talked it over, and their dad's injury was a perfect excuse to talk to him about taking up their seats. They wanted to move soon — both of them were of the mind that Harry was being far too optimistic to think he could keep both Dumbledore and Fudge oblivious until he came of age, and the more trustworthy seats they held before shit hit the fan, the better.

From the look on Bill's face, though, the conversation wasn't going well. Their father didn't consider the seats a burden at all, not when he left all his voting to Dumbledore.

"It's our birthright, Dad," Charlie heard Bill say. "I know we're young, but we're ready for it. You've got enough on your plate."

Charlie caught his older brother's eye, silently asking if he needed back-up. Bill shook his head minutely, then gave him a smirk that Charlie translated as stay over there and keep flirting.

Well, if Bill insisted...

Leaving the curse-breaker to it, Charlie reached nonchalantly past Sirius for the water jug. He could've summoned it, but that wouldn't let him lean in close to Sirius' shoulder, getting a faint whiff of the man's spicy aftershave. ““Scuse me,” he murmured, only a little smug. Sirius shot him an unimpressed look.

“Like you don’t know what you’re doing,” he muttered, making Charlie laugh quietly.

“Guilty,” he confessed freely. “Go ahead and tell me to stop.”

Sirius was silent, and triumph bubbled in Charlie’s belly.

The older man didn’t think Charlie was serious. Charlie could tell that from day one. But he’d been drawn to the dog animagus since the first time they’d met — once he’d got over the ingrained fear of seeing actual Sirius Black, the man he’d been told was a crazed mass-murderer.

He was hot, and had been fun to have a bit of a flirt with, since all of Charlie’s usual flirting targets were back in Romania and he hadn’t warmed up to the Welsh crew enough to know who would be welcome to it.

Charlie hadn’t expected to develop feelings.

But he had, and Bill had noticed, and Tonks had noticed, and the pair of them were insufferable about it, and Charlie was trying his best but Sirius seemed determined to see him off. Not because he wasn’t interested — Charlie knew what that look in a man’s eye meant, and Sirius was no good at hiding it — but because his own self-worth was so low he didn’t think he was worth Charlie’s time.

“I like those jeans, by the way,” he said quietly, giving as long a look as he dared at the man’s lap with the rest of his family in the room. “They new?”

“Yeah,” Sirius replied, ears still flushed, “Did a bit of owl-ordering. And had Remus pick up a few things for me.”

“Good to hear.” Charlie glanced around to check if anyone was watching, and leaned in a bit closer. “Any miniskirts in the mix? You did say you look fabulous in them. I’d like to see that.”

Sirius choked on his mashed potato. Charlie clapped him on the back, smirking when the last hit was more of a caress. “Steady on.”

“You’re a cruel man, Charlie Weasley,” he coughed, and Charlie gave his best charming grin, dimples at full force.

“Now that’s just not true at all.”

He would change Sirius’ mind. He would get him to see that they could be great together, if given the chance.

The last time he'd been set on something as keenly as he was set on Sirius Black, it had been his desire to work with dragons. And look how that had ended up.

Chapter 62

Whoever's bright idea it had been to get the Knight Bus back to school, Harry wanted to hex them. Why they couldn't just get the train like all the other students he had no idea; just because they'd left under unusual circumstances, didn't mean they had to return in them.

But thankfully, none of them lost their breakfast — which was more than Harry could say for some other passengers of the bus — and with Tonks and Remus chaperoning, they all made it back to school in one piece. Harry hugged Remus tightly at the school gates.

“Stay out of trouble,” Remus said, and Harry laughed.

“Funny joke, Moony,” he teased, making the werewolf roll his eyes.

“Stay out of excessive trouble.”

That still seemed like a tall order for Harry, but he didn't argue, allowing Tonks to bundle him in a hug and ruffle his hair. “See you, kid,” she said cheerily. “Have a good term. Give old Umbridge hell for me.”

“I'll do my best,” Harry replied. “See you in summer!” Unless something drastic happened, he wouldn't be leaving the castle for Easter break. He had far too much studying to do for that.

The five of them traipsed up towards the castle, dread falling on them like a curtain as the imposing building came into view. “Let's see what the damage is, then, boys and girls,” Fred sighed, pushing open the doors.

Luckily, they avoided just about everyone up until they reached Gryffindor Tower. And there, the only people who were curious about why they had left were those who were just happy to see them back. Fred dipped Angelina in a showy, overdramatic kiss in the middle of the common room, while George mimed retching behind them both.

“Alright, Harry. Ginny,” Neville greeted, waving cheerily. Harry glanced at Ginny, wondering if she'd written Neville that letter, or was planning on doing it in person. From the wooden smile on her face, Harry was betting the latter.

“Hey, Nev. How was the rest of your holidays?”

“Yeah, great. Hey, look — Gran got me a new wand!” The blond boy showed it off eagerly. “She said with the way things were going at school, I might end up in a fight, and she didn't want me to damage Dad's.” Not quite what Harry had said to her, but the result was the same. At last, Neville had a wand suited to his magic.

As much as Harry wanted to grab his cloak and map and hunt down Draco, he had missed his friends — and he didn't want to be suspicious. So he happily let Neville regale him with the goings on of his greenhouse at home; and then, when she arrived, of Parvati's Christmas in India with her family. She spoke about places over there with confidence that she would one day be able to show Harry too, and his heart ached with longing.

The Educational Decree that Susan had written to him about seemed to be the only new one that had appeared over the holidays. Harry wondered how long it would take for the next one — surely Umbridge was running out of things to ban?

The day was surprisingly relaxed, right up until dinner, when Harry entered the Great Hall and immediately saw Umbridge glaring at him with that too-sweet smile on her face. He didn't react, heading straight for the Gryffindor table. Her ban of mixing houses at mealtimes was still in place, but all that meant by now was that students ate as quickly as possible and then went elsewhere to socialise.

Across the hall, Harry caught Blaise Zabini's intent stare. He nodded discreetly; he had got the message.

Sure enough, the Slytherin appeared at Harry's side when he was walking away from the Great Hall, and the pair surreptitiously ducked into an alcove, warding it.

"What's the problem?" Harry asked, concern colouring his tone.

"A lot of the neutral Slytherin families were approached over Christmas break. Some Ravenclaws, too," Blaise explained, voice low. "They aren't likely to be allowed to remain neutral for long."

Harry's stomach sank. "How many?"

"At least eight that I know of. Plus Theo — he's not neutral, but he needs an out." Then, Blaise's lips turned down. "I've got a few more in his boat, as well. Though not many are brave enough to come to me. Their parents have them pretty well locked down."

It made Harry's heart ache, to think of how many teenagers would end up with that foul brand on their arm just because they weren't in a position to say no. How many already had?

"Right. But no one needs it more urgently than summer?"

"I don't think so," Blaise assured.

"Good. I'm working on something right now. It should be ready in time." He hadn't heard back from Farlig yet, but he'd told the goblin to send future correspondance through Bill, so it would take a little longer to get a response. "Just... tell them to hold off for as long as they can."

The Slytherin smirked ruefully. "That's been the plan thus far." He reached out, clasping Harry's arm. "We appreciate this, Harry. Truly. No one wants to be in Dumbledore's debt for their own safety."

"They won't be in mine, either," Harry insisted. "Sanctuary is offered freely. As long as they don't intentionally bring Voldemort to the doors, they're welcome."

Blaise shook his head, like he couldn't quite believe it. "The wizarding world isn't ready for you, Potter."

Harry laughed, grinning. "Me? Scrap that — they're not ready for Susan."

Blaise nodded emphatically. "Too true. Hey, by the way, Draco wanted to talk to you when you got back. Said to meet in your usual fourth floor spot, once you're done talking to me." The Italian boy smirked. "You two have a usual spot?"

Harry hoped desperately he wasn't blushing. "Not like we can chat in class, is it?" He retorted. "And Draco can't even come to HA." Those defence sessions were becoming the only time people could actually relax and let down their guard a little, safe in the magic of the contract.

"Fair. I'll leave you to it, then."

Harry dropped his ward, and Blaise left first. Harry slipped on his invisibility cloak before he stepped out into the corridor, heading straight for the fourth floor classroom in which they had once broken a chair. A familiar head of blond hair was waiting for him — Harry beamed, dropping his cloak and hurrying over. "Hey. Blaise said you'd be here."

"Good." Draco tugged him down imperiously, until they were both sat on the floor. "You've got some nerve, you know. Telling me you love me and then leaving school in the middle of the night." But he was smiling, and Harry grinned back, leaning in.

"I still love you," he promised, watching Draco's cheeks flush with delight.

"You'd better."

Harry took his hand, threading their fingers together. "How was Christmas in the castle?"

"Much the same as it always is. Mother sends her best, by the way."

"Have you seen her?" Harry went wide-eyed, but Draco shook his head.

"No, but she managed to write without Father over her shoulder. A rare thing, these days." His smile dropped. Harry squeezed his hand sympathetically. "I spent most of Christmas Day in Uncle Sev's rooms. It was nice, though a bit strange not doing Yule rituals with Mother. Blissfully Umbridge-free, at least, unlike the rest of the bloody school." They both scowled, then Draco kissed Harry's temple. "Oh, that reminds me — Uncle Severus gave me the animagus potion for Christmas."

Harry sat bolt upright. "He never said!" He turned eager green eyes on his boyfriend. "Did you find your form? What is it?"

"I'm a snowy owl," Draco replied proudly. Harry beamed at him.

"Brilliant!" A powerful hunter, prideful to the point of being a little bit vain — and an animal Harry happened to have an enormous soft spot for. Perfect for Draco. "You and Hedwig can fly together."

“We can, and I can pick your little fox self up in my claws and drop you at the top of a tree, because apparently you made your transformation and didn’t tell me,” Draco said, giving him a hard stare. Harry gulped.

“I wanted Sirius and Remus to be the first to know. And, uh, then I forgot,” he admitted sheepishly. Draco huffed.

“Forgot? Honestly, Potter,” he sighed in mock-annoyance. “Disaster of a wizard.” A pause, and then an expectant look. “Go on. Show me!”

“Oh.” Harry concentrated, and then he was a fox beside Draco.

“Ohh,” Draco cooed, grey eyes filling with delight. “Aren’t you beautiful.” Harry preened, and quickly arched up under Draco’s hand, begging the boy to pet him. They spent a fun five minutes or so with Harry flopping around in Draco’s lap, letting the boy scratch the soft white fur on his belly, before Harry decided he wanted to kiss Draco properly, and became human once more so he could.

“You might be a disaster, but you’re a bloody talented one,” Draco told him, smoothing Harry’s mussed hair. Harry shrugged, bashful.

“You’ll get yours before sixth year, I bet.” The Slytherin didn’t look so convinced, and smoothly changed the subject.

“Well, my OWLS have to come first — we can’t all do eight things at once on top of studying for exams. How was your holiday, anyway? Despite the eventful start. Please tell me you actually rested for more than five minutes.”

Harry had written the important parts to Draco already, but it was nice getting to sit and tell him about the more mundane events of his break. Draco’s fingers began carding through his hair while he spoke, and Harry’s eyes went half-lidded with pleasure.

“Well, I’m glad you managed to get some quiet in that madhouse,” Draco remarked. “Slytherin house was more full than ever. Seems I’m not the only one who didn’t fancy heading home for Yule.”

“But you’re the only one with Voldemort in your house,” Harry pointed out. Draco’s pale lips became a thin line.

“Perhaps, but his reach is extending ever further. Rumour has it, he wants to start marking everyone once they turn seventeen. If not sooner.”

Fear gripped Harry’s throat. “Cassius?”

“Went to his secret boyfriend’s for the holidays,” Draco assured. “His family had no idea. He’s got them convinced he can’t be marked because he’s going to infiltrate the Ministry when he graduates, but considering the Dark Lord is talking about taking over the Ministry in due time... I don’t know how long that will last.”

Harry made a mental note to speak to the Slytherin. He needed sanctuary perhaps as much as Theo did — more, if Harry's suspicion about the seventh year's mysterious boyfriend was correct. His father would kill him if he found out.

"I've told Blaise I'll have a safehouse ready by summer," he said. "I'm going to see if there's a Potter property I can use. The goblins can't legally give me the deed 'til I'm of age, but if I can find it, I can take on the blood wards without technically owning the place."

"So your idea of sanctuary is squatting in your own ancestral home?" Draco drawled. Harry snorted.

"Well, when you put it that way... any better ideas?"

Sadly, Draco was all out.

"If needs must, I'll have Sirius kick the Order out of his house and we can use that instead," Harry said with a shrug.

"You're so sure you'll be on the outs with Dumbledore by the end of the year?"

"The only reason he hasn't figured me out is that he thinks I've got Voldemort in my head," Harry retorted. "Once he gets over that fear, it's all over." He was fairly confident that there were no major moves Dumbledore could make against him without drawing the ire of the wizarding world — not yet, anyway — so he didn't mind the man discovering Harry had lost the blocks on his magic. He had a bigger secret, now; Voldemort's horcruxes. Particularly, the one in his scar.

"At least that will mean he can't try and send you back to those muggles in the summer," Draco muttered. "Or to the Weasleys. You can actually go home."

"He couldn't send me to the Dursleys even I wanted him to," Harry revealed, a bitter smile crossing his lips. "They've moved away. Not sure where to." The information had come from Kingsley — who, unbeknownst to Harry, had been monitoring the Dursleys ever since the dementor attack. Apparently they couldn't cope with living in a house surrounded by memories of Dudley; in late October they'd packed up, and never looked back. The blood wards around the house were shattered.

"Good riddance," Draco said. He let out an exaggerated sigh, shifting Harry out of his slump against the blond's shoulder. "Now, enough of these depressing topics. It's been an awfully lonely three weeks without you." His grey eyes darkened.

Harry reached out eagerly, pulse picking up. It had been very lonely indeed.

. . .

Six o'clock on Monday evening found Harry headed down to the dungeons, for once not covered by his invisibility cloak. Only Draco knew the truth of the matter; even Neville, usually privy to Harry's secrets, believed he was headed for Remedial Potions lessons. He and plenty of others knew Harry already knew Occlumency; to have them aware that Snape was supposed to be teaching it to him would prompt them to consider where the Potions Master's loyalties truly lay.

"Come in," Snape called curtly, when Harry knocked on the door. The office looked as it always did — but for the exception of a softly glowing bowl of silver liquid on the desk.

"Why do you have a pensieve?" Harry asked curiously. Snape warded the door for privacy, and glanced at the stone basin.

"Albus thought it might be necessary, for me to hide important memories. In case your Occlumency training should go awry."

Harry wasn't sure how things would go so awry that he would end up in Snape's own mind, but stranger things had happened. "That was generous of him. Don't suppose he left anything useful in it?"

Snape smirked briefly. "Sadly not. Now, I'm sure we can both agree that the last thing you are in need of is more Occlumency tutelage. Anything further would take you into the realm of falsifying your own memories, which, while potentially useful, is not a skill you necessarily need right now. The Dark Lord is very likely aware of the connection between you now, but I have faith in your current abilities to keep him out of your side of the connection." He leant against the edge of the desk, long legs stretched out. "With that in mind, I thought it best to use these lessons to continue our studies from the summer. Far be it from me to deny a perfect opportunity when it arises."

He was right — if Dumbledore expected Harry to be with Snape for the next few hours, it was an excellent time for Harry to get in some duelling practice. Harry looked around the office skeptically, eyes lingering on the shelves covered in jars of strange liquids. "This isn't really the best place for it."

"I was hoping you might be able to help with that. Come here." Snape walked to the back wall of the office, and pointed at the stone. Harry stepped closer, confused — then he noticed the tiny snake engraved in the grey slab. He smirked.

"You just want to go back to the Chamber," he accused lightly, and Snape's eyes narrowed.

"If you would prefer I have you sit here and read about the spells I wish to teach you, you are very welcome to," he drawled. Harry snorted.

"No, thank you." He paused, concern brewing. "Will Dumbledore not expect you to give him some kind of report on my progress?"

"And I shall. If he requests visual proof, I am an expert at falsifying my own memories," Snape said matter-of-factly. "But, to be blunt, I believe Albus is expecting these lessons to be a complete and utter disaster, in which I shall discover all the secrets hidden in that thick skull of yours, and you shall be even more convinced that I am evil incarnate." His eyes flashed with amusement. "I will feed him some lies about your mind being full of little else but exam worries and boys, and make my disgust at having to sift through such things very clear."

Harry shot the man an indignant look. “Hey, I could have more going on than that!” He thought about it for a second; Dumbledore was certainly expecting a lot more than that, after his vision of Mr Weasley. Harry doubted the headmaster would believe that Harry had any kind of natural talent in Occlumency… they would have to give the man something good. “Tell him about the corridor dreams.”

“Pardon?”

“The dreams Voldemort keeps sending me, of that corridor in the Department of Mysteries. Tell him you saw those in my head. It’ll make him think he’s right, at least about Voldemort trying to influence me through our connection.” If Dumbledore was busy patting himself on the back, he wouldn’t look much further. “If you don’t give him anything he can use, he’ll start to suspect both of us.”

A sudden realisation hit him, making his blood turn cold. “If he realises I know about the magic blocks and you aren’t the one to tell him, he’ll know you’re not loyal to him.”

On the contrary, Snape didn’t look concerned. “He cannot expect me to seek out every last secret in your mind without making you a vegetable. Considering he currently believes you shed his incredibly powerful compulsion charms from sheer stubbornness, I do not think it will surprise him to find that you are equally stubborn enough to force me away from your deepest, darkest secrets.” Then he gave an almost predatory sneer. “I have been serving two masters for long enough to know how to manipulate the truth for my own benefit. Trust me, Potter; I will be fine.” Then he snorted derisively. “Though if you decide to remove Albus as permanently as you will the Dark Lord, that would make my life easier.”

Harry couldn’t say he hadn’t thought about it. “If I kill him, people will declare me the next Dark Lord before his body’s even cold. And if it looks like an accident, he’ll be martyred.” He smirked sharply. “I plan to publicly disgrace him before he can even think about toddling off on his ‘next great adventure’.”

“Then you had best be prepared to deal with the Dark Lord as soon as possible,” Snape returned. Then he tapped the wall pointedly. “Come; we’re wasting valuable time. We can discuss these plans further while we duel — it’ll be good for you to practice multi-tasking.”

There was a vindictive look on Snape’s face that made Harry’s heart sink in trepidation, even as he obediently hissed at the snake to open a passage.

He was going to be so very sore in the morning.

.-.-.

Harry dragged himself back up to Gryffindor Tower an hour past curfew, his duelling injuries healed but his muscles still sore from use — working with the HA was nowhere near as gruelling as working with Snape, and after a lazy Christmas Harry was woefully out of shape.

Still, it had been a productive session — between dodging curses and flinging back his own, Harry had managed to talk more freely to Snape than he had since the summer; about Dumbledore's plans, and Voldemort's, and how much they knew about Harry. From the sounds of things, both were quietly trying to gather their armies in preparation for what was to come — to both of them, Harry was practically an afterthought, just a pawn to shift into the right place when the time came.

As long as they both believed that, Harry could do some army-gathering of his own.

He looked appropriately downtrodden as he made his way to his dormitory, cementing the idea for any onlookers that he'd just had a private Potions lesson with Snape and hated every second of it. He had another on Wednesday — as if there weren't enough things filling his evenings, these days.

But they were all necessary, and he wouldn't turn down the opportunity to learn from Snape right under the headmaster's nose. So with that in mind, Harry readied himself for bed, already thinking about when the next HA meeting could be squeezed in.

Just as he was about to pull back his duvet, Harry was hit by a wave of pain in his scar — followed by an overwhelming feeling of pure happiness. Triumph filled his chest, a maniacal laugh ringing in his ears. Something truly excellent had happened!

“HARRY!” He heard the call through the fuzz of pain and joy, felt a sharp prod of magic like an electric shock running through him. The laughter cut off abruptly, making him realise it was coming from his own throat. He pushed past the fire in his scar to open his eyes, seeing Neville watching him in concern. Luckily, none of the other boys in the dormitory were present. His friend's eyes were intent, and as Harry sucked in a sharp breath, a cold fear flooded his veins.

“He’s happy,” he rasped, watching the horror dawn on Neville’s features. “He’s so happy.”

“What happened?” Neville pressed, but Harry shook his head.

“No idea.” His scar was still prickling, and he ran a hand through his hair, grimacing. Something had happened, something Voldemort was very pleased about. That was an incredibly worrying prospect. “I need to talk to Sirius.”

“Won’t a letter take too long?” Of course, Neville didn’t know about the two-way mirror. Well, that was one secret he was happy to share with his friend.

“Don’t need to write.” Harry scrambled for his bedside drawer, pulling out the hand mirror. When he sat on his bed, he wasn’t surprised when Neville immediately joined him. Worried about the other boys intruding, Harry drew his drapes with a flick of his wand and raised a silencing ward. “Sirius Black.”

The mirror went fuzzy for a second, and then Sirius’ face materialised in the glass. He looked grim. “Pup. Now’s not the best time.”

“Something has happened,” Harry said urgently. “I just got this massive hit of... happiness. Something has happened that Voldemort is really pleased about. You need to be careful—“ He stopped abruptly when Sirius’ frown became more pronounced.

"It's too late for that, pup," the animagus said. Harry's heart leapt to his throat — it had to be bad, to make Sirius look like that. "Tonks just sent a message; the auror department is a madhouse right now. There was a mass breakout at Azkaban."

Harry looked up at Neville, just in time to see the blood drain from his friend's face.

"Yeah," Harry said weakly, hating that the joy was still simmering in the back of his mind. "That'll do it."

Gathering armies, indeed.

.-.-.-.

The news was all over the front page of the Daily Prophet the next morning. Ten pictures; ten Death Eaters who were at large once more. The sight of all three Lestranges staring up at Harry made his jaw clench, and he looked sideways at Neville. The boy had been ashen-faced since he'd heard the news, and Harry had noticed the Silencing charm around his bed that night. From the dark circles under his eyes, Harry would bet that Neville's sleep had been more nightmare-plagued than his own.

On the blond's other side was Ginny, her hand wrapped tightly around Neville's. "I'm so sorry," she breathed, voice cracking. "Neville, fuck, I... I'm so sorry."

Neville gave a tiny shrug, mechanically eating his toast. Harry pressed his shoulder to his friend's in quiet sympathy. What else could he do? There was nothing to say to make the situation any better.

Neville wasn't the only one hit hard by the news. At the Hufflepuff table, Susan was squeezed tight between Ernie and Hannah, who were hiding her from view and had been since she'd burst into tears at the sight of the men who had tortured and killed every member of her family barring her Aunt Amelia. The Hufflepuffs around them were quiet, sharing worried looks between them.

Reading the full article just made anger flare in Harry's gut — Fudge was blaming the break-out on Sirius.

Luckily, he wasn't the only one who realised how utterly ridiculous that was.

"If Black was going to break everyone out, surely he'd have done it when he got loose," he heard from the Ravenclaw table behind him.

"You-Know-Who has the dementors, I'm telling you," someone else from further up the Gryffindor table declared. "It's been obvious ever since one of them got Potter's cousin. Fudge just can't admit he fucked up that badly."

Harry hated how flippantly Dudley's death was being bandied about the hall, but if it was helping people realise the truth about the Ministry's incompetence, he couldn't argue against it. It was something Fudge couldn't deny, not after how quickly the news had spread around school — and back to the parents, Harry would bet.

More than one person was murmuring about Fudge needing to be sacked, and up at the head table Umbridge had a white-knuckled grip on her knife and fork. Harry was surprised she wasn't trying to take house points for the blatant defamation of her beloved Minister; perhaps she realised she didn't have a good argument against the truth, this time.

Wishing he could do something to stop the tremors he could feel running through Neville's body, Harry turned to look at the rest of the school, stomach clenching at the sight of so many fearful, horrified faces. Even the Slytherin table wasn't immune to it — while there were some poorly-hidden expressions of triumph, there were just as many who looked like they might be ill. Several of the children Harry knew to have Death Eater parents were among them; did they know, what now awaited them when they left school? Did they expect these Azkaban escapees to be waiting for them, ready to welcome them into the fold?

His gaze landed on Draco, who was making a valiant effort at pretending to be unaffected; pleased, even. But Harry could see the faint shake of his hand, the terror in his eyes.

He knew they were all very likely at his home, now. He knew that Bellatrix Lestrange would be delighted to see her little sister again.

Harry forced himself to look away, before he did something stupid. He let his eyes trail over the other Slytherins; Blaise and Daphne had their heads down, huddled together with some fourth years. Pansy was halfheartedly picking at a bowl of fruit, while beside her Tracey Davis was actually laughing at something, trying to get the attention of Theodore Nott — who, oddly enough, was looking over at the Hufflepuff table. At Susan.

Susan had mentioned spending time with him over Christmas, catching him up on all the heirs' plans. Maybe they were friends, now.

"Have you seen the rest of it?" Ginny asked suddenly, making Harry's heart sink. There was more??

Ginny flipped the pages of the paper, showing him a smaller article — practically hidden amongst the extended coverage of the escapees and their crimes. 'Tragic Demise of Ministry of Magic Worker'. Apparently some man named Bode had been sent a Devil's Snare disguised as a pot plant to his bed in St Mungo's, and it had killed him.

"I've heard Dad talk about him before," Ginny murmured quietly. "He works in the Department of Mysteries."

Harry tensed, and felt Neville do the same beside him. A blatant assassination — no one sent Devil's Snare by accident — of an Unspeakable, who was already in the hospital in suspect circumstances? That couldn't be anything good.

A bell rang, and half the hall jumped — in light of the news, most of them seemed to have forgotten they had classes to go to.

The absolute last thing Harry wanted to do right then was go and listen to Binns drone on for forty-five minutes. But life went on; there was nothing they could do about the break-out from within the school.

“Come on, Nev,” he murmured, gently urging the boy into a standing position. He grabbed a banana off the table, slipping it into his pocket; Neville hadn’t been able to eat anything, but he would get too hungry to ignore it eventually.

Ginny looked like she was considering ditching her own classes to stick with Neville, but after a pointed look from Harry she gave the blond boy’s hand one last squeeze, then hurried to catch up with Colin.

It was somewhat novel for Harry, to hear the school full of whispers that weren’t necessarily about him. If it weren’t such an awful situation, he might have enjoyed it. As it was, there was nothing to enjoy about this. Voldemort had ten of his most loyal supporters back in his ranks.

Harry’s time was running out.

Chapter 63

The news that Hagrid had been put on probation was just the icing on top of the exceptionally shitty cake. No one seemed particularly surprised — not even Hagrid himself, who was still covered in an absurd amount of bruises, and Harry did not want to know. Hagrid didn't seem all that worried, either; not about the probation, at least. He was definitely worried about something else, his mind absent during classes and his gaze often on the Forbidden Forest. He brought much more mundane creatures out to study — likely at the behest of Hermione, who Harry noticed practically coaching Hagrid through his lessons — but every single one of his lessons was now attended by Umbridge, and Harry suspected Hagrid had come to the same conclusion he had.

Not even perfect lessons were likely to save him from Umbridge's blood-purist wrath.

Trelawney, too, now had to deal with the presence of the High Inquisitor in every one of her classes.

"You'd think she'd be focused on teaching her own bloody classes," Parvati hissed venomously once they were out of earshot of the Divination classroom, her expression thunderous. "Maybe that's why all she does is have us read the textbook."

To add insult to injury, Umbridge had introduced another Educational Decree, this one banning teachers from discussing anything but the subject they taught with their students. Harry suspected this was to stop teachers talking to them about the Azkaban breakout, or anything related to what was going on outside the castle walls — as far as Lavender and Parvati were concerned, it stopped them talking freely to their favourite professor, and that was a step too far.

Umbridge was making enemies all over the school, but there was very little they could all do about it. Except what they were already doing, of course.

With that in mind, Harry scheduled a HA meeting as soon as his busy timetable allowed it. As instructed, everyone had spent Christmas researching a spell they wanted to learn — Harry now had quite an impressive list of magic to work through, only a handful of which he would have to have Snape teach him first.

"Brilliant, guys. I'll sort that list out and we can start working on them next week. Today, I thought we'd do something a bit more fun."

"Are we breaking out the duelling dummies again?" Cho asked excitedly, looking over to the corner where a trio of dummies waited. Each of them now had a picture of Umbridge's face stuck to the front of their heads, and it made practicing with them that much more entertaining.

"Not today. Instead... how many of you know what paintball is?"

Immediately, all the muggle-raised members of the group lit up with unholy glee. Harry grinned back at them. “I’m going to split you into two teams,” he announced. “And I hope you’re all familiar with the Colour-Change charm, because we’re going to be using a lot of it.”

Just because learning to dodge spellfire was a very serious and necessary skill, didn’t mean Harry couldn’t make it fun, after all.

.-.-.-.

Sirius looked around the small group, tucked away in the upstairs drawing room of Grimmauld Place. These were the only members of the Order he could trust, these days. Other than Snape, of course — and if his teenage self could hear that, he’d check himself right into St Mungo’s.

“The Minister isn’t interested in searching for the escapees,” Kingsley said in his low, rumbling voice. He had an arm around Tonks, gently rubbing her shoulder — the young auror had been in a state ever since the news of her dear Aunt Bella’s escape. Sirius didn’t blame her; the thought of that crazy bitch running free made him feel cold inside, like the dementors were right over his shoulder again.

In his sleep, he could hear her, cackling away to herself from a few cells away, the sound echoing in the narrow stone halls of the prison.

Sirius didn’t sleep much, these days.

“He’s too scared that actually going after them might unearth something he’s not ready to face,” Tonks snorted derisively. “He’s paying lip service, of course — assigning aurors, telling the press he’s got it handled. But the aurors he’s putting on the case can barely tell their arse from their elbow.”

Sirius snorted grimly; he was very familiar with the type.

“The fact that he’s still in the job is a bloody miracle,” Charlie muttered, shaking his head. He was sat beside Sirius, close enough to press their legs together from knee to ankle, and Sirius was glad no one else was bringing up the matter — with the ever-present chill in his bones, he would take all the warmth and comfort he could get. Within reason. He wasn’t going to get the poor man’s hopes up, no matter how desperate he was for some company at night, a warm body to keep the shadows at bay. Charlie deserved better than that.

“It’s not a miracle, it’s a sign that Voldemort’s people are already in power, and Fudge is playing right into their hands,” Remus piped up knowingly. He was propped up in an armchair, wan and tired-eyed from the recent full moon. “If he were competent, he’d be dead by now.”

He was right; the dark side wouldn’t put up with a Minister who might actually do something to stop them, not after all the work they’d done to worm their way into government.

“Charlie, we need to talk to Dad. We need to get our seats,” Bill declared. Sirius felt Charlie tense beside him.

“You think he’ll go for it?”

Sirius knew the boys had been laying the groundwork for a while now, especially since Arthur’s attack.

“We’ll have to keep at him until he does. If we leave it too late, we risk getting caught out by Dumbledore; he’ll never let Dad pass his seats on to us if he thinks there’s even a chance of us voting against him,” Bill pointed out with a frown. “Hell, having the guarantee Dad will vote with him is the only thing that keeps him one up on Malfoy.”

With all the seat proxies given to Lucius Malfoy from various Death Eater friends who were incarcerated, or otherwise unable to take up the positions, it gave him nine votes in the Wizengamot alone. But with all of Harry’s proxies, Dumbledore held nine of his own, and several more that were his in all but magic, considering how devoted their true holders were. Considering those who kept their politics firmly neutral were often not Dumbledore’s biggest fans, losing the Weasley and Prewett backing might just tip him out of his power vacuum.

Not that Bill and Charlie would necessarily agree with anything Malfoy proposed, but it would stop Dumbledore passing his ridiculous, restrictive bills that so many people didn’t realise were merely cementing the old man’s foothold in society.

“If you can, that’ll be a huge step in our plans,” Sirius agreed. He ran a hand through his hair in frustration. “Merlin, I wish I could do something useful.” If he were a free man, he could take Harry’s proxy seats as his godfather, without it necessarily looking like the boy’s faith in Dumbledore was waning. He could take up the Black seat, as he should have years ago.

At this rate, they would have to wait until all of Harry’s classmates began turning seventeen before any real progress could be made. And that was only if many of them could convince the current seat holders to step down — not all of them had dead parents and proxy holders, after all.

“You’re doing what you can,” Charlie protested, hand squeezing Sirius’ knee. “We always knew the Ministry would take time. There won’t be any real change until all of the Death Eaters have been weeded out. Fudge’s incompetence is just making that part of our jobs even harder.”

He was right, and they all knew it — Dumbledore’s adoring public wouldn’t matter one knut if Voldemort took the Ministry proper. All the kids coming of age wouldn’t mean anything if it was too dangerous for them to attend Wizengamot sessions.

“Now he’s got his best generals back, we know the Dark Lord won’t wait around forever,” Kingsley said solemnly. “He’ll strike eventually. And we’ll be ready when he does.” Sirius caught the man’s dark gaze, seeing it become bloodthirsty for just the briefest moment. “We know who the key players are. If we can catch them, get them off the board, we can begin to turn the tide. Enough for Harry to sweep in and do the rest, once he’s ready.”

At that, Sirius glanced over to Bill, who looked troubled. The animagus wondered how the goblins were doing on the horcrux solution.

If they couldn't figure out a way to get that soul shard out of Harry safely, it would all be for nought regardless.

He set his head in his hands, resisting the urge to tear at his hair — or turn into a dog, where emotions were much easier to deal with. He'd promised Moony he'd stop doing that.

So many aspects of their plans relied on uncertainty. If they could fool Dumbledore for long enough and if they could unseat Fudge and if they could destroy all the horcruxes. If they could get Sirius free, or get Malfoy in prison.

If, if, if. Sirius hated that word.

A gentle hand on his back made Sirius look up, and he realised the room had cleared out — everyone except for Charlie, who was watching him with concern on his handsome face. "Talk to me," he urged, fingers sweeping up to massage gently at the tense knot of muscle at the base of Sirius' neck. He couldn't stop himself from melting under the touch.

"It just feels like it won't be enough," Sirius blurted. "I feel like— like I'm not holding up my end of the bargain. Harry's at school risking everything under the noses of Dumbledore and Umbridge both. He's training his classmates for war — something none of those kids should need to prepare for — and he's got his friends planning an entire restructure of the government, and he's dealing with those shitty visions. Meanwhile I'm here rattling around this bloody house with nothing to do but put laxatives in Dumbledore's tea when he comes for meetings."

Charlie snorted. "Have you actually?"

"Once or twice," Sirius confirmed with the barest hint of a grin. "It's hardly worth anything, though. Harry's my godson — I should be doing more to take some of this burden off his shoulders." A burden no teenager should have to bear, least of all his beloved pup, who had already been through so much.

The dragon tamer's fingers stilled. "Sirius," he sighed. "Like it or not, you're a wanted criminal. Harry knows it, we all know it — Kingsley and Tonks are doing what they can to get info on Pettigrew, but it looks like the rat is holed up tight with his master." Sirius snarled at the mention of him. "We all wish Harry didn't have to do what he's doing, but let's be honest, half of his burden is shit he decided to take on himself, the over-achieving little bastard." His voice was affectionate, despite his words. "As his godfather, all he wants you to do — all any of us want you to do — is support him, and love him, and give him a safe place to call home whenever he needs it. And you've done all those things. Are doing all of them."

Charlie's hand moved to cup Sirius' cheek, his other hand coming up to do the same, cradling the older man's face tenderly. He kissed him, and Sirius' heart ached. "You're doing everything you can, Sirius. I wish you'd stop being so hard on yourself."

But couldn't he see? Everything Sirius could do wasn't enough, not while he was trapped in this bloody house. "He needs someone who can protect him from all the crap he's getting. All the crap that's coming his way." If Harry were attacked, Sirius would be one of the last to know, and no one would let him fucking do anything about it for risk of his capture.

Blue eyes softened, a thumb stroking the line of Sirius' cheekbone. "I hate to say it, but if you tried to protect Harry he'd be the first one to shove you out of the way. Kid has even less self-worth than you do." Sirius wasn't sure whether to be more offended on his own behalf or his godson's. "We all feel useless. We're all playing a waiting game. Don't you think I wish I could take up the Weasley seat and put Dumbledore in his place? But it's not time for that. And I get the feeling that when it finally is, we'll be longing for the days where we sat around thinking how useless we all were."

He grinned, cheeks dimpling, and Sirius' heart thudded hard in his chest. "We're all doing what we can. Yourself included. This breakout... it's shit. There's no denying that. But the second those bastards show their faces, we'll get them. Until then, we just keep the lies going, so we don't put Harry in danger. That's the most important thing."

They could both agree on that; while Harry was stuck at school, they all had to fool the world into thinking he was just an average fifth year who happened to have a Dark Lord after his head.

A long sigh escaped Sirius' lips, and for a moment he let himself fall forward, forehead resting against Charlie's. "What would I do without you, Charlie?" he murmured. The hands on his face slid down his neck, resting on his shoulders.

"Don't know. But I can think of plenty of things you can do with me," the redhead replied flirtatiously. Sirius barked out a laugh, and it was harder than ever before to pull himself away.

"I keep telling you, you don't want to be saddled with me."

"And I keep telling you, that's my decision to make," Charlie retorted without missing a beat. His eyes, when they met Sirius', were sad and tired. "You deserve to be happy, Sirius. But I don't know how long I can keep trying to convince you of that."

The admission made Sirius' stomach clench, but before he could say anything Charlie was gone. Sirius was alone in the room, staring at the door, bereft.

He'd been telling himself for weeks now that he would be glad when Charlie gave up, when he could get on with his life in his solitude without gorgeous redheads trying to tempt him into breaking their hearts.

So why did he feel like his own heart was breaking?

.-. .

Exhaustion tugged at the edge of Harry's senses as he headed down for his latest 'Occlumency lesson', and he pushed it away stubbornly. He had stayed out a little too late with Draco the night before, and he wouldn't let Snape punish him for his tiredness, less he accidentally admit the source.

To his surprise, Snape was stood in front of his desk when Harry arrived, rather than at the wall ready to enter the chamber. Harry cocked his head curiously. "I have a different lesson in mind for today," the Slytherin declared. He gestured for Harry to sit.

"What kind of lesson, sir?"

"Legilimency," Snape said, and Harry's eyebrows rose.

"I... but I thought my Occlumency shields were fine?" He hadn't felt much since the Azkaban breakout, and at night the only dreams he got were of the endless dark corridor. Voldemort was fully aware of the connection now, and making sure things only got through when he wanted them to.

"They are. I will be teaching you to perform Legilimency," Snape said, to Harry's astonishment. "It will be beneficial for you to know what an intrusion of the mind feels like from the other side — perhaps, should the Dark Lord ever become... vulnerable, the skill may allow you to dig a little deeper when he draws you into his own thoughts."

"But..." Teaching Harry Legilimency meant Snape allowing Harry into his mind. The Slytherin nodded, mouth in a thin line, clearly of the same thought.

"It is necessary. I have used the pensieve, for once. And I am confident in my ability to throw you out of my mind should you go searching for something I do not want you to see." He peered down his large nose at Harry, and Harry knew then that no matter how much progress had been made between them, how much they had become family due to their shared love of Remus Lupin, if Harry violated this trust he would never be forgiven.

"I'll behave," he promised. "Tell me what to do."

Snape drew up a chair to sit opposite him, and set his wand in his lap. "You know the incantation. To truly breach the mind, you must have absolute focus — there are billions of moments and memories inside a single person's brain, and if you do not know exactly what it is you are looking for, it can be easy to get lost in there. The hardest part is not the spell itself, but removing yourself from the other's mind."

Harry's fingers tightened around his own wand, attempting to stop them trembling. "I could get stuck?"

"In an untrained mind, yes," Snape said with a short nod. "I have enough skill in Occlumency to eject you myself, though I will not until you have gained a feel for it. First, I will lower my shields for you, so you can see what it is to enter a mind without resistance. We will work upwards from there. Are you ready?"

Harry nodded, meeting Snape's near-black eyes, imagining he could see some of his own trepidation reflected back at him. He took a deep breath. Focus.

“Legilimens.”

At first it was like being plunged into a pool of icy water, not knowing which way was up. Sensations and sounds were bombarding him from all angles, so overwhelming he could hardly breathe. Focus, he reminded himself. He had to try and find his way around. Find a memory, intentionally.

Immediately, his mind went in one specific direction. Show me Lily, he thought, yearning with his whole heart to see his mother through this man’s eyes.

The sensations faded a little, and Harry wondered if Snape was kicking him out, if he’d asked to see something off-limits. Then everything blurred around him — and he was stood on grass.

It was like being in a pensieve memory but... sharper. More. He could smell the grass, feel the wind in his hair.

He could see the sunlight glinting off the vibrant red hair of the little girl in front of him.

It was not the kind of memory Harry had anticipated; they were in a park — a rather rundown one, by the looks of it, with a swing seat hanging from only one chain and a climbing frame that looked like an absolute death trap. But all he could feel was joy, excitement, and the warm glow of receiving this girl’s wide smile. There was a boy with the girl; twig-thin and knobbly-kneed, with a curtain of dark hair falling in front of a pale face.

“It came! Sev, you were right — it really came!”

“Of course it came,” Harry heard the boy say — Severus Snape’s voice to be sure, but pre-pubescent.

And northern.

Lily Evans, too, had a thick Birmingham accent, crying out to “Show me yours, show me yours!” She thrust a piece of parchment in Snape’s direction.

Dear Miss Evans, we are pleased to inform you that you have been accepted at Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry.

In Snape’s hand was an almost identical letter, crumpled at the edges from being held so tight; proof that he was worth something, that he could be more than this silly little mining town.

“Mum and Dad thought it was mental, but I told them it weren’t a joke,” Lily continued. “They wanna talk to your mum, though.”

“I don’t know if that’s a good idea, Lils.”

“Oh, come on, Sev!” A small hand on the boy’s skinny arm, a bright smile directed his way. Nothing could possibly be bad when Lily was smiling like that. “They’ve met your mum, they know what she’s like. As long as your dad’s not around it’ll be easy.”

"That's easier said than done," young Snape pointed out. "He got let go from the factory again." A flash of pain, a wince. Lily's smile was gone, replaced with righteous fury blazing in those vivid green eyes.

"What did he do to you?"

Harry saw those dark eyes widen a fraction. Saw Snape scrambling to think of a lie, something Lily might believe, anything to get her off the subject.

"Lily! Mummy says it's time to come in, now! I— oh. You're with the freak." And that could only be one person, with that sort of contempt. Harry looked across the park to see a girl a couple of years older than Lily, her blonde hair cut in a wavy bob, a look of disgust on her face as she stared at them. Petunia Evans, aged thirteen, and just as hateful as always. She had the same accent as her sister, though her words were clipped and over-annunciated, like she was already trying to train herself out of it and into the crisp RP accent Harry knew her to have as an adult. "Come away, Lily."

"Leave him alone, Tunie!" Lily argued, glaring at her sister. "You're just jealous because we get to go to magic school and you don't!"

A sneer on Petunia's face, so cold it made Lily flinch. "Why would I want to go to such an awful place with a couple of unnatural weirdos like you? I'll be glad to see the back of you. Maybe Mum and Dad can ask that old man if they can keep you over the holidays, too."

And then Harry felt a sharp shove, and he was back in his own mind, his body feeling even more worn and leaden than ever. "I'm sorry," he gasped, looking up awkwardly at Snape's face. It was remarkably blank. "I... I got carried away." He hadn't intended to linger so long in the same memory, but his mother was right there, tiny and fierce and so incredible.

"I could have removed you at any time," Snape replied — his way of assuring Harry that he had not overstepped. "You must learn not to get trapped in memories, however. No matter how... appealing they are. Had I been of the mind to, I could have caged you there for as long as I wanted. Especially since you did not keep any connection to your own mind — a true Legilimens needs to be able to slip into another's mind while remaining in their own, to avoid leaving themselves unguarded. Or arousing suspicion."

That made sense; when Dumbledore tried to sneakily use Legilimency on people, he didn't go all slack and vacant-eyed like Harry no doubt had. He could hold entire conversations while rummaging through peoples' heads!

"It's harder than I thought it would be."

A flicker of a smile crossed Snape's lips. "You have only seen it done well, and that makes it look easy."

Snape leaned back in his chair, no doubt giving Harry a little time to recover from what he'd seen. Harry's head was full of his mother's voice, her face; it was so different than seeing pictures.

“When did you lose your accent?” he blurted, eyes going wide at the faintest blush on Snape’s pallid cheeks.

“Summer after my first year, for the most part,” he confessed. “Speaking in such a way, to the other Slytherins, was... uncouth. I didn’t need even more for people to bully me over, so I trained myself out of it. I... slipped, on occasion. Remus found it particularly amusing to make me revert to my childhood accent.” He blushed deeper, and Harry started blushing, too.

“I never knew. Aunt Petunia hasn’t a trace of it.”

“Oh, Tunie was speaking like a toff before she hit sixth form,” Snape told him, and there it was, just a tiny hint of a Brummie twang. “Though it took her far longer than it did me to learn proper elocution, and it certainly didn’t endear me to her any further.” A small twitch of Snape’s lips. “Lily, on the other hand, made a point of getting even more northern the longer we spent away from Cokeworth. Said she wasn’t ashamed of where she came from and there was nothing wrong with a good regional accent. It was quite entertaining, watching her yell at your father — he was as posh as anything, and when she really got going I think he only understood a quarter of the words from her mouth.”

Harry laughed, imagining that tiny red-haired girl yelling at a tiny Indian boy, her accent ever-thickening. “Would— would you show me, sometime?” he asked before he could help himself. “Not in your head, if you don’t want.” Experiencing things with the full weight of young Snape’s emotions was a little alarming. “But... in the pensieve, maybe?” While they had it, it couldn’t hurt to take advantage, surely?

“Perhaps,” Snape drawled, and he — thankfully — didn’t look offended. “If it will incentivise you to learn Legilimency faster.”

Harry straightened up in his seat. “Deal.”

To watch memories of his mother, he would do just about anything.

.-.-.-.

Harry was starting to feel like he was going insane.

Between the Prophet still denying the truth of the breakout — running a series of increasingly ridiculous articles about the criminal mastermind Sirius Black and what he could possibly be gathering Death Eater accomplices for — and Umbridge cracking down on any hint of independent thought within the walls of Hogwarts, the school began to move on from it all, and Harry often felt like he was the only one who realised how close to impending disaster they actually were.

Well, not the only one. His friends were right there with him. But just when he started to think they might be gaining a majority on the side of truth, he was knocked right back down again — like right now, in the Great Hall, overhearing a group of Ravenclaws in his own year laugh about how much of an attention-seeking crazy person he was, to be full of such anti-Ministry conspiracy theories. This, naturally, was the result of yet another detention with Umbridge after he mentioned in class that sending dementors out to search for the missing prisoners was not going to work when the dementors had let them escape to begin with.

He forgot, sometimes, that despite his growing friendships with people outside his own house, he didn't have everyone on his side. Padma and Mandy were the only Ravenclaw girls in his year that he spoke to, and there were still a fair few Hufflepuffs who gave him dirty looks whenever he was nearby. Hell, even within Gryffindor he was not entirely supported — Seamus and Dean had become Ron's new friends, and even though Ron was fully aware that Voldemort had returned and Sirius was an innocent man, he was happy to make jokes about how Harry had finally gone 'round the twist.

It was disheartening, to say the least. He was trying so hard to prepare people for the dark times to come, and they would much rather stick their heads in the sand and keep going with business as usual.

"If it's this bad inside the school when I'm right here telling the truth, I dread to think what the rest of the country thinks," Harry muttered, turning back to his lunch. He had Ginny on one side and Neville on the other, and the Weasley girl patted his shoulder sympathetically.

"With the Prophet against you, there's not much you can do."

Harry still scowled, absently wondering if Susan had any plans in her arsenal for laws about unbiased media reporting. He was on the verge of calling Mrs Frobisher back up, but he doubted there was much she could legally do about it; they were insinuating a lot, to be sure, but they weren't outright calling Harry a liar or a lunatic. He couldn't sue them just because they were saying not to worry about Voldemort.

"It's like last year all over again," he muttered, "only worse, because it's about other peoples' safety rather than just me being a glory-hound."

Suddenly, Ginny froze, and then a slow smile stretched across her face. "If it's like last year," she drawled, "why not take the same approach?"

Harry blinked at her, and then it clicked. "Write another article?" She grinned wider, nodding.

"People listened to the last one. Mostly," she added, remembering her own mother's firm denial on the subject. "But anyone with a brain can tell that the Ministry's story doesn't add up — if you tell the world the truth, it'll be harder for them to deny it. Not everyone will believe you, but you'll get plenty to think about it at the very least."

"Half the magical folks in the country only have the Prophet for news," Neville agreed. "They've no reason not to trust it. And they might not know anyone at the school to know that your story is a whole lot more plausible."

Harry thought it over, dipping the crust of his bread into his soup. It could backfire on him spectacularly; the Quibbler, as much as he loved Luna dearly, was hardly a recognised source of truthful, legitimate news.

But... it was like Ginny said. If he could just get people thinking, get them questioning the legitimacy of the stories the Prophet fed them...

“Okay, then,” he declared, his heart lifting with enthusiasm for the first time in a long while. “It can’t hurt.” It could, but he wouldn’t think too hard on that.

“At the very least it’ll piss Umbridge off, and that’s always a winner,” Ginny chirped slyly. Harry laughed — that was certainly true. Maybe if Umbridge was railing at him again, she might ease up on Hagrid for a while.

“I’ll talk to Luna in Charms,” Ginny promised, grabbing her school bag. “You just start thinking about what you want to write.”

Harry groaned quietly; he’d forgotten that publishing an article meant actually having to write the article. He’d have to try and squeeze that in somewhere amongst the three hundred other things he had going on.

But he would, because it was worth it. The resistance needed to happen outside of Hogwarts, too.

Chapter 64

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Wandering between the rows of shelves in the library, Harry looked around for a place to study without being gawped at or whispered about. He had a stack of books in his arms all about the process of animate conjuration, and a two-foot Transfiguration essay due in the morning.

Continuing to some of the rows further back, hoping they would be more deserted, Harry froze — sat in a darkened corner, completely alone, was Cassius Warrington. And he looked awful.

The seventh year's usually handsome face was pale and waxy, his brown hair hanging into his eyes like it was long overdue a cut. His robes hung loosely off his shoulders; he'd lost weight, this school year.

Carefully, Harry checked there was no one snooping around, then approached the Slytherin and put up a privacy ward to block them from view. Cassius jumped as the magic washed over him, looking up in alarm. "Oh. Potter. It's just you." His shoulders slumped again.

"Are you alright?"

A derisive snort escaped the Slytherin's lips. "Oh, I'm just fine," he replied, sarcasm dripping from his tone. "Positively wonderful."

Harry sat down warily. "Cassius," he started, and the boy's aloof Slytherin mask cracked just a fraction.

"I have NEWTs in four months," he said, voice hollow. "And after that I will go home, to my family, where my older brother and my uncles and both my cousins are all waiting for me to join them in the ranks of the Dark Lord's loyal subjects." His face twisted in disgust. "I know they won't let me use the Ministry as an excuse to keep that foul Mark off my arm. Hell, three of them work there themselves, and it's not been a problem for them." He ran a hand through his hair, messing it up even further. "Somehow I have to pass these fucking exams knowing what's waiting for me when they're over. But even if I don't pass them I'll face the same fate, so what's the fucking point." He kicked the leg of the table, making it rattle.

"If I could kill him faster for you, I would," Harry remarked wryly. Cassius' eyes widened.

"I didn't— It isn't your fault, Harry," he insisted. "Even if the Dark Lord died tomorrow, that wouldn't stop my family being there. Being awful. Trying to trap me in their twisted net of dark magic." His lips quirked in a cold, bitter grin. "Best I can hope for is all of them getting sent to Azkaban when they fight in their Lord's army. Or killed. I'm not picky." The bravado faltered, and he sighed once more. "I just... the boys in my dorm are all legitimate supporters, and I can tell they're watching me. They know I used to hang out with all sorts last year. They know I was friendly with your lot. But they're always there and when they're not, Umbridge is, and I can't trust that no one's reading my letters so I can hardly talk to the one person who actually gives a shit, and my workload is getting worse and I just—I have nowhere to go, Harry," he said, voice cracking. "I'm almost eighteen and it still doesn't matter. I'm still stuck with them. If I want the chance to save the family name, if I want to have even a knut to my name when I graduate, I have to do what they say. Disinheriting me would be the kindest thing they'd do — I'd much more likely end up dead."

"What about Oliver?" Harry asked, and Cassius' whole body went stiff, his hazel eyes filling with fear for the briefest moment. Then he relaxed, turning sheepish.

"Did he tell you?" he asked knowingly, and Harry shook his head.

"I guessed."

A short laugh rang through their quiet corner. "What gave me away? Anything I need to worry about?"

Harry shook his head before the older boy could second-guess himself. "Only because I know you, and him. It was a bit suspect when you were both so friendly at the World Cup, and then how happy you were listening to the match commentary that one time... Plus a couple things the twins said, here and there." Because Fred and George absolutely knew about the relationship, and Harry wouldn't be even a little bit surprised if one or both of them had had a hand in it.

A long, slow breath whistled through Cassius' clenched jaw. "He asked me to marry him, at Christmas. When I graduate."

Harry's eyes widened. "Blimey. I, uh, hadn't realised you were that serious." He should have, though; Oliver Wood was a very committed individual, to whatever he decided to give his heart to, be it quidditch or a person. And they had been together quite a while, it seemed; longer than Harry and Draco.

Not that Harry had asked Draco to marry him or anything. He was way too young to do that.

"I still don't know what he sees in me," Cassius remarked. "But I love the crazy bastard. When I'm with him... I can forget what kind of man my uncle is making me become. With Ollie I feel like I actually might amount to something better." He shook his head, eyes filled with pain. "I want to marry him, more than anything. But I can't. If my family got word that I even spoke to Oliver, they'd kill him in front of me and then kill me too for good measure."

There wasn't even a hint of exaggeration in his tone, and Harry believed every word.

"You have somewhere to go, Cassius," he said, but the Slytherin shook his head.

"I can't put Ollie in danger like that."

"I'm not talking about Ollie. I'm talking about me." That made Cassius pause, brows rising. "I've offered Theo sanctuary, and a few of the neutral families who have come to Blaise for help. I can offer it to you, too. And Oliver, if you're worried about him. He's still my Captain." Always would be, as far as Harry was concerned. Harry hadn't written to Oliver since the summer because of his worries about his mail being read, but he always told Charlie to send his regards, and kept up with what the keeper was doing that way.

"As if Oliver would go into hiding when there's quidditch to be played," said Cassius dryly, and Harry laughed. Fair point.

"For you, then. He can visit whenever. Your family never have to know about the connection between the two of you."

He could tell by the look on Cassius' face that the boy was considering the idea. "If I leave the family, they'll cut me from the tree. I'm not like Theo — he's the last of his line, for both Nott and Avery. They can't disinherit him or both those lines die out for good. The family magic might've rejected my brother, but I've got two cousins and an uncle who are still eligible. I can't risk the family seat going into their hands."

Harry bit his lip; that was all perfectly good reasoning. He knew he was lucky that Sirius hadn't been properly, magically disinherited by his parents. But he hated the idea of Cassius staying with them, "I won't force you to make any decisions," he said eventually, wishing there was more he could do. "But you'll always have a place of safety as long as I'm alive to offer it to you. If things get bad — if they force you into the Mark, or they find out about Ollie — you come straight to me alright? Don't risk your life just to keep that fucking Wizengamot seat. It's not worth it, yeah?" he finished passionately. Cassius looked up at him, and after a beat of silence, cracked a small but genuine smile.

"I've got too much Slytherin self-preservation instinct in me to let them kill me over a single vote," he remarked. Still, he looked like a weight had been lifted off his shoulders. "Thank you, Harry. It's... it's good to know I have options. And that Ollie has someone looking out for him." He shook his head in fond exasperation. "Damned fool would take a beater's bat to my whole family if I let him."

"Sounds about right," Harry agreed, amused. "I'll kill Voldemort as quickly as I can," he promised, ignoring the boy's flinch at the name. "I can't say how long it'll take, but know that I'm trying my best."

"Never doubted it for a second," Cassius assured.

"Good. So you just leave that to me, and keep yourself safe, and tell Oliver you'll marry him when you can." Harry grinned, heart aching fiercely. "Because that is a wedding I desperately want to attend."

Cassius grinned back. "It'll be fucking quidditch-themed if he has his way," he warned, and Harry laughed.

A wedding to look forward to at the end of all this was exactly what he needed. A quidditch-themed wedding sounded even better.

Somehow, between homework and lessons with Snape and the HA, Harry squeezed in enough time to write an article for the Quibbler. It was a lot harder than his last one; he was no journalist, to be sure, and this time he had to make sure he sounded as credible and sane as possible. It wasn't just about writing from the heart — he was writing to convince people to accept danger was coming.

When he had a solid draft, he took it to Luna, the pair of them holed up in an unused classroom to read it over. Luna was surprisingly good at editing; she helped her father with the articles when she was at home, apparently.

"This is very good, Harry," she said, smiling. "And your timing is perfect, too; if I get it to Daddy soon, he'll be able to get it out before he hears back from the entrants to his writing competition. He's asked people to send in their experience with Heliopaths, so he's bound to be very busy with that."

"That's... good," Harry said, unsure how else to respond. Hopefully Luna's father would not put his article in the same space as a story about some ridiculous conspiracy theory that might make him look like even more of a madman than the Prophet implied. "I'm really grateful you and your dad are willing to do this, Luna."

"People need to know," she replied sagely. "And as journalists, we have a duty to report the truth."

Harry wished the people at the Prophet could have even a scrap of the same journalistic integrity. "Well that's it, as best as I could manage it." He gestured to the parchment of his article. He had tried his best to report everything he thought might help; both the story of what happened to Cedric, and the dementor attack on Dudley. If the general public wasn't alarmed by the prospect of a seventeen year-old boy being kidnapped from school and murdered, perhaps they might be by the idea of a dementor roaming a perfectly ordinary muggle street. Harry had leaned a little heavy on the idea of the Statute of Secrecy being broken by the Ministry's careless response to Voldemort's return, and how catastrophic that could be for everyone.

"We'll try and have it out in the next issue. That's a week after Valentine's Day," Luna promised brightly.

"Perfect." Harry glanced at the blonde girl, eyebrows raised. "Any big plans for that Hogsmeade weekend?" For days already, the school had been aflutter with people discussing their plans for the auspicious day. Harry was torn between being glad he didn't have to get involved, and wishing he could take Draco to Hogsmeade like all the other lovestruck young couples.

"Oh, I'm going with Daphne," Luna replied, fiddling with her butterbeer cork necklace. Harry stared.

"...Daphne Greengrass?" Slytherin, no-emotions-unless-they're-contempt, Daphne Greengrass? Luna nodded, her smile growing wider.

"She's awfully pretty. I partnered with her a few times in the HA and she has a very nice smile. So I asked her to Hogsmeade."

Harry wasn't sure which side of that pairing was the more difficult to believe, but it absolutely was not his place to judge, so he just offered a smile that he hoped hid his utter bewilderment. "Well, have fun with that."

"Thank you, Harry. I'm sure we will."

That would certainly be an interesting combination.

.-. .

Harry had to turn down quite a few invites to Hogsmeade himself, for the upcoming Valentine's Day weekend. From both male and female students.

"Don't know why they're bothering," he grumbled to himself after attempting to politely reject Romilda Vane for the fourth time. "They know I'm gay."

Harry heard a snort behind him, and turned. Ron was there, walking a few feet behind him with Dean and Seamus. They were all on their way to the Great Hall for dinner, and as they'd come from Herbology Harry had left Neville behind talking with Professor Sprout.

"Something to say?" he asked sharply, and the redhead scowled at him.

"Just wondering how long you're going to keep that up."

"Keep what up?" Harry was confused.

"The whole gay thing. We all know you're just faking," Ron spat.

"...I'm sorry, what?" Where the hell had he got that idea?

Far from being embarrassed, Ron continued. "Come on, don't pretend like we haven't all seen you. I heard you and Loony Lovegood were locked in a quiet classroom for hours the other day. And the way you've cosied yourself up to Lavender and Parvati in Divination, acting like you're just the gay best friend, like you're safe, when we can see them all over you. Susan Bones, too. Just how many girls have you got on the go, Potter?"

Harry stared incredulously, then looked at Dean and Seamus, who were pointedly not meeting his gaze. "You're not serious," he spluttered. They had onlookers, now; people on their way to dinner, wondering why the pair of them had stopped in the entrance hall. "It's called having friends, Ron."

"Friends you're always sneaking off in secret with?" Ron retorted.

"If you consider that suspect, I've got a lot of questions about you and Hermione," Harry shot back, seeing a few people go wide-eyed. Ron's face went as red as his hair.

“You shut up about Hermione,” he sneered. “She seems to be the only bloody girl in this school that isn’t obsessed with you. You’ve even got my sister under your thumb. You’ve got some nerve, parading it around in public like that, pretending to be queer so no one notices you’re sleeping with any girl that’ll have you.”

“I’m not sleeping with any girls!” Harry argued. “And I’m not pretending to be anything.”

Ron scoffed. “Like I believe that! We all know what Lavender’s like, I really doubt you two are just friends when she’s throwing herself at you in Divination.”

Smack!

Harry hadn’t noticed Lavender Brown appear, but there she was, her hand raised and a rapidly forming red mark on Ron’s face. Her face was a picture of utter fury. “How dare you,” she hissed.

“Lavender!” Ron was wide-eyed, in shock or fear Harry wasn’t sure. “Well— well it’s true! You’ve had half the rest of the Gryffindor boys, and we’re supposed to believe there’s nothing going on with you and Harry?”

Harry was quite impressed she didn’t slap him again. “You’re just jealous because of all the boys I’ve kissed, you’re not one of them,” she retorted. “And you never will be. After a comment like that, I’ll be surprised if you ever get a date in this school, Ron Weasley!”

Indeed, of the girls in the audience, most of them were looking at Ron like he was dirt on the bottom of their shoe. His face reddened further.

“So he’s fooled you, too, has he?” Ron taunted. “Haven’t you realised he’s always off with girls but never seen sneaking around with a boy? He’s always turning them down, too. Never even holding hands with one.”

“I have a boyfriend!” Harry blurted, and a chorus of gasps rang out. “Clearly I’m just better at keeping my private life private. It’s none of your damn business who I’m with, Ron.”

“Mr Potter!”

Harry’s heart sank at the high-pitched call. Umbridge was approaching the hall, face severe. “Detention, for inappropriate behaviour. Tomorrow evening, my office.” She looked around at the gathered students, who quickly dispersed, heading in to dinner. Ron was still glaring at Harry, even when the pink-clad teacher had left.

“Come on, Harry,” Lavender huffed, linking her arm with his. “Let’s go sit down.”

Harry let her take him to the Gryffindor table, fury still pounding through his veins. It would be all over the school by morning, his mysterious boyfriend. Draco was going to kill him.

“I’m sorry he said that to you, Lavender,” he sighed, and the girl shot him a sharp look.

“Don’t you dare apologise for his slut-shaming bullshit,” she snapped. “I swear, just because he’s got his emotions so far up his arse he can’t find enough of them to tell Hermione

Granger how he feels, doesn't mean he needs to take it out on every girl who's so much as looked at a boy."

"Well, he'd better hope Hermione figures it out eventually, because I think you're right in saying he won't get a date otherwise," Harry muttered under his breath, looking further up the table, where Ron was sat alone. Even Dean and Seamus had distanced themselves, no doubt not wanting the Hogwarts girls to tar them with the same brush.

"Speaking of dates," Lavender purred, eyes lighting up. "Boyfriend?"

"Secret," he replied ruefully, and she gave an exaggerated pout.

"No fun."

Harry chuckled. "Sorry."

She left it at that, happily filling him in on the rest of the romantic gossip of Hogwarts. Harry could feel the eyes of the rest of the hall on him, and desperately wished they would all accept his secrets with as much grace as Lavender Brown.

.-. .

Considering Harry thought he may end up hexing Ron Weasley into the hospital wing if he went to Gryffindor Tower after dinner, he instead went down to the Chamber of Secrets, happily ensconcing himself in front of Salazar's bookshelves. He'd narrowed it down to eight books that mentioned the word 'horcrux', and was now trying to focus enough to read in further detail, his brain tripping up on the archaic form of English. Salazar was blessedly silent, except to offer translations into Parseltongue when Harry was truly stuck on a word.

The first three didn't contain much; they described the process to make horcruxes, though only one of them actually gave the explicit spells and rituals. The rest just said that 'certain magics' were involved during the cold-blooded murder of an innocent, and the soul was split and placed in a vessel. It was interesting to confirm that the soul was halved each time, making what remained progressively weaker with every additional horcrux.

Clearly, that had not been in any of the books Voldemort had read on the subject, given he'd made at least three of them.

It was the fourth book that had Harry's jaw dropping, his pulse picking up excitedly. Typically, it was one of the most confusingly-written ones, and eventually Harry gave up and just held the book up to Salazar, asking for a translation.

"Should your horcrux be kept within a being of sentient life, there are dangers inherent to the natural lifespan of said host," the founder hissed. "It is recommended that horcruxes be held within inanimate objects, but where that is not preferred, it is possible to transfer the horcrux into a new living host, when the current host approaches their end. This must be done before the death of the host, as the death of one soul is the death of both."

Salazar stopped reading, and Harry went wide-eyed. “Does it say how?” he pressed. Salazar nodded.

“It does, but I will be honest, I do not expect you to understand it, lad.” His tone was not designed to be disparaging, but it made Harry scowl all the same. He looked at the book, and at the utter gibberish on the page — both in the writing itself and in the form of the complex Arithmantic diagrams of some kind of ritual. Salazar had a point; even if the whole thing were in modern English, Harry likely wouldn’t make heads nor tails of it.

But he knew who would.

“I need to show this book to my friend,” he hissed. “He works for the goblins, as a curse-breaker. His team is trying to find a way to remove the horcrux from my scar.”

“You may make a copy of it,” Salazar assented. “The original texts will not leave this office, but I doubt any of them are still under Copyright Charms. Duplicate it, and take it to your friend.”

Harry waved his wand, and sure enough the book duplicated easily. He quickly put the original back on the shelf, before he forgot which was which. “My friend is going to ask where I found this,” he said cautiously. Salazar’s expression soured.

“Now is not yet the time to reveal my presence to the world,” he insisted.

“One person is not ‘the world’,” Harry retorted defensively. “Bill can keep a secret.” He’d done well so far, keeping Harry’s.

Salazar still didn’t look impressed, but he let the argument slide.

Then Harry realised there was one more obstacle. His only way of getting the book out of Hogwarts quickly was Snape, and he would definitely want to know where it came from. And to see for himself what sort of obscure magics Harry was discovering. “How would you feel about me inviting the head of Slytherin House down here? He is helping with this research, and he would likely be more useful than I would.”

He waited patiently for Salazar to consider the subject. “This is the man who plays triple agent? He is family to you?” he clarified, and Harry nodded. A flicker of a smile crossed the man’s painted face. “He is a worthy Slytherin. You may bring him.”

Relief filled Harry’s veins. That would make his life easier; not in the least because it would ingratiate him to Snape even more than letting him harvest the basilisk had. Harry was going to introduce him to Salazar Slytherin himself, let him look through the founder’s private library.

Snape was going to love him.

.-.-.

Valentine’s Day arrived in a flurry of excited students — and an increase in detentions due to inappropriate behaviour. It seemed Umbridge considered almost any expression of positive human emotion inappropriate, for Harry had seen her take points from two people just stood close together.

At least there were no headache-inducing decorations, as the colour pink had been ruined for everyone over the last six months.

Still, even Umbridge's wrath couldn't dampen the joy of celebrating the love-filled holiday with a Hogsmeade weekend, and as Harry went down to breakfast that morning he was surprised to see just how many couples were lined up to leave the castle, holding hands and grinning at each other.

He felt a pang in his chest, briefly wishing he could be one of those students; but even if there wasn't the danger of Lucius Malfoy involved, Harry wasn't sure he'd want to be gawped at all day as he knew he would for taking Draco Malfoy on a date.

One day.

Not wanting to pass up the excuse to get out of the castle, Harry lined up by himself, ignoring the number of eyes fixed firmly on him. Ever since his admission in the face of Ron's ridiculous accusation, half the school seemed dead set on sleuthing out who his mystery boyfriend was. There was even a betting pool going around, which Harry found utterly ridiculous.

Mainly because the top name on the list was George Weasley. As if there would be any reason to hide such a relationship; the Weasleys had made themselves targets for the Dark long before Harry was around.

The second name was Blaise Zabini, which was a little closer, but it still made him laugh that Draco's name was way down the bottom with astronomical odds. One person had put a bet on him.

Harry suspected that may have been Draco himself, but the blond would never tell.

Entering the village, Harry let a smile take over him as he watched the students go about their morning — it was so nice to see people so happy, so carefree. In all his training in various forms, his battle of wills against Umbridge, Harry sometimes forgot that things weren't all doom and gloom just yet. There was plenty of time for his fellow students to just be normal teenagers.

If Harry had his way, there always would be.

His smile widened at the sight of two heads of blonde hair, one much darker than the other; Luna and Daphne were strolling along the main street, holding hands while Luna gestured wildly with her free one, chattering away about some creature or another with earnestly wide eyes. Daphne looked fond, and a bit bewildered — like she couldn't quite understand how she'd ended up there, but she was very happy to be there all the same.

Harry still didn't understand that one.

He saw Ernie and Hannah head into Madam Puddifoot's, which was exactly the explosion of red and pink that Harry anticipated. Neither of them looked particularly impressed by the decoration, and as Harry walked by them he caught Hannah's eye, and she mimed gagging. He laughed, absolutely no help whatsoever; it wasn't his fault the students were limited to either Puddifoot's or the Three Broomsticks.

Honeydukes was absolutely heaving with students, all trying to buy sweets for their sweethearts. So Harry steered clear of it, deciding to head towards Zonko's instead. There, he saw his second unexpected couple of the day.

He didn't realise they were there together at first. The two boys were stood close, but just talking. Then George stepped forward, pressing a bold kiss to his companion's cheek and gesturing dramatically at the entrance to the shop. Blaise Zabini chuckled, but obligingly walked through, and as he passed George's hand slid down to the small of his back. The pair disappeared inside the shop, and Harry was left gaping at them.

When had that happened? And why had no one told him! The pair clearly weren't keeping it a secret.

He would have to have a long conversation with George Weasley, tomorrow.

He chuckled to himself; that couple would certainly upset the Harry Potter Dating Pool.

After a brief detour to Scrivenshaft's for some more parchment, Harry began to get peckish, and decided to brave the Three Broomsticks for lunch. He walked past a group of girls, who burst into giggles at the sight of him. His jaw clenched.

Maybe after that he'd go back to the castle. Hogsmeade on Valentine's Day was not the place for a single person, especially when that person was Harry Potter.

Luckily it seemed like the main lunch rush hadn't properly begun yet, people still out making the most of their dates — or feeling too awkward to come inside and sit opposite one another for an entire meal.

That didn't mean there weren't plenty of people inside — almost all the tables had been rearranged into little two-seater sections — but it was quiet enough that Harry could actually see all the way from the door to the back wall. His gaze travelled over the couples sat down, wondering if he might see any more unusual pairings.

At the back of the room, sat alone in a booth, was Neville.

Harry frowned, winding his way through the tables to sit down opposite his friend. Neville looked up, forcing a smile. "Oh. Hi, Harry. Didn't know you were around."

"Yeah, thought I'd have a wander. Are you alright?" He paused, wondering if his next question would be well-received. "I, uh — I thought you'd be with Ginny, to be honest." The pair had been growing ever closer since Christmas, and Harry had been almost certain this weekend would make them official.

Neville gave him a wry look. “Not today, no.”

They were interrupted by Rosmerta, delivering a butterbeer for Neville, and the pair of them ordered lunch. Harry could feel eyes on them, but ignored them all; it wouldn’t be the first time people had thought he was dating Neville.

When they were alone again, Harry cleared his throat. “So, uh... neither of you asked each other, or...?” He wondered, for a brief horrified moment, if Ginny was out there in the village on a date with some other boy. If she was... Harry would be having words with her.

“She asked me,” Neville confirmed. Harry blinked — now he was even more confused.

“But, then...”

Neville sipped at his drink, and sighed. “Valentine’s Day is... so much pressure. It’s this big cliché of romance and grand gestures and all that, and I just... she had her time for herself, when she was dating Michael and everything. After that, after how that felt... I needed a bit of time for myself. I think we both need a bit of space to be alone for a bit, to be honest.”

“That’s understandable,” Harry agreed softly. He wondered if Neville had admitted — either to Ginny or even to himself — how much watching her with Michael had hurt him.

“I’m not saying no forever,” Neville assured. “I want to be with Ginny. But... I didn’t think Valentine’s Day was the easiest place to start from.”

As if to accentuate his point, a girl across the room stood from the table, screamed a Stinging hex at her date, and stormed out. The boy stared after her, a huge welt forming across his cheek. Harry and Neville shared a look, wincing.

“No, I get it,” Harry said, turning away from the drama. “You’re sticking up for yourself.” He gave the boy a small grin. “I’m proud of you, mate.”

Neville blushed, ducking his head, and was saved having to respond by the arrival of their lunch.

Ginny needed to see that Neville wasn’t just waiting around for her to be ready for him. He had to be ready, too. And she deserved to be the one waiting, for a change.

.-. .

After lunch with Neville, Harry headed back up to the castle — he had tried to wander the village a bit more, but Neville had wanted to go to Dogweed and Deathcap, and Harry was not willing to sacrifice the two hours of his day that would inevitably take. And since being alone just made more people stare and giggle at him, he decided to take his leave.

He had his own plans to take care of, after all.

It was nearly three by the time he made it back to Gryffindor Tower, which was mostly full of younger year students; some studying, some just hanging out, and a few brave souls clearly trying to get what romance they could from within the confines of the castle. Seeing the pair of second years holding hands and playing cards in the corner made him grin to himself in reminiscence. If only he'd been brave enough to hold Draco's hand back in those early days.

Thinking of his boyfriend, Harry picked up his pace on the stairs up to his dormitory. He had a surprise to set up, and he wanted to shower and change before he had to start sneaking.

.-

When Harry next left Gryffindor Tower, it was under his invisibility cloak. He didn't have to wait long for the portrait hole to open, and he hurried through before it could close on him, setting off towards the stairs. He knew where he could find Draco, because he'd told the blond to meet him in their usual spot.

Harry ducked through a little-used passageway behind a suit of armour, and froze. It was... occupied.

In front of him, shadowed in the dark stone corridor, were Susan and Theo. Quite happily snogging their hearts out, Theo's back pressed against the wall as Susan stood right up on her toes to kiss him.

Well, then. This day was just full of surprises.

Harry slowly backed out of the passageway, and left a weak Notice-Me-Not on the entrance just in case there was anyone else who might be trying to find a private spot.

For Susan not to have put up her own wards, she must have been quite... distracted.

He shook the image from his head, carrying on the long way down to the third floor. He could tease his Hufflepuff friend later; he had more important things to focus on, now.

Draco was waiting for him in the classroom, and startled when the door opened to Harry's invisible form. "Hi," Harry greeted, before the Slytherin could get nervous. "Follow me." And then he turned right back out of the classroom.

"How?" Draco retorted, hurrying to follow. "I can't bloody see you!"

"Oh, yeah." Harry doubled back, sliding an invisible hand around Draco's elbow. "Come on."

"Where are we going?" Draco whispered suspiciously. Harry just grinned, though his boyfriend couldn't see it.

They didn't have to go far; it was only around the corner. Harry brought them to a halt in front of an ordinary patch of wall, and hissed.

The wall melted into a doorway.

"What the," Draco muttered, but Harry yanked him through the opening, and once the wall reformed behind him he whipped off the cloak, green eyes dancing.

“Hello.” He leaned in, kissing him quickly. “You look gorgeous.” He did, in a pale blue jumper and charcoal grey trousers. Draco pulled him back in for a proper kiss.

“What are you up to, Potter?” he asked, raising one blond eyebrow. “Where are we?”

Harry kept grinning mischievously. “Let me know when you figure it out.”

With Draco’s hand in his, he headed down the passageway.

Most of the secret passages to the Chamber were still quite gross after centuries of disuse, but Harry had made sure to clean this one ahead of time. With a ball of light floating above their heads, it illuminate the stone walls — and the snakes engraved in them, at about waist height. He wondered how long it would take Draco to catch on.

“Where are we even... wait.” Draco paused, clenching tight on Harry’s hand. “How did you open that passage?”

A chuckle burst from Harry’s lips, and he pulled his boyfriend to keep walking. “Oh, I think you know.”

“Fucking— that can’t be possible. Don’t tell me...” Draco trailed off as they reached the end of the passageway, stepping out into the enormous chamber. “Holy hell,” the blond breathed, his grey eyes as wide as dinner plates. He turned to Harry, speechless for a moment. “Are we — this is— how? ”

So Harry told him, about how Ginny’s offhand comment had made him decide to venture down and see what state the Chamber was in. “I had Snape come down and harvest the massive basilisk skeleton,” he explained. “It was incredibly gross. I also had to do a serious amount of cleaning charms.”

“I thought the entrance was in a bathroom?” Draco asked, looking up at the huge statue of Salazar.

“The one I originally found was. But when I got down here... there’s an office, hidden behind the wall, that I discovered by accident. And before you ask, I can’t take you in there. He’s a bit... prickly.” He’d only barely given permission for Snape, Harry wasn’t going to risk ambushing him with Draco.

“He?” Draco repeated, gaze narrowing. “Who...no.” His jaw dropped when Harry nodded.

“The only existing portrait of Salazar Slytherin,” he confirmed. “He told me there’s secret entrances hidden all over the school. It was originally supposed to be a safehold, in case the witch hunters stormed the school. Enough room to hide the students and staff, with entrances all over the place for safety.” According to Salazar there was a Parseltongue spell that would open all the entrances at once, so people could run in from wherever they were in the castle, but Harry hadn’t yet had the opportunity to try it.

It took Draco several long moments of gaping like a fish to compose himself. When he finally managed it, he whirled around to glare at Harry. “If your surprise is bringing me to this Chamber and then telling me there's a portrait of my house founder you won't let me meet, you're going to have to do some serious grovelling, Potter."

Harry laughed, shaking his head. "No. The surprise is over here; the Chamber is just the location. And I promise you, as soon as Salazar is willing to allow it, I'll take you to meet him." He just had to hope Snape wouldn't tell even his godson when Harry brought him down to the office.

Taking Draco's hand once more, he led him over to the foot of the statue. With a wave of his wand, the true surprise was revealed; a picnic for two, laid out on a green and silver blanket, complete with a bouquet of red roses in a vase. "Oh," Draco said softly.

"I wish we could go out for a proper dinner somewhere nice," Harry said, kissing his cheek. "But I thought this might be a good substitute. We'll certainly have privacy down here," he added, and grey eyes flared with heat, sending a shiver of electricity down Harry's spine. He would not admit that the privacy had been the biggest factor in planning his Valentine's surprise. They could stay down here as long as they liked, without having to worry about Umbridge or patrolling prefects or anything.

Showing Draco the Chamber of Secrets had just been a bonus.

Harry knelt down on the blanket and began unpacking the basket, but stopped when a hand landed on his wrist. When he looked up at Draco, the blond was staring at him intently.

"I'm not all that hungry just yet," he drawled, kneeling down in front of Harry. "I think we'd best work up a proper appetite, first."

Harry swallowed thickly. "Fine by me." Suddenly, food was the last thing on his mind.

In moments, Draco had him on his back, pinned by his wrists to the blanket, their mouths pressed firmly together — as well as other parts of their bodies. Harry moaned softly, arching into the embrace. Then with a quick jerk of his hips, he flipped them over, straddling Draco's thighs. Draco gasped against him, and Harry smirked. "Y'know, something I've learned about the Chamber," he said conversationally, sitting back to start unbuttoning his own shirt. "It's got excellent acoustics." As soon as brown flesh was revealed, Draco's hands were on it, blunt nails scrabbling up Harry's chest. Harry leaned back down for another kiss, then looked Draco dead in the eye. "Bet it's going to sound amazing when I suck your cock so hard you scream my name."

Draco's pupils blew wide. "Holy fuck," he breathed. Harry grinned.

"That a yes?" Already, he was shifting down, working at the fly of Draco's trousers.

"Hell yes," Draco confirmed, lifting his hips to help Harry pull the trousers down. He wasn't wearing underwear, and it made Harry's throat go dry.

He started somewhat tentatively, licking at the flushed, sensitive skin. Even that little touch had Draco whining quietly. Slowly, Harry got a bit bolder; the taste wasn't bad, so he took a bit more in his mouth, careful to keep his teeth out of the whole affair. He was working only off what he'd read in the book — and one embarrassing but informative conversation with George, a few days ago.

Still, Draco certainly seemed to be enjoying it. A hand slid into Harry's hair, gripping tightly, and to his surprise it sent a hot bolt of arousal straight through him when Draco tugged a little too hard. He let out a muffled yelp, and Draco pulled his hand away. "Shit, sorry."

"No." Harry pulled off of his boyfriend's erection, lips swollen and spit-slick. "No. I liked it," he admitted, feeling his face flush. Draco's cock jumped.

"Fuck, you're a walking wet dream, Potter," he groaned, squeezing his eyes shut. Harry pressed a kiss to his belly, trailing them down to the crease of his thigh, then resumed his ministrations.

It did indeed sound amazing when Draco's moans echoed through the Chamber, the ragged gasps making Harry's arousal burn that much sweeter. Eventually it was too much, and he tugged on Harry's hair in warning, giving him enough time to pull off before he came, shouting Harry's name into the huge empty space. Harry was glad, not sure he was ready to swallow on his first try, flinching a little when the hot seed spurted up onto his chest. He fluttered gentle hands up Draco's sides, stroking him through the aftershocks, watching the blond lie there flushed and panting and utterly gorgeous. Utterly Harry's.

Draco pulled him down into a fierce kiss, not remotely bothered by where Harry's mouth had just been.

"Was that... okay?" Harry asked tentatively, suddenly unsure of himself. Draco cupped his jaw, meeting his gaze, and to Harry's relief he was smirking.

"Not sure if it's beginner's luck or natural talent, but it was certainly more than okay," he assured. "Sweet Merlin. I— that was— fuck." His incoherence made Harry grin, kissing him sweetly.

"Worked up enough of an appetite, then?" he asked cheekily. Draco chuckled, sitting up with Harry still straddling his lap, and cast a Cleaning charm on them both.

"I'd certainly say so," he assured, running his hands through Harry's hair in an attempt to tame it. "I'm sure I can think of something fun for dessert," he added, smirking wickedly. "Unless you don't want to wait?"

His fingers trailed down Harry's bare stomach, but the Gryffindor shook his head. He was hard, certainly, but there was no need to rush things. "I'm good, for now." The idea of letting his arousal simmer while they ate was... compelling.

Draco nodded, kissing him hotly, then unceremoniously shoved Harry off his lap so he could pull his trousers up. Harry snorted, and went back towards the picnic basket, wondering how overboard Dobby may have gone in packing it.

"Happy Valentine's Day, love," he said, holding out a bottle of butterbeer. Draco took it, clinking the neck against Harry's own.

"Happy Valentine's Day indeed," he murmured. "I'm gonna have to get very creative if I want to top this next year." A competitive light entered his grey eyes. Harry snorted, lifting out a couple of covered plates.

"No need to go overboard," he assured, then winked. "You know me, I'm easy."

"Only for me," Draco purred, ghosting fingers across Harry's denim-clad backside while he kneeled up to reach into the depths of the basket. "Merlin, I can't believe you brought me to the Chamber of Secrets. I'd be the envy of every Slytherin in the world if they knew."

"Glad you approve," Harry replied, making himself comfortable on the blanket the best he could with his jeans still tight in the groin area. With his back against the base of the statue, he stretched out his legs and let his plate float in front of him, well aware that Draco's lust-filled gaze was trailing up his body. Harry still hadn't put his shirt back on. "I thought about taking you to the Room of Requirement — actual furniture in there, y'know — but I didn't want to risk being interrupted. And I thought this might impress you a bit more."

"Consider me impressed," Draco responded, not even looking at the Chamber, eyes fixed firmly on Harry's crotch. Harry smirked. "Do you have to be back in your tower by any particular time?" Draco attempted a casual tone, but missed the mark thanks to the strain in his voice.

"Not really. Before the others wake up," Harry shrugged. That, too, was one of the reasons he'd picked the Chamber — even if the whole castle were looking for him, they'd never be found down here.

He had Draco to himself for the whole night, as long as they were both back in their dorms before sunrise.

He certainly planned to make the most of it.

Chapter End Notes

There might be a lot of scary adult things going on around them, but they're all still teenagers ;)

Chapter 65

The only person who seemed to be aware that Harry had snuck back into the Gryffindor dorms at the crack of dawn was Neville, who kept alternating between smirking at him and looking vaguely ill when he started to think too hard about what Harry and Draco might have gotten up to. He didn't know where they'd been, just that Harry had planned a surprise for his boyfriend.

"Went well, then?" he asked under his breath when they eventually went down to breakfast on Sunday morning. Harry's beaming grin was enough of a response. "Spare me the details," Neville said, laughing. Harry stuck his tongue out at his friend.

"Planned on it." What had happened between him and Draco down in the Chamber was just for them.

And maybe George Weasley, once Harry was done teasing him to high hell.

Speaking of which; the twins were sat at the Gryffindor table already, and Harry slid in beside George with a smirk. "Good morning," he greeted in a quiet drawl. "You've been holding out on me, Weasley." George looked at him, raising an eyebrow. "I saw you and Blaise in Hogsmeade yesterday."

"Oh." A faint flush dusted the redhead's freckled cheeks. "Yeah. So I was gonna tell you..."

"Sure," Harry agreed sarcastically. He eyed the redhead over, grinning. "You look positively smitten, my friend." It was true; he was happy in a way that for once had nothing to do with mischief-making, his brown eyes bright, his gaze occasionally darting towards the Slytherin table. "How long has that been going on, then?"

"Few weeks," George confessed. "We paired up in HA, when we started learning the Impediment jinx." Harry's eyes widened; that was ages ago! "Turns out when he's frustrated that cool-and-collected mask of his tends to slip a bit. It was very fun making that happen," he added lightly, and there was the mischief again. "Didn't realise I'd been going out of my way to pair with him til we left for Christmas and I missed him. So, ah, I did something about it."

"Always knew you had a thing for snakes," Harry commented, making George cackle.

"Like you can talk."

Harry couldn't argue that one. "You two had a good time yesterday?" That made George blush brighter.

"A gentleman doesn't kiss and tell."

"Good thing you've never been a gentleman," came Harry's instant retort. George laughed, running a hand through his hair.

"He's a lot funnier than most people expect from him," he said eventually, smiling like an absolute sap. Harry, familiar with Blaise's particularly dry sense of humour, nodded. "Hell of a snog, too," George added lasciviously.

"So it's official, then?" Harry asked, watching the redhead's face soften as he nodded.

"We can't exactly hide it now we've been all over Hogsmeade together," George pointed out. "He says he's happy to call me his boyfriend, even to the other Slytherins." There was a wistful note to his tone, and Harry made a mental note to have a chat with Blaise about breaking his big brother's heart. Then again, anyone who tangled with a Weasley knew full well what they were getting into.

Michael Corner's quills had been regularly exploding ink on him since January.

"Oi, you two," Fred barked, tossing a satsuma at Harry, who caught it instinctively. "Save your little gossip session for later, yeah? My brother and I were having a conversation before you rudely interrupted." He was grinning, and Harry tossed the fruit back.

"My apologies," he teased. "Did you want me to ask how your date with Angelina went, too?"

Fred's face turned positively filthy. "Harrikins, I'm quite certain you don't want to know."

Harry made a face of disgust, turning back to Neville, who had been listening to the whole exchange in amusement.

"George and Blaise?" he asked in an undertone, and Harry nodded. "Blimey. Good for them."

"Did you see Luna and Daphne, too?"

That made Neville's eyes go wide, and Harry reached for the strawberry jam, settling in to tell his friend that particular tale.

Really, from the number of couples that seemed to be sprouting from the HA, Harry could start offering his services as a matchmaker.

.-. .

While Harry did have a large pile of homework to do that afternoon, he wasn't remotely interested in working on it when the heirs study group gathered in an empty classroom. Not all of them were there — a few had gone down to Hogsmeade, now it was slightly less full of loved-up couples — but Blaise and Daphne were.

"I'm offended, you know," he said to the pair, entirely too smug. "Both of you found romance through my defence club, and I don't even get a single thank you!"

"Technically, the club was my idea to begin with," Blaise retorted without missing a beat. Harry scoffed.

"Yeah, but I was the one who insisted people mix up partners. If not for me, you never would have discovered the charms of George Weasley," he teased. "Or Luna Lovegood," he added to Daphne. The blonde girl sniffed haughtily.

"Luna is a law unto herself, and I'm sure I would have discovered her charms exactly when she wanted me to, club or no club," she insisted. There was probably some truth to that, but it didn't stop Harry grinning.

"I'm surprised you're even admitting to having emotions, let alone falling for Luna's charms."

The faintest blush crept up Daphne's neck. "She's interesting," she bit out defensively. "And she's not scared of me."

Harry didn't think Luna was scared of anything at all. "It's just nice to see you snakes shedding those stone-cold outer shells," he joked. "Good to know Slytherins have hearts, too."

Under the table, Draco kicked him in the shin. "Just because we have enough decorum not to wear them on our sleeves," he retorted. "It's called discretion, Potter. Something you seem to be lacking in."

Harry almost shot back a retort asking where Draco's discretion was when he was leaving the enormous hickey that Harry had needed to heal with Bruise Balm that morning, but he held his tongue.

"You can't get at them for not sharing about their relationships when you've not told a soul about your secret boyfriend, Harry," Susan piped up from further down the table. Harry's smirk widened.

"And would you like to share anything about secret boyfriends, Susan, dear?" he asked smoothly. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Theo's quill pause mid-sentence. Susan tensed, and narrowed her eyes.

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"Oh, nothing," Harry drawled. "Just that you should really be more careful where you choose to stop for a quick snog, especially if you aren't going to bother putting wards up."

The Hufflepuff's face coloured, her jaw dropping in horror. "You—we didn't—you saw that?"

Harry nodded. "I was doing a bit of sneaking of my own, last night. I'm surprised you didn't feel the Notice-Me-Not I left to cover you." A pause, then, "I suppose you were a bit distracted."

Susan's wand twitched, and a light Stinging charm caught Harry's shoulder. "Ow! Rude! I haven't even said a name," he groused lightly. He wouldn't out the two, not if they truly wanted to keep it secret, though the group was as much of a safe space as they were likely to get.

“We may as well own up to it,” Theo sighed, and the whole room stared at him in shock. “Potter will be insufferable otherwise.”

“I— Susan!” Ernie stuttered, looking between the Hufflepuff and the Slytherin. “You and Theo?”

Susan nodded, not a hint of embarrassment on her face. “We spent a lot of time together over Christmas,” she admitted, fighting down her blush. “There’s certainly something to be said for — what was it, Harry? Ah, yes — shedding those cold outer shells,” she teased, making Theo duck his head bashfully.

“Ah, Slytherins in love,” Harry cooed playfully. “See how much wider your options yet when you look outside the snake pit?”

He wiggled his eyebrows pointedly at both Pansy and Millicent, who looked distinctly unimpressed.

“No, thank you,” Pansy said flatly.

“I’m good,” Millicent agreed.

“Are you done acting like a third year now, Potter?” Draco drawled, sounding bored. “Because the rest of us came here to work, so if all you want to do is gossip I suggest you seek out Weasley and Lovegood.”

“I’ll do that later,” Harry replied breezily. “And don’t act as if Slytherins aren’t the biggest gossip-hounds in the school. You all just call it blackmail instead.”

“Knowledge is power,” Draco retorted. “Something your tiny little Gryffindor mind might struggle to comprehend.”

The bickering was almost instinctual, Harry fighting against a smile as he argued with Draco, riling the Slytherin up.

Suddenly, a loud thud cut them off as Parvati dropped a stack of heavy books on the tabletop. “For the love of Merlin, just kiss already!” she said, glaring at them. “I need to finish this essay before dinner.” Both boys froze. Draco let out a slightly strained laugh.

“I beg your pardon, I—“

“Oh, come off it, guys,” Hannah cut in. “We figured it out ages ago. You’re not subtle, either of you.”

Harry looked around the room; none of them seemed surprised by the accusation. Even Theo, the newest member of the group, just looked quietly amused.

“When you say ages,” Harry started nervously.

“Since, like, Christmas,” Susan dismissed, waving a hand. “Like Hannah said, you’re not subtle. And you’ve got your reasons to keep it quiet, so we never said anything.” Then she smirked, entirely too smug. “But we know.”

Harry turned to Neville, who shrugged helplessly. “I never exactly confirmed it.”

The green-eyed Gryffindor looked to his boyfriend, who looked offended that his emotions had been read so plainly. “This is all your fault, Potter,” he muttered, making Harry grin.

“What, for melting that Ice Prince persona of yours,” he teased. “Can’t say I’m sorry. You’re a lot more fun without that stick up your arse.”

“I’ll show you stick up your arse,” Draco muttered, and Blaise’s lips twitched.

“Not in public, if you please,” he said drily.

“Oh, shut up, you’re dating a Weasley,” Draco retorted, as if that settled the argument.

“What’s wrong with Weasleys?” Neville said, daring him to argue. Rolling his eyes, Harry got up, moving around the table to sit beside Draco.

“Don’t answer that,” he advised, leaning in to kiss his cheek. “Quit being all pouty that our friends know. Now you’ll just have to get used to being nice to me in front of people.”

“And you’ll have to learn that being an annoying little pest to those around you often comes back to bite you on the arse,” Draco said immediately, though he twined his fingers with Harry’s on the tabletop. “Now, help me with this Transfiguration homework, since you were bragging about conjuring an entire hedgehog the other day.”

“I wasn’t bragging, I just mentioned it.” Harry elbowed Draco playfully. “You’d figure it out if you weren’t so set on just demanding things into existence. Sometimes asking nicely gets better results, y’know?”

What followed was a muttered conversation of half innuendo and half comments on Draco being a spoiled little brat; meanwhile, the rest of the group watched the exchange in dawning horror.

“Oh, Merlin,” Susan groaned quietly. “This is worse.”

“I did warn you,” came Neville’s sage response.

Harry and Draco ignored them all, too busy arguing, while Draco’s thumb stroked lovingly over the back of Harry’s hand.

.-. .

His next lesson with Snape started out as it often did, with the pair of them heading down to the Chamber of Secrets through the passage in Snape’s office. When they got there, however, Harry paused at the threshold. “I need to show you something,” he said, wringing his hands nervously. Snape looked at him shrewdly.

“What have you done now?”

Harry almost snorted at the automatic assumption. “For once, nothing irresponsible,” he assured. “So when I brought you down here, I implied that this main room was all there is to it. That, uh, isn’t the case. And I’ve found this book and I think it’s got the answer to our horcrux problem, and I need you to get a copy of it to Bill without anyone knowing where it came from. So I need to show you where I got it.”

“You’ve been reading books you found in Salazar Slytherin’s secret chambers and you don’t consider that irresponsible?” Snape said sharply. “I thought a summer at Grimmauld Place would have made you aware of what kind of curses can be on books, especially books about dark magic. Are you so foolish as to test that, entirely unsupervised, where no one but you can reach?”

“I wasn’t entirely unsupervised!” Harry protested. “And, uh, that’s where the other part of this secret comes in. The reason it took so long to tell you. I had to get permission first.”

Before Snape could start assuming the worst, Harry strode over to the office wall and hissed the password, beckoning the professor to follow. “I brought company,” he hissed in announcement. When he turned around, Snape was stood in the doorway, as close to gobsmacked as Harry had ever seen from the reserved man. “Professor Snape,” Harry said hesitantly, “this is Salazar Slytherin. Salazar, meet Professor Severus Snape, head of Slytherin house.” He switched to Parseltongue halfway through. Salazar rose from his chair, looking down at Snape with calculating eyes.

Suddenly, Snape dropped into a low, reverent bow. “It is an honour, Lord Slytherin,” he greeted, voice positively shaking with emotion. Harry opened his mouth to translate — only for Salazar to smile.

“The honour is mine, Professor Snape. I understand I have you to thank for keeping my young heir alive on multiple occasions.” His voice was smooth, a little bit raspy, but his pronunciation was perfect. Harry gaped at him.

“Since when do you speak English?” he blurted. “Proper English, I mean! You always talk to me in Parseltongue.”

“It’s good for you to get used to speaking it without needing a snake around to trigger you,” Salazar replied, unrepentant. “I never told you I couldn’t speak English, you just assumed.” He narrowed his eyes, like Harry should be well aware of his opinions on assumptions.

“He does tend to do that, my Lord,” Snape agreed ruefully. Salazar chuckled.

“It is a habit I shall endeavour to break him of. And please, call me Salazar.” He returned to his chair, fingers running over the head of his pet snake. “Now, I believe there is a book young Harry wants to show you.”

Harry snapped back to attention, hurrying towards the copy of the book he’d left on the desk. “Here,” he said, flipping it open to the relevant pages and holding it out pointedly. “The language is pretty archaic but I got Salazar to translate, and I think it’s exactly what we need.

So if you would please take this copy of the book to Bill, however you can, that would be a huge help.”

Snape’s eyes were already trailing greedily over the titles on the main bookshelf. “And... the rest?”

“All the originals have to stay in the office,” Harry warned. “But... I’m sure Salazar won’t mind if you want to copy a few for personal use.”

“He’ll certainly make more of them than you would, lad,” Salazar remarked, making Harry roll his eyes.

“There’s some Potions books in the mix. I don’t know what’s what, though. Some of these books might still be around in the world.” Not all of the books were tomes lost to the ravages of time. Some were just earlier versions of books that were still in print today.

Snape was hiding it well, but behind the reserved frown he looked like all his Christmases had come at once. With great effort, he tore his gaze away from the wall of books. “You still need to practice your Bone-Breaking hex.”

“I can do that,” Harry assured. “I’ll be just over there. I promise I’ll yell if I hurt myself,” he added cheekily, watching Snape scowl. There was a brief deliberation on the man’s face — whether his need to stop Harry injuring himself was greater than his desire to start going through Salazar’s shelves. Eventually, Snape nodded decisively.

“I will choose three books to copy for now,” he declared. Harry was reminded absurdly of a small child at a library, trying to reason themselves out of taking the entire shelf home with them.

Severus Snape had absolutely been one such child.

“We will continue our lesson as planned, and then next time, you will bring your homework down here so you have something productive to do while I investigate these books. Provided, of course,” he added, glancing back at the portrait warily, “that I am permitted entrance in future.”

“It will be nice to have another actual adult to talk to,” came Salazar’s reply. Harry made a faint noise of indignation.

“Rude. Before I turned up you had no one but your snake,” he muttered pointedly.

“One day you will look back on your childhood and you will understand exactly what I’m talking about,” Salazar hissed, amused. Snape was eyeing Harry curiously, and Harry just snorted.

“Bold of you to assume I will ever grow out of this,” he replied, unsure exactly what part of his general existence Salazar was complaining about now. He could make a few guesses, if he had to.

Instead, he leaned against the back of the sofa, folding his arms and waiting for Snape to choose his three books.

He got the feeling the next visit was going to be a very, very long one.

.-.-.-

The Gryffindor versus Hufflepuff quidditch match was a surprisingly difficult match for the Gryffindor team, but thanks to Vicky Frobisher's keen defence of the goal, and Harry's speedy capture of the snitch, they managed to pull out another victory. The day ended in another celebration in Gryffindor Tower, and Harry went to sleep with a smile on his face.

The next morning started out great, too. But it didn't stay that way for long.

He was in good spirits at breakfast, until the post owls came in and a veritable storm of feathers swooped in Harry's direction. Some just dropped their letters on his head — or in his eggs — and went about their morning, but others landed on the table, hooting demandingly at him until he relieved them of their burden.

"What's this all about?" Ginny asked, bewildered, as a particularly round owl made itself at home on her plate, pecking at her bacon. "Oi, get off!"

"No idea," Harry replied — and then one owl caught his eye. It held a brown paper wrapped package, approximately the size and shape of a magazine.

He looked up at the Ravenclaw table, and Luna smiled serenely back at him. "Never mind. Figured it out." Harry reached for the package, tearing off the brown paper to reveal the front cover of the Quibbler. 'Harry Potter Speaks Out At Last', it declared, right above a picture of his own face.

"It came out yesterday," Luna told him, having made her way over. "I asked Daddy to send you a copy. I'd imagine these are letters from readers."

His excessive postal delivery had gained the attention of half the Gryffindor table, and a few more people besides. "Well, then," he said, rolling up his sleeves. "Everyone grab an owl. Let's see what we're looking at."

It was something of a free-for-all after that, all of Harry's friends reaching out to pluck owls from the chaos, relieving them of their letters and ripping open envelopes. Remembering Hermione's incident with bubotuber pus the year before, Harry watched them all warily.

"This bloke thinks you've cracked," George volunteered, waving the letter in his left hand. "But this one says he believes you," he said of the letter in his right.

"You've got this woman convinced, Harry," Neville added happily, passing Harry the letter he'd grabbed.

"This one, too!"

They quickly began to gather two piles; those who believed Harry, and those who thought he was just an attention-seeking nutter. They were so engrossed in the pile of mail, they didn't notice the approach that had the rest of the hall going ominously silent.

"Hem, hem." Harry's head snapped up, his stomach squirming in a mix of dread and excitement. "What is going on here, Mr Potter?"

"It's the morning post, Professor," he replied, watching her eyes narrow.

"Five points from Gryffindor for cheek. Why, Mr Potter, do you have so many letters?"

There was no point in trying to hide it. "I wrote an article recently, about what happened to me last June," he told her, watching a muscle twitch in her cheek as her jaw clenched tightly. "These are letters from people who read it."

"An article?" Umbridge repeated sharply. "What do you mean?"

Harry picked up his copy of the Quibbler, holding it out. "You're welcome to read it, Professor."

Umbridge took one look at the cover and turned a violent shade of red. "I see," she bit out, stubby fingers clenching around the magazine. "Clearly, Mr Potter, your continued detentions are not enough of a deterrent, for you. No matter how hard I try to teach you not to spread your awful lies, the message simply will not stick." Her eyes darted down to the scar on the back of his hand. "Perhaps something a touch more... restrictive is required."

Harry swallowed, wondering what she could possibly do that would be worse than having him carve his own hand open every night for a week. She, too, seemed to be struggling to think of something — until her eyes landed on the huge points hourglasses at the back of the hall. "You do not care about detentions, do you, Mr Potter? Even before I arrived here, you were no stranger to them. But," she said, a slow, vindictive smile spreading across her lips that made Harry's stomach clench. "You do care about quidditch."

His blood went cold. Her smile widened.

"Yes, that will do quite nicely, I think. Removing you from your house quidditch team might make you finally think about the consequences of your actions."

"I beg your pardon!" That was McGonagall, striding over with a look of absolute fury on her face. "You have no right to do that! Potter is a Gryffindor, it is my responsibility to think of suitable punishments! And there is nothing in the school rules that prevents students from writing articles for publication."

"He may be a Gryffindor, but I am the High Inquisitor," Umbridge returned sweetly. "I think you will find it is entirely within my right to punish students, especially when their heads of houses are not fit for the task." She turned back to Harry, triumph on her toad-like face. "Mr Potter, you are hereby banned from quidditch, for life. You will surrender your broomstick to me by dinner this evening."

“What! You can’t take my broom!” Harry protested. “This isn’t fair — that’s punishing the whole team!”

“You should have thought of that before you decided to spread this filth, Mr Potter.” She looked very pleased with herself, indeed. “You have such little care for yourself, perhaps seeing that others are affected by your bad behaviour will make you change your mind. And I’ll be keeping this,” she added, tucking the Quibbler under her arm. She stalked up to the head table, uncaring of the outrage she left in her wake.

Harry looked at McGonagall, who was white-faced, lips pressed tightly together, utterly outraged.

“Professor, surely she can’t do that!” Angelina said, aghast. McGonagall turned to her, and nodded sharply.

“I’m afraid she can, Miss Johnson,” she admitted reluctantly. “Mr Potter, I would like to remind you of the discussion we had at the beginning of the year.”

“We’ll be ruined,” Angelina murmured, collapsing on the bench, Fred’s hand on her shoulder. “No seeker, against Ravenclaw! With the points so tight!”

Harry tore his guilty gaze away from her, and met his housemistress’ eyes. “I’m sorry it came to this, Professor.” He wouldn’t apologise for writing the article. From the look on her face, she didn’t want him to.

She knew that some things mattered more than quidditch. As much as this would be a blow to the team.

Harry turned back to Angelina, grimacing. “I’m sorry,” he said. “If I’d known, I—“ He trailed off. It wouldn’t have stopped him, but he might not have been quite so smug about it.

Angelina bit her lip, taking a deep breath. “You can make it up to me by helping me find a new seeker in time for the match against Ravenclaw. We could do try-outs, of course, but it would take time, and who’s going to want to play for just one match?”

“She said I’m banned for life,” Harry pointed out, absently wondering if that would cause any issues with his future professional career. Surely she couldn’t ban him from the league?

“You’re banned as long as she’s here,” Angelina dismissed instantly. “Fuck, I knew we should’ve trained a reserve team this year.”

It was a testament to how much the Transfiguration professor cared about quidditch that she didn’t reprimand Angelina’s language.

Harry looked down the table, at the piles of letters all addressed to him, the people gathered to help go through them. His eyes landed on a head of long, fiery hair.

“How about Ginny?” he suggested, making the girl startle and look up at him.

“Me?”

"Yeah. I've seen you fly at the Burrow when you think everyone else is in bed. You're really good." Harry's insomnia in the summers often had him sat at the window in Ron's room, watching the youngest Weasley sneak her brothers' brooms from the shed.

Ginny blushed, but Angelina was on her like a shot. "Would you? Can you come try out after dinner tonight? We already know you fit with the rest of the team — usually the problem we have is people not being able to handle your brothers." The Weasley twins looked mildly offended, and Ginny laughed.

"I— I don't have a broom." She deflated, and so did Angelina. School brooms were okay, but Ravenclaw's chasers had the latest model Cleansweep.

"You can borrow mine." The slightly stilted call came from further up the table, and more than one person turned to gape incredulously at Ron Weasley. The boy flushed, ears going pink. "I've not really been using it and all. It's only for the rest of the year." Then, his face hardened. "Gryffindor shouldn't have to lose just because he keeps pissing off Umbridge."

He didn't look Harry in the eye, but the message went unspoken; he might hate Harry right now, but even he couldn't argue that Voldemort was back, and Harry had done the right thing in sharing that.

"Really?" Ginny looked hopeful, and when Ron nodded again, she dashed down the table to give him a tight hug. "Thank you. I'm sorry I called you a prick."

Ron blinked. "Wait, when did you call me a prick?"

Ginny grimaced briefly. "Don't worry about it." She quickly turned back to Angelina. "Tonight, then? Let's say six thirty?"

Angelina nodded, and Harry's shoulders slumped in relief. That was one crisis averted, at least.

. . .

By the end of first period, there were huge signs all over the school declaring that by order of the High Inquisitor, the Quibbler was banned from Hogwarts.

Naturally, that meant that everyone had read it by dinnertime. Harry couldn't help but grin to himself as he listened to people quote the article all through the hall, and watched Umbridge's eyes get so bugged with fury he thought they might pop right out of her skull.

A couple of chairs down, Dumbledore was watching the whole scene, and Harry noticed the man's twinkling eyes were conspicuously dimmed. The headmaster didn't seem to know whether to be pleased that the Ministry had been thwarted, or pissed at Harry for making such a bold move, revealing exactly what happened in the graveyard so Dumbledore couldn't warp or sanitise the story for his own gains.

He wondered sometimes if he was perhaps baiting the headmaster a little too much, but then he decided he didn't really care — all the better, even, if the slow build of annoyance resulted in Dumbledore flipping his lid, preferably somewhere public. It would help enormously once Harry started trying to tear the man's reputation to shreds.

.-

For the rest of the week, Harry watched as Umbridge tried to ferret out the copies of the Quibbler interview that were clearly circulating the school, the woman growing increasingly flustered and frustrated as her efforts fail. The Hogwarts students were truly ingenious, disguising the pages as homework, or cuttings from Witch Weekly, or letters from home. Even the teachers were in on it, though due to the Educational Decrees they couldn't discuss any of it with their students. McGonagall's ire at Harry didn't last long — especially once Angelina confirmed that Ginny Weasley would make a suitable temporary replacement seeker — and he started earning house points in half of his classes for the most mundane things. Everyone in the school was talking about the article, and Luna told him delightedly that their sales were even better than the issue he'd contributed to the year before. Every day, more letters came in; plenty were still from people accusing him of trying to slander the Minister, but more and more people told Harry they believed him, that they were preparing for the Dark to rise again.

Judging by the low-level fury burning in the corner Harry's mind, right around his scar, there was someone else who wasn't particularly happy about it, either. Voldemort even got so irate one night that he forgot to block Harry, giving him insight into a meeting with a Death Eater named Rookwood, where Harry learned that Bode had been Imperiused into removing something, which was how he ended up in St Mungo's to begin with.

So that was what happened to someone who touched a prophecy that didn't belong to them.

It was awful information, but it wasn't anything useful, so Harry pushed it from his mind, happy to focus on Umbridge's utter outrage at the Quibbler. She had given him a few more nights detention — obviously mad that banning him from the quidditch team had not devastated him in the way she hoped — but even that couldn't dampen his spirits, and the first night he was free he happily went down to duel in the Chamber with Snape.

Ever since Harry had introduced him to Salazar, Snape had started pushing him even harder in their lessons. Harry wasn't sure if it was the man's way of thanking him, or just ensuring Harry had all the skills to stay alive longer so Snape would continue to have access to the portrait, but either way as the looming exams began to weigh heavy on his shoulders, Harry was more than glad to let off some steam.

"You're improving well," Snape complimented, once they finished their sixth duel of the night. Harry was sweaty and aching, but his magic was singing. "If only we had access to more people, so you could try your hand at duelling multiple opponents at once."

"I've done a bit of that with the HA," Harry told him, gratefully accepting the conjured goblet of water Snape handed over. "Obviously not with the kind of spells you use, but, y'know. Having a bunch of people come at me at once." From the amount of times he'd been outnumbered in a fight, he'd thought it helpful to teach his friends how to handle themselves in such a situation, and get some practice in on his own.

"Indeed?" Snape cocked a curious eyebrow. Harry grinned at him.

"It worked out pretty well. I learned that Justin Finch-Fletchley takes muggle boxing classes during the summers," he revealed. "And isn't afraid to fight dirty." A lot of them had surprised him, honestly, when he'd told them to give it their best shot. They had been lucky not to end up needing the Hospital Wing.

Snape's thin lips twitched in a brief smirk. "I'm glad to hear you're putting your little club to good use."

"You wait until exams come around," Harry said proudly. "Then you'll really see what these students are capable of."

"I'm sure." Snape straightened his robe, then vanished the empty goblets. "I believe that's enough for tonight. I have books to translate."

Harry, desperately in need of a shower and some Bruise Balm, wasn't going to argue. "How's that going?" he asked curiously, wondering what Snape might have uncovered in Salazar's old books. Surely potions had only advanced since then?

"They are fascinating," Snape admitted. "Many of the texts contain references to ingredients that have fallen almost entirely out of use in this age. Of course, many are now extinct, but those that aren't... I will have much to work on over the summer."

"Until Ceri drags you out of the lab and reminds you to eat," Harry joked; a common occurrence at Seren Du. Snape huffed.

"Damned meddling elf," he muttered, though there was no heat to it.

Sealing the passageway, Harry gathered his school bag and went on his way, heading quickly up to Gryffindor Tower. It was technically past curfew, but it was easy for Harry to avoid any patrolling prefects about. Except for one particular gorgeous blond Slytherin prefect, who he couldn't help but pull into an alcove and snog for five minutes before heading on his merry way.

His good mood deflated when he reached the common room, and saw Parvati and Lavender crying over by the fire. "What happened?" he asked, hurrying over to them. Parvati looked at him with puffy red eyes.

"Professor Trelawney's been sacked!" she wailed, crying even harder. Harry gaped at her.

"What?"

Through sniffles and hiccups, the two girls told him what had happened; the way Umbridge had tried to remove Trelawney from the castle as well as her teaching post, but Dumbledore had stepped in. The most surprising part was when they revealed Dumbledore had already hired a new teacher, and he was a centaur.

"Umbridge looked furious," Lavender said gleefully, wiping her eyes.

"What did you say the centaur bloke's name was, again?" Harry asked. Her brow furrowed.

“Firenze, I think Dumbledore said.”

“He’s gorgeous,” Parvati piped up with a wet giggle, her sadness temporarily forgotten.

Harry remembered Firenze. The centaur had saved his life, back in his first year. The rest of his herd had not appreciated him doing so.

Did they appreciate him doing this? Agreeing to work for humans?

“Well, then. S’pose we’ll have to see how long before Umbridge finds a reason to kick him out, too,” he said, shrugging. “At least it sounds like Trelawney isn’t going anywhere, so you can still talk to her.” Though now she didn’t have to stay sober enough to teach, Harry wasn’t sure the Seer would be the best conversation partner. Still, it seemed to cheer up the girls.

Harry went up to the dorm to shower, unease brewing within him. Trelawney’s sacking wasn’t unexpected, but with her gone, that meant only one thing.

Hagrid would be next.

Chapter 66

Every week, without fail, no matter what chaos was taking place in Harry's schedule, he set aside some time to teach Draco everything he'd taught to the HA. Sometimes that time ended up being midnight, but it was worth it. Whatever Harry could teach Draco, Draco would then teach Pansy and Millicent and Cassius and now Theo — the Slytherins who couldn't risk coming to the sessions themselves, but similarly couldn't risk going to Blaise and Daphne's little Slytherin House study group to do the same.

They were the Slytherins who couldn't risk being seen defecting, even by other defectors.

Luckily, sessions didn't last nearly as long as they would with the HA — Draco was just one person, not the fifty-odd Harry was now teaching, and he was an intelligent person at that. He picked things up quickly, making Harry's job a whole lot easier.

And leaving plenty of time for them to make out before they went to bed, depending on the night. Since they'd started moving their little rendezvous down to the Chamber, it was a little easier to get carried away.

Right now, they were working on the first spell to really trip Draco up, to cause him to need more than one session on the subject; the Patronus charm.

"I can't believe you're actually teaching everyone this," the blond muttered, glaring in frustration at the formless blob of silver magic lingering in front of them. "It's seriously advanced magic."

"It's seriously useful magic," Harry retorted. "And it's not impossible, it just takes some trying. This is only your second session. You remember how long it took me back in third year."

"Yeah, because you were thirteen," Draco said waspishly. He huffed. "Let me try again." A look of determination crossed his face. "Expecto Patronum!"

The silver magic was close, now; Harry definitely saw something with four legs and a long tail. A thought hit him, and he grinned. "That's brilliant, love."

Draco's eyebrow rose suspiciously. "Why do you look so fucking smug?"

Harry leaned in, kissing him quickly. "If I'm not mistaken, your Patronus is a fox," he informed the Slytherin boy delightedly. Draco's eyes widened.

"Oh." A smile tugged at his lips. "That makes sense, I suppose."

"I love you," Harry declared, heart full with the knowledge that Draco saw him as his greatest protector. Draco rolled his eyes.

"I love you, too, but if you tell me Longbottom gets his Patronus before I do, I'm leaving you," he deadpanned. Harry just laughed.

"To be honest, I kind of assumed you would teach yourself the spell when you knew I was learning it, back in third year. You always were a competitive little shit," he added fondly. Once again, Draco huffed in frustration.

"I did. I couldn't get it, so I gave up."

Harry moved closer, wrapping his arms around Draco from behind, propping his chin on his boyfriend's shoulder. "Well, now you've got happier memories," he pointed out, kissing the shell of his ear. "Come on. You're almost there."

He felt the shiver that prickled down Draco's body. "Not helping," the blond muttered, though he made no move to dislodge his barnacle boyfriend. He raised his wand, took a deep breath, and tried again.

. . .

"Part of me just wants this year to be over," Draco admitted, when they had finished the Patronus work and cuddled up together on the sofa Harry had conjured in the corner — conjuring a bed had seemed a bit too forward, even for him. "But then I remember what I have to go home to, and I never want it to end."

Harry ran a hand through the blond's hair. They were well into March, now; only a couple of months away from the dreaded OWL exams, and then summer.

A couple of months away from the time that Harry's school year usually went to hell in a handbasket.

"We'll figure it out," he promised, holding Draco a little bit closer. "How are the Slytherins doing?" Harry felt like he hardly saw anyone in silver and green outside of classes and meals, these days. The entire house had gone to ground, even those who supported Voldemort — they could tell something was brewing, and with all that self-preservation instinct, most of them were waiting to see how things would fall.

"Your little article put quite the bee in everyone's bonnets," Draco informed him. "Half the house has had a letter from their parents warning them one way or another. Either they know what's coming and they aren't sure they can stand against Him, or they know what's coming and they don't want their kids to get too cocky until the Ministry has been taken."

It made Harry's blood run cold, to hear how inevitable the fall of the Ministry seemed to be in everyone's minds. Not that it surprised him in the slightest.

"Any whispers about what he's up to?" Harry asked hopefully, but Draco shook his head.

"Anyone who knows isn't going to put it in writing, not with Umbridge around. She might be an awful pureblood supremacist hag, but she's not a Death Eater."

Harry scowled; sometimes, he felt like she may as well be.

"Well we're on track for having sanctuary by summer," he confirmed, brightening up a little. "I heard back from Farlig; Potter Manor is still under an Unplottable charm, but otherwise there's nothing physically stopping me from going there and taking the wards even without the deed. And they're definitely blood wards." With blood wards, even if Dumbledore tried to claim he was Harry's legal guardian, he wouldn't be able to get in without Harry's consent. He didn't have a single drop of Potter blood.

"But it's Unplottable," Draco pointed out, frowning. "You've never been there."

"I haven't, but Sirius and Remus have," Harry said. "I've asked Sirius, and he remembers it. He'll take me once exams are over and I can take the wards, then it'll be ready as soon as people leave the train." He wasn't sure how many people would need it that desperately, but at the very least Theo needed a place to go. Harry would be ready.

He could feel the stress ease from Draco's narrow shoulders at the assurance, and he tucked the blond into his side, kissing his head. "I'll take care of it," he promised. "I'll keep as many of them as I can safe."

"I just hope they'll be able to get there in time," Draco replied quietly. "My last letter from Father... he's far too pleased with himself these days."

Harry gritted his teeth. What he wouldn't give to knock Lucius Malfoy off his high horse.

.-. .

Their little heirs' study groups were getting fewer and further between, and entirely devoted to actual studying as exams grew closer. No one seemed to mind; not even Susan, who admitted there was little she could do in the way of revolution until after she had passed her OWLs.

Still, they gathered when they could; Harry liked it that little bit more, now that everyone in the room knew about his relationship with Draco. He hadn't realised how much he had been yearning to do such simple things like hold his hand or kiss his cheek, or even just watch him while he studied. Little things the rest of Hogwarts wouldn't even have to think about before doing in front of others. If it made his friends complain about how nauseating they were, that only made it better, as far as he was concerned.

Besides; Susan and Theo were worse, in his opinion.

As he unrolled his half-written Potions essay, turning hopeful green eyes on his boyfriend, the classroom door suddenly opened and every single one of them froze in horror.

Then, Luna drifted in, smiling like she had barely even noticed they were there, and sat down in a chair next to Daphne. "Hello," she greeted. Daphne stared.

"Uh... hi, Lu," she responded hesitantly. None of them moved. "What... what are you doing here?" The unspoken how did you find us ringing in the air. Luna just smiled brighter.

"This is where all the Wizengamot heirs meet up, isn't it? That's why you're all here?" Her wide blue eyes surveyed the group in interest. She didn't seem surprised or alarmed at the presence of all the Slytherins.

"...Yes," Daphne admitted. She reached over, smoothing down some of Luna's haphazard waves of hair. "Honey, this is supposed to be a secret meeting." She merely sounded exasperated, like Luna knowing such information was expected — then again, with her suspected Seer abilities, perhaps it was.

"I won't tell anyone," Luna promised. "But I thought it's about time I joined you all."

"Hang on — Lovegood, are you saying you're an heir?" Cassius asked sharply, causing a quiet intake of breath around the room. Luna, entirely unperturbed, nodded and began to braid a silver ribbon into Daphne's hair.

"My mother was of the Ollivander line," she declared absently. "The eldest daughter of the eldest daughter."

Harry sat up straighter. "That explains so much," he murmured, and Draco nodded beside him.

The Ollivander line was one that had gotten muddled over recent history, until no one knew who Garrick Ollivander's heir actually was, which caused increasingly higher alarm amongst the Wizengamot as the wandmaker grew more ancient.

The Ollivander line was also known to produce... oddities. The current family head being a prime example, his preternatural insight into magic and wandlore making him excellent at his job but also seem a bit crazy. There were Seers in the line, too, if Harry remembered his research correctly.

A slow smile spread across Daphne's face, and she kissed Luna chastely. "You are full of surprises, aren't you?" she remarked amused. Luna paused in her braiding to stroke Daphne's cheek. "Do you know why it's time for you to let us know that?"

Luna hummed thoughtfully, tying off the end of the braid. "Not exactly," she said. "But I know that I can trust everyone here. Great-granddad gave me permission to tell you."

More than a few uneasy looks passed between them all — what could be coming, for Luna to suddenly know that they needed to be aware of her heritage?

Eventually, Sullivan grinned. "Well, I'm glad you're here," he declared, picking up his books and moving over, forcing Ernie out of his seat. "Have you done the Arithmancy homework yet? My numbers won't add up right and I can't figure out why."

That seemed to break the spell that had fallen over them with Luna's interruption, and slowly they all started to get back to work. But it didn't stop Harry wondering, occasionally looking up to glance at the blonde-haired Ravenclaw.

Eventually, he shook his head, deciding to let the matter slide. If it was something important, Luna would tell them when they needed to know. She usually did.

.-.-.

Snape was distracted.

Harry didn't know why, but whatever the cause, the man was seriously off his game. Harry was practicing his Legilimency, and he kept finding his way into memories he knew Snape couldn't possibly want him to see. An incident with his father; his first kiss with Remus... Harry tried not to snoop, but considering Snape had instructed him to look for the things he was trying to hide, he couldn't help himself.

"Are you alright, sir?" he asked tentatively, once he was pushed out of a memory involving fish and chips on some run-down pier and a nineteen year-old Remus Lupin wearing leather trousers, Snape's whole heart filled with love for the man. It warmed Harry's own heart, to feel the way this man felt about a person Harry cared so much about, but... it wasn't like him.

"I am fine," Snape bit out, clearly lying. His dark eyes met Harry's. "Again."

Harry did as instructed, murmuring the spell to enter Snape's mind, trying to split his own focus. He was supposed to be writing about antidotes while he searched the man's mindscape, to practice managing Legilimency undetected. Eye contact was only needed for the initial spell, after all.

He appeared in the now-familiar haze of Snape's mental defences — currently at a fairly low level, while Harry was still learning — and narrowed his focus for something that would surely get Snape back to his usual self.

Show me why you hate my father.

Immediately there was a swarm of memories, but one shone brighter than any other, and Harry dove into it.

Four boys, confronting a skinnier boy after an exam. A girl, redhead and blazing with anger, coming in to defend the skinny boy. A fight, and the skinny boy was hanging in the air all of a sudden, his robes over his head showing he was full Wizarding Traditional beneath them. Jeering laughter, the redhead offering to help, that word, that awful word, the word that ruined it all. The four boys, faces turning cruel, led by the one with dark hair and bronze skin and vindictive brown eyes. "Who wants to see me take off Snivelly's pants?"

At last, Harry was forced away, returning to his own mind with a gasp. At first he wasn't sure if the ejection had come from Snape or from his own disgust at the sight — then he looked up, and saw the utter fury in the Slytherin's eyes.

"I suppose you found them funny, did you?" he drawled icily. Harry gaped at him.

“What? God, no!” That seemed to startle Snape. “That was what they were like? That was—that’s what he was like?” In none of the stories Sirius and Remus had ever told, did they mention that. “That… that wasn’t a prank. That was assault.” He hadn’t seen if they had in fact removed Snape’s underwear, but even without them going that far it was still sexual assault. “Why didn’t Remus do anything?”

“He stopped them, the second Potter even hinted at… well, you saw,” Snape said stiffly. “He was always… reluctant to interfere, when they got going. He worried that if they knew about us, they would abandon him, or worse. They were his pack. He couldn’t face that.”

“You don’t let that happen to someone you love,” Harry argued firmly. “How can you forgive him for that? And Sirius! Sirius was—“ Harry didn’t even have words for the way he felt, watching his godfather do something so cruel. “They reminded me of my cousin, and his friends.”

Snape’s lips became a thin line. “Sometimes, I forget that your childhood was more similar to mine than James Potter’s.”

Harry winced. “Sometimes I like to forget my childhood existed at all,” he retorted bluntly. He ran a hand through his hair. “God, no wonder you hated me at first. How the hell have you and Sirius managed to even be civil, let alone sort-of friends?”

“Amends were made, for various incidents,” Snape said. “Our school years were… complicated, to say the least. Sometimes in life you have to decide to move past things that hurt, because continuing to hold anger over them can make things worse. Needless to say, Black and I will never be bosom buddies, but for the cause of a greater good we can be companionable. As for Remus… that history is even more complicated, and suffice to say I do not owe you an explanation.”

Harry went wide-eyed, nodding. “Yes, sir.” But he still couldn’t fathom it, forgiving people who treated you like that. Forgiving people who stood by and let it happen. “Is… is that when you and my mum stopped being friends, sir?”

Slowly, Snape gave a jerky nod. “She forgave me, eventually,” he said. “But by that time, the damage had been done.” He rubbed unconsciously at his left forearm, where the Dark Mark lurked beneath his sleeve.

An awkward silence spread between them. Then, Harry steeled himself. “Excuse my bluntness, sir, but we both know I’m not that good a Legilimens,” he said frankly. “I should never have seen that. Any other day, you’d never let me get that far. What the hell is wrong with you today? Sir,” he added belatedly, not wanting to push his luck. Snape scowled, tucking some of his hair behind his ear.

“You’re more skilled at it than you think,” he admitted offhandedly. “But you’re right, you never should have seen that. Albus called me into his office this morning, to give a report on your Occlumency progress.”

Harry’s shoulders tensed, but he still didn’t understand how that could have Snape so thrown. “He’s done that before, right? What was different this time?”

“He seems... displeased with what I have told him I found in your mind,” Snape said, pursing his lips. “The headmaster seems to believe even more strongly than before that the horcrux within you is... controlling you.”

A startled laugh burst from Harry’s lips. “He what?” That was the most ridiculous thing he’d ever heard! “I thought he agreed that I wasn’t possessed?”

“Not possession,” Snape corrected. “Albus believes that as his compulsions on you have eroded — not that he explicitly admitted to ever doing such things, merely referencing how you were growing older — it has allowed the horcrux to start to influence your own soul, turning it dark. Making you more like the young Tom Riddle he remembers.”

“The only thing I have in common with young Tom Riddle is that we both saw through Dumbledore’s bullshit,” Harry muttered. “Why is this a problem?” He didn’t understand why it had Snape so bothered.

“Because, you Gryffindor fool — if Albus can convince himself of this, then he can convince others. He doesn’t need to tell them of the compulsions, or the horcrux; he certainly hasn’t mentioned either of them to me. He merely needs to play on your connection to the Dark Lord, the one half the school knows you have thanks to your dorm-mates blabbing about your vision before Christmas. He will mention how since the Dark Lord returned you have become colder, more withdrawn, more intelligent. You have made new friends — powerful friends — and you have pulled away from his own guiding hand. Exactly as another young boy once did in these halls.”

With dawning horror, Harry began to see the problem.

“He’ll have the whole of wizarding Britain against you before you can even graduate,” Snape finished grimly.

“But... surely no one will believe him?” Harry said weakly, already knowing the answer.

“He’s Albus Dumbledore,” Snape pointed out, “many people would believe the sky to be green if he told them. And as far as the general public is concerned, he knows you better than most. If he tells them your behaviour has changed, who are they to argue otherwise. Especially when he is not wrong.”

Snape had a good point. All those things, everything Dumbledore was using as a sign of Harry’s turn to the Dark — they were all technically true. He was applying himself better in lessons, he was not putting up with the gawping of the general public as much. He had split quite explosively with Ron and Hermione, and had a powerful and influential new circle of friends. Just as Voldemort once had, his original followers.

And he was definitely turning away from Dumbledore’s guidance, which to many in this country was a sure sign of darkness.

“What do I do?” he asked. Snape leaned back in his chair, thoughtful.

"I am assuring Albus that I saw no signs of outside influence in your mind, other than the obvious. No memories of secretly practicing Dark Arts, or torturing animals," his lips quirked briefly, "but as he believes me unaware of the horcrux within you, I suspect he just assumes I do not know what to look for." His frown returned. "You must not let this derail your plans. Your public divide from the headmaster is inevitable; we can only hope that it comes at a time when public opinion is in your favour. Leave manipulating Albus to me."

"If you're sure." Harry didn't like the idea of just leaving that whole thing alone, but there was little else he could do. He would lose so much ground if he pretended to turn back into the headmaster's docile little puppet. And his sanity, as well, before long.

"I think we are finished for the night, Potter," Snape declared, and now Harry looked closer he could see the stress in the furrow of his brow, the tension in his shoulders.

"Yeah. Yeah, of course." He scrambled to grab his bag. "I... I'm sorry I saw those memories, sir. I'm sorry for what my father did to you."

Snape's return smile was a twisted, bitter thing. "Those are not your sins to apologise for, Harry," he replied evenly.

"I'm sorry all the same." Then Harry left, his heart heavy, wondering why no one had ever told him his father was such a shithead.

..

The first thing he did upon reaching the dormitory was ward himself in his bed curtains, and pull out his mirror. "Sirius Black."

Sirius responded in moments, and the bright grin he greeted Harry with dropped as soon as he saw the look on his godson's face. "What's wrong, pup?"

"Is Remus there?" Harry asked, and Sirius frowned.

"Yes... Did you need to talk to him?" Harry could see the background shift as Sirius got up, no doubt to go find his friend.

"Both of you, if you're not busy."

Soon Harry could see both men in the surface of the mirror, staring worriedly at him. "Is everything alright, cub?"

Harry told them; about his Legilimency lesson, and the scene he'd watched in Snape's memories. As he spoke, he watched both of them grow paler.

"Harry..." Sirius began, and Harry glared at him.

"Don't patronise me," he warned. "How could— he wasn't even doing anything. He was just there."

"Things between Severus and James were complicated, Harry. And Severus will be the first to admit he wasn't exactly innocent in the matter," Remus said.

"I bet Snape didn't strip any of you half-naked in the middle of the school grounds," Harry spat viciously, glad when they both flinched.

"No, he didn't," Remus admitted. "That was too far, and even James agreed that, once he calmed down. He sort-of saw red after Severus called Lily the M word."

"But the fact that you had him like that at all!" Harry wasn't letting them talk him out of his anger. "You treated Snape the way my cousin Dudley treated me. I was just lucky he didn't have magic to help along the way." Dudley with magic... now there was the stuff of nightmares.

His accusation made Sirius wince. "We were fifth years."

"I'm a fifth year," Harry shot back immediately. "That's no excuse."

"No, it's not," Remus agreed sadly. "Harry, I'm sorry that we tried to shield you from the more... vindictive parts of James' school years. We didn't want you to think ill of your father — he was far more than the boy you saw in those memories."

"You didn't want me to think ill of him, or of you?" asked Harry knowingly. Both men were silent. "I thought so. Look, I love you both. I always will. But... I don't know if I can look at you the same, having seen that."

Sirius looked crushed in a way that had Harry's heart clenching.

"We understand," Remus assured. "But please understand that was just one moment. One incident; none of us at our best. When we get the chance to get the Potter pensieve out of the vault, we'll show you more. The good, and the bad," he promised. "But despite some rough moments, James Potter was a good man. As is Sirius. And I... I try my best to be worth the forgiveness Severus has offered me." Now he looked pained, too, and Harry started to feel a little guilty. He didn't want to dredge up old wounds. He just wanted to understand.

"You're a good man too, Moony," Sirius insisted roughly. "The best of us." A smile flickered across Remus' face, but he said nothing.

"I think that would be good," Harry said slowly. "To see more memories. If you're willing." Anything to banish the awful sight of his father's cruel, laughing face from his mind.

"We'll sort something out this summer," Remus promised. "But please, Harry — don't hold our stupid teenage decisions against us as adults. We know we were wrong, back then. We grew up. We apologised. It— it wasn't easy, at times. But we moved on."

"Snape said the same thing, sort-of," Harry admitted, and Remus' smile finally looked genuine.

"We worked through a lot of old grievances to get where we are today," he said. "I wish that hadn't been your first real sight of your father, Harry. But what's done is done. You of all people know that such things are rarely simple.”

Harry knew he was talking about Draco, and part of him wanted to argue that Draco had been twelve and had never done anything as bad as that and he knew better now. But he was tired, and his heart ached, and he was worried that if he kept talking it over he would convince himself to hate his own family. He didn’t want that.

“I think I’m going to get some sleep,” he said eventually. Sirius still looked like someone had kicked his puppy.

“We love you, Harry,” he said earnestly, and Harry managed a small, but genuine smile.

“I love you both, too.” Even that awful memory couldn’t change that.

“Did Severus seem busy, when you left?” Remus asked, frowning.

“No, I don’t think so.” The way he looked, Harry doubted he could have concentrated on work. Remus nodded, looking relieved, and Harry knew there would be a visitor in the Potions Master’s quarters soon. Good — regardless of how he felt about the whole situation right now, Remus and Snape loved each other, and they could both do with company after Harry had dredged up such difficult history. Not to mention Snape’s other worries.

Harry bid them both goodnight, and lay there for a while in the silence, still in his school robes.

He would talk to Draco about it when he could, he decided. Maybe he would have some insight to soothe Harry’s soul.

For now, he really did need to sleep.

Chapter 67

Harry looked around the Room of Requirement, watching all the wisps of glittering silver throughout the room. Some had shapes, some did not, but almost every wand in the room was producing something. “This is brilliant,” he declared proudly, amazed at how many of his classmates had a solid, corporeal Patronus. “Once you’ve found your form once, it gets easier, I promise,” he added to those who were still struggling.

A few feet away, Michael Corner almost threw his wand across the room in frustration. “It’s just not happening,” he grumbled, and before Harry could go over to assist Anthony was already on it, carefully talking his friend through the process.

It warmed Harry’s heart to see the co-operation going on in the group, between those who had succeeded in the spell and those who had yet to do so. He might have been the ‘official’ leader of the group, but by this point in the year they were definitely working more as a team than as a class.

He looked up at the clock, surprised to see how much of their usual time had already passed — and then the door opened suddenly. Everyone in the room froze, wands raised at the intruder.

“Draco!” Harry burst out, hurrying towards the blond. Draco’s face was paler than usual, his eyes wide in alarm.

“She knows,” he blurted, sending a shock of fear through Harry. “She knows where you meet, even if she doesn’t know what you’re doing. She’s planning on having a bunch of Slytherin students waiting in the hall outside close to curfew.”

“Fuck,” Harry declared emphatically, his voice ringing through the otherwise silent room. When he turned around, half the room were glaring at Draco suspiciously.

“Why should we trust Malfoy?”

“How did he even know we were in here?”

Calls of alarm and distrust began to start up, and Harry shot off a firework from his wand. “That’s not the problem here,” he snapped. “Draco knows where we are because I trust him, and because I’ve been teaching him in here as well. Not everything outside this room is as it seems.” It was too late to shove that particular cat back in the bag, now. “And I’ll remind you all, you’re still under a secrecy contract for everything that happens in here.” Though clearly, someone had broken that contract. He looked around suspiciously — everyone here still had their memories of the HA, so they had not spilled the beans. So who was missing?

He whirled around to look back at Draco, who had taken a half-step behind Harry, putting the Gryffindor firmly between himself and dozens of raised wands. “You said she’s waiting to ambush us at curfew?” he repeated, and Draco nodded.

"She can't see the door, obviously, but she's been told where it is, and that you're doing something secret behind it. She wants to catch as many of you as she can when you leave." He grimaced. "I can't stay long, I'm supposed to be getting ready to join them."

More murmurs from the crowd, which Harry ignored.

"Why don't we just use the other doors?" Susan suggested, gesturing to the four house doors hiding the secret passageways. "Leave her waiting all night."

It was tempting, but Harry knew that was only going to delay the inevitable. "If she doesn't get anything she'll just keep trying harder," he pointed out. "The rest of you can leave through those doors — be careful at the other ends, just in case she's waiting. Hide yourselves if you can."

"So we're just going to believe Malfoy, then?" Angelina said archly.

"Yes," Harry replied, not rising to the bait. "I told you, I trust him."

"Draco isn't loyal to the Dark Lord," Blaise piped up. "But it's too dangerous for his father to catch wind of that."

A ripple of unease flickered through the group; all of them knew what Lucius Malfoy was like.

Draco's jaw clenched, and he tugged on Harry's sleeve. "I need to go. If she catches me leaving here..." He didn't need to finish that sentence.

"Go with Blaise and Daphne," Harry urged. "All of you, get going, quickly!"

"Don't do anything stupid, Potter," Draco hissed, the look in his eye saying he knew exactly what Harry was thinking and he didn't approve in the slightest. Harry winked at him, wishing he could kiss the blond the same way George had just kissed Blaise, a worried expression on his face. Instead he squeezed Draco's shoulder, and urged him towards the pair of Slytherins.

In a quick and orderly fashion, the group began to disperse through the four doors, and Harry hoped they all had the sense not to just run in terror back to their common rooms. If they went to the library, or pretended to have been enjoying the balmy April evening in one of the courtyards, or literally anything less suspicious than walking back from seemingly nowhere in particular.

The room began to empty, and Harry pushed away the sour anxiety in his stomach, thinking about what he had to do next. He would have to play it very carefully, or he could ruin everything.

At last, there were only two people in the room; himself, and Neville. "Nev, you should go," Harry urged, but the blond shook his head.

"It's gonna look really suspicious if you walk out of here by yourself, mate," he insisted. "Umbridge knows you're up to something, she'd expect you to have at least one accomplice. I'm coming with you."

“Neville—“ Harry broke off when his friend fixed him with a stubborn glare. “Ugh. Fine. But if your Gran murders me for getting you fucking expelled or something, I’m blaming you.”

Neville paled slightly at the possibility, but nodded anyway. Bloody Gryffindors.

Before they left, Harry reached out to the magic of the room, and felt it change — it grew smaller, the four house doors disappeared, and soon they were stood in a cosy room with a pair of sofas and a table in the middle. The mirror wall disappeared entirely, taking their little message board safely with it. “Just in case she comes in to check,” Harry pointed out at Neville’s astonished look.

“I didn’t realise the room worked like that,” Neville murmured. Harry shrugged. It did for him, at any rate.

Heartbeat a hard staccato against his ribcage, Harry headed for the door, wand still in hand. Neville was right behind him. Harry pushed open the door, stepped outside — and immediately ducked a bright red jet of light. “He’s here!” a shout rang through the corridor, and suddenly there were spells firing at him from multiple sources. Harry put up a Shield charm, blocking most of them, but he knew he needed to let himself be overwhelmed — and he didn’t want Umbridge knowing just how capable he was in a fight.

Still, he quite happily disarmed the Slytherin student in front of him. He tried to run, and let himself be hit with a Tripping jinx, skidding across the stone floor. In an instant, there was a knee pressed to his back, and his hands were bound. “I’ve got Potter!” It sounded like Montague, the quidditch captain. Harry craned his neck, trying to see if Neville had managed to escape. Unfortunately, the other Gryffindor was lying Stunned on the floor only a few feet away.

“Well done, Mr Montague! And you, Mr Malfoy. Twenty points each!” Umbridge cooed in delight. Harry tensed when Montague pulled him roughly to his feet, setting him face to face with the pink-clad High Inquisitor. Umbridge looked like she had just been declared Minister for Magic herself.

Behind her, with the faintest trace of apology in his eyes, Draco had hold of a bound Neville.

“You, Mr Potter, are in very deep trouble,” Umbridge declared, sounding very, very happy about that.

.-

For the second time that school year, Harry found himself riding the revolving staircase up to the headmaster’s office. This time was about as cheerful as the last, though the company was different. It was just him and Umbridge, her stubby fingers gripping him tightly by the shoulder — she had let Neville go with a week’s detention, and sent the Slytherins on their way to see if they couldn’t find any more suspicious-looking students. She had checked the inside of the room, but still seemed convinced Harry was hiding something.

When they reached the office, Harry’s heart stuttered — the Minister himself was already there, with a smiling Percy Weasley and a pair of aurors, stood close to Dumbledore with blank expressions. Kingsley was one of them, though he showed no recognition.

“Sit.” Umbridge practically threw him into a chair.

“Well, Dolores? Did you find them?” Fudge was eager-eyed, but Umbridge’s face went stony.

“Only Potter and Longbottom. The room was empty otherwise,” she admitted begrudgingly.

“Well, then, that seems to be that,” Dumbledore declared cheerfully. “There is no Educational Decree preventing two boys from being in a room together.”

Harry hated the drawl of insinuation in his tone. Fudge puffed up angrily.

“We both know what they were really up to, Dumbledore!” He turned to Harry, sneering at him. “I expect you know why you are here, Potter.”

“No, sir,” Harry replied blankly. Fudge’s face turned purple.

“I beg your pardon?”

“I don’t know why, sir. Neville and I were just doing homework.”

“A likely story,” Fudge scowled. “You truly claim to have no idea why Professor Umbridge has brought you here? No recollection of breaking any school rules? Or Ministry Decrees? ”

Harry maintained his polite expression. “No, sir.”

Fudge looked like he was about to have a stroke, his anger rising.

“I think, Minister, it is time I fetch my informant,” Umbridge piped up, shooting Harry a gloating smirk. Harry didn’t let himself react; not even when Umbridge disappeared through a side door, and returned with none other than Marietta Edgecombe.

So that was their leak.

The curly-haired Ravenclaw girl looked utterly terrified and bewildered, looking from Fudge to the aurors and back again. There was a blankness to her gaze that had a flare of triumph shooting through Harry’s stomach.

“Don’t be scared, dear,” Umbridge encouraged gently. “The Minister is very pleased with you. Tell him what you told me.”

Marietta’s wide eyes flicked to Umbridge, and a quiet whimper escaped her lips.

Umbridge pressed further, but Marietta remained silent. She looked to Harry, horror in her gaze, and he stared back impassively.

She would have no memory of the HA, but she would know what she had done.

“Very well, I’ll tell him,” Umbridge snapped eventually, turning to Fudge. “Earlier this evening, Miss Edgecombe came to my office and told me that should I proceed to a particular spot of the seventh floor and wait until curfew, I would find something that I had been looking for for a very long time. I questioned her further, but all she would tell me was that there was some sort of illegal meeting going on, of which Potter was the leader. At that point, she became too scared to say anything further.”

Harry would bet she was scared — having her memory suddenly disappear in the middle of Umbridge’s office, no longer knowing why she was there.

Fudge turned to Marietta with an expression that was probably supposed to be kind, but mostly looked constipated. “You did a very brave thing, going to Professor Umbridge. Can you tell me more about this meeting? Who was there? How many people were involved?”

Marietta shook her head silently, and frustration passed across Fudge’s face.

“You will remember, Minister, that back in October I heard word of Potter’s intention to form a duelling club, to circumvent the Ministry-approved Defence Against the Dark Arts curriculum,” Umbridge volunteered, sending a venomous look to Harry. Harry wondered how that rumour had made it to her ears.

“I was going to, but then you introduced the new Decree, so I didn’t,” he replied blandly. Umbridge’s lips curled in a brief snarl.

“And yet here we are, hearing of such a thing six months later. Six months after the Decree was put in place.”

“And yet, Dolores, we do not have any evidence that any meetings occurred at all,” Dumbledore cut in, offering his ever-present eye twinkle and genial smile. “So I believe you have brought Mr Potter here on false pretences.”

“We have Miss Edgecombe’s word!” Umbridge insisted, gripping Marietta’s shoulder tightly. “Tell him, you silly girl!”

“I don’t know anything,” Marietta blurted, tears welling in her eyes. “I don’t—I don’t remember any meetings.”

“You’re lying!” Umbridge screeched. “You told me yourself!”

“I ask you, Professor Umbridge,” said Dumbledore, voice going stony, “not to yell at my students, if you please. It is clear that Miss Edgecombe has no memory of the illegal duelling club you are referring to. Likely because it does not exist.” He glanced back at Harry. “All you have evidence of is Mr Potter and Mr Longbottom using a hidden room within the castle to quietly complete some homework. Hardly a crime,” he added, chuckling.

Fudge rounded on Umbridge, fury in his gaze. “You told me you had proof, Dolores,” he hissed. Umbridge’s eyes bulged.

“I did! I do!” She floundered for a moment, and Harry sat there, watching her impassively, trying to force down his grin. She had absolutely nothing on him, and they both knew it.

Then Umbridge went completely still, before turning to the headmaster, a cold smile forming. “Miss Edgecombe has no memory of the events, does she?” she echoed his previous words. “Perhaps because she’s been... Obliviated?”

The portraits of previous heads of school, who were all shamelessly listening in, gasped in outrage.

“That is quite the serious accusation, Dolores,” Dumbledore replied evenly.

“I have known for weeks, months even, that something is going on here!” Umbridge continued, a hysterical light in her eyes. “Heard the little brats whispering around the school, thinking they’re so very clever. They have been meeting, Minister, I assure you. And what’s more, do you know what they call themselves?” She smiled a crazed, dangerous smile. “The Hogwarts Army. ”

That wasn’t entirely true, but it was enough to have Fudge sucking in a sharp breath, rounding on Dumbledore with accusation plain on his face. “I knew it! My advisors thought me mad, but I knew it!” he bragged. “I told them you were plotting against me, training the students to fight me! I suppose Potter was your little general, was he? You’ve always had quite the soft spot for him. And now you’ve erased this poor girl’s memory to keep your own secrets!”

For one heart-stopping moment, Harry was sure Dumbledore was going to throw him under the bus. Sure the headmaster would use this as the perfect excuse to punish Harry for his rebellious ways and blame him for everything; Umbridge would likely accept it, even if Fudge didn’t. Her enemy had always been more Harry than Dumbledore anyway.

But Dumbledore merely smiled, and laid his hands on the desk, one still holding his wand. “Well, I suppose the game is up,” he agreed. “Would you like a statement, Cornelius?”

Harry didn’t move as Fudge practically salivated over the information, keenly directing Percy Weasley to write it all down as Dumbledore admitted to plotting to overthrow the Ministry. Umbridge kept shooting Harry little glances, as if expecting him to defend his headmaster — especially when Fudge mentioned arresting the man — but Harry stayed silent. Dumbledore knew what he was doing. He obviously recognised it was best to keep Harry in school, that it would be easier for him to get the bullshit charges dropped than it would be to get Harry un-expelled. And he seemed far too eager to make Fudge squirm.

It all came to a head when Fudge attempted to have the aurors subdue Dumbledore, and suddenly there was a bright flash of light and a loud bang. Harry dropped to the ground instinctively, and when he raised his head the room looked like a bomb had gone off; everyone was unconscious, except for himself and Dumbledore. The headmaster stood behind his desk, and he looked at Harry — though very carefully did not make eye contact. He was still scared of what he might find.

“You must be careful, Harry,” he insisted quickly. “This will not stop Dolores from watching you. I will not be around to help a second time.” He gathered some things from his desk, sweeping them into his robe pocket. “Work hard on your Occlumency, and remember what you are fighting for. What you are truly fighting for. The same cause your parents sacrificed themselves for.”

And with that cryptic statement, he raised an arm, grabbing onto Fawkes’ tail feathers as the phoenix swooped low over him. In a flash of fire, the pair were gone.

The rest of the room awoke, seemingly with no idea they’d been out for any longer than a split second, and Fudge immediately sent the aurors to the stairs. Harry and the bewildered Marietta were almost forgotten about in the chaos — eventually, Umbridge dismissed both of them, though not before giving Harry another week’s detention.

Harry didn’t waste time on his way back to Gryffindor Tower, practically skipping with glee. He wasn’t expelled, and Dumbledore was gone from the school — and clearly under the impression that with enough belief in love and practice in Occlumency, Harry could be redeemed from his supposed Dark leanings.

His day had turned out much better than anticipated, all things considered.

. . .

In the morning, the Prophet ran a full story about how Albus Dumbledore had been training Hogwarts students as his own private militia to one day overthrow Fudge’s power, and there was outrage in the Hogwarts Great Hall.

No one knew the full story, but naturally word had spread that it was Harry Potter’s fault that Dumbledore was gone. Suddenly, his popularity — which had been slowly rising since the Quibbler article — was at an all time low; he was the reason they now had Umbridge as a headmistress.

Harry would forever be amazed at the accuracy and speed of the Hogwarts rumour mill; within hours half the school seemed to have their own version of Dumbledore’s daring escape, and not all of them were entirely off the mark. Perhaps Marietta had said something, but Harry doubted it — when he arrived at breakfast, the curly-haired girl was sat alone at the end of the Ravenclaw table, with her head bowed so low she was practically face-first in her porridge.

“I’m so sorry, Harry,” Cho hissed in the corridor on the way to their respective classes, clearly devastated. “I never thought she’d— her mum works at the Ministry, but I didn’t think “It’s fine, Cho,” Harry insisted. “The contract worked as expected. I can handle the detentions.” He and Neville were alternating days, since Umbridge only seemed to have the one Blood Quill.
—“

“Still, I’m really sorry.” Cho was saved further apologies when they had to part ways. Harry hoped she didn’t feel guilty for too long; it wasn’t her fault her friend was a snitch.

By lunch, things were worse — the Inquisitorial Squad had been born. Harry watched silently as Draco, flanked by Crabbe and Goyle, made a show of taking points from both Ron and Hermione, bragging about his new authority. Around the Gryffindor table, several members of the HA were giving Harry intent looks, as if asking him to explain the Slytherin's supposed loyalty now. Harry just shook his head — surely they understood such things were necessary sometimes?

Harry wasn't surprised by which Slytherins appeared to be in the Inquisitorial Squad — or the handful of Ravenclaws, too — but he was quietly pleased to see how many of them were secretly his own allies.

The Ministry was not as stable or respected as Fudge and Umbridge thought.

He kept his head down for the whole day, glad he didn't have Defence Against the Dark Arts on his schedule yet. Every time he saw Umbridge, she looked like she was trying to set him on fire with her mind.

It was Neville's turn for detention first, so Harry went up to Gryffindor Tower, intent on doing as much homework as he could before his evenings were once again limited. Almost as soon as he sat down, a tall redhead appeared on either side of him.

"Hey, mate, question for you," Fred asked in a low tone. Harry instinctively raised a privacy ward.

"What's up?"

"You know how you've been self-studying for those two OWLs?" George asked, making Harry blink; that was not what he'd anticipated. "Do you know anything about registering for exams at the Ministry?"

Suddenly, things clicked. "You don't think you'll stick around for your NEWTs?" he asked with raised eyebrows. The twins shared a look.

"With Umbridge in charge? Not likely," George remarked. "We're close to getting premises for the shop, too, but that's all hush-hush."

"It will be a help to have qualifications, though," Fred said. "And we've already put all the work into studying for them. Might as well try it."

"There are all sorts of potions ingredients you can only access if you've got a NEWT in the subject," George explained. "We didn't give a shit about OWLs because they don't really mean anything, but NEWTs are important."

Harry knew they'd only passed three OWLs each, but he also knew that half their professors had let them continue their classes even in the subjects they'd failed, knowing it was not through lack of skill. The twins were two of the most talented students in the entire school.

"I don't know anything, but I have ways of getting letters out to Remus. I'll ask him," Harry assured, earning twin grins. "How soon d'you think you'll be off?"

Again, they shared a look over his head. "Depends how the next few weeks go," Fred admitted, frowning. "We'd like to stay til after the match against Ravenclaw. But we also have absolutely no intention of letting Umbridge enjoy her new position,” he added with a devilish smirk.

“And if we leave, at least we know you’re here to look out for Ginny. And Ron, too, I suppose,” George said.

“I’ll do what I can,” Harry promised. “For Blaise, too.” George’s face softened; Harry knew how much the redhead worried about the dangerous line his Slytherin boyfriend was walking.

“He told me about the sanctuary offer,” George revealed. “You bleeding heart, Potter.”

Harry just grinned. “You know me; saving people is what I do,” he joked. “The offer is open to you, too, y’know. If anything happens — with your mum, or Dumbledore, or if Death Eaters come after you. I’ll always have somewhere safe for you to go.”

Each of them laid a hand on one of his shoulders, squeezing gently. “We know, little brother,” Fred assured. “But don’t you worry about us. We’ve got more than just silly little tricks up our sleeves.” He winked, and then they were gone, halfway across the common room before Harry could even blink.

There were only two and a half months left of term. Harry wondered what the twins had planned, that they didn’t think they could last that much longer.

He couldn’t wait to find out.

. . .

Charlie straightened his robe nervously, and Bill slapped his hand away for the dozenth time. “You’re making it worse,” the eldest Weasley boy said, shooting his brother a look. “Calm down. It’ll be fine.”

This was, perhaps, not the best timing to be doing this. Then again, as Bill had pointed out the night before, the timing was only going to get worse. With Dumbledore out of Hogwarts, Fudge would only get more vehement in his desire to stamp out Dumbledore supporters within the Ministry.

But Dumbledore leaving the school had been of benefit to them, as it meant their dad had been able to sit down with the headmaster and discuss the possibility of his two eldest sons taking up their civic responsibilities. Dumbledore, believing Bill and Charlie to be just as dedicated to him as their father was, had given his blessing on the matter.

So now, they were here. Waiting outside the Wizengamot chambers for the door to open, Charlie feeling like he was going to overheat in the stuffy dress robe Bill had forced him into. Merlin, he hated formalwear.

At last, the door clicked ajar, beckoning their entry. Charlie took a deep breath, steadied himself, and fell into stride behind his brother.

The Wizengamot chamber was intimidating to say the least. Even with barely half the seats full thanks to the number of proxies between Lucius Malfoy and Albus Dumbledore, seeing them all dressed in their official garb, staring down at him, made Charlie's neck prickle with sweat.

"With the permission of my father, Lord Prewett, Arthur Weasley; I, William Weasley, have come to claim the Prewett seat of my birthright," Bill declared, his voice strong. Charlie stared hard at a point on the wall ahead of him.

"With the permission of my father, Lord Weasley, Arthur Weasley; I, Charles Weasley, have come to claim the Weasley seat of my birthright," Charlie echoed. A heavy silence filled the room. Then, there were two bright glowing lights up ahead.

The seats had recognised them, and accepted them. Their robes changed, transforming into the same plum robes the rest of the Wizengamot wore.

In the Chief Warlock's seat, Fudge looked apoplectic with rage. Beside him, writing the minutes for the meeting, Percy had dropped his quill in shock. Seeing his younger brother made Charlie's heart clench. He only felt delight at Fudge's anger.

But the magic of the Wizengamot chamber was as old as the Ministry itself, and so complex even the Unspeakables didn't understand it fully. There was no arguing with the magic of birthright.

"Welcome, Lord Prewett, Lord Weasley," Fudge declared reluctantly. "Please, take your seats so we may begin."

Charlie glanced at Bill, who grinned at him, and together they walked up to their glowing chairs, sitting in unison. Instantly, Charlie felt the warm flare of the Weasley magic, accepting him into the family headship. It filled his chest and settled on his shoulders, an awareness, a power like nothing he'd ever felt before. And this was only the Weasley half of the magic.

He went wide-eyed for a moment as he thought about how it might feel for Harry, once he could fully accept lordships over all his family magics.

No wonder Dumbledore was afraid.

But as he looked down at a burst of warmth on his hand, he saw the Weasley lordship ring materialise on his right middle finger. He now technically had more of a say in the family than his father; than anyone but Bill. The Prewett magic was stronger than the Weasley magic, and Bill was the elder, after all.

He settled back, listening to Fudge begin some droning speech, his blood fizzing through his veins. They had done it. Now there was no way Dumbledore or their father could take the power away from them. The headmaster didn't know it yet, but his sphere of power had just grown a little bit smaller.

..

They flooed back to Bill's flat, and as soon as they were home Charlie reached up to loosen the collar of his robe, letting out a whoop of triumph.

“We did it!” Bill exclaimed, grabbing his brother in a rough hug.

The Wizengamot meeting had been long and boring, with very little to actually vote on, but that didn’t matter. They had taken their lordships, and that was the important thing.

Once his robe was open over the plain t-shirt and jeans Charlie wore underneath, he looked back down at his Weasley ring, quietly awed. He’d never really seen it before; Dad didn’t wear it because he thought it was a bit pompous, especially when he had turned his political power over to Dumbledore’s discretion. But it really was beautiful.

Bill was rummaging through his kitchen cabinets for a celebratory drink, and Charlie slumped down on the sofa — only to immediately jump up when someone pounded on the door.

“What the hell?” Bill murmured, eyeing his own front door warily. Charlie approached, wand in hand, and opened it. He did not expect the person he found.

“What do you two think you’re playing at!?” Percy thundered, bursting into the flat without waiting for an invitation. His face was pink, his blue eyes narrowed behind his glasses.

“Taking up your lordships like that! Dumbledore put you up to this, didn’t he?”

“How do you even know where I live?” Bill questioned incredulously, bottle of firewhiskey in hand. Percy waved him off.

“Doesn’t matter. I can’t believe this; I never expected our father would ever turn his seats over while Dumbledore was still alive! Do you have any idea how that made me look in front of Minister Fudge, to not give him warning about something my own brothers were planning? He looked like a fool!”

“That’s not hard,” Charlie muttered with a snort. “We don’t really care that we made you look bad in front of your boss, quite frankly — not after everything you’ve put Mum and Dad through lately. The seats are our birthright, it’s none of your business when and how we choose to claim them.” His eyes were hard, though it made his stomach squirm to look at Percy in such a way. He might be a prick, but Charlie could still remember the little boy peppering him with endless questions the Christmas of Charlie’s first year, begging him to tell him all about the school and his classes and his friends, pleading to spend the night in Charlie’s room because he’d missed him so much. Percy was his responsibility, like he had been Bill’s, and the rift in the family hurt.

Percy’s face reddened further as he sucked in a breath, at a total loss for words, puffing up like a balloon — then, to the surprise of both his older brothers, a ragged sob burst from his lips. “How the fuck am I supposed to protect you when you pull shit like this?”

And then he threw himself into Charlie’s arms.

Charlie held him close automatically, throwing an alarmed glance in Bill’s direction. The curse-breaker looked back at him with the same expression. “What do you mean, protect us?” Charlie asked, rubbing Percy’s back, being his big brother as easy and instinctual as breathing. Percy’s hands gripped tight to the open lapels of Charlie’s robe.

“You think I’m doing this because I want to?” he gasped. “Ignoring the family, devoting my every bloody moment to the Minister, making Mum—making Mum cry, like that?” Percy himself was crying, his eyes bloodshot when he looked up at Charlie. “Char, please, you know me. I’m just trying to keep everyone safe.¹”

“Safe from what?” Bill asked, suddenly right there at Charlie’s shoulder, firewhiskey abandoned. He had one hand on Charlie’s shoulder and one hand on Percy’s, and for a moment Charlie was twelve again and being told that Fred and George might have Dragon Pox but they were going to be fine, and it wasn’t Percy’s fault for catching it first, not at all.

“From everything!” Percy wept. “Fudge is running the Ministry into the ground and Dumbledore’s got his own fucking agenda that I don’t trust for a second, and everyone knows You-Know-Who is back and I know he’s got people in high places and I’m trying to weed them out in case Harry bloody Potter actually manages to kill him and we can finally start getting some actual fucking competent people involved, but until then the whole bloody family is under Ministry watch because our parents are right in Dumbledore’s pockets and I thought if I could get Fudge to trust me, I could keep him away from you, but you had to go and ruin it by taking your fucking lordships and now Fudge wants to keep an eye on you!”

This was all said in one long, hurried breath, and finished with a weak fist thudding against Charlie’s chest.

Charlie looked up again, his own horror mirrored in his older brother’s eyes.

“Fuck, Perce,” he breathed, running a hand through Percy’s short-cropped red curls. “Why didn’t you say anything?”

Percy snorted, pulling back to fix him with a shrewd look. “It had to look real,²” he insisted mulishly. “If Fudge didn’t believe I absolutely hated all of you and the headmaster besides, he’d never let me so close to him.” He blinked away tears. “Except I’ve just gone and cocked that up because now you’re going to go to Dumbledore about it and he’s going to try and get me to spy on the Minister!”

“Hey, hey, none of that,” Bill soothed as Percy began to cry harder. “Easy. Look, why don’t you sit down, I’ll make some tea, and then Charlie and I can tell you why we really took our lordships, yeah?”

Percy looked bewildered, and heartbroken, but let Charlie gently manhandle him over to the sofa.

Charlie mentally apologised to Sirius, who had been expecting them both to visit Grimmauld Place that evening to discuss the Wizengamot meeting. But he would understand; he’d been a big brother to a difficult little brother too, once. Even if things hadn’t ended quite so nicely for Regulus, in the end.

Bill got the kettle going, and Charlie offered Percy a handkerchief, rubbing his back until the shaking of his shoulders subsided.

The three of them had a whole lot to talk about, it seemed.

Chapter 68

Chapter Notes

I hope this is worth the weekend wait ;)

Despite having gotten rid of Dumbledore over the matter, Umbridge was not remotely satisfied with leaving Harry and his friends well enough alone. Every time Harry snuck past the entrance to the Room of Requirement — always under his invisibility cloak — there was at least one member of the Inquisitorial Squad waiting outside it.

She knew Harry wouldn't give up so easily, and she was determined to catch him in the act. Every day in classes and at meals and between lessons, Harry found himself on the receiving end of a dozen intent looks; all HA members wondering if this was it, if they were finally finished. Harry merely shook his head slightly, and carried on. He would find a way.

With all of them under such close scrutiny, the heirs couldn't meet either. This was mostly fine, as they had only been studying the last few times, but it was still annoying to have his social groups so limited by Umbridge's bug-eyed ever-present stare.

But Harry wouldn't let it stop him. He knew far more secrets within Hogwarts than Dolores Umbridge could dream of knowing.

"I won't tell anyone about the office," Harry hissed in promise — even though Salazar had admitted to speaking fluent modern English, he still insisted they converse in Parseltongue. "But unless you know of any better ideas for a space big enough for fifty-six people to cast spells without getting caught, the Chamber is my best option."

Salazar, to Harry's surprise, gave a hard smirk, his eyes glinting. "Harry, lad; the four of us built Hogwarts to rebel against a form of government that wanted magic to remain secret, taught only between master and apprentice," he pointed out. "Rebelling against the government is what we're all about! Of course you can bring your friends down here, as long as they do not leave the main Chamber itself. They cannot explore without you, after all."

He was right; Harry had long ago closed the gaping mouth of the statue of Salazar Slytherin, and he knew the hissed command that would lock down every exit in the main room. There were no other Parselmouths in the school to go against him.

He beamed up at the founder. "Brilliant."

The next evening, after his detention with Umbridge, Harry went up to his dorm and reached into his bedside drawer for a particular inkwell. A few quiet questions had enlightened him to the quidditch practice times, and he wanted to move as quickly as possible. He raised his wand, carefully etching a short phrase into the silver plate on the bottom.

'Thursday 7PM. Library, row 82'

There. That would certainly keep them guessing.

..

In the morning, he was ambushed by Ginny as soon as he and Neville entered the common room. "We can't do it in the library!" she hissed, her sentence earning raised eyebrows from a couple of sixth-years walking past at the time. Harry flushed despite himself. "Pince will have our heads!"

"It's not exactly hiding," Neville agreed doubtfully. Harry grinned at them both.

"The pair of you, no faith at all," he said mock-sadly, shaking his head. "We aren't going to do anything in the library. That's just the least suspicious place for everyone to go in the evening." Umbridge couldn't ban students from the library, not so close to exams.

"So what, you just wanted to talk to everyone?" Ginny asked, brows furrowed. Again, Harry shook his head.

"I have a place we can go, and we can get there from the library. It's a little... unorthodox. But it's more secure than even the Room was."

All of a sudden, Ginny stopped in her tracks, realisation dawning on her face. "Harry, tell me you didn't," she murmured, voice wavering.

"It's not scary anymore, Gin, I promise," he assured her, reaching out to squeeze her hand. "I swear; I cleaned it up, there's no trace of it all left, and I wouldn't be taking anyone down there if I weren't absolutely confident of that." He'd even scrubbed off the black ink stain on the floor.

Ginny bit her lip. "You're absolutely sure?"

"Positive," he swore without hesitation. "You won't be alone down there, Gin. Not again."

Neville was following the whole exchange, confused and a little bit suspicious. When he opened his mouth, both Harry and Ginny shook their heads; they couldn't talk about it, even in a corridor that seemed empty.

They could never be sure when people were listening.

Ginny wasn't the only one with questions, but the rest of the HA were wisely keeping them to themselves over breakfast, Umbridge sat upon Dumbledore's old throne-like seat, smiling down at them like a medieval queen wondering which of her servants to behead next.

Harry kept his rage quietly burning through the day, right up until dinner time. Neville bid goodbye to head off to his detention, looking extra morose — he was going to be missing the HA meeting. Harry felt bad about it, but he knew Neville understood; they had to move quickly. They couldn't afford to wait two whole weeks for both of them to be done with their detentions.

Harry went about his evening as if it were any other, hitching his schoolbag over his shoulder and walking towards the library with his hands in his pockets. He looked like any other student, headed to get some studying done, and no one looked twice at him when he entered the library. Except for the other members of the HA, some of whom were already there, waiting.

He took his time perusing the shelves, slowly making his way back into the lesser-used parts of the library, right back to row 82, which contained old copies of the Daily Prophet for historical purposes.

At the end of the row was a small alcove set with a window, and Harry approached it. On the left side wall of the alcove, there was a Hogwarts crest engraved. Below that crest was a tiny little snake.

Harry checked his watch, then cast a wandless Notice-Me-Not charm; just a gentle one. Just enough that anyone who was not expecting to see him would look right past that row of shelves.

Then he hissed quietly, and the wall became a doorway, just narrow enough to fit a single person.

Harry stood in the doorway, and waited.

Unsurprisingly, the twins and Ginny were the first to show up. All three brown-eyed Weasleys looked guarded, making Harry wonder if Ginny had told the twins what to expect. Harry discreetly waved them over.

“It’s down there, then?” Ginny asked, looking a bit green. Harry nodded.

“I promise you, it’s safe.”

“Come on, little sis,” George crowed quietly, slinging an arm around her shoulders. “Trust Harry. This is wicked!”

The twins joked and cajoled Ginny into the narrow passage, but Harry didn’t miss how both of them had tight grips on their wands, ready to defend their sister from anything that might be lurking in the Chamber.

He wished he’d had a little more time, to perhaps give Ginny a chance to face her demons quietly, but he hadn’t wanted her to dwell on it too long. Going down there and getting straight into a HA lesson would keep her mind off the last time she’d been down there.

A small cluster of Ravenclaws led by Cho Chang was next, and Cho still looked guilty, though Marietta was notably absent. Harry nodded to them all, and stepped aside to let them squeeze into the passageway. “Keep going, all the way to the end. The twins and Ginny are down there already.”

The whole group looked relieved to hear they would be welcomed at the end, lighting up their wand tips and heading down. Already, the next group was approaching from the end of the aisle, and Harry was glad to see the Hufflepuff seventh-years removing Dissilusionment charms from themselves. While it was not suspect for so many students to be in the library, it would be very odd for them all to disappear into the same row and not return for hours.

He trusted in the HA’s discretion, by now.

A steady trickle of students continued, and by quarter-past Harry was fairly sure everyone was in. Anyone else clearly wasn’t coming; Harry wouldn’t wait around for them forever. He stepped into the passage, closed it with a hiss, and hurried to catch up with his friends.

He couldn’t help but grin at the sight of the whole group spread around the Chamber, looking around in a mix of awe and horror.

“So, what do you think?” he asked with a mischievous grin, spreading his arms wide.

“Is this what I think it is, Harry?” Blaise asked, his dark eyes incredulous. Harry laughed.

“If you’re thinking it’s Salazar Slytherin’s Chamber of Secrets, then yes, it is. Did all the snakes give it away?”

A few squeaks of terror sounded.

“The Chamber of Secrets is real?” Zacharias Smith blurted, face pale as he looked up at the statue. “I— but what about the monster?”

“Harry killed that, didn’t he?” Fred pointed out. “With that big old sword in Dumbledore’s office.”

“I thought I’d told you guys what happened in my second year?” Harry asked, confused. Several people shrugged, and more than a few glanced at Ginny Weasley.

“Not really,” Justin piped up. “Just something about a big snake and saving Ginny from being possessed by You-Know-Who.”

Ah, of course; Harry had given the bare minimum, not wanting any information to slip out that might lead anyone on the Dark side to realise what the diary was. Likely Voldemort already knew one of his horcruxes had been destroyed — Lucius Malfoy would have had to own up to it eventually — but the fewer other people who knew, the better.

“Well, it’s real. There was a basilisk but it’s dead now. So we’re good to practice in here. Though I’ll warn you now,” he added, and hissed the command to lock down the Chamber. All over the walls, huge snakes wriggled in place, barring the exits. Several people jumped. “I’m the only one who can command the passageways in here. I’ll let us all out in the same place we came in from, but if anyone was thinking about going exploring, I would strongly advise against it. I'm not so arrogant as to think I've discovered all of the secrets down here, and I don't want you getting hurt."

He was sure Salazar still had a few that he wasn't sharing, the sneaky bastard.

"So." He clapped his hands together, determined to get them all on track before they could freak out too much about the new surroundings. "Back to Patronus charms, then?"

Umbridge certainly wasn't going to find them down there.

.-.-.-.

Sirius wanted to punch something. He stalked through the corridors of Grimmauld, restlessness coursing through his veins. He hadn't been outside since Dumbledore had fled Hogwarts; the old man had practically moved in to Grimmauld Place, showing up at all hours, sometimes with nothing in particular to say — like he was checking to see Sirius was where he was supposed to be. It was utterly galling, being checked on like a recalcitrant child, and Sirius desperately wished he could give the man a piece of his mind.

But he couldn't, because they were still pretending they didn't hate the manipulative bastard.

Fleeing Hogwarts in such a courageous move and letting the media paint him as the driving force behind the students learning to defend themselves had done nothing but strengthen Dumbledore's reputation as protector of the Light, to the point where Sirius was beginning to wonder if he hadn't orchestrated the whole thing himself. The man no longer had to worry about the students, or Umbridge breathing down his neck, and there was no auror in Fudge's pocket actually capable of arresting the great Albus Dumbledore.

As long as the headmaster made sure to look sad and express how awful he felt about leaving the school vulnerable — though assuring that Minerva had everything in hand until he could return — everyone ate it up. Sirius wanted to strangle him.

"Hey." He whipped around at the whisper, raising his eyebrows at the sight of Charlie Weasley, dimples and all, leaning in a nearby doorway with mischief in his eyes. Sirius' heart thudded painfully. "You busy?"

"Do I look busy?" Sirius retorted, a little sharper than necessary. It didn't bother Charlie, who held out a hand.

"Come here, I want to show you something."

It took less hesitation than it probably ought to for Sirius to slip his hand into the dragon-tamer's calloused one, letting the shorter man drag him up the stairs and down the left hand corridor. Sirius' brow furrowed in confusion when Charlie opened the door to the formal dining room. It was the largest room in the house, used for parties and the like when Sirius had been a child, and Sirius hadn't stepped foot in it since he'd ripped all the wallpaper down and painted it pale gold. What could Charlie possibly want to show him in there?

The redhead just grinned at the look on his face, tugging him over to the tall window. It was dark outside, the half-moon shining brightly.

Then, to Sirius' surprise, Charlie pulled out his wand and tapped it against the centre of the window. Suddenly, the glass flexed, stretching outward, melting down until Sirius was looking at a small balcony, barely big enough for two people to stand on. "Tonks showed me the trick," Charlie revealed. "Said her mum told her about it. They used to do it at parties, for all the people smoking cigars."

Sirius remembered, now; being a child, seeing a cluster of people all gathered around the open window, plumes of multi-coloured smoke drifting into the air.

He stepped forward, and the gentle breeze ruffling his hair made his eyes flutter shut in ecstasy. "That's not even the best part," Charlie whispered, suddenly very close to Sirius, his breath tickling the man's stubbled cheek. "Watch this."

Charlie stepped onto the balcony, turned to the side, and reached up. Then he was gone. Sirius hurried out after him, turning around to see the redhead climbing the stonework up to the roof. Once he was sat on the edge, he beamed down at Sirius. "Come on up! It's gorgeous out."

Sirius couldn't refuse a challenge like that, and soon he was gripping the decorative gargoyles and hauling himself up onto the roof beside Charlie. There wasn't much space for both of them to sit, so they ended up pressed close together, Charlie's arm braced around Sirius' back. He was warm, always so warm — constantly joking that working around dragons made him run too hot — and just having him so close was making Sirius' head swim. Combined with the air on his face, the feeling of finally being outside... it was a heady sensation, bubbling away in Sirius' belly.

"Sometimes I come up here when I want to think," Charlie admitted. "It's quiet, and the muggles can't see. I wish you could see the stars, though." This deep in London, the sky was far too thick with pollution to see much of anything. "You should see the sky at the reserve. It's incredible."

He spoke quietly, his wonder palpable. "Do you know many constellations?" Sirius asked abruptly, and Charlie shook his head.

"Nah, I was never good at Astronomy," he admitted. "I liked the ones that were shaped like animals but I was rubbish at finding them."

A chuckle rumbled through Sirius' chest. "One of these days, when I can, you should take me out to the reserve to see this incredible sky of yours. I can show you all the constellations. Bit of an Astronomy expert, me."

"Name like Sirius, I'd expect nothing less," Charlie teased. He shifted, and in a move that was entirely too smooth for Sirius' liking, the hand splayed on the tiles behind him slid across to cover Sirius', tangling their fingers together. It moved Charlie even closer, the pair of them practically cuddling. "Would you really come to the reserve with me?"

"Wide open space, full of dragons?" Sirius retorted. "Sounds perfect." He was starting to forget what actual nature looked like.

"It's a date, then," Charlie murmured. He let his head fall forward, nose brushing Sirius' ear. "Please say it's a date."

Sirius' chest ached at the earnest hope straining his voice. It had been weeks, months even, and Charlie Weasley wasn't giving up on him. "I don't know what you see in me," he confessed quietly. "I don't... I don't know how to do this anymore."

"There's lots of things I see in you," Charlie said. "You're funny, you're clever, you've got a fantastic arse," he added, dimples returning for a moment. "But I think the thing that really hooked me was seeing how much you care about Harry. Us Weasleys, we're all about family, y'know. People thought I was the odd duck because I buggered off to Romania, but... it's just a different kind of family, out there. You're the kind of man that would do anything to make that kid's shitty life better, even if it made you miserable. That kind of devotion... it's an attractive trait, that."

And oh, that hurt, because if Charlie had just talked about his arse more, or even his sense of humour, Sirius might have been able to brush him off as a young man looking for a challenge, a boyfriend more interesting than the last. But to talk that way about him, about Harry... Charlie had seen him, in ways most others didn't.

"I'm older than you," he reminded, and Charlie scoffed.

"Only twelve years."

"Twelve years I spent in Azkaban," Sirius pointed out, voice getting sharp again.

"So mentally we're the same age, then," Charlie reasoned, grinning ever so slightly. Sirius shot him a look.

"I was shit at relationships even before I spent time in that hellhole," he said flatly. "Ask Remus. I... I don't know if I can be what you want me to be."

"Won't know until you try, will you?" Charlie said, unfazed. "I reckon you'll be a lot better at it than you think you will."

"I don't know how to love anymore, since the dementors."

"Bullshit," Charlie retorted, not even hesitating. "You love Harry. You love Remus. You love Tonks. You love blackberry crumble in a way that's more than a little bit obscene, quite frankly." He grinned, eyes glowing in the moonlight, and Sirius could hardly breathe, "You know how to love, Sirius Black, and we both know it. You're just scared of it. And of all the things I've learned about you in the last year, I never took you for a coward."

There was a challenge, bright in his blue gaze; the kind of challenge that set Sirius' blood afire.

“And if you’re talking euphemistically, well; I’ve taught more than a few people how to love, and I’d be very happy to remind you of the finer details,” he drawled huskily, dry lips pressing feather-light against Sirius’ jaw.

Something deep inside Sirius broke. All of a sudden, his free hand was cupping the side of Charlie’s face, pulling him into a deep, filthy kiss. It wasn’t their first, not by a long shot — but it was the first Sirius had initiated. Charlie moaned deeply into his mouth, gripping Sirius’ shoulder for purchase, his tongue doing truly sinful things.

“You win,” Sirius admitted in a raw, ragged whisper, once they parted. “You persistent little shit, you win. But don’t blame me when I break your heart.” It would take a stronger man than him to keep denying this beautiful man, this man who seemed so determined — determined not only to woo him, but that Sirius was truly someone worth wooing. And Sirius wanted it, so deep down it hurt his soul, he always had — he’d dated his way through Hogwarts, always desperately seeking the kind of connection James had with Lily, the connection he later learned Remus had with Snape.

He wasn’t lying when he said he thought the dementors had destroyed his ability to form a connection like that. But Charlie Weasley made him want to find out for sure.

Charlie kissed him again, running fingers through his hair. “The only way you’ll break my heart is if we get off this roof and you tell me you’ve changed your mind,” he breathed. Sirius smirked into the kiss.

“Why don’t we get off this roof and find out, then?”

Truly, he was amazed neither of them fell and broke their necks, the way they were so eager to climb down to the balcony. But they made it, Charlie’s fingers like brands as they chased Sirius’ bare skin, sneaking up his shirt as soon as both of them had two feet on solid ground. Sirius’ heart was racing like it hadn’t in years, he felt alive, he felt wanted, he felt like if he didn’t get Charlie on a flat surface in the next ten minutes he might combust from the force of his arousal. He pinned the redhead against the wall, devouring his mouth, and Charlie groaned loudly.

“Knew it would be hot when you finally pushed back,” he declared smugly, eyes bright. “Fuck, that feels so good,” he said, pressing up against Sirius’ body. One of his hands snuck down to squeeze just the right side of too-hard on the bulge in Sirius’ jeans. “Was starting to wonder if this had fallen off from lack of use.”

“Cheeky fuck,” Sirius growled, pulling back and grabbing the redhead’s wrist, hurrying him towards the door. “I’ll show you fallen off.”

“Yes, please.”

Thankfully, they weren’t disturbed as they snuck up to Sirius’ room, and a silencing ward hit the door as soon as it was closed. Sirius stared as Charlie shamelessly began to strip, revealing tanned, freckled skin and a number of detailed tattoos. A good number of burns and scars, too; Sirius couldn’t wait to get his mouth on every single one of them.

Not one to be outdone, Sirius pulled his shirt over his head, enormously glad for Ceri's insistence on over-feeding him in the last two years. He was a far cry from the skeletal figure he'd been when he escaped; still a little skinny, but with more muscle, a healthy flush to his olive complexion.

Certainly nothing to be ashamed of, especially the way Charlie was looking at him, both of them stood naked in Sirius' room. "Get on that bed, right now," Charlie said huskily, pupils blown with lust. "I've been waiting far too bloody long for this."

Sirius didn't need telling twice, practically launching himself onto the bed, reaching greedily for Charlie. The first press of warm skin against his own had his vision almost whiting out, the simple feeling so incredible he could hardly stand it. "Fuck, touch me," he begged. "Don't care where, just— your skin, so good."

"I've got you, sweetheart," Charlie assured, hands somehow everywhere at once on Sirius' body, his bulky form pressing him down on the mattress — comforting, not suffocating, grounding him to reality, the only thing stopping him vibrating out of his own skin, Charlie's lips whispering words of affection between open-mouthed kisses down his neck and collarbone. He was so warm, Sirius wanted him all over, warming all the parts of him he'd thought Azkaban had turned cold forever.

Sirius whimpered, a sound he might've been embarrassed by if he hadn't lost control of himself entirely, so overwhelmed by the contact. For a second he thought he might be too overwhelmed, and tensed up in fear — Charlie immediately pulled back, still whispering to him, still touching him but not quite so much.

"I forgot it could feel like this," Sirius gasped, utterly broken. He might have been crying, it felt so good. He was probably embarrassing himself, probably making Charlie regret the whole decision. What kind of thirty-six year-old man couldn't handle being touched while naked? Charlie hadn't even laid a finger on his cock yet!

"Oh, sweetheart. Sirius," Charlie murmured, still there, still looking at him with so much adoration in his eyes, more than Sirius could handle. "I'm going to make you feel so good, I promise, baby steps." His hand stroked Sirius' flank, his powerful thighs still tangled with Sirius' slimmer legs. "I'll take care of you, I swear, fuck, you're so beautiful. Never thought you'd actually let me do this."

His touch was reverent, his kisses like molten gold, and it didn't surprise Sirius when he tipped over the edge of bliss with a full-body shudder, going boneless in Charlie's embrace. The redhead moaned, pressing him down into the mattress once more as Sirius' hands scrabbled at his back, urging him closer, needing that weight to cover him before he floated away entirely.

When sense slowly returned, his cheeks were burning, and he could hardly look Charlie in the eye. "Sorry," he muttered. "Probably not what you were expecting." His first time being intimate with another person in fifteen years, he should've expected a bit of an overload, but he hadn't anticipated a full fucking breakdown and the most premature orgasm he'd had since puberty!

“Are you kidding?” Charlie whispered, stroking Sirius’ damp cheeks. “That was amazing. You’re amazing.” He propped himself up on his elbows, his erection digging into Sirius’ thigh. “I could get addicted to watching you enjoy yourself, Sirius Black.”

Something fierce in Sirius’ heart lurched to the surface, and part of him knew he was done for there and then. “Well, I might be a bit... sensitive, but I’ve never left a lover unsatisfied, and I don’t intend to start now,” he remarked, shifting his hips a little and moving upwards, clenching Charlie’s cock between his thighs, whispering a quiet Lubrication charm to ease movement. Charlie’s eyes rolled back, a purring groan spilling from his lips. Sirius held his breath, enraptured, watching the redhead fuck his thighs with abandon, pleasure written all over his face.

Charlie wasn’t the only one who might get addicted.

.....

The school was rapidly becoming something of a war zone. After almost an entire school year with Umbridge looming over them, having her become headmistress was the last straw for so many; or perhaps it was her unseating of Dumbledore that had the students so shaken. Either way, there was something... feral about the Hogwarts student body, these days. The Weasley twins were happily in the centre of it all, and business was booming for the pair as they sold their inventions to kids all over the school. Students were dropping from DADA lessons like flies with some ailment or another, and Umbridge knew it was not natural illness but didn’t seem to be able to catch any culprits. Subtle rebellions against her ridiculous rules were everywhere; untucked shirts, holding hands in hallways, copies of the Quibbler — new copies, entirely unrelated to Harry Potter, but still banned — turning up in Umbridge’s classroom and office and even, reportedly, in her private rooms.

Harry thought it was brilliant, though he didn’t have much to contribute himself; all his anti-Umbridge energy was going towards keeping the HA running, and making sure everyone who needed it learned how to do the necessary charms after a Blood Quill detention session. The day after his own detentions had finished, he came across a pair of second years with bleeding hands in the common room — Umbridge had procured more of the blasted quills, obviously frustrated at how slow it was to punish only one student at a time.

And then the invitation came.

“Potter!” It was Filch, shuffling down the corridor in Harry’s direction, a twisted look of glee on his face. “The headmistress wants to see you!”

“What for?” Harry asked warily. He was with the Weasley twins, who stood either side of him with their arms folded intimidatingly, and Filch stopped abruptly. But then he smirked again.

“You’ll soon find out, won’t you?” He looked positively joyous, and that was definitely not a good sign. “Reckon you two will finally get what’s coming to you, and all,” he added, glancing at the two redheads.

Silently assuring the pair he would be fine, Harry followed Filch down the corridor, dread trickling down his spine as the caretaker muttered about the new Decree coming that would allow him to reintroduce corporal punishment. Was Umbridge bored of her quill, finally? Of only punishing one student at a time? Or was she just trying to get Filch on her side; his knowledge of the castle was far better than her own, after all. She probably thought she could use him to try and smoke out the HA. The idea made Harry smile to himself — did she really think him that naive?

Filch led him all the way to Umbridge's office — Dumbledore's had sealed itself since shortly after the man's departure, and wouldn't open no matter how many curses Umbridge flung at the gargoyle. When he knocked, the door opened immediately, and Harry was half-shoved into the familiar room. Filch gave him one last oily smile, then left them to it.

"You wanted to see me, Professor?" Harry asked politely. Umbridge smiled, her eyes like daggers.

"Sit down, Mr Potter. Have some tea."

At the doily-covered desk where he usually wrote lines, there was a single cup of tea. Harry began to draw his own conclusions, watching the way Umbridge stared keenly at his hands around the cup.

"I just thought I'd call you in for a little chat," she said, giggling girlishly. "Drink up!"

Harry lifted the teacup to his mouth, and pretended to take a long drink. As he did, he Vanished half the contents of the cup. When it hit the table, Umbridge's gaze lit up.
"Excellent. Now, tell me — where is Albus Dumbledore?"

That was her angle, really?? "I don't know, Professor."

Her jaw clenched. "Drink your tea, Mr Potter."

Amused, Harry pretended to drink again, Vanishing the rest and setting his empty cup down. He even let his stare go a little vacant.

"Where is Albus Dumbledore?"

"I don't know," he said again. A tiny noise of frustration escaped Umbridge.

"Has he written to you? Contacted you in any way?"

"No, Professor." She didn't like that answer any more than the last. She made a face like sucking on a lemon, and leaned forward in her chair.

"Who is in your little defence club?"

"I don't have a defence club," Harry told her.

"Impossible!" she screeched, glaring. "I know you've been hiding it from me! Where are you meeting your little friends?"

"I study with Neville and Ginny in the common room," Harry answered, keeping his tone even. "And sometimes I do homework with my other yearmates in the library."

"That's not what I meant and you know it!" Umbridge hissed, wild-eyed in her anger. "Let's try another question — where is the criminal Sirius Black?"

Harry didn't even need to bother lying about that one; before he could open his mouth, a huge explosion rocked the castle. The colour drained from Umbridge's face, and she shot to her feet.

The sound of screams began to echo through the castle. For one horrified moment, Harry wondered if Death Eaters had attacked, taking Dumbledore's absence as a sign of weakness.

"Back to lunch, Potter!" Umbridge yelled, already hurrying from the office. Harry gave her a small head start, then left after her, wand in hand. It soon became all too clear what the source of the chaos was.

There were fireworks everywhere. By the time Harry reached the top of the main staircase, there was a riot of sparks in all colours and shapes filling the air; huge dragons made of coloured fire that roared as they shot off smaller fireworks; whizzing Catherine wheels screeching as they spun through the air; rockets trailing sparks as they soared higher through the castle. It was an endless supply, all originating from the Entrance Hall, and Harry had a very good idea who had done it.

The fireworks lasted through the entire rest of the day — thanks largely in part to the array of spells on them that had them multiplying or changing shape whenever anyone tried to vanish them.

And, of course, thanks to the rest of the staff, who seemed largely unconcerned by the displays. And with all the Educational Decrees about what was within their proper authority to handle, many of them seemed perfectly happy to summon Umbridge whenever they came across a firework, rather than disposing of it themselves. In Transfiguration, Harry had to bite his lip to keep from laughing as McGonagall continued to teach despite the purple dragon shooting around the classroom, which she had sent Lavender to go alert Umbridge of. The sweaty, soot-blackened headmistress appeared and raised her wand feebly, clearly exhausted from the whole affair.

Everyone was talking about it at dinner, and everyone seemed to know who the culprits were. Not that Fred and George were really trying to hide it, promising that their full line of fireworks would be for sale in the summer, and people could pre-order now.

A hush fell over the hall when the headmistress finally staggered in, her lurid pink robe slightly charred at the edges, her hair entirely in disarray. "Weasley! Weasley!" she called, and four heads of red hair popped up at the Gryffindor table. "Not you two," she snapped dismissively at Ginny and Ron.

"Can we help you, Headmistress?" Fred asked politely, eyes dancing. A vein in Umbridge's temple pulsed.

"You can count your lucky stars I'm not having you expelled for this little stunt," she snapped. "But don't you think you've gotten away with it. Two weeks detention, both of you. And no more quidditch!"

That made the twins sit up a little straighter. "What?"

"That's right!" Umbridge was almost delirious in her fury. "You're clearly cut from the same cloth as Potter, so you'll suffer the same punishments! And be very careful how you conduct yourself over the next few weeks, boys," she warned, before stalking off to her seat, waving her wand angrily at a bright orange firework whizzing through the air above the Hufflepuff table.

The twins looked at each other in dismay. A few seats over, Angelina got abruptly to her feet, hands clenched in rage, and stormed from the hall.

A few horrified seconds later, the entire Gryffindor quidditch team was up and following her — and Harry, too, even though he wasn't technically part of the team any longer.

They caught up to Angelina in the Gryffindor common room, where she was repeatedly punching a cushion. In the corner, a sparkler was writing rude words in the air.

"Angie, we're sorry," Fred started, and Angelina whirled around, expression furious.

"Don't," she growled. "I'm not mad at you. The fireworks were fucking brilliant. I'm mad at that bitch." There were tear-tracks on her cheeks, and as Fred edged closer, her shoulders slumped. "This was supposed to be our year," she despaired. "You two, me, Alicia; one last year to win the cup, to play together before we graduate and life takes over. It was bad enough when she kicked Harry off, but this..." She sniffed noisily, "One more match. We only had one more match together before it would all be over, and she's fucking ruined everything!"

She punched the cushion one more time, so hard it split open and spewed feathers everywhere. Fred hurried forward, wrapping his arms around her.

"Hey, hey, it's okay," he murmured, kissing the tears off her cheeks. "Angie, it's okay. We'll play together again. Maybe not like this — not as students, not as Gryffindor. But we'll be a team again. You're not getting rid of me or George any time soon." He grinned, and she laughed wetly.

"I just really wanted this last year to be perfect," she sobbed, "and it's all gone to shit!"

Harry stood back awkwardly as the twins and Alicia crowded around their yearmate, hugging her tightly. There was nothing he could say, really; Umbridge might have ruined the whole year, but at least he had two more. Sure, his school years rarely went to plan, but he was an oddity there. He could understand Angelina's desire to have a perfect final year of school; especially with how grim the outside world was looking.

"It's only Ravenclaw, Angie," Alicia comforted, attempting a smile. "The boys aren't missing much."

Angelina snorted. “Easy enough to say; we’ve got to find two new beaters and get them ready in the next three weeks.”

“You’ll find them,” Harry said supportively. “Even if they’re shit, you girls are so great it won’t matter.”

“I bloody hope so,” Angelina groused. “I might not be able to play my last match with my boys,” and she looked over pointedly, including Harry in that statement, “but you can be damned sure I’m going to win it anyway.”

The whole team cheered at that, and Fred gave Angelina a sweet kiss. “We did warn you we might not stick around ’til the match,” he murmured, getting comfortable with her on the sofa, while George sank into the armchair. Harry perched on the arm, leaning back against the space beside George’s head.

“I know, but I thought you’d make it. And at the very least, I thought it would be because you’d gone, not because that hag banned you.” She kicked off her shoes, tucking her legs up beneath her. “What made you do the fireworks today, anyway? I thought you were saving that one.”

The twins shared a look, then looked up at Harry.

“She pulled me into her office,” Harry volunteered. “Tried to interrogate me. I think she drugged my tea, but I didn’t drink it. She seemed pretty angry that I wouldn’t tell her about the HA, or where Dumbledore was.”

Angelina’s face screwed up in disgust. “What a cow. Did she hurt you?”

Harry shook his head. “Fireworks went off before she could do more than ask questions.” He wasn’t so naive to think she wouldn’t have resorted to violence, if she thought it necessary.

“Good,” George said quietly, resting his head against Harry’s shoulder. “Happy to be of service.”

Harry wished it hadn’t gotten them banned from quidditch, but from the way their pranks had been escalating, it likely would have happened eventually. They were just lucky she didn’t have enough proof to kick them out properly.

. . . .

Remus let his thigh press against Severus’, the pair of them sat together on a sofa at Grimmauld Place. It still felt risky, to be so close to each other anywhere but Seren Du or Severus’ quarters, but Sirius had assured them the three of them were the only ones still in the house. They had just finished another Order meeting, and Sirius clearly had something to tell them.

“Dumbledore tried to break my Occlumency shields the other day,” the dog animagus announced without delay. Remus cursed, and felt Severus tense beside him. “He didn’t get through,” Sirius hastened to assure, “but he tried, and he knows I’m blocking him. He’s suspicious.”

“Do you know what he was searching for?” Severus asked intently.

“I think he was looking to see if I’d been in contact with Harry,” Sirius replied, frowning. “But honestly, it could be anything. He’s making it nigh on impossible for me to do anything, these days. He’s around here so often, I haven’t been home since he left the school.”

Remus’ heart clenched in sympathy; it couldn’t be easy for Sirius, locked up in Grimmauld all the time. “Is there anything we can do to put him at ease?” He turned helpless eyes to Severus, whose lips were pursed in thought.

“I think we may need to accept that Albus will find out the two of you are not loyal sooner rather than later,” he said eventually. Remus knew that his partner was planning on playing the triple agent for as long as physically possible. “Have you heard back from Bill at all?”

“He said the book you gave him was really helpful,” Remus relayed. “That they should be able to figure out a way to get the horcrux out by summer.”

Severus’ shoulders twitched, the tiniest betrayal of his relief. Remus wasn’t sure where the book had come from — sometimes he knew best not to ask — but he was glad Severus had found it.

“I’m worried if Dumbledore pushes my shields again he might break them,” Sirius admitted.

“He will expect you to avoid looking him in the eye, now he’s been caught out,” Severus reasoned. “It is unlikely he will try again; he may, however, find other ways of trying to question you on Potter’s movements.”

“If he does, he’ll get a reminder that this is my bloody house, and Lord Black or not I still hold the wards,” Sirius growled, eyes flashing. Remus smirked; he would quite like to see that.

“As satisfying as that would be,” Severus drawled, clearly of the same mind, “need I remind you that Potter is still stuck with that hag at the school, and putting him on Albus’ shit-list will not help in the slightest?”

“How bad is it there?” Sirius asked, the light in his eyes fading until he just looked weary. Remus hated that look on him, the reminder of the twelve years his friend had spent in Azkaban. It appeared less and less these days — especially with Charlie Weasley around — but when it did pop back up, it made Remus’ heart grow heavy.

“The students are united against her,” Severus supplied. “The Weasley twins are certainly making her life difficult. They’re better than you and Potter ever were,” he added with a smirk, making Sirius laugh.

“Having seen their inventions, I’ll concede to that,” he said. “Bloody brilliant, the pair of them. Glad to hear they’re keeping Umbitch on her toes.”

“How’s Harry?” Remus pressed, stomach sinking when Severus looked concerned once more.

“Currently, he is well. I have it under good authority that he’s started holding his little defence club sessions in the Chamber of Secrets.”

Remus goggled at him. “That’s...” It was either genius or madness. Perhaps both.

“Indeed,” Severus agreed, eyes amused for a moment. “We shall have to see how that plays out. But Umbridge certainly isn’t willing to let it go; not after he embarrassed her in front of the Minister. She asked me to provide Veritaserum for a little chat she wanted to have with him last week.”

“And you told her where to shove it?” Sirius asked hopefully. Severus’ lips quirked.

“I told her I would be delighted to oblige,” he drawled, waiting a beat, “and I gave her a bottle of simple syrup. Salazar knows the fool woman won’t bother testing it first.”

Remus laughed, patting Severus’ thigh. “Devious snake,” he murmured fondly, ignoring the brief expression of disgust that Sirius pulled.

“Using Veritaserum on minors is enormously illegal, and no matter what free passes she has from Fudge, I will not be complicit. Even if it weren’t Potter,” Severus said. “There’s far too many of the little idiots running around that school with secrets the Ministry mustn’t learn.”

That was all too true. Remus brushed a kiss on his jaw, briefly inhaling the man’s comforting scent. “I’m glad the students have you looking out for them,” he said. “Even if they don’t realise it.” No doubt they all thought the evil Dungeon Bat was on Umbridge’s side, stealing all their joy.

“All the professors are doing what we can in Albus’ absence,” Severus said instead, not acknowledging the compliment. “With any luck, we may be able to keep them safe long enough to reach summer, when hopefully this whole mess can be put to bed for good. The students can go home and tell their parents about the gratuitous use of Blood Quills as punishment, and both Umbridge and Fudge will be out before they can say Hogwarts.”

Remus desperately hoped that was the case — that would be the quietest, easiest outcome of it all.

But he knew how Harry’s school years usually ended, so he didn’t raise his hopes too high.

Chapter 69

It was fun, taunting Umbridge.

Since the fireworks, Harry had gotten bolder, and so had the rest of the students. They seemed to be realising that she couldn't put everyone in detention at once, and by the end of the Easter holidays she had mostly stopped trying. Education Decrees were popping up out of nowhere, trying to ban anything that might give the students — especially Harry — any kind of joy. There had been a revolt from the entirety of Ravenclaw house when Umbridge had tried to limit library hours to between ten AM and eight PM, noticing how many students were spending time in there; particularly the HA members, not that she knew why. The Decree had been rescinded within three days, when Umbridge had taken so many points from Ravenclaw house there was nothing left in the hourglass, and the students were still refusing to leave the library.

She should have known better than to try and curb their study habits so close to exams.

But now they were back for the summer term, exams so close Harry could practically taste it, and once again students were falling mysteriously ill in Umbridge's classes, or just not bothering to show up altogether. The headmistress had vastly underestimated how much work it was to run a school — at least, when every other person in the school was determined to make it as difficult as possible.

Like all fifth years, Harry had a careers meeting with his head of house set up during the first week of the new term. He really shouldn't have been surprised by the sight of Umbridge perched in the back corner, holding her clipboard. Seriously, did the woman not ever teach classes outside of Harry's?

McGonagall looked distinctly unimpressed at the intrusion, her nostrils flaring. "Well, Potter, this meeting is to talk over any career ideas you might have had, and help you decide which subjects to continue on through your sixth and seventh years," she said, once Harry was sat down.

Harry looked at his housemistress, then glanced back at Umbridge. When he turned back to McGonagall, a tiny smirk was playing at his lips. "Well, Professor," he began, "I'd thought I might become an auror."

McGonagall blinked. She knew full well he had plans to go into professional quidditch — and to avoid the Ministry as much as possible. Then she took in the look on his face, and her mouth twitched, ever so slightly.

"Indeed?" She reached for a leaflet out of the stack on her desk. "Well, it's no easy path — they ask a minimum of five NEWTS, all E or higher. Then there's a series of character and aptitude tests that are very rigorous; the auror department take only the best. I don't think we've had a successful applicant in the last three years."

That didn't surprise Harry even a little bit. Behind him, Umbridge made a small noise that might have been a cough, and was summarily ignored.

"Given your grades, especially this year, I can't see you having a problem with that part of the application."

Umbridge coughed again, a little louder. McGonagall's jaw clenched. "There are a few subjects that are mandatory — Defence Against the Dark Arts, naturally."

Another cough. And another, at each pause McGonagall made as she talked Harry through the subjects required, until finally she could ignore it no longer.

"May I offer you a cough drop, Dolores?" the Scottish woman bit out, and Harry pursed his lips tightly to avoid laughing.

"I was just concerned you may not have received my note on Mr Potter's most recent Defence Against the Dark Arts grades," Umbridge said sweetly.

"Oh, this thing?" McGonagall held up a piece of pink parchment between two fingers, like it was something particularly foul. "Yes I got it. Anyway, Potter, as I was saying; you've made generally high marks in Defence Against the Dark Arts — Professor Lupin in particular thought you had an aptitude for the subject—"

Umbridge's interruptions continued, her voice getting higher and higher until Harry worried she might strain something, her insistence that Harry would never become an auror so vehement.

Harry would have felt bad about faking his career interest just to wind her up, but he couldn't, not when McGonagall was so clearly enjoying the verbal sparring, and so clearly winning. Harry's recent grades spoke for themselves, in everything but Potions and DADA; and Harry knew he could ace both of those exams without breaking a sweat.

"If you cannot control your behaviour, Dolores, I will ask you to remove yourself from my office while I advise my students," McGonagall snapped eventually, cutting through Umbridge's rant about Harry's unsuitability for any Ministry profession.

"The Minister would never employ Harry Potter!"

"I'd suspect he's more worried about his own job than Potter's, at this point," came McGonagall's swift reply. Umbridge recoiled as if slapped.

"Yes, yes, that's what you want, isn't it! You want Albus Dumbledore to replace Cornelius Fudge — I'm sure you think you'll be where I am, then, hmm?"

McGonagall's deadpan stare was at odds with Umbridge's wide-eyed fanaticism. Harry sat in the middle, trying not to crack a rib from holding in his laughter.

"Dolores, you're starting to look a little... purple," McGonagall said, holding a remarkably straight face. "Perhaps a trip to the hospital wing is in order?" Earlier in the week, Ginny and Colin had slipped something into her dinner that made her head swell up like a giant blueberry every time she got particularly irate. It had all the muggle-raised students quietly singing Oompa-Loompa songs whenever Umbridge passed, which of course made it happen all over again.

Umbridge's hand flew to her face — which was its usual furious shade of magenta — and horror filled her eyes. "This discussion is not over," she hissed, before storming from the room. As soon as the door shut in her wake, Harry dissolved into helpless giggles.

"That was amazing," he croaked, watching a small but satisfied grin cross his housemistress' face.

"You're not actually thinking of becoming an auror, are you, Potter?" she asked, raising her eyebrows. "Because I hate to disappoint you, but I feel they've far too many rules for your liking."

Harry snorted. "Oh, no, Professor. I want to play professional quidditch," he confirmed brightly. "I just wanted to see Umbridge's face." And it had been far better than anything he could have imagined.

McGonagall pinched the bridge of her nose in exasperation. "You have been spending far too much time with your godfather, Potter."

"Thanks," Harry chirped.

She stared at him, then shook her head. "Regardless, I have no doubt that you'll be able to take any subjects you please at NEWT level — except perhaps Potions; Professor Snape only accepts O level students, and while I understand his judgement of your skill is... weighted, I'm not sure you're quite there yet."

"I'm studying hard," he promised, making her nod approvingly.

"Also, Potter," she added, flicking through his file, "it says in my notes that you have been enrolled in both the Arithmancy and Ancient Runes OWL exams."

"Yes, Professor," he confirmed. "Remus has been helping me self-study."

"A few weeks of summer may not be enough to get you up to OWL level," McGonagall warned. She studied him carefully, and clearly saw something in his gaze. "But if anyone could surprise me on that front, it would be you. I shall confirm the request."

Harry grinned at her. "Thank you, Professor." He wouldn't let her down.

"Just do me a favour, Potter," the Gryffindor housemistress requested, and Harry cocked an eyebrow curiously. "Make sure your little group gets the highest OWL scores this school has seen in years, will you?" There was a fire in her gaze that reminded Harry exactly why she was head of Gryffindor.

"I'll do my best," he promised. It was an easy one to make.

His students were going to blow their exams out of the water.

.--.

The tension in the school was reaching dangerous levels, between Umbridge and the rest of the school. The Inquisitorial Squad had grown bored of their point-docking privileges once all hourglasses but Slytherin's were empty, so many of them began prowling about, looking for a fight they knew they wouldn't be punished for. With so many students beginning to crack under the pressure of impending exams, the whole castle was a powder keg waiting to blow.

And blow, it did.

It started when Ginny was given a detention for 'too short a skirt' — a detention she returned from at two in the morning, dangerously pale and with blood dripping from her hand. Harry saw the hard look that passed between her twin brothers, and he knew deep down what was coming.

By breakfast, the school was chaos. Harry barely made it down to the Entrance Hall, having to use all his knowledge of the school's secret passageways to avoid getting stuck in some prank or another. One corridor had everyone who stepped in it turning upside down and walking on the ceiling. Another seemed to have turned to ice, sending people sliding around in all directions. There were large brightly coloured soap bubbles floating through the air that belched when you popped them and covered the victim in vibrant paint. And, rumour had it, there was a literal swamp somewhere in the east wing.

In the Entrance Hall he saw Umbridge, drenched head to toe in lurid green paint, hands on her hips as she glared at the Weasley twins. "You think this is funny, do you?" she accused, and the twins shared a look.

"Pretty funny, yeah," George replied nonchalantly.

Filch, covered in yellow paint, came skidding around the corner, brandishing some parchment that was now slightly soggy. "I've got the forms, Headmistress!" he crowed in delight, and a dangerous smile slipped onto Umbridge's face.

"Excellent. You two," she stepped closer threateningly, "are about to learn what happens to delinquents like you in my school."

The twins were unmoved. "Nah," Fred said, shrugging.

"Don't think we are," George agreed.

Harry watched with his heart in his mouth as the pair of them sassed Umbridge, then summoned their brooms and took off into the air above the gathered crowd. The front doors were wide open, and Harry couldn't help but laugh as George swooped low, blowing a dramatic kiss to Blaise with his little group of Slytherins. Blaise rolled his eyes, but he was smiling.

And then they were off, out of school in a blaze of glory, exactly as they deserved. Umbridge looked like she may have a heart attack on the spot, staring after them — until she realised how many students were staring at her, and yelled at them all to get on with their mornings.

For the whole day, the story of the Flight of Fred and George swept the school, the students who had witnessed it all regaling those who jealously wished they had. Much like with the fireworks, there was some kind of Anti-Vanishing spell on the paint, and Umbridge was forced to teach while looking like Slimer from Ghostbusters right up until lunchtime, when she could finally disappear for a shower.

The only dim moment of it all was the sight of Angelina and Lee, curled up on the twins' usual sofa in the common room late that evening, their faces tired from holding smiles even though their best friends were now gone. Harry approached them tentatively. "Did you know it was coming?"

"Yeah," Lee confirmed. "We said our goodbyes. And we'll see them in a few months." Still, his voice was sad.

"Listen," Harry leaned in closer, "I've got ways of getting letters in and out of the castle. And I know where the twins will be. If you want to write to them, let me know; I'll make it happen."

That made both of them brighten up, even as Angelina eyed him in consideration. "You're full of surprises, Potter," she remarked. "Fred and George always said you had more mischief in you than you let on, but I never really believed it until this year."

Harry grinned lopsidedly. "Been a bit busy, most other years," he pointed out wryly. "Besides, the twins always had mischief covered."

"You're not wrong, there," she agreed, shaking her head with fond exasperation. "Thanks for the offer, Harry. I'll probably have a letter for you in a week or so. Let them know what madness they've spawned in their wake."

"Sounds good." Harry bid them goodnight, heading up to his room, ensconcing himself in his bed curtains with the mirror and calling Sirius' name. "Hey, Padfoot. You get the package today?"

Sirius snorted. "If by package you mean those red-headed demons of yours, then yes, they showed up safe and sound just after lunchtime. Hell of a story with them, too."

"I'll pensieve the memory this summer," Harry promised. "I saw everything, it was brilliant."

The animagus grinned. "Good, good. Were you just calling to check they made it safely, or have you got time for a chat?"

"I've got time," Harry assured, getting more comfortable. "I actually wanted your advice on something."

"Boyfriend or exams?"

Harry laughed. “Neither. I’ve been thinking, today — now the twins are gone, I’m really the only bit of the Marauders’ legacy in this school. Maybe I should take up the mantle a bit.” So far, he’d really only stuck to little things to piss off Umbridge, and sneaking around the school in fox form at night when it was easy to be mistaken for a cat.

Umbridge would think she was safe, now the twins were gone.

He couldn’t have that.

.-. .

Harry didn’t seem to be the only one who was determined to fill the void left by the Weasley twins; everyone was trying their hand at becoming the next Master Prankster, inspired by their boldness. It was now impossible to go anywhere without a Bubblehead charm thanks to the number of dungbombs being dropped everywhere — Harry was highly amused to see one of the Ravenclaw seventh year prefects herding a group of first and second years down to dinner on one of the worst days, all the kids’ heads in one giant bubble like some sort of ridiculous aquarium. A niffler had been deposited in Umbridge’s office, the suits of armour were liable to jump out and challenge you to anything from a duel to a dance-off, and amidst it all Peeves was taking the twins’ parting shot to heart, causing more chaos within the school than all previous years of Harry’s memory combined.

Despite Filch’s insistence that he would get permission to exorcise the poltergeist, that had yet to happen. And with so many troublemakers popping up, Filch couldn’t keep track of them all, pacing the corridors and yelling at any student he happened to find but unable to punish any of them.

In between the times in which he was stationed at the edge of the swamp in the east wing, which Umbridge had been unable to remove despite many attempts, hauling over any students who were incapable of levitating themselves. Harry had spent one excellent lunch hour hidden as a fox, watching Filch punt first years across the foul-smelling miniature biome.

On top of all that, members of the Inquisitorial squad kept suffering strange and mysterious accidents, leaving them unable to help Umbridge put a lid on this wave of terror. Nothing particularly serious, but all very entertaining.

Harry didn’t feel the need to join in until a few days after the twins’ disappearance, when the initial wave of pranking began to die down. Then he prepared his supplies, and got to work as soon as curfew had passed.

He had asked Draco to join him, hoping to spend a little quality time with his boyfriend, but the blond had studying to do apparently. Still, Harry was surprised to see a different Slytherin waiting for him outside the Gryffindor common room.

“That you, Harry?” Blaise whispered, after seeing the portrait open for seemingly no one. Harry lowered the hood of the cloak.

“Everything alright?”

Blaise smirked. “Draco said you were up to something fun, needed a helping hand. I had nothing better to do tonight.”

Harry stared at him, surprised, then nodded after a few moments. “Yeah, alright then.” He wouldn’t turn down an assistant. “Come on.” To his credit, Blaise didn’t blink at talking to a floating disembodied head as they made their way down to the Great Hall. Any time someone came nearby, Harry put his hood back up; while Blaise wasn’t a member of the Inquisitorial Squad, Slytherins could practically do what they wanted these days. Even Slytherins who were dating Weasleys, apparently.

“So what’s the plan?” the Italian boy asked eagerly, once they were in the Great Hall. It was eerily silent so late at night, the stars twinkling overhead. Harry shed the cloak properly, stuffing it in his bag.

“First thing’s first,” he declared, striding up to the head table. Reaching the headmistress’ chair, he quickly Vanished the seat, then put up a glamour to make it look like it was perfectly ordinary. Umbridge would fall right through when she sat down for her breakfast.

Blaise snorted at the sight of it. “Good, but a little… tame,” he drawled. Harry straightened up, setting his bag on the table and pulling out several egg-shaped objects.

“This is the main plan. That was just for my own amusement,” he admitted. “I need these eggs hidden up in the rafters; they’re already enchanted. Whenever Umbridge says the word ‘detention’, one will fall down, splatter whatever it lands on with slime, and hatch an origami toad that’ll follow her around and repeats everything she says back at her.” Umbridge couldn’t go five minutes without screaming for some person or another to be put in detention, so Harry was confident all the eggs would hatch before the end of breakfast. She’d be hearing her own voice echoed twenty times over all day. “Also I wanted to hex the table to dump her food in her lap.” It was a classic, after all.

Blaise stared at him, reluctantly impressed. “You devious little bastard,” he remarked. “I’m in. Where do you want me?”

Between the two of them, setting up the eggs went much faster than they would have with Harry alone. When they were finished, they stood at the doors and surveyed their work, all hidden under careful Disillusionment charms.

“Should make for an interesting morning,” Harry declared in satisfaction.

“George will be sad to have missed this,” Blaise mused wistfully. Harry glanced at him.

“Yeah, but you know he’ll be crazy proud once he hears you were involved,” he said, watching the boy blush through his smile. “Hey, I can sneak letters to him, if you want to write,” he offered; Blaise would be missing the twins plenty, he deserved the same as Angelina and Lee.

The Slytherin’s eyebrows rose. “Umbridge is monitoring every letter that crosses the wards.”

“She certainly thinks she is,” Harry agreed mischievously.

“...You can really get a letter to him? And he can write back?” Blaise’s voice was so hopeful, it sent a pang through Harry’s chest — oh, those boys were so smitten, it warmed his heart to see it.

“Takes a couple days, but yeah.” If Snape couldn’t deliver him letters, Ceri was always down for the job, and no one had yet figured out they needed to ward against house elves. Harry was amazed he was the only one who seemed to have discovered such an obvious flaw in the school defences.

“Brilliant.” Blaise ran a hand over his short hair. “I’ll have a letter for you by the weekend. Thanks, Harry.”

“Happy to help.” He bumped Blaise’s shoulder companionably with his own. “You two are good for each other.” He hadn’t been sure at first, but seeing the pair of them together made sense — even more so now he had discovered this mischievous side of Blaise.

“It won’t be easy, my last two years now he’s graduated,” Blaise admitted. “But we’ll make it work. And it’ll be easier once Umbridge is gone.” There was no doubt in anyone’s mind that Umbridge would not last until September. She would not be the one to break the DADA curse.

“I hope so.” There was a loud noise outside the hall, and both of them froze. “We should get to bed.”

Blaise nodded, watching Harry disappear under his invisibility cloak. He shook his head in amazement. “I can’t believe you have a cloak like that,” he murmured enviously. Harry let out a soft laugh, and bid the Slytherin goodnight, heading back up to Gryffindor.

Maybe next time he’d let Blaise in on the secret of the Marauder’s Map.

.-.-.-.

Harry’s prank went off without a hitch, and with no clear signs of where Umbridge could place the blame. The frogs followed her around for the entire day, resistant to all attempts at Vanishing them — and burning, freezing, stunning, or just about anything else she could throw at it. Flitwick quietly offered thirty points to whoever had come up with such ingenious magic, but the rubies in the Gryffindor hourglass didn’t give anything away — nor did they last long. But no one cared about the house points anymore; the only thing worth anything anymore was the quidditch cup. And no one wanted it more than Angelina Johnson.

Given the last-minute need for a replacement pair of Gryffindor beaters, no one was expecting miracles. Anyone in fifth or seventh year was far too stressed about exams to give up their precious free time, and the younger candidates were... not fantastic. After a rather haphazard try-out, they ended up with a pair of third years; Andrew Kirke and Jack Sloper.

They weren’t the worst beaters Harry had ever seen, but they were certainly close.

“It’s just one match,” Angelina was muttering to herself at breakfast before the game. “We just need a sixty point lead to take the cup.”

“You’ll get it,” Harry assured confidently, feeling incredibly strange being in jeans and a t-shirt while the rest of the team wore their quidditch gear. “You’re all great at dodging bludgers. You’ll be fine.”

They would certainly need to be great, because Kirke and Sloper were more likely to hit themselves with their bats than a bludger. Harry couldn’t believe there was so little talent in the younger years of Gryffindor; it did not bode well for next year’s cup.

Harry went with Neville to get a good seat in the stands, his stomach still squirming anxiously. “I hate this,” he muttered, and Neville clapped his shoulder.

“You’ll be back out there next year,” he said with confidence. Harry hoped he was right.

The match began, Lee Jordan’s commentary not quite as lively as usual, and while the female members of the Gryffindor quidditch team were performing as excellently as always, it was clear the two boys were not up to scratch. At one point, Kirke was so afraid of the bludger coming towards him he screamed and fell off his broom.

Harry’s hands were clenched in his lap, his eyes intently on the play. He’d already spotted the snitch thrice, and was desperately trying to will Ginny to notice it. But the Ravenclaw beaters were gunning for her, trying to give Cho the best chance, and with useless beaters Ginny could do little but dodge and hope for the best.

At one point, Harry noticed Hagrid further down in the stands — he was as bruised and bloodied as he had been all term, and was talking to Ron and Hermione. After a brief conversation, the trio left the stands. Harry was almost curious enough to go after them; he’d tried to talk to Hagrid about whatever it was that was causing all those injuries, especially after relaying a few cryptic warnings from Firenze, but Hagrid just kept gruffly insisting that Harry had enough on his plate.

With any luck, Ron and Hermione would be able to help the half-giant out with whatever he was doing.

Shaking it off, Harry turned back to the match, gaze flicking to the scoreboard at the commentator’s box. Gryffindor was down sixty-thirty, their chasers hardly able to keep possession of the quaffle because of their useless beaters.

“Come on, Ginny,” he urged, watching the redhead fly.

Another twenty minutes passed, the score becoming ninety-forty, when at last Ginny turned into a sharp dive, a bludger hot on her tail. Harry followed her line of sight, eye catching on the glint of gold, and he leaned forward in his seat. The bludger chasing her was actually doing her a favour; because of it, Cho couldn’t get close, circling her dive awkwardly.

“Yes, yes, go!” Neville muttered at Harry’s side, practically on his feet.

Ginny’s hand clenched around the tiny golden ball, and the Gryffindor stands exploded with noise.

Harry jumped to his feet, shouting and hugging Neville — he didn't mind this part of being in the crowd, getting to celebrate in the huddle of red and gold, watching the team fly a breathless victory lap. It hurt, not being with them, but there was always next year for him.

Angelina and Alicia took an extra lap, just the two of them, bidding goodbye to the pitch they had loved for the last seven years. More than just Gryffindors cheered for them, and Harry whistled loudly, whooping. They were joined by Roger Davies, who would also be graduating in a few weeks, and the three of them flew together before heading back down, tumbling to the grass in a tight embrace. Roger had a few words with Angelina, then shook her hand and went back to his team, who patted him on the back all the same.

It took a while to file out of the stands, and Harry and Neville headed up to the castle with Parvati and Lavender, all four of them beaming.

"Did you see Umbridge's face?" Lavender crowed in delight. The headmistress had looked outraged that even banning three players couldn't stop the Gryffindor team from winning. Harry thought he'd seen Colin take a picture of the expression, and he made a mental note to hunt the fourth year down and see about getting a copy to send to Fred and George.

Speaking of Fred and George... "You guys head up," Harry urged once they hit the Entrance Hall. "I've got to go sort something first."

Neville eyed him shrewdly, but let it lie, walking with the girls towards the stairs. Harry turned in the direction of the corridor to the kitchens.

The twins were usually responsible for the epic feasts present at Gryffindor victory parties, and Harry had to step up in their absence. Luckily, Dobby was more than happy to help.

"We is taking care of it!" the elf promised with an enthusiastic salute. Several other elves grinned up at Harry, hurrying to fill a picnic basket with enough food to feed an army.

"Brilliant, thank you all so much. Can you just go ahead and send it up to the Tower?" Harry had another stop to make.

Hugging Dobby goodbye, Harry continued on his way, sneaking through the one-eyed witch and down to Hogsmeade. Madame Rosmerta only look half surprised to see him, raising one amused eyebrow. "Gryffindor won, then?" she presumed, and Harry nodded.

"I'll take as much as you're willing to give me," he declared, setting a stack of galleons down on the table. The barmaid laughed.

"It was getting far too quiet without those Weasley boys around," she declared, levitating a crate of butterbeer with her wand. "Glad you're picking up their legacy, Mr Potter."

Harry shrunk the crate and put it carefully in his pocket, then disappeared again, racing through Honeydukes' cellar and back to the castle.

By the time he reached the Tower, the party was well underway, though the quidditch team hadn't arrived. Someone had hung one of the 'Go Go Gryffindor' banners up on the wall, and the picnic basket had been unpacked onto a conjured table.

A round of cheers went up when Harry revealed his purchase, enlarging the butterbeer crate and setting it in the usual place, grabbing a finger sandwich off the table.

“I don’t want to know how you managed that, do I?” Neville asked wryly, accepting a bottle. Harry beamed at him.

“Ask me no questions—“

“You’ll tell me no lies, right, yeah,” Neville finished, rolling his eyes.

The portrait hole opened, and a roar of cheering filled the room as the quidditch team entered, wearing Gryffindor house hoodies and beaming widely. Harry whooped, grinning when he met Angelina’s eyes — he was so glad she could experience winning the cup one last time.

Ginny was striding towards them, a determined glint in her eye, and Harry was about to ask what the matter was when she stepped up to Neville, grabbed him by the shoulders, and pulled him down into a kiss.

Neville froze only for a moment, before his arms wrapped tight around the redhead, butterbeer bottle still in his hand as he kissed back like there was no tomorrow. Harry laughed, wolf-whistling loudly, and another round of cheers filled the room along with several cat-calls and more whistling.

Across the room, Harry could see a red-faced Ron gearing up to head over, only for Hermione to grab him by the arm and begin yelling at him. Good. Ginny and Neville deserved this moment.

When they finally surfaced for air, both of them were grinning like loons, and Harry clapped them both on the shoulders like a proud parent. “About fucking time, I say!” he declared vehemently, making them both blush.

“I, uh— we’re gonna go talk. Somewhere quieter,” Neville told him, his cheeks as red as the Gryffindor banner, but his hand still firmly clasped in Ginny’s.

“No worries. Here, take these with you.” He handed Ginny a butterbeer, and Neville a napkin stacked with chocolate chip scones. “They might all be gone by the time you get back. Also, fantastic catch, Ginny,” he complimented, making the girl beam wider.

“Thanks, Harry! I hope you’re ready to have me at chaser try-outs next year!”

He pat her on the back, then ruffled her hair. “You’re on. Now get out of here, lovebirds.”

The only reason neither of them flipped him off was because their hands were full, but Ginny’s glare did the work anyway. Harry watched them go fondly, then looked for the three chaser girls in the crowd, eager to hug the life out of them for their victory — and make Angelina and Alicia cry again, probably.

He might not have played this match, but he would always be part of their team.

....

Listening to his little cousin's increasingly worried report, Sirius frowned; it certainly sounded like things at the Ministry were going downhill fast.

'How long do we think before there's a vote of no confidence?' Bill asked, but Kingsley shook his head.

"There are too many people who are happy to let him keep blundering through," he pointed out. "Something big would have to happen first."

None of them said what they were all thinking; Voldemort would have to rear his ugly head.

It was even more worrying, in Sirius' opinion, that the Dark Lord hadn't made any obvious moves yet, not since the breakout from Azkaban. Either his ten Death Eaters were in worse shape than he'd thought, or he was taking advantage of being presumed dead to work under the radar and get something big in place. The flurry of belief caused by Harry's Quibbler article had been slowly worn down by the lack of activity and the Prophet's continued insistence that it was all lies.

"It's bloody frustrating," Tonks growled, running a hand through his bright orange hair. "There's nothing we can do but sit back and watch more and more departments get headed by obvious Death Eaters, or at least Death Eater sympathisers."

Kingsley squeezed his partner's shoulder. "We can keep the aurors legitimate for as long as possible. Scrimgeour may be a bastard, but he's an honest one."

Sirius remembered Scrimgeour; a senior auror back in the day, gruff and a little too rough with the suspects — a little too keen to accuse people of dark magic. Cut from the same cloth as Alastor Moody, which wasn't ideal, but it was better than a Voldemort lackey in charge.

Tonks sighed, and shook his head. "You're right. As always," he added with a mock annoyed look. Kingsley smirked.

"We should get going. I've got to be at work in an hour."

That seemed to be the cue for all four of them to make their leave, and Sirius started to clear the table from their impromptu lunch meeting. He smiled when a familiar scarred hand picked up one of the plates. "You don't have to be anywhere?" he asked, and Charlie shook his head, sending the dishes into the sink with his wand and reeling Sirius in by the hand.

"Not 'til five," he replied, kissing him slowly.

Sirius still felt giddy, even more than a month into their relationship. After all those months of that in-between stage where he'd been trying to deny things, it felt like he and Charlie had been together for much longer than they had. But this was so much better than the way they were before.

"That's good," he said, leaning into Charlie's embrace, relishing in how warm the dragon-tamer always was. Sirius hardly ever felt cold these days, thanks to him. "Want to come read in my room for a bit?"

"Read, or read?" Charlie asked, wiggling his eyebrows. Sirius snorted.

"Actually read," he clarified. "I'm... I could use some company, today."

"I'm all yours," Charlie promised, kissing his cheek, entirely unaware of the way that made Sirius' heart skip with joy.

They cleaned up the kitchen, then wandered up to Sirius' room, shedding their jeans and shirts before climbing into bed in just their underwear. There were two books on the nightstand, and Charlie's long arm reached for them, passing one to Sirius.

Sirius wasn't sure he'd ever get used to being freely allowed so much skin-on-skin contact. Charlie was happy to be naked, or close to it, even if they weren't going to be doing anything sexual. He would lie there and read with Sirius in his arms, one hand stroking the animagus' chest and belly gently, like he was petting Padfoot rather than the very human Sirius. It was the best feeling in the world.

"Hey, can I tell you a secret?" Charlie said, once they'd been reading in silence for a little while. Sirius hummed, setting his book down.

"What's up?"

Charlie nosed his temple, hand on Sirius' stomach pausing in its motions. "Bill wants to ask Fleur to marry him."

"Really?" Sirius grinned. "That's brilliant!" He had never met the French witch, but from everything he'd heard about her from both the Weasleys and Harry, she was a spitfire, and perfect for Bill. "That is brilliant, isn't it?"

"Yeah, no, she's great, I'd love to have her in the family," Charlie assured quickly. "But they want a longer engagement, since they've only been together a year or so. So he's thinking he's gonna ask her to marry him, and then if she says yes, she'll move in to his flat with him. Gringotts don't care about cohabiting before marriage or whatever."

Sirius now understood Charlie's dilemma. "And you don't want to third wheel your big brother and his future spouse?" he finished knowingly. Charlie nodded.

"He's said I can stay as long as I like, and it's not like Fleur would really mind. But... they should have their privacy, y'know. To figure out how to live together as a couple before they get married, without me being there." Charlie sighed. "I'm fine with moving into reserve housing, I suppose. It'll just be a pain in the arse to travel to and from because of the wards."

Sirius knew the wards on the dragon reserve were incredibly tight, with limited and designated access points, to make sure none of the dragons got out — and no one got in to the dragons who wasn't authorised.

"Why don't you move in here?" he suggested without really thinking. He felt Charlie tense. "I'm serious," Sirius continued, the idea sounding better and better the more it rattled around his head. “It’s safe, you’re right here for Order meetings, and you can come and go as you please. And, y’know, I’m here too.” He felt a flutter in his belly at the idea of having Charlie warm and heavy in his bed every night.

He felt lips curve into a smile against his temple. “Six weeks ago you wouldn’t even admit you liked me,” the redhead pointed out.

“Six weeks ago I was an idiot,” Sirius retorted. He turned, shuffling on Charlie’s broad chest to look his boyfriend in the eye. “If you don’t want to, forget I asked. Or if you want to move in to one of the guest rooms, that’s totally fine. I’m not gonna tie you to my bed,” he teased, watching blue eyes light up playfully.

“Shame,” Charlie drawled.

“It just seems stupid for you to get a flat at the reserve when you’re always either here or at Bill’s when you’re not at work,” Sirius pointed out. “And I know you hate living alone.”

He had different reasons than Sirius, but as one of seven children he had confided in Sirius that being in any empty house felt unnerving. He’d had two housemates back in Romania, the three of them living in a little two-bed cabin on the reserve.

Charlie let out a long breath. “Are you sure?” he asked worriedly. “I don’t want to rush things. I don’t want to overwhelm you.”

“I’d love to have you around all the time.” Sirius couldn’t think of anything better, in all honesty, except perhaps having Harry home. Charlie was the perfect companion; he knew when to be quiet and read versus when Sirius needed conversation and laughter and music; he was happy to give Sirius his space when he wanted, but always seemed to know when the animagus was slipping into dark thoughts; and, Sirius thought with a blush, he was an incredible lover, which certainly didn’t harm things.

He set his book properly aside and leaned up, cupping Charlie’s face. “I know I took a while to come around to this,” he said softly, “but it’s not because I don’t care about you.” If anything it was because he cared too much, he wanted Charlie to have better than some fucked up ex-convict. “I don’t think having you move in will overwhelm me. Except in the good ways,” he said, winking. “Hell, it’s a big enough house; if I need to avoid you, I can do so.”

Charlie snickered, and then he was rolling them over, trapping Sirius tenderly against the mattress. “You’re not wrong,” he mused. Sirius hummed absently — it was always a little harder to think with Charlie’s weight on top of him, his brain turning into a happy puddle of goo. Sometimes he thought Charlie did it just to get an honest answer out of him while he didn’t have the brain cells to lie. “You really want me to move in here?”

“I really do,” Sirius assured, eyes falling half-shut. “Want you here, all the time.” He clenched his jaw shut before he said something foolish. Charlie kissed the corner of his mouth.

"Okay, then. When Bill proposes, and Fleur says yes, I'll move my stuff over here." There was no doubt in Charlie's voice that the French girl would accept the proposal. "You do know that me moving in here means my parents will probably find out eventually," the redhead added. Sirius groaned quietly. "I mean, we could try and fool them, but we'd probably slip up eventually..."

"Fuck it," Sirius murmured. "Let them find out. I don't care. Give Molly another reason to hate me."

"Mum doesn't hate you," Charlie said, and Sirius snorted.

"She does," he insisted. "Thinks I'm a reprobate. It'll be worse when she finds out I'm fucking her son." He grinned at the prospect.

"Okay, I need you clear-headed," Charlie declared, and with another quick kiss he rolled off of Sirius, leaving the older man pouting. "Do you mean it? Not about Mum hating you. About you not minding if her and Dad know."

Sirius did his best to look serious, sitting up. "They'll find out sooner or later. It's going to be an argument whether it's now or six months down the line. Might as well get it over with." He grinned ruefully. "You spent this long wearing me down, it's not like an argument with your parents will be enough to break us." He wouldn't have given in if he wasn't at least hoping for the long haul. "I just want to tell Harry first," he added, frowning. "I don't want him thinking I'm keeping secrets."

Charlie's eyes were bright, sparkling in the lamplight. "Of course, yeah," he agreed. The dimples were back, and this time Sirius didn't resist reaching for them, slotting his thumbs into the little divots. Charlie laughed, surging up for a kiss.

"I'm so happy you said yes," he sighed. "Sometimes I still can't believe it."

Guilt wormed its way through Sirius' gut. "I'm sorry I made you wait so long."

"Worth it," Charlie insisted without hesitation. Sirius stole another kiss, leaning over the redhead, wondering how he got so fucking lucky that someone like Charlie Weasley was willing to even give him the time of day.

"You need to leave for work soon," he said, looking at the clock on the wall. "Let me suck you off before you go?"

Charlie's eyes darkened with lust.

"An offer like that? How can I refuse."

Yes, Sirius would definitely like having Charlie in the house all the time.

Chapter 70

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Looking around the Chamber of Secrets at the gathered teenagers casting spells with increasing fervour, Harry was quietly glad that this was the last time he'd have to do it. Teaching had been fun, but trying to sneak everyone in and out of the Chamber once a week was exhausting; there was so much more at stake if he got caught with that, than there had been with the Room of Requirements. But exams were almost upon them, so they were holding one last session, just to cover anything anyone was alarmed about.

Harry let it go on until about half an hour before curfew, then wound everything down, wanting to make sure everyone had plenty of time to make it back to their common rooms safely.

“Before we all go,” he said, rummaging through his bag, “I just wanted to let you know that I’m going to burn the contract.” He pulled it out, holding it up for them all to see. Several people gasped.

“What? Why?”

“The last thing I want is any of you getting asked about learning a spell during your exam, and accidentally triggering the contract, wiping your memories in the middle of your practical,” Harry pointed out. Many faces went green at the prospect. “If I burn it, the magic is ended. I think by now I can trust all of you not to say anything.” With any luck, by the summer it wouldn’t matter.

Then, he smirked. “Besides,” he added, “if any of you did tell someone that I was sneaking you into the Chamber of Secrets to practice spells, they’d never believe you.”

Laughs rang out, which turned into a cheer as Harry lit the contract on fire, the parchment turning to ash in front of him. “No matter what happens in your exams, I’m proud of each and every one of you,” he declared firmly. “And I dearly hope you never have to use what you’ve learned this year in the real world, but… I’m glad you know it, just in case.”

Embarrassingly, Ginny started up a cheer for Harry, thanking him for teaching them in the first place. He blushed, hurrying over to open the passage that would take them back up to the library. “Let’s just get out of here,” he muttered bashfully.

Safely back in Gryffindor Tower, Harry made his excuses and headed up to his dorm, intending to call Sirius. He hadn’t spoken to his godfather in a little while, and probably wouldn’t get the chance much once exams began.

“Hey, Padfoot,” he greeted, and Sirius grinned back.

“Hi pup. How are you doing? All ready for exams?”

"I think so." He had a few things he wanted to go over, but for the most part he was confident. "I'm going to go over Runes and Arithmancy with Draco at the weekend, just to check I'm up to standard." Remus and Sirius had taught him well, but it had also been twenty years since they had taken their exams, and Harry wanted to be absolutely sure he hadn't missed anything on the curriculum.

"Good lad," Sirius approved, then smirked. "Just don't get too side-tracked, yeah?" he wiggled his eyebrows, but Harry just rolled his eyes.

"As if Draco would let me. He's in study-mode now, it's all business." There was a touch of annoyance to his tone, but he couldn't help it; his boyfriend wouldn't let anything more than light kissing happen, not wanting to be distracted so close to such important exams.

Though he had promised something great to make it up to Harry, after. But Sirius didn't need to know that.

They chatted a little about inconsequential things, and Harry slowly began to notice that his godfather seemed... out of sorts. "Is everything alright, Sirius?"

Sirius blinked like a deer in headlights. "What? Yeah, yeah. I just... I need to tell you something, actually."

Cold fear gripped Harry. "Who's been hurt? Is it Voldemort?"

Sirius' eyes widened. "What? No! Nothing like that," he assured quickly, and Harry slumped in relief. "Probably should've prefaced that it's nothing life-threatening or alarming."

"Yeah, probably," Harry agreed, trying to calm his racing heart. "What's up, then?"

Sirius bit his lip, and Harry watched him, perplexed. What was happening that was so difficult to say?

"Well, see, it's like this," Sirius began haltingly. "You might hear something, from someone else, and I want to make sure you know before any... rumours might get to you. Because I'm not trying to keep secrets. I just—you've had a lot on your plate lately, and I didn't want to add to that with my drama, mundane though it may be. But things are changing and I just don't want you thinking I was trying to hide it from you."

"Padfoot, just spit it out," Harry urged, wondering what could have his godfather so tied up in knots.

"I'm dating Charlie," came the blurted response. Harry blinked. And blinked again.

"Charlie Weasley?" he echoed. Sirius nodded. "Oh. Wow. Okay, then." That was unexpected. "And that's... a new thing, then?"

"Sort-of. Not really. It's complicated." Sirius ran a hand through his hair. "But for various secret reasons I'm not allowed to tell you yet, he might end up moving in with me here at Grimmauld, which means Molly will probably find out soon, and I wanted you to know before she does.” He grimaced ruefully. “So that when you start to hear about how I’ve corrupted and defiled her precious baby boy, you know what it’s about.”

“God, yeah, that is not going to be pretty when she hears about it,” Harry said with a wince. “But he’s at the stage of moving in already?” How long had that been going on?

Harry raked back through his memories over Christmas, and suddenly certain things were making a whole lot more sense. “How—I mean, you say complicated… you’re happy, right?”

The blinding force of Sirius’ grin was like a punch to the chest. “So happy, pup,” he assured. “Charlie… he’s brilliant, really.”

“Yeah, Charlie’s great.” Harry liked the dragon tamer a lot. He just hadn’t expected the redhead to start dating his godfather. “Blimey, if only I’d known this would happen when I asked him to keep an eye on you,” he muttered to himself.

Then again, thinking back to Bill’s reaction to such a request, perhaps Harry should have known, even then.

“What?”

“Nothing,” Harry dismissed. “You know I’m going to want the full story, right? All the complicated bits and everything.” Then he paused, making a face. “But, uh, none of the corruption and defiling, please, if you don’t mind.” He might have had a tiny fleeting crush on Charlie once, and Sirius was attractive enough, but they were family and Harry did not need those mental images, thank you very much.

Sirius’ cheeks pinked, though he was still grinning. “I’ll tell you all about it after your exams,” he promised.

“Deal.” Then Harry smirked, every bit a Marauder. “You’re in for so much teasing. After all the shit you gave me about Draco.”

“But pup! I’m your godfather!” Sirius yelped indignantly, making Harry laugh.

“Exactly; godson’s prerogative to be a little shit,” he retorted in glee. “Especially since it’s Charlie. Got yourself a handsome boy-toy, haven’t you?”

The blush on Sirius’ face flared brighter. “You think my boyfriend’s handsome?” he returned instead. Harry raised an eyebrow.

“I have eyes,” he pointed out dryly. “And it is very weird to hear you call Charlie your boyfriend. But in a good way!” he added hastily, when Sirius’ face began to fall. “It’s good. A surprise, but good. I… you didn’t seem like you wanted to date again, for a long time.” Every time Harry had brought it up, even jokingly, Sirius had changed the subject.

The animagus let out a slow breath. “I didn’t, really. S’why it got complicated. And why it took so long to figure things out. But I’m glad Charlie talked me round.”

Harry was so very desperate to hear that whole story, but Sirius was right; they didn't have time for that right now.

"Well I'm happy for you," he declared, grinning. "And Charlie. I'll be happier when I'm home and get to tease you both, but this'll do for now." He winked, and Sirius barked out a laugh. "Will he come home with us? To Seren Du?" Would Harry even get to go to Seren Du this summer, or would he be sent straight to Grimmauld?

Sirius ran a hand through his hair, shrugging. "Honestly, pup, fuck knows what's happening this summer. We'll get there when we get there. But considering Molly might be ready to murder me once she finds out, I'd say there's a high chance of Charlie coming to Seren Du with us."

"Fair point," Harry agreed with a smirk. "Well, the more the merrier." Having Charlie around would be great. He would finally have someone who could fly seeker against him, other than Draco's birthday visits.

Besides; anyone who could put that smile on Sirius' face was someone Harry wanted around as much as possible.

.-. .

Finally, the time had come.

OWLS were upon them.

Harry largely kept to himself in the few days before; everyone was stressed out enormously, liable to snap at the slightest provocation, especially in Gryffindor with all those volatile tempers. Hermione was known to start hexing anyone who interrupted her revision time — when she wasn't busy confiscating every fake brain elixir and concentration booster making its way around the school.

Harry wondered why Umbridge seemed to care so much about reading mail in search of Dumbledore, but didn't seem to give a shit about people sneaking in banned substances prior to the exams. Clearly the Ministry's priorities were incredibly narrow.

On Sunday afternoon the examiners arrived. There was only a small handful of them; Harry had expected more, considering they had both OWL and NEWT students to examine. But, he supposed, students dropped quite a few subjects at NEWT level usually, so there were fewer to examine individually. The scheduling seemed a bit brutal to Harry, but who was he to judge? As long as he got to take his exams, he would be happy.

"You ready for this, then?" he asked Neville on Monday morning, as they forced themselves to eat as much breakfast as they could manage. Neville shrugged.

"Have to be, don't we?" he pointed out wryly. "I think I'm alright, though." Since getting his new wand, Neville's spellcasting had improved in leaps and bounds, and Harry was glad to see his friend's confidence rising. He hoped exam results would show Neville that he wasn't nearly as incapable as he thought he was.

"Good luck, boys," Ginny said, once it was time for her to go to class. She kissed Harry's cheek, then kissed Neville properly on the lips, leaving him flushed and smiling. "You'll do great."

"Thanks, Gin," Harry replied, since Neville seemed a bit too dazed to form words. The pair had been an official couple since the quidditch match, and were still firmly in the honeymoon phase, all starry-eyed at each other and holding hands whenever they could. It was adorable, and Harry wondered if half the reason they were so sappy was because the twins were no longer around to tease Ginny about it all.

Either way, he was glad to see them happy together, after so long dancing around and crossing wires so painfully.

The fifth and seventh years were booted out to wait in the Entrance Hall while the Great Hall was adjusted for exams, and then finally they were being sent into the hall to take their Charms exams, directed to single desks each marked with a name in alphabetical order. Harry gave Neville a fleeting squeeze on the shoulder, then moved to sit at his desk between Sally-Anne Perks and Oliver Rivers from Hufflepuff. All the seventh years were at the back of the hall with their NEWT papers.

As he waited, watching the examiners stroll the aisles to double check no one was trying to hide any contraband, Harry was struck with the sudden fear that he had forgotten everything he had ever learned in Charms.

Then he was given permission to turn over his paper, and skimmed his eyes over the first few questions. He grinned to himself.

Yeah, this wasn't so bad.

..

The Charms practical in the afternoon went as smoothly as he thought the theory had gone in the morning; they were called up in groups of four and sent to the nearest available examiner, which meant that as Harry was starting his exam, Draco was just finishing his own. Harry tried not to watch him too hard, but he still had pride welling in his chest as Draco offered a small bow to Professor Marchbanks, who congratulated him on his performance.

"I think the rest will be less scary, now we know what they're like," Neville said to Ginny that evening in the common room, while all the fifth and seventh years were gathered trying to cram as much last-minute Transfiguration knowledge into their heads as possible. It was a point of pride for Gryffindor house, being their housemistress' subject, and no one wanted to let her down by doing anything less than their best. Some of the fourth and sixth years with friends or partners taking exams, like Ginny, had volunteered themselves to be quizmasters, shooting off questions from textbooks or hand-written revision cards.

On Wednesday it was Neville's time to shine with their Herbology exams, and as they were waiting in the Entrance Hall before the written exam the Gryffindor boy was being peppered with questions from students of all houses — and even a few of the NEWT students, too.

Harry imagined it was something of a relief for the blond boy when they were called in to sit at their desks.

Then he got to see exactly what it was like for Neville the next day, because it was time for Defence Against the Dark Arts.

“Harry, remind me which spells can’t be blocked by Protego?”

“Help, I’ve forgotten all the things you need to subdue a redcap!”

“Can you go over the counter to the Jelly-Legs jinx one more time, Harry?”

He almost shouted in joy when the doors opened and they immediately went silent, filing into the hall. Harry did his best to offer a reassuring look to every member of the HA — they all knew their stuff. They would be fine.

He hoped.

He himself breezed through the paper, enjoying going into more detail on some subjects than the examiners would likely expect. When he dared glance around the hall, he saw plenty of his friends looking calm and focused as they wrote furiously — and Hermione Granger biting her fingernails, already having twice requested extra parchment, as she had in both the previous exams as well. Was she even making it to the end of the questions, over-answering like that? It would be interesting to see her results.

It was the DADA practical he was actually looking forward to; as much as a person could look forward to an exam, at least. The proud feeling returned as he watched both Parvati and Padma perform exemplary Stunning and Disarming charms in their exams, and as Harry went through each spell as instructed, he could see Professor Tofty’s bushy eyebrows rise higher and higher, clearly impressed.

It was even better to see Umbridge watching with thinly-veiled anger as the students she’d kept from performing magic all year showed off all those spells with the accuracy of clear practice.

“Well done, Mr Potter!” Tofty crowed in delight. “Now, that’s everything I need to see from you... however,” he leaned in a little closer, “I have heard among the rumour mill that you, Mr Potter, can produce a Patronus. Perhaps, for a bonus point...?” He trailed off hopefully, and Harry grinned, raising his wand.

“Expecto Patronum!”

Everyone in the room halted in astonishment as the huge silver stag galloped around the room. Other members of the HA might be able to do a Patronus as well, but none of them were as solid and impressive as Harry’s — and none of them would likely be asked to perform it in their exam.

If looks could kill, Harry would be dead from the glare Umbridge sent his way. He made sure to smile extra wide at her on his way out.

..

Friday's exam day was the one Harry had been quietly anticipating; the Ancient Runes exam. There was just the one written exam, with no practical; the afternoon would be taken up by the Muggle Studies exam.

All the students who had not chosen Runes as an elective eagerly left the hall at breakfast, keen to get in a day of relaxation — or of more revision for the exams to come. Harry waited with the small group of Runes students, hands in his pockets as he mentally went over his notes.

It took several minutes for Hermione to notice him. "Harry, what are you doing?" she asked, and he shrugged.

"Waiting for the exam?"

"But you don't take Ancient Runes," she said rudely. Harry nodded.

"I know. I've self-studied."

The very concept seemed to outrage the girl, and just as she was gearing up for what would no doubt be a very impressive rant, the door opened. Hermione wheeled around instantly. "Professor Marchbanks!" she called. "Harry says he's taking the exam but he's not in Ancient Runes class, he can't do that! You must tell him he's got it wrong."

Professor Marchbanks frowned faintly, then looked down at the parchment in her hand, one gnarled finger trailing down the list of names. "Potter...Potter... yes, there he is! Potter, Harry. He registered his intent with the Ministry, young lady. He's as much of a right to this exam as you do. Come on, in you go, all of you!"

"But—but—that's not fair! He isn't in the class!"

No one listened to Hermione's protests, filing past her to enter the hall. As Harry walked past, she grabbed his sleeve. "You're going to fail, Harry. You shouldn't do this. It'll look bad on your record."

"I think that's my problem, not yours, don't you?" he replied neutrally, tugging his sleeve free and carrying on to his desk.

It was incredibly satisfying watching Hermione try and look back at him without getting scolded by the examiners, as if she expected to see him staring blankly at his paper or having a breakdown over all the things he didn't know. On the contrary, Harry was fairly confident with how he did in the exam; between Remus and all his friends helping him — and Draco, of course — Harry faced no surprises in the paper.

Hermione was probably going to regret paying more attention to his progress than her own, though.

He left the exam with a smile on his face, which widened when Hermione just glared at him and stormed off. "Oh, you have upset her, haven't you?" Blaise remarked in amusement as he and Daphne appeared at Harry's side. "You'd think in all her supreme knowledge she'd have learned it's fairly common for students to self-study for elective exams."

Harry knew there were at least ten muggleborn and muggle-raised students signed up for the Muggle Studies exam just for an easy O, despite never having taken the class. He had thought about it himself, but ultimately couldn't be bothered.

"One day she'll realise that she can only control her own education, not everyone else's," Harry said. Daphne laughed.

"She hasn't even been controlling her own very well. You should've seen her in her Defence practical; some of the shakiest wandwork I've seen in ages."

Harry did feel the tiniest pang of regret, but he forced it away; it wasn't his fault Hermione wasn't trustworthy enough to invite to the HA. It wasn't his responsibility to educate all his yearmates. She was perfectly capable of practicing the spells in secret, just like everyone else in the school; not only the ones Harry was teaching. But Hermione had always been more capable with the theory than the practical. Spells — especially combat spells — were often about intuition, and she struggled with that sort of fluidity that didn't come out of a textbook.

His thoughts were interrupted by Luna skipping towards them, rocking up on her toes to press a kiss to Daphne's lips. "Your exams went well." It was a statement, not a question, and Daphne smiled — at least, the closest she got to smiling in public.

"Did they? Oh, good."

In Luna's wake came Ginny and Neville, holding hands. "Great, you're all done, I'm starving," Ginny declared, nudging Harry towards the doors as they reopened, the hall set for lunch once more.

With Umbridge's stupid Educational Decree in place they couldn't all sit together, so they bid goodbye to their Slytherin friends and found a spot where Luna could sit at Ravenclaw and still be within conversation distance of the Gryffindors at their own table.

"I'm not letting you spend all weekend with your head buried in Potions books, Nev," Ginny insisted, happily scooting up the table to make room for Parvati and Lavender on her other side.

"Oh, Neville, don't torture yourself like that," Parvati agreed. "Your brain needs to rest."

"We'll be doing a bit of Divination revision tomorrow afternoon, though, if you both want to join us."

"That would be perfect, thanks," Harry said. It was solely down to the two girls that he thought he might actually get a decent passing grade in the subject.

Harry did do some revision over the weekend, though he wasn't hitting the books quite as hard as some. Incredibly, he managed to persuade Draco to sneak away with him to the Chamber on Sunday morning, cuddling up to the blond on their conjured sofa.

“If you don’t know it now, you never will,” he insisted, wandlessly banishing Draco’s Arithmancy book across the room.

“Easy for you to say, Mr Powerhouse,” Draco groused, watching after his book. Harry smirked, kissing him chastely.

“You’re the brainbox of the two of us and we both know it. I’ve just got enough raw magic to get away with being sloppy.” Draco raised an eyebrow.

“I’m sorry, but if you’re trying to call me a nerd I will have to insist on holding up a mirror,” he retorted. “You started doing Rune circles for fun the other week.”

“It was more fun than memorising Potion ingredients!” Harry retorted. Then he shook his head. “Look, never mind; I don’t want to spend the next hour arguing with you.” As much as they both usually enjoyed arguing. “Come on, lie down with me. You haven’t been sleeping,” he accused knowingly. He could see the dark circles beneath Draco’s eyes, no matter how many face creams and glamour charms the Slytherin used.

“I’m fine,” Draco insisted, though he let Harry manhandle him to lie down on the sofa, the blond cradled between Harry’s body and the back cushions. “I just... I really need to do well in these exams.”

“You will,” Harry assured, kissing his temple, tangling their legs together. “You’ll do brilliantly. Your mum will be prouder than ever, and your father can go fuck himself regardless.”

Draco snorted, arching his neck for a kiss. “No manners in you,” he teased, making Harry grin.

“None at all,” he agreed. “But I’m right and we both know it. So just relax, take a nap with me. I’ve got an alarm on my wand to wake us for lunch.”

“Hmm,” Draco murmured, though Harry could already feel him relaxing, inch by inch. “I suppose we can take a short break. I have all afternoon to study with Theo and the girls, after all.”

“Exactly.” Harry tucked his face into the warm hollow of Draco’s neck, inhaling the faintly spicy scent of the boy’s aftershave. Not that Draco needed to shave all that often, with such a baby-face and his pale blond hair. Not like Harry, whose chin-fuzz now needed taming at least three times a week to avoid embarrassingly patchy scruff all over his jaw.

“Do you know what you’re doing for the summer yet?” Draco asked quietly. Harry hummed.

“Not a clue.” They were mostly waiting to see what happened with Dumbledore and the Ministry. “You? Have you convinced your mum to move to Seren Du yet?”

“I wrote to her, but Umbridge is screening even our mail these days,” Draco sighed. “I’ll try again when I get home.” His hand moved up to tangle in Harry’s hair, stroking gently at the base of his skull. “It might be too dangerous to split so publicly from Father like that.”

“No more dangerous than living with the fucking Dark Lord in your house,” Harry pointed out. “Besides, with any luck I’ll be at Seren Du, too. Don’t you want to spend your summer with me?”

“That is a tempting prospect,” Draco agreed. He turned his head ever so slightly, lips brushing Harry’s head. “I’ll try, that’s all I can promise.”

Harry made a vague noise of agreement; his mind was already on the prospect of having his boyfriend live with him all summer. Playing quidditch together, swimming in the pool together... and all those hidden little corners of the manor they could use to escape their guardians and get up to fun things. Not that he thought any of their guardians would truly mind them getting up to anything in their bedrooms, after dating for so long. No one could become pregnant by accident, after all.

Harry’s belly warmed at the thought of being with Draco in that way; they hadn’t gone so far yet, happy getting more familiar with just their hands and mouths — but fingers had been wandering in that direction more and more, and maybe with a whole summer ahead of them they would have the time to... explore.

“Whatever you’re thinking about, stop it,” Draco drawled, amused. “I can feel you getting hard — this is supposed to be nap time, you randy bastard.”

“Sorry,” Harry replied unrepentantly, kissing Draco’s neck. “Saving it all for after exams, yeah?” It was getting a bit frustrating, having to masturbate every night after his stupid teenage libido got wound up just watching Draco across the Great Hall, but if Draco needed no sex to focus on his exams, then Harry would oblige.

“Hmm.” Draco sounded considering. “I suppose we are halfway through... and it is supposed to be good for stress relief.”

Harry tried not to get his hopes up, but the blood rapidly heading south had other ideas. Draco’s hand trailed down to his backside, squeezing. “Go on, then,” he relented, already shifting, and suddenly Harry could feel Draco’s erection too. “Shame we’ve already done our Transfiguration exam,” the Slytherin murmured, meeting Harry in a kiss. “This would be great practice for Vanishing spells.”

Harry smirked, grabbed his wand, and with a short movement they were both entirely naked. “Let’s call it early practice for NEWTs.”

Draco laughed, which rapidly turned into a moan, the sound shooting straight to Harry’s cock.

Yes, this was exactly what they both needed to get them through their exams.

.-.-.-.

Walking out of his Potions practical exam, Harry silently made a note to buy an enormous amount of chocolate for Remus Lupin at his next earliest convenience. If the werewolf had not been in love with Snape, then Snape would not have been so willing to tutor Harry in the summers, and Harry would not have done nearly as well as he thought he had. He could get a present for Snape, of course, but he had already given the man the remains of a sixty-foot basilisk and free access to Salazar Slytherin's private library. Those counted as a pre-emptive thanks for the O he thought he had maybe achieved.

He hoped he had. He wanted Snape to be proud of him, to see that his efforts with Harry had not gone to waste.

"And now I never have to study Potions again," Neville declared joyfully, and Harry laughed.

"Congrats!" He clapped his friend on the back. "Bet you passed, though." Neville had started improving in Potions when he learned to look at it from a Herbology perspective. And he didn't make nearly as many mistakes when Snape wasn't in the room.

"To be honest, I could've gotten a Troll and I wouldn't care at this point. I'm just glad it's over."

Tuesday's Care of Magical Creatures exam was one that just about every student was determined to do well in, if only to spite Umbridge. She would just love to see all of Hagrid's students fail, and they weren't going to give her the satisfaction.

Wednesday was the toughest exam day yet for Harry; Divination in the morning, Arithmancy in the afternoon, and then at night they had their Astronomy exam.

He added Parvati and Lavender to the 'must buy chocolate for' list; the Divination exam was much less gruelling than he'd expected, and he knew it was down to them.

"Thank you, both of you," he said emphatically at lunch, and they giggled.

"It's what friends are for," Parvati insisted. "I'm pretty sure I would've barely scraped an A in Defence without you, so we'll call it even."

Harry was still going to buy them something nice.

The crowd waiting for the Arithmancy exam after lunch was much smaller than average, with few students willing to take such a complex elective, and as such Hermione spotted Harry almost immediately.

"No," she declared flatly, staring at him. "You— you can't. This is Arithmancy!"

Hermione was the only Gryffindor fifth year taking Arithmancy classes, and all weekend she had been biting off peoples' heads for suggesting that the toughest exams were out of the way, because of course Arithmancy was going to be impossible.

"Self-study," Harry explained with a shrug, hiding his smile behind a neutral facade.

"Leave it, Granger," Anthony Goldstein cut in, rolling his eyes. "If Potter wants to fail exams, it's none of your business." But then, when Hermione wasn't looking, he winked in Harry's direction. Anthony, along with Draco, had been Harry's main tutor in the subject during school time, and he had told Harry himself he was capable of getting an E at least.

Hermione glared at Harry right up until the examiners let them in, and then glared at Marchbanks when she made no move to eject him from the hall.

Harry desperately hoped he got Os in both Runes and Arithmancy, just to rub it in her self-righteous face.

After dinner, some of the Gryffindors chose to revise for their Astronomy exam, but Harry decided to take a nap instead. Sirius had quizzed him over the weekend — all Blacks did well in Astronomy, apparently, and he would make damned sure Harry did too — so after two difficult exam papers already written he'd much rather get some restful sleep before needing to write another. There were only so many constellation and moon names he could cram into his head.

The whole year group went up to the Astronomy Tower at eleven o'clock, and set up their telescopes ready to observe the cloudless sky. It was a good night for it — a full moon, bathing them in bright silver light.

Had Remus had to take exams on full moon days, he wondered? That sounded awful.

Professor Marchbanks bid them to start, and Harry reached for the blank star chart he was supposed to fill out, carefully angling his telescope.

It was surprisingly peaceful, working away up there with no noise but the rustle of parchment and scratch of quills, the occasional squeak of a telescope being adjusted. Harry thought he was doing quite well with his chart — and then he noticed the light spill onto the lawn, and several long shadows stretch onto the grass.

Ever curious, he couldn't tear himself away from the group of six figures walking across the grounds. He recognised the walk of the leader of the group; the shortest, squattest member of the group. Dread filled his stomach. They were headed to Hagrid's hut.

He tried to focus back on his star chart, which was three quarters of the way finished. He had to fill it, even if he didn't use his extra time to go back and double-check.

He heard a faint knock, and the muffled barking of a dog. He pressed his face closer to his telescope, blocking the sounds from his head, ignoring the light turn on in Hagrid's window.

Suddenly, a loud roar echoed through the night air, and Harry was no longer the only one staring at Hagrid's hut instead of the starry sky.

Tofty and Marchbanks tried to keep them focused on their exams, but even they were astonished when spells began to fly.

"Look!" Parvati squealed, pointing to another dark shadow approaching the chaos from the castle doors.

"How dare you!" the figure yelled, in a familiar Scottish brogue. "How dare you!"

McGonagall scolded the aurors, brandishing her wand — and was cut off mid-sentence by four bright red Stunners hitting her all at once. It blasted her back, illuminating her body for a moment, and then she hit the ground hard and did not move again.

“Galloping gargoyles!” Tofty exclaimed, giving up on the exam entirely. He sounded outraged, and Harry was right there with them, his heart in his throat as he watched Hagrid snap, his huge fists flying. Umbridge kept screaming at the aurors, but they weren’t stupid enough to pick a physical fight with an angry half-giant, and with the unconscious Fang slung over his shoulders, Hagrid sprinted for the gates, and disappeared.

A tense silence fell. No one moved. Then, Tofty coughed. “Um, five minutes left, everyone.”

Harry gave his mostly-full star chart a cursory look over, but his attention was mainly focused on McGonagall’s unconscious form on the grass below. Umbridge walked straight past her, and Harry’s chest burned with hatred for the woman, magic rising in his palms. Oh, the spells he wished to cast on that foul toad.

At least the aurors seemed to have a scrap of decency left — or shame, more likely, as they huddled around McGonagall and carried her back up to the castle.

Marchbanks called time, and Harry handed his star chart over, hurrying down the tower steps.

“Harry, where are you going?” Neville called, hurrying after him. Harry glanced back.

“Hospital Wing,” he replied shortly, not slowing down. He wanted to check Professor McGonagall was alright.

He wanted to check the aurors had actually taken her to get help.

Some other Gryffindors clearly thought he had the right idea; Harry heard several sets of footsteps trailing him. He burst through the Hospital Wing doors, making Madam Pomfrey jump.

“Potter! And— good heavens!” she exclaimed at the small crowd of students in his wake. “It’s half past one in the morning, what are you all doing out of bed?”

“Is Professor McGonagall alright?” Harry asked urgently. “We saw the whole thing. Astronomy exam,” he explained. Pomfrey’s mouth thinned severely.

“She’s stable for now, but I’m calling a transfer to St Mungo’s first thing in the morning if she can handle the move,” she explained. Harry looked past her, seeing one bed with curtains up around it. “Four Stunning spells right to the chest, at her age? She’s lucky it didn’t kill her.”

Harry heard two gasps behind him that sounded like Lavender and Parvati.

“Will she be okay?” he asked, hating how his voice cracked ever so slightly around the lump in his throat. Pomfrey’s expression softened.

“The healers will do everything they can,” she promised. “And Minerva is nothing if not stubborn. There’s plenty of life in her yet, I’d wager.”

It wasn't as reassuring as Harry would have liked.

"What about the aurors?" Ron asked loudly, and Pomfrey's eyes hardened once more.

"Claimed it was self defence, and will not be facing charges," she said tersely.

"But that's codswallop!" Neville blurted.

"You'd best not say such things where our headmistress can hear you, Mr Longbottom," Pomfrey reprimanded. But the look on her face said she agreed with him. "Now, off to bed with you. You've an exam tomorrow, all of you."

There was nothing any of them could do, so the group of morose Gryffindors headed back to their common room.

It turned out the whole fight had been visible from the Tower, too, so the common room was full of people in pyjamas all desperate to know what had happened. They explained the story, finishing with the news that their head of house was in dire condition and being moved to hospital shortly. That sent tempers rising, and it was four in the morning before the common room cleared out.

If Harry were Umbridge, he would be fearing for his life right about now, because a tower full of furious Gryffindors was not a good enemy to have. Just because two year groups had not yet finished their exams did not mean retribution would not come. Ginny certainly had plenty of ideas.

Harry slept through breakfast, taking advantage of Dobby's kindness to have bacon and eggs in his dorm at around ten. He had no desire to face the rest of the school and look at Umbridge's smug face as she explained away Professor McGonagall's absence, like the whole school wasn't aware what really happened. He went down for lunch, though, and at two o'clock he and the other exam candidates filed in to the Great Hall for the final OWL exam; History of Magic.

Harry could tell which students had chosen revision over sleep, just by looking around. Indeed, it seemed cruel to have exams the day after the late night Astronomy exam; shouldn't that have waited until the end?

If Harry had been writing the schedule, he also wouldn't have put the most boring subject at the very end, when all the students were too strung-out to properly care. Or perhaps that was the point; they knew no one really gave a damn about their History of Magic result, so they saved the exam until last so students could blame low grades on burn-out rather than lack of study or interest.

He was definitely one of the students who couldn't give two shits, but he tried his best nonetheless. He wrote everything he could remember, everything he'd tried to pour into his head in study sessions because Binns was utterly useless, but clearly he did not get enough sleep because a drowsy headache began to brew at his temples, blurring his vision.

Gritting his teeth, Harry pushed past it. He just had to get through this one exam, and then he was done. Then he could pass out for a week if he wanted to.

His words came slower, like writing through treacle. All around him the constant scratch of quills began to grate on his sensitive ears, turning into one long discordant hum that made his brain itch. He squeezed his eyes shut, putting his face in his hands for just a moment.

Concentrate, Potter, he thought to himself, trying to visualise the timeline he and Susan had written out together.

His head ached harder. His vision swam, so he closed his eyes again.

And suddenly he was in a long, dark, familiar corridor.

Harry's heart sank. Oh. Of course.

It was about that time of year, after all.

He was a passenger in his own mind as he hurried down the corridor, heading through the door and into the circular room, then through a second door to a room dancing with bright lights. Onwards he went, a destination in mind — rows and rows of glass orbs, but he only needed one.

At the end of the row was a black mass; a figure slumped on the floor. Harry's own arm raising a wand, casting magic that made the man on the floor scream in pain.

A scream Harry knew.

Sirius Black raised his head defiantly, spitting on the ground at Harry's — Voldemort's — feet. Daring the Dark Lord to do his worst. Harry felt the pleasure that drew in Voldemort's chest; he did so enjoy making people scream.

And scream Sirius did, his voice ringing in Harry's ears. But then someone else screamed, too — Harry was screaming, back in his own body, and he returned abruptly as he fell out of his seat and onto the cold stone floor, still screaming, his scar burning.

He gasped in a sharp breath, and realised there was someone stood over him; Professor Tofty, eyeing him in concern.

"I'm fine," Harry rasped, his throat sore from screaming.

"Really, my boy, I must insist you go to the Hospital Wing," the examiner pressed, helping Harry to his feet with surprising strength for such a frail frame. Harry looked around; the exam was ongoing, but everyone was staring at him. How long had he been screaming for? How hard had they tried to snap him out of it?

There had been enough rumours about him floating around the school in the past two years that Harry bet most of them could guess what had just happened, whether they believed it or not. He met Neville's worried gaze, and looked away.

Tofty gently corralled him out to the Entrance Hall, assuring him that exam pressure could happen to anyone, and if he perhaps had a drink of water and a quiet sit down he might be able to go back in just to round off his last answer.

“No, I’ve done all I can, thanks,” Harry assured; his History grade was the last thing on his mind, now. “I think — I’m just going to go back to bed, if that’s alright?”

“Of course, of course! I’ll go collect your examination paper. I do hope you feel better, Mr Potter.” With a pat on the arm, Tofty left him to it, and as soon as the old man was gone Harry was sprinting for the stairs. He had a mirror to check.

Chapter End Notes

This is a mean place to leave you for the weekend, I'm sorry~ :P

Chapter 71

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Gryffindor Tower was silent when Harry entered; those who weren't in the exam were in class, or studying elsewhere. He sprinted straight up to his dormitory, wrenching open his bedside drawer. "Sirius Black!"

The few seconds it took for Sirius to answer the mirror felt like years.

Harry deflated in relief as his godfather's face appeared, frowning at him. "Harry? What's wrong? Shouldn't you be in an exam?"

Immediately, Harry relayed the contents of his vision; a trap, he now realised. A lure to get him to the Ministry. "They don't know I have the mirror," he pointed out. "They think I can't contact you." Voldemort and his lackeys probably thought they were very clever, choosing Harry's most beloved person outside the castle when all communication was monitored. A person who would not be missed, who was supposed to be hidden anyway; a person who was known to be reckless.

"The Order is out at the moment, anyway," Sirius said grimly. "Death Eater raid on a muggle village. Likely intentionally timed, just in case you could get a message to one of them to get to me."

Harry's heart clenched; yes, it had worked out all too well for them. Dumbledore gone, McGonagall unconscious in the hospital, no other Order members nearby.

As usual, their fatal flaw was underestimating Harry Potter.

"What do we do?" he asked, and Sirius' frown deepened.

"What do you mean? The vision was fake, there's nothing to do."

"But they're expecting me," Harry retorted. "They'll be waiting for me. Voldemort will be waiting for me." His brain was working a mile a minute, drawing conclusions that made his blood run cold. "What if they're claiming the Ministry, tonight?" It had been coming for a while, they all knew it. "Killing two birds with one stone. Distracting the Order with the raid, getting me in to take the Prophecy — then they'll kill me, take the Ministry, and they've won."

"All the more reason for you to leave well alone!"

"But I can stop them!" Harry urged. "At least long enough for the Order to show up. Long enough for the Ministry to bring back-up and finally see what's been in front of their faces the whole time!" Unless it was too late, unless the Death Eaters had killed everyone and were just waiting for Harry, but surely the Order would have heard if such bloodshed had happened.

“You’re fifteen,” Sirius started, but Harry cut him off.

“You’ve been training me for things exactly like this. And I can take back-up of my own.” If any of his friends were willing to go with him, willing to risk their lives like that. “I can feel it, Sirius. He’s so... determined.” The emotions bleeding through Harry’s scar were far too intense to just be about the prophecy. “If we don’t go and stop them tonight, they’ll have taken the Ministry by morning.” Fudge was weaker than ever these days, and the auror department wasn’t much better. It was nearly five in the afternoon, the Ministry would soon be empty for the evening, and then the Death Eaters would come.

“Leave it to the Order!”

“The Order is busy, you said it yourself,” Harry protested.

“You better not be doing this just because you want to hear that bloody Prophecy for yourself,” Sirius growled, and Harry glared at him.

“It’s not that. I don’t need the Prophecy, I’m stuck in this mess regardless.” Unless it gave detailed instructions on how to find and destroy all of Voldemort’s horcruxes, Harry didn’t care, and if it did Dumbledore would have gone and done it already himself. “Please, Sirius. We can’t let them take the Ministry. It’ll be all over if they do.” Even if the rest of magical Britain were against the Dark, only a small fraction of them would actually be brave enough to do anything, and if Voldemort had the whole legal system behind him he could silence any protesters easily. He had already proven he was happy to Imperius as many people as it took to get the job done.

Harry could see by the look on his godfather’s face that Sirius knew he was right.

“I’ll try and raise the alarm with the Order,” he said eventually. “We’ve got time. Any luck, they’ll be back before you can get to London.”

If the raid was meant to keep the Order distracted and out of the way, Harry wasn’t too sure of that. “Take your mirror with you,” Sirius continued. “I’ll call when backup is on the way. I — are you sure about this, pup?”

“He’s planning something big,” Harry insisted. He could feel it, deep in his chest; Voldemort was far too happy to have just the Prophecy on his mind.

“Right. Fuck.” Sirius’ grey eyes were pained. “Be careful, alright? You know he can’t die yet.”

Harry nodded. “Not looking to kill him. Just to stop him getting the upper hand, and take out as many of his people as possible.”

“Don’t go alone.”

“I won’t.” Harry didn’t know who he would take, but he would try.

“I love you.”

“I love you, too. I’ll see you soon.” Then, before Sirius could try and talk him out of going, Harry cut the connection. He sank down onto his bed, running a hand through his hair. After one long, shaky breath, he squared his jaw and got to his feet.

He had work to do.

. . .

Harry wasn’t expecting to be grabbed by Neville as soon as he stepped out of the portrait hole. “What? Nev, where are we going?” Harry had places to be!

Neville ignored him, dragging him down the corridor and into the Room of Requirement, where Harry’s jaw dropped at the sight of the entire group of heirs, plus Ginny. “What the hell?”

“What did you see, Harry?” Ginny asked, brown eyes intent. Harry was taken-aback.

“I— you know I had a vision?”

Blaise scoffed. “Please, everyone knows what it means when you start screaming and clawing at your scar like it’s trying to murder you,” he pointed out. “What is it? What’s he up to?”

Harry swallowed hard. “He’s planning to take the Ministry. Tonight.” They didn’t need to know about the fake torture of Sirius.

Gasps rang through the room.

“There’s something he wants there, something he needs me for. But I’m just the icing on the cake. He’s been putting his people in place, and with Dumbledore out of the way he thinks he can take the Ministry tonight.”

“So we’re going to stop them, right?” To Harry’s surprise it was Neville who spoke, hand clenched around his wand.

“I don’t expect anyone to come with me. But I wouldn’t say no to some assistance.” Harry saw the uneasy glances passed around several of the heirs; it was one thing to train for some vague ‘future fight’, and another thing entirely to actively seek out Death Eaters. “I should be getting back-up, but I don’t know how long it’ll take them to be notified.”

Neville and Ginny shared a look, then stepped forward. “We’re coming,” Ginny told him, her face daring him to argue.

“I’m coming, too,” Luna agreed, kissing Daphne’s cheek and moving to stand beside Ginny.

When Harry looked to the rest of the group, he saw Draco step forward. “No,” Harry said immediately. “I’m not letting you fight your father.”

For a moment, Draco looked like he might protest, but then his shoulders slumped. “I want to keep you safe, you idiot.”

Harry reached for his hand. “You can do that by staying here, where I won’t be worried about you.” It was far too dangerous for Draco to risk being seen at Harry’s side.

“I’ll keep him safe,” Susan said, stepping forward with determination. “If you’ll have me, Harry.”

He grinned at her — she was fierce with a wand, and he wasn’t going to turn that down.

“If Luna’s going, I suppose I’m coming too,” Daphne sighed. “They’re already after my uncle anyway. Can’t make it much worse.”

“Daphne, you don’t have to.”

“No, but I’m going to,” the blonde girl said before Harry could argue. “Blaise needs to stay here. He needs to be the approachable face for the neutral Slytherins; he can’t be seen rushing into danger at Harry Potter’s side. But I can.” She smirked, and for a brief moment Harry pitied anyone who ended up on the other end of her wand that night.

No one else in the room looked eager to volunteer themselves, and Harry put them out of their misery before they felt pressured into trying. “The rest of you need to stay here and keep Umbridge distracted,” he told them. “She’s going to raise hell once she realises I’m gone, and if there’s trouble at the Ministry things could get messy. Dumbledore and McGonagall are both gone, the school is unprotected.”

“Not with us around it’s not,” Parvati told him, showing her Gryffindor spirit. Harry was glad; between them and the HA, any real damage would surely be mitigated.

He pushed away the small part of him that was worried the Death Eaters were planning a double-hit, Ministry and Hogwarts while they were both unguarded. They surely didn’t have the numbers for that, not yet.

Still holding Draco’s hand, Harry pulled him aside, and everyone pretended not to notice them the same way they didn’t notice Theo with his forehead pressed to Susan’s, whispering to her beseechingly.

“Tell Snape where I’m going, as soon as we’ve gone,” Harry whispered. “The Order is elsewhere, but I’ve spoken to Sirius, and he’s going to try and get in touch so they can follow.”

“That’s relying on an awful lot of hope,” Draco murmured, and Harry just grinned, kissing him.

“I’m Harry Potter; blind hope tends to work out pretty well for me.” Draco was not impressed, but he pulled Harry into a proper kiss, his tongue reaching into Harry’s mouth like he didn’t ever want to be separated. But they had to, eventually, and Harry hugged him tight. “I love you.”

"I love you, too. Don't do anything stupid." Draco's sharp glare cut off any cheeky retort he might have given. "And... if my father is there... hex him for me, will you?"

Harry snorted. "Will do." One last kiss, and he was ready. He looked back at his friends, and they were ready, too.

"Be safe, all of you," Blaise said, dark eyes pausing on Daphne.

"You, too." Harry wasn't so naive to think the castle wouldn't be a dangerous place, once Umbridge got wind of what was happening. "Right, then. Let's go."

The six of them — Harry, Neville, Ginny, Luna, Daphne and Susan — hurried out of the Room and down the corridor.

"How are we getting to London?" Susan asked, and Harry grimaced.

"Hadn't exactly figured that one out, yet." He ducked into a side passage, waiting until everyone was in with him, then; "Dobby." The elf appeared instantly, green eyes as wide as always.

"How can Dobby help Harry Potter sir?"

"Dobby, I don't suppose you can take me and my friends to London, can you?" he asked hopefully. Dobby tugged at his ears, face falling.

"Elves is not able to remove students from within school wards. Dobby is sorry." He looked truly devastated, and Harry put out a placating hand before the elf could punish himself.

"No, no, it's okay! It was a long shot. I suppose even Ceri couldn't either? It's not limited to just school elves?" Again, Dobby shook his head. "Damn." Then he paused. "What if we were already outside the school wards? Say, in Hogsmeade? Could you travel with us then?"

Dobby frowned thoughtfully. "Dobby supposes... it is not in the school rules. And there is no magic to stop it."

Harry grinned, looking up at his friends. "Sounds like that's the way to do it, then." Even if Dobby couldn't break through his bonds as a Hogwarts house elf, Ceri absolutely could if Harry called her from outside the school wards.

"But how are we going to get to Hogsmeade? Umbridge has people crawling all over the school, we'll never get past the gates." Daphne looked skeptical, and Harry's grin widened.

"Oh, that's not as difficult as you'd expect." He looked at his watch; it was now an hour and a half since he'd had the vision in the exam. Voldemort would likely be expecting him to travel by broom or something equally reckless; he'd said they had hours before anyone came to find Sirius. "Before we go anywhere, though, we need a plan."

He might be sneaking out of school with his friends to go fight Death Eaters at the Ministry of Magic, but he wasn't going to be quite so reckless as to do so without even a vague idea of what to do when they got there.

“Susan, what time does the Ministry close up for the night?”

“Most people are out by six. Some will stay in their offices til seven or eight, but there’s not many these days. There’s a night-shift guard in the atrium, and I know the aurors have an on-call rotation, but I think they only usually have one or two people manning the emergency floo line and that’s it.”

The Ministry was probably mostly empty by now, then. Harry would bet anything that most of those still in their offices were those planning on aiding the Dark Lord’s attempt however they could, even if that was just with their own silence.

“One thing I want to know, Harry,” Ginny piped up, “is what You-Know-Who wants from you out of this whole thing. Considering how you’re so good at upsetting the cauldron on all his other plans, surely he’d want to keep you out of the way?”

Harry’s smile was a grim line. “Yes, but he also wants to kill me quite a lot,” he replied, and Daphne snorted. “He needs me to get something. From the Department of Mysteries. There’s... there’s this Prophecy, alright? About me and him, supposedly, and he’s heard the first half but not the second, and he thinks it’ll tell him how he can defeat me and live forever, or something.”

“You really are the Chosen One, then?” Daphne remarked dryly.

“A Prophecy is only as strong as those who believe in it,” Luna said. “Often the damage done from hearing them is worse than the prophecy itself.”

“Yeah, well, the damage done from him hearing the first half was going after my parents. And Neville’s,” he added with an apologetic glance to his friend. Neville gaped. “Child born at the end of July. Look, it’s not important.” Harry was getting off topic. “The point is, he expects me to meet him down in the Department of Mysteries. And I will. But not as blindly as he thinks. So. Plan.”

He wasn’t good at this part. Even without the compulsions rotting his brain, his idea of a ‘plan’ was ‘start with good intentions and make the rest up as I go along’. But he had others with him now, people whose safety relied on more than just dumb luck and good timing.

He wouldn’t lose any of them like he lost Cedric.

So, planning it was. Luckily, his friends were much better at that than he was.

....

With a plan in place, Harry and his friends hid themselves under Disillusionment charms and headed for the statue of the one-eyed witch. Harry had considered the Shrieking Shack, but it would be a much harder task to get all six of them across the grounds unnoticed. He had never snuck so many people out of Hogwarts before, but he was fairly confident in his own abilities. Most of the school was finishing up dinner by now; he had to hope the rest of his friends were doing a good job of hiding their absence from Umbridge and anyone else who might care.

Ginny just happened to have stink pellets in her pockets, so she dropped a few of them on the stairwell as a diversion. Then they were sprinting through the corridors, camouflaged by magic, and Harry skidded to a halt at the witch statue. "Dissendium," he murmured, tapping her hump with his wand. "Quickly, in here." He directed all of his friends down the tunnel, waiting until they were all gone before jumping in himself. It felt like it took hours, but the corridor remained undisturbed, and he let out a breath of relief once he was in the cramped tunnel.

"Do I keep going?" Neville asked, apparently the one at the front.

"Yeah, all the way to the end!"

"Where does this thing lead?" Daphne asked as she began crawling. Harry chuckled.

"You'll see in a minute."

They made their way down, and Harry heard Neville's shock the moment his friend poked through the trapdoor into Honeydukes' cellar.

"Did Fred and George show you this?" Ginny asked enviously. "This explains so much."

"In a way." Harry forgot she didn't know about the Map. "Okay, let's see if this works. Dobby!"

A beat, and the elf appeared. He looked far too happy to be assisting them in their rule-breaking. "How many of us can you take at a time?"

Dobby eyed them all over. "Dobby is best taking two at a time, and not Harry Potter sir and his tall friend together," he said, gesturing to Neville. Harry nodded.

"Perfect. Okay, if you take Susan and Daphne first, and then Neville and Ginny, and come back for me and Luna after." If anyone found Susan and Daphne alone, they were the most likely pair to be able to talk their way out of any suspicious circumstances; and the two least connected to Harry.

"Okay. Where is Dobby takings them?"

Harry blinked. Their plan had focused more on what to do inside the Ministry, rather than how to get there.

"Um, Dobby, was it?" Susan cut in tentatively. "Do you know where the muggle entrance to the Ministry of Magic is? The phone box?"

Harry blinked incredulously at the fact that there was even a muggle entrance to begin with, but Dobby nodded, ears flapping. "Yes, Miss, Dobby knows it!"

"Perfect. Take us there, then, please." Susan held out one hand to Daphne and the other to Dobby, and the Slytherin girl hesitated only for a moment before doing the same. The three disappeared in an instant, and Harry held his breath until Dobby returned.

“Harry Potter sir’s friends are in London,” he confirmed brightly.

He transported Ginny and Neville, then quickly returned for Harry and Luna. Harry squeezed his eyes shut against the strange sensation of elf travel, and when he opened them he was stood in a dirty side-street somewhere in London, watching Susan walk over to a heavily vandalised telephone box.

“Can Dobby do anything else for Harry Potter and his friends?”

“Don’t tell Professor Umbridge where we are, if she asks. Or anyone else, honestly.” Dobby nodded eagerly, and Harry grinned. “Thanks so much for this, Dobby. I really appreciate it.”

“Dobby is glad to help,” the elf chirped, and then vanished.

“I never realised house elves could transport people,” Daphne said, faintly surprised.

“House elves can do a lot of things people don’t think about,” Harry told her. Then he looked to Susan, eyebrows raised. “Where’s this entrance, then?”

“Right here.” The Hufflepuff patted the phone box. “It’ll be a tight squeeze, so I hope you don’t mind getting cosy.”

It was indeed a tight squeeze, all six of them in the booth, and Susan peered out from her place trapped against the corner of the glass. “Whoever can reach the phone, dial ‘6-2-4-4-2’.”

Harry, whose ribcage was pressed right against the phone, snorted. “Very clever.” He dialled the numbers, and a cool voice spoke over an invisible speaker, asking them to state their name and business. Susan spoke before he could, declaring all six of them ‘John Smith’ with the business of ‘Ministry Evaluation’. The badges were a surprise, clattering into the coin slot, and with a warning about needing to submit their wands for a security check, suddenly the phone box began to move. It sank below the pavement, and before long it was pitch black.

“I hate this bit,” Susan muttered. Harry wasn’t a fan of it either, his brain throwing up memories of being locked in his cupboard. Luckily, it didn’t last long; soon golden light began to spill from the area near their feet, slowly increasing until they were no longer in a dark tunnel but instead lowering into the middle of what Harry could only assume was the Ministry atrium. There was a fountain in the centre with a large gold statue of various magical creatures being presided over by a witch and wizard, and a whole lot of marble elsewhere. It was incredibly pompous, as buildings went.

It was also completely empty.

“This isn’t right,” Susan murmured. “There should be a security team.”

The phone box touched the ground, and they spilled out into the atrium, stretching out their aching limbs from the awkward journey.

“D’you think they’re dead? Or just... gone?” Ginny asked dubiously. Harry frowned.

“Probably Dark supporters. Or just bribed to bugger off for the night.” His experience of the Ministry was not one of moral integrity, for the most part.

“Well, isn’t it good for us, that it’s this quiet?” Daphne reasoned. “Less obstruction.”

She was technically right, but it didn’t make Harry feel any better about it. “Either way, we know something’s certainly not right.”

“Harry,” Susan said suddenly. When he turned to look at her, she was pale. “Do you—I’ve seen the aurors, and some other people Aunt Amelia works with, do this thing with their Patronus where they send messages. Can you—do you know how to do that?” Her voice was hopeful. Harry frowned.

“In theory, yes.” He’d asked Remus to show him in the summer when he’d seen the man summon Snape from his lab that way. “I’ve never done it very far, though. Why?”

“Aunt Amelia should know what’s happening,” Susan told him. “She knows who to trust. If we could get a message to her... maybe she can gather up the Ministry workers who would actually fight back. Or at the very least stop us getting arrested once we’re found here.”

She had a point. Harry palmed his wand, pulling together his magic. “Expecto Patronum.” Prongs appeared, silver light glittering off the shiny marble floor. “Take a message to Amelia Bones. Tell her — Death Eaters are in the Ministry. I am there, so is Susan. Bring whoever you trust.” The stag nodded its enormous head, and then dashed off towards a wall, disappearing from sight. A few seconds passed.

“Did it work?” Neville asked hopefully. Harry shrugged.

“No idea.” Once the Patronus was gone, it was hard to tell.

“We should get moving,” Luna said, voice echoing with an urgency that none of them wanted to argue with. They hurried over to the lifts, and all of them winced at the racket made when the golden grilles slid open.

“Fuck,” Neville whispered, hurrying into the lift. Susan immediately pressed the button for level nine, and with more horrendous clanking, the lift began to move.

“Susan,” Harry said after a beat, “I’m very glad you came with us. Because I didn’t actually know where we were going.”

Susan giggled, a slightly hysterical sound. “I’ve been down there with my auntie before,” she explained. “But I’m glad I came with you, too.”

Harry just hoped she didn’t change her mind about that once the fighting began.

The lift ground to a thunderous halt, the cool female voice declaring that they had reached the Department of Mysteries.

Now things looked familiar.

Harry's chest felt a little tight, finally seeing the dark corridor from his dreams in person, the flickering torches and plain black door that had haunted him for so long.

A shoulder pressed against his arm, and he glanced down to see Luna stood beside him, looking up with a surprisingly determined smile. "We're with you," she said simply.

It was enough.

Harry led the way, unsurprised when the door opened easily for him. And there was the circular room with its many doors and blue-flame torches.

What he wasn't expecting was for the room to start spinning as soon as the door closed behind them.

Instantly, all six of them had their wands out, huddling close to make sure no one was left uncovered. But nothing jumped out at them. The walls spun until the blue flames were just thin neon lines in Harry's vision, and eventually slowed to a halt; all the doors were completely identical, and Harry had no idea where to go. "It didn't do that in my vision," he admitted. Now, they couldn't tell which door they had come from, let alone which door led to the Hall of Prophecies.

"Aunt Amelia says the trick is just to ask," Susan whispered, fear colouring her voice. Harry frowned; it was worth a try.

"Would you show me the way to the Hall of Prophecies? Please," he added, in case the room was a stickler for manners.

Abruptly, a door off to his right flung open, and through it Harry could see the same dancing lights he'd seen in his dream. "That's the one," he confirmed, grinning as he strode towards it. "Brilliant, Susan."

The Hufflepuff blushed happily, following him into the room.

"Oh," Ginny gasped softly, once they were inside. "It's beautiful."

It took a moment for Harry's eyes to adjust to such brightness after the dark antechamber room, but when they did he realised the room was full of timepieces. Clocks in all shapes and sizes, from tiny little pocket watches on stands to a huge grandfather clock against one wall, hundreds of them, all ticking away in near-perfect unison. The light was coming from an enormous crystal bell jar at the far end of the room, and Harry found himself drawn to it curiously.

It sparkled almost painfully bright with some kind of ethereal wind — and in the very centre was a tiny, jewel-bright egg. The students watch the egg drift upwards, beginning to hatch as it moved; soon there was a beautiful hummingbird within the jar, but once it was carried all the way up to the top it began to sink slowly, feathers turning bedraggled, until soon it was an egg once more. The process was mesmerising, and it took several cycles for Harry to tear his eyes away.

Just past the jar was a shelf entirely full of tiny hourglasses. Timeturners, Harry realised, recognising the devices from his third year. Some were bigger than others, but all of them would fit neatly in the palm of Harry's hand. Or on a necklace chain.

What sort of time-based magic was within this room? What did Unspeakables even do down here? The questions were endless, but there was no time to answer them.

"We need to keep going," Harry said softly. It felt like the kind of room you had to whisper in.

His words startled his friends out of their reverie watching the hummingbird, and while they looked reluctant, they followed Harry to the door.

It was definitely the right room. Shelves towered far above their heads, all full of identical dusty glass orbs, with more blue-flame candles lighting the way. Stepping into the room made a shiver crawl down his spine after the light and warmth of the time room, and they all huddled closer together.

"Where to now, Harry?" Ginny asked. Harry peered at the silver numbers on the end of the nearest row.

"Row ninety-seven." They all pulled their wands out and started walking, grouped tightly together.

This was where the plan would begin. This was the part Harry had worried about.

They reached row ninety-seven, and paused, peering into the darkness. "He's down the end," Harry said, pitching his voice a little louder than before. "He's here, I know it."

He led the way down the row, finding it entirely empty, as expected. "He's got to be here somewhere!"

"No one's here, Harry," Ginny said gently, placing a hand on his arm. Harry tore his gaze away — looking instead at the shelves of orbs, reading the names on the little labels. Most of them were dim and dull inside, but a few still glowed with a faint light. He scanned the labels, looking further down the aisle. It had to be easy to find, or Voldemort wouldn't have sent him down here.

"Harry, come here," Daphne said urgently. Harry whipped around; she was pointing at an orb on an eye-level shelf, and when he met her gaze she gave a short nod. "This one's got your name on it."

"What?" he feigned bewilderment, heading to take a look. Sure enough, the little label read;

S. P. T. to A. P. W. B. D

Dark Lord

and (?)Harry Potter

That was it. Inside that faintly glowing orb was the record of the words that had destroyed his life forever.

The words that had led to the death of his parents, and thirteen years of relative peace for the rest of the wizarding world.

“Harry, don’t touch it,” Neville warned, but it was too late. Harry’s hand was already reaching out, wrapping around the strangely warm glass. As he did, he placed a protective charm around it. Things were going to get messy, and he didn’t want it cracking.

“It’s got my name on it,” Harry argued. “That means it’s mine.”

Suddenly the air shifted. Instantly, all six of them tensed.

“There are two names on that label, Potter,” a cold, familiar voice drawled. Harry turned to face Lucius Malfoy, his pale hair glowing eerily in the blue light. “And the other owner would very much like that Prophecy.”

Harry moved to stand in front of his friends, feeling them gather behind him, their wands out and ready. Malfoy wasn’t alone; a dozen shapes suddenly loomed in the shadows, more Death Eaters surrounding Harry and his friends. Harry glared at his boyfriend’s father, wishing he could hex the snot out of him, show him what he’d learned from Severus Snape. But it wasn’t time yet.

“Where’s Sirius?” he asked, and didn’t flinch when the Death Eaters mocked him. Though when the female voice chimed in, taunting him in an exaggerated baby-voice, he felt Neville’s full-boddy shudder and suddenly knew exactly who the woman was.

“Oh, and you’ve brought your little friends, how sweet,” Malfoy remarked, his eyes trailing over the group behind Harry. “Miss Greengrass, I’m surprised to see you here. Your uncle will be most... disappointed.”

“On the contrary, my uncle will be delighted I got the opportunity to tell you to go fuck yourself in person,” Daphne retorted sweetly. Several Death Eaters growled, and one raised a wand, but a sharp look from Lucius held back any spell they might cast. Harry was quietly surprised; it wasn’t like Death Eaters to show hesitation, even when hurting children.

“Enough of this!”

Bellatrix Lestrange tried to summon the Prophecy, but Harry was faster. It still rolled to the ends of his fingertips, and that was enough to have Malfoy turning on his companion.

“I told you, no!” he reprimanded. “If you smash it—“

Ah, so that was their concern, was it? Harry smirked. “Why does Voldemort want it so bad?” he asked boldly, and was very proud of his friends for not even twitching at the name, while all the Death Eaters shuddered and Bellatrix Lestrange began to screech about his filthy mouth defiling her lord’s name.

Harry was almost tempted to inform her that his filthy mouth had also defiled her nephew, but that was a story for another time.

Slowly, he shuffled one foot back. The Death Eaters were watching his hands — one holding his wand, the other holding the prophecy. They didn't notice when the heel of his shoe tapped back against the toe of Ginny's. He felt a quick tap back, and then the faint movement of a hand behind him. Harry continued to taunt Malfoy and his fellows, keeping attention firmly on him.

He kept them talking, let Malfoy do his whole villain exposition thing, let him think he was so clever leading Harry to the conclusions of what happened to Podmore and Bode. Harry had to kill as much time as possible, silently praying that Sirius was able to get hold of the Order soon. He liked his own chances against the Death Eaters — was desperate to put some of Snape's spells into practice — but he didn't want to risk his friends.

Then, faintly, he felt something go warm in his pocket.

His mirror.

Help was on the way.

“NOW!” he yelled, and all at once six wands were raised; five voices sent Reducto curses at the shelves, while the sixth — Harry’s — sent a Cutting curse straight in the direction of Bellatrix Lestrange’s chest. She screeched, managing to move fast enough that it caught her across the arm instead, but it was enough.

Glass orbs shattered everywhere as shelves began to topple, and Harry was running, hot on Susan’s heels as they sped for the exit, destroying as much as physically possible in their wake.

The fight had begun. They just had to last long enough for assistance to arrive.

Chapter End Notes

In the last couple chapters we've passed 5k kudos and 2.5k comments, which is AMAZING and I am so grateful to all of you for sticking with me on this adventure <3 Even if like 500 of those comments are you guys begging me not to kill off Sirius ;) We're getting through it, friends! I just had to build tension for a liiiiittle bit longer~

Chapter 72

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Sirius, as soon as he got off the mirror with Harry, scrambled for his wand.

He wasn't sure if this would work, but he was willing to give it a try.

It took a minute to pull together a happy memory enough for a Patronus, but with his heart full of red hair and laughing blue eyes, it came far quicker than expected. And took form, which was something it hadn't done since he was twenty years old. Sirius gaped at the large silver bear in front of him, waiting patiently.

Oh, Charlie, he thought to himself, heart clenching. He couldn't remember what it had been before, but it hadn't been a bear.

He pushed the realisation away, remembering his original intent. "Go to Remus Lupin," he told the bear. "Tell him; end your fight now, a bigger one is coming. It involves our pup."

The bear nodded, then gambolled off through the wall, and Sirius tried to send as much of his love and happiness with it as possible, hoping it would make it to wherever Remus was. Wherever the Order was.

Then he could do nothing but wait. He killed some time, changing out of his muggle clothes and into some duelling robes. He tied his hair back, then loosened it, then re-tied it again. He made a sandwich. He paced up and down the kitchen while eating said sandwich.

The clock on the wall ticked away, and every minute felt like days.

More than ever, Sirius hated his criminal status. It was bad enough seeing the Order go out and save lives and having to just stay home, but to know his pup was heading into danger with no more than just a few of his school friends to aid him... it was almost enough to send Sirius to the Ministry, with or without assistance. But that wouldn't help Harry. One man against however many Death Eaters, possibly Voldemort himself, would not help Harry.

Sirius took a steady breath, reminding himself that Harry was surprisingly well-trained for a fifteen year old, that his friends had been practicing defensive magic all year.

Just as he was gearing up to send another Patronus, the crack of apparition rang through the hall. Sirius turned, seeing Remus come running into the kitchen, eyes glowing gold. The moon had only been the night before, and the wolf was closer to the surface than ever. "What's happening with Harry?" he asked urgently.

"Where's the rest of the Order?"

Remus shook his head. "Still fighting. There were more Death Eaters than we anticipated, it turned into a bit of a shitshow. Everyone's alright," he added at the alarm on Sirius' face.

“Nothing we can’t heal. And it’s almost over. Kingsley tried to summon the on-call aurors but of course they’re bloody useless. The Death Eaters seem to be clearing out soon enough. Now, Sirius, what was that message about? Frightened the bloody life out of me! Where’s Harry?”

“The raid was a diversion,” Sirius relayed. “Harry had a vision. Voldemort’s going for the Ministry, tonight.”

The colour drained from Remus’ face. “Harry’s going after him, isn’t he?” His voice was knowing.

Sirius nodded grimly. “Yup. So you’d better get back to the Order and tell them to hurry the fuck up if they want to save this damned country.”

He had a lot of faith in his godson, but there was only so much one teenage boy could do. Still, he called Harry’s name into the two-way mirror, hoping to confirm his godson was safe while he waited for back-up.

There was no response.

.-. .

It took far too long in Sirius’ opinion for the Order to gather at Grimmauld Place. It wasn’t even the full contingent; Dumbledore was off farting around somewhere or another, not that Sirius really gave a fuck, but he’d taken Vance and Moody with him.

That turned out to be a pretty good thing, actually; there was far less arguing without the three of them around.

“Harry and some students have gone. I don’t know who,” he added at the look of horror on every Weasley face in the room. “And I don’t know how many. But I promised we’d send back-up as soon as possible.”

“I don’t understand how they got into the Ministry to begin with,” Arthur Weasley murmured, and Kingsley let out a bitter chuckle. He had blood on his robes, betraying his earlier battle; all of them looked a little worse for wear, honestly. Sirius hoped they were up for another.

“They’ve been worming their way in for months, Arthur. Bloody Malfoy greasing palms all over the place. But I’ll admit, I didn’t think they were at quite this stage.”

“They’ve blind-sided us all,” Remus cut in bluntly. “But that doesn’t matter. We need to get to the Ministry, fast.”

“Shouldn’t we have some sort of plan?” Hestia Jones asked. Sirius glared at her.

“Can’t plan for what we don’t know,” he pointed out. “We’ve no idea of numbers, but with Harry involved there’s a high chance Voldemort himself will be there.” Several people flinched.

"Likelihood is, they've disabled the floo and put anti-apparition wards up," Tonks declared, her face more serious than most would expect of her. She closed her eyes and spun slightly, face screwed up in concentration. "Yeah, no dice. Shit." Sirius' stomach sank; if even she, as an auror, couldn't get through the wards...

"How far do the wards extend?" Fred Weasley asked, another unexpectedly serious face in the mix.

"Half-mile radius," Kingsley informed them. "That's our standard wards, at least. No idea if they've raised their own or just triggered the existing."

The twins bent their heads together, discussing it over quickly.

"St James' Park station should do it, right?"

Sirius thought over his mental map of London, trying to poke his ragged memories from the Before times for anything he might have been told about the Ministry wards threshold. Back then they had been warned of it, in case the wards had to be raised in an attack and back-up had to approach from elsewhere.

"Waterloo," Tonks piped up. "I was always taught Waterloo."

"Anyone here never been to Waterloo station before?" Sirius asked, his fingers tapping his thigh impatiently. Several hands rose, Charlie's included. "Right. Buddy up, we need to get moving."

"We can't just rush in there!" Jones started, and Sirius turned on her, glaring.

"Harry is in danger!" he roared. "Every extra second is crucial. It's already gonna take enough time to bloody run from Waterloo to Whitehall."

That shut the woman up, and there was a mild amount of chaos as everyone hurried to find an apparition partner. Sirius wasn't surprised when Charlie grabbed his hand, the redhead winking at him and stepping incredibly close. "I'm with you," he murmured.

"Oh, I'd best stay here — wait for Albus, you know," Molly was fretting off to the side, and Sirius looked up at Charlie, squeezing his hand back. Molly hadn't figured them out yet — Bill hadn't gotten the nerve to propose yet — but every day Sirius cared less and less. After his Patronus revelation, he cared especially little right now.

He wound an arm around Charlie's waist, offering a grin. "Hold on tight."

Then they were squeezing together through space, gone in an instant and back again just as fast. Sirius looked around, quietly delighted that he'd actually remembered Waterloo well enough to apparate there. It had been fifteen years, after all.

They had appeared in a dingy side-street, and a few moments later Bill and Hestia appeared. Before he forgot, Sirius pulled his two-way mirror from his pocket, calling Harry's name again. Part of him hoped for an answer, but the bigger part knew there was not one coming; Harry was not in a position to chat.

Several more cracks sounded, everyone apparating into whichever spot they remembered best, and soon there were eleven of them Disillusioned and running for Westminster Bridge.

Charlie was still holding Sirius' hand.

. . .

Half a mile turned out to be a longer run than most of them expected; wizards were not generally prone to exercise. Considering keeping himself fit was one of the few things Sirius could do while confined to the house, he had no trouble keeping up with Charlie; the dragon tamer was hardly even breathing heavy by the time they made it to the Ministry back entrance; a set of dodgy-looking stairs below a fire escape with a door labelled 'Staff Only' at the base.

"I didn't know this was here," Charlie mentioned, and Sirius grinned.

"Most don't. It's for emergencies only. And considering I'm not cramming eleven of us into that bloody phone booth it'll have to do." He hoped the others were keeping track of their non-Ministry companions to guide them over. Sirius honestly had been too focused on Harry to think about it.

Luckily they heard footsteps, and as charms dropped several others came into view, some huffing and puffing more than others. Sirius strode over to Remus, who looked a little pale. "You alright, Moony?"

When he grinned, the wolf was back in his eyes. "Better than ever, old friend," he promised, and Sirius believed him.

Diggle was the last one to show up, and while he was catching his breath Kingsley jogged down the stone steps, tapping his wand on the 'Staff Only' door. It swung open, and the bald-headed auror let out a quiet sigh of relief. "This way," he urged. All of them moved forward, wands raised. Sirius was right up behind him — he was the only one who was coming fresh to this fight. More than fresh; he was begging for the chance to finally put his wand to use, do something other than sit around and wait.

The atrium was emptier than Sirius had ever seen it, and the hair on the back of his neck pricked up.

"Where is everyone?" George asked in a low voice.

"Department of Mysteries, I'd bet," came Sirius' grim response. A murmur of understanding swept through the group; they all knew at least a little about what Voldemort was after down there.

They split up to take the lifts, and Sirius ended up with Remus, Charlie, the twins and Arthur Weasley. As the lift rattled along, Charlie leaned his shoulder against Sirius'. "He's going to be fine," he said quietly. Sirius' jaw clenched.

"Bloody better be."

“He’s Harry,” Fred piped up with a weak grin. “He’s always fine.”

“Terrifying in a fight,” George agreed; and he would know, after months of the HA. “And if he’s got our sister with him, those Death Eaters will be wetting themselves already.”

Charlie visibly stiffened at the prospect of Ginny fighting Dark wizards. Sirius put a hand on his arm. “Hey, it’s okay. If she’s here, it’s because Harry thinks she can handle it. He’s protecting her,” he assured, catching all the Weasley men with him in his gaze.

“They’re just kids, Sirius,” Charlie whispered, ragged and heartbroken. Sirius understood; he felt the same way when he watched Harry be taught multiple ways to kill a man, to fight against magic far more complex than he would learn in school. But it was too late to shelter the children, now. The best way to protect them was to teach them to protect themselves.

The lift doors shrieked as they opened, and the six of them stepped into the corridor.

They could hear the sounds of battle already.

Sirius didn’t wait for the rest of the group; he surged forward, heading for the door to the Department of Mysteries. He didn’t get very far, though; Charlie was still holding onto him, and reeled him back in, kissing him before Sirius even knew what was happening. “Don’t do anything stupid,” the redhead growled. “Alright? I’m not telling Harry I let you die on my watch.”

Sirius could only nod, and then blush when Fred let out a quiet wolf-whistle. He’d forgotten other people were around.

“Well, then,” Arthur said quietly, eyes wide behind his glasses. “That’s, uh... that’s a conversation best had later, I think.”

Sirius snorted, sharing an amused look with Charlie. They had that to look forward to, then.

With that in mind, he turned to the door, wrenching it open.

Sirius had been to the Department of Mysteries twice as a young auror, and both times he’d found it utterly creepy. Now, it was just terrifying.

Several of the doors were open, though all the ruckus seemed to be coming from one in particular. There was an unconscious and hog-tied man in a Death Eater robe in the middle of the circular room, a snapped wand at his side. Sirius turned to see Fred and George quietly high-fiving.

“That’s our lot,” Fred confirmed proudly.

Sirius was already looking for his godson, running straight past the Death Eater and into the room where the action was. It was a large coliseum style room, stone steps leading down to a plinth on which an archway stood, a piece of faded black fabric hanging from the stone.

The old execution chamber. Of all the places to end up...

While looking at the Death Veil made Sirius' blood run cold, he wasn't looking for more than a second; the room was utter pandemonium. Duels were happening all over the room, though a fair number of Death Eaters seemed to be disarmed and unconscious like their fellows. It made Sirius grin as he launched himself into a fight with Rodolphus Lestrange, tearing the Death Eater away from a red-haired girl who looked much like Amelia Bones had when they were kids.

"You're Sirius Black," the girl declared, ducking a spell flying her way and sending back an impressive Flame-Whip hex in return.

"I am. I was framed. Harry can tell you all about it," Sirius told her. Above them, the rest of the Order was spilling in and joining the fight, and Sirius could see the relief in the girl's eyes.

Rodolphus let out a shout of rage at the intrusion, sending a particularly nasty hex Sirius' way, but Sirius deflected it with a somewhat obscure Shield spell. While Sirius had Rodolphus distracted, the girl — probably Susan Bones — was watching for an opening, and she sure as hell found one; a Stunner hit Rodolphus in the thigh and he went down like a sack of bricks. Immediately, probably-Susan was darting in, plucking the wand from the Death Eater's hand and snapping it over her knee without a hint of remorse.

"Sirius!"

The voice that called out was familiar, and Sirius whirled around, heart clenching at the sight of his godson duelling Lucius Malfoy worryingly close to the Veil. Bellatrix Lestrange was looming behind them, but Tonks and Kingsley had her under control for now. Sirius hurried down the stone steps, dodging curses and sending his own in return, jumping over another bound and disarmed Death Eater — and really, it was embarrassing for them, how many of them had been taken down by a handful of school children.

"Looks like you hardly needed help, kiddo!" Sirius said once he was at Harry's side, throwing up a shield of his own to block Malfoy's Entrail-Expelling curse. Harry grinned breathlessly at him for a moment.

"Still good to see you." Harry sent a wordless jet of lurid purple magic at Malfoy, missing him by mere centimetres.

Had they not been in such dire straits, Sirius would have sat back and watched in awe as his fifteen year-old godson duelled with Lord Voldemort's right-hand man and held his ground. Harry didn't look overwhelmed at all, fighting back with determination in his green eyes. All around them, Death Eaters were realising how drastically out-numbered they were, falling to spells — many of which came from the students.

"The only reason you're not dead is because you still hold that Prophecy, Potter," Malfoy snarled. "But I've no qualms about killing your dogfather here." As if to demonstrate, he sent a Killing curse Sirius' way, and Sirius ducked quickly.

"Just fucking try it," Harry dared, and then his Bone-Breaker hit Malfoy square in the shoulder, causing him to groan in pain. Harry pushed forward, trying to press his advantage — and then over his shoulder, Sirius saw Tonks go down to a bolt of blue light, and Bellatrix turn in Harry's direction. The animagus jumped to cover his godson's back, the pair of them moving together. Malfoy tried to circle around, veering closer to the Veil, trying to find some way to separate the pair of them. The whole room could've been falling to shit around them and Sirius wouldn't have noticed, couldn't let himself notice, couldn't stop to think about anything but Harry and their opponents. The only thing that mattered was protecting James' boy. His pup.

Bellatrix cackled and shot some poor quip at him, but Sirius could only laugh and return a spell; she'd been mad before Azkaban and she was even madder now, but Sirius didn't fear her anymore; the only thing he could feel was pity. She was flagging, too, with blood soaking one arm of her robe and the hem charred, and Sirius wondered if she'd had the privilege of duelling Harry Potter yet.

"No!" Harry shouted suddenly, and Sirius whipped around just in time to see Harry bat a spell away with his bare hand, sending it ricocheting back at Malfoy. The blond man was so surprised he didn't have time to dodge, getting hit right in the stomach with his own magic. It knocked him backwards — right into the middle of the stone archway.

Sirius felt the instant it happened; the voices behind the Veil — the whispers of the dead — grew louder in his ears for a single horrible moment, and the room's temperature dropped. Then, with a look of astonishment etched on his face, Lucius Malfoy was gone. Another victim of the magic that no one understood.

All of a sudden, an ear-splitting scream rent the air. Bellatrix was staring wide-eyed at the space her brother-in-law had just occupied, fury building on her face. "No!" she screeched, and Sirius moved to protect Harry from her retribution. But she wasn't going after him — she was running up the stairs, skirts flying. She was aiming for the door.

Sirius looked to Harry, who was grey in the face. His scar stood out a livid red on his forehead. "He's coming," Harry rasped, and then he was off.

.-.-.-.

Watching Draco's father fall into the strange, whispering veil seemed to take an age. Harry wasn't worried at first, more concerned with what the hell kind of wandless, wordless shield he'd managed without realising. He was preparing for Malfoy to get up and keep going — but he didn't. As soon as he touched the weird curtain, he was fading, falling through it like a portal to another place. He was gone in a moment, no sign of him on the other side.

Harry didn't have time to think about it too hard — Bellatrix screamed with rage, and then Harry's scar burst to life. He knew immediately what had happened; she had called her Master for back-up.

"He's coming," he warned Sirius, sprinting up the stairs, giving only a cursory glance around the rest of the room. He wasn't worried, not really; they'd been doing pretty well even before the Order had shown up, and Harry just hoped between Tonks and Kingsley the Death Eaters they'd incapacitated would actually stay captured. Of course, some weren't just unconscious; Harry hadn't asked his friends to kill, would never ask that of them, but he himself had no such qualms at this point. Snape had taught him to be liberal with his Cutting curses, and any other bit of magic that could give him the upper hand.

Whatever dregs were still standing, it all seemed to be well in hand now, so Harry didn't waste time stopping to check on anyone. Bellatrix was headed for the atrium, and he wasn't going to let her get away.

Waiting in the lift was like an out-of-body experience, his heart pounding a mile a minute in his chest, his brain still burning with the image of Lucius Malfoy disappearing behind the veil.

How the hell was he going to tell Draco he'd killed his father?

Would Draco thank him for it?

He shook away the thoughts; he could deal with that later.

Bellatrix was screaming in the atrium when he arrived, and he shot a spell at her, but she blocked it. "How dare you!" she yelled. "You jumped-up little half-blood, I'll kill you, and pry the Prophecy from your cold, dead hands!"

"It's far too late for that," Harry taunted in reply. "It got smashed, in the fight." He spoke with utter conviction, watching Bellatrix turn white with fury.

"Impossible. You're lying!" Her words came out as an inhuman shriek, and she tried to summon the orb, but of course nothing happened.

Harry felt the Dark Lord's arrival before he saw it; a searing pain in his scar, which he had to use all his limited talent in Occlumency to shove away. When his vision stopped blurring around the edges, he saw the snake-like man in front of him, Bellatrix prostrate at his feet.

"You smashed my Prophecy, Potter?" Voldemort asked in that high, cold voice. Harry smirked.

"Yup. My bad."

A cry of rage came from the Dark Lord, while Bellatrix sobbed loudly.

"You worthless little fool! I shall make you experience pain so will long for death. Months of preparation, and my Death Eaters have let Harry Potter thwart me again!"

"Well, you know what they say," Harry retorted, dodging a Killing curse. "If you want a job done right, you've got to do it yourself."

He was a little glad everyone else was downstairs, not there to see him so recklessly taunting Voldemort himself. Adrenaline was surging through his veins, his plan utterly disintegrated in his mind by now. All he could do was hope that Amelia Bones had received his Patronus, and was working on the wards as they spoke.

Then, out of nowhere, there was a pillar of phoenix fire and a burst of birdsong.

Albus Dumbledore had arrived.

Harry grit his teeth at the man's genial greeting, like he'd bumped into Voldemort while out for an evening stroll. But it was doing its job; the Dark Lord's attention was no longer on Harry.

"It was foolish to come here tonight, Tom," Dumbledore reprimanded, magic flowing from him with such force that Harry felt it like a heatwave. Voldemort conjured a bright silver shield, and the magic hit it with a sound like a gong. "The aurors are on their way."

That was a relief, though Harry had to wonder why Dumbledore had not arrived with the rest of the Order. It didn't matter now. Harry shuffled backwards towards the golden fountain, the only defensible position in the atrium.

The duel between the two most powerful wizards in the world had begun, and Harry was not going to get in the way.

Their magic was flashy. That was all Harry could say for it. They were not fighting to kill, or even necessarily to harm. Dumbledore was fighting to intimidate, and Voldemort was doing whatever he could to show he was not cowed by it.

If it would have counted for anything, Harry would have shot a Sectumsempra right then to cut Voldemort's head clean off. But that would only buy them a little time until the man resurrected himself. Hardly any time, now he had servants who knew how to do it.

All of a sudden, the golden statue beside Harry jumped to life, the metal goblin leaping to take a Killing curse headed straight for Harry. Voldemort was trying to kill him again, clearly fed up with trying to best Dumbledore.

Harry stayed crouched low with his wand in his hand. Then there was a sound like a whip cracking, and the feeling of pressure releasing in the air, so strong and abrupt Harry's ears popped.

The wards had broken.

A flurry of pops sounded, and suddenly there was a crowd in the atrium. Among them was Cornelius Fudge, wearing his pyjamas — and at the front of the group, a woman Harry knew to be Amelia Bones, her wand raised as she stared Voldemort dead in the eye.

Fudge barely had time to gasp, before Voldemort was sweeping across the atrium towards Bellatrix, grabbing her by the arm and disappearing instantly. All around the atrium, fireplaces were flaring green as witches and wizards spilled in, but Harry was focused on Fudge. The Minister looked like he was having some sort of fit, stuttering helplessly.

"That was— he was— You-Know-Who! In the Ministry! Great heavens, how can— I don't
—“

"Mr Potter," Amelia Bones called, and Harry stood up properly, walking straight towards her.

"Well met, Lady Bones," he greeted, making her smile.

“Well met.” Then her gaze sobered. “Thank you, for your swift warning. Very impressive Patronus, by the way.”

Harry smiled halfheartedly. “Thank you. I wasn’t sure it would make it, I’ve never sent a proper message before.”

“We would have arrived sooner, but it took time to get authorisation to break the Ministry’s own wards,” Madam Bones replied, sending a scathing look at the still-blabbering Minister. “What happened? Where’s Susan?”

“Department of Mysteries,” Harry responded. “She was alright when I last saw her. They’re all down there, with a bunch of Death Eaters.”

Bones nodded sharply, and with a call to the Aurors she was leading a group to the lifts. Harry hoped Sirius scarpered before any officials arrived.

“I will explain everything, Cornelius, as soon as I have sent Harry back to school,” Dumbledore was saying loudly, reaching out to put a hand on Harry’s shoulder. Harry tensed.

“Harry Potter?” Fudge jolted, as if he’d only just realised Harry was there. “What— what is he doing here? What is the meaning of this?”

“As I have said, I will explain once he is safely back at Hogwarts,” said Dumbledore patiently. Harry glared at him, stepping back.

“I’m not leaving without my friends.” He made sure to raise his voice, cause a scene. Anyone who hadn’t already been staring at him absolutely was now.

“Harry, my boy, you have been through a lot tonight,” Dumbledore placated. “You must get back to school, where Madam Pomfrey can check on you.”

“My friends need to get back, too,” he insisted. “Or do you not want the public to know that six school children defended the entire Ministry from two dozen Death Eaters for almost an hour and a half before anyone showed up?”

That sent a cascade of whispers through the crowd, and Harry saw Dumbledore’s tiny wince.

“I just want you to be safe, my boy.”

“If you wanted me safe then where were you half an hour ago when Lucius Malfoy was trying to kill me?” Harry shouted. Many of the onlookers gasped, and Fudge turned an interesting shade of puce. “He’s dead, by the way. Fell through that weird veil thing. I’m assuming it kills people, at least.” Harry didn’t want Malfoy’s disappearance to be swept under the rug without a body. He wanted as many people as possible to know what had happened.

Dumbledore frowned, and the next thing Harry knew the headmaster was reaching out towards him with what looked like a bottlecap between his fingers. He pressed it into Harry’s hand, then pulled back and muttered a word, and Harry was spinning, the world a riot of colour.

The fucking bastard had forced a portkey on him.

Harry reappeared in the Headmaster's office at Hogwarts, which was fully repaired from the state it had been the last time he'd seen it. The people in the portraits all jumped in surprise, but Harry ignored them, heading straight for the door. It didn't budge. "Let me out," he growled, shoving harder, putting magic into it. Whatever ward Dumbledore was using to keep him in held fast. "Let me out!" The shelves rattled, several of Dumbledore's strange trinkets exploding. But the door did not move.

His fury rose, green eyes bright with rage and magic. "LET. ME. OUT." He reached for the castle, and the castle reached back, and with a feeling like a rubber band snapping the door burst open. Harry jumped onto the revolving staircase, sending a wave of gratitude to the castle's magic.

He stepped out into absolute anarchy.

He'd thought the castle looked bad in the days after Fred and George had left; this was a thousand times worse in comparison. Paint was smeared on the walls, scorch marks studded the floors and walls and even ceilings. As he reached the stairs he saw students floating in giant bubbles, bobbing along merrily. He headed down, ignoring those who waved at him, looking out for any sort of familiar face. Eventually he ran into the Patil twins, who were barricaded behind an overturned desk in the middle of the third floor corridor.

"Harry! You're back!" Parvati greeted brightly. "How did it go?"

"Fine, yeah — Parvati, what the fuck happened here?"

The two sisters exchanged a look.

"We tried to keep Umbridge distracted," Padma told him. "Only, when she finally realised you'd gone, she sort of... pitched a fit. And then she tried to contact the Ministry and I guess that didn't work because she just lost it, started screaming about coups and mutiny and how the Minister was going to have everyone jailed. Then Lee Jordan let off some fireworks and she screamed and used the Cruciatus curse on him, and everything went a bit downhill from there."

Harry gaped at her. "I was gone for five hours!"

"A lot can happen in five hours," Parvati said with a sage nod. "Where are you going?"

"I need to find someone. Don't worry. Just... keep doing whatever the hell you're doing." He didn't want to know, at this point. He was far too tired for this shit.

"Just watch out for the Entrance Hall!" Padma called after him. Harry's brow furrowed in trepidation.

He understood the warning when he got there.

The Entrance Hall was now a swimming pool. Someone had turned the whole floor into a pool of water, and students were happily splashing away. There were even beach toys floating about, and a few rubber ducks — some of which exploded into soap bubbles when touched.

Harry blinked. Then shook his head, turned around, and decided to use a Parseltongue passage instead.

The Chamber of Secrets was blessedly quiet, but Harry didn't stay long, heading straight for the wall that would take him to Snape's office. Thankfully, the man was inside, and he jumped to his feet at Harry's entrance. "Potter!" He rushed forward, gripping Harry by the shoulders. "When did you get here? What happened?"

Suddenly, Harry was hit by a wave of exhaustion, the entire day's events crashing into him at once. He swayed forward, forehead resting on Snape's thin chest. "The Ministry is safe. We captured a bunch of Death Eaters, and Fudge saw Voldemort in the flesh. And Lucius Malfoy is dead." Snape tensed at that last declaration. "Dumbledore's talking to Fudge now, he forced a portkey on me. I don't know where Neville and the others are." With any luck they had been moved to the Hospital Wing, or at least away from the Ministry.

Fingers gently gripped his chin, and Snape tilted his head up, looking him in the eye. "Let me in," he urged, and Harry didn't have the energy to argue. He welcomed the man's Legilimency, shoving the memories of the whole evening his way. He wasn't sure how long they were stood like that, how much real time passed while Harry sent flashes of the last five hours, but eventually Snape pulled away. Then, to Harry's surprise, the dour Potions Master pulled him into a hug.

"You bloody marvel, Potter," he declared, and Harry laughed.

"Wasn't just me. The others helped too." They had been so amazing, so much better than he'd ever imagined.

Snape smirked lightly. "Indeed. I could spend the rest of my life re-watching the memory of Rabastan getting his wand snapped before his own eyes, and I would die a very happy man."

Harry grinned; Ginny had done that, once she'd got the man tied up by his own robes. Then she'd punched him in the face to break his nose before Stunning him unconscious. It was brilliant.

"I don't know what to tell Dumbledore," he blurted.

"He will need to know at least some of the truth. The Heads' paintings will tell him you accessed your family magic to get out."

Harry blushed sheepishly; perhaps that had been a little foolish, yes, but he had just felt so trapped.

"He can't find me here," he realised all of a sudden. Snape nodded.

"I have been down here waiting to hear word — and ignoring the rebellion, quite frankly," he added, incredulity touching his voice. "But from what I have heard through the house elves, your little defence club have gathered in the Great Hall to try and begin putting things to rights. The headmistress is... indisposed."

Harry definitely didn't want to know what that meant, but he nodded anyway, turning to the open space in the wall. He paused in the threshold. "Remus was fine, when I left that veil room."

Snape's responding nod was terse. "And I am sure he continued to be fine after you were gone."

That was that, and Harry didn't press further, continuing on his way. This time in the Chamber he followed a passage he had never used, but that he knew would take him up to the Great Hall. No one seemed to notice him stepping out from the wall beside the points hourglasses — all of which were entirely empty, now.

The house elf information network had been correct; Harry could see at least half the HA in the centre of the Great Hall, gathered around the Hufflepuff table. The room was in surprisingly decent shape, considering the state of the rest of the castle. But the signs of recent chaos were there if you knew what to look for.

"I leave you lot alone for five bloody minutes!" he burst out, startling everyone. He had to throw up a quick Shield spell at the number of curses that were sent his way.

"Harry!" Angelina exclaimed, going wide-eyed. "Where have you been?"

"It's complicated. I'll explain later." He could feel the intent eyes of the other heirs burning into him. "What happened here? I got a bit of a run-down from the Patils on the fourth floor, but I'll be honest it didn't make much sense. And then there was the swimming pool."

Several people snorted.

"We've got it under control now," Cho assured. "Mostly. We dealt with the worst of it once Umbridge was unconscious."

Harry's eyebrows rose. "Unconscious?"

A number of hands pointed towards the head table, where there was a large pink blob that Harry was only now beginning to realise contained the High Inquisitor. She was encased in some strange sort of bubblegum-coloured slime, limp and distinctly ruffled.

"She's fine. We think," Justin Finch-Fletchley assured him with an uncaring shrug. "She got hit by about sixty different spells so the mix was... interesting. Took a while to reverse it all. We'll get her up to Pomfrey once we've gotten rid of the swimming pool."

"Do we have to?" Colin Creevey sighed. "I've always wished Hogwarts had a pool."

"Maybe not one in the Entrance Hall, though," Harry pointed out, and Colin huffed.

"Spoilsport."

Harry surveyed the group, counting heads. “Where’s Lee?” he asked, remembering what Padma had said. Angelina scowled.

“With Pomfrey. That bitch didn’t have him under for long, luckily, but… it was awful.”

Harry, who had experienced more than his fair share of Cruciatus curses, nodded in sympathy.

“And the professors?”

A sea of sheepish faces. “Most of them are upstairs, dealing with the sixth floor,” Blaise volunteered. “It got… difficult.”

Harry definitely did not want to know.

“Right, then.” All he wanted was to curl up in a corner and sleep, but clearly the universe had other things in store for him. “I think stories can wait a bit. Let’s get rid of that pool, yeah?”

The group made for the doors, and Hannah slipped into the space beside Harry. “Where are the others?” she whispered urgently.

“Safe.” Harry hoped that wasn’t a lie.

Groans rang through the hall as the HA came to disrupt the impromptu pool party, and Harry raised his wand, pointing it at a purple rubber duck floating nearby.

And so that was where Dumbledore found him twenty minutes later; fishing second years out of the pool while they begged him to let it stay for just a couple days. The headmaster didn’t look nearly as alarmed as Harry would have anticipated, given the state his school was in. Indeed, he chuckled as one ballsy Gryffindor flung himsel back into the water as soon as Harry’s back was turned.

“Mr Potter, a word, if you don’t mind?” Dumbledore called, and a cheer went up at the sight of him, but all Harry could feel was cold dread. Nonetheless, he levitated himself over the pool, landing by Dumbledore’s side, and followed the man back up the stairs.

“I was surprised not to find you waiting in my office, Harry.”

“Yes, well I was surprised to find myself in there to begin with,” Harry returned evenly. “Involuntary portkey, not a fun experience. Especially not with my history of them.”

“Ah, I do apologise, but was necessary to remove you from that situation. Cornelius is already quite… volatile lately, I did not want to risk your safety,” Dumbledore told him. Harry held back a snort; a likely story. More like Dumbledore didn’t want interruptions when he spun whatever lie suited him best.

“And what about the safety of my friends? Where are they?”

“They have all been removed to the Hospital Wing,” Dumbledore informed him. Immediately, Harry turned down the corridor that would take him in that direction;

Dumbledore had been trying to lead him back to his office. “Harry, I must insist you come with me for a moment,” the headmaster attempted, but Harry kept walking.

“I want to see my friends. I need to make sure they’re okay.”

“You did not seem so concerned for their safety when you led them into danger,” Dumbledore said sagely, and Harry glared at him.

“They volunteered. They knew exactly what they were getting into. I’m still worried about them. Or do you not care about the lives of everyone you send into battle?”

“Those I send into battle are adults.”

“I’m not,” Harry pointed out sharply. “And yet you’ve managed just fine on that front.” He was losing his temper, perhaps, but he’d had a hell of a day, and the last thing he wanted was to hash everything out for Dumbledore so the man could give him some cryptic bullshit and sweep it all under the rug.

“Harry, my boy,” and there was that disappointed voice. “I must confess, I’m worried about you. You have been... different, this last year.”

“Maybe I’m just growing up,” Harry bit out. “Seeing your friend murdered in front of you will do that to a person.”

They reached the Hospital Wing, and Harry’s shoulders loosened at the sight of all five of his friends sat up in hospital beds, no longer covered in blood and dust and splinters of shelf like they had been when Harry had seen them last. They looked relieved to see him, too.

“How are you? Were any of you hurt?”

“Nothing Madam Pomfrey couldn’t fix,” Ginny promised. “She wants us all to stay overnight, but we’ll be fine tomorrow.”

That was excellent news, and Harry beamed at her.

“Ah, Mr Potter,” Madam Pomfrey herself greeted, stepping out of her office. “I was hoping you would arrive soon. Go on, then; on the bed, let me check you over.”

Harry didn’t argue with the mediwitch, perching on the edge of his usual bed and sitting still for her diagnostic spells.

“I have pieced together the vague series of events from various members of the Order,” Dumbledore began, “but I would like to hear your side of things, Harry. I am very intrigued to learn how six of my students made it all the way to London unaided.”

Harry bit his lip, thinking quickly to try not to incriminate Dobby. “We rode the thestrals, sir,” Luna piped up suddenly, in her usual dreamy voice. Dumbledore turned to her.

“Thestrals, Miss Lovegood?”

Luna nodded. “Yes, sir. Professor Hagrid taught us about them. They’re very fast, aren’t they?” Her pale blue eyes blinked owlishly. Dumbledore’s lips pursed, but the rest of them were straight-faced and nodding in agreement, so he could not press further.

“Indeed. Well, then. It is fortunate they carried you safely.”

Madam Pomfrey healed a cut on Harry’s cheek, and tutted. “Nothing but scrapes and bruises, Potter. All six of you are lucky as sin, going up against full grown wizards like that.”

Harry grinned to himself, sharing a look with his friends; luck had nothing to do with it. Those full grown wizards were not nearly as capable as they had made out to be.

“Excellent.” Dumbledore clasped his hands together. “Then, if you please, Harry; come to my office, and we can discuss the events of tonight.”

Harry wasn’t going anywhere with him. “We can do that here, sir. I trust my friends. Shouldn’t they know what they risked their lives for?” He had to play this carefully, and he wished he had one of his guardians there to help him because his brain felt like scrambled egg. “Voldemort wanted me to get a Prophecy, but it smashed in the fight.”

Dumbledore’s eyes darted quickly to the other students, but none of them reacted. Then, he sighed. “It smashed? You are certain?”

Harry nodded. “He was really angry when he found out. I suppose it was important. But it’s gone, now.” He put the appropriate amount of regret in his voice, wondering what the headmaster would say next. Wondering if he would admit that he knew the full words of the Prophecy.

He did not. “Indeed, it is,” Dumbledore sighed. “A shame. But do not fear, Harry; prophecies usually have a way of being fulfilled even when no one has heard them.”

Anger bubbled within Harry — yes, prophecies did get fulfilled, especially when meddling old goats were pulling strings without anyone noticing, cursing babies to use them as weapons when they grew.

“Tell me, my boy. What urged you to go to the Ministry tonight? You knew your godfather was in no danger.”

“Voldemort was going to take the Ministry,” Harry retorted. “The Order was busy. I wasn’t going to sit aside and let that happen. Which turned out to be the correct choice, considering how long we were there before the Order joined. Before you showed up.” Late as always, but just in time to take the most glorious part of the fight, and control the narrative of the outcome.

“I apologise that you felt there was no other option,” Dumbledore sighed. “I knew things would get difficult once I was no longer in the school. But throwing yourself into danger is never the answer, Harry.”

“But it worked! Look at us, we’re fine!” Harry gestured at his friends. “The Order is fine!” then he paused, “they are, aren’t they?”

“Nymphadora Tonks may need some time in St Mungo’s, but that is the worst of the damage,” Dumbledore confirmed, to Harry’s relief.

“See — we stopped the Death Eaters, prevented a Ministry coup, and stopped Voldemort from getting his hands on the Prophecy. I don’t think you can be mad at us for that, sir.”

Dumbledore clearly did not like this version of Harry that spoke back to him, though he was trying not to react outwardly in front of Pomfrey and the other students. “Be that as it may,” he said, a hint of frustration seeping in, “it was an enormous risk to take, and to expect your friends to take with you.”

“If I had seen another option, sir, I would have taken it,” Harry retorted evenly. “But I didn’t, and it’s done, and the only person who died is Lucius Malfoy, so I don’t really see that as a loss.”

Something flickered in Dumbledore’s eyes. “Death is always a loss, Harry.”

“Rather him than anyone I care about.”

“I’m sure the people who care about Lucius Malfoy would argue that. His son, perhaps.”

Harry didn’t know whether to laugh or curse the old man; he had no idea how Draco felt about his father. Harry would feel plenty of guilt over the situation, but that wouldn’t make him regret it, and he thought — he hoped — that Draco would agree.

“It has been a long and difficult evening,” Dumbledore said eventually. “I’m sure once you have had some rest, we can come back to this conversation with a more level head.” His tone was unbearably patronising, but at this point Harry was ready to take any end to the conversation with both hands.

“Great. I’m off to bed, then.”

“I’m sure Poppy would much prefer you spend the night with your friends here,” Dumbledore started, but Harry shook his head.

“Nope, I’m not injured, I’m not staying here.” He wanted to be properly reassured that his friends were alright, but that wasn’t going to happen with Dumbledore lurking around, and there was no way Harry was leaving himself so exposed by staying in the hospital wing overnight.

“Harry, please—“

“I’ll come see you guys in the morning,” Harry promised his friends, ignoring the headmaster.

“Tell Hannah to come visit in the morning, too, will you?” Susan requested. “She’ll be worried about me.”

Harry gave a thumbs up, and was out before anyone could argue, making a bee-line for the Room of Requirements. It took the form of his bedroom at Seren Du, and the sight of it tore a quiet groan from his chest.

“Ceri,” he called, and in an instant the elf had appeared. She looked Harry over with concern in her large brown eyes.

“Master Harry is hurt!”

“I’m fine, Ceri,” he assured. “Can you— would you take a message to Draco for me, please? If he’s alone. Tell him I’m back, and I’m up here.”

Ceri nodded and vanished, then returned a few moments later. “Master Draco is on the way. And Ceri brought Master Harry’s pyjamas.” She held out the bundle of fabric, making Harry grin weakly.

“Thanks, Ceri.”

The elf smiled and disappeared, leaving Harry alone.

The Room could have provided a shower, but Harry was too exhausted to even think about taking one. A weak Cleaning charm rippled sluggishly over his skin once he’d peeled off his school uniform, but the clean pyjamas felt good enough. He sighed in relief as he rolled onto the bed, not even pulling back the duvet.

There were a million and one things floating around his mind — he had to check on Sirius and Remus and the rest of the Order; he had to figure out exactly what the ever-loving fuck had happened in the school while he was gone; he had to deal with Dumbledore and whatever the man had told Fudge had happened.

But all that could wait until the morning. The only thing that couldn’t was Draco. Harry needed to tell him about his father before the rumours started.

The door opened quietly, and Harry looked up to see Draco slip in. The blond was visibly relieved to see Harry, and made straight for the bed, pulling Harry into a tight hug. Finally, the knot in Harry’s chest began to unravel itself — he was safe, he was with Draco. It was over.

But he still had to deliver the bad news.

“Thank fuck you’re safe, I was so worried,” Draco breathed, scattering kisses across Harry’s cheeks. “The school has been madness while you were gone, you’ll never believe some of the shit they pulled, but that hag is never going to come back to this castle after tonight, I swear,” he said with a smirk. Then he paused, took a proper look at Harry’s drawn face, and faltered. “What happened? What’s wrong?”

There was no easy way to say it. “Draco,” Harry sighed, fingers clenching around the Slytherin’s shirt. “It’s... your father died, at the Ministry. It... it was my fault. I’m sorry.”

Draco froze. Harry's heart sank as he watched his boyfriend, looking for any kind of response; sadness, anger, relief. But he was just... blank. "Oh," he said eventually. "I... what happened?"

Harry told him about the fight, and the strange veil, and the spell he'd deflected with his hand. He held Draco the whole while, feeling the tiny shudders rack his body. When he finished, he bowed his head, waiting for judgement. Draco just held him back tightly.

"He was trying to kill you," Draco rasped, and Harry nodded. "Then... it's not your fault. He brought it upon himself. I..." Draco shook his head, lying down. Harry eyed him cautiously, unsure if he should move closer or give the blond some space. "I never thought I'd be rid of him. Not truly. Certainly not before the Dark Lord died." He ran a hand over his pale face. "I'm free. Mother's free. My... my father is dead."

The words seemed to echo through the room. Draco stared at the ceiling for several long, silent moments. Then he looked at Harry, and his face softened. "You look exhausted." He pulled himself into a sitting position. "We can talk about... everything else, once you've had some sleep."

"Stay with me?" Harry asked desperately, wincing when his voice cracked. Draco leaned over, pressing their foreheads together.

"Of course, you daft lion. I'm not going anywhere," he promised. Harry's heart ached — his whole body ached, too, now the adrenaline was fading. But mostly he felt like he was going to cry, just from the sheer force of all the emotions from the evening, his love for Draco rising above them all.

Draco kicked off his shoes and stripped down to his boxers, while Harry reluctantly wriggled his way under the duvet properly. He wished that his first time sleeping in a real bed with Draco was under happier circumstances, but there was no way he was letting go now. He pressed himself to Draco's chest as soon as the blond boy joined him, and Draco's lithe arms wrapped tight around him, cocooning him safely.

And Harry fell asleep like that, with Draco whispering soothingly to him, promising that everything would be alright.

Chapter End Notes

You can breathe now, guys ;)

Chapter 73

They had to go to breakfast.

Harry knew this. He had to show his face, see the damage from the night before — both at the school and the Ministry. He had to see what the story was before it started twisting beyond his reach.

But Merlin, he didn't want to.

He let out a groan of protest, and felt Draco's chuckle rumble through his chest. "Come on," the blond urged. "Best get it over with now. Go to breakfast, check the paper, visit the Hospital Wing, then you can hide again." A kiss dropped to Harry's shoulder. "You know it's necessary."

He did, but that didn't make him any more eager to do it. Still, he reluctantly uncurled himself from Draco's embrace, and reached for his glasses on the bedside table.

"I suppose." It was already nearly nine. Luckily, it was a Saturday. He couldn't imagine having to face more classes after this. Or worse; exams.

The Room provided a bathroom, and the pair of them shared a shower, Draco helping Harry wash all the tiny glass particles and debris from his haphazard nest of hair. When they emerged, there were clean clothes waiting for them on the bed, no doubt thanks to one of the house elves. Once he was dressed, Harry's nerves began to rise. Draco reached for his hand, kissing the back of it. "It's going to be fine. Just keep your head up, and use all of that Gryffindor arrogance," he teased. Harry laughed. Then his green eyes softened with concern.

"Will you be alright?" They would have to go to breakfast separately, and Draco would have to deal with the whole school knowing his father had died — more than that, had died a Death Eater, trying to kill Harry Potter.

Draco nodded, and by the time he let go of Harry's hand the Slytherin Ice Prince mask was firmly in place. "I'll see you later," he promised, and then he was gone.

Harry took five long, steady breaths alone in the room, convincing himself not to just turn around and go right back to bed, and then walked out after him.

The school was still in a state of disarray, but the more pressing matters seemed to have been dealt with. Whatever had been on the sixth floor that required the entire staff to fix, there was no trace of it now, and the Entrance Hall was back to rights again — except for one lonely, half-deflated beach ball in one corner. Students stared wide-eyed at Harry as he passed, whispering to one another, but Harry ignored them.

Breakfast, Hospital Wing, Out, he promised himself, repeating the mantra over and over as he stepped into the Great Hall and sent the whole room into an abrupt silence.

The students were mixed again at the house tables, and Harry saw a small cluster of HA members at the end of the Hufflepuff table, so he joined them. His gaze flicked to the Slytherin table as he passed; Draco was there, looking exactly as stoic as Harry anticipated, with Theo and Pansy and Millie there to keep the busybodies away.

“Susan’s in the Hospital Wing, but she’s fine,” he said by way of greeting as he sat, directing his words to Hannah and Ernie. “She said to tell you to come visit as soon as you can. She should be getting released soon.”

The Hufflepuffs beamed in relief. “Brilliant. Thank you,” Hannah breathed. “I— you’d best take a look at this.” She handed over a copy of the morning’s Prophet, and trepidation rose like bile in Harry’s throat.

The headline was as expected; You-Know-Who alive, attacks Ministry. Some brave soul had managed to get a picture of Voldemort himself right as he grabbed Bellatrix to flee, and that took up most of the front page. Harry could see himself in the corner of the picture, battle-worn and scowling.

He skimmed the article, lips pursing. It wasn’t as bad as anticipated. Dumbledore had clearly gotten hold of the story, explaining how he had gotten wind of the attack and brought some ‘concerned fellow citizens’ to help, but somehow Harry and his friends had managed to sneak in and take on the Death Eaters themselves. He made it sound like the students had been struggling until the Order showed up, and Harry glared at that particular section of the article.

Further down, Amelia Bones was quoted, crediting Harry for raising the alarm at the Ministry through use of his Patronus message to her. What followed was a long, wheedling section that was ultimately a lot of arse-kissing from the Prophet, who were tripping over themselves to go back on everything they’d said about Harry being a liar and a lunatic.

At the end of the article there was mention that ‘a handful’ of Death Eaters had been captured but names would not be released until they had been questioned and processed. And there, practically a footnote; Lord Lucius Malfoy is known to have perished in the attack.

As if he had just stumbled across the Death Eaters and been hit by a stray spell.

Harry swallowed back a wave of disgust; of course, even now, there were so many people who had been paid off by Lucius Malfoy that they were not willing to so plainly accuse him. But word would get out, regardless.

By the sounds of the whispers in the hall, it already had.

“Monday’s classes have been cancelled,” Anthony informed him. “While the teachers put the school to rights over the weekend.”

“What happened to Umbridge?” Harry asked curiously. The group around him shared smug grins.

“She’s in the Hospital Wing,” Parvati supplied. “But I think the aurors will be coming for her, soon. There’s already been about thirty howlers from parents of kids who sent letters out last night, since she was too busy to monitor them. Everyone knows about the blood quill.”

That was good. Now that Fudge was in disgrace, she might actually face consequences.

Harry could see that everyone had questions, and he didn’t blame them; the Prophet certainly didn’t cover everything.

But Harry was so fucking tired.

“The others should be getting out of the Hospital Wing soon,” he said, piecing together a sausage sandwich and grabbing a hard boiled egg. “I’m going to go up and see how they’re doing, take Nev and Ginny back to Gryffindor.” And then probably spend the rest of the day there.

“Okay. We’re going to help the teachers clean up the school,” Padma declared, gesturing to her fellow prefects. “Any help would be appreciated, if the rest of you aren’t busy.”

Harry left them sorting that out, eating his sandwich as he walked, glaring at anyone who looked like they might try and ask him anything about the night before. He felt one set of eyes burning into him more than any other, and stopped in the doorway to look back at Albus Dumbledore.

The headmaster did not look impressed. Harry grinned at him, offering a little wave, and carried on his way. So what if Dumbledore thought he was Voldemort incarnate? Harry was the darling of the Wizarding World again, thanks to Amelia Bones. And now the fight had begun, Harry could work on ruining Dumbledore’s reputation so no one would listen to the old man anyway.

As Harry walked up to the Hospital Wing, he could see teachers and students alike trying to set the school to rights; repairing suits of armour, cleaning stains off of walls, vanishing the remnants of strange and bizarre magic. Most of the students were members of the HA, and it made Harry glow with pride to see them assisting — and to see the teachers clearly impressed with their magic use. Several of them waved at him as he passed, and he waved back, but didn’t stop to chat.

The Hospital Wing was quiet, with one bed curtained off far away from the students; Umbridge, most likely. To Harry’s surprise, despite the chaos of the school the night before, there only seemed to be a handful of students in beds, other than his own friends. Those five were all sat around one bed, dressed in clean clothes and looking none the worse for wear after their excursion. “Harry!” Neville greeted cheerfully. “We were just wondering if you’d show up. Madam Pomfrey says we’re all good to go.”

“Glad to hear it,” Harry replied. He looked at them all, amazement plain on his face. “Listen, guys; last night— that was far more than I should have asked of you, and I’m sorry. But you all did brilliantly. You were fantastic.”

“Those Death Eaters didn’t know what hit them,” Ginny said vindictively, eyes flashing.

“Don’t apologise, Potter; we knew what we were getting into,” Daphne added. “Also, here. You’ll want this back.” And then she slipped him a palm-sized glass orb, winking. Harry grinned, quickly hiding it away in his pocket.

“Wait. Was that—“ Susan gaped at him.

“The Prophecy I told Dumbledore I smashed?” Harry finished, keeping his voice low.
“Maybe.”

It had been easy, to speak with conviction against both Voldemort and Dumbledore. To let them into his mind just enough to see him look on in horror as a glass orb slipped from his hand and shattered on the ground.

But it wasn’t the same orb he’d pulled from the shelf. That he’d passed to Daphne while they’d run, hiding the movement in all the chaos.

Harry wasn’t going to let any advantage in this war pass him by.

“You’ve been hanging out with your boyfriend too much,” Neville teased, making Harry grin wider.

“There are worse influences.” His eyes trailed over the five students; five people he’d hardly known two years ago, yet who had risked their lives for him without hesitation. “Thank you. All of you. I’d be dead if you hadn’t come with me. And there would be a lot more Death Eaters still at large.” He was keen to see an exact list of numbers, to see how many his friends had subdued.

“You don’t need to thank us, Harry,” Neville insisted, clapping him on the shoulder.

“We were just doing what you taught us to do,” Susan agreed.

“Besides, it was fun,” Ginny added, and all of them laughed.

“I’ve created a monster,” Harry declared in mock-horror. Ginny punched him gently on the arm.

“Come on, let’s get out of here before Pomfrey finds some reason to keep us longer,” she said. “I want to see what happened to the school before it’s all cleaned up.”

“I can’t believe the whole school went nuts so quickly,” Daphne mused incredulously. “I know it’s been building up all year, but...”

Harry nodded; he hadn’t expected quite such an explosion either. “I can’t believe Umbridge used an Unforgivable on a student in front of half the school.” Good luck to her trying to worm her way out of that one.

They bumped into Hannah and Ernie at the doors, and Susan left to go with her Hufflepuff friends after hugging Harry quickly. The rest of them split up there, Luna going back to Slytherin with Daphne while the three Gryffindors headed for their common room.

Sadly for Ginny, most of the chaos and destruction had been handled., but there were still some signs of things. Harry was too tired to go searching for the best parts, especially as people were looking even more keenly at him now. He just wanted to go back to bed.

..

Neville bullied him into coming down for lunch, and so Harry found himself accompanying his friend to the Great Hall — Ginny had disappeared hours ago, apparently intent on seeking out some of the more fun pranks before they were returned to normal.

It was a balm on his ire to see the hall as it had been before Umbridge's Decrees; students sitting wherever they pleased, talking and laughing without fear of being put in detention for disruptive behaviour. Hogwarts could actually feel joy again, now.

Harry took a seat at the Gryffindor table, reaching ravenously for a plate of chicken drumsticks.

"Is the Prophet telling the truth, Harry?" Colin called from a few seats over, wide-eyed. "Did you really fight You-Know-Who at the Ministry last night?"

"I did. So did Neville and Ginny, and Luna and Susan and Daphne. We all went."

A wave of chatter followed the proclamation. "Wow," Colin breathed. "And Dumbledore duelled him? And you saw it?"

"Dumbledore showed up just as I met Voldemort—" a collective flinch "— in the atrium, after we'd already duelled a load of Death Eaters. Voldemort—" another flinch "— was trying to kill me, so Dumbledore distracted him with a duel. Then the aurors broke the wards and showed up with the Minister, so Voldemort—" less of a flinch, this time "— grabbed Lestrange and scarpered."

"You mean Professor Dumbledore wasn't with you when you fought the Death Eaters?" Katie Bell queried, frowning. Harry hid a grin — it was never too early to start dismantling Dumbledore's lies.

"No, we were alone when we got there," he said.

"It was nearly two hours before anyone showed up," Neville agreed. "And even then, Dumbledore never came down to the Department of Mysteries — that's where we were fighting," he explained. "He didn't make it down there until after all the fighting was over, when he came to take us back to school. All the Death Eaters who were still standing fled as soon as the anti-apparition wards broke."

Wide-eyed gasps, and another explosion of quiet chattering.

"The six of you fought Death Eaters for two hours all by yourselves?" There was more awe in Colin's eyes than Harry had ever seen before, which was saying something.

Before Harry could respond, Neville was smiling widely and clapping him on the shoulder. "It's what Harry taught us to do, right?" he reasoned.

Thankfully, those who had overheard seemed much more intent on spreading word to as many of their friends as possible, than on pestering Harry for more details.

Harry saw Dumbledore enter the hall and make a bee-line straight for the Gryffindor table, and he tensed. “Hey, Nev, I’m gonna go for a wander,” he said in a low voice. “Avoid that conversation I really don’t want to have.” Hazel eyes flicked to Dumbledore, and Neville tilted his chin in assent. “Cover for me?”

“Yeah, no worries.”

Grinning in thanks, Harry stood up, grabbed an apple, and strode quickly in the opposite direction, heading for the points hourglasses. The Parseltongue passage was well-hidden there, and as it closed quickly behind him Harry cackled to himself, imagining Dumbledore stood in the hall wondering where the fuck Harry had gone.

Once again, he found himself sneaking through the passage to Snape’s office, though this time it was empty. That didn’t bother him; a quick check of the Map had him grinning, heading for the man’s personal quarters.

As the Map had revealed, Remus was there too, and Harry barrelled into the man in a tight hug.

“Oh, cub,” Remus murmured, stroking his hair. “I’m so proud of you. Padfoot is, too. You did brilliantly last night. I’ve been telling Severus all about it.”

Harry turned to the Potions Master, who nodded, a faint smile crossing his lips. “It seems you have been listening in our lessons. May wonders never cease.”

Harry snorted, recognising the compliment for what it was. “How is everyone else? What’s going on with the Order? Dumbledore said Tonks is in hospital.”

“She’s fine. A Compression curse caught her in the chest and broke a couple of ribs — punctured a lung — but they got her all healed up and with a few days rest she’ll be back on duty,” Remus relayed. “The rest of the injuries were minimal. Quite frankly, it was a walk in the park compared to the raid we’d just come from. Your lot took out half the opponents for us.” He ruffled Harry’s hair proudly, and the Gryffindor preened.

With hot chocolate delivered by Ceri, the three of them got comfortable in Snape’s sitting room, and Harry relayed the events of the night before the Order had shown up. Snape explained that Draco had come straight to him with the news as soon as Harry and the others had left, but once Umbridge began her rampage there was little he could do, so he retreated to the safety of his office.

“The students had it covered,” he said dismissively. “Any Slytherin that did not want to be involved had already been escorted to the common room. I decided to leave the rest to their own decisions.”

A round-about way of saying he supported the dissent in the only way he could.

"Well, I can't say much for what happened after the Ministry got involved," Remus said, shrugging. "I got Sirius out of there as soon as we got notice that aurors were on the way. Kingsley took care of the whole situation, from what I've heard. Made sure to send aurors he trusted to sweep the whole department for any stray Death Eaters you lot had left trussed up like turkeys." He gave Harry a teasing glance.

"Hey, you're the ones who taught me to disarm and incapacitate as quickly as possible," Harry defended. "I just passed that information along."

"There's going to be an Order meeting this evening," Snape cut in. "To discuss the impact of last night, and how to move forward. Already we are hearing reports of neutral families fleeing the country, now that the Dark Lord's return is public."

Harry's amusement died quickly. "We need to get the sanctuary plan in motion," he said, and Remus nodded.

"Sirius is going to come here in the morning and take you to the Pottery," he relayed. "It shouldn't take long for you to claim the blood wards. We can go from there."

"Will it be safe, for me to leave?"

"Have you seen the state of the school, Potter?" Snape pointed out. "Albus will have far more important things on his mind."

"He wants to talk to me, alone," Harry said with a grim look. "Avoiding him for the rest of the week is going to be a pain in the arse." If he could manage it, if he could just make it to summer, he would be in the clear.

"You're no longer hiding your magic," Remus said, "or your knowledge. Do whatever you can; he won't want to risk making a move in front of the rest of the school."

"You have the staff singing your praises, that should help keep him out of your hair," Snape added, eyeing Harry shrewdly. "Apparently since you burned the secrecy contract, members of your little club have been quite proudly telling their teachers who taught them the advanced magic they've been using to help clean up Umbridge's mess."

Harry's cheeks went hot. "Oh."

"You're beginning to gain a reputation," the Slytherin informed him. "I'm sure Albus is thrilled."

That made both Remus and Harry snort. "Well, as long as I'm allowed to piss him off, now; might as well do it properly," Harry remarked dryly. "Oh, that reminds me." He reached into his pocket and pulled out the Prophecy orb. Both men froze.

"You said that was smashed," Remus breathed.

"Did I?" Harry's expression was entirely Slytherin. "How silly of me."

“You managed to fool the two greatest Legilimens in the country?” Snape asked, looking both proud and horrified. Harry shrugged.

“The two most arrogant Legilimens in the country,” he corrected. “I told them what they expected to hear, showed them basic proof, and they didn’t question it. I did smash a Prophecy. But this one was safe in Daphne’s pocket the whole time.”

There was a beat of silence. Then, Remus poked Snape in the shoulder. “And you thought Sirius and I were all the influence he had. Not my responsibility my arse; you’ve made him as sneaky as you are!”

Snape’s pale cheeks went vaguely pink. Harry wasn’t quite sure what that was about, but he laughed regardless. “Anyway, shall we see what it says?”

“I... are you sure you wish us to be the ones to hear it?” Snape asked, surprisingly cautious. Harry nodded without hesitation.

“I wish Sirius could be here too, but you can always tell him later. I trust you both.” No matter what he’d thought when he’d learned of Snape’s involvement with the Prophecy and the murder of his parents, the man had proven himself a hundred times over by now. He deserved to know.

Harry leaned forward, removed the Unbreakable charm he’d put on the orb, and slammed it down firmly on the coffee table.

Immediately, the pearlescent ghostly form of Sybil Trelawney rose from the shattered glass.

“The one with the power to vanquish the Dark Lord approaches... born to those who have thrice defied him, born as the seventh month dies... and the Dark Lord will mark him as his equal, but he will have power the Dark Lord knows not... and either must die at the hand of the other for neither can live while the other survives... the one with the power to vanquish the Dark Lord will be born as the seventh month dies...”

Then, she faded, leaving silence in her wake.

Harry stared at the small pile of glass shards, the words echoing through his head. “Well, then,” he croaked, and coughed. “That, uh... fair bit to unpack, there.” He looked up at the two men. “What do you think that power refers to? Just my family magics, or...?” He waved a hand up at his scar, to encompass the whole horcrux situation.

“It could mean the Slytherin magics in particular,” Snape suggested. “That is quite a heavy boost to your magic, and one he would be anticipating within himself rather than you. I believe the horcrux is covered in the later part; neither can live while the other survives.”

That was certainly true; Harry could not truly live safely with the shard of soul in his head — and the Dark Lord trying to kill him regularly — and Voldemort would always have a half-life while part of his soul existed within Harry.

“And Dumbledore put the block on my power, no doubt thinking that the explosion of its release could be the power the Dark Lord knows not,” Harry realised bitterly.

“Indeed.” Snape was solemn, thoughtful. “This knowledge changes very little of our plans, in all honesty. It does not suggest the number of horcruxes, or where they might be hidden. It is as vague and useless as most Divination.”

He was right, except the Prophecy wasn’t useless at all; it was worse than that, because so much damage had come from it.

“Business as usual, then?” Harry said, injecting false cheer into his voice. Remus and Snape both nodded.

“Business as usual.”

.

As instructed, first thing after breakfast the next morning Harry headed down to Snape’s quarters — once again neatly dodging Dumbledore’s attempt to talk to him. Sirius was waiting there, and the animagus pulled Harry into a rib-crushing hug.

“I know we’re on a tight schedule here, and we can talk properly in the summer, but I am so enormously proud of you, pup,” he murmured, making Harry’s heart clench. Then, Sirius looked up at Snape. “If we’re not back in an hour, you know what to do.”

The Slytherin nodded, and then they were gone.

For the second time in three days Harry found himself unexpectedly travelling by portkey. This time was easier, though, as he had Sirius’ arms securely around him. They landed in Sirius’ bedroom at Grimmauld Place.

“I thought we were going to the Pottery?” Harry queried, and Sirius nodded.

“We are, but this is just in case anyone traces the portkey. We’re going to apparate the rest of the way, alright?”

Harry, whose eyes had caught on t-shirt draped on the end of the bed that he was fairly certain belonged to Charlie, snapped back to attention and nodded. Sirius held him tight again, and then they were spinning.

“Here we are, Harry,” Sirius said, his voice soft and oddly choked. “The Pottery. Your ancestral home.”

Harry looked up at the huge wrought iron gates in front of them. They held the Potter crest, and the magic emanating from them felt so familiar Harry thought for a moment he might cry. Sirius nudged him forward gently. “Go on. They’re blood-warded, they’ll know you.”

Harry did as bid, stepping up to the gates and placing a hand on the lock. Instantly something pricked his finger, and then warmth flooded his body. The Potter magic searching him, twining with the family magic of his own core. It felt happy.

It felt like it was welcoming him home.

There was a click, and then the gates swung open, revealing the house ahead.

It wasn't as big as Seren Du, but it was just as beautiful. A large stone manor, like the old listed houses Aunt Petunia used to sigh over on the telly. The front lawn was a sea of wildflowers, and ivy crept up the front facing wall. To Harry's surprise, it didn't look as dilapidated as he expected after fifteen years of neglect.

That was quickly answered by two quiet pops, and the appearance of a pair of house elves in front of him. They were almost identical, wearing neat white toga-like uniforms, and they stared up at him with tears in their huge brown eyes.

"Master Harry has arrived," the elf on the left breathed in awe. "We has been hoping for many years this day would come."

"Essie? Tinker? Is that you?" Sirius moved to Harry's side, and the elves wailed loudly.

"Master Sirius!" the elf on the right screeched, throwing itself at Sirius' knees and hugging tightly.

"Bloody hell, I didn't realise you two were still around!"

"We is waiting, Master Sirius!" the elf wrapped around Sirius' legs cried. "We is keeping house and we is waiting, hoping we will have family again!"

It took a few minutes to calm their sobs, and Sirius looked up at Harry, beaming. "Pup, this is Essie and Tinker. They've been Potter elves since before your dad was born."

"Oh. It's nice to meet you." Harry hadn't been expecting elves. They both beamed up at him, still crying silently.

"Master Harry is looking so much like his parents!" Tinker crowed delightedly.

"Missy Lily's pretty eyes, just like Master James wanted," Essie agreed. Harry's breath caught in his throat. Beside him, Sirius laughed.

"Even as kids, James would go on forever about how he wanted his and Evans' future kids to have her eyes," he explained fondly. "Creepy little weirdo that he was."

Snorting, Harry looked back at the elves. "I... I can't stay very long. I'm supposed to be at school." Both elves drooped sadly. "But there will be people here again soon. Having you two here is brilliant, actually." With two elves running the place, the sanctuary would go that much smoother — and better protected. "Would you show me to the wardstone, please?"

"Yes, Master Harry, sir!" Tinker chirped, and then they were off.

As they walked up the driveway, Harry explained to the elves what he was planning — they seemed a bit sad that he was planning on living elsewhere for now, but eager to welcome new guests to the manor.

If they'd had more time, Harry would have loved a full tour. As it was, he promised to come back for one as soon as summer began, though he wasn't sure if he was emotionally ready for it; the elves said they had kept everything as it was, including James' childhood bedroom. And Sirius' room, from after he'd run away from home.

But for now, all he saw was the entrance hall, the basement stairwell, and the ward room. Sirius had to wait outside, as he was not technically a member of the Potter family, not by blood or marriage.

But he had already instructed Harry on what to do, so Harry stepped forward and placed both hands on the glowing red wardstone; a perfectly smooth crystal about the size of a dragon egg. Immediately magic washed over him, a hundred times more intense than the magic of the gates. His knees almost buckled with the force of it, but Harry pushed his Potter magic to the forefront, making his intentions clear. He was not there to cause harm, only to claim his birthright.

The battle of wills took several minutes, but eventually Harry felt the pressure ease as the wards accepted him. They lingered, a presence in the back of his mind. It was... odd; he could feel the two elves, feel Sirius in the house. His godfather had explained what it was like to hold house wards, especially old house wards, but it was still strange.

Sirius was grinning when Harry rejoined him in the stairwell. "Done it?" the animagus asked, beaming when Harry nodded. "Brilliant. Well done, pup." He bit his lip, hesitating. "There is one more thing I considered. But I'm not sure if you'll want it. And I completely understand if you don't." Harry raised an eyebrow. "I thought we could do a Fidelius charm on the property."

Harry went wide-eyed, and Sirius misunderstood the reaction, face flashing with hurt. "Yeah, no, of course not — not after the last one, that's just—"

"No, Sirius, I didn't say that," Harry protested. "I was just surprised." It made sense; an extra layer of protection for those who needed it. "Can we do a Fidelius charm?"

"I mean, I know how, if that's what you're asking. I can make you the Secret Keeper. If you want to. Then at least you won't have to worry about the people you welcome here sneaking in anyone unsavoury."

"Let's do it," Harry said decisively. It certainly couldn't hurt.

The spell was surprisingly less complicated than Harry had expected. "It's not all that difficult, but it takes power," Sirius explained. "And it relies so heavily on trust that a lot of people are too scared to use it." With a Fidelius, there was no consequence to the Secret Keeper sharing the secret, no monitor of how many or who they shared it with.

But Harry wasn't going to tell anyone who didn't need it, and so when he portkeyed back from Grimmauld to Snape's rooms after hugging Sirius goodbye, it was with the location of Potter Manor sitting safe and sound in the back of his head, along with his new awareness of the wards. He looked at Snape, and smiled briefly. "The Pottery can be found on the northeast edge of Thetford Forest,” he declared, feeling the spark of magic pass from himself to the Potions Master. Snape raised an eyebrow.

“Fidelius, on top of the Unplottable wards?” Harry nodded. “Good. Now get somewhere public before someone comes looking for you.”

Harry wasn’t bothered by the abrupt ejection from Snape’s rooms. He had other places to be, after all; he used the Map to seek out Theo, finding him out on the grounds by himself.

“Hey,” Harry greeted quietly, warding the area as soon as he approached the Slytherin. Theo was sat on a bench not far from the greenhouses. “I have news for you.”

Harry sat beside him and leaned in, whispering the secret into Theo’s ear. Moss-green eyes widened. “It’s still Unplottable,” Harry warned him, “I’ll give you a portkey on the train.”

“Thank you, Harry.” Theo’s quiet whisper was hoarse, and Harry looked closer and realised the boy’s eyes were red-rimmed. A sudden realisation hit him.

“Theo, I— your dad wasn’t at the Ministry, was he?”

Theo’s mouth twisted in a sneer. “No. He was one of the Death Eaters torturing muggles up outside Manchester,” he revealed hatefully. Harry winced. “Along with Cassius’ uncles and cousins.”

“Fuck.” Harry wished Cassius would accept the offer of sanctuary.

“You’ve saved my life doing this, you know,” Theo told him matter-of-factly. Harry clasped his shoulder.

“I’m glad I could help. And I’m glad you made the choice to let me.” It couldn’t be easy, going against a father like Theo’s. He’d seen a similar struggle in Draco over the years, and that was with the support of his mother. Theo had no one, until recently.

Harry left the Slytherin boy to his solitude — or perhaps not quite that, for he passed Susan on his way back into the castle — and spent a pleasant afternoon avoiding Dumbledore by lazing in front of the fire in the Gryffindor common room. Everyone seemed to have recognised that the interesting bits of the story of the Ministry had already been said; now people just wanted to know what the fall-out would be. And that was nothing Harry could control.

He did, however, use Dobby to get a message to Blaise, telling him to get any kids whose families needed sanctuary to the Room of Requirement at seven.

Blaise didn’t disappoint. He met Harry at the Room at six fifty-five, and within ten minutes there were eight Slytherin kids of various ages in there with them. Harry vaguely recognised some, but most were students he’d never interacted with in his life.

“Okay, here’s the plan,” he began without delay. “I have an Unplottable, Fidelius-protected building that I will be setting up as a sanctuary for anyone who needs to avoid persecution from either side of this war. I won’t question yours or your family’s right to use it, but only ask that you do nothing to jeopardise anyone else living there. You treat your fellows with respect, regardless of what you think of them. Remember, everyone else is there for the same reason you are. If you or your family cannot hold to these rules, this isn't the place for you."

One of the older Slytherins put his hand up. "What will we owe you for use of this building?" he asked expectantly. Harry resisted the urge to roll his eyes; bloody Slytherins!

"Nothing but the things I've already said. You keep the others in the sanctuary safe, and you behave while you're there. If anyone wants to get more involved in the war, that's something we can discuss later, but it's not in any way expected." Harry ran a hand through his hair. "All I'm asking is that you keep my secrets, the same way I'm keeping yours."

Several of the kids sent Blaise a look as if to say 'is this guy for real?', and Blaise smirked. "Harry isn't the type to collect debts," he assured. "Gryffindors," he then added wryly, which seemed to placate the skeptics among them.

"So how do we get our families there before He can come for us?" the youngest, a timid-looking second year girl, asked tentatively. Harry grinned.

"I'm glad you asked."

It was a somewhat convoluted plan, but Harry was confident it would work.

Chapter 74

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Classes resumed on Tuesday, but the teachers' hearts weren't really in it. Flitwick spent the whole of the double period talking to them about the charms involved in various wizarding sweets — while letting them sample said sweets, naturally. Then, because McGonagall was still gone from the castle, their double Transfiguration was a free period. It was a glorious day outside, so Harry was happy to accompany Neville out towards the edge of the forest so the boy could look at some plant that had recently bloomed. Harry wandered his way over to Hagrid's hut; he'd hardly seen his half-giant friend all school year, he thought guiltily.

"Good to have you back, Hagrid," he said as they sat on the front step of Hagrid's hut in the sunshine, and Hagrid grinned.

"Aye, good to be back. I hear you got into quite the adventure while I was away!" Harry shrugged, holding out his arms in a 'these things happen' sort of gesture, and Hagrid laughed. "Least you came out the end alright."

"I always do."

"An' everyone knows you been tellin' the truth, now," Hagrid added supportively. "You an' Professor Dumbledore." The bearded man's face grew concerned. "'E's worried about you, y'know."

"I know. But he doesn't need to be." Harry's stomach squirmed; one of these days, he was going to have to ask Hagrid to make a big decision about their friendship, and he wasn't sure which way it would turn out. "Hagrid... we're friends, right? And you trust me?"

"O' course!" Hagrid replied immediately.

"Good. Then... when it comes to Professor Dumbledore, and the way things go between me and him... just remember that, yeah?"

Hagrid frowned at him. "What d'you mean?"

"Nothing, just... I really hope we keep being friends, Hagrid. Even as I get older and things change."

A large hand came down heavy on his back. "Yer not gettin' rid 'o me any time soon, 'Arry, don't you worry!" Hagrid's grin turned a little sad. "Even though I know yer gonna tell me yer not takin' my class for NEWTs."

Harry winced; he hadn't even thought about how to bring that up, yet. "Hagrid, I—"

"Nah, nah, it's fine. S'not for everyone," Hagrid assured. "I reckon you've got classes a bit more important than mine to take."

"You've been a great teacher, Hagrid," Harry said earnestly. "And it's a fun subject." It just wasn't the career path for Harry. "I'll still come visit, when I can."

"That's alright, then," Hagrid declared, the matter settled. "We were friends before I started teaching yeh, and we'll be friends long after, I 'ope."

Harry hoped desperately that was true.

. . .

He stayed with Hagrid for a little while longer, remaining evasive about what he meant about Dumbledore — the same way Hagrid remained evasive regarding all the injuries he'd been getting all year, just insisting he 'had it handled'. As lunch drew closer, Harry decided to head back towards the castle. Neville seemed to have disappeared, either back to the castle or off to the greenhouses, so Harry was alone on his way back up.

In the entrance hall, he froze; Draco, Crabbe and Goyle had just emerged from a door to the side, coming up from their common room. They stopped at the sight of him. Harry's heart clenched.

He hadn't had the chance to spend time with Draco since he'd got back from the Ministry; both of them were under far too much scrutiny to risk trying to meet up. There were only a few more days of term; they could wait. But it still hurt Harry to see his boyfriend drifting around the school like a ghost in the wake of his father's death.

It hurt not to know how much of that was just a performance.

Draco sneered at him, clearly gearing up to say something, and Harry prepared himself for a performance — and then the door opened behind him, and Draco's face went even paler.

"Everything alright, gentlemen?"

Harry wheeled around at the voice, face lighting up. "Professor McGonagall!"

The Gryffindor housemistress looked more frail than Harry was used to seeing her, leaning heavily on a walking stick, but her eyes were as sharp as ever.

When Harry glanced back, the three Slytherins were gone.

"Oh— let me help you with that, Professor," Harry insisted, stepping forward to reach for her bag. He waited for the nod of permission, then took it from her hand, along with her travelling cloak. "It's good to see you back."

"I hear there was quite the ruckus in my absence," she replied, and even though he hadn't been involved in the mutiny against Umbridge, Harry still blushed. "Walk with me, Potter."

He did as bid, keeping pace with her slow, limping walk. She refused assistance on the stairs, but Harry remained a step behind her, just in case. "I have been in touch with the rest of the staff while I was away, Mr Potter. And, of course, I read the Prophet."

Harry winced.

"My colleagues have told me quite a bit about you," McGonagall continued. "Particularly, the feedback they have gotten from those students who claim to have been under your tutelage all year."

"I... Umbridge wasn't wrong about the secret defence club," Harry admitted, and McGonagall's lips twitched.

"We all knew that from the start, Potter," she informed him dryly. "What we didn't know was quite how... comprehensive your curriculum appears to be."

"There are more useful spells in a fight than just curses and jinxes, Professor."

"Indeed. And the healing charms? The conjuration? Professor Flitwick tells me some of his students say you taught them some rather advanced concealment spells."

"I asked everyone what spells they wanted to learn," Harry dismissed, "so really, it was a group effort."

McGonagall's shrewd gaze made him want to squirm. "Indeed," she said flatly. "And the five students who accompanied you to the Ministry, and by all reports aided you in the capture of no less than fourteen Death Eaters?" Harry had not yet heard that official number, but it sounded about right, and it made him grin.

"They asked to learn how to fight. So we learned together." It sounded a lot better than admitting Remus and Sirius had been training him in secret. "I had a bit of help from some Order members. But it's easy enough to teach people how to manage a solid Stunner, Disarming charm and Incarcerous charm. Those are the important ones."

"I hear you also taught your friends to snap their opponent's wand." He couldn't tell if McGonagall sounded impressed or dismayed.

"Only in a serious fight," he insisted. "But if their wand is snapped, they can't get it back and hex you with it."

There was silence once more as McGonagall focused on making it up the last few stairs. Then she eyed him carefully. "Professor Dumbledore believes there to be outside influences at work on you."

Harry held in a snort; the only outside influence was Dumbledore himself, and Harry had shed those! "I have learnt over the last few years that Professor Dumbledore is not as omnipotent as he seems. Nor as trustworthy."

McGonagall's eyebrows jumped up her forehead, but Harry held her gaze patiently. He wanted so badly for her to be on his side, to be willing to see Dumbledore for the man he truly was. "I believe Albus likes to think himself infallible," she said eventually, "and that can often lead to less than ideal results."

It wasn't much, but it was enough. Harry's shoulders relaxed, ever so slightly, and he shot a quick smile at his housemistress.

"You know, Mr Potter," she said, coming to a stop outside her office, "from everything I've heard, you would make an excellent teacher," and then she smiled — not wide, but bigger than anything he'd seen from the reserved woman. "Once you're done taking the quidditch league by storm, of course."

Harry grinned at her. "I'll certainly think about it, Professor." He'd heard worse ideas.

"You do that." She accepted her bag and cloak back, opening her office door. "I look forward to seeing your OWL results, Potter."

"I hope they're worth the anticipation," he joked. To his surprise, McGonagall placed a gentle hand on his shoulder.

"I can guarantee, Mr Potter, that whatever is in those results will be something you should be proud of. Something your godfather and Professor Lupin will be proud of. Your parents certainly would be, were they here to see it." A quick squeeze. "I am proud, to have you as my student. Both for what you have done at the Ministry, and everything you have done for your fellow students during the course of this last year." She narrowed her eyes knowingly. "Don't think I don't know where those care spells for those wretched Blood Quill wounds began circulating."

Ducking his head to hide his blush, Harry had to swallow against the lump in his throat. "I— thank you, Professor. That means a lot to hear."

She pat his shoulder once more, then stepped into her office. "Oh, and do try and stay out of trouble for the rest of the week, Potter," she added wryly. "I may be back on my feet, but that is an extra stress I do not need."

Harry laughed, offering his most innocent smile. "I'll try my best, Professor."

Yes, there was definitely hope for Minerva McGonagall yet.

. . .

Harry still didn't have his own subscription to the Prophet, but he was thinking about getting one, and when Wednesday's headline stared him in the face across the breakfast table that morning, he almost spit out his tea.

'Not As Black As He Seems? Death Eater Captured At Ministry Is Confirmed Peter Pettigrew: Sirius Black Case To Be Re-Opened'

"Hey, can I borrow that?" Harry requested. Alicia shrugged, handing the paper over.

He read the article quickly — evidently one of the still-masked Death Eaters they had subdued during the battle in the DoM had been Pettigrew all along, and he was now in Ministry custody awaiting questioning by Veritaserum. They were asking members of the public to come forward if they had any information on the incarceration or whereabouts of Sirius Black.

Harry's heart pounded in his chest, and his gaze sought Susan out at the Hufflepuff table. Luckily, she was in her usual seat, and Harry hurried over to her. "Susan!"

"Harry," she greeted, scooting over to make room for him. "You've seen the paper?"

"Susan, I— you saw him, right? Fighting with us, at the Ministry?" he asked quietly, and she nodded. They both knew he wasn't talking about Pettigrew.

"He was on our side, for sure," she confirmed.

"Will you write to your aunt?" he begged. "Tell her I'm willing to testify to whatever jury I need to. And—and tell her to look into my parents' wills, if they had any." It always seemed suspicious to Harry that his parents wouldn't write something in their wills to clarify the Secret Keeper in case of their deaths.

"I will. But you can write to her yourself, if you'd like," Susan pointed out. "I know after what happened the other night, she wants to meet you properly." The red-haired girl grinned. "She told me to invite you over for dinner sometime this summer, if you're willing. Seems she wants to thank the boy who turned her niece into such a 'ruthless little warrior'."

"I'd be happy to," Harry agreed brightly. "I, uh, don't know what I'm doing this summer, though. I'll get back to you."

"Once your godfather is free, we'll invite you both over," Susan said, and there was so much confidence in her voice Harry couldn't help but hug her.

Sirius could be free.

.-. .

At Grimmauld Place, Sirius Black was staring at the same newspaper headline, hands clenched tight around the paper, heartbeat a furious drum in his otherwise empty head.

"Sirius, what's the matter?" Charlie asked, yawning. He had stayed the night, and was over at the stove cooking omelettes. He hadn't seen the post arrive.

Sirius made a noise that was halfway between a yelp and a groan, and Charlie looked over. And then dropped the frying pan with a clatter. "Holy fuck." He hurried over, one warm hand on Sirius' shoulder as he leant over him to read the headline. Sirius still couldn't think, not really, but he focused on that hand, that grounding pressure, until finally he could breathe normally again.

"They got Pettigrew," he breathed, wide-eyed in astonishment. He craned his neck, meeting Charlie's gaze. "They've caught Pettigrew. They... they're looking into my trial."

"And Kingsley's on it, so you know he won't let the rat escape," Charlie added. His thumb began to stroke the curve of Sirius' neck, his dimples out in full force as he smiled brightly.

“You’re going to be free, sweetheart.”

Sirius surged up, dropping the paper in order to get a hand in Charlie’s fiery hair, his other bracing himself on the man’s shoulder. Charlie kissed him furiously, both of them pouring their relief and delight wholeheartedly into the embrace.

They were so engrossed in each other that they didn’t notice the fire in the grate flare green. But they did hear the scream.

Molly Weasley stood in front of the hearth, staring at the pair of them in utter shock. “You... but... Charlie.” She snapped out of the daze, face rapidly turning red. “Sirius Black, what in Merlin’s name do you think you’re doing to my son? Charlie, get away from him,” she urged in a high-pitched, alarmed voice.

“He wasn’t doing anything I didn’t want, Mum,” Charlie insisted, making Molly’s eyes bulge.

“But—he’s so much older! And a criminal!”

“Wrongly convicted, as you well know,” Sirius said, getting to his feet, glaring at the woman. Whether it was the news of his impending freedom or the surety of Charlie’s hand on his shoulder, Sirius felt suddenly like he could do absolutely anything — including tell Molly Weasley where she could shove her judgement. “Charlie is a grown man, Molly. He doesn’t need you making his decisions for him.”

“He is my son!” Molly argued. “I won’t have you manipulating him into some kind of relationship he thinks he wants! He’s barely older than Harry!”

“He’s eight years older than Harry, and how dare you accuse me of manipulating him!” Something in Sirius snapped, and an entire year’s worth of anger came spilling out. “I don’t care that you don’t think I’m good enough for him — hell, I agree with you! — But you will not do him the disservice of thinking he isn’t capable of making his own bloody choices about who he wants to be with! And more than that, you will not accuse me of forcing him into anything, in my own house! Or have you forgotten that, Molly?” he pressed, and over on the counter the plates began to rattle. “This is my house, where I have allowed you and your family to live for weeks, completely for free, eating food that I paid for, enjoying the safety of wards that I hold, and not once have I heard a single word of gratitude! All you’ve done is act like you own the place, talk down to me, belittle me in front of my godson and the Order and your own children, treat me like I’m some filthy criminal when we all know I never deserved to be in Azkaban! You’ve treated my house like it’s some den of Dark magic and iniquity, too good for your precious babies, trying to throw out my family heirlooms without so much as asking if I might want to keep them! And now you come in here — entirely uninvited, might I add — and try and convince the man I love that he shouldn’t be with me? Well I have had enough!”

Abruptly, Molly turned chalk-white, and Sirius snarled at her. “I am barring you from the house wards, Molly. You’re no longer welcome here.”

“But—but the Order!”

“Not my problem,” Sirius snapped. “You don’t like it, take it up with Dumbledore.” They could all bugger off, as far as he was concerned. “Now get out of my house!”

“Charlie. Charlie, please. Come with me. Can’t you see this man is dangerous?” Molly turned imploring eyes on her son, but Charlie’s hand remained firmly on Sirius’ shoulder.

“No, Mum, he’s not. I’m staying here.”

Molly looked at him, tears in her eyes, but when he didn’t move she huffed. “Fine.” She turned to the fire, grabbed a handful of floo powder from the tin, and was gone.

Immediately, the anger drained from Sirius like someone had pulled the plug. He was breathing like he’d run a marathon, and leaned back against Charlie’s broad chest. “I’m sorry,” he said hoarsely, belatedly realising that may not have been the best way of handling things. “Charlie, I—“

But anything he might have said was swallowed by Charlie’s tongue pressing furiously into his mouth, the redhead spinning Sirius around and pinning him to the table by his hips.

“Watching you stand up for yourself was so fucking sexy,” the redhead rasped, lips trailing down Sirius’ stubbled jaw. “Merlin, sweetheart. Don’t apologise. Mum’s had that coming for months.”

Sirius was lightheaded with relief and euphoria and a dozen other things, and he gripped the back of Charlie’s t-shirt. “I need to write to Amelia Bones,” he said dazedly. Charlie stroked his shoulder.

“Not yet. You’re still shaking,” he pointed out, and Sirius realised he was right. His body was trembling, he was going to fall apart. So many emotions bouncing around him, so many positive emotions he could hardly breathe from it all. The table digging into the back of his thighs was helping a little, but he needed more, he needed grounding.

“Upstairs,” he gasped, and Charlie pulled back to look him over properly. Those beautiful sapphire eyes lit up with arousal. “I need you.”

“Now that sounds like a much better plan,” the dragon tamer drawled, the sound caressing Sirius’ bones. “I’ll take you upstairs, and fuck you into the mattress so hard you’ll see stars. Then you can write whatever letters you want.” He kissed Sirius hot and hard, and when he pulled back this time his face was softer, something else burning in his gaze. “And then we can talk about how you told my mum you love me.”

Sirius’ heart stuttered. He had said that, hadn’t he?

But Charlie was smiling, and he was still there, so maybe it was okay.

.-.-.

The end of term arrived, not with a bang, but with a whimper. Or, more accurately, with an enormous sigh of relief.

Dumbledore's end-of-year speech had been as vague and useless as always, reminding people to trust in the power of love and always find the light in the darkness and other such platitudes. The house cup had been awarded to Ravenclaw for their grand total of sixty-seven points, which was still an impressive amount to have been gained in the week since The Umbridge Incident as it was now being referred to. Cornelius Fudge had officially been sacked, and the hunt was on for an interim Minister — it seemed no one wanted to risk a proper vote with the country so fraught. Harry quietly hoped Amelia Bones got the job.

But at last the students had packed, the seventh years had cried, and Harry was finally heading down to the train station at the end of another year at Hogwarts.

“Harry, my boy.” The call sent a burst of annoyance through him. He’d managed to avoid Dumbledore successfully for the last week, needing more and more blatant methods of escape. He’d thought he was free.

Evidently not.

“Headmaster, I really must get to the station,” Harry said, still walking through the Entrance Hall. Dumbledore moved closer towards him, frowning faintly.

“I only need a moment of your time,” he insisted. Harry snorted — he doubted that.

“Sir, I don’t want to miss the train. Can’t it wait until next year?” By which point, the stage would be set and likely Dumbledore wouldn’t want to talk to Harry at all.

“I suppose I can come and see you at your godfather’s house,” the headmaster remarked, and Harry forced a smile on his face to cover his laughing eyes. If Dumbledore thought he could find Harry at Grimmauld, he had another thing coming. “Very well, then. I shall see you soon, Harry.”

“Goodbye, sir.”

Harry jogged to catch up with Neville, who eyed him warily. “What did he want?” the blond asked, and Harry shrugged.

“The usual. He says he’ll stop by Sirius’ place for a chat in the summer.” He rolled his eyes, and Neville snorted.

“Good luck to him on that.”

They joined the crowd of students heading for the station, and soon the pair of them were tucked away in a compartment with Ginny, Luna, Daphne and Blaise. The two Slytherins had been adopted quite neatly into the group, thanks to their partners, even though Blaise’s was no longer at school. Harry had been ferrying letters between them with Remus and Ceri since the twins had left, and their relationship seemed to be going strong.

“You should come visit this summer,” Ginny said to the two Slytherins. “Luna only lives over the fields from me. And I’m sure George would come home if you were around,” she added to Blaise, who smirked.

"Considering I plan to spend at least three weeks of summer at his flat, I don't need to come visit you to see my boyfriend," he said, "but I'll keep it in mind."

"Please, someone come visit," Ginny begged. "Otherwise it'll just be me and Ron."

Harry grimaced in sympathy, and he wasn't the only one.

"You can come stay with me," Neville offered, and then went bright pink. "I mean, Gran wants to meet you properly, and I'm sure she wouldn't mind if you wanted to come over for a week or two. Or more. Or less. Whatever, really."

Ginny laughed, pecking her babbling boyfriend on the cheek. "I'd love to," she assured. "Talk to your gran and let me know."

"I'm gonna be a bit all over the place, but you're always welcome at Sirius' place," Harry assured her. He hadn't said a thing about Charlie yet, even though Sirius told him Bill proposed to Fleur the day after the battle at the Ministry. Neither of those things were his news to share.

Harry looked out the window as the conversation turned to miscellaneous other summer plans, watching the green hills of the highlands roll by. "I'm gonna have a wander," he said, getting to his feet. "I'll be back in a bit."

They waved him off, unconcerned, and Harry stepped out into the train corridor. He glanced into compartments as he passed them, looking for familiar faces; he found one full of Gryffindor seventh years fresh from their graduation ceremony, and was dragged inside so Angelina and Alicia could hug him and make him promise to replace them with good chasers, but not too good, because they wanted him to miss them. Another compartment held a bunch of Hufflepuffs in his year, and while Megan Jones and Oliver Rivers eyed him coolly, Susan and the rest were happy to chat.

It was still a surprise to Harry, how many people he knew in the school — it was even more now, he realised, since he'd done the HA. Now he had all sorts of people waving at him, exchanging friendly words, wishing him a good summer. Loads of his friends promising to keep in touch.

He'd come a long way from the boy who only had Ron and Hermione.

Speaking of whom, he found them in a compartment with Dean and Seamus; Hermione reading a book while the three boys played exploding snap. Harry didn't stop to chat, but as he looked in the door Hermione caught his eye, giving him an unreadable look that made him vaguely uncomfortable.

He carried on quickly, and was relieved to find Cho with the Hufflepuff seventh year boys a few compartments down. All of them showed signs of crying, and Cho was holding the picture of Cedric that had been up in the Room of Requirement for so long.

"Don't be a stranger, eh, Potter?" Patrick said, reaching out to shake Harry's hand. "If you need us, we'll be there. Cho knows where to find us."

"I'll keep that in mind," Harry promised seriously. All of the boys were skilled duellists after their time in the HA, and Harry would be happy to fight with them any time.

Cho hugged him, kissing his cheek. "Write me this summer, if you can?"

"I will, yeah." He wouldn't have any restrictions on his mail this time, and he was very much looking forward to that.

Harry carried on his way, stopping briefly to look in to a compartment full of Slytherins — namely Draco, Theo, Pansy, Millicent, and Cassius. Checking the corridor, Harry slipped in quickly, warding the door so no one could see through it.

"Oh, it's you," Pansy sighed, and Harry snorted.

"Nice to see you, too," he said dryly. He turned to Draco. "Where are Dumb and Dumber?"

"Bathroom," Draco explained. "So you've got a bit of time." He reached for Harry, unceremoniously pulling the Gryffindor into his lap and kissing him firmly.

"Draco, must you?" Millicent sighed. Harry felt Draco raise a hand, and was certain his boyfriend had just flipped her off.

Reluctantly, Harry pulled back. "I didn't actually come here for that," he said, though he certainly wasn't complaining. "Just wanted to check you're all okay going home." He knew Pansy's father was one of the Death Eaters arrested at the ministry, though unfortunately Theo's father was not. But all of them still had active Death Eaters in the family.

"We'll be fine, Potter," Pansy assured. "And if we're not, we know where to go." Harry had told all of them the floo address for Remus' cottage that he hardly ever used, just in case they needed a fast escape.

"Cassius?" Harry checked, still feeling uneasy about letting the now-graduated Slytherin go back to his uncle and brother.

"I'll stay as long as I can last," the dark-haired boy said. "I told my uncle I got a flat, so I shouldn't need to put up with them too much. I'll be able to be at Ollie's." He looked relieved at the prospect of seeing his boyfriend again.

"Good. But if they start talking about Marking..." Harry trailed off, and Cassius nodded sharply.

After the fiasco at the Ministry, Voldemort was likely to be looking to refill his ranks. Cassius might not be able to think up excuses for long enough.

"Theo, got your portkey?"

Theo nodded, patting his pocket. He would be heading to meet Charlie straight off the train, who would take him to the Pottery. He wouldn't be alone for too long.

"Good." Harry looked to Draco, frowning. "And you're sure I can't convince you to come home with me?" He wanted Draco and his mother in Seren Du, where they would be safe.

"Mother is now the Lady of Malfoy Manor," Draco pointed out quietly, smirking. "Somehow I don't think she will be chased out of her own home quite so easily."

From what Harry knew, Narcissa was playing the dutiful mourning wife and Death Eater, and would continue to do so until her son was home. She was being remarkably evasive about what her plans were past that point.

"Just be careful," Harry fretted, pushing Draco's hair out of his eyes. Draco's gaze softened.

"We're Slytherins, remember? Not reckless Gryffindor fools. We will be just fine, and I'll see you soon."

Soon was too vague, in Harry's opinion. "You lot, close your eyes," he warned, then pressed his lips to Draco's, breathing in the scent of him, wanting to make the most of their kiss before they were separated for Merlin knew how long.

The kiss went on for a while, until eventually one of the others got fed up and drenched them with an Aguamenti. Harry spluttered, breaking away from Draco, and turned to glare at an unrepentant Pansy.

A quick spell had them dried off, and Harry gave Draco one last kiss before getting to his feet. "Fine, fine, I'm going," he mock-grumbled. "Stay in touch, all of you."

He Disillusioned himself, removed the ward from the door, and left the compartment, finally heading back to his own. He was satisfied, for now.

. . .

By the time the train was pulling into the platform, Harry was half asleep sprawled over the bench seat with his head in Ginny's lap and his legs in Neville's. He groaned as the train rocked to a halt, dragging himself into a sitting position. "Oh, I can't wait to finally be able to relax," he declared vehemently, getting several noises of agreement. Between Dumbledore, Umbridge, and everything else, Harry didn't feel like he'd truly relaxed since Christmas.

"I'll write soon," Daphne promised, leaning over to kiss both him and Neville on the cheek before tugging Luna's hand. "Come on, honey, I want to introduce you to my uncle."

Luna hugged them all, and then she and Daphne left. Harry helped Ginny get her trunk down from the rack, and the four of them shuffled their way off the train. Harry looked around the platform, eyes lingering on several Slytherins, all approaching family members who looked a little too panicked to be comfortable. All of them held portkeys — they just had to last until the morning.

Mrs Weasley and the twins were easy to spot, the twins dressed in identical lurid purple dragonhide suits. Beside them were Remus and Tonks, the latter with bright Gryffindor-red-and-gold chin length hair.

George broke away from his family as soon as he spotted them, barrelling over and immediately sweeping Blaise into a kiss that wouldn't have been out of place in a muggle romance film. Ginny made an exaggerated noise of disgust.

"Caro mio, it warms my heart to see you have found a man so expressive." Immediately the two boys pulled apart, Blaise breaking out into a wide smile while George went a little paler.

"Mama," Blaise greeted, holding out a hand to an incredibly gorgeous woman who could only be his mother. Her skin was a few shades lighter but she had the same nose and mouth as Blaise, her green eyes almost as bright as Harry's. "This is George; I told you about him."

"It's nice to meet you Lady Zabini," George croaked, offering a somewhat clumsy bow. Blaise's mother laughed, the sound like a chorus of bells.

"He is charming, Blaise," she declared, patting George's hand. "You must join us in Italy for a while, if you can. My son tells me you are quite the young entrepreneur." Her smile was warm and welcoming. Nothing like Blaise's cold Slytherin facade. "Come, caro, say goodbye to your friends. You will see them soon, I'm sure."

Her gaze drifted briefly over to Harry, and she nodded ever so slightly, understanding passing between them. She would do whatever she could to protect Blaise, and Harry would do what he could to help her.

Blaise shook Harry and Neville's hands, kissed Ginny's cheek, then gave George a sweet kiss and murmured something in Italian, before heading off with his mother.

At last, Harry made it over to Remus and Tonks, laughing as Tonks hugged him so hard his feet left the ground. "Wotcher, Harry!" she greeted brightly, ruffling his hair.

"Hi, Tonks. You're obviously feeling better." He was glad to see it. Remus hugged him next, much more gently.

"Hello, cub. You ready?"

"One moment." Harry turned to the Weasleys, where Neville was being greeted a little frostily by Mrs Weasley. Harry had heard about her explosion over Sirius and Charlie, which had apparently been made worse by the news of Bill's engagement; it seemed she was less than impressed by all her children's choices in partner, now.

Ginny just glared at her mum, pulling Neville into a kiss and promising to write soon. Then Neville looked to Harry, and the two boys shared a tight hug. "Let me know how your plans go," Neville urged, hazel eyes meeting green. "If I can help, I want to."

"I know." It was a little overwhelming, sometimes, the depth of Neville's loyalty to Harry, but it was something he would never take for granted.

With a little wave to the rest of the group, Neville disappeared to find his gran. Mrs Weasley turned to Harry, kissing both his cheeks with a slight frown still on her lips. "Are you sure you don't want to come with us, Harry, dear? There's plenty of room, these days."

Harry offered her a tight smile. “I’m good, thanks, Mrs Weasley.”

Letting himself be bundled in a hug by Ginny and the twins all at once, Harry was laughing when he escaped, reaching out to Remus. Just in time, too; Ron and Hermione were on their way over.

“Okay, Moony,” he declared, beaming. “Let’s go home.”

Chapter End Notes

Buckle up, kiddos. It's gonna get a little wild from here on out~

Chapter 75

It was a novel thing, not even needing to pretend to go to the Dursleys' at the start of summer. But Harry didn't have the chance to properly enjoy it; he was up early the first morning of the holidays, anticipation buzzing through his veins. They had a big day ahead, and he needed everything to go smoothly.

Ceri had breakfast ready for all of them, and Harry gave a sleepy half-smile. "When's the first one due?" Remus asked, and Harry checked his watch.

"Eight." They had twenty-five minutes to get there. Remus nodded, and the pair of them ate quickly. On their way out, Remus briefly laid a hand on Snape's shoulder, and the pair made intense eye contact that Harry politely looked away from. Remus walked with him across the lawn, both of them shivering in the early morning air.

"You ready, cub?" Remus wrapped an arm securely around Harry's shoulders, and the dark-haired boy nodded.

"Can't wait til I can do this myself," he grumbled, making Remus laugh.

"It'll be sooner than you think," he promised, and then Harry was being squeezed tightly through a tube, and when he opened his eyes he was stood on the front step of the Pottery. He opened the front door with a grin, which widened at the sight of Theo Nott in the entrance hall.

"Hey, Theo. Settled in alright?"

The tall Slytherin smiled back, the relief in his eyes making Harry's heart clench.

"Everything's perfect. Thank you, Harry."

"Glad I can help." Harry couldn't let anyone suffer that sort of fate, let alone a friend of his. "We should have others arriving soon. I'll be at the property line to give the secret when they get here, and then I'll send them in your way, if that's alright? I assume you've met Essie and Tinker by now?"

On cue, the two elves appeared in the hallway, beaming at Harry. "Yeah, they're great. Essie makes a mean omelette," Theo added, watching the elf blush.

"I'll have to stay for breakfast sometime," Harry said, watching the elves wiggle eagerly. "You two have all the rooms and everything figured out, right?"

"Yes, Master Harry!" Tinker confirmed, nodding quickly. "We is ready to show Master's guests to their rooms as they arrive."

"Leave it all to us, Harry," Remus assured, squeezing Harry's shoulder. "Mr Nott and I will help with any questions and such. You just worry about getting them in here safely."

Harry nodded, checked his watch again, then turned back to the front door. “Great. I’ll, uh, leave you to it, then.”

He hurried down the driveway, headed for the gates. All the portkeys were set to land there, and he needed to be ready for the first.

It was a bit of a convoluted plan, but it had to be, for safety purposes. Snape had enchanted a collection of portkeys to random locations, where the families would then find someone who had their own portkey to the Pottery. If things were safe, they would come to Harry, who would tell them the secret and send them inside. No one wanted to risk accidentally portkeying a Death Eater directly into the sanctuary house, so the multiple steps were necessary.

Charlie was the first to arrive. With him he had a family of four; the youngest daughter wasn’t even Hogwarts age yet, while the elder was a third year Slytherin. All four of them looked warily at Harry, who smiled. “No trouble?” he asked, directing the question to the redhead, who gave him a thumbs up.

“All clear,” he promised. “I’m off to pick up my next lot, then.” And then he stepped back, and apparated away.

With Charlie’s assurance that the family had no tracers, glamours or other suspicious magic on them, Harry beckoned them forward, and quietly told them the location of the Pottery. As one, they gasped, the large house suddenly revealing itself to them. “If you go inside, Remus Lupin and Theo Nott are in there with the house elves, they’ll show you around,” Harry relayed. Both parents flinched at the name Nott, and Harry gave what he hoped was a reassuring look. “Theo’s here for the same reason you are. I trust him.”

“We can trust Harry, Mum,” the third year girl — Juliette, Harry was sure her name was — said firmly, tugging on her mum’s robe. “Come on.”

Warily, the family started up the driveway, and Harry felt the warmth of their magic in his awareness of the wards. It was a strange feeling, knowing instinctually where on the property everyone was. But he didn’t have much time to think about it, as Tonks appeared with the next family. This was a smaller group; just a father and son, who both looked exhausted. “They’re clear,” Tonks reported. “Been hiding all night, poor sods.”

The father took a step forward, clasping Harry’s hands. “Thank you, Mr Potter,” he gasped earnestly. “I— I can never repay this kindness you’ve shown me, or my family.”

“You don’t have to, Mr Whiddon,” Harry assured him. “Head on inside, there are people who will get you both settled.”

With a wink, Tonks disappeared again, and Harry shared the secret so the pair could go in and get some rest and food. Right on schedule, Fred showed up with the next family; a group of four kids and five adults, all squeezed around a length of rope.

And so it went on like that through the morning, families arriving one by one. Truly, there weren’t that many; a lot of neutral or Dark-leaning families had put failsafes and escape plans in place since the first whispers of Voldemort's return, not wanting to be put in a difficult position. But not everyone had that capability, and soon there were eight new family groups in residence at the Pottery, plus Theo. Harry was glad to be saving even that many, though he knew as time went on it was likely to be more. Voldemort would go looking further afield for both victims and soldiers, once his first attempts were through.

Once everyone had arrived safely, Harry went back in the house, smiling at the sounds of life coming from within. Most people were up settling into their new rooms, but some of the earlier arrivals were out exploring. Harry wandered through to the dining room, where the table was laden with food — and Remus was waiting, nibbling on a chocolate biscuit. "All good on this end?" Harry checked, raising an eyebrow. Just because these people were here for sanctuary didn't mean they were all excellent people, and part of him was worried about how they might treat the elves. But Essie and Tinker knew to stand up for themselves, and Harry trusted Theo to help keep the peace.

"So far," Remus replied. "I think they're all just glad to be out of the firing line, for now. Trouble will come once they're comfortable." He grimaced slightly, and Harry mirrored the expression.

"We'll deal with that when it comes to it. Essie, Tinker," he called, and both elves appeared, "would you please ask our guests to come down here? Thanks."

It took a few minutes for everyone to arrive, and Harry noticed several of the adults eyeing each other suspiciously. "Okay, then. Welcome to the Pottery," Harry said loudly, grabbing their attention. "I'm glad you all made it here safely, and I hope everything is to your liking. I'm sure Remus and Theo went over things, but just to make sure everyone's on the same page, I wanted to go over the rules." He made sure to look everyone in the eye for at least a second, to check they were paying attention. They were, even the young children — they knew how serious their situation was. "First off, no fighting. I don't care what grievances you may have had with each other in the past. Everyone is here for the same reason, and that's what matters. Secondly, please respect both my property and my elves. This is my ancestral home, and I'm sure you can understand what that means to me, considering my family history." Several people winced. "The elves are here to assist you, but they are not your slaves. They know what they are and aren't expected to do, and if they refuse a request it's because they know I won't allow it, so take it up with me, not them. Three meals a day will be provided, and I'm sure snacks will be available if you ask nicely. As far as the rest of your time, it is your own — I'm not going to force you to stay within the property, it's up to each of you what you feel safe doing. You may write letters, which the elves will take to the owl-post office, but I don't need to warn you to be careful what you put in those letters." Serious-eyed nods from many of the adults, and even more from the students. Of course, they'd just survived a year with Umbridge; they knew all about mail interception. "You obviously can't bring anyone else onto the property. If you know someone who is in danger and in need of sanctuary, tell one of the elves and they'll come to me or someone I trust."

Harry glanced to Remus, shrugging slightly. "I think that's about everything." The werewolf nodded, so Harry looked back to the crowd. "Just... we're all trying to keep each other safe, here, guys. Help me out with that."

“Don’t worry, Mr Potter,” one of the adults with the large family said, her brown eyes sharp. “We all know what you’re sacrificing to help us.”

“What about school?” Mrs Scalby piped up, her hands on her son’s shoulders. “What happens when the kids go back?”

“Again, I’m not going to force anyone,” Harry said. “We don’t know what things will look like by the end of the summer. If you don’t feel it’s safe for your children to go to Hogwarts, they’re welcome to stay here with you.” He couldn’t promise the school would be a safe haven. He wasn’t too thrilled about having to return himself. “Your welcome here lasts until Voldemort is dead; until things are safe for you outside these wards. Provided you don’t test my hospitality,” he added pointedly. “If circumstances change, we’ll figure it out when we get there, but... I’m offering what safety I can. Between us, we should manage to preserve it.”

He hoped he could trust these people in his home. They were all hiding from the same evil, and they were too Slytherin to risk angering someone with as much power over them as Harry currently had. “I’ll have friends coming by every now and then just to make sure everything is going fine,” he said anyway, just to make it clear they would have more supervision than two house elves. “Also the Prophet should be delivered daily, so you can keep up with the outside world. Other than that... help yourselves to food, and you have the run of the house. Though — if you try a door and it’s locked, there’s a reason for that, so leave it be.” There were some rooms that were for family only, and Harry had the wards locked tight on those ones.

At his cue, the gathered crowd tentatively approached the table, and soon everyone had full plates and was chatting away — not happily, but comfortably enough. Harry could tell it would take a few days for it to settle in that they were safe there. He slunk back to the corner where Theo was stood, a plate of his own in hand. “You think you can handle them?” he asked quietly, gaze on the room at large. Theo hummed thoughtfully.

“I know most of them at least in passing. They’re not the troublemaking type,” he said. “But we’ll see how it goes after a few weeks in close quarters. Might have to duke it out with a duel or two, some of them, but I’ll keep it non-lethal,” he added with a small grin. Harry snorted.

“That’s all I can ask.” He paused, chewing on his ham and cheese sandwich. “I’m sorry I can’t share the secret with Susan. I just... necessary people only, y’know?” It had been difficult enough deciding whether he could trust the Weasley boys and Tonks, but ultimately he had no choice if he wanted to get people there safely.

“I understand. I can still go see her,” Theo replied. “I, uh, haven’t met her aunt yet. But she knows about me.” His cheeks coloured slightly. Harry grinned.

“Good luck with that.” The relationship between the Slytherin and the Hufflepuff still baffled him a little, as even amongst the heirs they were fairly reserved. But he could see how strongly they cared about each other.

It was no stranger a pairing than him and Draco, really.

"Do you, ah, know how your father is taking... everything?" Harry breached uncertainly, watching pain flash across Theo's face for a brief moment.

"I haven't felt the family magic rip from my body, if that's what you mean," he replied dryly. "He can't disinherit me; I'm the last of both lines. He'd still rather see the magic live on in a blood traitor than let it die entirely. But past that, I've no idea. If I never see him again, I'll be content."

Considering the war ahead of them, that was an entirely likely possibility.

"Cub." Remus approached, brows furrowed. "We should get going. Unless there's more you need to do here?" He glanced briefly to Theo. Harry shook his head.

"No, no, we're fine." He turned, shaking Theo's hand. "I'll be in touch soon. And I'll let Susan know you're safe."

"Thanks, Harry." A brief, devious smile. "And thanks for giving me a room to myself."

Harry laughed, winking. "Friendship privileges," he joked. Then, bidding goodbye to the rest of the group, Harry let Remus apparate him back home.

That was one burden off his shoulders, at least.

.-.-.-.

At around the same time Harry was welcoming his first guest to the Pottery, Draco was being shaken awake unexpectedly.

Considering the type of people currently in his house, Draco jolted upright immediately, wand in hand. But familiar fingers brushed over his forehead, and his bleary gaze met his mother's keen grey eyes. His heart stopped. "Mum? What's wrong?" Was it the Dark Lord? Were they in trouble?

Narcissa's gaze softened, and she leaned in to kiss his forehead. "Get dressed, darling. Quickly, now. The others will be up soon."

Pulse still racing even as confusion swam in his rapidly-awakening brain, Draco did as bid, not asking any questions until he was shoving his feet into his boots. "Do we need to run?" Already he had a packing list in his head, prioritised by how much time he might have to grab what he needed.

A cold, vindictive smile slid onto his mother's regal face. "Draco, darling, this is our home. We will never run from this place."

She held out her hand, and Draco took it.

Silently, they crept through the halls. Draco wasn't sure where she was taking him — still didn't know what they were doing, in all honesty. But he followed her down the stairs and through the dining room, until she was stood in front of a bookshelf. To his astonishment, she reached out and tapped a book with her finger, and the shelf swung open.

The room it revealed was small, but stepping inside Draco quickly realised what they were there for. Sat on a pedestal in front of him was a large, smooth crystal, swirling like it held mercury inside it.

The Malfoy wardstone.

For some reason, Draco had always expected the wardstone to be somewhere... grander. He'd gone searching for it, in his youth; determined to uncover all the family secrets. His father had told him he would only learn of it when it was time for him to become lord of the manor.

That time was now, Draco supposed.

"Mother, what are we doing here?" he asked, when his mother had shut the door behind them, both squeezed in the small room. The magic radiating from the wardstone was palpable, dragging at Draco's own core like treacle.

"We are here to reclaim what is ours," Narcissa replied primly, rolling up her sleeves. "Your father invited that filth into the manor. But he is gone now, and we no longer need to put up with his guests. His influence."

Draco's eyes widened. "Are— are you sure?" Anything they did now, it would be a statement. It would reveal to the Dark Lord that the Malfoys were no longer securely under his thumb. "What about your Mark?" He'd heard Severus mention more than once that the Dark Lord has ways of reaching him through his Mark, tangling with his magic, bringing him to heel.

"Quite certain," Narcissa assured. "My Mark is not like Severus' — he is valuable enough for the Dark Lord to keep a close connection; I am just a wife," her lips curled in a smirk. "He did not believe me worth the effort of controlling, and that shall be his error." She softened, reaching out to squeeze Draco's hand. "We made our choices long ago, little Dragon. I made mine the moment I saw you look at Harry Potter like he was the greatest treasure in the universe." Draco couldn't help but blush. "While Lucius was around we had a part to play, but that is past, now. I am Lady Malfoy, head of the family until you come of age. And I refuse to cower in my own manor. Between the two of us, I believe we'll have enough power to lock down the wards, and eject our unwanted visitors."

She spoke so casually about booting the Dark Lord himself out from their house, it made Draco gape. "I— is that possible?" He was underage, and his mother was only a Malfoy by marriage.

"This manor has war-wards, and it is understood that war does not always wait for the head of the family to reach majority," Narcissa said. "I have faith that this will work. And if it doesn't... we have other options."

Draco wondered if he perhaps should've packed a bag, after all.

But it was too late now. Squaring his jaw determinedly, he nodded, and together they turned to the wardstone. "Let me do the asking," Narcissa instructed quietly. "You just put the power into it.”

They put their hands on the wardstone as one, and Draco gasped faintly, feeling the wards rush through him; echoes of centuries of Malfoys past, tangling with his own magic, judging his worth. He pushed forward everything he had — his strength, his power, even his love for Harry. Anything that might aid his mother in securing their home, proving to the wards that those within were not worthy of the sanctuary of Malfoy magic.

For several long minutes, nothing happened. Then, slowly, he felt it. A rushing in his blood, a vibration in the stones below his feet. His heartbeat pulsing in time with his mother’s, in time with the wardstone, all of their magic combining to flood through the house and out all the way to the boundary line. It felt solid, like a shield surrounding the whole property. But the magic felt... expectant.

It needed more than just his magic, to hold such powerful wards.

Instinctively, Draco pulled his wand, keeping one hand on the wardstone. With a spell, that hand cut open from the base of his thumb to the curve of his wrist, and the wardstone flashed bright white as his blood touched the warm surface. The wards gave an extra firm pulse, and then it released him.

He and his mother stood, breathing hard, Draco’s hand still dripping blood onto the floor.

“Well done, darling,” Narcissa murmured, carefully healing his wound. “I think we did it.”

Draco could see the tremble in her arm as she reached to push the door open. If they hadn’t succeeded, they would soon be dead.

But it looked like their gamble had paid off. Walking through the dining room, everything was silent. In the hallway, Narcissa cleared her throat. “Dippy,” she called out, and a house elf appeared. “Have our visitors gone?”

Watching the elf nod made Draco’s shoulders crumple in relief. “Missy Cissa and Master Draco is the only peoples in the house, Miss,” Dippy confirmed. A satisfied smile took over the Lady Malfoy’s face.

“Wonderful. Clean up any rooms that were previously occupied, would you? I want no trace of them left. Put their belongings in the Lord’s office, I’ll deal with them later.”

The elf vanished, and only then did Narcissa relax. “They’re going to kill you,” Draco said fearfully, reaching for her hand. “The moment you step foot outside, they’ll kill you.”

Far from alarmed, that just made her smirk wider. “Have a little faith, darling. I know how to play this game.” She brought his hand up to her lips, kissing his knuckles. “This has been long overdue. But it’s a start. There is much more work to be done.” She met his gaze unflinching. “Your Harry is making good progress, but there are certain moves that can only be made by someone rather more experienced in the ways of these things. And we will aid him however we can. He is family, after all.”

Draco's heart squeezed painfully, tight with the strength of his love for this woman. His awe of her strength. "Thank you," he rasped, and her eyes softened lovingly.

"Do not thank me, my darling; I'm only doing what a mother should. And quite frankly, it's about time the name Malfoy had someone truly worthy to uphold it. Really, with the amount of influence your father held, it's quite ridiculous how little he really did with it." That devious smirk returned. "His loss."

Draco blinked at her, not entirely sure he wanted to know what else his mother was planning. Sirius was right; Black women were terrifying.

.-. .

Seren Du was empty when Harry and Remus returned — Ceri reported that Snape had been summoned to a Death Eater meeting not more than half an hour ago. Remus cursed quietly, and Harry squeezed his shoulder. "Come on. Let's go work on my schedule for the summer; Snape can go over it with us when he gets back."

Eager for the distraction, Remus agreed, and soon the pair of them were holed up in the living room with tea and scones, a piece of parchment on the table between them.

"We're adding apparition lessons," Remus said first, writing that at the top of the page. Harry brightened up.

"Really?"

"It shouldn't take too long. I imagine you'll get the hang of it quite quickly — you certainly seem to with everything else," Remus added, making Harry blush.

Duelling was of course added to the list, though Remus admitted that would mostly rely on when other people would be around to help. "After watching you at the Ministry, it's clear you can hold your own. We just need to make sure you're ready to face Him as well as his minions." The werewolf's eyes crinkled as he smiled proudly. "You really were marvellous, you know. Your friends too, of course, but seeing how well you fought against Malfoy and the Lestranges, and Death Eaters that have brought down experienced aurors... you're remarkable, Harry."

Harry's cheeks burned hot, and he ducked his head. "Only because of what you've all taught me," he insisted.

"Teaching conditions can only go so far in preparation for the real thing," Remus retorted. "Be proud of yourself, Harry. You're doing incredible things for your age."

Harry cleared his throat awkwardly. "So what else do we need to work on this summer?" He couldn't sit there and just let Remus compliment him. Besides, there had to be plenty more for him to learn.

"Honestly, a lot of it will just depend on how the summer plays out. Between the Pottery and everything else, you may be busier than usual."

‘Everything else’ was a very broad way of referring to the absolute shitshow that was the Ministry currently. There was no sign of a new Minister yet, and everyone was reeling from the discovery of just how many influential Ministry employees were actually Death Eaters and now either dead or in Azkaban thanks to Harry and his friends. The whole thing was a mess, and it infuriated Harry watching known Dumbledore sycophants try and fill the gaps, praising the headmaster for seeing off Voldemort’s attack like he’d been in any way useful for more than about five minutes.

“You say that, but everything else will just have me sat here waiting for the rest of you to get home,” Harry pointed out mulishly. He knew it made sense, but that didn’t mean he had to like being kept out of the fight when he’d been training so hard for just that. Remus sighed.

“Considering you’re still underage, yes, it will. I don’t know who the new Minister will be, but if it’s another Fudge, you’ll have to be even more careful than before,” he warned, making Harry scowl.

“So what else can I do this summer?” he asked, not wanting to upset himself with the prospect of another incompetent Minister.

“You can rest,” came Remus’ immediate response. “Harry, cub, you’ve had a hell of a year. You need to take some time to relax and recover from it, while you’re safe.”

“Voldemort isn’t relaxing,” Harry snapped.

“Perhaps not, but he certainly isn’t trying to do everything himself,” Remus retorted without missing a beat. “He’s got his minions for that.”

A pause, then Harry snorted. “Are you saying you lot are my minions?”

Remus’ lips twitched amusedly. “I’m saying that you need to give yourself a break. But honestly, minion isn’t far off,” he teased, and Harry aimed a half-hearted scowl his way.

It wasn’t that he didn’t want to relax. He did, desperately, after Umbridge and OWLs and the battle at the Ministry. But he couldn’t shake that feeling that as soon as he let himself rest for ten minutes, the whole world would fall to shit.

“Summer is the only time I can actually learn useful things without having to sneak around to learn them, Moony,” he insisted. “I need to take advantage of it while I can.”

“Oh, it’s that time of year again, is it?” The voice had Harry scrambling out of his chair, beaming at the dark-haired figure in the doorway.

“Sirius!” He hurried forward, wrapping his godfather in a tight hug. He’d been at Grimmauld since Harry had left school.

Sirius hugged him, kissing his hair. “Good to see you, pup.”

When Harry stepped back, he saw the shock of red hair just past Sirius’ shoulder. “Hi, Charlie.”

The dragon tamer grinned. “Hey, kid.” Then he turned to Sirius with raised eyebrows. “That time of year?”

“The time of year where Moony and I have to persuade Harry here that he can’t spend all summer turning himself into a duelling machine,” Sirius explained, ruffling Harry’s hair pointedly. “We aren’t letting Dumbledore turn you into a weapon, and we’re not letting you do that to yourself, either. Take breaks. Do fun things. Get some fucking sleep, Merlin knows you’ve not had enough this last year with all your after-curfew adventures,” he added, rolling his eyes.

Harry could do nothing but sigh and let himself be herded back to the sofa. “I slept,” he defended, though it was feeble. Admittedly, his sleep schedule had not been brilliant lately. “I just—things are getting worse out there. I need to be ready.”

“We both know damn well that your preparedness is not the thing holding us back,” Remus pointed out. “These things take time, Harry. Time you can’t control. It’s better for you to pace yourself while we wait than burn out before you get there.”

Harry huffed. “I hate it when you’re reasonable,” he muttered, making Sirius snicker.

“Moony’s always reasonable,” he teased. He and Charlie made themselves comfortable on the opposite sofa, and Harry eyed them curiously.

It was... strange, having Charlie around like this. Every other time Harry had interacted with him, it was as the second-oldest Weasley brother; now, with no other Weasleys around, he was definitely here in the capacity of Sirius’ boyfriend. He had an arm around Sirius’ shoulders, the animagus leaning against him slightly. He looked a bit bewildered, too, Harry realised.

“Is this Charlie’s first visit here?” he asked, and Sirius nodded. Harry smirked, unable to help himself. “So he’s family, is he?” he drawled. “He knows what this place means?”

While Charlie’s confusion grew, Sirius blushed brightly. “He’s got the gist of it,” Sirius insisted. “He also knows he’s got full permission to hex you if you’re being a little git,” he added in a playful growl. Harry’s green eyes turned wide and innocent.

“Me? Never.” Even he couldn’t hold that straight face for too long.

“I grew up with Fred and George, you know I won’t hold back,” Charlie joked with a wink. “But don’t worry, if Harry starts teasing me about you, I’ll just give him all the gory details about how we got together.” His eyebrows wiggled salaciously, and Harry made a face.

“Gross.” Once again, Sirius was blushing. Harry marvelled at the sight; his godfather hardly ever blushed before now! Merlin, he was smitten. “Well, the more the merrier, as far as I’m concerned. Even better if it means Sirius doesn’t have to pretend to live at Grimmauld anymore.”

“You having this place does explain a lot,” Charlie agreed. “I, uh, I know it’s a big deal for me to know where it is and everything. So... thanks.” His expression melted into a sappy grin as he looked at Sirius, and Sirius beamed back, kissing him quickly.

“Ugh, are they always like this?” Harry joked, glancing at Remus.

“Like you can talk,” Sirius retorted pointedly. “Don’t be jealous because your boyfriend isn’t moving in yet.”

Harry glared at him, while Charlie’s blue eyes sharpened in intrigue. “Boyfriend? Tell me more,” he drawled lightly. Sirius smirked.

“Our Harry,” he declared dramatically, “is in love with a snake!” This was said with an exaggerated gasp and wide eyes. Charlie shook his head mock-sympathetically, patting Sirius’ thigh.

“It’s okay,” he assured. “There’s one in every family. You just have to learn to accept it.”

Harry snickered. “I’m telling George you said that,” he joked. “But I suppose, since you’re learning all the family secrets — I’ve been dating Draco Malfoy since fourth year.”

Charlie’s eyebrows show up in genuine surprise. “Really? Even after...” He waved a vague hand gesture, and it took Harry a moment to get his meaning. His stomach squirmed uncomfortably.

“After what happened with his dad?” when I accidentally killed him, he didn’t say, though they were all thinking it. “He, uh, didn’t get along with Lucius. Neither did his mum. We’re still good.”

“They’re worse than good, they’re disgustingly adorable,” Sirius grumbled. “And speaking of snakes in the family, where’s...?” He trailed off expectantly, looking towards Remus. The humour melted from the werewolf’s face.

“Death Eater meeting,” he replied, and Sirius cursed quietly.

“How long’s he been gone?”

Remus checked his watch. “Little over two hours, now.” He ran a weary hand through his hair. “Any luck, he’ll be home for dinner. Not that he’ll be in any mood to eat.”

“Who are we talking about now?” Charlie cut in, looking confused.

Harry bit his lip to stop himself smirking. “You didn’t tell him that family secret yet, either?” he asked Sirius, brows raised. That secret was really the kind that deserved prior warning.

Sirius flushed. “I was going to, but there was never a good time,” he muttered. He turned back to Charlie, trepidation flickering through his eyes. “So, someone else lives here. Moony’s partner.”

“I didn’t know you were seeing anyone, Remus.” Charlie paused, frowning. “And... he’s a Death Eater?”

“A spy.” There was a small smile on Remus’ lips; he was enjoying drawing this out far too much. “You know him, actually.”

Harry watched the clues slowly come together, and Charlie’s eyes go comically wide. “You... you don’t mean Snape, do you?” There was a hint of nervousness to his tone. Remus’ smile widened, and he nodded. “Oh.” Charlie’s voice came out a bit strangled.

“He’s not as bad as you think he is,” Harry offered supportively. “I mean. Well. He is. He’s not a totally different person when he’s in private.” A quiet snort was all Remus had to say about that. “But it’s less mean and more funny. Sort-of.” It was hard, trying to explain Severus Snape.

“I thought the two of you hated each other?” Charlie asked Sirius, who shrugged.

“Oh, we absolutely did. But Moony stopped giving a fuck about that about the time we graduated school, so we learned to get along. Eventually. For the most part.” He froze suddenly, head cocked slightly. “Speak of the devil.”

Remus jumped to his feet. “He’s back?” Sirius nodded, and the werewolf was gone.

“Well, we won’t see those two for a few hours,” Sirius mused, squeezing Charlie’s knee. “Don’t worry, love; Severus really isn’t terrible to live with. You’ll get used to him.” He glanced to Harry. “What are you up to for the rest of the evening, pup?”

“I should probably finish unpacking,” Harry admitted with a shrug. He had been too tired to bother by the time he and Remus and Tonks finished dinner the night before, and hadn’t had time this morning.

“Solid plan. I’m gonna give Charlie the tour of the place.” The dog animagus got to his feet, tugging Charlie up by the hand. “See you at dinner, kiddo.”

Harry watched them go, faintly bemused. There was a spring in Sirius’ step that he’d never seen before, a light in his eyes he only recognised from pictures of him before Azkaban.

If Charlie was the one bringing that out, then Harry was glad he was around.

But that wouldn’t stop him teasing the pair of them as much as possible.

.-.-.-.

Harry was in bed early, that night; Remus and Snape missed dinner, and Sirius and Charlie were making eyes at each other that Harry did not want to contemplate too closely. Besides, he’d had a long day, and he was exhausted.

The exhaustion fled the instant his head hit the pillow.

A stone room, torches sending long shadows across the small crowd gathered in front of him. Harry sat in his throne, sneering down at the man kneeling at his feet. “You are certain of the address, Rookwood?” he said softly, voice cold. The man nodded.

"Yes, my Lord. It is Amelia Bones' flat, for certain. I—I Imperiused the floo guard for that area, her entry wards should be down."

"Should?" Harry hissed pointedly, fingering his wand.

"Will! Will be down, my Lord," Rookwood corrected.

Satisfaction bloomed in Harry's chest, but he cast a Cruciatus curse anyway; Rookwood would learn to deal in certainties around Lord Voldemort. "Then we strike tonight," he declared. "I will handle this one myself." Rage burned within him. "That insolent blood traitor will regret attempting to stand up to Lord Voldemort!"

Cheers erupted from the small crowd, and Harry got to his feet, eager for bloodshed. Yes, Amelia Bones would learn that those who supported the Potter brat got exactly what they deserved.

Harry awoke with a gasp, skin crawling from the feel of being inside Voldemort's mind. Panic gripped his heart — immediately, his wand was in his hand. "Expecto Patronum!"

The room lit up with an eerie silver glow as Prongs burst from his wand. "Go to Amelia Bones. Tell her; he's coming for you. Your wards are down. Run, now."

Prongs set off immediately, seemingly sending the urgency in Harry's voice. Harry checked the clock; it was almost midnight. Hopefully Amelia wouldn't sleep through his warning.

Harry launched himself out of bed — there was no way he was getting back to sleep after that. He paced his room, thinking over every second of the vision, trying to see if he'd missed anything; was the strike Voldemort referred to just on the Bones', or were they going after others, too? Did he just mean that he was taking back-up with him?

There was a knock on the door, and Harry whirled around to see Sirius nudge it open, stood there in a dressing gown, concern in his sleep-hazed eyes. "Ceri said you had a nightmare."

"Vision," Harry corrected, watching Sirius perk up in alarm. "He's going after Amelia Bones. I sent her a Patronus, but..." His stomach lurched; what if his warning didn't make it to her? What if he was too late?

Sirius swore, hurrying to wrap Harry in a hug. "You did what you could, pup."

"He's going himself, Sirius," Harry said, voice cracking. "Susan's a great fighter, and I'm sure her aunt is too, but... against Voldemort himself?" Those were not good odds.

Sirius held him tighter, smoothing down his hair. "Don't write them off yet," he insisted soothingly. "Come on. Let's go get you a drink, yeah?"

Harry suddenly felt his cheeks heat, embarrassment rising. "You don't need to stay up with me, Padfoot," he muttered. "I'll be fine. Go back to bed. Charlie'll be worried."

Sirius just rolled his eyes. "Charlie knows where I am, I told him to go back to sleep," he said. "I'm not leaving you to yourself when you've just come out of his head, not until you know the Bones' are okay." He pulled back, though one long arm stayed around Harry's shoulders, guiding him towards the door. "You're still my first priority, pup. Charlie doesn't change that. Hell, he'd leave me in a heartbeat if he thought I was putting him over you," he added with a flicker of a smile. "I know we didn't really talk about what it means, me and him, not concerning us. And right now isn't really the best time for it. But you're still my kid, yeah? So let me take care of you."

And that made Harry lose the fight against tears, his heart lurching as Sirius' grey eyes fixed on him. "You silly bugger," he sighed, kissing Harry's forehead. "You didn't think I'd stop being an overbearing fusspot just because I've got a hot redhead waiting up for me, did you?"

The noise Harry made was a cross between a laugh and a sound of disgust, wet with tears, and it made Sirius grin. "You're top of the list, kiddo. For me and Moony both. Only reason he's not up with us is I told Ceri not to wake him; sounded like Snape had a rough meeting. But I can get both of them, if you want?"

"No, no, it's fine," Harry insisted, wiping at his cheeks. "Like you said, nothing we can do. I — should we get a message to Kingsley?" Amelia might need back-up.

Before Sirius could answer, the corridor filled with pale light; a silver badger bounded towards them, stopping in front of Harry and raising its head. "We are safe," it said, in Amelia's voice. "It was a close call. Letter to follow shortly. Thank you, Harry."

Then it dissolved, and with it went the tension in Harry's shoulders.

"Thank Merlin," Sirius breathed. "That's... that's good to hear." Harry nodded emphatically. "Let's go put some tea on. I know neither of us is going to be able to relax until that letter arrives."

As they headed for the stairs, the door to Sirius' room creaked open, and Charlie stuck his head out. "Everything alright?" He was shirtless, but his wand was in his hand, clearly prepared for the worst.

"We're fine, love," Sirius assured. "Just waiting on a letter. Going downstairs for a bit." He stepped away from Harry, cupping Charlie's cheek. "Go back to sleep, you've got work in the morning."

Charlie leaned into the touch, eyes falling half shut. "You sure? Don't need to muster the cavalry?"

A fond chuckle escaped Sirius' lips. "No cavalry necessary," he assured, pressing a kiss to Charlie's mouth. "Go to bed. It'll do you no good to be half-asleep dealing with that new Welsh Green arriving."

Charlie didn't take any more convincing than that, and Sirius shut the door behind him, turning back to Harry. In the dim light, Harry could see him blush faintly, realising they'd had an audience for the whole exchange.

"You really care about him, don't you?" he asked quietly, continuing towards the stairs.

“More than I thought possible, after... everything,” Sirius admitted in a whisper. “He’s far too good for me. But he made it very clear he’s made his mind up, and at this point I’m in too deep to let him go.”

Harry bumped their shoulders together gently, smiling. “I’m happy for you, Padfoot,” he said earnestly. “Y’know, you promised you’d tell me the full story. And... I think we could both use the distraction, right now.”

“Alright, then, you nosy sod,” Sirius teased. When they reached the kitchen, two cups of steaming peppermint tea were already waiting at the table, though Ceri was nowhere to be seen. “Sit down, I’ll start from the beginning.”

So he did, telling Harry all about Charlie’s harmless flirting, which had gotten gradually less harmless as time went on, both of them falling for each other even though Sirius was determined not to. To Harry’s relief, his godfather glossed over the more... intimate details, but it warmed his heart to hear how insistent Charlie was that Sirius deserved love in his life.

He knew he liked Charlie Weasley for a reason.

So captivated in the story, Harry almost forgot what they’d been waiting for — until the window opened suddenly, and a small brown owl he recognised as Susan’s careened into the kitchen, dropping a letter on the table in front of him. Harry reached for it, tearing it open.

Harry,

You saved our lives. Your Patronus arrived a minute before the ward alarm went off — enough time for Aunt Amelia to grab some essentials and summon the emergency portkey. You-Know-Who showed up, but he was too late.

We’re with the Longbottoms, now. Neville’s gran has said we can stay for the summer; their wards are the strongest we know that aren’t under a Fidelius or anything complicated. Aunt Amelia isn’t going to let this force her out of the public eye. The flat is probably trashed, though. We’ll go back and check it tomorrow with some aurors.

I don’t know what kind of vision you had, but thank you. If you hadn’t warned us, I know Aunt Amelia would have stayed behind to fight so I could escape. I can’t lose her, Harry. She’s all I’ve got left.

Talk soon,

Susan

Harry let the tension bleed out of him, reading the letter over a few times just to reassure himself everyone was fine.

“That’s alright, then,” Sirius declared, reading over his shoulder. “Augusta won’t let them come to any harm. Terrifying woman, she is.”

Harry snorted; that was certainly one way of describing Neville’s grandmother.

“That was far too close,” he breathed, and Sirius squeezed the back of his neck gently.

“Always is. But it’s close enough; they’re safe.” The pair were silent for a few moments, eyes still fixed on the letter. “Want to stay up longer, or are you good to go back to sleep?”

Harry glanced at the clock on the wall; it was almost four in the morning, now. His exhaustion had returned in full force, now the adrenaline was fading.

“Sleep sounds good,” he agreed. Sirius looked like he could use it, too.

So much for a nice, relaxing start to the summer.

Chapter 76

Chapter Notes

Fully forgot it was Friday for a while there, my bad :P Here we are, though! Exciting things afoot~

No one was particularly energetic over breakfast. Sirius had obviously told the rest of the household about Harry's vision, as by the time the Gryffindor made it downstairs they were chatting quietly, and stopped as soon as Harry walked in. "Morning," Harry greeted wearily. Remus stood immediately, holding his arms out for a hug.

"Are you alright, cub?"

"Fine, now. Might go for a swim later. I'm a bit sore."

"Cruciatus?" Snape checked, and Harry nodded.

"On Rookwood. But just the once, so I didn't take a potion. I thought he was one of the ones we caught?"

"You did. He claimed to be a Ministry spy, and got himself released," Snape replied, sneering. Harry scowled.

"Spy, my arse," he muttered, sinking into his usual seat at the table. Opposite him, Charlie blinked, clearly still getting used to the whole 'Snape' situation. "Anything useful happen at your meeting?"

"Nothing of alarm," Snape replied, sipping at his coffee. Ceri floated a plate of pancakes in front of Harry, and he offered her a brief smile. "It seems Narcissa grew tired of hosting — she put the Manor on lockdown, ejected everyone except herself and Draco. As you can imagine, the Dark Lord is... not pleased. Bellatrix suffered most severely for not noticing her sister's disloyalty."

Harry went wide-eyed, though he couldn't bring himself to feel bad about Bellatrix being punished. "Narcissa can do that? And it'll keep them all out?"

"It appears so. Likely she had Draco assist her; he is the new Lord of the Manor, after all, even though he is a year shy of majority."

"That's my girl," Sirius cheered, grinning. "Turned them all out on their arses."

It was a relief, knowing that Draco no longer had Voldemort in his house, but such a bold move made Harry uneasy. "He won't take that lying down," he murmured grimly. Snape's dark eyes met his, surprisingly confident.

"Trust that Narcissa has been planning her actions for a long time, now. She will not take unnecessary risks."

Harry hoped he was right.

"Cheer up, pup," Sirius crowed, "if it gets dire, they'll just move in here; old Snake-Face would never find them then." He winked playfully. "You'll get your boyfriend back earlier than you thought."

Rolling his eyes, Harry threw a blueberry at him. It would be nice to have Draco around, sure, but not at the expense of Voldemort wanting him dead!

"I suppose no one's going to duel with me today, then?" he sighed, reaching for the jug of orange juice. "Since you all seem to think I need rest or something." As if to reinforce the point, a huge yawn escaped him, and Remus snorted. "Shut up, Moony," Harry grumbled weakly.

"You're taking it easy today, kid. We've got an Order meeting back at Grimmauld this evening, anyway."

Harry smirked at Sirius' words. "You're leaving me behind for that, yeah? Dumbledore wants to talk to me; he was trying to get hold of me at school but I dodged him, and before I got the train home he said he'd see me at headquarters."

"Then you're definitely not going," Sirius agreed.

"On that note, I've got dragons to see," Charlie declared, pushing back from the table. As he stood, he ducked to kiss Sirius' cheek. "I'll see you all at the meeting. And you after, I suppose," he added to Harry. His gaze swept the table, pausing awkwardly on Snape, who stared back impassively. Then Charlie coughed, and headed for the door.

"Have fun," Sirius called after him. When they heard the front door shut, Remus elbowed Snape gently.

"You could at least try and be less intimidating."

"Why bother?" Snape drawled in reply.

Harry ducked his head to hide his smile in a mouthful of pancake.

It was good to be home.

.-. .

Sirius was the first to arrive at Grimmauld Place ahead of the Order meeting; Remus was reading, and promised to follow shortly. The animagus half expected to find Molly Weasley banging around his kitchen, until he remembered delightedly that he'd banned her from the wards. His brain drifted happily back to the events of that morning — or, more specifically, what had happened after Molly had left — but he was snapped out of his thoughts by the sound of apparition in the hallway.

“It’s only me!” Tonks called brightly, then appeared in the kitchen doorway. She seemed to delight in being as loud as possible, now there was no painting of Walburga Black to yell at her for it. “Blimey, I’m that early?”

“Looks like,” Sirius agreed, snorting when she went straight to the pantry and returned with a bottle of butterbeer and a small pork pie. “Skipped lunch?”

“Had to,” she said with a scowl. “Ministry’s a bloody disaster. We’ve got too many Death Eaters to process — they’re trying to delay Pettigrew’s interrogation, like we might just forget and leave you on the run, or something.”

Sirius scowled back at her. “Fucking aurors.”

“Tell me about it.”

They were interrupted by the fire flaring green, and Bill Weasley stepped out, closely followed by Fleur Delacour. She was a recent addition to the Order, but Sirius liked her already. Namely because she too held Harry’s opinions much higher than Dumbledore’s.

One after another, the members of the Order of the Phoenix arrived, filling the kitchen. Charlie slipped in behind Mundungus Fletcher, and Sirius waved him over, a seat saved beside him. It garnered some looks — especially when Charlie kissed him on the cheek — but Sirius didn’t give a fuck; everyone he cared about knew, they weren’t hiding their relationship anymore.

Only after the room was full did Albus Dumbledore arrive through the fire, and the quiet whispers stopped immediately like a bunch of naughty school children. “Good, you’re all here,” he greeted, then frowned slightly. “Sirius, must you continue to hold this grudge against Molly? She should be able to attend meetings at the very least.”

“Not until she learns to respect me in my own damn house, Albus,” Sirius replied evenly. That earned him a disappointed frown, but nothing further was said.

Dumbledore launched into an update on Ministry proceedings, stating that a new Minister would be chosen by the end of the week. “It is a relief that Lucius Malfoy is not there to throw his own hat in the ring, but that does not mean Voldemort’s men are absent from the process. I am trying to guide it the best I can.”

Sirius hid a scowl; oh, he bet that was true. Dumbledore would be guiding them towards whichever puppet he could control the easiest.

The only good part of the headmaster’s report was the confirmation that Dolores Umbridge was going to Azkaban for her crimes against the students of Hogwarts.

“Good riddance,” Moody snarled, and for once Sirius agreed with him.

“Quite,” Dumbledore said. “Though it does leave me once again on the search for a new Defence Against the Dark Arts teacher.”

“Do you have anyone in mind?” Hestia Jones asked. An infuriating smile crossed Dumbledore’s lips.

“I believe I have an idea,” he assured. “I merely need to make some inquiries.”

He continued droning on, and the longer he spoke the less patience Sirius had for it. “I’m surprised you’ve not mentioned anything about the attack on Amelia Bones, Albus,” he cut in. Several people gasped.

“Attack? What attack?” Arthur Weasley asked, wide-eyed.

“Voldemort himself decided to go after her,” Sirius revealed. “Last night. Luckily, Harry had a vision, and we managed to get word out just in time. Amelia and Susan are both fine.”

“Amelia did mention getting early warning,” Kingsley said, approval in his eyes. “Said she was damned lucky for it, too. Much later and things would have been... disastrous.”

Several people around the table looked uneasy; a Ministry without Amelia Bones was a much weaker institution indeed.

“Harry is still having visions, then?” Dumbledore pressed, blue eyes curious. Sirius felt the faintest pressure on his Occlumency shields, and scowled.

“He is. Not every night, but far more often than I’d like,” he remarked.

“I’ll be honest, I quite expected to find him down here,” Dumbledore said. “Last summer I understand he was quite insistent on being involved with the Order. I can’t see that having changed, after the events of last month. I would like to speak to him after the meeting, actually.”

“You can’t, I left him at home,” Sirius said blandly. Dumbledore froze.

“...He is not living here?”

“What do you mean, home?” Hestia Jones piped up.

“He’s not back with those awful muggles, is he?” Arthur asked in alarm.

“Of course not!” Sirius protested, offended that anyone would even consider he might have left Harry with them. “He’s at home. Our home. Which is the safest place he could possibly be.”

“Sirius...” And there was Dumbledore’s disapproving frown once again. “I must insist you bring him here at once; Voldemort will be looking for him, and it is imperative Harry be safe.”

“He is safe,” Sirius repeated. “Much safer with only a small handful of people knowing where he is. Forgive me, Albus, but after everything that happened last summer, I’m not going to let you just toss Harry around wherever is most convenient for you. He’s at home, and he’ll be staying there all summer.”

“Do you mean you’re not living here, either, Black?” Moody barked. “You’re supposed to be our point of contact. Keeping Headquarters protected.”

“Which goes to prove my point exactly; if I need to be here at all times to protect this place, I wouldn’t consider that safe, would you?” Sirius retorted. “As long as the Fidelius holds here, it’ll be safe for meetings. But there’s far too many people coming and going for me to be sure Harry will be alright. And quite frankly, it’s none of your damn business where I house my godson.”

“You are not his legal guardian, Sirius,” Dumbledore reminded.

“Not yet, but I will be as soon as I’m free.” And Sirius wondered how much of the stalling around Pettigrew was secretly Dumbledore’s doing, trying to avoid Sirius getting free and reclaiming his proper place in society.

“I need to speak with Harry,” Dumbledore said again. Sirius stared him down coolly.

“I’ll let him know, and if he wants to meet with you, we can arrange something,” he replied. “Until then, I thought the whole point of the Order was that Harry doesn’t need to be involved. You lot all spent last year telling me he was too young and had to be protected, now you’re angry at me for doing exactly that!”

“If you show me this home of yours, so I can see those protections for myself—“

“No,” Sirius cut the headmaster off bluntly. “I’m allowing you the use of my family house for the Order, Albus, but you’ve got no right to my private home.”

Across the table, he caught the look of warning in Remus’ eyes — they didn’t want to show their hand too early. But there was no way Sirius was allowing Dumbledore anywhere near Seren Du.

“Harry is fine where he is, Albus,” Remus said calmly. “I can attest to that myself. Perhaps we should get back to the matter at hand? Is there anything we can do to help secure the Ministry?”

Kingsley took the topic and ran with it, launching into his own report on the traitors within the auror department, and how things were going in the muggle Prime Minister’s office where he was currently stationed. Sirius leaned back in his chair, knee pressed against Charlie’s under the table. When he looked up, Dumbledore was still frowning at him. Sirius resisted the urge to smirk.

There were more members of the Order on Harry’s side than Dumbledore’s, at this point. The headmaster had best watch his step.

....

“What!?” The outraged yelp that burst from Harry’s lips startled Remus into spilling his tea, and Charlie’s egg fell off his fork.

“What’s the matter?” the redhead asked worriedly. Harry scowled, turning the front page of the morning paper for the rest of the table to see.

Rufus Scrimgeour Named Minister For Magic

“Oh, for fuck’s sake,” Sirius groaned, shaking his head. “They chose that prick?”

“Who is he?”

“He was the Head Auror,” Snape drawled, voice distinctly unimpressed. “He is cut much from the same cloth as Alastor Moody. A... traditional approach to eradicating Dark magic.”

Harry looked down at the article, reading quickly; indeed, there were lots of references to Scrimgeour being the ‘firm hand’ the country needed in these dangerous times. “So he’ll curse first and ask questions later, basically?”

“And anything worse than a Tickling charm will have him calling someone a Death Eater,” Remus agreed, frowning. “I understand people are looking for someone a bit more... proactive, after Fudge. But really, with how corrupt the Auror Office is already, putting the head of it in charge of the whole bloody Ministry hardly seems like a good idea.”

“That would require them to admit the Auror Office is corrupt,” Snape pointed out.

“What’s all this stuff about Scrimgeour having a rift with Dumbledore?” Harry asked, gesturing back at the paper. Sirius snorted.

“Oh, that’s a load of codswallop. Scrimgeour’s too prideful a man to bow to Dumbledore’s whims, so he pretends they hate each other but sucks up every scrap of advice the man hands out regardless.”

“Mentioning there’s bad blood between them is probably to placate all those people who have decided they hate Dumbledore because the Prophet’s spent the last year telling them to hate Dumbledore,” Charlie agreed. “They’re just covering their own arses.”

Well, Harry was all for people hating Dumbledore, but this Scrimgeour bloke didn’t look any better. “I thought for sure Amelia would get it,” he sighed. Remus pat him on the shoulder.

“She’s the most qualified for the position,” he agreed. “But she’s far too progressive. And competent. There’s a reason Voldemort tried to kill her himself. Between him and Dumbledore sticking their wands in, there was no way she’d get the job.”

He was right, but it didn’t make the news any easier to swallow. Susan was going to be furious.

"We'll just have to make sure Amelia lives to the end of the war, when we can have an actual, proper vote," he muttered to himself.

"That's the spirit, pup," Sirius enthused. "And here, this'll cheer you up." He waved a letter in his hand, grinning broadly. "It's from Amelia. My trial is set for three days time; the first Wizengamot meeting of the summer."

Harry's head snapped up, a beaming smile stretching across his face. Soon, Sirius would be free!

.-. .

With the trial in the books, it felt like the whole house had been hit with a sense of urgency. Sirius could hardly sit still, bouncing wildly between exuberant joy at his impending freedom and intense melancholy at the prospect of Dumbledore interfering and getting him locked up again. The rest of them tried their best to ease him out of those down swings, though Charlie seemed to be the only one with any real success.

Harry, meanwhile, was writing frantically back and forth with Susan and her aunt, making sure their case for the trial was as air-tight as possible.

Anything to stop him from worrying about Draco.

He hadn't heard anything from the Malfoys since Snape had told them Narcissa locked down the Manor; any letters with Hedwig came back unanswered, and Harry hadn't had the chance to give Draco the other mirror before they left school. The uncertainty gnawed at his gut, filling his head with all sorts of horrible scenarios whenever he took a moment to breathe.

It would have been in the papers if they were dead, he kept telling himself, but it wasn't as reassuring as he'd hoped.

But with Sirius so stressed about his upcoming trial, Harry didn't want to add more of a burden to his shoulders, or anyone else's. So, when the worry became too much, Harry grabbed his Firebolt and headed outside.

It felt glorious to be back in the air. Umbridge might have only banned him from quidditch for a couple of months, but he'd still missed flying intensely. He let his practice snitch go, doing laps of the half-pitch while it fluttered around. But even flying couldn't entirely rid him of the anxiety bubbling in his gut, the tiny voice in the back of his head insisting that Draco was in danger.

He turned, intending to dive for the snitch, only to come up short at the sight of a redhead zooming towards it.

Charlie plucked the snitch from the air, offering Harry a gentle smile. There was worry in his eyes nonetheless. "Best two out of three?" he suggested lightly.

"That one doesn't count," Harry insisted, and Charlie laughed.

"Yeah, okay, fair."

He released the snitch, and the pair of them circled for a count of fifteen, then shot off.

It was easier to focus, with the distraction of playing against another person. By the time they'd played five rounds — four of which had gone to Harry — he had something of a smile on his face.

"Feel better?" Charlie asked, drifting up beside him. Harry let out a long breath, pocketing the snitch once it was securely in its box.

"A little." Harry tipped his face into the breeze, wishing it would blow away his troubles along with it. "I just... I had another letter come back from Draco, this morning. Unanswered."

"Malfoy Manor's war wards are likely to deflect any form of contact," Charlie pointed out. "Just in case. I'm sure he's fine."

"But what if he's not," Harry argued. "What if the wards failed and Voldemort got him!"

"Snape's been Called twice since Mrs Malfoy kicked the Death Eaters out." Charlie's voice was frustratingly calm. "You really think You-Know-Who wouldn't brag to all of them if he'd captured the Malfoys?"

He had a point, and it eased Harry's worry just a little. "I just need to know he's okay." It had been hard enough saying goodbye on the train, knowing the death of his father still weighed heavily on Draco's mind.

"I'm sure you'll hear from him soon," Charlie assured. "Once it's safe. From what Sirius tells me, he's probably just as worried about you in return."

"What has Sirius told you?" Harry asked with raised eyebrows, wondering how much his godfather had been gossiping about him. Charlie blushed faintly.

"Not much," he said quickly. "Just that Draco's a good kid, considering his father. And that Narcissa's probably got the wedding colours picked out already," he added teasingly, and it was Harry's turn to blush.

He couldn't even deny that. Narcissa had probably picked them out months ago.

"Have you tried sending a letter with Ceri?" Charlie asked. Harry nodded morosely; the Malfoy wards even kept elves out. "Damn. Well. Have you asked Sirius for ideas? Narcissa's his cousin, he might know something."

"He's got enough to worry about, with the trial," Harry insisted, shaking his head. For some reason, that made Charlie smile.

"Like he wouldn't drop it all for you in a heartbeat," the redhead retorted. "He's worried about you, Harry. He... I've tried telling him there's too much evidence to have him locked away again. And even if the worse does happen, we won't let Dumbledore get his hands on you. But in all his fears about the trial, none of it is about going back to Azkaban for himself. He's just terrified of leaving you."

Harry's heart twisted painfully. "He still doesn't need to be worrying about Draco on top of all that. After the trial, I'll ask him." There was little point doing anything now, anyway; the trial was tomorrow.

"If you're sure," Charlie said, shrugging.

They drifted together, doing lazy loops around the pitch. "He's scared of leaving you, too, y'know," Harry said abruptly. Charlie raised an eyebrow.

"Pardon?"

"Sirius. He might not say it to you, but I've seen the way he watches you lately." Like Charlie might disappear if he looked away. The same way he watched Harry. "He's scared he might lose you, through this trial."

"He'll have to try harder than that, to shake me," Charlie challenged, smirking. "I'm not worried, Harry, and you shouldn't be either. The evidence is solid. Amelia's got it all under control. Sirius will get free."

Harry wished he could have that sort of confidence.

"The twins have asked me to bring you both round to the shop, after the trial," Charlie continued. "Said something about you needing to inspect your investment." He raised an amused eyebrow. "Care to elaborate?"

Harry told him about giving the twins his Triwizard winnings, and Charlie burst out laughing.

"Merlin, Harry! Never tell Mum, she'll kill you." His smile faltered at that, turning sad.

"Have you... spoken to her, since, y'know?" Harry didn't know the exact details, but he knew Mrs Weasley had blown up when she found out about Charlie and Sirius.

"I tried," Charlie said. "Went over to the house, tried to chat with her. Just ended in an argument. Mum... I know George has told you she's never really agreed with our sexuality. And I know she's gotten at you for it a few times." Harry scowled, nodding. "I think maybe she might've come round if it had been anyone other than Sirius. Some nice Romanian bloke, or maybe a good Gryffindor lad my own age. But... she never liked Sirius, regardless. I think because he was a threat to her — with him around, her and Dad were no longer the only parental figures in your life. And he was just so unashamedly himself, unapologetic about everything, she couldn't bear to see it." He grinned, winking at Harry. "I'll confess that's half the reason I started flirting with him, to start with. Just to piss Mum off, if she ever noticed it." He ran a hand through his hair. "Didn't expect to fall arse over teakettle for the bloke."

"He grows on you," Harry agreed fondly. Charlie laughed.

"Doesn't he just." He shook his head, affectionate smile still curling his lips. "Mum will either come around, or she won't. But Dad and the rest of the family don't care. And I've got the approval of you and Remus, so that's the only opinions Sirius gives a shit about. Far as the rest are concerned, he'll probably enjoy the outrage of it all."

Harry snorted; that sounded like Sirius. “I hope you know what you’re getting in for, once he’s free,” he mock-warned. “He’ll be dragging you out all over the place, wanting to show off his pretty bit of arm candy.”

Charlie laughed again, smirking deviously. “Fine by me,” he drawled. “I can do arm candy. It’s likely to be more seedy bars than fancy restaurants, anyway; he knows it takes persuasion to get me into formalwear.”

“Ew,” Harry mock-groaned, making Charlie snicker.

“Get used to it, little brother; I live here now,” Charlie teased, swooping in close to ruffle Harry’s hair. Harry ducked away, scowling.

“Can you really call me little brother when you’re dating my godfather?” he joked, wiggling his eyebrows. “I think it’s closer to step-son, if you look at it like that.”

“Only when we’re married,” Charlie shot back automatically, then blushed at the intent look Harry gave him.

“When, is it?” he asked pointedly.

“Don’t be a brat, son,” Charlie retorted. Then he paused, making a face of disgust and shaking his head. “Nope, that’s weird. I’m too young for that.”

Harry snickered. “Get used to it, Dad, you live here now,” he taunted, quickly dodging as Charlie started to chase him.

“You don’t need another dad, you’ve got two of them in that house,” the redhead pointed out dryly. “Three if you count Snape.” He slowed down, and a shudder ran through him. “That’s still the weirdest part of this whole situation.”

“You get used to it eventually,” Harry assured. “Give it enough time and you’ll catch him having a genuine emotion. After that it’s a bit hard to take all the scowling seriously. Not to mention the flirting, ugh, they’re awful when they get going.”

“Too weird,” Charlie insisted. “You’ve just been living here too long. Can’t believe they hid you right under Dumbledore’s nose.”

“He’s not as omniscient as he thinks,” Harry said, a little smug.

“I’m starting to realise that,” Charlie agreed.

They were pulled out of their half-hearted chasing when the bell rang to summon them for lunch, and the pair landed quickly, shouldering their brooms. “Hey,” Charlie called, reaching out one huge arm to wrap around Harry’s shoulders. “I’m sure Draco’s doing fine, yeah? Once Sirius is free, we’ll figure out a way for you to write to him. Or bring him here.” He grinned, cheeks dimpling. “I’ve got a lot of brotherly teasing to catch up on, after all.”

“We’ve heard it all from the twins already,” Harry told him, unbothered. “And Ginny.”

"The twins have got nothing on me," Charlie insisted, seemingly delighted by the challenge.
"You'll see."

Harry wondered if he should be nervous, but the feeling didn't last; he was too swept up in Charlie's unbridled optimism.

.-.-.

Harry sat with his hands on his knees, green eyes carefully surveying the group of wizard and witches sat opposite him.

The trial of Sirius Black was about to begin.

The Wizengamot looked incredibly imposing, sat in their identical deep plum robes. Even the familiar faces within the mix couldn't calm Harry's nerves. Not when Albus Dumbledore sat there, looking entirely too happy for Harry's liking.

"The Wizengamot calls the defendant; Sirius Orion Black."

The side door to the courtroom opened, and Sirius was marched in between two aurors. Unfortunately, they weren't aurors Harry knew — Tonks had been recused due to familial connections, and Kingsley was on Wizengamot duty. Still, Sirius kept his head high, and offered Harry a reassuring smile that didn't quite meet his eyes. He was forced into a chair in the centre of the room, and when one of the aurors tapped it with her wand, chains sprung up and wrapped around his arms and legs. Sirius didn't flinch.

Minister Scrimgeour cleared his throat, but before he could speak again, the main door slammed open. Harry's breath caught in his throat.

Narcissa Malfoy strolled in, looking for all the world like she owned the place, wearing perfectly tailored charcoal robes. "Humble Wizengamot," she called in greeting, grey eyes flashing. "Following the death of my husband, Lord Lucius Malfoy — I, Lady Narcissa Malfoy, claim his right of proxy guardianship over the houses of Malfoy, Burke, Lestrange, Rosier, Rowle, Travers, Yaxley and Mulciber, until such time as their rightful heir can claim them."

Before Scrimgeour or anyone else could say anything, there was a hum of magic, and the empty seats of the eight houses she'd listed glowed briefly.

The Wizengamot magic had confirmed her position. To show it, her robes transfigured immediately into the same plum robes that the rest wore.

Scrimgeour cleared his throat. "Very well, then, Lady Malfoy. Please, take your seat so we may begin."

Narcissa gracefully swept towards the Malfoy seat, catching Harry's eye on the way. She looked incredibly pleased.

Dumbledore, too, looked quietly delighted by the proceedings; likely he thought Narcissa would vote against her cousin's freedom out of spite.

He had another thing coming.

Scrimgeour paused, as if expecting some other surprise, and then slammed his gavel down, bringing the court to order. Beside him, Percy Weasley was poised to make notes.

“We are gathered here on this day, July seventh, nineteen ninety-six, to conduct the trial of Sirius Orion Black,” he announced. “Black, who was previously sentenced to life in Azkaban for the crime of fourteen counts of murder, and breaking the statute of secrecy, and who escaped Azkaban in July of nineteen ninety-three.” Scrimgeour turned to Sirius, staring at him coldly. “Mr Black, how do you plead?”

“Not guilty,” Sirius replied without hesitation. “Not of murder. I will admit I escaped prison, but I was there unlawfully to begin with.”

Scrimgeour sneered. “So you claim. Madam Bones,” he called, turning to the woman. Harry was glad to see her there, unharmed and keen-eyed. “I believe you have evidence for the defence.”

“I do, Minister.” Amelia stood, gathering a stack of parchments. “May I call the prisoner Peter Pettigrew in for questioning?”

There was a flurry of whispers through the crowd. Then Scrimgeour cleared his throat. Harry was starting to get Umbridge flashbacks. “I’m afraid, Madam Bones, that will not be possible. The man claiming to be Peter Pettigrew was found dead in his cell this morning.”

The chains rattled as Sirius visibly flinched. Harry’s heart sank — how could that be?

His eyes turned to Dumbledore, whose eyes were smug behind his twinkle. Harry scowled; had the headmaster done this?

Luckily, Amelia was unperturbed. “That is unfortunate,” she replied. “But it is a good thing Auror Shacklebolt already provided me with a Veritaserum-confirmed transcript of Pettigrew’s interrogation. If the Wizengamot would please read.” She waved her wand, and parchment appeared on the desk of each member. “In the interrogation, Mr Pettigrew admits to having been the Secret Keeper for the Potter family, and also a servant of the Dark Lord. He confesses to framing Mr Black for his murder, and using his unregistered animagus form to escape, seeking refuge with a wizarding family in the guise of a pet rat.”

Amelia gave everyone time to read, while Scrimgeour sat and scowled, not even looking at his papers. It was clear he’d already made his mind up.

“A fanciful story, to say the least. But as there was no magical confirmation that the man was indeed Mr Pettigrew, it cannot be taken as evidence for Mr Black’s innocence.”

“Not alone, which is why Mr Black has agreed to his own Veritaserum testimony in front of the Wizengamot today.”

“Impossible,” Scrimgeour snapped. “Black has already been found guilty once of this crime; a defendant cannot be placed under Veritaserum twice for the same confession.”

"That's where you're wrong, Minister," Amelia replied, smiling pleasantly. "Mr Black has never given any form of Veritaserum testimony in front of a Wizengamot court. Indeed, Mr Black was never given any trial of any kind." A few gasps rang out from the Wizengamot crowd.

"What?" Scrimgeour's eyes narrowed. A wave of Amelia's wand, and more parchment appeared.

"You will see the arrest record for Mr Black, and his Azkaban registration," Amelia explained. "Eleven hours apart. Mr Black was never given the chance to defend himself in court, nor was the evidence ever processed. With the late Barty Crouch Sr's signature on the papers, Mr Black was taken to Azkaban without trial or due process." Her smile was dagger-sharp. "So you see, Minister, Mr Black is long overdue his testimony."

Scrimgeour was pale, now. "Indeed," he growled. "Very well; bring forward the Veritaserum."

Harry tried not to smile too widely, watching one of the aurors appear with a bottle of potion, which was tested for legitimacy with a complicated-looking spell, and then three drops were placed on Sirius' tongue. Amelia stepped forward, beginning the interrogation.

"What is your name?"

"Sirius Orion Black," Sirius responded, in that vacant tone of one under the influence of the truth-telling potion.

"What is your date of birth?"

"November 3rd, 1959."

"Are you, or have you ever been, a servant of the Dark Lord Voldemort?"

"No."

Gasps echoed through the room. Amelia continued. "Were you the Secret Keeper for Lily and James Potter?"

"No."

"Who was their Secret Keeper?"

"Peter Pettigrew."

Harry's hands curled in the fabric of his robes as he leant forward in his seat slightly.

"Please recount the events of the night of October 31st 1981, beginning with your arrival at the Potters' home."

"I arrived on my motorbike, at around nine in the evening," Sirius stated blankly. "The house was half-destroyed, and I could hear a baby crying. So I went inside, to try and find Harry.

He was in his cot, with a cut on his head. I picked him up. I knew Voldemort would be after him, I had to keep him safe. When I left the house, Hagrid was there. He said that Dumbledore had sent him to retrieve Harry, to take him somewhere safe. We argued — I didn't want him taking Harry anywhere. He accused me of betraying Lily and James, and I knew that until Peter was caught, everyone would think I did. So I let him take Harry, and my motorbike, and I went to go find Peter. I caught up with him at his house, where he was packing, trying to run. I chased him out onto the street. He yelled for everyone to hear that I was the Secret Keeper, that I was the reason Lily and James were dead. Then he blew up the street, cut off his own finger and transformed into a rat. I tried to find him, but the aurors showed up."

It broke Harry's heart, hearing his godfather recount such a traumatic night in that empty, emotionless voice.

"No further questions, Minister." Amelia declared.

"I have a question," Scrimgeour growled. "You were laughing, Black; when the aurors came for you. Why?"

"It was the first time Peter had shown any sort of cunning," Sirius responded. "I was laughing because I couldn't believe he had the brains to do it. And laughing was easier than crying."

The response just made Scrimgeour scowl harder. But he waved his hand, and the antidote was given to Sirius, who blinked away the vacant stare.

"If Black was innocent the whole time, why did he break out of Azkaban to go after Potter?" Scrimgeour pointed out. That made Amelia smile.

"For that, I would like to bring Mr Harry Potter to the stand."

Harry stood up, approaching the chair Amelia gestured to.

"Objection!" Dumbledore cut in. "Mr Potter is a minor; he cannot be subject to Veritaserum."

"No potions," Amelia promised. "Just questions. Mr Potter, do you consent?"

"I consent," Harry confirmed.

"Excellent. Have a seat." Harry sat. "Mr Potter, please recount to the court the events of the night of June 27th, 1993, to the best of your knowledge."

Harry had prepared for this. He was ready. In a clear, steady voice, he explained what had happened the night Sirius dragged Hermione to the Shrieking Shack.

He glossed over some of the details; the Marauder's Map, some of the exact things said, the extent of Snape's involvement. But the important parts were there; namely, Sirius' confession of innocence, and Pettigrew's admission of guilt.

"In all the chaos of Professor Lupin transforming, Pettigrew got away," Harry explained. "Professor Snape got knocked out trying to protect us. Sirius and I ran to the lake, for safety, but the dementors came. I cast a Patronus to keep them at bay, and then I passed out.”

“A Patronus, able to keep a hundred dementors at bay, at the age of thirteen?” Scrimgeour blustered. “Preposterous!”

“Minister, if I may.” It was Madam Marchbanks, raising her hand. “I saw Mr Potter perform a Patronus myself, in his recent OWL examinations. It certainly had the strength for such a task, and I fully believe his story.”

Scrimgeour didn’t like that, as an impressed wave of whispers scattered through the room.

“I can perform the spell right now, if you’d like,” Harry offered, but Scrimgeour scowled at him

“Underage magic will not be necessary,” he snapped.

“I have a few further questions for Mr Potter, if I may?” Amelia continued, making Harry tense. What else could she possibly have to ask him? “Mr Potter; would you please describe, to the best of your knowledge, the events of your arrival at the home of Mr and Mrs Dursley, on the night of October 31st, 1981?”

“Objection!” Dumbledore cut in. “This questioning is irrelevant to the case, and a breach of Mr Potter’s privacy.”

“It is relevant, Minister, I promise,” Amelia assured.

“I’m happy to answer,” Harry added. Scrimgeour gave a curt nod. “I only know what I’ve been told, since, y’know, I was a baby,” Harry admitted, and a few people snickered. “My aunt found me on the doorstep on the morning of November 1st when she went to get the milk delivery. I was left with a letter, explaining that my parents had been killed, and for my own safety my aunt and uncle had to take me in.”

“Do you know who wrote this letter?” Amelia pressed.

“Albus Dumbledore, Ma’am.”

“So Albus Dumbledore instructed Rubeus Hagrid to bring you to your muggle relatives immediately after the murder of your parents, where he left you on a doorstep overnight in freezing cold weather, with nothing but a letter as explanation.” Amelia’s tone was even, but her eyes were bright.

“Yes, as far as I know.”

“Albus Dumbledore is not the one on trial,” Scrimgeour cut in. Amelia’s smile widened.

“One more question, Minister.” She turned back to Harry. “Mr Potter, are you aware that both the wills of Lily and James Potter expressly forbid your guardianship being turned over to Mrs Potter’s muggle sister?”

Harry gaped at her. “I—I didn’t know they had wills.” When she hadn’t mentioned anything, he’d assumed that had come up empty.

“Let the Wizengamot see,” Amelia waved her wand, “that according to the records at Gringotts bank, the wills of Lily and James Potter were both sealed by Professor Albus Dumbledore — four hours after the arrest of Mr Sirius Black, but prior to his Azkaban admittance. While Professor Dumbledore was, by technicality, Mr Potter’s legal head of house, due to proxy offered by James Potter in the event of his death and Mr Black’s inability to claim the position. Approximately seven hours later — around the same time Mr Black was being taken to Azkaban prison without trial — Mrs Petunia Dursley found an infant Harry Potter on her doorstep, after the child had waited there for an unspecified amount of time.”

Amelia looked up at the Wizengamot, coolly staring down Scrimgeour, not even acknowledging Dumbledore. “It is travesty enough that the heir to the Noble and Most Ancient House of Black could be imprisoned for life without trial. It would be much, much worse to consider that it was done to secure the unlawful placement of Harry Potter with his muggle relatives.”

Harry stared at her, incredulous. That was a *balls*y move. Indeed, Dumbledore looked like he’d choked on one of his lemon drops. “Objection!” the headmaster called after he collected himself. “As Minister Scrimgeour said, I am not the one on trial here, and the matter of the safety of Harry Potter is more complicated than you could begin to understand, Amelia, dear.”

“I’m sure you believe that, Professor,” Amelia replied blandly. “The point of the matter is, Mr Black was arrested, sentenced and convicted without trial — while his godson, Mr Potter, was claimed and removed from the wizarding world, against the request of his deceased parents, while Mr Black was not present and able to advocate for him. I would not be so bold as to suggest Mr Black was intentionally framed for his crimes, but it is clear that a grave miscarriage of justice was conducted that night, and we are obligated to correct what we can. Sirius Black is an innocent man, and I move for all charges against him to be dropped, and his freedoms — and guardianship of Harry James Potter — to be returned to him immediately.”

“All against the motion?” Scrimgeour droned, raising his own wand. Harry craned his neck, counting the number of wands that went up. Hope rose in his chest; it wasn’t nearly enough, surely!

When he turned to Dumbledore, the man was staring intently at Narcissa. He looked very surprised that her wand was not raised.

“All in favour of the motion?” Dumbledore raised his wand; as did Amelia, and both Weasley brothers, and Kingsley, and a smattering of others.

And then Narcissa Malfoy raised her wand high in the air.

There was a long, tense silence. Until Percy Weasley cleared his throat. “The motion is passed,” he declared somewhat nervously.

Scrimgeour had no choice but to slam down his gavel. “Sirius Black is cleared of all charges,” he announced, scowling. Immediately, the chains around Sirius’ limbs dropped. Harry jumped to his feet, throwing himself into his godfather’s arms.

“We did it!” he breathed, his chest so full of joy and relief he could hardly breathe. Sirius smacked a kiss on his head, then straightened up, arm still around Harry’s shoulders.

“Before the Wizengamot is dismissed; I, Sirius Orion Black, do hereby claim the Black seat of my birthright.” The seat glowed brightly, and a lordship ring formed on Sirius’ hand. “I also claim, with permission, proxy guardianship of both the Potter and Peverell seats, until such time that my godson, Harry Potter, comes of age and desires them himself.”

Two seats glowed softly, and Harry felt a warmth in his own chest. “I give my permission,” he said aloud, not sure if he needed to but not wanting any hint of doubt.

The glow brightened, and then there was a hum of magic in the chamber. It was done.

Dumbledore looked furious.

“Wizengamot dismissed!” Scrimgeour barked, before any other changes could be made. At once, everyone’s purple robes transformed back into the outfits they had arrived in. The group began to disperse, and Dumbledore — now wearing a blindingly bright lemon-yellow robe — came towards them. Sirius’ hand tightened on Harry’s shoulder.

“Congratulations, my boy,” the headmaster said, smiling. His eyes were devoid of their twinkle, and it made Harry grin. “You understand, of course, that Amelia’s evidence regarding the wills is circumstantial at best? Of course I would have done everything I could to keep you out of prison, but my priority had to be Harry’s safety, and by the time that was secured it was too late for me to interfere.”

“Oh, I understand completely, Headmaster,” Sirius assured evenly. Dumbledore’s smile widened.

“Glad to hear it. Harry, it is good to see you looking so well,” he added, finally addressing his student. “Might I have a word, if you are not too busy?”

“Sorry, Professor, but Remus is waiting for us at home,” Harry said with the best apologetic smile he could muster. “They wouldn’t let him in because of the whole werewolf thing, y’know. But he’ll be really pleased to hear the good news. Another time, perhaps?”

“I— of course, of course. Enjoy your celebrations.”

Harry and Sirius didn’t wait for the man to apparate away, already headed to the doors where Bill and Charlie were waiting. They stopped at the approach of a blonde head of hair. “Congratulations, cousin,” Narcissa drawled, and Sirius grinned.

“Thank you, Cissa, dear. My condolences for the loss of your husband,” he added drolly. “Though I hear you have been doing some... spring cleaning, to work through your grief.”

“Quite.” Narcissa’s lips twitched in the barest of smiles. She held out an envelope to Harry, who immediately recognised the handwriting on the outside, his heart lurching. “My son sends his regards, Mr Potter,” Narcissa said, watching Harry carefully tuck the letter away. “Good afternoon, gentlemen.”

Then she swept away, apparating from the chamber at the threshold. Harry was practically skipping by the time they reached their two redheaded companions.

“Lord Prewett, Lord Weasley,” Sirius greeted with an unnecessarily pompous bow. Charlie smirked.

“Lord Black,” he returned, offering his arm with a flourish. “Shall we?”

And so with Charlie on one side and Harry on the other, Sirius Black walked out of the Wizengamot chamber, a free man at last.

Chapter 77

In the morning, the Prophet was full of stories of Sirius' freedom. The ex-convict delighted in reading them aloud over breakfast, gleefully repeating the parts that shed suspicion on Dumbledore's involvement in the Potters' wills.

"I want to marry Amelia Bones," Sirius declared, and Charlie kicked his shin halfheartedly.

"Oi!" he protested. Sirius just laughed, dancing out of kicking range.

"Come on, can you blame me? The way she just brought out those facts, right in front of the old goat, and managed to make it all part of my own case! Fucking masterful."

"It was brilliant," Charlie agreed. Then he reached out, grabbing Sirius by the wrist and yanking him down into his lap. "But you're not marrying her."

"Make me a better offer," Sirius challenged. Charlie just winked.

"Maybe I will."

"I'm going to leave before I vomit," Snape declared, getting to his feet. Remus laughed.

"Don't forget to come up for lunch," he teased, bidding his partner goodbye.

"So what do you want to do with your first day as a free man, then?" Harry asked, beaming at his godfather.

"Well, now it's all over the paper, I suppose we should see what the public reaction will be," Sirius suggested, still grinning. "Anyone up for a trip to Diagon?"

"You mean we have to be seen in public with you?" Charlie mock-complained. Sirius just laughed, kissing him firmly.

"Get used to it, Weasley," he drawled. "I can go anywhere I want, now! I've got fifteen years of catching up to do!"

"I'll come with you, as long as you stop doing that," Harry said, gesturing to the pair of them, and Sirius barked a laugh.

"I suppose it has been a very long time since I witnessed the Public Spectacle of Sirius Black," Remus mused, shaking his head. "But I can't be out too long; I promised Severus I'd go over some adjustments he's making to the Wolfsbane this afternoon."

"You're going to leave me with the lovebirds?" Harry yelped in dismay. Charlie snorted, reaching out to ruffle his hair.

"I'll drop Bill a line, see if he wants to join us," he assured. That perked Harry up, and he finished his breakfast quickly, heading upstairs to get changed for the day.

On his desk, the letter from Draco was open, having been re-read a dozen times the evening before; the Slytherin boy was absolutely fine, but they were just laying low while Narcissa sorted out some legal business leftover from Lucius' death. He promised Harry he'd visit soon, and Harry could hardly wait.

When he returned to the entrance hall, the three adults were dressed in robes. Sirius was in fine form, his hair silky and tied back in a low ponytail, looking every bit the Pureblood Lord he was. His eyes were shining in a way that made Harry's heart swell with happiness for him.

"Let's go!" he declared brightly, practically dragging Charlie towards the door. Remus and Harry followed at a much more sedate pace, though Harry could see mischief hiding in Remus' amber gaze; he was looking forward to shocking the public just as much as the rest of them.

Indeed, when Sirius apparated into Diagon Alley, there was a small burst of screams. Then people remembered the Prophet headline, and just stared at the four of them, wide-eyed.

Sirius didn't falter for a second at the scrutiny, and to his credit, neither did Charlie. The redhead tangled his fingers with Sirius', offering his partner a sunny smile. "Where to first, sweetheart?"

"Gringotts, I think," Sirius declared. "Make sure the accounts are all in order."

They were given a wide berth up the alley, people stopping to stare and whisper as soon as they saw them. It was weird, for Harry, being the centre of attention due to someone else's presence. Was this what his friends felt like?

They all paused at the sight of the lurid purple building declaring itself to be Weasley's Wizard Wheezes. "Fucking brilliant," Sirius declared proudly. "Oh, we're definitely going there next. But I need money first."

They hurried to the white marble building at the end of the alley, and Harry spotted a familiar head of red hair waiting outside. Bill waved at them, reaching out to clap Sirius on the shoulder. "How does it feel?"

"Incredible," Sirius declared vehemently, beaming. "I need to check my accounts."

"I thought you might; I set up a meeting for you," Bill told him. "With Farlig; he's the goblin Harry put in charge of all his accounts, which included the Black accounts at the time. He wants to know if you'd prefer to switch back to your old account manager."

"Nah; if Harry likes him, that's good enough for me," Sirius assured, to Harry's quiet relief. They passed by the goblins guarding the bank and into the main entrance hall. Bill led them straight through to one of the offices, flashing a Gringotts pass as he walked.

Harry was only partially surprised to see Gorrik in the office as well as Farlig; both goblins bowed, and Harry bowed back, offering the customary greetings.

"The Nation's congratulations on your freedom, Lord Black," Farlig said. "I understand you wish to review the Black accounts?"

Harry left him to it, shuffling over with Bill and Gorrak. "How is progress going?" he asked. To his shock, the Weasley and the goblin shared a toothy grin.

"That's one of the reasons I asked Gorrak here, actually," Bill started. "I don't know where Snape got that book, but it's exactly what we needed. We know how to get the horcrux out of you."

Harry stared at him, the words echoing in his brain. "I— really?"

"We can perform the ritual as soon as you are ready, Mr Potter," Gorrak confirmed.

Harry's heart soared — and quickly fell, once a thought occurred to him. "I can't, yet," he realised, feeling sick. "The visions... I can't stop having them. I've already saved lives with them, I can't risk that going away." Without the horcrux, he would no longer have the connection to Voldemort's mind. There would be no early warning if anything should happen again like it had almost happened to the Bones', or to Mr Weasley last Christmas.

Bill's brow furrowed. "It's dangerous to keep it, Harry. He could send you false visions to trap you; he's already tried it once. The longer he knows about the connection, the higher the chance he might figure out what it really is."

"I know, but I just... I need a little more time." He just needed to see how bad things were going to get. How many other people he could save. "How long does the ritual take to prepare?"

"Half an hour," Gorrak responded. "We could even do it right now, if you wished."

"I can't," Harry insisted sadly.

"I don't like this, Harry." Bill was frowning. "Having that thing inside you... it's not good for you."

"It's been there fifteen years almost, what's a few more months going to make?" Harry retorted. "I promise, as soon as it looks like things need to change — if it gets dangerous, or he becomes too aware — I'll have it removed. But... I can do good things with it, right now." His lips twisted bitterly. "It's not like I can kill him even if we do destroy it. We still don't know where the rest are, if he has any more."

"The cursebreaking team have been doing some research on that front, as well," Gorrak supplied. "We believe with confidence that it is impossible for any more than nine horcruxes to be made without the soul dissolving entirely. So at the very least, there is an upper limit."

That wasn't nearly as comforting as Harry would like it to be. "Is there a way of tracking them?"

Gorrak and Bill shook their heads. "We've been trying to figure out where the rest might be," Bill assured. "But considering where the ones we know about were, we don't have much to go on.”

Harry bit his lip in thought. The diary had been with Lucius Malfoy, and the locket... either Voldemort had left it in Grimmauld Place, or he'd given it to Regulus Black.

“What about with his other followers?” he suggested. “That seems to be what he did with them; giving them to other people to look after.” He was struck with a thought, and frowned. “Is there a way to search the vaults of his Death Eaters? I know the contents is private and everything,” he added quickly. “But if you’re, like, cataloguing or whatever. Surely you could take a look?”

The pair frowned, Bill glancing at Gorrak for authority on the matter. Slowly, a sharklike grin crossed the goblin’s face. “It is true that what wizards choose to store in their vaults is at their discretion,” he began. “However, the Nation has laws. Including the law that no living being is to be contained within a vault.” His dark eyes flashed viciously. “I believe a horcrux could be considered a living being, of a sort. It would be entirely within Gringotts policy to remove such an object from its vault for violation of goblin law.” He turned to Harry, nodding decisively. “We shall see it done. If there is a horcrux within this bank, we will find it.”

“Brilliant.” Harry’s stomach clenched, hardly daring to hope it might be that simple.

When he looked back to Sirius, his godfather was bent over the desk, wielding a sharp grey quill over an ancient looking piece of parchment. Considering Gorrak and Bill were already deep in discussion over which vaults to check, Harry sidled over to the desk, peering at it curiously. “What are you up to?”

“Oh, y’know,” Sirius replied airily. “Just a little family tree maintenance.”

Harry’s eyes widened, and he looked closer. Sirius’ name on the tree now glowed bright gold, showing him to be the current head of the family. A few rows over, in fresh black ink, was Andromeda Black Tonks.

Sirius had only needed to write her name; as the magic accepted her reintroduction to the family, ink sprawled out, creating lines to link her to her husband Edward Tonks, and her child Nymphadora Tonks. Sirius nodded in satisfaction, then put the quill down, reaching for a blood red one lying next to the family tree.

Without hesitation, he struck a line through the name of Bellatrix Black Lestrange, murmuring something in Latin that Harry didn’t quite catch. There was a flare of magic, a tug within Harry’s core, and then Bellatrix’s name faded on the paper until it was little more than a scar of faded ink, her connections to her family dissolved.

“Merlin, that felt good,” Sirius declared, smirking. Farlig grinned, rolling up the family tree at Sirius’ order.

“I will have the full accounts of the Black holdings sent to Curse-breaker Weasley to bring to you,” he declared.

"Would you send him the Potter and Peverell holdings, too?" Harry requested. "He can look at them, right? Since he's my guardian?" If Sirius could get the deed to the Pottery, that would make their sanctuary even more secure.

"It will be done," Farlig assured. "Is there anything else we can do for you, Lord Black?"

"There should be a pensieve, in the Potter vaults," Sirius said. "Would you have it brought up, please? With Harry's permission."

"Yes," Harry blurted immediately. "Please." He flushed, but Farlig just smiled and nodded, writing a note which vanished immediately.

"I know I said we'd go through the whole vault together, pup," Sirius said, squeezing his shoulder. "But I don't think today's the day for it, yeah? We'll come back another time."

Harry wasn't about to make Sirius spend his first day of freedom holed up in a Gringotts vault underground. They had plenty of time for that, in future.

"Sounds good," he agreed.

While they waited for the pensieve to be delivered, Sirius got set up with a new bank card and money purse, and was able to authorise them for Harry, too. "Don't spend it all in one place," he said teasingly when Harry pocketed his card, as if it would be possible to spend the whole Potter fortune in one lifetime, let alone one place.

The pensieve brought up from the vaults was a beautiful piece of carved obsidian, and Harry was surprised when a small wooden box was placed beside it. "The note on the pensieve instructed these to be used together," the goblin messenger who had brought them up explained. Sirius reached for the box, and he sucked in a sharp breath when he opened it.

"Oh, Monty," he breathed. Remus froze.

"Monty?"

"He left memories," Sirius explained quietly. "For James and Lily. For us."

"...Oh." The two Marauders stared at each other for a long moment, and no one else spoke; there was nothing they could say. Then Remus cleared his throat, wiping hastily at his eyes. "Well, then. We can look through those later. Thank you," he added to the messenger, who bowed and retreated at Farlig's hand gesture.

"I think that's everything, then," Sirius said, voice a little hoarse. "Thank you, Farlig. You've been a friend to my godson, and I hope our relationship is long and prosperous."

"I am glad to guard your family's wealth, Lord Black," Farlig replied firmly.

Harry bid both goblins goodbye and the five of them left the bank, Sirius getting goggled at once more.

"I think that's about enough staring for one day, for me," Remus decided. "Pass me the pensieve, Padfoot. I'll take it home safely." He ruffled Harry's hair. "Be safe, cub." Then he looked at Bill, and smirked. "Keep these three out of trouble, will you? I don't trust either of them to be able to say no to Sirius today."

Bill laughed, while Charlie blushed. "I'll do my best," he promised. "See you, Remus."

The werewolf went to find a quiet spot to apparate from, and when Harry turned back, he was unsurprised to see Sirius' gaze set on the twins' shop.

"Looks like we're off to visit Fred and George," Charlie mused, sighing. Sirius just grabbed him by the hand and set off.

Harry and Bill kept up easily; Harry was keen to see the shop, too. There was a huge crowd outside it, though it parted with a sort of terrified awe at the sight of Sirius Black.

"At last!" the call came from nowhere, and suddenly Harry felt hands on his shoulders; he would've jumped, had it not been so familiar.

"We were starting to think you didn't love us anymore," Fred sniffed, tweaking Harry's ear.

"And you!" George said, rounding on Charlie. "Here I thought I was going to be the disgrace to the family with my pureblood Slytherin boyfriend. But you just had to go and one-up me with bloody Sirius Black!" He looked quite put-out, and Charlie laughed.

"Have to take the opportunities when they come, little brother," he replied, slamming a hand over George's mouth before the younger Weasley could make some inappropriate joke out of it. Charlie made a disgusted face, pulling his hand away and wiping slobber on George's robe. "Don't lick me, you don't know where that hand has been."

"I can make a few solid guesses," George retorted dryly.

"This place is amazing," Sirius declared in awe, looking round-eyed at everything the joke shop had to offer. Indeed, it was a riot of colour; Harry could see several things he recognised from the past year at school — including a whole display full of Skiving Snackboxes — but there were even more brand new items; the twins had been incredibly busy in the last few months.

"I can show you around if you like," Fred offered, bouncing on the balls of his feet.

"Marauder discount on whatever strikes your fancy."

"Except Charlie, you're paying full price for him," George joked, and Sirius snorted.

"Happy to," he replied with a wink.

"And you can just grab what you like, Harrikins," Fred added. "Your money's no good in here."

"Don't argue with us," George insisted, placing a finger over Harry's lips. Harry took a leaf out of his book, and licked it. George just laughed. "Now you definitely don't know where that's been lately."

Thinking over the possibilities, Harry mock-gagged.

"I'll try not to take offence at that, Potter." It was Blaise, approaching from the direction of the till. Harry stared at him.

"I thought you were in Italy!"

"Decided to stay and help the twins with the initial summer rush," the Slytherin explained. "Angie's here, too." He gestured back at the till, where Angelina was ringing up a cluster of kids for an incredible stack of prank goods. "Bit cosy in the flat with the four of us, but it could be worse. It's good to see you, though; I was starting to feel outnumbered by lions."

Harry blinked at him. "Blaise, I'm also a lion," he pointed out, amused. Blaise waved a dismissive hand.

"Barely."

That drew a laugh from Bill, and Blaise eyed him over. "You must be the eldest brother. Well met, Lord Prewett."

"Well met, Heir Zabini," Bill replied in turn, then offered a hand to shake. "Welcome to the madhouse, I suppose. Seems a bit late to warn you away from it."

Blaise chuckled, casting fond eyes towards George, who was eagerly demonstrating something to Sirius. "Quite," he agreed. "I hope we'll soon have a chance to get to know each other somewhere... quieter." As if on cue, an explosion of bright green smoke went up from somewhere in the back of the room. Blaise sighed. "Excuse me a moment." He started to squeeze through the crowd, headed in the direction of the mess.

"Looks like he fits right in," Bill joked. "Come on, let's see what they're selling Sirius on."

Harry and Bill shuffled their way over to where the twins were regaling Sirius and Charlie with the story of the Fireworks Extravaganza at Hogwarts. "I'll show you the memory when we get home," Harry promised the pair, grinning. "We just picked up a pensieve from my family vault," he added to the twins in explanation.

"Wicked," they replied, beaming.

"You'll have to show us all the stuff that went on after we left," Fred begged. "See if we can get some inspiration."

"And those origami eggs you did," George added, eyes bright. "Blaise told me about it. You've been holding out on us, Potter."

"We'll sort dinner at Grimmauld one night," Harry assured. "Memories and brainstorming. You can give me some ideas to keep the legacy alive now you're gone, too."

The twins nodded eagerly.

Sirius was off investigating again, and Harry was quite happy to leave Charlie to chase him around. Aware of Bill keeping close, Harry did some exploring of his own. The twins really were geniuses, with some of their stuff.

“This section is cool,” Bill said, gesturing to a smaller section off to the side. “It’s all defensive stuff. Pre-charged shield spells, stunners, that sort of stuff. Noise decoys — and this Peruvian Instant Darkness Powder, it’s really incredible.” He pointed at the little jet black rocks. “Do I want to know what you did that the twins won’t take your money? Or are you really just the favourite brother?” Bill asked, looking amused. Harry laughed, and told him; there was hardly need to keep it a secret now, after all.

“Wow,” Bill said, grinning. “I’ll have to tell Fleur, she’ll get a real kick out of that.”

“How’s she doing, anyway? I hope I get to see her this summer.”

Bill’s smile turned a little goofy at the mention of his fiancée. “She’s great. Part of the Order officially, now. We’ll figure out our next weekend off, have lunch together or something.”

“When’s the wedding?” Harry asked, tossing a couple of the Decoy Detonators into his basket with the Darkness Powder.

“Haven’t pinned a date down yet. But we’re not in a rush; I need to find us a house, and Fleur wants to be done with her internship and onto the apprentice programme before we’re married. It’s, ah, a more secure job — better hours, less chance of gallivanting about with something weird and dangerous. We’re pretty keen to try for kids, as soon as we’re married, so we want to make sure that’ll all work out.” He blushed faintly at the admission, and Harry stared at him, wide eyed.

“That soon? Really?”

Bill nodded. “We both want a family. Just got to get the essentials squared away; marriage, house, apprenticeship. After that... well, we’ll figure out the rest when we get there, yeah?” He was grinning, clearly eager for that future. Harry could see him with a little red-haired baby in his arms — or even a little blonde baby, if the veela blood ran true.

“You’ll be brilliant parents.” He’d seen Bill with all his younger siblings, and the way Fleur doted on Gabrielle. Any kids of theirs would be incredibly lucky.

“Thanks, Harry,” Bill said, beaming. “You’ll have a lot of competition for favourite uncle, though. Better start brainstorming now,” he joked.

They found their way towards the till, and Harry set his basket down. Angelina stared at him flatly. “No can do, Potter,” she declared. “Fred’s told me you don’t pay here.”

“Oh come on, Angie,” Harry whined. “I can’t just take all this stuff!”

“Quit being such a bloody Gryffindor, Potter,” Blaise drawled. “You’re better than that.”

That just made Harry roll his eyes, and eventually he was forced to stand aside so the person behind him in the queue could pay. Blaise grabbed him gently by the elbow, directing him into the back room. “How did everything go last week?” he asked, voice low and urgent. It took Harry a moment to figure out what he was referring to.

“Oh, that. Yeah, went smoothly. Everyone you sent my way is where they should be. Haven’t you heard from Theo?”

Blaise shook his head. “I think he got too focused worrying about Susan, after the attack was reported in the paper. I only know he’s fine because she told me.” He scoffed. “Lovestruck little idiot that he is.”

“Pot, kettle,” Harry retorted, smirking.

“Don’t start fights you won’t win, Potter,” came Blaise’s immediate retort. “I’ve seen you and Draco.”

Harry had to concede there.

“Speaking of, I assume you’ve heard about what happened at the Manor?”

Harry wasn’t sure how Blaise had heard, but he nodded all the same. “Mrs Malfoy claimed Lucius’ proxy seats before Sirius’ trial yesterday,” he explained. “I think her votes in his favour were the only reason he won, actually.” If all those seats had been down as abstaining, it might not have been enough.

“She’s certainly making her stance clear,” Blaise agreed, impressed. “I’ve heard a few rumours, down Knockturn way; there were a few darker families under a bit of pressure to join up, but several of them seemed to have mysteriously disappeared, with all their belongings. Current theory is they’ve moved in with the Malfoys.”

Harry’s eyebrows rose; Draco’s letter hadn’t said anything about that. “What makes you think that?”

“They’re all women from Mrs Malfoy’s social circle — women with family members in His service, but who have never pledged themselves. A few men, too. And their kids of course. I can’t think of anything else that would have such a prominent collection of dark socialites vanishing all at the same time.”

“Hopefully it’s not for more sinister reasons.” If Narcissa was rescuing people who were stuck in the same position she once had been, more power to her. “I should get to see Draco soon; I’ll give him your regards, and see if I can get some answers for you.”

“Please do. I’ll send you some names, too — Mrs Malfoy may be able to look into them. They’re kids I know are struggling, but they’re not in the position to help themselves. If she can do anything...” Blaise’s face was drawn, and Harry nodded.

Even if Narcissa couldn’t do anything, maybe Harry could, or even Snape.

The curtain to the back room was suddenly pulled back, and George peered in at them, smirking. “Oi, go back to your own snake, Potter,” he teased. “This one’s taken.” He slung an arm around Blaise’s waist, kissing him.

“You can keep him,” Harry replied lightly. “I just had some information.”

“About your boy?” George’s brows furrowed in concern. “Heard the Manor’s gone dark.”

“He’s fine,” Harry assured. “His mum came to Sirius’ trial. We’ll tell you about it later; it was amazing, you should’ve seen Dumbledore’s face! But she passed on a letter, and Draco’s safe. Hoping to visit soon.”

That made George crack a smile. “Glad to hear it.” There was a shout from the other side of the curtain, and George nudged Blaise forward. “Come on, you two. Come join the party.”

‘The party’ turned out to be watching Sirius pay for a truly obscene amount of Weasley products, a look of childlike glee on his face. Harry sighed. “Remus is going to hate us,” he said to Charlie, who just laughed, looking back at his partner indulgently.

“Probably,” he agreed. “But it’s worth it. Look how happy he is.” Then his eyes turned mischievous. “Besides, we’ll just blame Bill. He’s the one supposed to be telling us no.”

They both looked over to Bill, who was chatting away with Angelina about something or another, not even blinking at the amount Sirius was buying.

“Works for me.”

Eventually, Sirius was finished, all his purchases shrunk down into a bag. “We’ll owl you about dinner plans,” Harry promised, ducking Fred’s attempt to ruffle his hair — only for Angelina to get him instead.

“See that you do,” George insisted, kissing his cheek. “Don’t be a stranger, kid.”

After a long round of goodbyes, they were finally stepping back out into the alley. “Is that all you wanted, Padfoot?”

Sirius turned to him, grinning in a way that had dread gathering in the pit of Harry’s stomach. “Oh, pup,” he said brightly, “I’m just getting started.”

.-.-.-.

It turned out that shopping with Sirius Black was an endurance event. By the time they made their way back to Seren Du, Sirius had dragged them into what felt like every shop in the alley — it was even more of a shopping spree than Harry had gone on in the summer before his third year, when he’d been there alone! Bill bailed at around one in the afternoon, while Charlie and Harry were stuck with him until they finally returned home a little after five, laden down with bags. They found Remus in the living room, looking amused at the sight of them.

“You knew,” Harry accused, collapsing down on the sofa. “You knew how bad it would be.”

“Of course I knew,” Remus confirmed. “I grew up with the bugger. I can imagine he’s only gotten worse after fifteen years without access to shops in person. Why do you think I left after Gringotts?" He reached out, patting Harry's cheek consolingly. "How many new outfits did you end up with?"

"Twelve," Harry replied. "With a promise to go muggle clothes shopping sometime."

"For him or for you?"

"Both."

Remus glanced over at Sirius, who was stroking Charlie's hair while the redhead sprawled out on the sofa, as exhausted as Harry. "I'd make those two separate trips, and let those two get Sirius' clothes by themselves," he advised. "Unless you want to know things about your godfather you may regret learning."

Harry screwed up his nose in disgust. "Noted."

"Oh, come on, you two; it wasn't that bad," Sirius insisted cheerily. He was hardly even winded; Harry wondered if he was just riding on the high of finally being able to go out and be around other people.

"You're even worse than shopping with Tonks," Charlie groaned. "Maybe I should send the two of you off together next time."

Sirius looked delighted at the prospect.

"Why don't you go take a nap, Harry," Remus suggested, squeezing his ankle. "Put away the mountain of things I'm sure Sirius bought you. We'll call you when it's dinner time." His face softened. "Then we can get the pensieve out after?"

Harry brightened up; that sounded like a perfect plan to him.

.-. .

After dinner, Charlie begged off, saying he was still tired from the shopping spree. Harry suspected he just didn't want to intrude in their little trip down memory lane, but that was fine with him.

The four of them — Harry, Sirius, Remus and Snape — gathered in the upstairs living room, where the pensieve was sat on the table. Beside it was the box containing the memory vials from Harry's grandfather.

"I haven't watched any of them, yet," Remus said. "I wanted to wait for you to get home."

There were five vials in the box; one for James, one for Lily, one for the pair of them together, one for Sirius, and another simply labelled 'our boys'.

"What do we do about these three?" Harry asked, gesturing to the ones for his parents. Sirius and Remus shared a long, considering look.

"Leave them, I think," Sirius decided. "Whatever Monty and Phee wanted to say to them... that's not for us to intrude on."

Part of Harry wanted to argue — those were his grandparents' memories, and he wanted to know them! — But a bigger part of him wasn't sure he had the capacity to watch his dead grandparents leave a message for his dead parents, one they would never get to hear.

"Okay, then."

Sirius reached for the 'our boys' memory, pouring it into the pensieve. "Come on, then, Moons," he said, voice choked. Together, they placed their hands in the liquid, getting sucked into the memory.

Harry had never seen someone else use a pensieve before. It was strange, seeing them blank-eyed and bent over the bowl. Watching them unnerved him, so he looked away, turning to Snape instead. "Did you, uh... did you know my other grandparents?" he asked tentatively. "My Evans grandparents?"

Slowly, Snape nodded.

"Mr and Mrs Evans — Mark and Rose, though I could never bring myself to call them by their first names no matter how many times they asked. They were... incredibly kind individuals. Every Friday, Mr Evans would stop in at the chip shop on his way home from work. He always made sure to buy enough for me to have some, and they'd insist I stay for dinner, and to watch Come Dancing on telly. Mrs Evans used to be a ballroom dancer, in her youth."

Harry hung on his every word, watching the nostalgia cloud dark eyes. "They knew what things were like, with my family, and they always tried to help the best they could. I think... it confused them, once they found out about magic, wondering why my mother stayed. But I was always welcome at their house, even when I was not welcome at my own."

"I— Remus said, once... Mum's dad died in your sixth year."

Snape nodded. "He was hit by a car on his walk to the shops. Drunk driver," he explained, and God, that made Petunia's lie about how Lily and James died all the more painful. "Mrs Evans didn't last much longer, without him. She saw us graduate, and she was at the wedding, but... she passed in her sleep, only weeks before Lily found out she was pregnant with you. She was only fifty five. Broken heart, they said."

"That's so sad." Petunia had never talked about her parents. Harry had only ever seen one picture of them in the house; a photo with Petunia, looking around eighteen or so, sat beneath a Congratulations banner at a dinner table somewhere. Harry had always assumed it was to celebrate her graduating school.

"You never would have gone to Petunia, if Mrs Evans had been alive," Snape remarked.

Harry was saved having to figure out a response by Remus and Sirius returning to their bodies. Both of them were crying. "Are you alright?" Harry asked, eyeing them worriedly.

Remus turned straight to Snape, burying his face in the man's black shirt. Snape blinked for a moment, but cradled him close, long fingers running through Remus' hair.

Sirius sat beside Harry with his hands clenched, tears streaming down his cheeks. Harry leaned into him. "Do you need me to get Charlie?" he broached, but Sirius shook his head, pulling Harry into a hug.

"No. I'm good. I... Merlin, pup, I wish you could've known your grandparents. Finer people you'd never find in this world."

Harry let Sirius hug him, his own heart aching. So much family he would never know.

It took several minutes for the pair to compose themselves, and even when they turned back to the pensieve Sirius had a white-knuckled grip on Harry's hand. "Think I'm gonna leave that other vial for another day," he said, voice hoarse. "Two in one go might be a bit much."

"We can do this another time," Harry offered, but Sirius shook his head.

"No, no; you promised you'd show us those shenanigans you got up to," he said, mustering a smile. "Why don't you put your first year in. The stone."

Harry wasn't sure it was the best idea for two emotionally fragile people to watch the events with Quirrell, but it was too late to turn back now. After some instruction from Snape on how to remove the memories, Harry set them in the pensieve. "I, uh, I think I'll come with you," he said uneasily. It would be interesting, watching it back with everything he knew now.

And so the four of them plunged into the pensieve, right into the moment Harry and his friends tried to convince Professor McGonagall that Snape was going after the stone.

"You thought it was me?" Snape asked, looking bewildered. Harry blushed.

"You were sort-of scary back then," he pointed out. "Definitely seemed more evil than Quirrell."

"Never mind that, look how tiny you were!" Sirius cut in, stepping up close to eleven year-old Harry Potter.

It made Harry wince, looking back at his younger self. How had no one seen his rail-thin frame, his battered glasses, the clothes that swamped him. How had everyone looked at him and thought him a perfectly happy, healthy child?

But that was the least of his worries when they headed for the third floor corridor.

The series of challenges ahead of the stone hadn't seemed nearly so terrifying when he'd faced them the first time around. Watching the three little first years on the chess board, watching Ron get flung off the board... Harry could understand the looks of fury on both his godfathers' faces. Even Snape was paler than usual, his jaw clenched tight. Though he did smirk a little when they reached his potion puzzle.

Harry regretted his decision to go with them when they came to the part where Quirrell unravelled his turban. Seeing the grotesque face of Voldemort made his stomach churn — and he almost lost his dinner when Quirrell burned to ashes beneath his hands. The memory went black as eleven year-old Harry fell unconscious, and they were ejected from the pensieve. A long silence stretched between them.

“I’m going to murder Albus Dumbledore,” Sirius growled vehemently. “Setting that up for a bunch of bloody first years!”

“So you, ah, don’t want to see my second year, then?” Harry asked hopefully. Sirius narrowed his eyes at him.

“Put it in, pup.”

Harry obediently reclaimed his first year memory and replaced it with his second, though he declined the trip this time. He wasn’t in the mood for seeing teenage Tom Riddle try and win him over with how similar they were.

His knee bounced anxiously as the three adults were inside the memory, and he yelped as soon as they were out; Sirius had immediately grabbed him in a strangling hug. “You could’ve died,” he muttered into Harry’s hair. “You could’ve died before I ever even met you!”

“But I didn’t!” Harry pointed out, arms trapped at his sides. “I’m still here, Pads. Things got better after that year!”

“You say that,” Remus drawled, looking very much like he’d like to give Harry a hug himself. “But we still haven’t seen the graveyard. If you’re up for it.”

Harry swallowed thickly. “I— I suppose.”

“Last one, then we’ll show you some good memories, promise,” Sirius rasped, reluctantly letting Harry go.

Harry took a deep breath, and replaced the memories. He definitely wasn’t going with them on this one.

The wait was excruciating. But it was worse to see the looks in their eyes when they came out of the memory; that haunted, horrified, pitying look.

“Oh, pup,” Sirius breathed. Harry shook his head.

“I’m fine,” he insisted. Sirius’ lips pursed, but to Harry’s utter relief, there was no interrogation.

He’d done his grieving for Cedric. He wasn’t sure he could stand to reopen that wound.

“Take it back, we’ll give you one each,” Sirius instructed. Harry did so, the memory somehow even sharper now it was in his mind once more. He forced it away, watching Remus place his wand to his temple.

"I thought this would be a good one to start with." He dropped the memory in the basin, and offered Harry a smile. "Go on, cub."

Heart pounding against his ribs, Harry lowered his hand to the silver liquid.

He immediately recognised his surroundings; it was a Gryffindor dormitory. There were only four beds in this one, and two of them were extraordinarily messy. But Harry wasn't looking at that.

His gaze was stuck on the four boys in the middle of the room.

The Marauders, all together. They looked around twelve or so — James Potter looked heartbreakingly familiar, though he was taller and less scrawny than Harry had been at that age. He was staring at little Remus Lupin, who had a look of utter horror on his face. "We've figured it out," James declared, sounding incredibly pleased with himself. "You're a werewolf, aren't you?"

"What?" Remus yelped, voice cracking. "I— of course not! Dumbledore wouldn't let a— a monster like that in a school!"

"You don't have to lie to us, Remus," Sirius insisted earnestly. There was a fading bruise around the rim of his eye, and Harry wondered if it was a prank gone wrong or something more sinister.

"Yeah," little Peter Pettigrew agreed, voice shaking. Harry's stomach burned with anger, even though this version of Peter had done nothing wrong. "We— we won't tell anyone!"

"It makes sense, though. You're always gone on the full moon — there's no way you need to visit your aunt that much," James continued. "You've always got those weird scratches after, too. You got a rash when you touched the silver cauldron in Potions the other week. And I saw your eyes glow when you got really angry at Snivellus."

Remus' face went bright red, and Harry wondered if even at this age, anger had not been the emotion James had sensed.

Then, he burst into tears. "I— I'm not going to hurt anyone," he sobbed. "Please, I'll go to Dumbledore, I'll go home. You won't have to room with me anymore. Just— just don't tell the Ministry! They'll lock me up!"

Harry saw James and Sirius share a look of horrified alarm, and immediately the two were bundling the blond boy in a hug. "Don't be stupid! We aren't going to tell anyone!" Sirius said. "And we don't want you to leave!"

"You're our friend, Rem!" James agreed, reaching back to yank Pettigrew into the group cuddle pile. "So what if you have a bit of a furry problem?"

The sound that came from Remus was halfway between a laugh and a hiccup. "It's a bit more than that, James," he retorted, still crying. "I turn into a huge bloodthirsty beast once a month!"

"You're two whole inches shorter than me, Lupin," Sirius reminded him. "I bet you're not that huge, even as a wolf."

"Besides, if Dumbledore knows, then I'm sure it's alright," Pettigrew added.

Remus wriggled his way out of the hug, staring at the trio incredulously, cheeks still damp with tears. "You— you don't mind? You won't tell anyone?"

"It'll be our secret," James promised, beaming. "You're not getting rid of us that easily, Remus Lupin. We're best friends."

"Forever," Sirius added with a decisive nod.

Harry saw the wide, wondrous smile cross young Remus' face, and then the memory began to fade, and he was back in the living room once more, a smile on his own face. Remus looked at him expectantly.

"You were all so tiny and adorable! When was that, second year?"

"End of first," Remus supplied, retrieving his memory with a fond grin. "I thought for sure it would be my last, too. But they kept my secret, no matter what."

"We told you, best friends forever," Sirius insisted, grinning. "My turn, now! Don't worry, Harry; the rat's not in this one." He plucked a memory from his head, dropping it into the pensieve. "Go on, pup."

So once again, Harry plunged into a memory.

This time he found himself in the living room at the Pottery, decorated for Christmas. Three of the four Marauders were sprawled on a huge Persian rug on the floor, staring up at the ceiling. This time, Harry put them at about seventeen or so; older than they had been in the memory of tormenting Snape, but still students. Christmas of their sixth year, or maybe even seventh.

"I hope Lily likes the gift I sent her," James sighed, and Sirius let out a groan.

"You'll find out when we get back to school," he droned, kicking James' hip lightly. "Can you stop thinking about her for five whole minutes, Prongs?"

"We all know he can't," Remus said dryly. He sat up, his shaggy hair flopping into his eyes. It was definitely the 70s, even by their wizarding fashion; all three had impressive feathered mops of hair, though Sirius' was cut more stylishly than the other two. Then again, Sirius was also wearing eyeliner, and a red tartan kilt.

"You boys look far too sedentary for my liking." Harry's breath caught in his throat; in the doorway stood a beautiful Indian woman, her face lined with age but her eyes bright and warm. "I'm always suspicious when you sit still for too long."

"We're bored, Mum," James whined. The woman — Euphemia Potter — laughed lightly. Harry's heart stuttered.

"Well, we can't have that," she teased. "Perhaps your visitor might liven you up a bit."

All three boys stared at her. "Visitor?" Sirius asked, confused. "It's not Pete, is it? He's supposed to be in Germany."

"No, it's not Peter."

Euphemia stepped aside, and Harry gasped; there was Lily Evans, green eyes shining so like Harry's own, a few flakes of snow melting on the shoulders of her dark blue jumper. She waved shyly, then laughed as James pitched head-first into the chair leg in his hurry to stand up.

"Lily Flower!" He rushed over to her, taking her by the hands. "I thought you were with your family?"

"I had a fight with my sister," Lily replied, her voice sending shivers down Harry's spine — still as Brummie as she had been as a child, but softer; more like the woman he would hear in his dreams, begging for his life to be spared. "She's brought her fiancé over for Christmas and he's just the worst, I couldn't stand being there any longer. So I told Mum I was going out for a bit, and... you did say I could visit, if I had the chance. I'm sorry I didn't give you any warning."

Suddenly, James was sweeping her up into his arms, spinning her around with a shout of joy. "Best surprise ever," he declared, kissing the tip of her nose. "Lily can stay for dinner, right, Mum?"

"Of course, dear," Euphemia agreed. "Lily, you're always welcome here. It's no trouble to set the table for one other; the elves cook for an army just to feed Sirius!"

"I'm a growing boy!" Sirius protested indignantly, while Lily giggled.

"Yes, and I wish you'd stop; you're taller than Monty now," Euphemia teased. "Any more and we'll have to make the fireplace bigger so you don't crack your head flooing home."

Harry saw the way Sirius' cheeks flushed, just a little, like he still wasn't used to thinking of the Pottery as home. Harry knew the feeling.

James slung an arm around Lily's waist, then froze. "Lils," he said slowly, "is that snow on your jumper?"

"Yeah? Did you not notice it's chucking down outside?" the redhead asked, bemused. James' brown eyes went round behind his glasses.

"Really? How long's it been snowing, Mum?"

"Look for yourself."

Harry followed his father to the window, looking out into the darkening garden to see nothing but a blanket of white. James yelped excitedly. "Why didn't you tell us!"

"Forgive me for thinking you were old enough to figure it out," Euphemia replied dryly.

"Are you thinking what I'm thinking, Prongsy?" Sirius asked, and with a wave of his wand his kilt became a pair of tartan wool trousers, tucking themselves into his biker boots.

"I'm always thinking what you're thinking, Padfoot," James retorted in a very Weasley-twins-esque way. Lily snorted.

"I hope not, or I've got a lot of questions about your feelings towards Polly Ashton," she joked, and James wrapped her in a bear hug.

"You know I only have eyes for you, my love."

While this was going on, Remus and Sirius were summoning and transfiguring hats and scarves, covering themselves in warming charms. After a solid fifteen seconds of watching James and Lily stare into each other's eyes, Sirius tossed a balled up pair of gloves at James' head. "Oi, lovebirds, are we making snowmen or what?"

James and Lily looked at each other, gaining identical competitive grins. "You're on," Lily declared in challenge.

The memory continued through the four of them rushing outside, first building snowmen together — James and Lily versus Sirius and Remus — then, when Sirius declared Lily too good at snowmen and body-slammed their effort, into the vicious snowball fight that followed — James and Sirius versus Remus and Lily, when Remus agreed that Sirius had cheated in the snowman contest and James had jumped to defend his best friend's honour.

It only ended when a voice called them in for dinner, and Harry could hardly see through his tears as he finally got his first glimpse of Fleamont Potter. If possible, Harry saw more of himself in his grandfather than his father; Fleamont was lithe like Harry, while James was a bit broader in the shoulders. Sirius was indeed taller than the Potter patriarch, though he still glowed with delight when Fleamont ruffled his hair on his way past him when setting the table.

James was on his best behaviour; there wasn't a trace of the arrogant boy who had flipped Severus Snape upside down after their OWL exam. He was funny, and still a little big-headed, but Lily happily deflated his ego when necessary. Sirius, too, was more mature, more like the Sirius Harry knew. Remus was ever the same, watching it all with fond eyes and an indulgent smile, occasionally piping up with a quip that had the whole table in fits of laughter.

And through it all, James and Lily stared at each other like there was no better sight in the whole world.

Harry was crying when the memory finally ended, and he hugged Sirius tightly, smiling against the man's shoulder. "Thank you," he breathed, his heart so full he felt like it might burst. It hurt, knowing that he had missed out on family dinners like that, with his grandparents and parents and Sirius and Remus around. But just to see them like that to begin with, together and happy... it was more than Harry ever could have dreamed of.

"I... I have a memory to offer as well, if you would like," Snape said, more hesitant than Harry had heard him before. Harry wiped his face, nodding eagerly. He would take every scrap of memories he could get — he knew it would be a good one. Snape wasn't in the mood to show him how awful James Potter could be, not right now. Not today.

Sirius reclaimed his memory, and Harry tried to steady his breathing while Snape gathered his own, setting it in the swirling liquid. "It isn't very long, but... she would want you to see it."

Harry braced himself, and dove in.

They were sat outside a cafe. Muggle, by the looks of it; a little run-down, the paint peeling on the sign. It was a gloriously sunny day, and there was Severus Snape, dressed all in black with his sleeves buttoned to his wrists.

And sat opposite him was a heavily pregnant Lily Evans.

Harry goggled at her; his mother, in her maternity sundress, sandal-clad feet propped up on Snape's denim-clad leg. "I hate this, Sev," she groaned loudly. "Be bloody grateful you can't get pregnant."

"Believe me, I am, frequently," Snape assured dryly. "You haven't long to go, Lily. Three weeks, now?"

"Two and a half," Lily replied. "Not that I'm counting every day or anything. And that's assuming the little bugger comes out on time; if he's anything like his father, he'll be a week late just to make a point."

Snape's face darkened ever so briefly at the mention of James Potter, but it was gone when Lily looked up again. "But that's the thing, Severus — in three weeks, it won't just be this awful huge belly and swollen feet and leg cramps and the constant need to piss, and all the rest of it. It'll be an actual baby! A baby that me and James are responsible for!"

"I'm sure you'd prefer not to hear my thoughts on Potter's parenting ability," Snape drawled. "But you've nothing to worry about, Lily. You'll be a wonderful mother."

The smile Lily gave him was blindingly bright. "I hope so. I just... I don't know what to do! Tunie's no help — she just told me that giving birth is the most painful and terrifying thing in the world, and I'll never feel the same down there again."

Snape looked a little green at the idea. "Considering the picture you showed me of that small whale she birthed, I'm not surprised."

Lily laughed, even as she glared at him. "Sev! That's mean. He's my nephew, and he's wonderful. Even if he is half Vernon's."

"It's the half that's Tunie's I'm more worried about," Snape groused, eyes flashing. Lily laughed harder.

"I swear to Christ, Sev — stop making me laugh, I'll wet myself!" she scolded, and that made Snape laugh, a slightly rusty sound, like he wasn't used to making it. Then Lily's eyes softened. "I know—I know I've complained about being pregnant the whole time, and I still haven't done the birth part and it might be the worst thing in the world. But... you know I'm still happy to carry for you and Remus, right? If you want that. You just have to ask."

The humour died from Snape's face, along with the little colour to his skin. "Don't be ridiculous, Lily," he snapped. "Remus and I can't even keep ourselves together, let alone a child." His lips pursed as Lily opened her mouth to respond. "Don't. It's... just don't. Not today."

Two sets of green eyes watched the man scratch at his left forearm, beneath his shirt sleeve.

"Just focus on the one you're carrying," Snape added, sadness forced from his tone. "You know damn well Potter will want a second, as well."

"He'd wait if I asked him to," Lily said easily. "We've got to figure out the first one. James is still struggling with the whole nappy-changing thing, and I can't make heads nor tails of half the stuff in that book of child-rearing charms Molly Weasley recommended me." Suddenly, her eyes were welling with tears. "I wish Mum was here. She'd sort me out."

"She would," Snape agreed, reaching over to place a pale hand over Lily's on the table. "But you'll manage on your own. You and Potter."

Lily sighed, turning her fingers over under Snape's to hold his hand. "When I'm not the size of a whale, I swear, I'm gonna sit the pair of you down and force you to hash it all out until you can at the very least be civil to each other. Remus'll help me."

"That's not necessary, Lily—"

"Yes it is," she insisted. "James called dibs on Sirius as the godfather for this one, but I've got you down for the next, so you'll have to be able to stand being in the same room as James by then. Y'know. Baby steps." Her smile was fond, her hand squeezing his. "You have to teach all my kids how to be good at Potions. And how to lie, when they need to — me and Jim can't lie for shit. And you can put the fear of God into the little blighters when they aren't listening to their mum and dad."

"I... I'll try, Lily," he promised. "But you know it's more complicated than that. The war—"

"Fuck the war," Lily said firmly. "I know, it's the worst time to have a kid, and anything could happen. I know we're on different sides of this bloody thing," she added with a sharp gaze. "But I also know that you, Severus Snape, are a good man, and you're gonna bloody love my kid. I know I'm gonna love my kid." She looked down at her bump, stroking it gently with her free hand. "I already love him so much, Sev, and he's not even born yet," she whispered. "But it's terrifying, knowing what's coming. And I need to know my best friend is at least going to try to get along with my family, when things are better."

"Remus is your best friend," Snape tried half-heartedly, only to be fixed with a glare.

"He will be if you keep talking like that, mister," she warned. Snape faltered under her gaze, then managed a small smile.

"You're going to be a brilliant mother, Lils," he assured her quietly. "That boy is lucky to have you."

She beamed at him, her other hand still stroking her bump. "I hope so," she murmured. Then, with what looked like considerable effort, she let go of Snape's hand and hauled herself to her feet. "I'm getting another slice of cake," she declared. "Only got a few more weeks with the excuse of eating for two, I'm going to make the most of it!"

Snape watched her go, his hand once more going to his left forearm, his eyes dropping to the hidden Mark with a look of disgust. And then the memory faded, and Harry was sat on the sofa once more.

"I... wow." He'd learned so much in that one memory, Harry could hardly comprehend it all. Snape's jaw tightened fractionally. "Thank you for showing me that, Professor. It's... yeah." He managed a smile, even as tears trickled down his face. "You kept your promise, though. Mostly." Snape blinked at him, perplexed. "You did teach me to be good at Potions," Harry pointed out. "Maybe not how to lie, but how to be better at lying. And you sure as hell put the fear of God into me, several times."

A beat, and then that rusty laugh again — even more of a foreign noise now. "I suppose you're right," Snape admitted, a strange glint in his eyes.

Harry was utterly drained from the emotions he'd experienced in the last few hours, and from the looks of the three men around him, they weren't far off either. "I think I'm going to bed," he declared, leaning into Sirius for a hug. "It's been a long day."

"Too right," Sirius agreed, kissing his forehead. "Sleep tight, pup. And the pensieve will be here, if you want to watch more memories another time. You just have to ask."

Harry knew that one day he would ask for the difficult memories; the times when James was a prick, and Lily hated him. But right now he wanted to ride on the warm fuzzy feeling of the memories he'd been shown so far.

He got up, hugging Remus tightly. Then, gathering his bravery, he hugged Snape, too. "Mum was right," he whispered, making sure he was looking right at the Slytherin, unflinching. "You're a good man, Severus Snape," he echoed her words, watching dark eyes widen.

"I... I try to be. For her. And for you." His throat bobbed as he swallowed. "For this family."

Harry stepped back, hands falling from the man's sides, and after a short nod he turned to leave the room, heading for bed. He wished he could curl up in Draco's arms, cry it out with someone who didn't have their own grief to bear for Lily and James Potter. But it was okay; even if he did cry, he knew that when he fell asleep, he would dream of his family. At it would be wonderful.

Chapter 78

The sound of the front door slamming could be heard through half the house, and Harry jumped up from his bed, tossing his book aside. He knew Snape hadn't been at a Death Eater meeting, so he didn't feel like he was intruding to go and investigate; not like the nights when Snape came home and he and Remus went straight upstairs.

He bumped into Sirius and Charlie on the stairs, and then Remus; all four of them hurried down to greet Snape in the entrance hall. The Slytherin was cursing up a storm, pacing back and forth, and he only seemed to realise they were there when Remus stepped in to place hands on his shoulders. "Severus, what happened?"

"I'll tell you what bloody happened," the man growled. Looking closer, Harry could see the tight line of exhaustion in the corners of his eyes. "Albus fucking Dumbledore happened! The imbecile almost killed himself!"

Harry gaped. "He what?"

"He went out and found a ring that used to belong to the Dark Lord, and in his ultimate wisdom decided he had to put it on!" Snape explained, still furious. "It's a miracle I managed to stop the curse before it killed him, but even so his left arm will never be the same."

"Did he know it was cursed?" Charlie asked, wide eyed. Snape scoffed.

"Considering it was dripping with dark magic, I should sodding well hope so!" There was just the faintest hint of a northern accent creeping into his words, and Harry sucked in a sharp breath; Snape had to be really made to be letting that slip.

Remus clearly noticed it too, as he pressed his forehead to Snape's, running soothing hands over his shoulders. "It's alright, Severus," he assured. "You said you stopped the curse, right? Albus is okay?"

"For now," Snape affirmed. "He wouldn't tell me what was so special about the ring, but I could feel the magic on it. If I had to guess, I'd say it was a horcrux."

It was Harry's turn to curse. "Dumbledore's hunting them?" he asked, and Snape nodded. "Did you destroy it?"

"I believe so," Snape confirmed. "I had to use phoenix fire to get the ring off Albus' hand without cutting it off, and when Fawkes burned it, it screamed like it was dark magic dying. All that was left was the stone in the ring. Albus seemed quite insistent that the stone remain unharmed."

Harry's brow furrowed. "Why? What's so special about it?"

"I've no idea," Snape said, shaking his head. "He wouldn't tell me."

"Well, that's good news, isn't it?" Charlie piped up tentatively. "Another horcrux gone?"

"Yes, and no," Remus hummed. "It's good that it's gone, but it's a little worrying that Albus is hunting them. If he finds out we know about them, that we found and destroyed one ourselves... worse, that Harry knows about the one in his scar..."

Charlie paled behind his freckles. Yes, that was not what they wanted.

"There is some good news out of the whole mess," Snape added, drawing their gazes once more. "I did what I could to stop the curse, but I couldn't get rid of it entirely. The Dark magic is leeching off his own, slowly destroying it. Albus Dumbledore will be dead within a year." A cold smirk curled across his lips. "You'd better start defaming him, Harry, before he can die a martyr."

Harry stared, hardly able to believe what he was hearing. "I... really? You're sure?" Snape nodded. "Bloody hell." He'd never really thought too hard about the act of killing Albus Dumbledore. He'd resigned himself to likely having to do it, but always hoped it would sort of... take care of itself.

Now, apparently, it was doing just that.

"That changes things," Sirius murmured. Harry nodded.

He had to make some plans.

.-.-.-.

The news about Dumbledore was certainly unsettling, but there was little Harry could do about it so far. Amelia had already gotten the ball rolling, after her pointed questioning at Sirius' trial; Harry had some time to kill before he could make his next steps.

He had to admit, it was oddly... freeing, to know that Dumbledore was dying. To have the certainty that even if Harry failed to discredit the man, he would soon be gone; restructuring the Ministry would be doable, even if Dumbledore's legacy was still in tact. Harry really just had to focus on staying alive long enough to kill Voldemort.

With that in mind, he pestered Snape into training with him the next morning. He could tell the man was in need of a little stress relief, after spending half his evening thanklessly saving Dumbledore's life. So Harry finally got the adults to break on their little moratorium on training him, and soon he and Snape were back in the ballroom with spells flying.

It felt good, to be back at it. Considering his last fight had been with very real consequences, it was nice to train again with the security that he wasn't fighting for his own life. Sure, Snape was pushing him hard, but it wasn't any harder than Harry could handle.

They hit a stalemate, Snape gesturing with one hand to end the duel, and Harry was grateful for the moment to catch his breath.

"You've been holding out on me, Potter."

Harry was smiling before he'd even turned around; Draco was leaning in the doorway, his grey eyes fixed on Harry. "Draco!" Harry sprinted towards him, barrelling into the blond with a soft 'oof'. "How long were you watching?"

"Only a few minutes." Draco's hands came to his shoulders, his smile softening as he leaned in for a kiss. "That's a bit more than you taught me and the HA."

Harry flushed. "I, uh, I've been at this a while."

Draco looked past him, at Snape. "I want to learn." Harry jolted in surprise, but when he looked at Snape the man was merely nodding, lips thin.

"Considering you're likely to spend any future battles at this fool's side, it would do well for you to be adequately prepared," he agreed. "I will speak to your mother." Then he smiled, infinitesimally small. "It is good to see you well, Draco."

"You too, Uncle Sev."

"Potter." Harry straightened up expectantly. "You're dismissed, for now." An amused smirk. "I know better than to expect you not to be distracted should I send Draco away."

Harry couldn't even deny it, and laughed softly. "Thank you, sir."

"Is Narcissa with you, Draco?" Snape asked, putting his wand away.

"Down in the conservatory with Sirius," came Draco's immediate response. Snape nodded, and Harry felt that was their cue to leave, so he grabbed Draco by the hand and tugged him towards the stairs.

They ended up in Harry's bedroom, and Harry shut the door by pressing Draco back against it, crowding him in a slow kiss. God, he'd missed this boy. "I'm so glad you're safe," he murmured, hands resting on Draco's hips. "When Snape told us about the Manor wards, I was worried."

"Mother had it handled," Draco assured. "I... I've never seen you duel like that before." There was awe in his eyes, and it made Harry blush. Of course, Draco hadn't been at the Department of Mysteries. He'd never seen Harry in a real fight.

"I'm not as good as Snape," he insisted. "I think he goes easy on me sometimes, even when he says he's not."

Draco snorted. "Uncle Severus doesn't lie to spare egos, Potter." He shook his head slightly, still looking amazed. "All my life, I've watched men who are obsessed with power. Men who are addicted to it, who will do anything they can to get more of it. Who will flaunt their power over others. And you... you have so much power and you don't even care about it."

"Power is only good if you can use it to protect those who don't have it," Harry retorted, watching Draco's smile widen a fraction.

"I've never known a powerful man like you, Harry Potter," he whispered, tilting his chin up for another kiss. Harry pressed into it eagerly, sliding a hand down to Draco's backside.

"If anyone has the power here, it's you," Harry pointed out breathlessly; if Draco said jump, he'd ask how high without a second of hesitation, and they both knew it.

The blond smirked, pushing back on Harry; all the way over to the bed.

"That's what's so incredible," he drawled, gently shoving Harry onto the bed and crawling up to straddle him. Harry's pupils were wide behind his glasses, his pulse racing frantically with lust. "You're arguably the most powerful wizard in the country, and you just... let me do this." Draco's hand pushed firmly on Harry's chest, pinning him to the mattress. Harry couldn't help the low, needy groan that escaped him. "A boy could get addicted to that sort of power."

"Good," Harry gasped, desperately wishing Draco would kiss him, touch him, do something other than sit there on his lap and look at him like Harry was the most beautiful thing on the planet. "If you're addicted, you won't leave me."

Draco's laugh was like warm honey over Harry's skin. "Oh, that ship sailed long ago," he breathed, and finally he leaned down to seal their lips together.

With a careless wave of Harry's hand, the door was locked and silenced. Draco's eyes darkened at the easy use of magic. "I use my power for the important things," Harry remarked cheekily, watching amusement flash across the blond's face.

"Clearly," he drawled, fingers playing at the hem of Harry's t-shirt. "One of these days, we'll have to experiment a little with that wandless magic of yours. I'm sure we'll find quite a few good uses for it."

Harry smirked at the challenge, want pulsing through him hot and urgent. "Well it sounds like you'll be moving in this summer after all, if you're training with me," he murmured. "So we'll have plenty of time on our hands for that." This summer, next summer, after graduation; they would have all the time in the world.

Draco grinned at him, grinding down against Harry, both of them moaning at the blissful friction. "Fuck, I missed you," he sighed, palming himself, head thrown back. Harry was transfixed by the pale column of his throat, Adam's apple bobbing delicately. He wanted to bite it.

He surged up to do just that, holding Draco in place while he ravaged the blond's neck, drawing desperate little gasps from his mouth that were music to Harry's ears. "Missed you, too," he breathed, biting at Draco's jaw. "Glad you're home."

If Harry had his way, Draco would be staying with him until September 1st. He was so tired of only getting snippets of time with his boyfriend.

.-. .

Both teenagers did a remarkable job of not blushing their way through dinner; even though they'd healed the impressive number of bite marks on Draco's fair skin, Harry could still just tell that the adults around the table knew what they'd been up to.

Or, at least, they were assuming, and they weren't entirely wrong.

"Severus tells me you want to move in here, darling," Narcissa remarked, neatly cutting her lamb shank into smaller pieces. "To work on your duelling with Harry."

"Uncle Sev is the best person to teach me," Draco pointed out. "Along with everyone else who helps out with Harry's training. It won't be easy to learn what I need to know at school; this summer is the best chance for that."

Narcissa frowned thoughtfully, and Harry silently prayed to any deity that might listen. "I suppose the Manor is getting rather crowded, as of late."

"So you have been sheltering people?" Harry blurted, then flushed sheepishly. "Sorry, I— Blaise mentioned he'd heard rumours. He, uh, has some names, if you're able to take any more."

Far from offended, Narcissa just looked amused. "That boy takes after his mother entirely too much," she said fondly. "Not a whisper that woman doesn't hear about. Yes, I've invited a few acquaintances to reside at the Manor, to get some space from their... difficult home life. I can certainly look into any names Mr Zabini has provided you." Her lips curved into a knowing smile. "And I suppose Draco and I can move our things over in the morning. If that suits you well, Lord Black?" There was just a hint of teasing to her voice, and Sirius laughed.

"I've been trying to get the pair of you to move in for months, Cissa; Ceri already has your rooms picked out," he assured brightly. Harry and Draco beamed at each other across the table.

This summer was looking better and better by the minute.

.....

They were officially at war.

The announcement had come in the Prophet in the middle of July, which quite frankly Harry thought was about three weeks too late. But it seemed the wizarding world was very reluctant to admit such a thing; only now they had no choice. The Death Eaters were no longer worried about keeping a low profile, attacking light-sided and muggleborn families almost every night of the week. Harry could hardly sleep for the visions that plagued him; more than once he had woken up with his wand in hand, sending a Patronus straight to Kingsley to mobilise either the aurors or the Order.

"Should we be worried about how many meetings he's having that you're not invited to?" Harry asked Snape one morning over breakfast. The Potions Master looked up from the paper.

"Only if you hear him talk about keeping information away from me," he said, unconcerned. "It has always been this way; I am his Potions Master, and his informant on Dumbledore — my position is too valuable to be risked with meaningless raids. Similarly, he believes me to reside at the castle over the summer, and I cannot be seen walking back and forth to the gates every night. I am summoned when I am needed, and do not involve myself with the rest." A sneer tugged at his lips. "A fact that would have those such as Alastor Moody convinced that I am more of a burden than an asset."

Harry scowled. "You're more of an asset than he is; he's bloody retired."

The sneer turned into a smirk. "Quite." He turned the page, then gave up on the paper entirely; he rarely had the patience for the whole Prophet before his first cup of coffee. "If anything is said that sounds like the Dark Lord is doubting me, then we shall make preparations. But until then, I can assure you this is entirely normal — under the circumstances, at least."

Beside him, Remus was frowning, much as he did any time Snape described working for Voldemort as any semblance of 'normal'.

"The only person who doubts you is Bellatrix, and she's not exactly been herself lately," Harry added with a flicker of amusement. Ever since Sirius had removed her from the Black family tree, Bellatrix seemed to have lost what little sanity she had left. Harry was amazed Voldemort put up with her raving and screeching — though she was very good at torturing, still, he supposed. After many late-night visions, he could attest to that personally.

"I'm more worried about how many meetings you're getting invited to, intentionally or not," Draco groused, his grey eyes surveying Harry fretfully. The Malfoys had only been living at Seren Du for a few days, but already it felt like they'd always lived there. "You're barely getting three hours of sleep a night!"

"I'm fine," Harry insisted, offering a smile. "I never slept much before, anyway."

"Do I want to know how you're aware of what sleep Harry is or isn't getting, Draco, darling?" Narcissa asked with raised eyebrows, her face unmoving as her son blushed.

"I can hear him walk past my room to get a cup of tea in the middle of the night," he explained defensively. Narcissa's lips pursed, but she said nothing further. Harry thought he could see a glimmer of amusement in her gaze.

"There's nothing I can do about the visions," Harry pointed out with a shrug. "I keep my Occlumency barriers up, but it doesn't stop me getting dragged into his mind. And sleeping potions aren't a long term solution." He was used to it, at this point. Used to functioning on very little sleep after years at the Dursleys'. Sure, it would be nice to sleep the whole night through every night, but honestly at this point Harry would probably wake up at four in the morning anyway, just out of habit.

Draco didn't look convinced. Harry reached over to squeeze his hand with what he hoped was a reassuring smile. He could handle it. And if his visions helped save lives, he'd put up with them even if they were making him struggle.

Snape had to go and skulk around Hogwarts for a while so Dumbledore wouldn't get suspicious of his whereabouts, and Draco was helping his mother settle a few new people into Malfoy Manor, so Harry was left to his own devices that morning. With that in mind, he decided to tackle the never-ending stack of post that needed replying to.

In his last batch of letters to his friends, Harry had discreetly insinuated that Dumbledore's health was beginning to fail him. Only to a couple of people; Susan, Blaise, Neville. But he knew word would spread from there.

Susan's response to the news was to not even acknowledge it, but instead to assure him she was getting in touch with other active Wizengamot members who may be amenable to their cause — gloating in the most polite way, as only Susan could. 'If I make overtures now, then with any luck I'll have good relationships with the neutral seats by the time things take their course'.

She was already at least on reasonable terms with the parents and guardians of most of their heir friends at school, thanks to an entire childhood of playdates and dinner parties. Harry absently wondered how long it would be before half the Wizengamot knew Dumbledore was dying, though none would ever admit to the information.

He wasn't worried; Susan had everything handled. Harry just had to focus on getting his hands dirty elsewhere.

But Susan was thinking of that, too; she had suggested Harry get back in contact with his lawyer, as they would need a formal suit against Dumbledore sooner rather than later.

So Harry did, penning a letter to Mrs Frobisher, asking if they could meet to discuss some of the work he had requested of her previously. He knew better than to put anything down in writing with someone working in a legal capacity, just in case it could all get turned against him.

His letter from Neville was much more mundane, and made Harry grin; apparently Ginny had accepted an invitation to stay several days at Longbottom Manor in a week's time. Susan's presence there had gone a long way to smoothing over any ruffled feathers Mrs Weasley might have, as did Neville's gran's reputation for being incredibly proper. The letter was adorable to read, his best friend flustered over his girlfriend and his gran spending time together, about the possibility of private time with Ginny. Harry did his best to give advice, but also pointed out that Ginny was an incredibly determined witch and Neville was best off just talking to her about what she expected. That had certainly worked for him and Draco, and he doubted the dynamics were all that different in a straight relationship.

Considering how much Fred and George both had to say about the benefits of communication in a relationship, Harry was fairly confident that Ginny would be on the same page.

He knew the pair of them hadn't gone any further than snogging while still at school — but he also knew that she had definitely gone further with Michael Corner, though he wasn't sure how much of that she'd told Neville about.

Either way, Harry assured his friend that they would be fine, and he didn't need to feel pressured into doing anything he didn't want to do, but at the same time he shouldn't expect anything in particular from Ginny. Not that Harry thought he would — Neville was a gentleman to the point of reserve. Any progress in that relationship would almost definitely be at Ginny's urging.

Or manhandling, demanding and just outright taking matters into her own hands — that was more Ginny's style.

As he wrote his response, Harry couldn't help but look back at the letter and chuckle to himself; it was bizarre, going from one letter about political manipulations to another about normal teenage relationship woes. Sometimes he forgot he wasn't even sixteen yet himself, still just a teenager. It was nice, to be reminded of that. Harry had quiet hopes that he might be able to do a few more normal teenage things, over the summer.

Both with Draco, and with his friends.

Finishing off his letter for Neville and adding it to the stack to all be delivered to Longbottom Manor, Harry reached for the next correspondence; a three page letter from Viktor, mostly detailing his adventures with the Bulgarian quidditch team. It never failed to amaze Harry, how much the quidditch player could write, now they were more comfortable with each other. Viktor might not be much of a talker, but once he got going with a quill...

Then again, Harry remembered Viktor being quite chatty in his native tongue, with the other Durmstrang students and the small handful of others who spoke Bulgarian. Considering he strongly suspected Viktor wrote with a Translation charm, Harry was sure the man's 'quiet, reserved nature' was actually just a lack of confidence with the English language.

And probably a fair dose of feigned aloofness to keep the fans at bay. Harry could relate to that.

It made him smile to read his friend's eager recounting of some antics he and his teammates got up to at their training camp, and he happily returned the favour with a story of a prank he and Draco had pulled on Sirius and Charlie a few days before.

There was a knock on his bedroom door, and Harry looked up, grinning at his godfather.
"Hey, Padfoot. What's up?"

"Just letting you know we're headed to Grimmauld for dinner. Yourself included," the dog animagus replied, and Harry made a face.

"Order meeting?" he assumed, wondering if his blissful Dumbledore-free time was coming to an end. But Sirius just smiled at him, eyes sparkling.

"Nope. Family dinner." Harry cocked his head in confusion. "Charlie arranged it with Bill and Fleur; you'll get to congratulate them in person. And, ah, the Tonks' will be there. Bringing Kingsley, if he can get off work in time."

Suddenly, Harry was very suspicious of the look on his godfather's face. "When you say 'family' dinner..."

"Draco and Cissa are coming too," Sirius confirmed, bouncing on his toes. "Fleur swiped the bit of parchment Dumbledore used to let her in on the Secret. I'll be damned if I let that old goat keep my family out of my own bloody house." He grinned devilishly. "We tried to get the twins and Ginny in too — and the plus-ones, of course — but they've got stuff going on tonight. Also I thought perhaps it would be best not to have too many people around, considering Cissa and Andi haven't seen each other since before Tonks was born." A shrug. "We'll have the rest of them over some other time."

Harry blinked; that was a lot of information to take in at once. "Okay. Well, sounds good. Is Snape coming, or...?"

"No, he's managed to wiggle his way out of it. Don't want too many people knowing about him and Moony yet, after all. Might get back to the wrong ears." Sirius scowled lightly, but shook it off. "Anyway, the Malfoys will be back at four, so we're leaving at six, make sure you're presentable." He wiggled his eyebrows, making Harry blush.

"Shouldn't I be telling you that," he retorted, pointed gaze reminding his godfather that it had not been Draco and Harry who got caught half-naked in the library together.

Sirius just grinned wider, entirely unrepentant. "Pup, when you've had the life I have, people forgive your eccentricities," he declared happily. "As long as I'm wearing clean clothes, I'm more presentable than half the family expects of me." Harry snickered; that was certainly true.

He did a mental headcount; even without Snape, that was still eleven people meeting for dinner.

And to think, that was still missing a huge chunk of the people Harry considered family these days.

"Did you ever think you could have this, Siri?" he blurted, voice suddenly small. Sirius frowned at him. "Family dinners with people you don't hate. Y'know. This." He made a broad gesture, vaguely encompassing the whole house. Sirius' gaze softened in understanding, and he leaned against the door frame.

"Not for a long time," he admitted. "And then never again after Prongs died. But... life's got a funny way of surprising you."

"Sirius!" That was Charlie, calling from somewhere in the direction of the stairs. "I'm popping into work for a bit! Trouble with one of the hatchlings. But I'll be back in time for dinner, promise. Love you!"

"Good luck, don't die!" Sirius called back cheerfully. "Love you too!"

There was the sound of footsteps on the stairs, and the front door opening and shutting. Sirius looked to Harry, and laughed, running a hand through his hair. "No, pup, I definitely didn't think I could have this,” he agreed ruefully. “We’re lucky buggers, though, aren’t we?”

Harry’s eyes trailed over his bedroom, with the wardrobe full of clothes that had only ever been his, the shelf full of books, the posters and the comfy bed and the big sunny window; the desk, covered in letters from friends and family. “The luckiest,” he said, voice soft.

Life’s surprises, indeed.

.-. .

Narcissa Malfoy was nervous.

It was hard to tell just by looking at her, but Harry knew the tells in her son, so he knew what to look for. The way her fingers were curled ever so slightly at her sides, like she was trying not to clench her hands. The tightness to her jaw. The sharper edge to her comments, not quite sharp enough to actually hurt.

Harry would be nervous, too, in her position.

They were at Grimmauld, watching Ceri set the table for dinner. It was just the group from Seren Du so far, though Harry knew that would change soon.

The fire flared green, and Bill and Fleur stepped out. Narcissa’s shoulders tensed further.

“Harry!” Fleur greeted him delightedly, beckoning him over to kiss him on both cheeks. “My, you have grown!”

He laughed. “Better late than never,” he joked. “Congratulations, by the way,” he added, glancing down at the very impressive engagement ring on her finger. “Blimey, that’s a bit of a rock, isn’t it?”

Fleur beamed, holding it up for his inspection, while Bill flushed at her side. “When you work with goblins, you develop a bit of a high standard for jewellery,” he defended.

“It is beautiful,” Fleur declared, kissing his cheek. “But not more beautiful than the man who gave it to me.”

That made Bill go as red as his hair, and Harry heard Charlie fighting a laugh behind him. Like the dragon tamer hadn’t said soppier things to Sirius!

“Now I hear you have someone for us to meet, non?” Fleur pressed, turning back to Harry with intrigue dancing in her eyes. “Charlie talked a lot, but he did not say much.”

“Sounds about right,” Sirius piped up, earning an elbow to the ribs from his partner.

Harry was suddenly hit with a wave of nerves of his own; he’d somehow forgotten this part of the evening’s proceedings. “I—“ He turned around, looking desperately for platinum blond hair, and reached towards Draco. “I think you’ve technically met, in the past. Fleur, this is Draco Malfoy, my boyfriend. Draco, you remember Fleur, of course. And I don’t know if you’ve met Bill?”

“Not properly,” Draco replied, offering an open-palmed bow. “Well met, Lord Prewett.” Then he turned to Fleur, with his most charming smile, kissing the back of her hand. “Miss Delacour, it’s a pleasure. Congratulations on your engagement.”

“Merci.” Fleur looked back to Harry. “He is charming.”

“Too charming for his own good,” Harry agreed wryly. He was about to say something else, but the fire flared green again, and Draco went stock-still beside him.

The Tonks family had arrived.

Harry hadn’t met Ted Tonks before, and he was quietly surprised by the kind-faced, slightly rotund man stood at Andromeda’s side. He wasn’t sure what he’d expected of the man Andromeda had been so in love with she’d abandoned her entire family, but… not someone who looked like a muggle green-grocer.

Still, he knew better than to take people at face value, and judging by the set of the man’s shoulders as he faced his wife’s estranged sister, there was certainly more to Ted Tonks than met the eye.

“Cissy,” Andi murmured, voice choked with emotion.

“Andi,” Narcissa replied, in the same sort of tone. “I… you’re looking well, sister.”

Andi cracked a smile. “A few more grey hairs since last you saw me. Entirely down to raising this one, I assure you,” she added with a gesture to Tonks, earning an offended look — which was quickly turned on Kingsley when he snickered quietly. “You, on the other hand, haven’t aged a day.”

Narcissa’s laugh only sounded slightly strained. “That isn’t true, but I appreciate you saying so. I… this is your child, then? I’ve been told you prefer to be called Tonks.” She turned to Tonks, who blinked, taken-aback.

“I… yes.”

“You’re welcome to call me Cissa,” Narcissa offered. “Or… even Aunt Cissa, if you like. Though it may take some time to get there.” She tittered quietly. Then she turned, and before she’d even said anything Draco stepped forward as if in a trance. “This is your cousin, Draco. Andi, I… I’d like you to meet my son.”

“It’s a pleasure to meet you, Mrs Tonks,” Draco responded, every inch the polite young pureblood he’d been raised to be. Andi smiled as Draco kissed her hand.

“The pleasure is all mine, I assure you.” She studied him carefully, and Harry could see his boyfriend trying very hard not to fidget. “I’m very much looking forward to getting to know you, Draco,” Andi said warmly, then her gaze travelled back up to her sister. “We have a lot of catching up to do.”

There was a beat of silence, and then Sirius clapped his hands together. “I think dinner is ready, now we’re all here?”

He was in fine hosting form, carefully seating everyone around the table so that reunions could be had without anyone getting overwhelmed. Harry found himself placed between Draco and Fleur, with Tonks and Kingsley sat opposite. Ceri flitted about, levitating plates of food in front of everyone, expertly managing the many drinks needing poured — she was a Black family elf, after all, even if it had been many years since their last dinner party.

With his knee pressed reassuringly to Draco's under the table, Harry started up a conversation with Tonks about a band that she'd got him listening to on the Wireless; a band that Draco had enjoyed too, giving them common ground to have a conversation of their own. He needn't have worried so much; by the time the second course came around, Draco was happily chatting away about school as if he'd known Tonks all his life.

"You are so protective," Fleur murmured in his ear, leaning in close. "It is very cute."

Harry flushed, turning to talk to her now that Draco was fine on his own, though he still kept his knee against his boyfriend's. "He hasn't had much in the way of good family," he replied in an undertone. "I just want this to go well."

"He is the boy you were with during the Tournament, non?" Fleur checked, and Harry nodded. "So sweet, that you have stayed together through it all. I did wonder if you were in love, when you wrote that article."

"I—I didn't know it at the time," he confessed sheepishly — though even then he'd had some idea of how much Draco Malfoy would come to mean to him. "But yeah. He's the one."

Fleur cooed delightedly. Beside her, Bill chuckled.

"Charlie mentioned you were smitten," he remarked. "I'd like to say I'm surprised, but honestly at this point I don't think anything you do could surprise me, Potter." His tone was teasing, and Harry shrugged ruefully.

"I try."

"You will have to bring him to the wedding," Fleur insisted. "Whenever it may be."

Harry glanced at Draco, imagining seeing the blond in dress robes again — and actually being able to dance with him in public, this time. "Sounds great, Fleur."

By the time they got married, Harry knew he would be ready to go public with Draco. Hell, he doubted they would be able to wait that long. With Narcissa openly setting the Malfoy family apart from the Dark, there was little reason to keep it secret these days.

As everyone grew more comfortable with each other, the conversations slowly expanded to involve the whole table; Narcissa offered recommendations for a florist for Bill and Fleur's wedding, while Ted got to talking with Charlie about the niffler nest in Ted's garden. Around the time Ceri served dessert, Harry looked over at Sirius — the Lord Black was in his element, face shining as he chatted with his cousins, Charlie's arm slung over the back of his chair. It was clear he was enjoying the company, after so long being mostly alone.

Harry could imagine him in the future, hosting even bigger dinners than this; Yule, perhaps, with the full family gathered around the enormous table. Big parties in the summer, at the Pottery so everyone could be there, spilling out onto the lawn to play quidditch and enjoy the sunshine.

The mental image made Harry's chest ache with hope — they could have that, if they just survived the war.

Dry lips pressed to his cheek, and he shook the thoughts away, meeting Draco's inquisitive gaze. "You alright, there? You were a million miles away," the blond asked quietly. Harry grinned at him, squeezing his knee.

"Just enjoying the company."

Draco gave him an odd look, but let it lie, though his fingers tangled with Harry's; he only needed one hand to eat his white chocolate parfait.

After dinner they retired to the big parlour, and for once Grimmauld Place actually felt cosy and warm and the right size for the number of occupants; even the previous summer, with the entire Weasley family living there, Harry had always felt like the house was far too big.

Now it felt almost as much like home as Seren Du.

"I must say, Sirius, I love what you've done with the place," Narcissa declared, running a hand over the back of the sofa. "Your mother had horrendous taste in interior design."

Sirius' laugh was loud. "Horrendous taste in a lot of things, Cissa," he joked. "Merlin, did you know she left a portrait of herself here? Oh, the old hag used to scream—"

Harry tuned him out as he regaled his cousins with the story of the removal of Mrs Black's portrait, though he was sure Andi had heard it before. He was glad Sirius was getting to reconnect with his family. It was good for him to have someone to talk about his childhood memories with; to remind him they weren't all awful and traumatic, and to sympathise with the ones that were. Harry and Remus and Snape might have all had terrible childhoods, but they had never experienced being raised in a Dark pureblood home.

He noticed Bill beckon him over, and slipped across the room towards the redhead. Fleur was over chatting to Tonks, so they went unnoticed.

"I just wanted to let you know, you were onto something with the idea of checking the Death Eater vaults," the curse-breaker said quietly, and Harry's eyes widened.

"You found one?"

Bill nodded. "In Bellatrix Lestrange's vault. A cup; looked like it belonged to Hufflepuff herself. It was a hell of a shame to have to destroy it," he added with a slight frown. "We tried to use the ritual from that book Snape gave me, but that's definitely only for moving horcruxes from one living vessel to another. The team wanted to experiment a bit with the inanimate vessel, but Gorra and I convinced them it was best to just destroy it and let it lie."

Don't want to risk doing something we can't reverse." His face turned grim, and Harry nodded. That was a dangerous road to go down.

"So another one's been destroyed?" Bill nodded. Relief flooded Harry's veins. "Blimey." Including Harry's scar, and assuming the ring Dumbledore nearly died over was indeed a horcrux, that was six of the damned things — with only his scar and the snake remaining. "Surely there can't be many more?"

"No more than three," Bill assured. "We're close, Harry. We're getting there."

Harry grinned up at him; there was light at the end of the tunnel.

.-. .

It was an exhausted group of six that apparated back to Seren Du, the balmy summer evening perfect for the short stroll up to the house.

"Thank you, Sirius," Narcissa murmured, linking arms with her cousin. "That was delightful." They all knew she was talking about more than just the dinner, and Sirius grinned at her, patting her hand.

"There'll be plenty more to look forward to," he promised. "The Black family used to dominate the social calendar, back in the day. I think it's about time we brought it back to that — though with better company, this time, preferably."

Narcissa's laugh chimed through the garden. "Charlie, dear, I hope you know what you're getting into with this one," she teased lightly. "A more social creature you'll never find."

"He lets me keep my dragons, I can put up with parties," Charlie replied, grinning. "I like the idea of a full house."

The couple shared a heavy look, and Harry felt like a voyeur just for being present.

They parted ways inside, each heading to their own bedrooms. Harry prayed he would get to sleep through the whole night for once, with no Voldemort-based interruptions. He just wanted one night to bask in the feeling of family.

Dragging himself to bed, he tugged the duvet up to his shoulders — and froze when his door creaked open. His wand jumped to his hand, but he needn't have bothered; it was just Draco, the moonlight shining off his pale hair.

"What's the matter?" Harry asked, reaching for his glasses. Draco was in a matching set of silver silk pyjamas, and Harry was only briefly distracted by the play of the material across his thighs. "Not that I object to a late night visit, but I'm a bit too tired for anything fun tonight." He grinned lopsidedly, and Draco rolled his eyes.

"I overheard you and Bill talking, in the parlour," he declared, and Harry froze. "What the hell are horcruxes?"

Harry sat up properly, and patted the mattress beside him. "That's... kind of a long story."

With a ball of light glowing overhead, Harry told Draco the truth — all of it, including the matter of the fragment of Voldemort's soul within Harry's own head. With every word, the blond's face grew more and more horrified.

"So that's why Occlumency doesn't help with my visions," he finished. "I can keep him out of my mind, but dreams are a sort-of... in-between space. And he's not putting much effort into keeping me out of his."

"And he doesn't know? That part of— that it's inside you?"

Harry shook his head. "Not as far as we're aware. But Dumbledore knows. That's why he blocked my magic, we think. So that he could use me to destroy both the horcrux and Voldemort himself, once the time was right. Then he could swoop in and play the devastated mentor, and keep the country eating out of the palm of his hand."

The horror on Draco's face was replaced by a scowl. "He's lucky he's already dying, the bastard," he muttered. "I'd kill him myself for what he's done to you."

Harry gave Draco a chaste kiss, stroking his face. "It's fine. Like Bill said, there's no more than three others out there, maximum. Probably less. We know how to get the one out of my scar, so we've just got to find a couple more, kill the snake, and then I can end it."

Draco tilted forward, until their foreheads were pressed together. "I wish you'd let the Gringotts team destroy the one in your head," he whispered. "But I know you won't. Fucking Gryffindor." Harry laughed quietly, fingers threading through Draco's hair.

"I've saved lives with that connection," he said. "You can't ask me to give it up for my own comfort."

A quiet sigh escaped Draco's lips. "I know. I'm not asking. But... can I stay here tonight?" He pulled back, grey eyes hopeful, tentative. "It's a hell of a lot to take in. I just—I just want to hold you. Please?"

Harry couldn't say no to that. He tugged back the duvet, shuffling them both to lie down beneath it. Draco pulled him close, Harry's back to his chest, a kiss fluttering across Harry's temple. "Promise me," he breathed, barely a whisper. "Promise me you'll get rid of it if it starts looking dangerous. If it starts looking like he's manipulating the link."

Harry put his hands over Draco's, melting back into the warmth of his boyfriend's body. Really, that was more than he could ask for — he wasn't sure he would be this calm, had their positions been reversed. "I promise," he vowed, curling his foot around Draco's ankle. "I want to survive this war, Draco. That wasn't always true, but now — now I know what's waiting on the other end of it. I won't take stupid risks. I won't let him kill me when I'm so close to winning."

Draco squeezed him tighter, his steady breath hot on Harry's neck.

Nothing more was said between them, but nothing else needed to be.

And for once, Harry slept through the night.

Chapter 79

Neither of the boys was so naive as to think the adults weren't aware of exactly where Draco had slept that night. But no one commented on it, so Harry was sure they were in the clear. Not that they had done anything they shouldn't have.

Not that he thought any of their guardians would really care at this point if they did. Draco was sixteen, and Harry was almost the same — he had told Sirius when he and Draco started getting more intimate, and Sirius just said he trusted the pair of them to be responsible.

They'd been together long enough now to be trusted not to make hasty decisions in that regard.

The morning paper arrived, full of more incompetence from the Ministry. Along with it came a couple of letters; one for Remus, and one for Harry. He opened it eagerly, reading the contents.

“Sirius, Mrs Frobisher has invited us for dinner on Tuesday,” he relayed. “She says the Bones’ will be there too. We can talk everything over. Is that okay?” He had promised Susan a dinner with their families at some point in the summer, so this would kill two birds with one stone.

“I think that’s a marvellous idea,” Sirius replied, looking up grim-faced from the paper. “We can talk about how Dumbledore is insinuating you’re possessed in a national newspaper.”

Harry blanched. “He what?”

Sirius handed the paper over, and Draco jostled Harry’s shoulder as he squeezed in so they could both read it.

It was a piece digging deeper into the attack at the Ministry a month ago — namely, how Harry had come to be there to begin with.

‘When questioned, Albus Dumbledore reminded our reporters that he was not present at the school at this time. “However,” he went on to say, “Mr Potter has long had a connection to the Dark Lord. The specifics of which are unknown to me, but as both have grown stronger it is increasingly clear that Harry has insight into [You-Know-Who]’s mind that the rest of us can only make guesses at.’

When asked if the connection went both ways, or for further details of the incidents, Professor Dumbledore declined to comment. On further investigation, it appears many students have witnessed Mr Potter experience ‘visions’ throughout his school life, claiming to have seen within the mind of He-Who-Must-Not-Be-Named. Indeed, sources report that Mr Potter may have experienced such a vision during his History of Magic exam, where witnesses say he had some sort of fit and left early — mere hours before the attack on the Ministry began.

What is the nature of this connection Mr Potter seems to possess? Could it be dangerous? This reporter is unqualified to make such speculations, and the Unspeakables were unavailable for comment on the matter.'

By the time he finished reading, the dishes were rattling on the table.

"Control it, Potter," Snape droned, sounding almost bored. Harry took a deep breath, pushing his magic back down.

"Surely there's something in there we can sue him for," Harry growled, glaring down at the paper.

"If there is, I'm sure Mrs Frobisher will find it," Remus assured. "But Albus has been playing this game for longer than any of us have been alive, cub; he knows how to say just enough to get people to fill in the blanks, while keeping it vague enough to avoid legal problems. And it's not like you can hide the visions you've had, not after having one in the middle of an exam."

"I'm sure half the auror department have put the pieces together, considering Amelia and Kingsley always have the earliest warnings on raids and you're known to be friendly with them both," Sirius added.

Harry's scowl deepened — he couldn't even go on record with the truth about the connection, not without giving up the secret of horcruxes. Dumbledore knew exactly what the connection was, but instead of declining to comment he was dropping infuriating little hints — giving support to these vague 'witness claims' of him having visions.

"Does he really think I'm being possessed, or is he just trying to make my life difficult?" His question was directed at Snape, who frowned.

"He knows you're not possessed, in the traditional use of the word. However, I do think he truly believes you have been... changed, by the presence of the Dark Lord's soul in your body, especially now the Dark Lord himself is active once more. He does not think you could have shed the compulsions and magical blocks so fully by yourself — and he thinks you too foolish to have discovered them and had them removed elsewhere. His reasoning is that the Dark Lord's soul is influencing you to become more powerful and lean towards the Dark — and away from the headmaster and his influence." The Slytherin snorted derisively. "He is too arrogant to consider you might have developed a mind of your own at some point in the last three years. So, naturally, the only explanation is the mind of another leading you astray."

A sound of disgust worked its way out of Harry's throat. "I hate him," he muttered, and several people hummed in agreement.

"We'll get him, pup," Sirius assured. "Write back to your lawyer, tell her Tuesday's perfect."

Harry hoped they could get enough evidence to destroy Albus Dumbledore.

With Draco living at Seren Du, Harry's training had picked up in full force — it was good for him to go back on things he might have already learned, while Draco learned them for the first time. And at the rate the blond was progressing, he'd be caught up to Harry in no time; Harry might have the raw power to smooth his way, but Draco had the brains and determination to match the fiercest of Ravenclaws. Not to mention far too much pride to let himself look bad in front of both his godfather and his boyfriend.

For Harry, who had spent the past two summers feeling like he'd stolen Snape from Draco, it was great to see the pair finally getting to work together. And very amusing, to see Snape working with someone he didn't feel the need to snipe at every few minutes, even in jest. Harry could see how much Draco idolised his godfather; sometimes, watching them, he could easily imagine a much younger Draco, begging Snape to teach him about potions, carefully mimicking the man's every movement. Snape indulgently explaining the different techniques for preparing ingredients — he didn't suffer fools, but his godson was no fool.

It always made Harry think back to the memory Snape had shown him, of his heavily pregnant mother; of her offer to carry a child for Remus and Snape. Snape's instant dismissal of the whole thing — far too quick, in Harry's opinion.

How different things could have been.

But today they weren't working with Snape, as the Potions Master was at Hogwarts brewing for the upcoming school year. Instead, they were with Sirius, walking out into the woods surrounding the property; past the property line entirely.

Outside the apparition wards, for lessons both Harry and Draco could hardly wait to start.

"Apparating isn't really as hard as it's cracked up to be," Sirius told them as they walked. "Won't be for you two, anyway; it's all about focus, and you've got that in spades."

Another thing Harry likely would have struggled with under Dumbledore's compulsions. Merlin, the man really had hoped to make Harry helpless!

They stopped in a clearing not too far from the ward line, and Sirius brandished his wand, tracing two sets of white circles on the ground, about ten feet apart. "We'll start off easy, to get a feel of things. You can see where you're going; all you'll have to do is get from one circle to the other."

As Sirius began to explain the three Ds of apparition, Harry tried his best to focus, stepping into the nearest circle. He very pointedly didn't look at Draco — the look on the blond's face when he was concentrating incredibly hard was far too cute, in Harry's opinion, and he knew he'd just end up getting distracted.

"Don't expect much to happen immediately," Sirius warned them, stepping back to watch. "It takes some time to get the hang of it. Remember, you've got all summer. No need to rush it and splinch yourselves." Both boys winced; yes, they definitely wanted to avoid that outcome.

Much like he did with his animagus practice, Harry steadied his mind and his magic, staring hard at the circle he was aiming for. He knew what apparition felt like from a side-along perspective; he just had to figure out how to get that feeling himself.

The first time he tried, nothing happened. Same for the second, third and fourth tries. After a while, he started to feel a bit of a tingle of magic, but it still wasn't quite enough to just throw himself into nothingness and hope he might reform on the other side.

He was also starting to develop a headache.

A glance over at Draco showed he was equally frustrated, and Sirius grinned sympathetically. "That'll do it for now, I think. Like I said, it takes time. It's a bit like the animagus transformation; once you've done it once, it becomes easier. You just have to make that initial pathway in your magic."

"I'm sure if I'd succeeded in the animagus transformation, that would make me feel better," Draco sniped, folding his arms. Sirius wasn't swayed, still smiling.

"Why don't you give it a try now, I'll see if I can help you out. I know you're at least halfway there; Harry told me you managed wings the other week."

"There were feathers everywhere," Harry piped up playfully, sticking his tongue out at Draco's glare. "If you two are gonna work on that, do you mind if I do the same? I've only ever been a fox indoors, so far; I want to see what it's like to really be in a forest." His fox senses were so sharp, he knew it would be overwhelming the first few times.

"Sounds good, but we'll move back inside the wards, first."

Sirius left the four white circles on the grass and led them back towards the house. Harry felt the faintest tingle when they crossed the ward boundary. "Don't go too far, pup," Sirius warned. Harry gave him a thumbs up, then kissed Draco's cheek, and within an instant he was a lot lower to the ground.

As he'd anticipated, being a fox in the woods was a lot. There were so many smells; creatures, magical and muggle alike, the different plants, the moisture in the earth. The scents of Sirius and Draco and himself. The scent of the wards, the magic fizzing lightly under his nose.

Mindful of his boyfriend and godfather, Harry bounded off into the trees, getting used to the feel of the soft earth under his paws. It was incredible, experiencing the world like this.

In the process of becoming an animagus, Harry had read the warning stories of people who became so attached to their animal forms that they ended up stuck in them forever, unable — or unwilling — to return to human form. Even Sirius had mentioned, once or twice, how he'd almost crossed that line after spending so much time as a dog to save his sanity in Azkaban. For the first time, Harry could understand how such things could happen; being out in the woods, his fox senses in full force as he sniffed out rabbit trails and strange birds and even the scent of Buckbeak having passed through, it was a strange sort of bliss Harry hadn't experienced anywhere else before. Things were so much simpler, in the mind of a fox; his worries melted away, in favour of keen-eyed exploration of the undergrowth.

He didn't let it overwhelm him, though. He had to keep a firm hold of the human side of his mind; he had too much at stake for that. When things started to get a little much, he turned back towards the familiar scents of Sirius and Draco, ignoring any other scents that might distract him. That was much easier — even as a fox, Draco's scent made Harry feel safe, made his heart flutter.

He didn't want to disturb his boyfriend's concentration, so Harry looked around for a comfortable place to watch from. His gaze landed on a nearby tree, the bark rough and the low branches wide and sturdy.

There was something he hadn't tried, yet...

Skittering up the tree, Harry grinned to himself in triumph when he made it to the lower branches, and settled in to watch Draco meditate. Already, the blond seemed to be making progress; his wings came far quicker this time, arms sprouting feathers all the way up to the shoulders. Sirius crowed in delight, and Harry's little fox heart warmed at the smile on his boyfriend's face.

"That's a really great start, Draco!" Sirius enthused. "Bird forms are supposed to be really hard to get, anyway; with the bone density and everything, it's a bit more complicated than mammal to mammal." He watched Draco shake his arms, feathers shedding onto the grass as they became human once more. "Keep practicing, I bet you'll have it down by the end of summer." Sirius checked his watch, and frowned. "We should probably get back inside before Remus sends out a search party. Wonder where Harry's wandered off to?"

Harry chuffed quietly, then launched himself out of the tree towards his godfather; Sirius yelped, but thankfully managed to catch Harry, steadying the fox somewhat awkwardly in his arms. "Bloody hell! Scared ten years off my life, you little menace."

Harry let out a little fox laugh, licking Sirius' chin. Sirius' already half-hearted glare melted. "You're lucky you're cute," he declared, then held the fox out. "Draco, here you go."

Draco cradled the fox like a baby, ruffling the soft white fur of his belly. Harry wriggled in delight, snuggling at Draco's neck. "Do I have to carry you all the way home?" Draco asked laughingly, and Harry nodded. "And you say I'm high maintenance," the blond muttered, rolling his eyes.

Harry chuffed again, making himself comfortable in his boyfriend's arms. Draco smelled even more amazing to his fox senses, this close.

It was nice; being carried, listening to Draco's soothing heartbeat. It was even nicer when they got back to the house and Draco carried him to the small living room, sprawling on the soft rug with him and petting him gently.

Harry could definitely understand why Sirius liked being Padfoot so much.

.--.

On Tuesday evening, Harry and Sirius bid goodbye to the rest of the household and set off for the edge of the wards, planning to apparate to Grimmauld and then floo from there to the Frobishers' house.

When they arrived, Vicky and her parents were waiting in the hall for them; Vicky clearly took more after her father, a tall man with curly dark hair and the same gap-toothed smile. Mrs Frobisher on the other hand was a smiling East-Asian woman with her black hair tied back in a simple ponytail, far more petite than her husband and daughter. "Lord Black, Mr Potter, welcome," she greeted, shaking both their hands. "It's so good to finally meet you both in person. Amelia and Susan just arrived, come on through."

Harry and Sirius both took their shoes off where instructed, then followed the family through to the dining room. Sure enough, Susan and Amelia were both waiting, and Susan hurried forward to hug Harry. Then she offered an open-palmed bow to Sirius. "Well met, Lord Black." She grinned. "Nice to meet you properly."

Sirius laughed. "You, too, Heir Bones. And Madam Bones, I can't thank you enough, for everything." He shook the woman's hand earnestly, and she smiled.

"Your godson saved my life, I think we're even," she remarked. "Thank you, Mr Potter. Without your warning..." She trailed off, squeezing her niece's shoulder. "Well, it's best not to think what might have happened."

"I'm just glad I could help."

Mr Frobisher levitated dinner through, and Harry took a seat between Sirius and Susan. There was a current of anxiety twisting a coil in his belly; for all he'd gotten used to family dinners in the last couple of years, he'd never had a proper dinner outside the family before. The closest anything came to it was staying with the Weasleys, but they had always just treated him like an extra kid, so it wasn't nearly the same.

Adding on that this was a business dinner, of sorts... Harry just hoped he didn't make a fool of himself.

You'll be fine, murmured a voice in the back of his head that sounded remarkably like Draco.

"I thought we'd save all the work-talk until after we've eaten," Mrs Frobisher said, waving her wand to pour water for everyone. "No need to ruin our appetites!" They laughed, and Harry looked down at his meal; it was a rice and vegetable dish he wasn't familiar with, but it smelled amazing.

"So, Harry — if I might call you Harry," Mr Frobisher began, and Harry nodded in assent, "Vicky was telling us about the defence club you put together last year. It sounded awfully exciting!" He chuckled. "I wish she was that enthusiastic about all her classes."

Further down the table, Vicky blushed.

"It was a lot of fun," Harry agreed. "I mean, I wish it hadn't been quite so necessary," a dark look crossed everyone's faces at the reminder of Umbridge, "but it was fun getting to know everyone better and work on spells we might not have learned in class."

"I didn't expect joining the quidditch team to lead to a secret underground defence club," Vicky remarked, "but it definitely made the year interesting!"

"With any luck, the next teacher will be a bit more competent, and you won't need a secret club just to pass your exams," Amelia mused.

"Provided we did pass our exams," Harry said. Susan scoffed, rolling her eyes.

"Come off it, Harry; if anyone in the HA got less than an E, I'll eat my copy of that awful Slinkhard book," she said, making him blush.

"Well, not much longer to wait to find out." Sirius clapped Harry on the shoulder.

"Don't remind us," Susan mock-groaned. "Only a couple more weeks to find out if all our dreams are crushed forever."

"Speak for yourself," Harry teased, "I don't need OWLs to play quidditch."

Susan's only response was a glare that had everyone at the table laughing.

"Well either way, I'm sure when Vicky does reach her OWL year, she'll be very grateful for your help," Mrs Frobisher said with a smile. Then her face turned mischievous. "Meanwhile, I'm sure she's very grateful to your club for getting her talking to the boy she's been writing non-stop since she got home."

Vicky immediately turned red. "Mu-um!" she groaned, and Harry looked at her with raised eyebrows.

"I've not heard anything about a boy."

"He's another Gryffindor. Name begins with a C — Christopher? No. Callum?"

"Colin?" Harry asked, and Mrs Frobisher clapped her hands together.

"Yes! Colin, that's the one."

"Colin Creevey?" Harry's gaze moved back to Vicky, who looked ready to sink through the floor. "Well, that is news."

"They've been sending letters back and forth all week," Mrs Frobisher teased. "Should I be worried, Harry?"

"Nah, Colin's great." Now he had stopped being weirdly obsessed with Harry, at least.

"Don't worry, Vicky. I'm a great matchmaker. Just ask Susan." It was Susan's turn to blush, though she did so with a glare.

"You're lucky Aunt Amelia's already met Theo, Harry," she grumbled, and he laughed.

"He mentioned you'd told her about him, don't worry. I'm not that mean."

"I don't need a matchmaker, Harry," Vicky informed him, still bright red. "Colin and I are just friends. He's really good at Transfiguration."

Harry hadn't known that, but he could also tell Vicky was not being entirely truthful. "Well, if that changes," he drawled lightly, "Colin and Ginny are good friends. So when Ginny's back on the quidditch team next year you'll have an in."

"But you'll be back as seeker?"

"Ginny's going to try out for chaser," Harry explained. "Katie'd be mad not to pick her."

Vicky, keen for the change of subject, happily turned the conversation onto the Gryffindor quidditch team's chances.

"That reminds me, Harry," Amelia cut in, "you'll be pleased to hear that all of Umbridge's Educational Decrees have been rescinded — including your lifetime quidditch ban. There will be no trouble with you returning to the Gryffindor team."

Harry beamed at her. "Brilliant."

"I almost wish Umbridge wasn't in Azkaban, just so she could see the exam results from the last year and know exactly how much better a teacher than her Harry was," Susan mused. "I bet the look on her face would be brilliant."

"Surely not all the students who weren't in the HA did poorly?" Harry asked. "I mean, sure, we were a bit more organised, but wasn't everyone practicing spells in secret?"

The two girls shared a bemused look. "Not that we saw," Susan replied. "Everyone else was too scared of getting caught."

"Sometimes Harry forgets that not everyone has the same disregard for the rules as him," Sirius said dryly, clapping his godson on the shoulder. "It runs in the family. In all ways, quite frankly."

"Auntie Zelda said she could pick the HA kids out just by their practical exams, and not just in Defence," Vicky chirped, and her father sent her a scolding look.

"Vicky, you shouldn't talk about other students' exam performance. Especially when you haven't even taken your own yet."

"I didn't name names!" Vicky protested. "Just said the difference was obvious."

"Excuse me, but — Auntie Zelda?" Susan asked, perplexed. Vicky grinned.

"Griselda Marchbanks," she said with a shrug. "It's more my great-great-something auntie, but who's got time to say all that."

Harry and Susan turned to stare at each other, eyes wide.

“You’re related to Griselda Marchbanks?” Susan asked. “I— does that mean... I’m sorry, but... Mrs Frobisher, how much are you aware of what Harry and I have been doing at school — outside the HA?”

Far from being confused, Mrs Frobisher’s face was knowing. “Are you talking about your alliance with the other heirs?” She smiled, reaching to place a hand on her daughter’s shoulder. “Aunt Zelda hasn’t publicised things for safety’s sake, but considering what we’re going to discuss later, I think I can trust that none of you will be spreading rumours. Vicky is indeed the heir to the Tremblay seat. Well, technically I am, but as soon as Vicky comes of age she’ll be the next in line. I’ve no intention of being on the Wizengamot — and Zelda certainly has no intention of leaving the seat empty any time soon!”

“I... we had no idea,” Harry murmured. “I mean, your family tree isn’t public record — we haven’t been snooping,” he insisted quickly. “Just... seeing what information is common knowledge.”

“No, no, I understand. Amelia has mentioned a few things about Susan’s political future,” the lawyer remarked with a grin. “But the Tremblays have never really fallen in to the whole Wizengamot crowd — I myself was educated in Japan, where my mother’s family is from. We didn’t want Vicky to feel like she had a reputation to uphold when she’s just trying to be a teenager. No offence, of course, Amelia,” she added hastily, but Amelia waved her off.

“Oh, none taken. Sometimes I think that’s the right idea of it — unfortunately, the Bones family have been far too proud of themselves in the last few centuries to hide away their family tree. And of course, there’s only the one branch of it left, now.” Amelia’s smile turned sad as she looked at her niece.

“We’ll keep your secret,” Susan promised. “But, Vicky... if you’re ever interested in taking a more active role, before your aunt passes the seat on. Or if you just want to meet the other heirs our age — we’d be happy to introduce you. We’ve got a sort-of study group.”

“I’ll think about it,” Vicky confirmed. Then she frowned. “Is Cormac McLaggen in it?”

Harry frowned. “No? Should he be?” Harry was only vaguely aware of the older Gryffindor, in that Katie thought he was a prick.

“He’s always bragging about his Uncle Tiberius like he’s the Ogden heir.” Vicky scowled. “Like he’s special for having a family member on the Wizengamot.”

“Cormac McLaggen isn’t Tiberius’ heir, love,” Mrs Frobisher assured. Her eyes flicked to Susan as she spoke. “Aunt Zelda knows who it is, but she won’t tell me. She’s good friends with Tiberius, though, and apparently he’s got a few things to say about how his brother-in-law raises children,” she said, sounding amused. “If I remember correctly, Tiberius had an older sister who passed the seat on to him to go travelling, but I don’t know where she ended up. Presumably she has a child that’s in line.”

"Well, that's good," Vicky said decisively. "McLaggen is the worst. He kept flirting with my roommate last year, even when she told him to bugger off. He was a sixth year." She gave a thetic shudder. "And Katie told me he was talking about trying out for Keeper this year."

"He didn't try out last year, did he?" Harry asked, horrified at the thought of Katie having to play on the same team as her hated yearmate.

"No," Vicky said, shaking her head, "he was in the hospital wing. Ate something stupid on a dare, I think."

"What a delightful young man," Mr Frobisher said dryly. "Well, I wouldn't worry about it, sweetheart; I'm sure you'll beat him even if he does turn up for tryouts. And on that note, I think we'd best leave your mother to talk business with her clients."

Vicky looked a little dismayed to have to leave the table — Harry could relate — but she nodded in the end, getting to her feet.

"It was good to see you both," she said to Harry and Susan. "I'll see you at school, I suppose. If not sooner."

"See you, Vicky. And don't worry — I'll talk to Ginny about putting in a good word with Colin for you," Harry teased, winking. Vicky huffed.

"I think I'm doing just fine on my own, thanks," came her confident retort. Then, she offered picture-perfect curtseys to both Sirius and Amelia, and followed her dad from the room.

When they were gone, Mrs Frobisher sighed. "Never thought I'd be raising a Gryffindor," she muttered, shaking her head.

"If it helps, Huflepuffs aren't easy, either," Amelia sympathised. Susan just gave an innocent smile.

"Professor Sprout says I'm a delight," she insisted.

"Professor Sprout doesn't know half of what you get up to at that school," Amelia accused without hesitation.

"Now, Amelia," Sirius drawled, eyes bright, "People in glass houses shouldn't throw stones."

"You know absolutely nothing, Sirius Black," Amelia retorted, narrowing her eyes at him. "And remember I got you out of Azkaban."

"For which I will always be grateful," Sirius agreed, though as soon as Amelia looked away Harry saw his godfather wink at Susan, mouthing 'I'll tell you later'.

"Student hijinks aside," Mrs Frobisher cut in pointedly, Vanishing the empty dishes on the table with a wave of her wand, "we do have quite a bit to discuss. From here on, you can be assured that anything said falls under client confidentiality."

“Good to know.” Harry cleared his throat. “So, uh; I suppose I should start by telling you that Gringotts has magical signature evidence that Albus Dumbledore put a block on my family magics when I was a baby? And put enough compulsions on me when I started school that I repeatedly endangered my own life without hesitation?”

Both women stared at him in horror. Sirius squeezed his shoulder. “You’d better go from the beginning, pup.”

“I... yes, I think you’d better,” Frobisher agreed faintly. Harry gave a grim smile.

They certainly had a lot to cover.

.-. .

Harry’s recount of everything he knew for certain Dumbledore had done to him took a little over half an hour, but when it came to things they only speculated it was a much larger conversation. “I’m worried that if we bring everything out too early, he’ll get it swept under the rug,” Harry said, running a hand through his hair. “He just... half of wizarding Britain is so convinced he can’t do anything wrong, and they’ve already painted me a lunatic half a dozen times.”

“With even half this evidence, he’ll struggle to convince everyone,” Mrs Frobisher assured. “Especially with what I’ve heard Amelia pulled out at Lord Black’s trial.”

“That was brilliant,” Harry agreed, grinning up at Amelia. The dark-haired witch smiled slightly.

“I saw the opportunity, and I took it,” she demurred. “The Wizengamot has spent decades being Albus Dumbledore’s personal chessboard, it’s long overdue for that to change.” Then she shook her head, amazed. “I had no idea he’d gone so far as to put compulsions on children.”

“You didn’t tell us it was that bad, Harry,” Susan added, biting her lip worriedly.

“It’s fine. They’re gone, now. And as far as I know, he hasn’t done any on any of the other students.”

“Still,” Mrs Frobisher said, “we can only imagine what else he might have done that no one has discovered.”

“I suspect we’ll never know the full extent of it,” Sirius mused with a frown. “But as long as we can get enough to break what hold he currently has. Long enough for the kids and their friends to get in and show us old farts how politics is really done.” He winked, making both Harry and Susan grin.

“I certainly think we’ve got enough to work with,” Mrs Frobisher agreed. “I can’t yet file anything for his comments regarding your connection with the Dark Lord, but you can be sure I’m keeping an eye on the paper, Harry — the second he steps out of line, I’ll file a suit on your behalf,” she promised.

"I can't do anything that means I have to explain what the connection is," Harry warned her. "Or have it examined or anything. I know what it is," he added at Amelia's mild look of alarm. "But it's not something that should be talked about, even in private."

The fewer people who knew anything about horcruxes, the better.

"I understand," Mrs Frobisher assured. "Don't worry, I won't let it get that far. A cease and desist to the Prophet is likely all it'll take." She pursed her lips. "With influential people like Albus Dumbledore, a lot of the work is done behind the scenes. Much like his own work — let people read their own conclusions into the little things that are done, and you'll get better results than attacking outright. From what I've heard from Vicky, you've already done very well with that — a lot of the students at the school think more critically of the headmaster these days, and that's gradually spreading to their families. And with Amelia working on the Ministry and the Wizengamot, the dissent is certainly rising."

Slowly, a devious smile overtook her face — the kind of look that Harry had learned to be wary of, after so many years with both Weasleys and Marauders around.

But in this case, it was Dumbledore about to face Mrs Frobisher's wrath, so Harry wasn't wary at all.

"I have something of a plan, if I may?" Frobisher asked, and Harry shared a look with Sirius.

"The floor is yours," Harry offered.

The devious smile grew wider.

.-. .

Once they were back at Seren Du, Sirius slung an arm over Harry's shoulders on the walk back up to the house. "Remind me never to get on your bad side," he said conversationally. "Your lawyer would eat me alive."

Harry laughed, grinning. "Keep that in mind when you're planning your summer pranks," he teased. Sirius ruffled his hair.

"You did well tonight, pup," he said, stopping Harry just outside the front door. With his hands on Harry's shoulders, Harry had to tilt his head up a little to look Sirius in the eye, though the difference between them was far less than it had been a year ago. "Both over dinner, and afterwards. I know you were worried about the whole thing." Harry flushed.

"You think it went okay?" Harry still worried that teasing Vicky about Colin in front of her parents was too far, even though her mum had been the one to bring it up in the first place. He was so used to considering the quidditch team practically family, Vicky had just slotted right into that spot in his mind.

"I think it went brilliantly. And as someone who has purposefully made about every social faux pas in the book at one time or another, I'd say you avoided them well enough." He winked, grey eyes softening. "I can't say if Prongs would be proud — he always hated all that pureblood, Wizengamot crap. But... for what it's worth, you're making your old godfather very proud indeed."

Harry's breath caught in his throat. "I— really?"

Sirius' eyes twinkled, and he leaned in to press a kiss to Harry's forehead. "Really. I can't really claim responsibility — you practically raised yourself thanks to those bloody muggles — but I'm glad I get to be here to see the young man you're becoming."

"I think you've got more responsibility for it than you think, Sirius," Harry insisted. Sirius pulled back, chuckling.

"Maybe. Have to share it with Moony, though. And Severus, I suppose." He made a mock-annoyed face. "It's probably for the best we got you after the formative years were out of the way."

"We'll see about that." Harry side-eyed him, grinning. "Once you've raised a kid or two of your own from the start, we'll see what they turn out like."

Then he reached for the door, because Sirius seemed entirely too gobsmacked by the prospect to do anything but stand there, wide-eyed and gaping. "I— we—"

Harry laughed at him, beckoning him inside. Only then did he let his grin soften. "For what it's worth — I think you'd be great at it." He rocked up on his toes, kissing his godfather's cheek. "I'm going to tell Draco how it all went. Goodnight, Padfoot!"

And so he skipped upstairs, leaving his godfather in the hallway to retrieve his brain from wherever it had fled in response to Harry's words.

.

On the night of the first full moon of the summer, Harry could hardly sit still through dinner. It was finally time — he would finally be able to join his godfathers on their moonlit escapades.

He could tell Draco was a little jealous, though the blond was hiding it well. He knew how important this was to Harry, how much it meant to be able to take part in this ritual his father had helped begin. He'd get to join them eventually.

Sirius and Remus were restless, too, though Harry suspected theirs wasn't entirely excitement as his was — Remus was wary of Harry getting hurt, even though he had run with animagi hundreds of times in his life without issue, and also the Wolfsbane would leave him aware and docile even in the face of humans. But they were his godfathers, and it was in their nature to worry, so Harry didn't protest; they were still letting him join, after all.

If he could prove tonight that everything would go smoothly, hopefully he could become a regular addition to the full moon nights. The ones he wasn't at school for, at least.

After dinner, Remus and Snape disappeared upstairs; Harry was familiar with their pre-moon rituals enough to know that they wouldn't resurface until around half an hour before moonrise. He looked across the table at Sirius, who offered him a small grin. “You should take a nap, pup,” the dog animagus suggested. “Save your energy for tonight.”

Harry scoffed; as if he could sleep with all this anticipation running through his veins. But then Draco’s hand slipped into his, squeezing gently.

Maybe he could nap with company, Harry mused.

“You’ll come get me when it’s time?” he checked, and Sirius barked a laugh.

“Of course,” he promised. “Go on. We’ve a few hours yet.”

Harry still set an alarm, just in case. He didn’t want to miss a single second of this.

With Draco’s body twined with his, thin fingers carding gently through his hair, Harry managed to drift off for a while, dreams full of abstract flashes of grass and trees and the feeling of being on four paws. When he woke to the beeping of his alarm clock, he found himself with his face buried in the hollow of Draco’s throat. He sat up, and the blond blinked dazedly up at him.

“You’re off, then?” Draco asked, voice husky with sleep. Harry nodded. “Mm, be safe. Have fun. Don’t die.”

The Gryffindor snickered, leaning down to press a chaste kiss to his boyfriend’s lips. “Will you be here when I get back?”

Those lips curled into a smile. “I’m far too comfortable to move now,” Draco assured. Harry grinned wider, and a wave of his hand transfigured Draco’s shirt and trousers into much more comfortable pyjamas. “Thank you. Go play in the woods now,” Draco dismissed, eyes already falling shut again. Harry kissed him one last time, unable to help himself, then shuffled off the bed and let him to sleep.

Sirius was in the hallway, clearly on his way to retrieve Harry, and he beamed at his godson. “You ready, pup?”

Harry matched his expression. “More than.” He fell into step beside the older man. “You’ll have to give me a proper nickname eventually, y’know,” he said, and Sirius rolled his eyes.

“Prongs came up with all the nicknames,” he revealed, running a hand through his hair. “Moony and I were shit at it. Honestly, some of the attempts we made...” He snorted, smile turning a little sad, and Harry’s heart clenched.

“You never told me that.” They’d always made the nicknames sound like a group effort.

“Yeah. So we can give you a nickname if you really want it, but you might regret asking,” Sirius said teasingly. “Or we can take Severus’ suggestion, just call you and your boy Mischief and Mayhem. Since that’s all you seem to cause,” he added with a wink.

That startled a laugh out of Harry. “I think Draco might take offence to that.” The Slytherin regularly maintained that any ridiculousness was entirely Harry’s doing, and he just got dragged along for the ride. “I... I like it, though.” Mischief wasn’t a bad name, for a fox.

That made Sirius brighten up, and he ruffled Harry’s hair. “Mischief it is, then,” he decided, just as they reached the entrance hall. To Harry’s surprise, Remus was already there; alone, wearing nothing but a pair of flannel pyjama bottoms, his shoulders tense.

“You hear that, Moony?” Sirius said, grinning at his best friend. “We’re sticking with Mischief. You can tell the old bat he’s now officially contributed to the Marauders’ legacy.”

Remus chuckled. “I’m sure he’ll be thrilled,” he said dryly, then turned to Harry. “You’re ready, then? You know what to do if... if things don’t go well?”

“Straight back in the house, let Padfoot deal with you,” Harry recited, as if they hadn’t been over it a million times before even considering allowing him to join in. “It’ll be fine, Remus. We’ll have fun.”

All Remus managed was a tight half-smile, and then he sucked in a sharp breath, his eyes flashing gold. “I need to go,” he declared, sharing a look with Sirius and then slipping out the front door.

Harry knew how it would go — Sirius had explained that Remus never let anyone see him in the act of transforming if he could help it. As children the other Marauders had waited outside the Shack for their friend, and now they would offer Remus the same privacy by staying inside the house until the transformation was complete.

Having seen the transformation as a third year, Harry could understand Remus wanting to do that alone.

And so they waited, listening as human screams became lupine howls. Harry’s stomach churned; normally he was in his room at this point, under a Silencing charm so he didn’t have to listen. It was awful, knowing that Remus was going through such pain and there was nothing any of them could do about it. Even though Remus brushed it off, insisted that it had been much worse before the Wolfsbane, that he barely even felt it now.

At last, there was a scratch at the door; the signal that the transformation was complete.

Sirius looked at Harry, grey eyes bright and lips tugging in a challenging grin. He winked, then in an instant there was a huge black dog stood there, staring expectantly up at Harry. Harry didn’t waste time; a twist of his magic, and he too was on four paws, his senses shifting in a way he was becoming increasingly familiar with. Instantly, he could smell the wolf on the other side of the door; Remus’ usual scent still present but overwhelmed by the scent of the predator within him, brought to the surface by the light of the moon.

Sirius nudged at the house wards, opening the door, and for the second time in his life Harry stood face to face with a fully transformed werewolf.

But he had no fear, this time. He knew Remus was in control, knew the wolf would not see the fox as a threat — he bounded out past Padfoot, paws hitting the still-warm grass as he approached the wolf eagerly. Remus had told him what to do here, too; let Moony get his scent, get used to him. Then they could play.

The wolf seemed even bigger, now Harry was so small. The fox sat patiently, keen-eyed and braced to sprint if the wolf should decide it didn't like what it saw. A large muzzle bumped against the side of his jaw, hot breath tickling his fur as Moony inspected him from tip to tail, circling him with wary gold eyes. Mischief didn't flinch. A few feet away, Padfoot stood watching the whole exchange, ready to intervene if needed.

Moony took a step back, then huffed, nudging Mischief with his huge head — a distinctly playful gesture.

The fox grinned, and took off.

In the back of the fox-led mind, Harry's human self was practically shouting in glee at getting to run with the wolf and the dog, all three of them headed for the woods. He darted between larger bodies, yipping excitedly as Padfoot chased after him and Moony followed close behind.

He and Padfoot had run together before, but it was nothing like this. Nothing so... freeing. So exuberant. This was the three of them giving in to their animal instincts, letting Moony truly be himself under the light of the moon. As he ducked and dodged between trees, following interesting scent trails and jumping on his two companions, Harry wistfully imagined a time in the future when there was a shadow overhead, a whisper of white feathers following them from above. Perhaps even two shadows; Snape might be persuaded to make the transformation, now he would not be the only avian among them. Draco would enjoy flying with his godfather.

They ended up in a clearing, a place the two canines were evidently familiar with; the space was layered with the scents of the two of them from many months past, other animals steering clear of a place claimed by the predators so blatantly. Moony and Padfoot wrestled playfully, and Mischief didn't hesitate to throw himself into the mix, taking advantage of his smaller size to live up to his nickname and trip the pair up, even clambering on top of the werewolf at one point to the sound of Padfoot's barked amusement.

Harry's heart raced with joy, even as the three of them slowed down in their play and made to settle in for the night. Padfoot trotted over, swiping his tongue over Mischief's head and chuffing at the disgruntled look it earned. He wasn't sure how much of the night had passed, the moon still bright overhead, but already he knew he would very happily do this every full moon for as long as he could.

Sirius had tried to explain what it was like, back when Harry had first expressed interest in joining them on full moon nights. But he'd always insisted it was something that couldn't truly be described, that the feeling of pack was unlike anything else in the world. Harry hadn't fully understood what he meant until now.

There were no human feelings he could put to this, not that would do it justice.

When he curled up between the dog and the wolf, fluffy tail tucked in close to his body, he caught the pair of them sharing a heavy gaze, and then Moony tipped his head to the sky and howled. A howl of welcome, for their newest pack member; a howl of mourning, for the one they had lost. The one who should have been there, antlers raised proudly at the introduction of his pup to the fold.

As he raised his gaze, Mischief caught a flicker of movement out of the corner of his eye — it was probably just his imagination, but for a moment he thought he'd seen the shadowy outline of a stag, lurking in the trees, watching them.

Then he blinked, and the shadow was gone.

The human soul ached within the fox's heart, and Mischief turned back to his godfathers; they were looking at the trees, too. Maybe he hadn't imagined the stag after all.

A full moon held a magic all of its own, everyone knew that. Perhaps that magic was enough to bring the echo of Prongs to life, just for a moment. Just enough to offer his blessing to his old pack, to his son's new animal form.

It made something settle in Harry's mind, an ache he hadn't realised he still held.

He was so grateful to Sirius and Remus, for so many things. But for this, for giving him this connection to his father in such a visceral, soul-deep way... Harry would never be able to thank them enough.

Chapter 80

Chapter Notes

This chapter takes us over the 500k mark! It's something of an interlude; checking in with all the people who aren't Harry, getting some cute relationship fluff and also some smut in the mix there, with a healthy shot of plot progression thrown in too.

Warning for depression/anxiety/PTSD in the Sirius/Charlie section, with Sirius' post-Azkaban struggles.

Also warning for discussions of gender dysphoria and other similar gender-related feels in the Tonks/Kingsley section.

Sirius had woken up cold.

It happened, sometimes. Charlie had been told many times in his life that he was obnoxiously warm to sleep next to, but Sirius had never complained about it — and sometimes, like that morning, Charlie woke up with the dark-haired wizard wrapped around him like an octopus, plastered to his chest as if he was trying to suck every scrap of warmth from Charlie's body.

When he felt the tiny shivers wracking Sirius' body, Charlie knew it was going to be a rough day. Still, he did what he always did on Cold mornings; rolled them over until Sirius was securely cocooned beneath his broad form, and pulled the duvet up to his neck, wrapping it around both of them. Never mind that it was summer, and already boiling in their room.

There was the smallest relaxation of Sirius' shoulders. Charlie's heart clenched. He tilted his head down, pressing the most gentle of kisses to Sirius' temple. "Good morning, sweetheart," he said quietly, trying carefully not to let his full weight rest on the man, else he go from cuddling to crushing. Sirius liked being weighed down, but when he was mentally in Azkaban Charlie always worried he'd smother him.

He waited, occasionally dropping another kiss on his partner's face. Little by little, Sirius stopped shivering. Then, finally, the ex-convict let out a long breath. "Fuck," he muttered, and Charlie hummed against his cheek.

"Want to have breakfast in bed this morning?" he asked. He felt Sirius wavering. "It's a Saturday. We've nowhere to be."

More than once, Sirius had tried to hide his own depression while Charlie got ready for work, so he wouldn't feel obligated to stay at home and care for him. Like any part of that was an obligation.

Charlie hated the demons in his boyfriend's brain, the way they made him hate himself.

Fucking Azkaban.

But luckily Sirius was fine with falling apart on a weekend, so he gave a small nod — and as if she'd been waiting for the signal, Ceri popped silently into the room, levitating a lap tray. Charlie slowly manoeuvred them both into a sort-of sitting position, Sirius still tucked securely against his side. He took the tray from Ceri with a grateful smile, and the elf bobbed her head. Before she left, she clicked her fingers, and the fire in the grate jumped to life.

Sirius had chosen this bedroom for a reason.

The room was warm enough already, but it was clear the dog animagus couldn't feel it, his whole body strung tight against Charlie. But he showed at least a little interest in the food Ceri had brought them, and with a little encouragement he was eating.

"Was it your dreams, or just... one of those days?" Charlie asked, and Sirius shrugged.

"Dreams, I think. Dunno. Just... cold. Empty."

Charlie knew the word wasn't referring to his surroundings, but himself. His heart squeezed tighter.

"It's going to be gorgeous out today. We could read outside for a while, by the fire pit?"

"I promised the boys I'd help them with apparition training today," Sirius rasped in protest.

"Let Moony do it," Charlie urged. "You know his only plans for the day were sitting in Snape's lab and trying to flirt him into bollocksing up a potion."

That got a tiny huff of laughter out of the dark-haired man, and Charlie's whole chest filled with pride. Small steps.

They stayed in their warm nest of a room until Charlie was sure the sun would be up, and then they slowly got dressed — soft, well-worn jeans, long-sleeved t-shirt, Charlie's old Gryffindor quidditch hoodie that Sirius had claimed when they'd moved in together. Comfortable clothes, clothes that wouldn't remind him of Azkaban.

Outside it was already warm, but leaving their room had Sirius shivering again.

The fire in the fire pit built quickly with a wave of Charlie's wand, and another wave had one of the benches transfigured into a comfy divan, just wide enough for both of them. Charlie laid down and pulled Sirius to lie between his legs, head on his chest. A thin layer of sweat had already formed on Charlie's skin.

Sirius' hands were still like ice.

The animagus turned his face up to the sun with the most genuine smile Charlie had seen from him all day, and the redhead stroked a hand down Sirius' side, sliding it beneath the hoodie and shirt to touch bare skin. Physical contact helped — often, Sirius couldn't decide between wearing a hundred layers to stave off the cold, or going entirely naked to get as much skin pressed against him as possible.

But Charlie's hands on his stomach seemed to be enough, and inch by inch he relaxed into the embrace. When Charlie finally felt him loosen fully against him, having drifted into a light doze, a spark of relief and triumph tingled in his body.

It was the worst day Sirius had had since he and Charlie had got together, and for a moment Charlie had worried he wouldn't be able to bring him out of it.

Warmth, sun and human contact; three things Sirius had been denied in Azkaban. With a combination like that, and a little patience, he could drag Sirius back from even the darkest corners of his own mind. Charlie glanced up at the sky with a small quirk of his lips, mentally thanking the weather for cooperating. He wasn't sure what he'd have done if it were raining.

They were out there for hours, Sirius waking up occasionally with a full-body jerk, but Charlie soothed him every time. At one point, Charlie summoned the book he'd been reading about the migration habits of various European dragon breeds, propping it up on a conjured bookstand to read while Sirius stared up at the cloudless sky with that chilling, vacant gaze.

Ceri brought lunch out to them. Ripe, juicy berries, and toasted sandwiches cut into bite-size squares. Packed with flavour — another thing to distance Sirius from the prison in his mind.

Sirius didn't talk, but Charlie didn't expect him to. Later, when they were back to reading and staring respectively, Harry appeared from the direction of the house. He approached cautiously, and Charlie offered what he hoped was a reassuring smile. The teen's eyes were sympathetic as they flickered down to his godfather, who didn't react at his presence.

"Draco and I were thinking about swimming for a bit," the green-eyed Gryffindor started, "but Moony said we should check with you first. Don't want to disturb."

"We're fine," Charlie assured, running a hand through Sirius' hair. "Just relaxing out in the sun. Bit of laughter in the background won't harm anyone. Just don't drown," he teased. Harry brightened up — then, cautiously, he stepped closer, leaning in to hug Sirius around the shoulders.

"Love you, Padfoot."

Sirius reflexively hugged him back. "Love you, too, kid. Have fun swimming."

And inside, Charlie cheered, because that meant Sirius was present enough to have registered the conversation. Finally, the shadows were lifting.

But it was slow going. When the sun began to set, the breeze picking up a slight chill, the pair of them went inside — back up to their bedroom. The fire was still going, the room swelteringly hot, and Sirius sprawled on the bed with a heavy sigh.

Charlie settled in beside him, still touching but not as close — if Sirius was ready to come out of his own head, he didn't want to overwhelm him. He ran his fingers through Sirius' long hair, blunt nails scratching across the man's scalp in a way that made him smile faintly.

At last, Sirius rolled over, making eye contact. For the first time all day, there were no shadows in those stormy grey eyes. “Hey.”

Charlie smiled. “Hey, you.”

“I’m sorry.”

That made Charlie frown. “What? What for?”

Sirius scoffed, one arm gesturing to the room at large. “This. Making you baby me all day, deal with my fucked-up head.”

“Okay, first of all, you didn’t make me do anything,” Charlie pointed out. “Second, as far as I’m concerned I’ve had an excellent lazy Saturday, reading a book in the sunshine all cuddled up with my gorgeous partner. Pretty sure that’s the definition of bliss in some circles.”

Sirius narrowed his eyes at him. “With the fire roaring on a twenty-eight degree day?”

A flicker of a smirk across Charlie’s face. “I play with dragons, sweetheart. A little heat never bothered me much.” Indeed, Sirius on a Cold day was very much like dealing with dragons; no sudden movements, no expectations, just warmth and steady companionship until they came to you.

“Still,” Sirius muttered, frowning. “I shouldn’t be having days like this, still. I’ve been out for three years.”

“And you were in for twelve,” Charlie reminded, shuddering at the very prospect of twelve years surrounded by dementors. “Don’t beat yourself up, love. Sometimes there are days when your brain just doesn’t cooperate. Not your fault.” He wriggled closer, watching for any sign that he might not be welcome, but Sirius melted into him without hesitation. Charlie kissed him, long and languid.

“You shouldn’t have to take care of me all the time,” Sirius sighed against his lips, and Charlie’s heart ached for the man.

“I’m gonna spend my whole fucking life convincing you that spending time with you is never an obligation,” he decided, “even on your bad days. Taking care of each other is what couples do.” He grinned playfully. “Wait til I get burned from shoulder to knee by some dragon and I’m asking you to put ointment on my arse three times a day.”

Sirius snorted. “I still feel like I’m wasting your time,” he said in a heartbreakingly whisper. Charlie kissed him again.

“I’m exactly where I want to be, sweetheart.” It might not be what he’d expected for his life, back when he was eighteen, but he couldn’t imagine being happier with anyone than he was with Sirius. “Now, how about we round off this day with a long, hot bath?” He let his grin turn sultry, blue eyes dancing. “Little bit of warm, wet and naked sounds like a perfect evening to me. Maybe work on some other definitions of bliss,” he added with a wink, hoping he wasn't pushing too far. Sirius didn't always want sex on Cold days, but sometimes...

Sirius' eyes lit up, and he arched up against Charlie's side. "Perfect," he agreed, hand coming up to cradle Charlie's jaw, bringing him down into a kiss. "So fucking perfect."

It was, Charlie thought. It really, really was.

.-.-.-.

Draco's shoulders ached, but his jaw was clenched indignantly as he dragged himself up off the floor.

Severus had beaten him, again.

"Better," his godfather said curtly, and Draco glared at him.

"I barely lasted two minutes."

"When Harry started, he lasted half that time," Severus returned instantly. That didn't make Draco feel better.

"When Harry started, he was thirteen," he grumbled. He should be better than this — he should be able to hold his own in a fight against a Death Eater! If even fucking Longbottom could do it—

No, that wasn't fair. Neville had improved enormously since getting a new wand. And likely the Death Eaters they faced at the Ministry weren't as exacting and punishing as Severus Snape in training mode.

But Draco should still be doing better.

"Take a break," Severus instructed. "I need to put Harry through his paces."

Across the room, Harry groaned, but Draco could see the light dancing in his boyfriend's eyes. He enjoyed this, the weirdo. He loved getting to duel, even if Severus still handed him his arse nine times out of ten.

He could last a lot longer than Draco did.

It was hard, training with someone like Harry. Years ago, Draco might have gotten unbearably jealous — the Gryffindor had power pouring off him, seeping from his every pore, eager to jump to life in a fight. He was light on his feet and quick to learn and surprisingly innovative when panicking.

But Draco couldn't be jealous, not really, not when he knew where those instincts had been born.

But it was frustrating. He had insisted on joining Harry's training so he could protect his boyfriend — now he just felt like he was holding him back.

Knowing how explosive the duels between his godfather and his boyfriend could get, Draco decided to step out into the corridor for a minute. To his surprise, as he did so his mother was walking past. She took one look at him and frowned. “What’s the matter, darling?”

“I’m fine,” he said, immediately hating how petulant he sounded. His shoulders slumped. “I — it’s nothing. I’m just... not taking to it as quickly as I anticipated.”

“You’ve only been here a fortnight,” Narcissa reminded him. “It takes time, Dragon. Especially with Severus — you know he’ll be pushing you to your limits.”

“That’s the damned problem,” Draco muttered, “my limits are lower than they should be!”

“Only compared to Harry. Any other person your age wouldn’t last ten seconds against Severus Snape. Hell, I barely last a minute against him, when he’s truly trying.” Narcissa moved closer, patting him on the cheek. “You know he’s proud of you. And you are improving.”

“It’s not about making him proud of me!” That was part of it, yes, he couldn’t deny that — he’d sought his godfather’s approval more than his father’s, growing up, because from Severus it felt like it truly meant something. With Severus he had to earn it.

But that wasn’t what had him upset now. “I need to be better at this, for Harry,” he insisted. “If I’m going to fight by his side I need to be able to stay by his side.” Right now he felt like he’d be cut down in the first five minutes of any proper battle, and that was no use to anyone, least of all his boyfriend who was training to go up against the fucking Dark Lord.

He hated the way his mother’s face softened in something that looked an awful lot like pity. “Oh, darling,” she sighed. “Harry Potter is both a law and a standard unto himself.” Her voice was fond, and Draco’s lips twitched reluctantly. Truer words had never been spoken. “I have every confidence that, when the time comes, you will protect each other. You think I would be half as willing to let you throw yourself into battle if I didn’t think he’d keep you alive through it?”

“He shouldn’t have to, though! He’s got enough to worry about as it is!” Anger flared deep in Draco’s chest. “What if he’s so busy protecting me he doesn’t look after himself?” He had nightmares about it; the pair of them in battle, Harry turning to block a spell from hitting Draco and taking a killing curse straight to the back for it.

“You’d never let harm come to him,” his mother told him. Draco wished he could have her confidence.

He let out a frustrated sigh, running a hand through his hair. “I just—I can’t fail him,” he whispered, voice cracking. “Malfoys don’t fail.”

“But Blacks do.” Draco blinked, staring at his mother incredulously. “Blacks fail. All the time. We’re rather good at it, actually.” Her lips curved wryly. “But we get back up and we learn from our mistakes and we become better.” When her grey eyes met his, they were intent; challenging. “We make it so that we do not fail when it matters.” Both her hands came to his shoulders, holding him firmly. “You will not fail Harry when it matters. Trust me on that.” She patted his cheek once more. “You have far too much love for the boy to do that. So get back in there, face your godfather, and fail a thousand more times at his wand now, so you will not fail at someone else’s later.”

“I—“ Draco swallowed thickly. “What if it’s still not enough?” What if even his best couldn’t keep Harry safe?

“Then that is the way the world must be,” Narcissa replied without hesitation. “We cannot control everything, my darling. We can only control ourselves. And you certainly can’t control Harry Potter.” She smirked at him. “Your father only taught you that Malfoys don’t fail because he never dared try anything he couldn’t immediately succeed at. You’re a Black, darling; you’re better than that.”

Then she kissed him on the cheek, and stepped back. “Do you see, now?”

A pause, and then Draco nodded. “I do. Thank you.”

His mother smiled, nudging him back towards the door, and went on her way. Draco reached for the handle, determination burning through his blood.

He would be better.

.-.-.-.-.

Longbottom manor was huge.

Ginny’s hands clenched anxiously around the handles of her bag as she stood in the elaborate entrance hall, staring at the grand curving staircase in front of her. “Ginny! You made it!”

She turned, unable to help the smile that flooded her face at the sight of her boyfriend. He was a little windswept, a faint smudge of dirt on his cheek — he’d been out with his plants again, most likely. “Sorry, I lost track of time,” he admitted sheepishly, leaning down to kiss her. Ginny relaxed into the kiss, then tensed, pulling back.

“Where’s your gran?” she asked in alarm, eyes darting around as if the woman would pop out of nowhere, vulture hat and all. Neville just laughed.

“She’s off playing cards with your Aunt Muriel,” he explained. “She’ll be back for dinner, don’t worry. Oh.” He glanced down. “Posy!” A house elf appeared suddenly, wearing a pretty pale blue dress. “Posy, this is Ginny. Would you take her bag to her room for me, please?”

“Of course, Master Neville!” the elf chirped happily, and Ginny awkwardly set the bag down for the elf to take.

She’d never visited anyone who had a house elf, before. Sometimes she forgot just how old-money pureblood Neville was.

The elf vanished with her bag, and Neville beamed at her, holding out a hand. “Come on, I’ll show you around.”

It was just Neville, she reminded herself. Even as he led her around a house that was bigger and grander than anything she'd seen before in her life.

Just Neville — her shy, sweet, slightly clumsy but utterly endearing boyfriend. So what if his family was rich as hell? She was best friends with Harry Potter, she should be used to it by now.

"I thought Susan and her aunt were staying here, too?" she asked curiously as Neville showed her down a corridor that was nothing but guest bedrooms. They hadn't seen a single soul yet.

"Oh, they are. Amelia's at work, and Susan is... around, somewhere." Neville's face turned mischievous. "Theo's visiting today."

Ginny smirked. "Ohh." They probably wouldn't see either of them until dinner, then.

They went up one more flight of stairs to see a beautifully decorating drawing room, and then Neville shrugged. "Honestly, that's about everything interesting inside. Would you, uh— do you want to see the gardens? I can show you my greenhouses?"

His face lit up so earnestly, Ginny swallowed the crack she'd been about to make about showing her his bedroom. "I'd love to."

They went outside, and finally Ginny's nerves began to fade — this was the Neville she knew, the boy she had fallen for. Chatting a mile a minute about plants, delight in his eyes as he showed her into one of the greenhouses; which was clearly under some hefty expansion charms, because it stretched on seemingly forever. "I've got some cobra lilies growing over there," he told her, gesturing broadly. "And the other week I managed to find some wild deadnettle seeds, but I've never worked with any of those before — they're really rare — so I'm not completely sure if they'll thrive in this section, but the books said they like drier climates, so if it doesn't work out I'll move them further along, and—"

Ginny kissed him, cutting him off mid-sentence, and after a startled moment he kissed back, his hand coming up to cup her cheek. Warmth flooded Ginny's body, and it finally began to sink in — she was staying at her boyfriend's house for a whole week.

She got Neville to herself — mostly — for seven full days.

When they broke the kiss, her arms were around his neck, and his hazel eyes were bright, his cheeks a little flushed. "What was that for?" he asked, smiling. Ginny grinned back.

"Just happy to see you, is all."

His smile grew wider, and he tucked a lock of bright red hair behind her ear. "I'm happy to see you, too." He kissed her again, more chastely. "I'm really glad your parents agreed to let you come stay."

"I'm pretty sure Mum was worried I might murder Ron and Hermione if I didn't get a break," Ginny joked, making Neville snicker. Hermione had only been at the Burrow for about a week, but already the pair were doing Ginny's head in; between their awkward not-flirting, their intense bickering, and Hermione's determination to be friends with Ginny again — in a thinly veiled attempt to get back in Harry's good graces — Ginny would have run away to Longbottom Manor even if her parents had said no.

"Well, while I can't officially condone murder, I'll encourage anything that lets me see you more," Neville said, and it could have been a joke but his voice was so incredibly fond it made Ginny's breath catch. "There's not much to do here, honestly — we've got space for quidditch, but neither Susan nor I fly — but I'll try not to make you spend all week in the greenhouse."

"I don't mind," Ginny insisted. She wasn't brilliant at Herbology — constantly got confused with all the specific needs and variations of magical plants — but she'd been helping her mum with the family vegetable garden since Charlie started Hogwarts, in some capacity or another; the two of them were the only Weasley siblings with enough patience for it. Percy had patience, too, but he got upset at the feel of wet dirt on his skin.

"Still, I don't want to bore you."

"It's not boring." Ginny smiled at him. "I like watching you with your plants; they make you happy. Besides," she added, gaze dancing with mischief, "it's sexy when you get all knowledgable and competent like that." Her hand rested lightly on his chest, and she could feel his pulse pick up as he blushed.

"Oh." His smile turned a little goofy. "I— really?"

"Very sexy," Ginny confirmed, stepping in closer. "Not that I came here to spend a week perving on you while you garden, or anything. But, y'know. If the opportunity's there." She winked, giggling when he blushed even brighter. Merlin, it was fun riling him up.

"I wouldn't mind," he said, stuttering ever so slightly. "If— if you did want to perv on me, I mean."

Not the smoothest of lines, but Ginny would take it — Neville was still pretty new to flirting, bless him. Like with most things, he lost his nerve as soon as he started overthinking it; he could be smooth as anything when he wasn't even trying, sometimes knocking the breath right from Ginny with his words.

But right now, even with the fumbling attempt, Ginny could feel her blood rushing through her. It hit her then that they were entirely alone in the greenhouses — the only other two people in the house were occupied with each other, and the adult supervision wouldn't be back for hours.

Even at Hogwarts, sneaking around in alcoves and abandoned classrooms, they were never truly that alone.

A thrill ran down her spine, her hand trailing down Neville's chest. "Seems a bit unfair if I'm the one doing all the perving," she drawled lightly. "And it'd be a shame to waste time just looking."

Her fingers slipped beneath the hem of his t-shirt, sliding up the swell of his stomach, and he sucked in a sharp breath.

They hadn't gone very far, in the few weeks they'd been together at Hogwarts. Between exams and everything else, there hadn't been much time for it — and Neville had never so much as kissed a girl before her, was nervous and tentative and so very proper. It took a week for her to get him to stop asking permission every time he kissed her. But the few times he had slipped a hand beneath her school shirt, or trailed kisses down her neck, it lit her up in a way that anything she'd done with Michael had never even come close to.

"Is there a bench here, or anything?" she asked, suddenly feeling a little weak in the knees. Neville's large hand settled on the curve of her waist, directing her over to a simple wooden bench nearby. He sat down, and Ginny sat beside him, legs pressed close together as sparks pulsed deep in her belly. She happily went back to kissing him, her hand sneaking under his shirt once more to slide up his broad back.

Neville was one of those kids that had puberty hit them like the Hogwarts Express; he'd come a very long way from the round-faced, slightly buck-toothed boy she remembered from her earlier Hogwarts years. Even in the few weeks since she'd seen him last, he'd grown an inch or so and lost more of the baby fat from his cheeks. And his time working with his plants had built some muscle across his shoulders, helped by his work with the HA in the last year. There was still more softness to his body than she knew he was comfortable with, at his waist and thighs and chest, but Ginny liked that about him. Knew she'd like it a lot more, if she ever got him brave enough to take his shirt off in front of her.

He was turning into a handsome man, and Ginny knew she'd have some jealousy to deal with once they got back to Hogwarts.

But inside, he was still the shy, earnest, clumsy boy who had been so very sweet to her at the Yule Ball, and stolen her heart without either of them realising.

Slowly, tentatively, his hand moved from her waist, down to her knee. Ginny's breath hitched, and he froze. "No, keep going," she urged, lips moving to his jaw.

His hand moved again, sliding under the hem of her skirt, strong fingers wrapping ever so tenderly around her thigh. His touch was like lightning straight to her core, and Ginny hummed in encouragement, gripping at his shoulder beneath his shirt. "You can keep going," she breathed, pulling back a little to meet his wide-eyed gaze.

"I— out here? Are you sure?"

"Who's going to find us?" Ginny pointed out, voice growing husky with lust.

"O-okay."

"Only if you want to," Ginny said — she didn't want to push him, didn't want to make him uncomfortable, but Merlin if she didn't get some kind of touch down there soon she might explode. "I didn't actually mean to jump you as soon as I got here," she added, a little sheepish. Neville huffed out a laugh, his eyes darkened.

“If you hadn’t, I would have,” he said boldly. “Merlin, Ginny… can I—“

He didn’t finish his sentence, but the next thing Ginny knew she was being lifted onto his lap, straddling him with her knees on the bench. A gasp ripped from her throat at the action; the bulge in his trousers was pressing right up against her damp underwear. “Fuck,” she breathed, eyes fluttering shut.

“Good?”

“So good.” Ginny rocked down against him, and both of them moaned.

“Oh, God,” Neville yelped softly, his hands fisting tight in the fabric of her skirt. “I want…”

“Yes.” Whatever it was, Ginny wanted it too. One of her hands cupped the back of his head, and as his tongue curled around hers, his fingers moved back to her thigh, finally moving higher.

“Tell me if—I don’t want to hurt you,” he breathed, but Ginny could hardly comprehend the words as his fingers slipped beneath her underwear and brushed against her most sensitive parts, sinking into the wetness he found there. She gasped in pleasure, pressing down into the touch.

“I—oh, Nev, I—little higher, yes, there.” His touch was tentative at first, but her words seemed to spur him on, and he took direction like a champ, fingers wringing pleasure from her, adjusting speed and angle as she aided him along the way. Ginny tried to reciprocate, her hand moving towards the hardness in his jeans, but he batted it away. “Let me focus on you,” he said breathlessly, and how could she say no to that?

Her orgasm hit hard — harder than she’d ever had before, a loud moan pouring from her throat as pleasure shuddered white-hot through her body. Neville froze, holding her through it, and when she slumped against him he let out a long, ragged breath. “Merlin,” he murmured, awed, as he slid his fingers out of her, hand resting on her thigh once more. “Did I — did I do it right?”

A tiny giggle bubbled from Ginny’s lips, and she yanked him down into a deep, messy kiss. “You did it very, very right,” she assured him, still riding the high of her orgasm. “Fuck. Wasn’t expecting that.” She’d thought it would take all week to persuade Neville to touch her like that.

“I—me neither.” Neville laughed quietly, looking amazed at himself. “I’ve been thinking about that for ages.”

“Me too.” But good Godric, that had been better than her imagination. She could hardly envision how good it might be with a bit of practice, once they really got to know each other. “I—I’m on the potion,” she blurted, and then immediately flushed as red as her hair. Way to sound like a sex-fiend! “Not that I’m expecting anything. We don’t have to, y’know, do anything. I just — Fred brews it for Angelina and he started doing a double batch last year for me too—“ She realised where that was leading and swerved abruptly, not wanting to mention her ex-boyfriend, not now she finally had Neville in her arms, “—but he taught me how to brew it, so there's no pressure for this week or anything, I honestly wasn't expecting—" He cut her off with a kiss, and when he pulled back he was smiling.

"You ramble worse than I do, sometimes," he teased playfully. "I—I know what you mean. There's no rush. We'll just go at our own pace, do what feels right. But... it's good to know that—that if things do get there, we're prepared. For whenever we want to take that step."

"Right." Ginny was glad he didn't take it the wrong way — she hadn't even meant it like that, not really, but Fred had made sure when she started seeing Michael to explain that there were always risks even if you thought you were doing something in a way that wouldn't lead to pregnancy, and it was better to be safe than sorry. So even though she and Michael had never actually had sex, she was in the habit of taking the potion every month, just in case.

She shifted a little in his lap, and he let out a choked-off gasp as she brushed up against his still-hard length. A pulse of renewed interest sparked within her, surprising her with its force; she hadn't expected to be ready to go again so soon.

She should have, really. It was Neville; she'd never get enough of him.

With all her Gryffindor courage, she kissed him hard, leaving him dazed. "It's my turn, now," she whispered, tracing the line of his jaw with her tongue, sucking a kiss against his throat. "Let me show you what else I've been thinking about."

She slid languidly from his lap, body humming with arousal, down onto her knees on the paving stones. Neville's spine went rigid, and she saw his cock twitch in his trousers.

"Are you sure?" he asked, and she grinned, carefully unzipping his fly.

"I want to," she insisted, adjusting his underwear to reveal his cock — while her other hand moved beneath her own skirt, where the aftershocks were turning just the right side of pleasurable. She leaned forward, taking him in her mouth, stroking herself as his hips bucked tightly.

They had a whole week together, Ginny knew; there was no need to rush things. But there was also no reason they couldn't start out strong.

.

Cassius loved the mornings when Ollie didn't have early quidditch practice.

Mostly because his boyfriend woke up early anyway, and the two of them could have slow, lazy sex, bodies still lax and warm from sleep. It was even better on weekends, when Cassius didn't have to go to work either.

Those were the days that felt like a dream, like a fulfilment of every fantasy Cassius had dared let himself have at Hogwarts — him and Oliver, living together and done with school, their time spent fucking and laughing and bickering about whose turn it was to do the dishes, reading together on the sofa, a hundred other little domestic things that Cassius didn't think he'd ever truly get to have. But he did — he owned this flat, and Oliver was here, and even though it was a secret from his family and almost everyone in his life, it was more than he'd ever hoped for.

Oliver's hand trailed down to his backside, still a little sticky with lube, both of them too sated and lazy to do a Cleaning charm. "Good morning, gorgeous," he drawled, that thick Scottish burr rumbling in his chest. "It's going to be a good day."

"Is it, now?" Cassius asked, rolling over to look up at his partner, raising one dark eyebrow. "What makes you say that?"

"Well it started fabulously," Oliver reasoned in a husky whisper, sea-green eyes darkening. "And I'm in the mood to cook a proper breakfast. Then I thought we could go back to bed."

"Hmm, interesting suggestion," Cassius murmured, tingles running down his spine as Oliver leaned over him, those broad shoulders blocking out the light from the window above them. "I could be persuaded, I suppose." He arched up, biting lightly at one of Ollie's nipples in a way that made the older man gasp; a sound that quickly turned into a moan as Cassius' tongue soothed the sensitive flesh.

"Mm, Cass," Ollie groaned. "Food first. Then more sex."

Cassius gave an exaggerated huff, but lay back against the pillows, letting Oliver sit up properly. "By all means, go start cooking," he insisted lazily. He drew one leg up, setting his foot flat on the mattress, giving Oliver a perfect view as he reached down to stroke his own cock. "I'll be here. Entertaining myself."

"Fucking insatiable," Oliver growled, eyes lighting up as he crowded Cassius against the bed, pinning him down. Cassius smirked in triumph, leaning up to nip his lover's pouting lip.

And then a hand pounded on the door, and both of them froze.

Cassius' arousal died quickly, replaced by overwhelming fear — who the fuck would be knocking for them so early in the morning?

Knocking for him, rather. Only a handful of people even knew Oliver lived there.

"Fuck," he whispered vehemently, scrambling to his feet, almost knocking Ollie off the bed in the process. "Hide!"

As he summoned some clothes, he looked around the flat, frantically trying to figure out if there was anything that might give them away. Some quidditch pads in the corner — Cassius could claim those were his, his uncle wouldn't know the difference — a book on the coffee table about Puddlemere, a pair of jeans that were definitely too big to be Cassius' on the floor. He kicked them hastily under the bed, pulling on a t-shirt and some trousers, and when he turned around Oliver was under a Disillusionment charm, nowhere to be seen. Cassius hoped he'd moved somewhere out of the way — it was a studio flat, there weren't many places to hide if spells started flinging.

The knock on the door sounded again, and Cassius hurried to answer it.

It wasn't his uncle. "Hi. Cassius Warrington?" He nodded blankly, staring at the purple-haired auror on his doorstep. "Right. I'm Auror Tonks." He tensed, wondering what sort of trouble he'd been accused of. "I'm a friend of Harry's." That made him blink, and he pushed past his panic to really take a look at her — she didn't look like she was expecting a fight.

She looked like she was about to deliver bad news, actually. The same sort of face his brother had worn when he'd told Cassius their parents were dead.

Dread sank like a stone in his gut. "Oh. Do you— do you want to come in?"

The auror nodded, and he stepped back, letting her enter the flat. "Is— is something wrong with Harry?" Fear gripped him tight once more— had the idiot Gryffindor done something foolish? He shouldn't have, not with Draco there to stop him being daft; but even he knew that Potter was a tricky little bastard when he thought there was something he needed to do.

"Oh, no, Harry's fine," Tonks assured quickly, offering a hesitant smile. "I'm here about something else. I— do you want to sit down?"

"I'd rather stand, actually." Cassius folded his arms over his chest, his right hand ready to draw his wand. He had no idea what this was about — it didn't seem like this auror meant trouble, but she could be lying about knowing Harry.

Then again, how would she know to say that, unless she knew the truth?

"It's about your family," Tonks began. Cassius' shoulders tensed. Had he been accused of something? "There was a Death Eater raid on a couple of muggleborn families last night. I... there's no easy way to say this, Mr Warrington. Thaddeus and Corvus Warrington have been arrested as Death Eaters, and Titus Yaxley was killed in the fight."

Cassius stared.

He felt like he was underwater, the auror's words distorted as they echoed around his brain. His uncle and cousin had been arrested. His other cousin was... dead.

"Oh," he said lamely, struggling to find any other words. How was he supposed to react? Should he look sad? Angry? All he felt was... hollow.

"I know this is a bit of a shock, Mr Warrington—"

Cassius snorted. "Hardly," he muttered, bitterness colouring his tone, "I always told them they'd end up in Azkaban one of these days." He'd always said it like a joke, but he'd meant it in his heart, hoped that some day they might get caught and he would be free.

That day had arrived, it seemed.

What the hell did he do now?

"It's expected that both your uncle and cousin will serve life in Azkaban for their crimes," Auror Tonks explained, her words even and professional, though her grey eyes were sympathetic. Cassius remembered her, now — she was the daughter of the disowned Black sister. Recently re-instated, if he recalled correctly.

She probably was a friend of Harry's then.

"Do I need to do anything? Testify, or... claim the body?" His voice cracked, just a little. Tonks shook her head.

"No; Mr Yaxley's father is being notified as we speak, and we expect him to deal with those affairs. And... testimony isn't needed, not after what they were caught doing." There was a look of disgust in the auror's eyes, and Cassius grimaced. He didn't want to know. "I'm just here to inform you; you're Lord Warrington's heir, according to our records... Minister Scrimgeour wants a quick trial — I'm afraid there won't be time for you to see your uncle or cousin before they're sentenced and transferred. It'll all be done by Monday." Her gaze grew pointed. "So if there's any family business you need to attend to, once that happens..."

She trailed off, and Cassius' chest tightened.

Family business. Heir.

As soon as his uncle was sentenced, he could become Lord Warrington.

"I— thank you, Auror Tonks, for letting me know." He cleared his throat, trying to regain some kind of composure, even as the gathering swell of emotion inside him clawed its way up his chest. "I don't want to see them. Or give them a message. Or— or anything." He could tell them to rot in hell, but that was hardly polite to pass through a member of law enforcement.

"Good to know." Auror Tonks nodded decisively. "I'll leave you to your weekend, then, Mr Warrington. I'm sorry for disturbing you." She headed for the door, and paused on the threshold, concern colouring her gaze. "I— you should contact someone. If you can. And stay safe." She frowned slightly. "You-Know-Who won't like losing that kind of power. Be careful. You know where you can go, if you need help?"

Cassius gave a jerky nod. "Harry has it covered." He didn't care if he was giving away too much — this auror was practically Harry's cousin, and she certainly didn't seem surprised to hear it.

"Good." She nodded again. "I'll see myself out."

She did, and as soon as the door shut behind her, there was a flicker of magic and Oliver appeared at Cassius' side, his face wary. "Cass, love?" he broached tentatively, one hand coming to rest on Cassius' back. "Are you... okay?"

Cassius sucked in a deep breath. And then another. And another. "I—" He shook his head, and suddenly he was laughing. Laughing and crying all at once, and then he was swept up in Oliver's wonderful, muscular arms, cradled against his big chest, and Cassius wept.

He wasn't sure why. He wasn't sad about Titus' death, or the fates of his uncle and Corvus. They deserved everything they got and more, as far as he was concerned. They weren't tears of sadness — they were tears of relief.

As soon as they were sentenced, that would be it. All political standing, all titles and boons, everything would be stripped away, including Uncle Thaddeus' position as Lord Warrington. Cassius could walk into the Wizengamot and claim his rightful seat, and no one would be able to stop him. The Dark Lord could come after him, could try and get him to accept the Mark, but Cassius no longer had to risk being disinherited — there was only his brother and his Uncle Atticus left, and neither of them had the Warrington family magic in them; there was nothing they could do. He might have to run, yes — he had not technically pledged to the Dark Lord, but he had been to enough meetings that he wouldn't be allowed to just leave — but Harry had offered sanctuary, and even if he ran he would still have access to his family magics and vaults.

He was free.

"I've got you, love," Oliver murmured, shuffling them over to the bed, still rumpled from their earlier activities — it felt like a lifetime ago, now. "Let it out, there you go. I've got you. You're alright. They can't hurt you any more, my love. Not now."

The Scotsman's words were a balm to Cassius' soul, his heart swelling with love. For the first time in his life, Cassius could look ahead, could imagine a future that didn't make him want to slit his own wrists in despair. A future where he and Oliver could stay together, could go public, could be happy.

"Marry me," he rasped, red-rimmed eyes meeting bewildered green. "Marry me, Oliver Wood."

A heartbeat, then a grin crept across Ollie's face, blinding in its intensity. Merlin, Cassius wanted to see him smile like that forever. "You're on, Warrington," the Gryffindor agreed, knocking him flat to the mattress in a bear hug. "Yes, I'll fucking marry you. I've only been asking for months!"

Cassius laughed, heart soaring. "But you never gave me a ring," he teased, and Oliver narrowed his gaze.

"Neither have you."

"Give me a second." Cassius unholstered his wand, and summoned the little box from where he'd hidden it far under the bed. It zoomed into his hand, and Cassius flicked it open, revealing the gold Celtic knot band nestled on a little velvet cushion. Oliver's jaw dropped.

"Oh, you crafty wee bastard," he breathed, and Cassius laughed as he slipped the ring onto Oliver's finger with trembling hands. Oliver kissed him hard, smiling against Cassius' mouth. "I love you."

Cassius' chest hurt from the force of his joy, his love for the man in front of him, and he kissed him again, fingers tingling from how fucking happy he was right at that moment.

Oliver was right. It was going to be an excellent day.

.-.-.-

Her shoulders slumped the moment she stepped through the floo, her fingers going to the buttons at the collar of her robe. The fire whooshed behind her as Kingsley stepped out, his dark eyes knowing. “Come here,” he urged, opening his arms. Tonks sighed, tucking herself against his chest, burying her face in his grey auror robe. “Proudfoot is a prick.”

“I hate him so much,” she agreed in frustration, arms winding around Kingsley’s hips. “I can’t believe Scrimgeour gave the auror office to him.”

The job should have been Kingsley’s, and they all knew it. Proudfoot might not be Marked but he was a Death Eater in every other aspect, and it amazed and horrified her that Scrimgeour had named him the new Head Auror. Could the man not see the kind of person he was promoting?

She knew the answer to that — no, he couldn’t, because Scrimgeour and Proudfoot had been friends for years, and as long as Proudfoot kept his blood supremacist bullshit just on the right side of socially acceptable, and continued to bring in results, Scrimgeour would forgive just about anything else.

“I just hate the way he talks to me! Condescending twat.” She scowled, looking up into Kingsley’s sympathetic gaze. “I swear, if he calls me Miss Tonks one more time, I’m cursing his dick off. I’m an auror, damn it!” She sighed, the fight draining from her, just replaced with the ever-familiar exhaustion of fighting a fight she knew she wouldn’t win. “Half the reason I joined the aurors was so people would stop calling me ‘Miss’.” Auror was a gender-neutral title, and she had fucking earned it, and she hated how dismissive Proudfoot was but more than that she hated how that word made her skin crawl like there were ants in her veins.

“Do you need to change?” Kingsley asked, but Tonks shook her head. More than once, she’d come home from work and immediately taken masculine form like her female body was going to burst into flames if she didn’t shed it soon. But it wasn’t one of those days. She was fine how she was — it was the way other people perceived her that made her mad, but she knew that would take a damned long time to change.

Still, she undid the buttons of her robe and stripped it off, letting it drop to the floor. Then she reached behind her back, underneath her shirt, and unhooked her bra, letting out a sigh of relief as she wriggled her way out of the hellish contraption. Kingsley shed his own robe much more gracefully, picking up hers and sending them both into the bedroom with a flick of his wand. “Are you hungry?”

“Not yet.” She was too angry to be hungry, too ready to claw off her own skin. Kingsley seemed to recognise the look in her eyes, and with another spell the record player was on, the Weird Sisters filling their flat; her favourite song.

“Dance it out,” he told her, smiling fondly. “I’m going to make sandwiches.”

He disappeared into the kitchen, and Tonks turned the volume up, belting out the lyrics as she danced around the living room, waving her arms and shaking her hips. Her hair cycled through a dozen colours as she purged the negative emotions, kicking off the tight auror-regulation trousers and ripping open the front of her button-up. She kept dancing through the first song, and the second, and by the third she felt somewhat human again. When she spun around at the end of it, she saw Kingsley leaning in the doorway, watching her with two plates in his hands and so much love in his eyes it hit like a punch to the gut. “You’re beautiful,” he told her, as she stood there in her pants and socks and an open shirt, her skin flushed and hair in disarray from her dancing. There was total honesty in his voice — and Tonks knew that he’d say that no matter what shape she morphed her body into. “Feel better?”

He approached, offering one of the plates with a sandwich on it, and she took it gratefully. “Much. Thanks.” A wave of her hand had the volume of the record turned down to a much more reasonable level. They collapsed together on the sofa, Kingsley’s feet propped up on the coffee table while Tonks tucked her legs underneath her. He was still in his full uniform minus the robe; the only concession to comfort he’d made was undoing the top button of his shirt, and rolling his sleeves to his elbows. Tonks trailed her fingers over the corded muscle of his forearm, tracing the line of the tattoo half-hidden against his dark skin.

The sandwich was delicious, and once her belly was full Tonks could finally let go of that last little bit of anger simmering inside her. “At least we’ll only have to deal with Proudfoot for a year or so.”

Kingsley raised an amused eyebrow. “So convinced he’ll be too incompetent to keep the position?”

“Convinced Harry won’t let Scrimgeour stay Minister that long,” she corrected. “Soon as he offs You-Know-Who, we’ll get someone competent instead. Someone who understands that the Head Auror position has had your name on it for years.”

His lips twitched. “If I become Head Auror, our relationship will be even more against the rules than it is now,” he pointed out, and Tonks just smirked.

“Rules, schmules,” she said, waving a hand dismissively.

“That’s not the correct attitude for an officer of the law, Auror Tonks,” he said, his voice serious even when his eyes were laughing, though Tonks doubted many people would notice it. They always thought he was so severe, so stern; they couldn’t see his wicked sense of humour. It just made it all the more precious, to Tonks.

“The auror department knew what I was like when they hired me,” she teased, “and if you gave a fuck about those rules you’d never have agreed to go on a date with me.”

“You’re surprisingly persuasive,” he remarked, and she laughed.

“Persistent, more like.” She’d spent at least eight months making a fool of herself trying to make him laugh before she’d gathered the courage to ask him out.

“Some rules are worth breaking,” he declared, pressing a kiss to the top of her head. Happiness fizzed in her belly, and she leaned against him, setting aside her empty plate. Her shirt opened wider, and Tonks didn’t miss the way Kingsley’s eyes trailed over her pale stomach, up the line of her sternum.

“If Proudfoot ends up with frogspawn in his desk drawers tomorrow, you’ll give me an alibi, right?” she asked, fluttering her eyelashes hopefully. He chuckled, the low baritone rumble sending electricity down Tonks’ spine.

“You’re good enough not to need an alibi,” he told her. “But if he comes after you, I’ll back you up.” He slung an arm around her, hand resting at the bottom of her ribs. “You’re not the only one who hates him, after all.”

That was true; the only aurors who didn’t hate Proudfoot were the ones who were also Death Eaters. “Maybe the twins will give me something good to get him with,” she mused, mentally going over what she knew of the shop’s stock. There was bound to be something Proudfoot wouldn’t immediately pin on her. Something with a time delay... Fred and George wouldn’t disappoint.

“You can go over and see them on Tuesday. Just don’t spend the whole day.” Kingsley’s eyes darkened, and Tonks’ skin prickled. “It’s rare we both have the same day off. We should make the most of it.”

Arousal chased through her veins, but on top of that was a sliver of guilt. “I... I promised Harry I’d go over to the house on Tuesday, actually. He wants to test his skills against an auror, see how he does.”

The playful light in Kingsley’s eyes dimmed, and the guilt grew bigger. “That’ll be good for him,” the senior auror remarked. “Though after watching the lad at the Ministry I’d say you better watch your step.”

Tonks snorted; that was an understatement. Watching Harry duel Lucius Malfoy had been a real eye-opener. “I keep telling him I’m not the auror he needs to be testing himself against,” she agreed. Then she bit her lip, anxiety curling tight. “I... I want to bring you, to the house,” she confessed, like it was some sort of deep, dark secret. “I just... the way that Mum talks about it, you have to understand... it’s the family summer home.” It sounded silly, put like that. But it was one of the two Black properties that wasn’t even on the Gringotts property register; as far as the world was concerned, it didn’t exist. Only those who were of the Black family, or as good as, were invited there. Sirius was pushing it a little having Remus there, but those two were brothers in everything but blood.

He was certainly pushing it moving Charlie in, but she knew her best friend; he’d been waiting half his life for someone to get domestic with, and from what Remus had told her Sirius was exactly the same, for all his teenage tom-calling around. Now they’d found each other, she was certain there would be wedding bells somewhere down the line.

That was what it meant, to invite someone to the family summer home. It was an agreement that they were welcome in the Black family — and an expectation that they would always be welcome in the Black family, would never betray those secrets.

"I know, Tonks," Kingsley assured her; he didn't seem remotely offended, and somehow that was worse, like he didn't expect her to want him there.

"No, it's not that," she said, though he hadn't even said anything, really. She groaned quietly as she tried to figure out how to articulate herself properly — but the only way to really do that was to just throw her entire heart on the line.

She looked up at Kingsley's patient, gorgeous face, and suddenly it seemed daft to even think about being worried. He had never batted an eyelash at anything else she'd emotionally-vomited at him in their relationship. Why would this be any different?

"Letting you come to the summer home, it's... even I didn't know about it until last Christmas — Mum didn't tell me because even after she was disowned from the Black family, it was still a Black family secret. She didn't consider her own child part of the Black family enough to tell me. It's the most secure place we have in the entire world, precisely because the only people who know how to find it are people who would rather die than give up its location — than betray the Black family like that. Inviting anyone who isn't blood... it's practically declaring intent to marry, in the eyes of the rest of my family. It's a big deal. And I don't want to put that kind of pressure on you just because my family is ancient and weird and secretive."

It all blurted out in one rushed mess, but she could see Kingsley taking in every word, thinking it over with that ever-present patience, that eternal steadiness that Tonks loved so much. Her heart pounded furiously in her chest as she waited for some kind of a response. Eventually, he took her hand, bringing it up to his lips. "That kind of commitment doesn't scare me, Tonks."

She stilled. "I— really?"

His deep brown eyes met hers, unflinching. "Amelia has promised me her job heading the DMLE, if she makes Minister after the war," he said, and she blinked, perplexed — what did that have to do with anything? "If I take that job, I'll no longer be your superior; not in any chain-of-command way that matters." His lips curved in a tiny, bashful smile. "I had hoped, once it was no longer putting either of our jobs at risk... well, let's just say that declaring intent to marry is not a problem for me. Not with you."

"Oh." Tonks was wide-eyed, turning to face him properly. She felt ridiculous, sat there in her shirt and pants while he was fully dressed, and he'd basically just proposed. "But— but I'm a mess," she blurted. "I'm clumsy and I talk too much and I have too many opinions about muggle music and I can't even stick to one bloody gender and you're—" He was Lord Kingsley Shacklebolt, accomplished and proud and capable in every situation he faced; never stuttering, never tripping over his own feet, never hasty or quick-tempered or anything less than incredible; the kind of man who deserved a wife just as capable and calm and able to be an actual wife, not like Tonks.

"I'm...?" Kingsley raised an eyebrow expectantly, kissing her hand again. "If the end of that sentence is anything other than 'completely in love with you', it's irrelevant. Your clumsiness is endearing, and I love listening to you talk because I spend far too much in my own head, and yes you might have questionable muggle music taste but my own is equally suspect. And if I cared for even one second about gender I'd be dating someone else." He frowned all of a sudden, looking concerned. "Have I ever made you feel like your gender is a problem for me?"

"What? No, I—" Tonks stopped herself, because that was the thing, the thing she'd entirely missed — she was so used to her partners assuming she would grow out of it and settle down one way or the other that she'd just expected Kingsley felt the same, deep down, just like everyone else in the world. Except he didn't, he hadn't, not ever. From the very first time she'd admitted to him that on some days she felt like being female was like drowning, that she hated the way the rest of the world looked at her, he had been supportive. He had told her to be however she felt comfortable, he had switched pronouns when she asked without a second of hesitation, he had touched her male body with the same level of care and reverence and passion that he touched her female body with, and her body on all the days in-between when she wasn't sure what she wanted to be called but she knew what felt wrong, what made her skin itch and her brain feel like someone was drilling a hole in her skull with every continued use of Miss and Nymphadora and woman.

And Kingsley was sat there, now, waiting as patiently as always for her to figure out something that had been right in front of her face the whole bloody time. He didn't even have the grace to look smug about it.

"You really just get it, don't you?" she breathed in wonder, and he shrugged.

"As much as I can, I hope, when I'm not in your head myself." That was fair; half the time, Tonks wasn't even sure she properly 'got it', not in a way that seemed to make sense to the rest of the world. "And if you ever decide you're comfortable presenting as anything other than female outside of your safe spaces, I'll be right with you." He smirked, eyes lighting up. "Especially if I'm in a position to fire pricks like Proudfoot for the way they treat you."

Tonks had never thought she'd be that brave, make those kinds of waves, but with Kingsley at her side she might just manage it.

"So... do you want to come to the summer house with me on Tuesday?" she asked hopefully, and Kingsley cracked a wide, genuine smile, brighter than probably anyone but Tonks had ever seen.

"I would love to," he confirmed, and the weight of their words seemed so much more, now they both knew for sure what it truly meant. "I would also," he continued, dropping his voice, brown eyes hot as they met Tonks', "very much love to take you into our bedroom, right now, and have you fuck me." He spoke so plainly, as always, and arousal pulsed through Tonks just at that low, sexy rumble. "Your shirt has been open for the last ten minutes and I've been very good in not touching you but I only have so much restraint left in me."

Tonks looked down, and sure enough, her unbuttoned shirt was completely wide, her breasts bared and her nipples tight and perked with lust. Kingsley's hand came up, cupping one of them, and Tonks groaned softly into the touch. "Bedroom," she agreed. He stood, carrying her with him, and there was a question in his eyes as he did because some days that just made her feel so dainty and she hated it but right now all she cared about was getting Kingsley on a bed and underneath her; he could pick her up all he wanted, with those strong auror arms of his, but soon she was going to be the one pinning him down and making him scream, unravelling him from the inside out, and he would love every second of it. So she wrapped her legs around his waist, making an impatient noise, all the while wondering if Harry would hurry the fuck up a bit and kill a Dark Lord so she could get her Happily Ever After with this man. And a smaller part of her wondered how he could even be real, so perfect for her, so endlessly fucking incredible—

Then he kicked the bedroom door open, and Tonks had much more important things on her mind than the war.

.

Two blonde girls walked through the woods; one with her hands in her skirt pockets and an indulgent smile on her face as she watched the second, who drifted between the trees like her feet barely even touched the ground.

“Finding anything good, honey?” Daphne asked, watching Luna peer up into the branches of a tall oak tree. Luna hummed, then huffed, the tiniest pout of frustration on her face. Daphne resisted the urge to kiss it away.

“There’s too many wrackspurts,” Luna declared in annoyance, shaking her head, making her dangling silver earrings jingle. “Even if I could find anything here, I wouldn’t see it through this cloud.”

Daphne had been with Luna long enough now to understand most of the things she said; at least when it came to her various creatures. Wrackspurts were the annoying little buggers that clouded her Sight, filling her brain with useless buzzing when the path ahead was unclear. It wasn’t a surprise — the current state of the wizarding world could definitely be described as path unclear — but she hated when Luna had that look on her face.

“How can I make them go away?”

Luna gave her a bright smile that made Daphne’s heart flutter, and danced closer, kissing her on the cheek. “Things will clear up soon,” she assured. “It’s just difficult, right now. But maybe the blibbering humdingers will make it easier. Come on.”

That was a new one to Daphne, but she didn’t protest when Luna grabbed her by the hand and pulled her along, leading her into a small clearing. Daphne had been staying with Luna and her father for four days now, and most of that time had been spent in the woods behind the house. Luna always said her head was clearer when she could feel nature’s magic.

The clearing they stopped in was pretty; just a circle of soft grass, about fifteen feet across, but even Daphne could feel the buzz of natural magic as soon as she stepped in. Perhaps it had once been a fairy circle, or it was a ley line crossing. She wouldn’t put it past Luna to find such things.

Luna let go of her hand and strode forward happily, lifting her dress over her head without a second of hesitation and tossing it aside, dropping down to lie on the grass in nothing more than a pair of pale yellow knickers printed with tiny smiling suns. Daphne’s eyes drank in the sight eagerly, though it wasn't too unusual these days, either; Luna often went skyclad in the woods, or close to it, wanting that better connection to nature. Daphne wasn't going to argue — Luna knew natural magic far better than she did.

Regardless, she would never complain about her girlfriend getting naked in front of her.

"May I sit with you?" she asked, waiting at the edge of the grass circle. Luna blinked up at her, nodding.

"Please do. The humdingers won't harm you — they're just helping me find out what the wrackspurts are trying to hide."

Daphne approached, settling down cross-legged at Luna's side. "May I touch you?"

Luna reached out, taking one hand and lacing their fingers together. Daphne took that as silent permission, and let her other hand trace runes on Luna's skin; runes of protection, of clarity, of insight. Luna purred, arching her back like a cat in a patch of sunlight. "Oh, that feels nice."

Daphne smiled, brushing Luna's hair gently off her shoulders, the near-silver strands fanning out over the lush green grass. "This is a nice little clearing," she said quietly, gentle fingers running over Luna's brow and nose. The Ravenclaw's chest rose and fell steadily with her breath, her eyes falling shut.

"It's my favourite place in the whole forest," Luna told her. "But I can't come here too often, or the magic will change."

"Then I'm honoured you're sharing it with me," Daphne murmured. Luna cracked one eye open, affection dancing in her gaze.

"Of course, silly. My favourite person belongs in my favourite place."

Daphne couldn't help but lean down to kiss her, then; just a chaste peck, for the words she couldn't articulate. She didn't want to distract Luna from her thoughts, after all; not if she was trying to See something important.

She could feel the magic swirling around them both, pulsing gently in time with Luna's breath. Daphne almost forgot to breathe herself, so awed by the whole thing. Luna was... truly unlike any other person she'd ever met. Daphne still didn't know what had possessed her to say yes when the strange blonde asked her to Hogsmeade for Valentine's Day, but she hadn't regretted the decision — Luna might be odd, but she had a way of viewing the world that was so very jarring to Daphne's persistent cynicism, and Daphne liked that about her. Luna never expected her to change; she just offered up her own thoughts and let Daphne figure out the rest.

Luna made Daphne a better person. And she kissed like she was imparting the very secrets of the universe to Daphne's eager lips; so many people assumed that her child-like optimism made her childish in other ways, too, but Daphne could attest to that being entirely untrue. Luna felt all her emotions strongly — including passion.

Passion that nudged at Daphne now, stirring inside her, watching her girlfriend lie there on the grass like some kind of fae temptation. Daphne's hand, still drifting over Luna's skin, swooped down to stroke across her stomach. Her hand holding Daphne's tightened ever so slightly, and Daphne smirked, watching two rosebud pink nipples swell at her touch. Luna's hips canted ever so slightly, and she blinked her eyes open. "I don't think the wrackspurts are going to let me see what they're hiding," she sighed. "There are too many possibilities right now." A brief, worried frown flickered across her lips. "I hope it's not to do with Harry."

If it was regarding the uncertainty of the future, it probably was at least somewhat to do with Harry Potter. Everything else was.

"They'll show you if there's something you can warn him about," Daphne assured confidently. "Best not to worry about it too much."

"I won't." Luna smiled, letting go of Daphne's hand and lifting her arms above her head, stretching out languidly, pushing up against Daphne's other hand still on her stomach. Daphne swallowed tightly. "The magic here is so warm, do you feel it? It tickles my skin." The Ravenclaw looked up at Daphne, a flirtatious tilt to her chin. "You should feel it on your skin properly, too."

Daphne laughed softly, hand sliding up to cup Luna's breast, flicking her fingers over the nipple. "Are you giving up on Seeing, for now, then?" she asked, like she didn't already know the answer. "Because you know what'll happen if we're both naked."

Luna smiled impishly. "There's only one thing I'm interested in seeing right now," she purred, squirming in the soft grass, the flush spreading down her chest all the way to her stomach. Merlin, she was beautiful.

Daphne could look at her like this for hours — but touching was far better. She pulled her blouse over her head, feeling Luna's gaze on her, feeling the magic dance across her skin as clearly as if her girlfriend was touching her. The sensation made her gasp, and Luna giggled. "I told you," she sing-songed, as Daphne unclasped her bra, gooseflesh prickling across her arms. The Slytherin smirked, leaving her skirt on and turning her attention back to her entirely too-smug girlfriend, peeling the sunshine-print knickers down her hips, exposing the thatch of soft, pale blonde hair. "Oh, that's not fair."

Daphne settled in between Luna's knees, skirt rucked up around her, teasing fingers sliding into Luna's wet heat. "Slytherins don't play fair, honey," she drawled, crooking her fingers and making Luna gasp. As she did, the magic around them flared, and both girls jerked at the sensation.

Luna's favourite place in the forest might not have helped with her Sight, but it wouldn't be a wasted trip.

.-.-.-.

They had finally chased out their last customers, and Blaise flipped the sign on the door to show that Weasley's Wizard Wheezes was closed for the night. As he did, hands rested on his hips, and lips pressed to his neck. “Come on, we’re all locked up down here. Angie’s gone to get dinner from the little place down the street.”

Blaise leaned back against George, humming quietly. “Sounds good.” He let the redhead nudge him towards the back room, where the stairs up to the flat were hidden. He took one last look around the quiet shop, smiling to himself; it always looked a little strange, empty like this, the displays deactivated. The whole shop sleeping, ready to burst to life in the morning once more.

They passed Fred at the till, sorting the ledgers and counting up, and the twins had an entire conversation with just looks and eyebrows before George carried on upstairs, Blaise close behind.

The flat wasn’t as chaotic as one might expect from Fred and George Weasley; with the shop downstairs and the workshop in the attic, they had plenty of other avenues for their chaos. The flat was a prank-free zone, as much as it could be with those two red-headed devils. Blaise went over to pour water for both of them, while George flopped onto the sofa. “Mm, thanks, babe,” the redhead murmured, accepting the drink and shuffling over so Blaise could get comfortable beside him. George wrapped an arm around him, pulling him close. “Do you have to leave tomorrow?”

Blaise had been living with the twins for three whole weeks now, and it had been wonderful, but he had to spend at least a little time with his mother. “Sadly, I do,” he sighed, kissing George’s freckled cheek. “But I’ll come back for Harry’s birthday. And I’m taking you back to Italy when I do.” They had worked it all out; Fred and Angelina would handle the shop for four days while George came to Blaise’s house in Italy, met his mother and spent some time with him there. Blaise was very much looking forward to it, even if George’s fair skin would need a hundred Sunblock charms a day when they went to the beach.

And at Blaise’s house, there was enough privacy that they didn’t have to worry about forgetting their Silencing charms, or being walked in on at inopportune moments. Not like they did with all four of them squeezed into the two-bed flat above the shop.

The door opened, and Fred and Angelina walked in, Angelina holding a brown paper bag that smelled deliciously of curry. “Fortescue’s is closed up,” she reported, frowning slightly. “Windows have been boarded up and everything. Looks like he’s gone for the foreseeable.”

Blaise and George shared an uneasy look; it wasn’t the first shop in Diagon Alley to abandon ship, since the attack on the Ministry. “That’ll be a blow,” George murmured. “Plenty of people thought old Fortescue could weather anything.”

“The more shops that close, the more customers we’ll have to entertain ourselves,” Fred said with false bravado — Blaise could see the worry in his eyes.

He’d gotten better at reading his boyfriend’s twin, in the last three weeks. At school, it had been so hard to get time with George he had so very rarely spent time with the pair of them together, unless it was in a group situation, and then they were too busy being the Infamous Weasley Twins for Blaise to properly get to know Fred. Now, after living together, he’d seen how they were without an audience, and had plenty of conversations with just Fred while George was elsewhere. Angelina, too; he had hardly said two sentences to her before this summer.

Blaise hoped he passed muster, by now. George wouldn't keep him around for long if he didn't.

Angelina handed him a bowl of fragrant lamb curry and rice, and he grinned in thanks, sitting up a little so both he and George could have their bowls on their laps without making a mess. Fred and Angelina claimed the other sofa; the common positions the four of them found themselves in of an evening, after a long day of running the shop.

As they ate, the twins chatted about their products; what they needed to make more of, what they were considering introducing. Blaise mostly listened, quietly in awe of the things that came out of their brains. At one point, he glanced over to Angelina, raising an eyebrow pointedly. She made a face of agreement, and shook her head fondly.

"Oh, Merlin, they've got their own secret language, now, too!" Fred exclaimed, pointing at the pair of them and grinning. Angelina stuck her tongue out.

"It comes from putting up with you two," she teased.

"But you both do it so well," George said, winking at her and bumping his knee against Blaise's. "A little too well, honestly; not sure how I'm going to cope without you," he added to Blaise, pouting for extra effect.

"I'm sure you'll manage, tesoro," Blaise drawled, amused. "You will have to learn; I have two more years of school left."

"Ugh don't remind me," George groaned. "Sure I can't convince you to leave? It worked out pretty well for us."

"It is not me you have to convince, but my mother," Blaise replied, watching as a glimmer of fear flickered in those brown eyes. "Besides, not all of us can be genius inventors."

George preened at the compliment. "You can be a genius something else, though," he suggested. "Or just let me shower you with my joke shop riches so you'll never have to work a day."

Blaise laughed, shaking his head. "Caro, I have my own riches; I'll never have to work a day regardless."

"Exactly! All the more reason to ditch school." George grinned, and Blaise kissed him.

"I would be far too bored, and we both know it."

"I'd keep you plenty occupied," George drawled.

"Oi, boundaries," Fred protested with a glare. "Remember the rules."

With both couples living in the same space, the twins had developed rules about where and when innuendo was acceptable. Of course, the rules went largely ignored on both sides, but that didn't stop them sniping at each other about it.

"It's tempting, but I'm afraid I'll have to pass," Blaise mock-sighed. "You'll just have to wait until I'm graduated."

"That sounds terrible," George sighed. "Merlin only knows how Ollie and Cass handled it."

"I'm sure you and Oliver can commiserate over it all you like," Angelina placated. "Though be prepared for him to get pissy about how at least your relationship is public."

Blaise winced; from what he understood, it was a bit of a sore subject for the ex-Gryffindor keeper. Not that he blamed Cassius for it — it was just a difficult situation all around. Knowing Cassius' family, Blaise couldn't blame them for keeping things under wraps.

"I'll see you every Hogsmeade weekend," Blaise reminded, running a hand through George's fiery hair. "And we'll work out holidays." They hadn't exactly figured out things such as Yule, because George's mother currently refused to acknowledge any of the relationships her children were in, thanks to her grudge against Sirius Black. But it was a while away, so perhaps things would change.

"Maybe, but you've spoiled me after having you here for three whole weeks."

Blaise had to admit that he too wasn't looking forward to it — going back to Italy without George, or going back to Hogwarts. But they were necessary. Their relationship would survive the separation.

There was a sudden thud from upstairs, and the twins shared a slightly alarmed look. "We're... gonna go check on that," Fred declared, jumping up from the sofa and running to the stairs. George kissed Blaise quickly and followed after his twin, the pair of them disappearing into the workshop. After a beat of silence, Angelina giggled.

"Those two," she sighed in fond exasperation. Then she sobered. "I'm worried about them, Blaise. Keeping the shop open, some of the things they're making... they're the biggest target in this bloody alley."

"I know," he murmured, running a hand over his hair. "But would we love them if they were any less?" That bold, unbearably attractive Gryffindor quality of doing exactly what they wanted and not giving a fuck what might come of it. That belief that they could do anything with enough nerve and determination, and no one could stand in their way. Not even the Dark Lord themselves. "Bill's done the wards, they're as safe as can be," he reminded; having a Gringotts curse-breaker for a brother certainly had its perks.

"I know, but I still worry." She twirled one of her braids around her fingers.

"I'd worry more about what they're getting up to in that workshop than what's going on in the rest of the alley," Blaise said dryly, as another quiet explosion noise sounded. Angelina snorted.

"You're not wrong there," she agreed. "That sort of mess, I can handle. I've been dealing with that since we were first years."

Part of Blaise was a little jealous, that she'd known the twins for so long, shared so many experiences with them through their Hogwarts years while Blaise had really only just discovered how wonderful George Weasley was in the last few months of his time at school. But mostly he was glad, knowing the twins wouldn't be entirely at their own devices while he was gone; they had a tendency to get caught up in their inventions and forget things like sleep, and food.

"You'll just have to look after both our troublemakers while I'm gone," he mused.

"And on that note, I'm breaking out the wine," she said with a laugh, summoning a bottle of red and two glasses. "But I suppose it's nothing I haven't done before. Even if George will be unbearable when he starts pining for you," she teased. "The two of us have to stick together, after all." She poured, and Blaise clinked his glass against hers.

"Cheers to that." He and Angelina had developed a sort of kinship over the last few weeks, bonding over their shared love of those redheaded menaces. "At least I should be able to write this year. And like I said, there will be Hogsmeade weekends." He knew the twins had ways of sneaking in and out of the school from Hogsmeade; they would work it out.

"You'll be gone twenty minutes and he'll start pining," Angelina told him with a smirk. "Hell, when you went to see Daphne the other week he acted like he was going to waste away without you."

Blaise shook his head in despair, even as the smile threatened to take over; he'd only gone to have lunch with Daphne and Luna, for two hours at the most. "Then I'm sorry in advance, and I'll make it up to you."

Angelina's face lit up deviously. "Tell you what," she declared. "When things are quieter, we'll get Lee and Alicia to watch the shop for a week, you can take us all to Italy." She grinned at him. "Or we can leave the twins to the shop and go anyway."

Blaise laughed. "It's a deal."

"What are you two plotting down here?" It was George, returning from the workshop with Fred at his heel, both of them surprisingly unscathed.

"We're running away to Italy together without you, tesoro," Blaise told him mock-apologetically. George gave a theatrical gasp, falling over the back of the sofa and into Blaise's lap.

"You heartbreakers," he declared mutinously, kissing Blaise. He hummed, then pulled back, and stole the glass of wine from the Slytherin's hand. "Good wine, that."

Blaise rolled his eyes, reclaiming his wine but letting George stay sprawled over his legs and chest, stroking his hair with his free hand as they settled in for the evening.

Going back to school without George would be hard, but it wouldn't last forever. And for someone usually quite cautious, Blaise was surprised to find that there was not a single ounce of doubt in his mind that the pair of them would still be together by that time, as long as they were both alive.

If they could survive Umbridge together, and survive a war together, he was certain they could survive anything else life may throw at them.

Chapter 81

The morning Prophet often made the occupants of Seren Du fill with rage, but this one managed to have Sirius swearing before a single page had been opened.

The front page story covered how a transport of prisoners to Azkaban had been ‘attacked’ and the prisoners — all convicted Death Eaters — had broken free. Miraculously, both aurors involved were entirely unharmed.

“Scrimgeour is going to be the death of all of us, that incompetent fool,” Snape muttered, glaring daggers at the newspaper. Harry reached for it, wanting to read just how badly the Ministry had fucked up this time. Their new Minister was much more focused on looking like he was doing something externally than dealing with the many problems within the Ministry itself, so things like this would only keep happening.

“At least they’ve finally admitted they don’t have control over the dementors,” Harry pointed out, gesturing to a section on the third page that was a response to all the calls for harsher punishments, for all the confirmed Death Eaters to be Kissed immediately. It was only a tiny admission, hidden in a much larger paragraph about how the Kiss was too drastic — citing Sirius as an example of how that could go poorly, as if he’d even had a trial the first time round. But there it was; Azkaban prison no longer serves as the home for the dementors, and their use in guarding prisoners has ceased to be Ministry protocol. Like they’d just decided against it, rather than had all the dementors bugger off to join Voldemort.

“Well they’ve had to, after all the attacks further north,” Remus reasoned. “They’d rather admit they’ve lost the dementors than pretend they haven’t and take responsibility for that whole village that got Kissed.”

Harry shuddered at the reminder; that had been a truly awful attack to read about.

Not for the first time, Harry wondered if there would be anything left of wizarding Britain by the time he turned seventeen. So much had happened already in the time Voldemort had gone public... what if he couldn’t afford to wait.

“I know what you’re thinking, and stop it,” Draco muttered, bumping his knee against Harry’s. “You’re not responsible for any of this.”

“But I know how to stop him—“

“So does Dumbledore, and he sure as hell isn’t hurrying up with it. Besides, there’s still potentially three more horcruxes we don’t know about.” Draco kissed him, giving him a sharp look. “Stop beating yourself up about this.”

Harry huffed. “Stop being right all the time.”

A cocky smirk crossed Draco’s lips. “Shan’t,” he replied, turning back to his breakfast, both of them ignoring the amused looks on the adults’ faces.

They were due to practice apparating again with Sirius, who thankfully seemed in much better spirits than the day before. So, after breakfast, the three of them went out into their usual spot in the woods; both Harry and Draco had managed to apparate at least once, with the circles so close together, and today Sirius was going to move them a little further apart. Harry just hoped his godfather was right about it getting easier after the first time.

..

By lunch time, they had succeeded in apparating three more times each without anyone getting splinched, and Sirius promised to start them on destinations they couldn't see next time they practiced. So it was on a high that Harry returned to the house, and Remus floated a letter his way when he walked into the kitchen. "This came for you, about half an hour ago."

Harry frowned, tearing the envelope open. "It's from Cassius."

Draco appeared at his shoulder with concern, leaning in to read the letter as well.

Dear Harry,

I'm sure you've seen the paper. I don't know if your friend Tonks told you, but my uncle and cousin were two of the Death Eaters convicted in the group that escaped. My other cousin died in the attack. I'm the last eligible heir to the Warrington seat.

There's a Wizengamot meeting in a week. I'm going to claim my seat. If I do that, they can't take it away from me, no matter what happens. But I am not nearly as politically powerful as Lady Malfoy, so I fear I cannot do this without bringing quite a high level of wrath down on myself.

That isn't going to stop me, but I may need sanctuary. I'll do my best to convince the Dark Lord I am aligned with his views, though I will continue to avoid the Mark for as long as I can. With any luck, I can toe the line, but I'll be honest I don't see it lasting long.

I just wanted to prepare you — and if you happen to get one of those handy visions of yours in time to tell me to run, a warning would be greatly appreciated.

See you soon, but hopefully not too soon,

Cassius

P.S. Oliver sends his love, and says to hurry up and end the war so he can have the quidditch pitch wedding of his dreams. I asked him, he said yes.

Harry was grinning by the end of the letter, even though the rest of the contents was slightly alarming. "Sirius, Narcissa?" he started, looking up at the pair, "you two are going to be at the Wizengamot meeting next week, right?"

"We were certainly planning on it," Narcissa confirmed. "Is there a reason we shouldn't?"

"No, no — a reason you should, actually. Cassius Warrington is going to take his seat — apparently his uncle and cousin are two of the Azkaban escapees from this morning. So he's taking his chance while he can, but... if Voldemort comes after him expecting him to be Marked and fall in line, he needs a place to take cover."

The two Wizengamot members shared a grim look. "We'll slip him a portkey once he's confirmed his seat," Sirius assured. "Let him know who his allies are."

"Thank you." With any luck, that would keep both Cassius and Oliver safe. He turned back to Draco, offering a slight smile. "Be my date to their wedding? Whenever it is." Whenever the war ended, by the looks of it.

Draco eyed him over, eyes sparkling. "I suppose I can stand to be seen with you," he agreed, making Sirius snort.

"He doesn't clean up too badly," he defended. "Shame there's little be done with that hair of his, Even Sleakeasy's doesn't work — best thing old Monty ever invented, and it's still not enough to tame the famous Potter mop." He ruffled Harry's hair pointedly, then raised an eyebrow. "A mop that looks to be due a trim, quite honestly."

"Ginny usually does it before school lets out," Harry said, running a hand through the messy locks. "With everything that happened, I forgot to ask her."

"Moony'll cut it," Sirius offered. "He used to do Prongsy's, never turned out too badly."

"One of these days I'll get you to a proper hairdresser," Draco declared imperiously. As he did so, Remus and Snape walked through the door. Remus raised an eyebrow at the blond.

"You do that and they'll weep," he warned. "We never found one brave enough to tackle James'."

"Is it part of the family magic?" Harry asked, slightly astounded that his hair was apparently that historically problematic. Aunt Petunia had always just cut it as short as she dared while still keeping his scar covered, no matter how strange or unkempt it looked.

"We were never really sure if it was magic or a weird genetic quirk," Sirius mused, sitting down to lunch. "Once James tried to see if growing it out would help, but that just made it worse. He broke three hair brushes in a month with that attempt."

"It will be very interesting to see which genetics come out on top," Narcissa remarked, eyeing Harry and Draco in consideration. "Every Malfoy since Henry VIII has been as blonde as a veela."

The boys looked at each other, blushing deeply at the insinuation. "Mother!" Draco protested in embarrassment. Narcissa just laughed, stroking her son's hair.

Harry stared down at his lunch with bright red cheeks — but, when he thought no one else was looking, he glanced up at Draco's pale hair in curiosity.

He was keen to see how those genetics would mix, too. One day.

.-.-.-

Harry was excited for their visitors the next day; Tonks had sent word ahead that she would be bringing Kingsley with her — something that had had Narcissa running straight to visit Andi, even though Tonks specifically said not to make a big deal out of it — but both of them had promised to duel Harry and see how he did.

According to Snape, this was not enough reason to slack around and wait for them to show up, but he couldn't be the one to do so without revealing his presence there to the two aurors.

So Harry and Draco were both being put through their paces by Remus when the pair finally turned up to the large room they'd turned into their training room. "Wotcher, Harry!" Tonks greeted, waving. Kingsley was at her side, and raised an eyebrow at the sight of Draco.

"Mr Malfoy, I didn't realise you were part of this, too," he remarked. Draco shrugged, holstering his wand.

"Someone has to keep this idiot out of trouble," he said, and Harry just grinned. "I'm a lot newer to it than Harry, though."

"Maybe the two of us can duel the two of you, later," Harry suggested, not letting Draco put himself down; he was far better than he gave himself credit for.

Tonks lit up at the suggestion. "Oh, that'd be brilliant," she enthused.

"Remus, do you mind...?" Kingsley trailed off, and the werewolf shook his head, smiling.

"No, no, not at all. These two are all yours — I'll be in the library if you need me." He shrugged his cardigan back on. "Have fun, all of you. Remember, no spells you can't reverse." That was mostly said to Harry and Draco, and once Remus had left Kingsley eyed them bemusedly.

"I sense a story behind that warning."

Harry shrugged sheepishly. "We've had a few close calls, over the last couple of years." And maybe just the other week he'd sent off a Bone-Melting curse that would've landed his opponent in St Mungo's if it had been anyone other than Snape.

Still, no permanent harm had been done, and Harry had learned a valuable lesson. He rolled up his sleeves, sending a grin of challenge at the pair of aurors. "Right, then; who's up first?"

.-. .

Duelling with two fully-qualified active service aurors was... difficult. Harry would be the first to admit he hadn't expected Tonks to be much of a challenge, considering how clumsy she was in her day-to-day life. But as soon as the fight began she turned into an entirely different person — though, not literally, even though it was well within her capability to do so.

Still, Harry had been trained by Severus Snape himself, and he was a lot more comfortable taking dirty shots than the aurors. It paid off eight minutes into the duel with Tonks, when he managed to freeze the ground beneath her feet for just long enough to get her slightly off balance, catching her with a Stunner to the thigh. Kingsley had a Cushioning charm out a split second before she hit the ground, and he walked over to revive his partner.

“He got me?” Tonks grumbled, accepting the hand up. Kingsley nodded.

“He did.” He turned to Harry, clearly impressed. “You are not what I expected.”

Harry laughed. “I get that a lot. Are you alright, Tonks?”

“Oh, yeah, fine,” the auror waved him off. “Bloody hell, kid; you’ve got an arm on you! You sure you want to go into pro quidditch?”

“Professor McGonagall says the Auror Department has more rules than I’m capable of following,” Harry told her cheerfully, hearing Draco snicker in the background. “Besides, I think once the war is over I’ll be about done with fighting criminals.”

“That’s a shame; you’re better than our trainees,” Kingsley remarked. “Though honestly, that’s not difficult at the moment, considering the standards.” He grimaced, and Harry matched the expression; he could only imagine.

“If it helps, a lot of Hogwarts students have trained with me. Not quite at that level,” Harry added, gesturing vaguely to indicate the duel he’d just had, “but they’re good in a fight. So hopefully the auror ranks should swell in the next few years with some decent recruits.” Though, admittedly, Harry wasn’t sure how many of the HA members would trust the Ministry enough to apply.

In the corner, Tonks snorted. “Tell them to wait until Proudfoot’s been kicked; he’s an arse, and he hates people more competent than he is. Which is a pretty low bar, honestly.”

The faintest smirk flickered across Kingsley’s lips, and he didn’t say anything, which was as good as agreement.

With the first duel out of the way, Harry faced off against Kingsley. That was a much harder fight, which he ultimately lost — but only after eighteen minutes of hard duelling. “More than most people get against Kings,” Tonks complimented, patting her partner’s bicep.

Having seen the way they duelled against Harry, Draco was reluctant to step up, but with a little encouragement and a whispered promise that had the blond flushing faintly, Harry persuaded him to duel Tonks while Kingsley went over some tips with Harry.

“I had no idea Sirius and Remus were such ruthless duellists,” Kingsley remarked, when they were discussing some of the more morally dubious moves Harry had made. The Gryffindor tamped down a smile, imagining what the man might say if he revealed who his main instructor was.

“Sirius was raised a Black,” he pointed out instead, “use any advantage you can.” That wasn’t untrue — not all of Harry’s ruthlessness had come from Snape. Sirius and Remus were Marauders, and it showed when they got serious about duelling.

Duelling in pairs was where things really got intense; Harry and Draco had trained quite a lot together, but never against opponents who were also used to duelling in partnership. Fighting Sirius and Remus was the closest they got, but the older pair had a whole twelve year gap in their lives that had changed their duelling style. Tonks and Kingsley worked together, lived together, knew each other inside and out; and it showed in their fighting style, the pair working with a fluidity that Harry and Draco could only dream of.

Still, it was an incredibly helpful exercise, and Harry was a little sad when there was suddenly a chirping sound from the inside of Kingsley's robe. Tonks cursed, while the bald man just frowned and pulled out something that looked like a pocket watch, but was flashing bright red. "Duty calls," he sighed. "Good work today, boys. I'd be happy to come back and work with you further, work permitting." He turned to Tonks, kissing her chastely. "I'm sorry, Tonks; we'll have to postpone our dinner plans. I'll see you at home?"

"Be safe," she replied. "If it's Proudfoot fucking up again, do me a favour and hex him."

A flicker of a smile, and then Kingsley was striding from the room, leaving the three of them behind. When he was gone, Tonks let out a long sigh. "I swear to Helga, if he's gone all evening because of something stupid that the in-office aurors could've handled, I'm going to blow up the whole fucking Ministry."

"I thought the on-call aurors were only for emergencies?" Harry broached tentatively, and Tonks huffed.

"You would think so," she agreed, "but we've both had all sorts of ridiculous calls lately — it's worse than when Fudge was in charge! At least then it was genuine incompetence; now it's just Dark supporters within the Ministry accidentally letting things go wrong." She scowled, the tips of her hair turning red. "Sometimes I think they've figured the pair of us out; this only ever seems to happen on the times we have the whole day off together."

"Will it be bad, if you do get caught?" Draco asked with furrowed brows.

"Depends," Tonks said, shrugging. "They could technically fire both of us, if they wanted to. If they're trying to get Light-sided aurors out, that could happen. Best case scenario is a slap on the wrist and maybe a bit of suspension time, with a warning not to bring personal drama into the workplace. But ideally we'll keep it secret until it's no longer a problem."

At that, a secretive smile crossed her face. Harry and Draco shared a look; what did those two have planned?

"Well," Draco said eventually, checking his watch, "we were about due to finish up anyway, and I have some potions I wanted to brew. Are you staying for lunch, cousin?"

"Won't turn down a free meal," Tonks chirped cheerfully. "Especially now I've got nothing to go home to for a while."

Draco nodded, and tugged Harry into a brief kiss.

“Don’t blow up the basement,” Harry teased, earning a dirty look from his boyfriend before the blond also left. Harry glanced at Tonks, shrugging. “We’ve got an hour or so until lunch. Would you mind going over that rope-tripping thing you used with me? I’ve never seen it before.”

“Of course, yeah!” She grinned. “It’s something my dad taught me, actually. Dead useful in a fight.”

She happily launched into a demonstration, and Harry paid close attention. After a while, he finally gathered the courage to ask a question he’d been thinking about for a while. “Hey, Tonks,” he started, and she raised an expectant eyebrow. “Can I ask... why doesn’t Kingsley call you by your name? Y’know, since you two are together and everything.”

She blinked, perplexed. “He does?”

“No, I mean like, your first name or anything,” Harry clarified. “Draco calls me Potter sometimes, but it’s not really the same thing.” He and Draco used surnames practically as a term of endearment by now, after so much time only being able to use them in public.

Tonks frowned, and Harry wondered if he’d misstepped. “I’m sorry, it’s none of my business, I—”

“No, no, you’re fine,” she assured. “It’s just not always an easy one to explain. I...” she sighed deeply. “My first name... I hate it,” she told him. “Not just in the way that it’s old-fashioned and a bit of a mouthful. For a while at school I tried shortening it to Dora, but... it’s such a girl’s name, y’know?”

Harry blinked, trying to figure out where she was coming from. “But... you’re only a boy sometimes, right? Does having a girl’s name bother you even when you are a girl?” Had he misunderstood the whole situation? Was he using the wrong pronouns, even now?

“I’m only a boy sometimes,” Tonks agreed, “but even when I look like a girl I don’t always feel like a girl, y’know? It’s like... something in-between. Not quite one or the other.” She huffed in frustration, running a hand through her hair. “I’ll be honest with you, Harry; I can hardly explain it myself, let alone to anyone else. But... Tonks is a name that feels like me no matter how I’m feeling gender-wise, y’know? There might be days where I don’t mind being called Dora — though I will always hate the full name, really, I don’t know what Mum was thinking,” she added with a look that made Harry grin, “but Tonks is just... me. So yeah, it might sound weird when my boyfriend calls me by my last name like we’re just auror partners and nothing else. But it fits.” She grinned playfully. “Sometimes I like to think it’s like I’m one of those muggle pop stars, like Cher, or Prince, or Madonna.”

Harry snickered. “You could bring the trend into the magical world.”

“Right?” she agreed enthusiastically. “Clearly I missed my calling as the next greatest magical pop star. Weird Sisters eat your hearts out.” She winked, reaching out to ruffle Harry’s hair. “Anyway, I like to pretend my first name doesn’t exist, and Kings is happy to do the same.” Her gaze turned teasing all of a sudden. “Or were you thinking about what he calls me when we're alone?" she drawled, wiggling her eyebrows. Harry blushed furiously, shaking his head.

"No!" he spluttered, making her laugh. "I just— it seemed a bit—" He didn't want to say weird, though clearly from the look on Tonks' face he didn't need to. She wasn't offended, though, and her smile softened.

"Not everyone needs pet names to know they're loved," she pointed out. "Him calling me by the name I choose is way better than any nickname either of us could think of, anyway." Her pale green eyes shone with adoration for a moment, and then she shook her head, blushing. "Merlin, listen to me, I sound like a besotted little third year."

Harry smirked at her. "Well, you did invite him here..." he started, yelping and ducking when Tonks sent a Stinging hex his way.

"We are not making a big deal out of that," she said pointedly, glaring even as her blush brightened. "Besides, it's Sirius and Charlie you should be teasing about that; moving the bloke in here after two months together."

Harry groaned, shaking his head. "Merlin, have you seen them, though? They're disgustingly happy together. And I thought Draco and I were bad!" Sirius and Charlie were the polar opposite of Remus and Snape, and having the two couples living under the same roof was wildly jarring at times.

"I've seen Charlie obsessed with boyfriends in the past, but it's never been like this," Tonks agreed. She shook her head fondly. "They're meant to be, I suppose."

Harry nodded vehemently; if ever there was an example of true love forming quickly, it was those two. "I'm just glad Sirius has someone. He was alone for so long..." Compared to the man he had been at the end of Harry's third year, Sirius was practically a whole new person. Even compared to how he had been in the weeks before Charlie had returned from Romania, there was a significant change.

"Yeah, takes the fun out of teasing them a bit, doesn't it?" Tonks said in mock-annoyance. "He's had so much shit, he deserves good things. Even if watching them together does make me nauseous."

Harry laughed; he could certainly agree with that, on both counts.

.-.-.-.

At last, the day had arrived.

OWL results.

Both the boys were surprised by the delivery over breakfast, too busy bickering about the plot of a muggle book Harry had made Draco read. They didn't even notice them, until Narcissa plucked two identical envelopes from the pile of post Ceri brought in. "Well, I've been waiting for these to arrive," she said, loud enough to cut over their argument. She held out one to each of them, and Harry took one look at the Ministry seal and thought he might be sick. Suddenly all eyes were on them; even Snape was watching keenly, though his face gave nothing away.

Harry turned to Draco, who looked equally nervous. “Best just get it over with, then, yeah?” he suggested, ever the Gryffindor. Draco gave a jerky nod, and together they opened the envelopes.

There was complete silence in the kitchen as the pair of them read. Harry stared down at the parchment, the letters taking a minute to turn into actual words through the panicked haze in his brain. As he skimmed over the listing, his brain shorted out for an entirely different reason.

ORDINARY WIZARDING LEVELS RESULTS

Harry James Potter has achieved:

Astronomy: E

Care of Magical Creatures: O

Charms: O

*Defence Against the Dark Arts: O **

Divination: E

Herbology: O

Arithmancy: O

History of Magic: A

Ancient Runes: O

Potions: O

Transfiguration: O

Mr Potter is to be congratulated for achieving the highest DADA grade since 1904*

“Well?” Sirius pressed eagerly, practically leaning over the table. “How’d you do?”

"I... I got an O in Potions," Harry stuttered — that, to him, was the most surprising grade of the lot. He looked up at Snape, wide-eyed. "I got an O in Potions." No matter how many times he said it, it still sounded utterly ridiculous.

Snape's lips curved in a smile, and even Harry could see the pride shining in those dark eyes. "Nothing less than I expected," he replied. The flood of warmth that filled Harry's chest at his words took him by surprise — had he truly been so worried about letting him down?

Yes, he realised. He had; Snape had put so much effort into working with Harry over the summers, despite their rocky start. He was a hard man to please, and Harry felt like a puppy who had just been given a treat for doing a good job. He grinned so wide his face hurt.

"You are never allowed to call me a nerd again," Draco declared, making Harry realise the blond was leaning over his shoulder to snoop at Harry's results. Grey eyes glittered, and lips pressed to Harry's cheek. "Not bad, Potter." It was said ever so fondly, and the warm feeling got impossibly bigger.

"How'd you do?"

Draco held his own parchment out so Harry could read it, right as Sirius gave up on patience entirely and plucked Harry's results from his hand. Harry ignored him, head pressed lightly against Draco's as he read.

Draconis Lucius Malfoy has achieved:

Astronomy: O

Care of Magical Creatures: E

Charms: O

Defence Against the Dark Arts: O

Herbology: E

History of Magic: O

Ancient Runes: O

Potions: O

Transfiguration: E

Harry looked up at him, beaming, and hugged him tightly round the shoulders. “Draco, that’s brilliant! Well done!”

“I would’ve liked to do better in Transfiguration,” the Slytherin said, frowning slightly. “But I knew I didn’t fully manage the animate to inanimate transfiguration, so it’s not really a surprise.” He let his mother take the results, and Harry kissed the corner of his mouth as the pair of them watched the adults react to the results. Sirius was beaming widely, Charlie’s chin propped on his shoulder so he could read as well, while Remus leaned in to get a look. Narcissa and Snape had their heads bent together over Draco’s, and when they looked up, both had approval clear on their faces.

“Well done, darling,” Narcissa said, reaching out to squeeze his hand. “Wonderful results!”

“You have done yourself a credit, Draco,” Snape agreed. Harry could feel the way Draco’s shoulders straightened at the man’s words, delight crossing his features — all he had ever wanted was to make Severus Snape proud of him.

“Sounds like you’re both nerds, to me!” Sirius declared playfully. “Oi, Snape, trade you.” He held out Harry’s results, his other hand reaching expectantly for Draco’s. Snape obligingly traded, and then Narcissa’s warm smile was directed at Harry.

“Congratulations, Harry, dear. You should be very pleased.”

“I am,” he assured, nodding hard. “Merlin, I can’t believe I got an E in Divination!” He definitely owed Parvati and Lavender something nice.

“Shame about History of Magic,” Charlie said. “But I guess you did sort of get a vision in the middle and everything.”

Harry snorted; yes, considering the circumstances, he was just glad to have passed that one.

“And I suppose I can let the Astronomy grade slide,” Sirius said with mock-dismay, “since there was a bit of an interruption. Although Draco still managed to uphold the Black family pride.” He was clearly teasing, and Harry laughed.

“Well done, both of you.” Remus smiled, amber eyes bright. “We’ll have to do something to celebrate. Certainly cake for dinner.”

“You just want cake,” Sirius teased, elbowing his friend. “You boys mind if I keep these for a bit? Cissa and I are having lunch with Andi after our Wizengamot meeting, it’s only fair if we do a bit of bragging.”

Harry didn’t mind at all; he wasn’t likely to forget any of those grades in a hurry.

“Should we write and see what the others got, or just wait until my birthday?” Harry asked, directing the question at Draco. Harry’s birthday was a little over a week away, and he knew he’d be seeing most of his friends then.

“Well I’m writing to the girls,” Draco told him, “but I’m going to wait on the rest.”

"I should tell Parvati and Lavender their efforts weren't wasted," Harry mused, still in shock over that Divination result.

"Go on, boys; go write to your friends," Sirius urged. "And take the day off training, too — you've earned it!"

Harry couldn't even argue with that; he was far too happy to even try and concentrate on duelling.

Abruptly, Draco snorted. "I bet you've done better than Granger," he remarked. Harry stared at him.

"Maybe in a couple subjects, but overall? I doubt it." He couldn't see Hermione getting anything less than an E. He wouldn't even be surprised if she had straight Os.

"You might not have noticed because you were busy doing a thousand things at once, but Granger spent half of the last year paying more attention to what you were doing than her own work," Draco informed him, deeply amused. "And you did one more subject than her, thanks to your two self-studies. Which, I can only speak for Runes, but she spent most of that exam trying to glare at you without getting caught. Between that and how much you improved through the HA, it wouldn't surprise me if you've beaten her. History of Magic doesn't count," he dismissed easily.

Harry shook his head, a little incredulous. "We'll see when school starts back, I suppose." The idea of academically out-performing Hermione Granger... well, it was incredibly satisfying, to say the least.

.-.-.-.

Sirius still felt strange walking into the Wizengamot chambers, his robes transforming into the official garb the moment he stepped over the threshold. It still felt strange to be in the Ministry at all; people looked at him like he was some sort of criminal, but he was getting used to that now.

It helped, having Charlie by his side. The redhead kissed his cheek before they all split up to take their assigned seats, and Sirius didn't miss the wave of whispers sparked by the action. He smirked to himself; let them gossip, he had nothing to be ashamed of. Charlie was the one whose reputation would take a hit, and the dragon tamer had repeatedly assured him that he couldn't give less of a damn about that.

He settled into the Black family seat, propping his ankle on his knee, and waited for the meeting to start.

"We have a new member joining us today," Scrimgeour announced once everyone was present and quiet. He didn't look too happy about it. Sirius sat up a little straighter; of course, the Warrington boy was claiming his seat, Harry had said.

The door opened, and Cassius Warrington strode in, the tightness of his jaw the only sign of his anxiety. Sirius could see the family resemblance easily; Julius Warrington, the boy's father, had graduated Hogwarts the year Sirius had started, but their families ran in the same social circles.

“I, Cassius Julius Warrington, have come to claim the Warrington seat of my birthright,” the eighteen year-old declared in a firm voice. Sirius saw several people exchange glances, no doubt curious that the boy had not said anything about doing so with the permission of his uncle.

As if he would admit such a thing even if he did have it, when his uncle was a wanted fugitive.

The Warrington seat glowed in approval, and Cassius’ robes transformed, the ring appearing on his hand. Sirius saw the way his shoulders loosened minutely — it was the same way Harry’s had, when the Wizengamot chamber had let Sirius take on his proxy seats.

The relief of knowing your future was in safe hands. In this case, in Cassius’ own hands.

“Welcome, Lord Warrington,” Scrimgeour sneered, his contempt visible. Sirius scowled; they deserved better than a Minister who judged people by their family name rather than their character. “Please, take your seat.”

The Warrington seat was only a few down from the Black seat, and as the young lord passed in front of Sirius, the animagus cleared his throat, bending as if to pick something off the floor. “Excuse me, Lord Warrington, I believe you dropped this.”

Cassius looked confused, but that cleared rapidly as Sirius discreetly handed him a folded piece of parchment with a small lump inside — a ring. Cassius met his gaze, and Sirius gave the barest nod. The portkey would take him to safety, should he ever need it.

“Thank you, Lord Black,” the Slytherin murmured, and continued on his way.

Sirius let his gaze slide to Narcissa, who had the tiniest shadow of a smile for him in response.

Scrimgeour started the meeting, and Sirius did his best not to doze off through the whole thing; most of it was just unnecessary waffle, whether it was the Minister or Dumbledore taking the floor. Nothing useful was being suggested — everyone was too scared of upsetting the balance in one direction or another, with all the outside forces at work. And with Sirius and Narcissa shifting the power around, no one was quite sure how voting would fall on certain matters; the Dark no longer had the confidence of keeping the Malfoy bloc, while the Light was fractured into those who supported Dumbledore and those who did not.

Just as things were starting to wind down, Narcissa raised her wand, startling the gathering.

“Lady Malfoy, you have the floor.” Scrimgeour was clearly reluctant to hand things over, but rules were rules.

Narcissa smiled, getting gracefully to her feet. “Thank you, Minister.” She turned to the gathered Wizengamot, who were eyeing her with varying levels of trepidation. “I would just like to announce ahead of time that I will shortly be placing a declaration in the Daily Prophet, where I will promise to personally fund any person who wishes to do an inheritance test at Gringotts Bank,” she stated. Sirius’ eyes widened for a moment — she hadn’t said anything about that to him!

“That is highly unorthodox, Lady Malfoy!” Lord Parkinson growled, and Narcissa’s sweet smile sharpened at the edges.

“Unorthodox, but not illegal,” she reasoned. “I’m sure we can all agree that it is... unseemly, for one person to hold such a large number of proxy seats in this governing body.” No one missed the way her gaze innocently landed on Dumbledore as she spoke. “I would very much like to return the guardianship of my houses to their rightful lines, to properly fill some of these grand seats once more. However, due to the events of the last several decades, I find myself lacking in viable heirs. We know they are out there, for the Chamber has not declared the lines extinct. I would like to encourage those who may not necessarily have considered their lineage to do so, with the hope that I shall not have to pass such an extraordinarily large burden onto my son, Draco.” She gave a demure laugh. “I find there are much better seventeenth birthday presents to be gifted.”

“I stand with the Lady Malfoy,” Sirius declared, on his feet before he really even thought about it. “And I am happy to offer coin from the Black vaults for this endeavour, should you be willing to accept.”

That sent even more shocked murmurs bouncing through the room, but Narcissa nodded to him in thanks.

Scrimgeour banged his gavel as the noise in the room grew, calling for silence. “Enough! Thank you, Lady Malfoy,” he said flatly, “for your... generous offer. Now, does anyone have any matters of relevance to discuss?”

Sirius sat back down, smirking to himself — across the room, Dumbledore looked like he had smelled something particularly foul.

Served him right.

.

Remus turned the page of his book, though if he was truly being honest with himself he hadn’t really been paying attention for the last ten minutes. His jaw cracked as he yawned — perhaps it was time to attempt sleep.

Beside him, Severus was still sat up reading a potions journal. Remus slid his bookmark in, setting his book on the nightstand, and shuffled closer to his partner. Severus’ lips twitched, and he raised one arm, silently inviting Remus to cuddle up against him while he read.

The familiar scent of potion ingredients and sandalwood filled Remus’ senses, relaxing him far better than any balm or candle could. Severus’ free hand rested on his shoulder, and Remus let his eyes fall to half-mast, happy to doze until his partner was ready to turn out the light and properly sleep.

“Remus.” The quiet voice startled him — Severus sounded surprisingly serious. Remus tilted his head up, trying to push the sleepy fog from his mind.

“Hmm?”

Severus’ mouth tightened imperceptibly; a sure sign that he was uncomfortable. Remus sat up straighter. “What’s the matter, love?”

“I— Potter may be Black’s godson, but it has become increasingly more clear to me that your relationship with the boy is equally… paternal.” His words were stilted, like he was trying to word things carefully. Remus froze.

Was he finally going to bring up the elephant in the room? The one that had been lurking since the first night they had brought the pensieve back from the Potter vault, and Severus had told him which particular memory he had decided to show Harry?

To celebrate the boys’ exam results they had taken another jaunt down memory lane that evening; perhaps bringing up the past was reminding Severus more and more of the good side of things, back then. The plans they had made, that may not be as hopeless as they once thought.

Severus seemed to be struggling with his next words, and Remus took pity on the man, carefully taking his potions journal and placing it aside so he could take both of Severus’ hands in his. “Severus,” he started, thinking through his next words. He didn’t want to scare the man away, not from this topic. “It’s true, Harry is like a son to me by now. And I won’t deny, it’s had me… thinking about things.”

Severus tensed. Remus forged on.

“I know, back in the first war, back before everything went wrong… we talked about it.” Only a handful of times, in the safety of their bedroom, just like this. When they could pretend the rest of the world did not exist. “I know you were always convinced it wasn’t possible, that it wasn’t advisable for you, but Sev, love; seeing you with Harry, and with Draco, it just makes me even more certain that you’ll be an incredible father.” He offered the man an earnest smile, squeezing his hands. Panic crept into those dark eyes he loved so much.

“I— both those boys are teenagers. And I am not solely responsible for either one of them,” Severus protested stiffly.

“I should hope you wouldn’t be solely responsible for any kids we had, either,” Remus teased lightly, feeling the Slytherin tense further. “I’m— I’m not worried about passing my genes on, either, not like I was when we were young. Especially not with recent research.” There weren’t many studies done on lycanthropy, but with the higher number of infected individuals thanks to Greyback’s efforts during the first war, people were discovering all sorts of things; namely, that a werewolf having a child with a non-werewolf was unlikely to result in a full werewolf child, unless the werewolf was the one carrying it. The child might have some wolf-like tendencies and sensitivities, but they were unlikely to change with the moon.

And even if they did, Remus no longer saw it as the horrifying curse it once was. Not now he was at peace with his wolf side, now Dumbledore's spells were long gone from his body.

"I was never worried about your genes," Severus remarked. "It is my own that concern me far more. And my actions even further."

Remus sighed, reaching up to cup Severus' face tenderly. "How do you still not see what an incredible man you are?" he breathed, heart aching. "Severus—you risk your life, every day, so that others can be safe. You may be more reserved with your emotions, but they are certainly there. And as I said; seeing you with the boys, I know you would be wonderful with children."

Near-black eyes shuttered with grief. "My father—" Remus cut him off with a kiss.

"Your father was a bastard, and you are nothing like him," he growled insistently. "You need to stop carrying his sins as if they were your own. Do you think I would ever let you do anything he did, to myself or to our child? Do you think you would ever allow yourself to stoop to such a thing?"

The fact that Severus was so worried about it was one of the things that most convinced Remus he would make a fine father.

But he could see the urge to retreat growing in his love's eyes, so he smiled slightly, kissing him again. "We don't need to decide anything now," he assured. "It's hardly the best time for it. And it would likely take a while to find someone willing to carry for us." They didn't have Lily, anymore. "But... so many things we thought would be denied to us have fallen into our laps, Severus. I just—let's not rule anything out, yes? The future is full of possibilities." He grinned playfully. "I'm sure Sirius and Charlie will beat us to the punch, anyway—we can see how we do with their babies before we attempt to create any of our own."

Severus' eyes narrowed. "As if a child of the two of us would be anything like the spawn of those two fools," he shot back automatically, making Remus laugh.

"Don't pretend you weren't a mischievous little sod as a kid; you just hid it better," he teased, smoothing a hand down the front of Severus' t-shirt. "It's something to think about, isn't it?" Something to dream about, when he was feeling bold; the two of them as parents, not only able to love one another openly without fear, but able to raise a child together.

There was a long moment of silence, and then Severus nodded — before letting his forehead fall against Remus'. "I convinced myself for a long time that such things were not meant for men like me," he admitted in a ragged whisper that broke Remus' heart. The werewolf gathered his partner up in his arms, holding him tight, tangling a hand in that silk-fine black hair.

"You are a wonderful man," he insisted, "and any child that has your love will be a very fortunate one indeed." He pressed his lips to Severus', coaxing him to relax. "I know I am lucky, to have your love."

Severus sighed quietly, hand resting on Remus' back. "I fear the love I have for you is all I am capable of offering," he confessed, eyes closed. Remus snorted softly.

"Now that's just not true at all," he murmured, thumb stroking the line of Severus' jaw. "You have much more than just your love for me. You wouldn't put up with half the shit Harry and Draco do if it were otherwise," he joked, feeling a rush of triumph when those thin lips quirked in a reluctant smile. "Come on, now. Let's get some sleep. We can talk this over again when the time is right." When the war was over, when things were safe, when Remus could freely admit his love of Severus Snape to the whole world.

Severus adjusted them both until they were comfortable, but before he turned out the light, he paused. "I will admit, though I am... glad the conversation took the turn it did, that isn't actually what I wanted to talk to you about."

Remus looked up, blinking in confusion. "I— it's not?"

"No, but it was clearly on your mind," Severus said with one raised eyebrow, and Remus blushed. "I merely wanted to let you know that I caught Draco brewing lubricant in the lab yesterday. The lemongrass variation."

Remus went wide-eyed — that was not what he had expected. "Oh."

"Indeed." There was the slightest flush across Severus' cheeks. "I merely thought that considering your relationship with Harry, you should be aware that the boys are clearly planning to... take that step."

The werewolf swallowed against the instinctive protest in his mind, the little voice that screamed the boys were far too young to be doing such things and they should intervene. They were sixteen — or close to it — and they knew what they were doing; Remus had had enough conversations on the matter with Harry to know that neither was going to be pressured into something they weren't ready for.

That didn't mean Remus wanted to think too hard on the specifics, or acknowledge any of it. Having an enhanced sense of smell gave him more information than he ever wanted, and not just on the teenagers in the house.

"Well, then," he said, forcing himself to remain calm, to think it through properly. "At least... at least they're adequately preparing. The lemongrass variation, you said? That's the same one you used when we..." Severus blushed, but nodded, fighting a smile. Remus smiled back; Merlin, they had been so nervous back then, tucked away in the Gryffindor dorms one Christmas when all the other Marauders had gone home for the holidays. "That's, ahem, good, then." The lemongrass variant had a muscle relaxant, and was specifically designed for... starting out, with these things. Merlin only knew where Draco had found the recipe; Remus suspected the book George Weasley had given Harry in his fourth year.

"I told Draco he could come to me if he had... concerns," Severus said, his discomfort plain, though he smirked. "He told me everything was fine and ran out of the lab like his cauldron was about to explode."

Remus snickered; he probably would have done the same, at Draco's age. "They're good boys, and they love each other. I don't think we've anything to worry about." Both those boys had difficult times ahead; let them get joy where they could. "But, ah, let's not tell Sirius, yes?" The poor kids didn't need any more teasing than they already got.

Severus huffed a quiet laugh, and finally let the light above their heads go out. "Quite," he agreed, tilting his head for one last kiss before the pair of them laid down properly, Remus sprawled over Severus with his nose tucked into the man's neck, as always.

As they drifted off to sleep, Severus' arms were a fraction tighter around Remus than usual, and the werewolf was unsure which of their conversations had prompted it. Their boys were growing up and taking big steps, which was terrifying in itself, but... there was a bigger step waiting on the horizon, and perhaps if Remus was lucky, Severus would maybe be willing to take it with him.

Chapter 82

Chapter Notes

It's birthday time! Ending the week on a good note :)

Also, some of you thought Harry's OWL results were a little overblown, but the way I see it; removing the compulsions, giving him a support network (that he's desperate to make proud) and reinforcing the belief that he has to be the best/strongest he can possibly be in order to defeat Voldemort and save everyone he loves, all that combined seems reasonable to bump everything up a letter grade. And Divination would bump up several because Lavender and Parvati wouldn't let him take the piss like Ron did. So there's my reasoning~ Harry did get mostly Es in canon, after all.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

On the morning of his sixteenth birthday, Harry woke to the sensation of gentle fingers stroking his cheeks and jaw. "Morning, beautiful," Draco greeted quietly, fuzzy around the edges due to Harry's lack of glasses. The blond leaned in, kissing him slowly. "Happy birthday."

"Mm, it certainly is," Harry agreed, lifting up the duvet so Draco could join him in bed. The Slytherin was a little cold, and eagerly crawled into Harry's cocoon of blankets, cuddling in close. "What are you doing here?" Despite temptation, and the knowledge that their guardians didn't really care at this point, Harry had gone to bed alone.

"Wanted to be the first to wish you happy birthday," Draco murmured, tangling their legs together. "And thought maybe I could give you part of your present early." His lips brushed the edge of Harry's mouth.

Harry felt heat rush to his cheeks, even as a different part of him also got a quick rush of blood. His present... they had decided, together, that they were ready to have sex, and decided Harry's birthday was the day to do it. As much as it seemed a little cliche, doing it as soon as the younger partner turned sixteen... but they wanted it to be special, so prior planning seemed like the way to go.

"Oh," he breathed, inhaling the scent of Draco's shampoo as the blond kissed his way down Harry's neck, sucking right on the spot that felt like a direct line to Harry's cock. Harry's breath hitched, his body arching automatically, desperately seeking friction. "I— now? You think?" How early was it? If they missed breakfast, someone would come looking for them.

"I said part of your present," Draco murmured, though his hand slipped below the waistband of Harry's boxers. "Not the main present. Consider this a... preview."

Harry relaxed; that was something he could fully get behind. He rolled over, pulling Draco on top of him, thrusting his hips against his boyfriend's body. Merlin, he could hardly wait.

Draco started to wriggle down Harry's body, pulling the dark-haired boy's boxers down as he went, licking his lips intently. Harry keened, gasping as Draco's mouth went around his length, grey eyes fixed on Harry's face the entire time. Harry scrambled for his glasses; he wanted to be able to see this properly.

Draco swallowed him deep, moaning low in his throat, and Harry tried not to choke him as one hand threaded through silky blond hair. Fingers started to play with his balls, occasionally slipping teasingly further back, expertly seeking out all of Harry's most sensitive spots. Harry threw his head back against the pillow, pleasure building in his veins—

And then there was a loud knock on the door. "Happy birthday, pup!" Sirius called loudly, banging another couple times for good measure. Draco choked, scrambling back off Harry's cock, spit trailing from his mouth. "Ceri's making pancakes, come down when you're ready!"

Then it went silent outside, and Harry looked down at Draco, still kneeling between his legs, though Harry's erection had deflated at the sound of his godfather's voice.

"He knew you were in here," Harry realised, utterly mortified. "He would've come in otherwise." Draco went bright red, wiping at his mouth.

"He can't," he denied, shaking his head. "I— surely he didn't—" But he trailed off at Harry's knowing look; Sirius absolutely would have noticed Draco sneaking over, and decided a loud interruption was in order.

Fucking Marauders.

"I can never look him in the eye again," Draco groaned, and Harry laughed. He reached down, hauling his boyfriend up to eye-level, feeling a little silly with his boxers still hooked around one ankle.

"Hey, he didn't see anything. He's just guessing," he pointed out, kissing Draco's nose. "He wants a reaction, which is exactly what we're not going to give him." He winked, green eyes full of challenge. "Put that Slytherin mask to good use, yeah?"

It took a little more encouragement, but eventually Harry sent Draco back off to his own room to get dressed, and when he came down for breakfast Harry just smiled at his godfather, hugging him around the shoulders. "Morning, Pads. Thanks for knocking for me; I overslept a bit," he said brightly, internally laughing at the taken-aback expression on Sirius' face. "Ooh, blueberry pancakes! Thanks, Ceri."

The house elf grinned brightly, and Harry took his usual seat, smiling as the rest of the household wished him happy birthday, kissing Draco as if it was his first time seeing him that day.

All through breakfast, Sirius looked between Harry and Draco as if expecting one of them to break, but they had not studied under Severus Snape for nothing.

.--.

As was tradition at this point, Harry and Draco headed out to the quidditch pitch to go fly together. “I have to say,” Harry said, capturing Draco’s mouth as they hovered side by side, ten feet in the air, “it’s much better having you here all day on my birthday.”

“Good to hear you’re not sick of me yet,” Draco agreed dryly, kissing him again. He had already veto-ed both of them climbing onto Harry’s Firebolt to make out properly, so this was the closest alternative. Harry was offended at the insinuation that he’d lose control of his broom at the slightest distraction, and already had plans for the Room of Requirement when they got back to school.

He would show Draco exactly what he was capable of on a broom. Give him something else to fantasise over during the next Slytherin/Gryffindor match.

“It’s only fair that I get to be here the whole day, considering you’re making me share you with the rest of your friends this evening,” the Slytherin mock-pouted, and Harry laughed.

“They’re our friends, not mine — don’t front, you like them. Even Neville.” Harry knew better. Draco liked the heirs and he couldn’t hide it.

“They’re not as bad as I anticipated,” Draco said, which was practically a glowing endorsement.

Harry smiled at him, drifting higher, beckoning Draco to follow him. “I’ve never had a birthday party before,” he said, excitement bubbling up within him at the prospect of being surrounded by all his friends on his birthday. “Not a proper one. The closest I’ve ever come is having you and your mum over. Most of my birthdays I was just alone in my cupboard.”

Draco’s face morphed into a mixture of sadness and anger, and Harry swooped closer to kiss him again. “Hey, it’s okay,” he soothed. “I’m free of them, now.” He hadn’t told Draco much about his life at the Dursleys, but between the scars and some of Harry’s off-hand comments over the years, the Slytherin had pieced most of it together. “Better late than never, right? This is for the best, anyway — if I’d had a birthday party when I started Hogwarts, it would’ve just been Ron and Hermione.” Draco made a face in response.

“I suppose,” he relented, softening. “I promise you’ll never spend another birthday alone. Even if it’s just the two of us.” Grey eyes sparkled. “Wait until we’re old enough to legally apparate,” he declared, “I’ll spoil you rotten. As you deserve.”

Harry smiled just imagining it; Draco taking him out on some fancy date for his birthday, threatening to hex the nosy reporters that would inevitably follow Harry around in public as they always did; maybe going back to their house for a party with their family and friends.

It sounded incredible.

“And you wait until we’re graduated and your birthday doesn’t clash with the start of exams,” he drawled in return. He still felt guilty for not doing anything special for Draco’s sixteenth.

“One of the many reasons I’m looking forward to being done with school,” said Draco airily. He leaned in for a kiss, and when he pulled back he was holding the snitch that had been in Harry’s pocket. “Best two out of three?” he challenged. “If you win, I’ll finish that blowjob I started this morning.”

Harry’s eyes darkened, even as he had to adjust his seat on his broom. “You’re on.” That was an easy bet, and they both knew it.

.-.-.-.

At five that evening, all of them except Snape apparated to Longbottom Manor — neutral ground for a birthday party, where no one was disrupting secrecy spells. Also, it was Neville’s party too, since his birthday was a day before Harry’s.

Harry handed his best friend a wrapped gift, grinning widely. “Happy birthday, mate.”

“You too,” Neville returned amusedly, offering up a present in return. “It’s, uh, from me and Ginny.”

“Ooh, joint presents already?” Harry teased, yelping when Neville punched him lightly in the arm.

“Don’t be a dick or I’ll take it back,” Neville told him. Harry raised an eyebrow.

“You really have been spending a lot of time with Ginny this summer, haven’t you?”

That made the blond boy blush, and Harry’s eyes narrowed. They would definitely be discussing that reaction at a later date.

“Come on,” Neville said instead, resolutely ignoring the statement. “The party’s outside. Uh, you all can come too,” he added to the small group of adults at Harry’s back. “Gran and Amelia and the rest are outside as well. And, um, welcome to Longbottom Manor. Well met.”

With Draco’s hand in his — mostly so the Slytherin could not escape — Harry followed Neville out to the garden. It was his first visit to Longbottom Manor; it was about the same size as Seren Du, though it didn’t have the same vast woodland surrounding it. A lot of the outside space was taken up with huge greenhouses, which was not a surprise in the slightest. But over by a set of French doors off the conservatory, Harry beamed to see a huge gathering of people, and a long table set up with food. Someone had even spread twinkling magical fairy lights through the trees and bushes, though it wasn’t quite dark enough yet to see them.

“Harry!” The shout was the only warning he got before a whirl of red hair slammed into him. He coughed, winded, but hugged Ginny back.

“Hey, Gin. Good to see you.”

“Happy birthday!” The youngest Weasley beamed. “Hi, Draco.”

“Hello, Ginny,” Draco replied wryly — Harry belatedly realised that Ginny was one of the few party guests who hadn’t properly met Draco as his boyfriend. Harry held Draco’s hand tighter, happiness flooding his belly; he was at his own birthday party, with his boyfriend, in front of the rest of his friends.

A glance at Draco showed that he'd come to that realisation as well, but was distinctly more nervous about it than Harry. Harry kissed his cheek with a reassuring smile; everyone there knew about them, they had nothing to be afraid of.

Over with the rest of the group, Daphne wolf-whistled, and Draco rolled his eyes. "I'm going to..." He trailed off, and Harry laughed, kissing him properly before sending him on his way.

"I'm glad everyone could make it," Harry said, gaze trailing over the group. All of the heirs who could risk coming to a party at Longbottom Manor — that was to say, everyone except Pansy and Millie — were there, along with partners. Cassius had even brought Oliver, who had his arm wrapped around his Slytherin's waist, looking overjoyed at being able to act like a couple in front of other people; Harry could understand the feeling. Fred and Angelina were there as well, Angelina's gaze narrowed at Draco while Fred whispered in her ear, looking amused. Of course; she didn't know about their relationship. Oops.

Over by the conservatory, the adults were clustered together, wine in hand; not just Neville's gran and Amelia Bones, but Bill and Fleur, and Tonks and Kingsley. And, of course, the group from Seren Du — Remus was introducing himself to Mrs Longbottom, as one of the few who hadn't met her through Wizengamot dealings.

"And miss an excuse to get together?" Ginny pointed out, grinning. "I'm sure as hell glad for the chance to get out of the house. Hermione's still visiting, and I'm ready to kill the pair of them."

"Does Hermione even see her parents anymore?" Harry asked incredulously; the girl spent most of her year at boarding school, her Christmas breaks either at school or with the Weasleys, and now she was spending most of her summer with the Weasleys too!

"She's going home for a bit after booklists have arrived, she says," Ginny replied, though she sounded skeptical. "But she'll be back to stay with us before school starts. Luckily," she continued, looping her arm through Neville's, "Mrs Longbottom thinks I am a delightful young lady and is happy for me to visit as often as I like."

"You've got her fooled, then," Harry teased, making Ginny laugh.

"Oi, Ginny's not the only one who hasn't seen you in ages, y'know," Susan mock-complained from a few feet away. "Aren't you going to say hello?"

"Hello," Harry replied dutifully, then turned his back on her, only to snicker at her shout of indignation. "Kidding," he said, heading over to hug her. "Hey, Theo. How's it going?"

"Doing well, thanks." Indeed, the Slytherin looked much better than he had when Harry had left him at the Pottery; he looked like he'd actually slept, for one.

Harry made his rounds of the group, saying hello to everyone and accepting the birthday presents offered with bashful smiles, putting them all in his Twilfitt and Tatting extended satchel to open later. He wasn't really sure what the protocol was, but he hoped no one would mind; opening presents in front of his guardians and the Malfoys had been bad enough, he didn't want that sort of pressure.

When he saw Parvati, she hugged him tight. "Thank you for the flowers, you absolute sweetheart. You didn't have to do that."

"I got an E in Divination because of you and Lavender," he retorted, as he'd said in the card with the flowers, "you deserved them for dragging me through that class."

"I got an O in Defence, and I sure as hell wouldn't have done that without you," she argued, smiling fondly. "It's what friends are for."

"Then shut up and accept flowers from your friend," Harry teased, and she laughed.
"Congrats on the O, that's brilliant!"

"Ooh, are we swapping exam results already?" Anthony cut in, looking at them in interest.
"How'd you do, then, Harry?"

"Yes! Inquiring minds want to know," Ginny pestered, smirking. "Ron passed six, mostly As and Es. Hermione's been insufferable — she didn't do half as well as she expected." She rolled her eyes. "Only seven Os, three Es. A true tragedy," she said in mock dismay.

Across the circle, Draco froze, his eyes meeting Harry's triumphantly. "I told you, Potter!"

"I had one more subject, that doesn't count," Harry argued feebly, but Draco was shaking his head, then he turned to Ginny.

"Harry got eight Os," he bragged. "It would have been ten, I'm sure, but there was the mess with Hagrid in Astronomy and then that whole vision business in History."

Immediately there was a wave of exclamations.

"Eight Os! Blimey, Harry!" Ernie said, impressed.

"You little brainbox!" the twins chirped, beaming with pride. Harry felt his cheeks heat, and he turned to glare at Draco, even as a smile threatened to overtake his face.

"I did pretty well, I guess," he admitted. Draco laughed, and kissed him hard enough for Fred to wolf-whistle.

"Fucking nerd," he teased fondly. "Practically a Ravenclaw."

"Oi!" the four Ravenclaws in the bunch piped up, offended.

Harry looked around, desperate for a change in subject. "Alright, what about NEWTs, then? Cassius, how'd you do?" He already knew Angelina's results, and the twins would be sitting theirs at the Ministry in a week.

Cassius' pale cheeks flushed, and Oliver slung an arm around his shoulders, beaming proudly. "Five Os, one E," the Scotsman declared, kissing his partner's cheek. Belatedly, Harry noticed the gold ring shining on his left hand, and gaped.

"Ring!" he exclaimed dumbly, pointing. Cassius raised an eyebrow at him.

"I told you I asked him," he said, and Harry hurried forward, Oliver smugly holding out the hand for Harry to admire.

"You didn't mention you did it properly," Harry said. "You said nothing about a ring! It's gorgeous." When he looked up, Oliver was smiling like he'd won the World Cup singlehandedly, and Cassius was looking at his partner with barely restrained adoration. "This is brilliant. I'm so happy for you both."

Oliver let go of Cassius to bundle Harry in a bear hug. "Couldn't do it without you, mate," he insisted, ruffling Harry's hair. "We've not set a date, mind. But now he's given me a ring he can't change his mind," he joked, winking.

"Really? Bugger," Cassius said dryly, and Oliver just laughed.

"Hate to interrupt, but we got bored of waiting for the birthday boy to come to us." That was Bill, Fleur at his side, and Harry turned to smile sheepishly at them.

"Sorry! There's a lot of people here." Harry wasn't used to having so many people around all expecting to talk to him. Was that what birthday parties were like?

"No worries, kid," Bill teased, clapping Harry on the shoulder. "Happy birthday! Here." He held out a present, but had to wait for Fleur to finish kissing Harry's cheeks before Harry could actually take it. "And congrats on the exam results; Charlie's been bragging all week," he added with a wink. "You'd think he was your godfather, not Sirius, the way he goes on."

Harry blushed — that was news to him. He glanced over at the dragon tamer, who was chatting with Tonks. Had he really been bragging about Harry's exam results?

He didn't know how to handle so many people being so vehemently proud of him. What was the correct response to that??

Eventually, Harry just decided to continue trying to change the subject, and accept that he was going to be blushing for most of the day. Was this what it meant, having a family?

.-. .

Luckily, after the initial rush of greetings and well-wishes and congratulations, the party was a lot easier for Harry to handle; people split up into smaller groups to talk, and Harry was able to drift between them, spending a little time with everyone. He made sure to go over and talk to the adults — especially Mrs Longbottom, thanking her for hosting the party — but it was easier when everyone started to mingle; Charlie came over to congratulate Oliver on his engagement and meet Cassius properly, and Bill and Fleur joined them so Fleur could introduce Bill to her ex Yule Ball date, Cassius jokingly warning Bill to treat her properly.

Then Tonks came over too, claiming the ‘proper adults’ were less fun, and soon everyone was spread out and chatting.

At one point, the twins put on a record player with music both wizarding and muggle, and there was a little makeshift dance floor space cleared. For the first time in his life, Harry had the experience of standing awkwardly while a crowd sang Happy Birthday to him — but Neville was stood right beside him, looking equally uncomfortable, so it wasn’t as bad. They were free once they cut the cake, and Harry warily eyed the twins before taking a bite. There hadn’t been any surprises in the food yet, but he didn’t entirely trust the pair to be on their best behaviour, even after Blaise’s promise that they weren’t going to mess with his birthday party.

The sun started to set and the fairy lights glowed brighter, some of them dancing wildly when Luna came over to whisper to the little creatures, and then she was dancing too, Daphne watching on with a fond smile curling at her mouth. The music got turned up, and Harry managed to drag Draco out to dance with him. “Think of it as payback for ignoring me at the Yule Ball,” he teased, playfully shimmying beside the blond in an effort to get him to loosen up.

“I wasn’t ignoring you at the Yule Ball,” Draco retorted archly. “I just couldn’t go over and dance with you. Believe me, I was staring at you all night.”

Harry laughed, and kissed him, then moved to dance beside Susan and Hannah. Most of Draco’s reluctance was just for show; soon he was dancing quite happily with Harry, hands wandering a little too inappropriately on occasion. It was a constant reminder of what they had planned for after the party, and it was slowly driving Harry to the edge of frustration.

But there was so much else going on, he couldn’t spend too much time thinking about being alone with Draco later — his friends were there, and he wanted to enjoy spending time with them all, because he didn’t know when they would next be able to gather like this. Especially with half of them graduated now.

And with so many of them in difficult positions due to the war, but Harry tried not to think too hard on that.

Neville’s gran retired for the evening not long after the sun set, assuring that anyone who wished to stay the night was welcome to. Kingsley went home around the same time, though Tonks stayed, waving goodbye to her partner and promising to see him bright and early at work in the morning, with a wink that was so heavy-handed Harry wondered how many glasses of wine she’d had.

It seemed those two were the only ones deemed ‘real adults’, as the party got a little bit wilder after that. Considering Sirius was right in the mix exchanging prank spells with the twins, he certainly wasn’t looked on as adult supervision, and even though Remus had taught many of them he thoroughly lost the air of maturity when Sirius egged him into sharing some of his own pranking secrets. All the while, Amelia and Narcissa stood in their own corner with ever-full glasses of wine, ignoring the party entirely and occasionally startling the gathering with a burst of laughter. Wisely, no one dared interrupt to ask what the two women were talking about.

So for one night, all of them could just be stupid teenagers, dancing and drinking butterbeer — and firewhiskey, which Charlie had in a charmed flask and passed around quite liberally — chatting about school and having fun without a single mention of Dark Lords or Dumbledore or the Ministry. It was perfect.

Naturally, with the twins in attendance, there were fireworks. Longbottom Manor didn't have any neighbours for a four mile radius, so they didn't have to worry about being seen; the Weasleys' Whizbangs were in fine form, filling the air with elaborate displays of light and colour — several of which they recognised from the prank against Umbridge, and whooped at the sight of. They all stopped dancing to watch the fireworks, and Harry leaned back against Draco's chest, the blond's hands on his hips. He could feel Draco's breath catch with every loud bang or particularly impressive firework.

"That was amazing, guys," Harry enthused when the display was over, and the twins gave elaborate bows in response to the applause.

"Only the best for our favourite birthday boys!" George replied, tipping an imaginary hat to Harry.

"Even if one of you did wait until after we left school to put his paws all over our little sister," Fred continued, elbowing Neville gently with a smirk.

"Oh, leave him alone," Ginny grumbled.

"Anyone who was in that common room can attest that it was definitely Ginny doing the pawing, don't worry!" Parvati piped up boldly, and there was a loud chorus of 'oooohhh's at her words. Ginny just grinned unashamedly, sliding her arms around Neville's waist.

"Can you blame me?" she remarked, making her already blushing boyfriend turn even redder when she patted him on the backside. "Had to get my claim in there first."

"Our little sister's all grown up and pawing at boys," Fred wailed in mock-despair, looking at Bill.

"With the examples we all gave her, are you surprised?" Bill joked, giving a pointed look to Charlie, who was wrapped around Sirius like an octopus 'to ward off the chill'.

"On the contrary, I couldn't be prouder," George cut in, offering Ginny a thumbs up, his other hand in the back pocket of Blaise's jeans. "You get 'em, sis!"

As Ginny kissed Neville passionately to a cacophony of wolf-whistles, the music was turned back up and the party continued.

It was almost midnight by the time things finally started to wind down — Amelia had gone to bed, Remus and Narcissa went home, and even Bill and Fleur were calling it a night. Meanwhile, half the couples had buggered off to go and snog in a dark corner somewhere. Harry and Draco were one of those couples, briefly, but then they'd been found by Tonks who demanded they both dance with her to her favourite song.

There were only a few groans when Charlie tapped the record player with his wand, ending the music; everyone was tired, and no one really complained at the concept of going to bed. Only a handful were staying the night; those who couldn't floo back home easily, or travel some other way. Ginny got a bit of ribbing from her brothers when she said she was staying for the night, but none of them kicked up a real fuss. They liked Neville — and they knew better than to try and treat Ginny like a baby by now.

There were hugs all around as everyone prepared to head home, and Harry made sure to give Neville an extra long hug. "Thanks again for organising all this, Nev. And thank your gran for hosting."

"It was fun," Neville agreed, grinning. "Best birthday I've ever had, for sure. We should do it again next year if we can."

Harry liked the sound of that.

Making sure he'd said goodbye to everyone, promising to write soon, Harry took Draco's hand and walked with him over to Sirius and Charlie. Sirius had Charlie's cardigan draped around him, far too broad in the shoulders for his much slighter frame, and he grinned at Harry, wrapping an arm around his shoulders. "You ready, pup?"

"Are you two okay to apparate?" he teased, knowing how frequently they had both been drinking from Charlie's flask. Charlie laughed.

"Kid, I've appurated far drunker than this," he assured with a roguish grin. "We'll be fine. Good to go?"

Waving goodbye to his friends, Harry held tightly to Sirius while Draco did the same to Charlie, and with the uncomfortable squeezing sensation that Harry was sort-of getting used to, they were back at the ward boundary of Seren Du. Harry's stomach lurched a little bit, but he hadn't had much alcohol, so it wasn't too bad.

"Drink water," Sirius advised nonetheless, calling Ceri to bring each of them a large glass. He ruffled Harry's hair, leaning down to kiss his forehead. "Good birthday, then?"

"The best," Harry assured, beaming.

"Good." Sirius nudged Harry towards the stairs. "Come on, then; bed time for all of us, I think."

Harry wasn't quick enough to avoid seeing the heated look Sirius shot Charlie, though he desperately wished he had missed it.

They all headed up the stairs, and Sirius paused outside the door to his and Charlie's room. "Goodnight, you two. Keep the noise down," he said with an exaggerated wink. "Love you, Mischief."

"Uh, goodnight, guys," Harry stuttered, blushing. Charlie waved, following Sirius into their room, and then Harry and Draco were alone in the corridor. Harry felt his face heat, biting his lip. “Should we, um.” He gestured towards his room, trying not to spill his water.

His heart was racing as he entered his room — this was it. This was the big moment.

Draco shut the door behind them, and Harry noticed his hands were trembling. Was he nervous, too? That was good. Sort of. Harry didn’t really want both of them to be nervous, but he also didn’t want to be the only one quietly freaking out.

It was ridiculous, really; they’d done just about everything else together, why did this one act have such significance? Plenty of stuff they’d already done was technically sex. But... this was different. This was the thing that people talked about when they referenced losing your virginity. This was a big deal.

Harry set his water down on his desk and shrugged off his jacket, unable to meet Draco’s eyes. When he sat down on the edge of the bed, he was hit with a wave of exhaustion, muscles aching from all the dancing. Draco was bent over in front of him, stepping out of his jeans, and while Harry’s cock jumped at the sight of the blond’s arse in green silk boxers, it wasn’t the overwhelming burn of lust that he anticipated. He unzipped his own jeans, letting his fingers brush against his half-hard length, trying to stir that heat. As he did, Draco’s silver eyes caught his, and they both paused.

“Should we—“

“Are you—“

They spoke at the same time, and blushed. “You first,” Draco said, walking over with his shirt half unbuttoned to stand in front of Harry. Harry’s hands automatically went to the blond’s hips, thumbs settling into the dips of his back.

“Are you...kind of... tired?” he said hesitantly, hoping he wasn’t about to ruin everything. There was a beat of silence, and then slowly Draco fell face-first onto the mattress with a soft thump, rolling over to look up at Harry.

“Merlin, yes,” he sighed, gaze apologetic. “I don’t think we thought this through.”

Harry chuckled, suddenly giddy with relief, and he kicked off his jeans and patted Draco’s thigh. “I think thinking it through too much was our problem,” he countered, lying down beside Draco, their noses almost touching. “I want our first time to be special,” he admitted, “but... putting all that pressure on it just seems a bit... much.” He’d spent half the day thinking about it, and now they were there he was exhausted just from running over every possible scenario in his mind. “There’s no rush. Hell, we’ve got half the summer ahead of us still. And it’s not like we’re sneaking around behind our parents’ backs or anything.” Draco had told him about how utterly mortifying it had been to get caught by Snape brewing lube, but thankfully no embarrassing conversations had followed.

“I want you,” Draco murmured, and as always the words sent a delicious shiver down Harry’s spine. “But without sounding like an utter Hufflepuff, it’s going to be special not because it’s your birthday or we’ve planned it or anything, but because it’s you, and I love you.” He tilted his chin for a kiss, lips moving languidly. “And being entirely honest, I don’t think either of us are up to performing our best right now," he added, eyes trailing over Harry and pausing on the slight bulge in his underwear. Harry chuckled, grabbing the collar of Draco's shirt and pulling him into a sloppy kiss.

"I love you, too," he murmured. "And all I really want right now, is for both of us to get naked... and to go the fuck to sleep, because it has been a really long day." He cracked a lopsided smile. "Rain-check on the birthday present?"

"Deal," Draco agreed. To Harry's amusement, the blond didn't even bother getting back up to finish undressing; he unbuttoned the rest of his shirt while star-fished in the middle of the bed, wriggling out of his underwear in a very graceless move that the Malfoy boy would never admit to anyone but Harry. Harry tugged his t-shirt over his head, dropping his own pants and doing a wandless Tooth-Cleaning charm, then draining his glass of water just in case he did end up with a headache in the morning.

Finally, he shoved Draco over enough to get both of them under the duvet, and pulled the blond into his arms. It felt amazing, having all that naked skin against him, but it still didn't give him more than just a low hum of arousal beneath his exhaustion. He tangled his hand in Draco's soft hair, kissing him deeply, and it was perfect. No need for anything else, not right then.

"Happy birthday, Scarhead," Draco whispered, kissing him once more before slumping against him, tucking his face into the curve of Harry's neck.

They fell asleep within minutes, smiles on their faces, and Harry's last hazy thought was that it was going to take a hell of a lot to top that birthday next year.

.-.-.-.

He woke with a gasp, screams still ringing in his ears and the scent of blood lingering in the back of his throat. Draco was right there, stroking his forehead. He put Harry's glasses on his face, and the world came into focus, including those worry-filled grey eyes. "What was it?" Draco whispered with dread. Harry grimaced, dragging himself into a sitting position.

"My birthday present," he spat, squeezing his eyes shut. "Family of muggles. He..." He couldn't even say out loud what Voldemort and his Death Eaters had done to the poor family. His stomach rolled, but Harry clamped the nausea down.

"Fuck." Draco held him close. "Do you need me to get someone?"

"No, s'too late anyway." They would be long gone by now. Also, he belatedly realised they were both naked, and that would be a whole lot to explain to any of the adults in the house. "What time is it?"

"Little after five," Draco replied, and Harry sighed.

"Sorry." It would be difficult to go back to sleep for any length of time to be worth it.

"Don't be daft," Draco dismissed instantly. "You didn't ask for this."

He manhandled Harry until the Gryffindor was lying against his chest, Draco's hand stroking through his hair. Harry let his eyes fall half-shut, wishing he didn't have such horrifying images in his head when he did. "Fucking Voldemort," he growled. "I had such a nice birthday, too." Why did he have to ruin everything?

Draco had no response, and the pair lay there for a while in silence, Draco just stroking Harry's hair as the shudders slowly faded from his body. Even the goblins didn't have an answer for why Harry felt an echo of Voldemort's Cruciatus curses in visions, but it often left him with muscle spasms the morning after a vision.

At seven, Harry gave up on even the vaguest hope of going back to sleep, sitting up and stretching out his arms. "I'm gonna take a shower," he declared, pressing a kiss to Draco's lips. "I'd ask you to join me, but..."

"Visions are a bit of a mood-killer," Draco finished knowingly. "It's fine."

They got out of bed, and while Harry grabbed his dressing gown and a new towel, Draco put on just enough of last night's clothes to have the important parts covered as he snuck back to his own room.

Showered and feeling a little better, Harry went down to the kitchen. Remus and Snape were the only ones up, and they both looked at him in mild surprise. "Harry," Remus greeted. "I thought you'd have a lie in this morning."

"So did I," Harry replied bitterly. "But Voldemort decided to give me a birthday present. Nothing we can do," he added as both men tensed. "But that poor muggle family... I don't even know who they were." Likely Voldemort had some reason for choosing them in particular, but it was a mystery to Harry.

"Oh, cub, I'm sorry." Remus hugged him, and Ceri floated over a cup of tea. "I... are you sure you don't want to do the ritual with the goblins? I hate that you're having to suffer through all of these visions."

"These visions save lives, Moony," Harry insisted. "I can't give that up just so I can sleep a bit better."

Remus levelled him with a searching look, but eventually sighed, shaking his head. "There's no convincing you, is there?"

"He's a Gryffindor, Remus. Are you surprised?" Snape muttered wryly.

Draco joined them, and neither of the adults seemed surprised that he already knew about Harry's vision. Harry was too tired to be embarrassed by that.

When Sirius came down, he was grinning widely, clearly ready to start throwing around innuendo — then he saw the looks on the rest of their faces, and his smile faded. "What's wrong?"

“Vision,” Harry explained. “Apparently the Dark Lord’s idea of a perfect birthday present is torturing a bunch of innocent muggles on my behalf. No wonder he doesn’t have any friends.”

Draco snorted behind his teacup.

“Oh, pup, no.” Sirius’ face fell. “Are you alright?”

“Fine.” At least, he would be, once he could close his eyes without seeing that little girl’s terrified, bloodied face.

“Well. Moony and I had plans for you boys today, but if you’d rather postpone, that’s completely fine.”

“Plans? What plans?” Draco asked, narrowing his eyes. Sirius and Remus shared a small grin.

“We thought we’d take you to some of our old haunts, in muggle London. Obviously none of the over-eighteens places,” Sirius added quickly, eyes darting towards Narcissa. “But a couple of places we loved when we were your age. They’ve changed a bit, but they’re still worth a visit.”

Harry perked up a little — that sounded like the perfect distraction from the images swimming in his head. The prospect of showing Draco muggle London was bound to cheer him up.

“No, we can do that today,” he insisted. “I want to.”

Sirius brightened up. “Good. We’ll leave at around nine, then.”

Across the table, Snape set down his paper, eyeing Remus flatly. “You’re taking them to Infinite aren’t you,” he said, sounding resigned. Remus’ eyes twinkled.

“We are. Want me to bring you back anything? Or maybe something from the place next door?” he added teasingly.

“That dump is still in business?”

“Oi, watch what you’re calling a dump,” Sirius piped up in mock-offence. “I found some great stuff in that shop. And on second thought, please don’t ever tell me what you and Remus did or saw or bought in there, I don’t need those mental images.”

Harry had no idea what kind of shop they were talking about, but from the look on Sirius’ face, he could make a few good guesses.

Snape turned to Remus, smirking slowly. “I’ll give you a list,” he drawled, and Sirius groaned.

The ‘old haunts’ Sirius and Remus were referring to turned out to be a series of hole-in-the-wall shops in a dodgy corner of Soho, their doors covered in stickers, one of them with a rainbow flag hanging from an upper window. The first one they went into was a record shop, and Harry stared in awe at the music options available.

“I bought my first ever muggle record from this shop, when I was fourteen,” Sirius declared proudly, a hand on Harry’s shoulder. “Go have a look, see what strikes your fancy.”

Harry had very little frame of reference for what he might like, but he flipped through the record bins anyway, pausing at covers that caught his eye or band names that he recognised. Tonks and Sirius were both trying to work on his musical education, which was giving him some... eclectic tastes, to say the least.

They left the shop with a handful of records shrunk in Sirius’ bag, heading down a few doors to a place called Infinite, the sign small and showing nothing more than a rainbow infinity symbol on a black background. Harry took a quick look at the shop next door — there was a sign on the front that declared under-eighteens were not allowed in, and from some of the stickers surrounding it he confirmed his suspicions that the place was a sex shop. He flushed, tearing his gaze away.

Maybe they could come back to that one under glamours, sometime.

But Infinite was equally fascinating, and more than a little risqué itself. Sirius laughed when Draco turned bright red over a large framed drawing of a naked man, and pointedly sidled across to the other side of the shop when the boys got into browsing certain sections.

It was a much bigger shop than it looked from the outside, and Harry found his way to a small book section. There was a shelf entirely full of non-fiction books on sexuality and gender — muggle equivalents of the book George had given him once, and what looked like a newer version of the book on the gender spectrum that Remus had given him. A couple of them looked interesting, and Harry added them to his basket.

On a lower shelf was a collection of what were very clearly queer erotica novels, and Harry daringly picked one of those out, too. Draco would probably get a kick out of it.

There were some t-shirts along the back wall emblazoned with flags and slogans, and Harry grabbed a couple — both because he liked them but also to wear around Hogwarts when he wanted to piss off Dumbledore.

When he found Draco once more, the blond was staring with a sort of horrified fascination at what seemed to be a blown-glass dildo. Harry slid in behind him, kissing the back of his neck. “Find anything fun?” he drawled, feeling Draco press back against him.

“Muggles really have thought of everything, haven’t they?” the Slytherin whispered, awed. Harry chuckled.

“Just about.” He took the blond by the hand, leading him over to a display of weird-looking novelty toys. As they looked, a young woman ducked out from behind the register, smiling brightly. Her hair was bright pink, and there were several piercings in her ears and face. She looked like someone Tonks would be great friends with.

“Hey, you two looking for anything in particular I can help with?” she asked, and Harry shrugged.

“Not really. We’ve, uh, never been here before. My godfathers brought us,” he explained, looking around for either Sirius or Remus, but they were nowhere in sight. Perhaps it was planned; giving them privacy to explore the shop without being embarrassed to have either adult looking over their shoulder.

“Aww, inducting the baby gays, I love it!” the woman cooed in delight. “Well, welcome, I’m June, and the sign on the door says we check IDs but I’m gonna be honest with you, we only have that up so the police get off our backs about distributing pornography,” she added with a roll of her eyes. “Let me know if you need any help or anything, okay? Also, you two are very cute together.” She grinned when they both blushed, and retreated back behind the counter.

Harry could have spent hours in that shop, in all honesty. Everywhere he looked there was something else interesting, and while a lot of it was quite sexual there was also a lot of tamer stuff that was just about being proud to be yourself, and helping to explore identities and become comfortable in your own skin. Even in the wizarding world, where homosexuality wasn’t nearly as taboo as it was with the muggles, Harry couldn’t imagine finding a shop like this.

He thought about teenage Sirius and Remus, the way he’d seen them in their pensieve memories, kicking around this place on their summers. Remus bringing Snape in when he knew Sirius wouldn’t be there, both of them enjoying the anonymity of the muggle world to be a couple, even if it was only within these walls.

It felt like a safe haven, like a hug in a shop — come in, it said, feel welcome here, even when you don’t feel welcome anywhere else.

“I like this place,” he murmured, and Draco hummed quietly, nodding.

“Me, too.”

They kept looking, and after June’s assurance that she wasn’t going to ID them for anything — and a quick look around to check Sirius was nowhere in sight — he added a book of gay sex positions and some flavoured lube to his basket, smirking at Draco’s blush. June rang him up without batting an eyelash; Harry imagined she’d seen all sorts of purchases, working at a place like this.

As if by magic, Sirius appeared right as Harry was putting his purchases away in his bag. “What do you think, pup?” he asked, smiling slightly. There was a knowing look in his eyes when Harry smiled back.

“It’s really cool,” he confirmed. Sirius’ grin widened. “Where’s Remus?”

“Next door, I think.”

Harry froze at the implication, then shuddered. “I should not have asked.”

Behind him, he heard June giggle quietly.

“Are you, uh, buying anything, Sirius?” Draco asked, voice a little strangled. Sirius barked out a laugh.

“Nah, don’t worry. This trip is all for you guys.” Then, because he was Sirius and he was the worst, he smirked lasciviously. “Charlie and I went on our own shopping trip last week.”

Harry groaned, shaking his head. “Nope, nope, don’t want to know,” he declared vehemently.

“Oh come on, Harry,” Sirius wheedled, wiggling his eyebrows, “there’s nothing to be ashamed of. It’s all perfectly natural.”

“It’s not out of shame,” Harry retorted, “it’s out of a desire to kiss my own boyfriend without ever getting mental images of what you get up to with yours.”

Sirius laughed again, ruffling his godson’s hair.

“It’s not me and mine you should worry about, it’s Remus and his,” he teased. “You still have to look Snape in the eye in class for two more years.”

“And that’s why we’re not going to talk about whatever Remus is buying next door,” Harry retorted pointedly. Before Sirius could really get going, Harry turned to June, who was valiantly holding in her laughter. “Thanks for your help. I, um, I’m sure we’ll be back sometime.”

“Glad to hear it.” She smiled, playing with her lip piercing. “Sounds like you guys have an... interesting family dynamic.”

Harry snorted. “That’s one word for it.” She hadn’t even heard the half of it.

“Well it’s good to hear you have a solid support network. A lot of kids aren’t lucky enough to have someone who would bring them to a place like this, let alone anything else.” June’s voice was soft, and it made Harry look back at Sirius fondly.

“Yeah, I know. I’m definitely lucky.”

Sirius slung an arm around his neck, kissing his hair. “Not letting you have the same shitty teenage years I did, Mischief,” he promised. “When I was your age, this place and your dad were the only things keeping me sane. God, it’s good to be back.”

“You sure you don’t want to look around?” Harry asked with raised eyebrows, but Sirius shook his head.

“Nah, we’ve got other places to be. Come on, let’s go pick up that lone wolf of ours.”

They bid a cheerful goodbye to June, and left the shop — at the same time, the door on their left opened, and Remus walked out, tucking a brown paper bag into his satchel. He froze, staring at the three of them for one long moment, then smiled wryly. “Where to next, then?”

Harry shared a look with Draco — yes, they were definitely never going to ask.

.-.-.

They spent most of the day in London, visiting more shops that Sirius insisted were integral to their ‘queer education’, then went over to Leicester Square to eat burgers and people-watch. Or rather, Draco was people-watching; Harry was watching Draco experience muggle life at its finest with a look in his eyes that Remus described as ‘utterly smitten’. Harry couldn’t even pretend to be annoyed about the call-out; it was true, after all. Draco’s joy and incredulity at seeing perfectly ordinary muggle things was adorable, and Harry couldn’t wait to one day introduce him to more.

When they got home, Sirius clapped them both on the shoulders and told them to let him know if they wanted him to take them back anywhere in future, then transformed into Padfoot and bounded across the grass, barking happily. Remus sighed, shaking his head in fond bemusement. “He’s sixteen all over again,” he muttered. “Silly dog. I suppose I’ll be out here playing fetch for a while. I’ll see you boys later.”

He jogged off after the shaggy black dog, and the two teenagers headed inside, making for the stairs. Harry wanted to put away his new purchases before Sirius — or anyone else — could get nosy and start snooping. He wasn’t surprised when Draco followed him to his room; both their purchases were in the same bag, after all.

“I had no idea that shops like that even existed,” the blond mused, still looking a little overwhelmed by the day’s events.

“Me neither.” Harry set his satchel on the bed, pulling out more bags than a muggle would expect to fit in such a space. “I mean, I knew they had to — I’d heard stuff, mostly my aunt and uncle talking about how depraved and perverted it all was. But I never really thought about what might be inside one.” A wave of his wand had his new clothes hanging up in his wardrobe, and his new books on his shelf. The lube he eyed with consideration, before deciding to put it in his bedside drawer.

When he turned around, Draco was holding a roll of dark green bondage tape, and Harry’s eyes went wide. “I didn’t see you buy that.”

“I can be sneaky,” Draco drawled in reply, stepping closer. “It looked interesting.”

Interesting was definitely one word for it. Harry’s throat went a little dry. “Y’know, I was thinking,” he started, voice low, “next summer, once we’ve got our apparition licenses... we could conjure up a couple of fake IDs and have a look at some of those shops we’re too young to go into. What do you think?”

Draco’s eyes darkened. “It’s a date,” he replied. The tape in one hand, Draco let his other slide around to Harry’s backside, squeezing lightly. “Now, whatever shall we do with the rest of our evening?"

"I've got a few ideas." After the things he'd seen in those shops, Harry had a lot of ideas. One jumped to the forefront of his mind, blood rushing southwards. "We could... take that rain-check, if you're interested?" He waved his hand, locking and silencing the door. Draco gaped slightly.

"You want to?"

"I've kinda been thinking about it since we left Infinite," Harry admitted huskily. "I—I'm ready. If you are."

"Yeah," Draco breathed, nodding dazedly. "Y-yeah, okay then."

Harry quickly shoved his satchel off the bed, pulling his t-shirt over his head without getting his glasses tangled up. His heart thudded hard against his ribs, but he didn't have any of the nerves he'd had the day before; all he felt was excitement, and near-painful levels of arousal.

This was Draco. His Draco, the boy he'd known since they were eleven, the boy he'd loved since they were fourteen. And after a day being surrounded by erotica and phallic objects and so much pride, Harry felt silly for having been so worried about it before. It was a big deal, sure, but it wasn't a big deal. It was nothing to be afraid of, not with Draco.

He'd loved everything else they'd done together, even the things that had started out a little awkward. Why would this be any different?

They fell onto the bed, tugging at each other's clothes and grinning into open-mouthed kisses. Harry got distracted sucking a hickey onto Draco's neck, loving the breathy moans that spilled from his lips — but then Draco yanked his trousers down and gripped his cock, and Harry arched down into him with a gasp. "Easy," he warned. "Don't make me go too early." He smirked, kissing Draco, biting playfully at his bottom lip. "I want you to enjoy this."

Soon they were fully naked; a familiar sight to Harry, but still one that sent a thrill through him, had him running fingers over flawless pale skin in awe. He would never get tired of looking at Draco's body.

Reluctantly removing his mouth from Draco's right nipple, Harry reached over to the bedside drawer for the vial Draco had tucked away in there a few days ago. This wasn't anything new, either; they had used lube before, stuff that Harry had brewed in the Chamber of Secrets. They had practiced stretching each other, finding that little bundle of nerves that sent fireworks up behind their eyes.

Taking this step felt like the most natural thing in the world, now that they hadn't spent several days psyching themselves up for it.

Harry kneeled between Draco's spread knees, vial ignored on the bedsheets as he stroked the sensitive pale skin of his inner thighs, leaning up to kiss him and bucking his hips down into him, their cocks trapped between their stomachs. Draco moaned, one arm coming up above his head, a pink flush flooding his face and spreading down his neck. “Go on, Harry,” he urged. “I’m ready.”

They had decided it would be this way, at least for the first time. Harry dropped a tender kiss on Draco’s lips, then slid down his body, tongue swiping out at Draco’s cock just quick enough to make the blond give a full body jerk. “Fucking tease,” Draco swore, making Harry grin.

He nudged Draco’s legs a little wider, grabbing a pillow to prop under the blond’s hips. The book said it was usually easier to start on all fours, but they both wanted to be face to face, even if it meant a little more discomfort to start.

Then, he reached for the vial of lube, uncorking it carefully and pouring some over his fingers. Shuffling down, he pressed a kiss to the inside of Draco’s thigh, and slid his first finger in.

Draco let out a long, low groan at the sensation, and Harry’s whole body pulsed with arousal at the feeling of the blond’s muscles relaxing for him. He’d done this a handful of times before, but this time he would finally get to feel that tight heat around his cock.

He added a second finger, moving carefully, searching out that perfect angle. When he found it, Draco’s back arched and he cried out, hand clutching against the sheets. “Fuck. Harry, please,” he gasped, the sound going straight to Harry’s groin. “More.”

Harry slid in a third finger, crooking them gently to rub over Draco’s prostate once more. Draco made the most incredible noises, and for a moment Harry worried he might not last long enough to even get inside him. Looking at him spread out on Harry’s bed like that, face a picture of bliss, Harry’s fingers deep inside him... Harry had to take a deep breath to steady himself.

He worked the three fingers in until the muscles relaxed a little more, and leaned down to press a kiss to Draco’s stomach. “Are you... can I...?” He couldn’t find the words, but Draco looked up at him, pupils wide.

“Yes, fuck,” he breathed. “I need you inside me, Harry. Come on.”

Harry sucked in a sharp breath. Okay, then.

He reached for the vial for more lube, slicking up his cock generously. The book always said there was no such thing as too much.

Slowly, thighs quivering already, Harry lined himself up carefully. He locked eyes with Draco, smiling slightly. He was glad he’d kept his glasses on; he wanted to see this as clearly as possible. “I love you,” he said, and Draco’s gaze darkened.

“I love you, too. Now move.”

Harry pressed against Draco’s slick hole, and ever so slowly began to sink inside. Draco stiffened, spine straightening as he tensed automatically, and Harry stroked over his stomach, lube-slick hand wrapping around his boyfriend's cock, coaxing him through the initial discomfort. For Harry, it was the most incredible feeling in the world, that tight-hot-pressure wrapped around him, knowing it was Draco, he was inside him.

Draco gave a slight grimace of pain, and Harry froze immediately. "No," the blond urged, "keep going. It's just— weird. Keep moving."

Harry did so, going as slow as he dared, breathing steadily to stop himself from coming far too early. He was suddenly very, very glad that they had taken their time to get to this point — if they'd tried it a few months ago, he would not have been able to control himself, and it would have been over embarrassingly quickly.

When he was in all the way, he stopped, looking down at Draco with concern. "You okay?"

Draco nodded. Unable to help himself, Harry leaned down to kiss him — and as soon as he did so, Draco shouted. "What?" Harry pulled back. "Did that hurt?"

Draco shook his head, reaching up to grab Harry's shoulder and pull him back down into a sloppy, gasping kiss. "No, fuck, that's— more." He met Harry's gaze insistently. "Move, Potter. Now."

Harry snorted, lips curling in a relieved smile, and he did as asked. First with just little jolts of his hips, testing the water, then getting a little braver when it seemed Draco was enjoying it. Then, finally, he hit that perfect pleasure spot, and got to feel Draco clench tight around him as he bucked up against Harry, drawing him in deeper. "Fuck, just, go for it," Draco urged, fingers tightening on Harry's shoulder. "Stop holding back. I want it."

Harry eyed him skeptically, but started to push a bit harder, bracing himself against the headboard. Draco moaned with every thrust, eyes closed, one of his hands wrapped around himself, and Harry knew then he wasn't going to last much longer.

"Draco," he breathed, and the blond dragged him down into another kiss, gasping into his mouth. "Draco, I'm gonna—"

"Do it." There was challenge dancing in those grey eyes, and as always Harry rose to it with aplomb, thrusting into Draco and losing himself in the motions, the pleasure building and building. He pulled one hand off the headboard and gripped Draco's cock, determined to make his boyfriend come before he did — with one swipe of his thumb over the weeping head, Draco arched up, and suddenly Harry saw stars as Draco clenched around him with the force of his orgasm. He had no hope of lasting through that, spilling into Draco with a ragged cry, climax ripping through him with such force he could hardly breathe for a moment. He slumped down onto Draco, trying not to fall fully on top of him, Draco's seed sticky between them. His cock slipped out, still sensitive from the aftershocks, and the pair lay there breathing heavily together, Harry's face mashed against Draco's collarbone.

"Oh," Draco sighed eventually — it was a sigh of satisfaction, a sound that made Harry go boneless, warmth flooding through his body. "Was that— how was that for you?"

Harry managed to lift his head, grinning dazedly. “Fucking amazing,” he declared, kissing Draco’s chin. “You?”

“Yeah,” Draco agreed, nodding, chest still heaving. “Sweet Merlin.”

The sweat on Harry’s skin began to cool, along with other things that were cooling much more uncomfortably. Harry did as gentle a Cleaning charm as he could manage, but both of them still squirmed at the magic. He shuffled further up Draco’s body, their heads next to each other on the pillow. “I love you,” he murmured, rolling them over, pulling Draco on top of him, trying to get at as much skin as he could reach. “I— fuck. We can do that again, right?”

Draco laughed. “I fucking hope so,” he retorted. “Maybe next time we could do it the other way round, see how that feels.”

Despite his recent orgasm, the prospect sent a surge of pleasure through Harry’s veins.

Merlin, he hoped next time was soon.

Chapter End Notes

As far as I'm aware, Infinite is not a place that exists, or existed in the 90s, but I'm sure there were definitely shops something like it and Sirius would know how to find them. He just wants the boys to be happy and comfortable in their identities :3

Chapter 83

The Prophet were getting bolder in their attempts to defame Harry, full of quotes from Dumbledore and other ‘anonymous witnesses’ about Harry’s concerning behaviours at school in the past year. Luckily, according to the letter Harry had just received from Mrs Frobisher, the last issue was enough for her to send one hell of a Cease-And-Desist in their direction.

It won’t stop Dumbledore, but it’ll give you some peace from the Prophet. And Amelia and I are working on the rest. We’re handling this, Harry. Don’t worry.

It was a novel feeling, having someone so dedicated to protecting his public image. He knew it would only do so much — the damage had been done with what Dumbledore had already said — but it was reassuring to know that it would all stop soon.

Now that they were securely into August, it felt like the new school year was looming far too close on the horizon. Harry knew a month was a long time — they’d already fit so much into the first month of summer, after all — but even so, the little clock in the back of his mind was ticking ominously.

It was a strange world indeed, when going back to school felt like going into enemy territory.

Still, the rest of the household were determined not to let him get too caught up in his worries. He trained when he could, and still made time for fun things with the others — and if it looked like he was getting too stuck in his own head with all his worries, Draco was happy to drag him upstairs while their guardians pointedly pretended not to notice.

Harry had to fight the dreamy smile that threatened to take over when he thought about his boyfriend, who had become so much bolder since the day after Harry’s birthday, when they had finally taken that step. It was like Draco had been holding his breath, wondering if every chance alone would turn into the big one, but now they had... Harry didn’t want to say got it over with, but now they had reached that point and both enjoyed the process, Draco was more relaxed in the bedroom than Harry had seen him since before exams.

Though they tried not to spend every night together; not because of fears of their guardians saying anything — it was clear that everyone in the house knew that the two boys were having sex, much to their embarrassment — but because neither of them wanted to get used to falling asleep together and then struggle to separate once they got back to Hogwarts.

Also, Harry was still having visions most nights, and he wanted to make sure Draco got some sleep that wasn’t interrupted by his flailing and screaming.

But they weren’t completely co-dependent, and aimed to stay that way — as such, Draco and Narcissa were off catching up with everyone at Malfoy Manor for the day, while Harry was in the library with Remus. Sirius and Charlie were... somewhere in the house, and Harry did not want to contemplate that too closely.

"Hey, can you take a look at this? It looks interesting," Harry said, handing over his book open to a page about spell-chains in duelling. Remus raised an eyebrow, but obligingly took the text, his face lighting up when he started to read.

"Oh, yes! Have I not taught you this before?" Harry shook his head, and the werewolf frowned. "Hmm. I swear it was on my list." He shrugged, shuffling over so they could both read the book at the same time. "It's fascinating stuff, really; you—" But whatever it was, Harry never got to find out; Snape stormed through the door, his rage like a cloud around his shoulders, magic practically vibrating from his skin. "Severus!" Remus jumped to his feet, alarmed. "What's happened?"

Harry narrowed his eyes, too; the professor had just come from a staff meeting, if he wasn't mistaken. "What's Dumbledore done now?" he asked warily, and the Slytherin let out a growl.

"Signed my fucking death warrant, that's what he's done," Snape muttered furiously. Harry looked to Remus in wide-eyed horror.

Remus stepped up to his partner, placing one hand on his shoulder and leaning in, other hand on the back of his neck. "Calm, Severus. Start from the beginning."

Snape's back went taut like a bowstring, then all at once he slumped against Remus' form — as much as Snape could slump, at least. Harry felt like an intruder just sitting there, watching them like this, but he couldn't get away.

"Today, we were introduced to the newest member of Hogwarts staff," Snape declared, straightening up to look at Remus with a sneer on his face. Both of them seemed to have forgotten Harry was even in the room. "Or, rather, re-introduced. Albus has brought back Horace Slughorn."

Harry didn't know who that was, but the name made Remus gasp. "Slughorn? Merlin, I didn't know he was still kicking around. So— wait. If he's coming back, that means..." He looked at his partner with trepidation, and Snape gave a short nod.

"I have finally been granted the position of Defence Against the Dark Arts teacher," he confirmed bitterly.

"What?" Harry blurted, unable to help himself, and both men whipped around to look at him. Harry was too bewildered to even blush. "I mean— can he do that?"

Snape snorted. "Albus can do whatever he wants at this point," he retorted. "But yes; Horace Slughorn was the Potions professor who taught us when we were in school. He retired shortly after I gained my Mastery, which is when I took over, but it seems Albus has convinced him to come out of retirement."

"Well... that's not so bad, is it? I mean, at least we'll have a competent Defence teacher this year." Even if it would be even harder for Snape to keep his cover as a Death Eater and still teach something useful in a class like DADA. "I know the position is cursed or whatever, but... not everyone who's taught it has died. Remus is still here."

Snape's face twisted in a scowl. "Unfortunately, that is the least of my problems." He pinched the bridge of his nose. "After the staff meeting, Albus bid me to speak with him privately. It seems he has had enough time since his incident with that damned ring to make plans — he knows he is dying, and he knows the Dark Lord wants him dead, and he has decided to tie the two neatly together." He turned back to Remus with haunted black eyes. "He has made me take a vow to kill him, should the opportunity arise, in order to secure my position at the Dark Lord's side."

Harry's blood went cold. "He what."

"Quite," Snape murmured, glancing Harry's way. "It seems all my fantasies of permanently wiping that damned twinkle from his eyes have been offered to me. Only at the price of my soul."

If Snape killed Dumbledore, even if they could prove it was at the headmaster's instruction, the man would be vilified forever. There would be no redeeming him in the eyes of the general public. Nothing Harry could say or reveal about Dumbledore would make such an act in any way forgivable by the wizarding world at large, not from a man like Severus Snape.

"I won't let that happen," he declared, and Snape snorted.

"I know you manage to pull miracles from thin air on a regular basis, Potter, but even you might struggle to turn this one around. He has forced me into an Unbreakable Vow. Should Death Eaters attack the school by the end of this year — and he seems alarmingly confident that they will — I am magically obliged to murder him in front of as many people as possible, once the opportunity arises. Thus my employment will be terminated, fulfilling the curse on the position — and convincing the Dark Lord that I am loyal to no one but him."

"And perhaps if you were truly loyal to Albus Dumbledore, that might have worked," Harry countered. "But you're forgetting something — there is no way in hell I'm letting Dumbledore control the school for another full year." He smirked, green eyes flashing. "He's dying regardless. If I have enough people publicly losing faith in him while he's trying to secure his legacy, he'll get angry — he'll start making mistakes. He's already started doing that; his work in the Prophet has been sloppy at best, giving me something I can actually take legal action on. He doesn't care about Voldemort right now, he just wants me back under his control before he pops his clogs so that when I off the Dark bastard, everyone chalks it up to Dumbledore's fine mentorship of me," he said with a roll of his eyes.

"Harry, it's not that simple," Remus started, but Harry shook his head.

"I'll kill the headmaster myself before I let him force you into it, Snape," he insisted, watching surprise flicker across that dour face. He gave his best innocent, Golden Boy grin. "I'm the Boy-Who-Lived, after all."

"And if Albus has done his level best to make the public think you're the next Dark Lord?" Snape retorted pointedly. Harry just shrugged.

"Then I bring out the evidence of him turning me into his little magical puppet, bring out the Sad Orphan Face, and do my best. By that point, I'm fairly confident I can destroy his reputation so thoroughly the country will just want to sweep the whole thing under the rug to save face.” Then he smirked. “Besides, your Vow might insist you kill him in a public manner — I’m under no such requirements. I’m sure I can make it look like an accident.”

The two men stared at him for a long moment, and then Remus shook his head incredulously. “The Slytherins really have claimed you, haven’t they?” he sighed, and Harry laughed.

“Sorry, Moony. Comes with the family magics, I suppose.” Also from training with Snape, and dating Draco, and talking to Salazar — he was doomed from the get go, really.

“I cannot ask you to kill a man to save my reputation, Harry,” Snape insisted, and Harry stared him down unflinchingly.

“You’re not asking,” he replied. “I’m telling you, it’s not going to come to that. Let my friends and I do the work — let Amelia and Mrs Frobisher do the work. We’ll have him out before exams, at the latest.” There was no way the public would let Dumbledore continue to be responsible for children once Harry was through with him.

His face softened, and he flicked his gaze to Remus, who was staring at him in astonishment. “You’ve already given so much of your life to Dumbledore’s service, sir,” he said to Snape, “I’m not going to stand back and let you give him this, too.”

One day, he and Remus would be able to stand together publicly and admit their love, and Harry would be damned if Snape was seen as a criminal by the time that day arrived. Not after everything Snape had done for him, for the Light, for the whole bloody country.

Snape stared at him, utterly silent, for a long moment. Harry tried not to fidget under the man’s scrutiny, keeping his shoulders square.

“I think,” Snape said eventually, a tone to his voice that Harry couldn’t quite place, “it is about time you called me Severus. Only when outside school, of course.”

Harry gaped at him. “I— um—“

Beside Snape, Remus smiled. “I think what Severus is trying to say, cub, is that he’s very grateful for your support, but let’s not get you set on murdering the headmaster quite so easily.” He twined his fingers with Snape’s, their shoulders pressed together. “Much can happen between now and the end of the year. But I will not see either one of you throw yourselves on that bastard’s sword.” His amber eyes flashed gold, determination written in every inch of his body. “We are a family, and we will figure this out as a family. For now, all you have to do is prepare for the new school year. Severus, you’re welcome to borrow as much of my old lesson plans as you require, if you’d like them.”

Good old Moony, reminding them what was truly important — academic preparedness.

Harry flashed a quick smile. “I, uh, for what it’s worth, si— Severus,” the name felt strange on his tongue, “I’m not sure what this Slughorn bloke is like, but I’m glad you’re going to be the new Defence teacher. If... if we’re heading into a war, the students need all the preparation they can get, and I know you won’t go easy on them.”

Snape looked faintly amused. “They will all hate me even more than they did in Potions,” he said knowingly, making Harry laugh.

“Maybe.” Snape would be just as harsh a taskmaster as he was with everything else, and even more prejudiced towards Slytherins besides. “But they’ll learn a darn sight faster than they would have with another bloody Umbridge involved.” If only through abject fear of what Snape might do to them should they fail.

A thought hit Harry, and his smirk widened. “Dumbledore’s going to expect me to be livid,” he realised delightedly.

“And I’m sure I will have ample opportunity to put you in detention,” Snape agreed, catching on as quickly as always. Harry laughed.

“Wonder if he’ll ever realise he just did me a massive favour.”

Dumbledore had declared war, and Harry was more than ready to meet him there.

.-.-.-.

Order meetings in the last few weeks had become an utter embarrassment, Sirius decided; it was a good thing they were a secret vigilante organisation, because if they behaved like this in a public forum, no one would take them seriously.

He glanced across the table at Remus, who looked equally fed-up by the incessant squabbling. Sirius had lost track of what this one was even about — it had started with a fairly reasonable discussion about whether the auror department could be considered trustworthy, but then derailed quite quickly when Tonks had mentioned Harry’s visions being the only decent way to get ahead of Death Eaters these days. Now it seemed there were about four arguments happening at once, all stemming from the reliability of using a teenage boy’s insight into a Dark Lord’s mind as a warning signal. It seemed Dumbledore’s pointed remarks in the Prophet had got to them — though the headmaster himself was being remarkably quiet on the matter.

Sirius expected nothing less; Dumbledore wouldn’t let himself be seen or heard actively disparaging Harry, not when he clearly still had plans to bring Harry back to heel. Every time Sirius saw him these days, the man had increasingly firm requests to see Harry prior to school returning. Every time, Sirius told him where to shove it.

He was starting to wonder if he shouldn’t just kick the whole damned Order out of his house and be done with it.

As tempting as that sounded, he knew Harry wouldn’t approve — they needed to know what Dumbledore was up to, and that meant at least some of them staying on his good side.

But as much as Sirius knew his godson meant well in wanting him to remain on semi-decent terms with the headmaster, Sirius was entirely ready to just punch the old bastard in the face.

"I think that is enough for today," Dumbledore declared over the chaos, waiting for silence to fall. "As difficult as it is to trust Harry's visions, knowing where they come from, we must continue to take advantage of this information — at least for now, while it appears to be accurate."

Sirius snarled silently; was he implying that Harry may start giving them false information, soon?

With the meeting dismissed, everyone started to go their separate ways. Sirius turned to Charlie, ready to leave — only to hear his name called in that infuriating too-calm voice.

"Yes, Albus?" he asked through gritted teeth, turning to smile at the elderly headmaster. Dumbledore reached into a pocket of his robes, pulling out a thick envelope.

"I'm afraid I had some trouble addressing young Harry's booklist, and I thought it might be easier to just hand it over in person." He chuckled quietly. "Or as close to it, with you keeping Harry tucked away so safely all summer! Here," he handed over the letter, "I trust you will make sure this gets to him in time. Please do send him my regards, won't you?"

Sirius took the letter, fingers tingling from the magic seeped into the parchment. He fought back a scowl. "I'll pass it on," he confirmed. Dumbledore smiled genially, clasping his hands together.

"Wonderful. Well, I shall see you at the next meeting, then."

He left, not even bothering to ask Sirius for a meeting with Harry, which was even more suspicious. Charlie was lingering in the doorway with concern in his eyes, and Sirius jerked his head towards the stairs — he wasn't going anywhere until he'd taken a proper look at that letter.

"Trouble addressing it my arse," he muttered, once they were shut away securely in the drawing room. "Trouble seeing the address, more like." Harry had no trouble getting post from anyone else; even his OWL results had made it fine. The only way Dumbledore would have had trouble was if he was trying to glean the address of the Unplottable building from the magic involved in addressing and sending school letters.

"Do I need to call Bill back?" Charlie asked, but Sirius shook his head, drawing his own wand.

"Nah, I think I know what this is." He grew up with incredibly paranoid parents; Sirius knew what tracking charms felt like.

Sure enough, a few diagnostic spells revealed at least four different trackers embedded in the letter, and with a growl Sirius dismantled them all.

Charlie edged closer, chest pressing against Sirius' shoulder as he eyed the parchment warily. "Should we open it and copy it for Harry, or...?"

"I don't think that's necessary." Sirius couldn't feel any other magic on there; if Dumbledore had any other trackers, they were nothing he'd ever seen before, and he'd seen a lot.

"Besides, look at that thing." He glanced down at the envelope, a proud grin sliding across his face. "If I'm not mistaken, there's a badge in there."

Charlie's eyes widened, and he leaned in to get a better look, his body warm against Sirius' back. "You think— quidditch captain?" he asked excitedly.

"Unless they've rescinded your brother's prefect badge," Sirius replied with a snort. He pecked Charlie on the cheek, picked up the envelope, and held out a hand. "Let's go give this to Harry so we can find out, yeah?"

Charlie grinned at him, fingers twining together, and together they apparated home.

Sirius didn't feel any alarm from the wards as they stepped through — not like he had at Grimmauld with those tracking spells triggering all sorts of warnings — so he assumed he'd managed to get rid of everything. He smirked to himself; take that, Dumbledore.

The sound of laughter and splashing ringing through the air made them pause in their stride, and the pair turned away from the path to the front door, heading around the back to the pool. It seemed the boys were taking advantage of the glorious sunshine, though Sirius would bet Draco had a strong Sunblock charm on that fair skin of his. Narcissa was out there too, sprawled gracefully in a sun lounger at the edge of the pool, wearing a swimsuit and reading a book while the boys tossed a beach ball back and forth.

"Well this looks like much more fun than we were having at Grimmauld," he drawled by way of greeting, smirking at the trio. "Remus and Severus not joining you?"

"Sn— Severus is brewing," Harry informed him, still tripping over the man's first name. Sirius could understand that; he still forgot half the time himself. "Moony said he might be out in a bit, but he's going down to the lab for a while first." Harry made a slight face, which made Sirius fight a smile. His poor pup, struggling with the active sex lives of the adults in his life.

To be fair, Sirius had struggled with the concept of Moony and Snape for a while, but after living with the pair for this long — not to mention all the teenage years living with Remus and learning far too much about his sexual preferences while drunk — he was just happy to see his friend happy, and equally happy that they kept their antics to spaces Sirius didn't frequent anyway.

Which was more than he could say for his godson and Draco, getting handsy all over the bloody house. Teenagers!

"Well, I've got a present for you, pup," he announced, brandishing the envelope dramatically. "Mayhem, did your booklist arrive?"

Draco made a face at the nickname, which he still wasn't sold on. "This morning," he confirmed, frowning slightly. "Nothing for Harry, though; it was strange."

“Dumbledore was having some trouble getting tracking charms to stick on something going to an Unplottable property,” Charlie supplied wryly as Harry hauled himself out of the water, pushing his wet hair back off his face. It warmed Sirius’ heart to see the teenager looking so healthy, even if there were all those scars on his back and legs. He was as tall as Charlie, now!

“He decided to have me deliver it personally,” Sirius added, handing it over once Harry had cast a Drying charm on himself. Wandless, too, the little powerhouse. “Don’t worry, I dismantled all the charms before I came home.”

“I could’ve just copied off Draco’s list, it’ll all be the same,” Harry said, frowning slightly. “You should’ve just burned the damn thing.”

Sirius smirked to himself. “Don’t be so hasty, there, kiddo.”

His suspicions were correct — as Harry peered into the envelope, his eyes went wide, and he dug out the small red Quidditch Captain badge with a look of awe.

“I— but— it should be Katie’s!” he protested, staring at the badge.

“What is it?” Draco asked, getting out of the pool and striding over. “Oh.” He looked at the badge, then grinned. “Congratulations, Scarhead. You won’t need me to sneak you into the Prefect’s bathroom anymore.”

Sirius could have done without hearing that.

“But it should be Katie’s, she’s been on the team longer. I was banned last year!” Harry protested.

“Only because of Umbridge,” Draco pointed out, rolling his eyes. “Maybe Katie turned it down. Look, there’s a letter in there, too.”

Sirius watched Harry properly empty the envelope, tossing aside the book list — which Charlie caught, pocketing for later — and focusing on another piece of parchment attached.

“It’s from Professor McGonagall,” Harry explained, shock still in his voice. “Well, it’s from Katie, passed through McGonagall. She says McGonagall offered her the captaincy but she turned it down to focus on her NEWTs, and—” He looked up, smiling slightly. “She says getting into pro quidditch will be easier if I have two years as captain under my belt, rather than just one. But she’s happy to help me out with it all if I end up really busy with all my other stuff again.”

Sirius wasn’t the only one who snorted — all his other stuff, that was an understatement to say the least.

“You’ve earned that badge, Harry,” Draco insisted. “You’re the reason Gryffindor wins as often as it does. You deserve it.”

“He’s right, kid,” Charlie piped up. “I’ve talked enough quidditch strategy with you to know you’ll be a brilliant captain. And if you ever need advice, well; you can take your pick from me, Ollie or Angie.” He gave that dimpled smile that Sirius loved, and Harry grinned back.

“Quidditch Captain,” he murmured, looking down at his badge. Sirius clapped him on the shoulder.

“Proud of you, kiddo,” he said, heart squeezing fondly at the way his godson’s face lit up. “And hey, now I’m a free man I’ll be able to come see you play.” He hadn’t watched Harry in a quidditch match since that disastrous game in his third year where the dementors had swarmed him.

“Really?” Harry asked hopefully, and oh that broke Sirius’ heart a little bit, that he seemed so surprised that Sirius might actually want to come and support him like that.

“Every game Dumbledore will let me,” Sirius vowed earnestly.

With any luck, he’d have Harry’s whole career to watch him play quidditch, but he wanted to start as early as possible. He’d missed enough as it was.

.-.-.-.

After the booklists arrived, it was decided that Harry and Draco would take separate trips to Diagon Alley, for safety reasons. Harry couldn’t really argue with that; he and Sirius got stared at enough as it was, without adding Draco and Narcissa to the mix. Diagon was a dark place these days, and Harry just wanted to get in and out as quickly as possible.

So he went first, with Sirius and Remus, apparating into the alley on a slightly grey afternoon. There wasn’t much Harry needed, really; Snape — Severus, Merlin, he’d never get used to that — had assured them he would take care of both boys’ potions ingredients, and Harry could have owl-ordered all the books and writing supplies he needed. But he needed new Hogwarts robes thanks to what he suspected was his final growth spurt, and that could only be done at Malkin’s.

Besides, Remus said it would be good for morale if people saw Harry out shopping for his school things.

Now that he was in Diagon, Harry wasn’t so sure about that.

The alley was certainly... different. The first thing Harry noticed was how empty it was; the few people who were there walked quickly and kept their heads down. No one stopped to chat, or called cheerful greetings.

Then he realised how many of the shops were empty. He’d heard, of course — the twins had told him about Fortescue closing up only days before someone smashed the shop up, and it had been in the Prophet when Ollivander mysteriously vanished one night. Even Luna wasn’t sure where her great-grandfather was, and Harry knew the Ravenclaw girl was worried about him. The further down they walked, the more it seemed shop owners had decided not to risk staying open in case Voldemort and his people took offence to that.

“It’s the first war all over again,” Sirius murmured grimly, a hand on Harry’s shoulder as they hurried towards Flourish and Blott’s. Luckily the bookshop was still open, though the only other customers seemed to be Hogwarts students.

They bought Harry’s new books quickly, then headed over to Malkin’s to get him measured up. The usually chatty witch was almost silent as she worked, her face lined and her eyes darting fearfully towards the doors. She didn’t look Harry in the eye, not once in the entire time he was in there.

It was something Harry was beginning to notice — though there were far fewer people in the alley than usual, all of them seemed wary of him. It hurt, realising how deep Dumbledore’s claws had gotten into all of them, how easy it had been to convince them that Harry was under some sort of mysterious dark influence.

Harry tried not to let it bother him — he had plenty of people supporting him, after all — but it still weighed on him inside. It was going to be another difficult start to the school year, if everyone thought he was dangerous again.

To cheer them all up, and to kill time while Madam Malkin made Harry’s robes, the three of them headed to Weasley’s Wizard Wheezes. It was easily the busiest shop in the entire alley; there was something to be said for seeking laughter in a time of fear.

The twins seemed a little star-struck at having both remaining Marauders in their shop at once, practically tripping over themselves to show Sirius and Remus some of their new products. Harry hung back with Angelina near the till, watching in amusement.

“Congrats on the badge by the way, Captain,” she said teasingly, grinning at him. Harry blushed.

“Katie told you?”

“When she gave the letter to McGonagall to pass to you, yeah. Made us all promise not to tell you ’til you got the badge.” Angelina winked. “Didn’t want to ruin the surprise.”

“I’m just glad I get to play again full stop, let alone captain the team!” Harry had truly been worried that the Ministry would have found a way to keep Umbridge’s ban in place, just to spite him for making them look bad.

“You’ll do great,” Angelina assured. “You’ve got a lot of work ahead of you, but at least you’re not rebuilding the entire team.” He still had Katie, and Vicky, and even Ginny. “I have every faith you’ll keep the Gryffindor win streak going.” Her gaze grew devilish, and she smirked. “You’ll have me and Ollie to answer to if you don’t.”

Harry snorted. “Aye, Captain.” He would do his best.

“Just do me a favour and don’t put those idiot beaters from the Ravenclaw match back on the team,” Angelina added, making a face.

“I might not have much choice.” If no one even halfway decent tried out, he’d be screwed.

Angelina was saved having to come up with some kind of sympathetic reassurance by the return of the four troublemakers to the till, Sirius with a basket full to bursting with prank goods while Remus had his own much more manageable stack.

Harry stared at the pile as the twins began to ring everything through, his eyes round. “I am so glad I’m heading back to school soon,” he declared, and Sirius barked out a laugh.

“What do you mean, pup? This is all just stuff to get you and your boyfriend with before you leave again.” His grey eyes danced even as he attempted an innocent face, and Harry eyed him warily.

“You sure that’s a war you want to start, Padfoot?” he asked. Sirius’ smirk widened.

“Try us, Mischief.”

Well, he couldn’t say Harry hadn’t warned him. The green-eyed Gryffindor turned to the twins, who were watching the exchange with poorly-veiled glee. “Okay, boys, help me out here. Give me your best stuff.”

He was met with identical smirks, and as George grabbed him by the arm and dragged him into the back room, Harry was sure he heard Sirius cursing, while Remus just laughed.

.-.-.-.

Despite the regular night-time trips into Voldemort’s head, Harry was starting to enjoy his routine at Seren Du; with Sirius free and no one expecting Harry to spend part of his summer elsewhere, it was turning out to be the best one yet. The Death Eaters even seemed to be slowing down their assaults, frustrated with how quickly the Order managed to mobilise against them every time. These days, most of Harry’s visions were of the Dark Lord torturing his own servants.

Of course, not everything could go to plan; not for Harry Potter. So when he saw the owl speeding towards him as he and Draco finished playing quidditch, his stomach sank.

“I know that owl,” Draco said, narrowing his gaze. “Whose is it?”

Harry looked up at the approaching bird, frowning; it was definitely familiar, but not one he immediately recognised. It was only when the owl was hardly a few feet away that Harry recognised it, and his stomach sank. “It’s Sully’s,” he realised, holding out an arm for the owl to land on. It was only a small thing, and it tried to be as gentle as possible, though it held its burden out with urgency. Why was Sullivan writing to him?

He opened the letter, dread building with every line.

Harry,

I need help. My parents have joined Him. They don’t want me Marked yet, but they want me doing His bidding, and are to present me to him tomorrow. Can you get me out of here? ASAP? I’m worried what will happen if they take me to Him, everyone knows I’m friends with you.

Sully

“Fuck,” he muttered, looking up at Draco with panicked eyes. “We have to get him out of there.” If Sullivan’s parents took him to Voldemort, the Dark Lord could rip through his Occlumency barriers and learn all about Harry’s plans.

“How?”

The owl stayed on Harry’s shoulder as the two boys hurried back towards the house, clearly expecting a response.

Harry knew that Tonks was the only one home; Sirius and Remus were out on Order business, Snape and Charlie were both working, and Narcissa was over at Malfoy Manor. Tonks wasn’t even supposed to be there long, just hanging out after a training session so the boys could fly without breaking the rules.

“Tonks!” Harry called, hoping the auror wasn’t getting ready to leave. “Tonks, where are you?”

Tonks came hurrying out from the direction of the kitchen, his wand raised warily. He blinked at the sight of the two teens and the owl. “What’s the matter?”

“The Fawleys have turned Dark,” Draco told him grimly.

“You know my friend Sullivan?” Harry pressed, and Tonks nodded, “he just wrote; he needs sanctuary, as fast as possible. His parents want to take him to meet Voldemort tomorrow.”

Tonks swore, and Harry could practically see him mentally switching to auror mode, his shoulders tightening like he was about to duel. “Bugger. Right. We can’t go in and get him ourselves, not without risking making everything worse.” He sent a warning look at Harry, who couldn’t even be completely offended — going in and rescuing Sully in person had been on his list of options. “Is that his owl?”

“Yeah. Waiting for a reply.”

Tonks nodded, and looked frantically around the hallway. Then he dug into his pocket, pulling out a chocolate frog card. “Portus.” The card glowed, and Tonks held it out to Harry. “Send him this; it’ll take him to the Pottery wards when he says your name. I’ll take you over there to wait for him.” He glanced at Draco. “Are you okay to wait here? The others will worry if they come home to an empty house.”

Draco gave a short nod. Harry summoned writing supplies, scrawling out a quick explanation and tucking the card securely into the envelope. He attached it to the little owl’s leg, hurrying over to the still-open front door. “Fly quickly,” he murmured to the owl, watching it take off into the bright blue sky.

He turned back to the others, frowning; he had no idea where Sully lived, no idea how long that might take. “We should eat something and head over there,” he suggested, and Tonks nodded.

"I was just about to call you in, anyway; Ceri made lunch," he replied. Turning for the kitchen, Draco reached out, catching Harry's hand and bringing it to his lips.

"Be careful, won't you?" he said, and Harry smiled.

"We'll be fine."

He trusted Sully not to let the portkey fall into the wrong hands.

.-.

Harry and Tonks waited outside the gates of the Pottery for hours. Harry was a little surprised that Tonks didn't switch back to his usual female form, but he didn't ask; if he was comfortable, that was all Harry cared about.

They chatted while they waited, though both were regularly checking their watches, shifting anxiously from foot to foot. At last, there was a burst of colour, and Sully appeared with the chocolate frog card clutched in his hand, a backpack slung over one shoulder. He was pale, dark eyes full of stark relief. "Thank you," he gasped, grabbing Harry in a tight hug. Harry hugged back, feeling the younger boy practically collapse against him.

"You're safe," he promised. It took a few moments for Sullivan to gather himself, stepping back with a deep breath. The Ravenclaw looked around.

"Tonks?" he checked, and the auror grinned. Sullivan's eyes widened just a fraction, trailing over his masculine form. "You look great."

There was a strange edge to his tone that had Harry tensing, but the look in Tonks' eyes was almost... sympathetic?

"Where are we?" Sully asked, peering around in confusion. Of course, he couldn't see the house.

"Oh. The Pottery can be found on the northeast edge of Thetford Forest," Harry told him. At once the boy let out a gasp, whipping around to stare at the manor through the open gates that had suddenly appeared. "Come on, let's get you settled in."

"The Goldsteins have turned, too," Sully told him as they headed down the drive. "Anthony's pretending to be a sleeper agent. He won't get Marked, not when he can pretend to be on the Light side. I wouldn't have either, but... Anthony's better at Occlumency than I am. And he knows less. I talk to Luna a lot," he added in explanation. Harry nodded in understanding, though the knowledge still sat sour in his belly. Anthony might know less than Sully, but he still knew enough about Harry's personal life, and his history with Dumbledore.

Harry just hoped Voldemort didn't feel the need to truly press the Ravenclaw for information.

"So be careful what we say around Anthony in future," he finished with a grimace. Sullivan nodded. A sudden thought struck Harry. "Do the Death Eaters know you know about the Goldsteins?" If they were hoping to use Anthony as a sleeper agent, they would not be pleased if they realised Sully had spilled the beans. They might give Anthony a different task, or do something far worse.

Luckily, Sully shook his head. “No, I don’t think so. Anthony sent me a letter because he overheard my dad talking to his dad about Death Eater stuff.”

Keep treating Anthony as normal, then. Right. They would have to get the word out discreetly. Harry wondered if Draco still had any of his password-protected ink, or if he’d have to ask the twins for more — Anthony’s idea to lie low and play Death Eater was a noble one, but Harry needed to make sure his friend knew he had other options.

The residents of the Pottery were surprised to see Harry, but Tinker quickly appeared, then went to retrieve Theo. The Slytherin, as Harry’s closest friend amongst the residents, had become the unofficial welcome-wizard for any new arrivals.

“Sullivan,” he said in surprise at the top of the stairs, hurrying the rest of the way down to meet the trio. “What happened?”

Sully gave a quick explanation, and Theo scowled. “He’s going after the peripheral families, then. Means he’s run out of known Dark families to ask.”

Harry doubted there was that much asking involved. “That’s not a good sign.” How many other kids at Hogwarts would find their families turning to Voldemort, would find themselves caught up in it all?

“I’ll send Susan a letter. She’ll know what to do,” Theo said resolutely. Sully perked up.

“We can still write to people from here?” he asked hopefully. To Harry’s surprise, it was Tonks who answered.

“As long as you trust them,” he confirmed, then winked. “You can still write to me, don’t worry.”

Since when did Sully and Tonks write to each other? Sure, Harry might have seen the pair of them chatting for a while at his birthday party, but… he shook his head — that was beside the point, and none of his business.

“I need to get back before people start to worry,” Harry said, checking his watch; Sirius and Remus would probably be home by now. And if he didn’t get back soon, Draco might come after him himself, apparition license or not. “Theo, are you good to show Sully around?”

“Yeah, no problem.” Theo clapped the Ravenclaw on the shoulder, offering a small smile. “Come on; you look like you could do with something to eat.”

Some of the tension began to seep from Sullivan’s shoulders, and he offered Harry a grin that was only a little bit strained. “Thanks for all this, Harry. I… I don’t think I could do what Anthony’s doing.”

“Happy to help,” Harry said with a shrug, “and we’ll figure out what to do about Anthony later. See what Susan says.” Harry was happy to defer such decisions to her; she was the strategy master of their group, after all.

They said their goodbyes, Tonks ruffling Sully's hair fondly, and then the pair of them headed to the edge of the wards to apparate home.

"I didn't know you and Sully were friends," Harry commented, and Tonks smiled.

"Sully's a good kid," he replied. "Needs a bit of help figuring some things out. But we're getting there."

Harry blinked at him, then shook his head slightly, leaning into Tonks' side ready to apparate home.

Again; none of his business.

.

There were five cauldrons simmering at once, and Severus went over his mental checklist, wondering if he had time to start anything else before lunch.

"Remind me again why you're doing this and not Slughorn?" Remus asked from his usual chair in the corner, brows drawn together in amusement. Severus scowled.

"Because Horace has been retired for fifteen years and I don't trust his ability to brew more than one cauldron at a time," he retorted evenly. This was all the regular stock for the Hospital Wing, and he wanted to make sure it was up to standard. Especially with the year ahead looking so fraught.

He anticipated a lot of his Slytherins ending up under Pomfrey's care, and he'd be damned if he let them take inferior medication.

Remus snorted quietly. "Albus might make suspect decisions, but I'm sure he wouldn't hire Slughorn back to teach Potions if he wasn't still competent."

"Debatable," Severus retorted, levitating some powdered bicorn horn with his wand, making sure the exact amount entered every cauldron at the exact same time, turning the liquid inside a vivid red. He reversed the direction of the stirring rods, keen eyes watching every cauldron. "I don't believe that getting me into the Defence position was Dumbledore's only reason for hiring that old social climber."

He saw Remus' gaze narrow. "What do you mean?"

Severus paused, wondering how best to word things so he didn't unnecessarily alarm his partner. "There are other Potions Masters who would quite happily take a position teaching at Hogwarts, even under the current political climate. Ones who wouldn't be quite as... high maintenance as Horace Slughorn." The face Remus made had a soft snort escaping Severus; they both remembered all too well what Slughorn was like, trying to ingratiate himself with any student he thought might have a future in something he could profit off. He was a passable brewer, but Severus knew better. He certainly knew better Masters who would not insist on collecting students like trophies.

“But what could Albus gain from having Horace back?” Remus paused. “You think his Wizengamot seat, perhaps?”

“That is likely some of it,” Severus agreed, adjusting the heat of the flames beneath his cauldrons. “However... Horace taught for a very long time before his retirement. Almost as long as Albus, even.” His lips thinned. “Long enough to have taught young Tom Riddle.”

Remus, ever quick on the uptake, looked at him in alarm. “You think he knows something?”

“I think Albus suspects he knows something.” Albus was horcrux-hunting now, the incident with the ring had made that clear. Bringing back Horace Slughorn was no coincidence. “And I think Albus is hoping the chance to teach Harry Potter himself is enough to loosen the man up enough to share his knowledge.”

A faint growl emerged from Remus’ throat, sending a prickle of something not quite fear but not quite arousal down Severus’ spine. One of these days he would have to address his inappropriate reactions to his partner’s wolf-noises, perhaps.

“Should we be worried about Harry?” came Remus’ immediate concern. Severus shook his head.

“I’ve told him to try and keep in Horace’s good books. Find out whatever it is Albus is after, if he can. But he’ll be fine — he’s got sensible friends, even if he defaults back to an idiot Gryffindor.” He smirked slightly. “Draco will keep him in line.” Severus wasn’t worried about Harry Potter; not as far as Horace Slughorn was concerned, at least.

Remus chuckled. “I suppose. Poor bugger, having to deal with the Slug Club,” he teased, laughing at the reflexive shudder of disgust Severus gave just hearing the name. So much of his school time wasted while that odious leetch tried to draw him into some lucrative potions scheme or another.

“If it gets us a step above Albus, it’ll be worth it.” Harry could handle it. He was used to people trying to manipulate him for his fame.

Finally, Severus was able to add his last ingredients to the cauldrons, using a tricky bit of magic to make sure everything was added in perfect intervals, identical in every one. He could feel Remus’ gaze on his back, still impressed even after he’d seen Severus do this a thousand times by now. And yet it still made pride flutter in Severus’ stomach, just a little.

“I still don’t see why you’re taking on this workload,” the werewolf sighed. “You’re the Defence teacher now, this isn’t your responsibility.”

“Technically it is,” Severus countered, striding over to lean against the wall beside Remus. “Albus left providing for the school optional in Horace’s contract — I suppose the old slug refused to spend his summer slaving away in a lab.” He sneered to himself. “Anything Horace chooses not to brew is passed on to me. And, as you can see, Horace chose not to brew anything at all.”

Not that Severus would have let him brew for the school anyway — as he'd told Remus, he didn't trust the man to make so much as a Pepper Up in bulk.

"Bastard," Remus muttered with a faint scowl.

"Merlin forbid I have anything else to do with my summer," Severus agreed wryly. Remus smirked, arm sneaking out to latch around Severus' waist, pulling him over until the Slytherin was stood in front of his seated partner.

"Little does he know," Remus teased, amber eyes dancing. "How much longer do these have left?"

Severus didn't even bother looking back at his cauldrons to check how they were doing. "Twelve minutes." He raised an eyebrow at his lover, one hand resting on the back of Remus' neck, leaning over him just a little. "You don't have to stay down here if you're bored."

"I'm not bored," Remus assured, arching into the touch. "But no one else is home, and I was quite hoping to use that opportunity to do something other than watch you brew." His gaze turned intent, and Severus swallowed.

"We have the house to ourselves for at least another two hours." For once, everyone else had scheduled things to do all on the same day. Severus bent down just enough to plant a whisper of a kiss on Remus' eager lips. "Be patient, wolf," he drawled, eyes alight. "I assure you, it will be worth it."

Remus let out a tiny whine as Severus pulled back, chasing his lips hopefully. Severus resisted the urge to give in — if they got distracted now, the last hour and a half of work would be wasted.

Eleven minutes. They could control themselves for eleven minutes.

Chapter 84

It was one of the rare times Harry and Snape were training together, without Draco or anyone else involved. They were only a few days away from returning to school, and the Slytherin was pushing Harry to his limits, making absolutely sure they had done everything they could. Not that their lessons would end when school began — Harry was fully expecting a slew of detentions in his future — but there were certain spells Snape wouldn't risk even in the Chamber of Secrets.

But after a full summer of pushing himself, Harry was very much starting to see the benefits; these days, duelling against Snape had him winning just as much as he would lose.

This was not one of those times, though; Harry blinked his eyes open to discover himself lying on the floor, Snape stood over him with a faint smirk on his face. Harry huffed, but accepted the hand to pull him to his feet.

"That frustration will get you nowhere," Snape warned him. While Harry was getting better at using the man's first name out loud, he would still only ever think of him as Snape.
"Remember, your duel with the Dark Lord is not likely to last as long as I have been training you for."

"But how many people will I have to fight to get to him?" Harry retorted, running a hand through his hair.

"Should the battle go as planned, not nearly as many as you seem to expect." Snape shot him a pointed look. "We are not sending you out onto a battlefield alone, Potter."

Harry knew that, but he also hated the idea of any of his friends throwing themselves between him and a Death Eater's wand. "It still doesn't feel like enough," he insisted. "I mean, I know you're one of Voldemort's best, but if I can't even guarantee a win against you..." He clenched his teeth in frustration. "He's going to be so much more ruthless than even you will be." He knew Snape was duelling him as he would were he a loyal Death Eater, but the man couldn't deny he was still treating this as a training setting, not a proper battle. He never threw anything that would actually kill Harry before they got a chance to reverse it.

"Look at me, Potter." Harry's gaze snapped up automatically, conditioned by years in the classroom with this man. Snape's dark eyes were intense as he stared Harry down. "You are capable of defeating the Dark Lord." His voice was clear, curt, with absolutely zero doubt to it. Harry gaped at him. "You may have seen him duelling Albus Dumbledore and been impressed, but we both know neither of them were truly aiming to kill in that duel. They were aiming to intimidate. You have seen the way the Dark Lord fights when his emotions get the better of him; he is sloppy. Foolish. Far too arrogant — there is a reason he surrounds himself with so many powerful, competent fighters. Those fighters will be busy elsewhere when the final battle comes." The man smirked slowly. "If nothing else, letting the Dark Lord know you have destroyed all his horcruxes will surely cause him to lose his composure long enough for you to finish him off."

Harry wished he could have the same level of confidence. “Provided we have destroyed all his horcruxes by then,” he retorted. “We don’t even know how many are left.”

“As I told you, I suspect Albus knows the answer to that. Or at the very least, he knows someone who might.” Snape had already shared his suspicions of Slughorn with Harry, and Harry had absolutely no idea how he was supposed to make this man like him enough to share such sensitive information. Snape seemed to be confident it would be easy for him.

“That’s the other half of my problem, though,” Harry burst out, “Dumbledore has been trying to get at me all summer, and I’m walking right back into his clutches! He’s going to be making my life hell enough as it is without me trying to suck up to Slughorn right in front of him!”

Snape didn’t look bothered in the slightest. “Albus is dying,” he said bluntly. “He knows his time is limited. The only manipulations he cares about now are the ones that will set his legacy in stone — not with the Wizengamot, or even as headmaster of Hogwarts, but as the mentor of the Boy-Who-Lived, defeater of the Dark Lord. His rumour-mongering in the Prophet is all to paint himself as the kindly, concerned guardian trying to pull back a poor young man from the clutches of the Dark. Either he will succeed — in that you will kill the Dark Lord — or he will fail, and the public will rally behind him in the face of a new threat; you.”

Harry’s stomach churned at the thought of Dumbledore manipulating the public so thoroughly that they truly believed Harry would turn Dark. Sometimes he felt like they were already halfway to that belief.

“But surely he knows I’m not just going to stand back and let him claim he mentored me?”

“No, he expects you to die in the battle in order to release that horcrux in your skull, remember?” Snape retorted sharply. “Then he can claim whatever the bloody hell he likes before he dies. Worse, if he dies at my hand — which he fully expects to do — he won’t need to claim anything because the public will create the story for him.”

“I’m not letting that happen,” Harry retorted automatically, earning a glare.

“Yes, because the story that will come from you killing Albus is so much better.”

“No, but the story that comes from me telling the public everything he’s done to me is,” Harry insisted, not backing down. He had more optimism than Snape, at least with regards to changing public opinion on Dumbledore. Amelia and Mrs Frobisher were working on it.

“As long as you are careful, Harry,” Snape said, and Harry never knew what to do when the man’s voice softened like that — the same voice he spoke to Draco with.

“I will be,” he promised. “But being careful with Dumbledore won’t get me very far if I can’t defeat Voldemort when the time comes. Duel me again.”

Snape stared at him for a moment, then sighed, but obligingly drew his wand.

....

Lying under a blanket on a conjured futon in the back garden of Seren Du, staring up at the stars with Draco curled up beside him, Harry was fairly sure he'd found the definition of perfection.

It was a beautiful cloudless night, still surprisingly warm even with the sun long since set. The whole thing was Draco's idea — teasing Harry about his Astronomy grade, saying he spent too much time indoors to even recognise stars anymore. So they had set up their little haven, with hot chocolate delivered by Ceri; the closest they could get to a date night while cooped up in Seren Du.

Harry pressed a kiss to Draco's hair, hand running gently up and down the blond's side. "This was a really good idea," he said softly, feeling Draco smile against his collarbone.

"It was, wasn't it?" he agreed, only a little smug. His fingers curled slightly around Harry's hip, just beneath the hem of his t-shirt. "I'm glad the weather worked out for us. I was worried we'd only have cloudy days before we had to go back to Hogwarts."

Harry sighed quietly; school was approaching far, far too close on the horizon for his liking. "I don't want to go back," he confessed. "I wish we could just stay here until I turn seventeen." Then he would have his full adult power, could finally take on Voldemort and Dumbledore both. But there was work to do in the mean time.

"Quit being such a pessimist, Potter," Draco scolded lightly. "This year won't be nearly as bad as last. No Umbridge, no awful exams, and a reason to put two fingers up at Dumbledore. Not to mention, we won't have to pretend to hate each other any more." Thanks to Narcissa's bold moves over the summer, everyone knew that the Malfoys were on the side of the Light — and that Narcissa and Sirius had reconnected as family.

"I'm looking forward to that part," Harry agreed with a slight smile, pulling Draco up gently to kiss him. "Maybe we'll be out properly before the end of the year." He wanted that, so very badly, but not at the expense of Draco's safety.

"Mm, we'll see how it goes," Draco agreed, their foreheads pressing together. Harry's glasses dug into his cheek a little, but he didn't care. "There are a lot of good things ahead. Even Dumbledore can't ruin that."

"I suppose." It was hard for Harry to remember all the things he was worried about when Draco was winding his fingers through his hair, lips skating down Harry's jaw.

The conversation was derailed as they kissed languidly, Harry slowly turning boneless beneath his boyfriend's fingers. Their touches weren't designed to arouse — they might feel alone out there, but they were both aware their guardians were still in the house and perfectly capable of looking out a window — but Harry arched up into Draco regardless, wishing it were somehow possible to get even closer, to surround himself with the blond's scent and warmth and love. Draco removed Harry's glasses so he could kiss him better, and the Gryffindor grinned playfully.

“How will I see the stars, now?” he asked, making Draco snort.

“You gave up on the stars ages ago,” he teased. “But if you want to go back to them, by all means...”

Harry whined, kissing the smirk off those pale pink lips.

They did eventually settle back down to look up at the stars, not wanting to waste such a gorgeous night. “I’ll admit,” Harry said after a long silence, “I’m glad that this time I’m leaving Sirius a free man. He won’t be trapped alone in Grimmauld.” That had been one of his biggest worries the year before, carefully watching the shadows in his godfather’s eyes whenever they spoke in the mirror.

“Even if he were still on the run, he wouldn’t be alone,” Draco pointed out. Harry hummed; that was true. Narcissa and Remus were planning on sticking around. And, of course, there was Charlie.

“Even better.” He smiled, thinking of Sirius and Charlie, how he’d been so perplexed by the unlikely couple at the beginning of summer. Now, he couldn’t imagine either of them with anyone else. They just worked. “I never thought I’d see him as happy as he is with Charlie.”

“They are certainly smitten,” Draco agreed. “The only worry you should have about leaving your godfather to go to school is the pair of them eloping while you’re gone.”

Harry laughed quietly. “Padfoot wouldn’t do that. He’d never miss an excuse for a party.” When he and Charlie got married, it would be an event, not an elopement.

Draco hummed, conceding the point. “Well, it’s one less line for you to provide an heir for, at any rate,” he remarked. “Which can only be a good thing, considering how many houses you’ve got to your name.”

Harry tensed, ever so slightly. He hadn’t thought about it like that; of course, any kids Sirius had would be more direct Black heirs than Harry. “Oh.” He bit his lip anxiously, staring up at the twinkling stars. “I mean... it wouldn’t be so bad to have enough kids for each house, would it?” His hand settled on the small of Draco’s back. “And the Malfoy line, of course. Four is a pretty reasonable number. Five if Sirius and Charlie don’t have kids.” Not that he could see that happening; Charlie wasn’t shy about voicing his hope to be a father in future.

“That’s four times we’d have to find someone willing to carry for us,” Draco pointed out. His tone was frustratingly even. Harry tilted his head, looking the blond in the eyes.

“But would you want to? If we could?” They’d never spoken about kids before, not really. Harry held his breath, waiting for a response.

“I... I hated being an only child,” Draco said eventually. “Father was only interested in securing an heir; once he did that, he was satisfied. And most pureblood families have trouble carrying to term these days — all the in-breeding, I suppose. Mother’s pregnancy with me was difficult, I don’t think they wanted to risk a second.” Harry saw Draco’s throat bob. “I always expected to be married off to someone who would only want the same. An heir to the Malfoy line, and nothing else.”

“I’d have a whole quidditch team of kids if we could manage it,” Harry blurted, unable to hold it in any longer. He turned his gaze back to the stars, not wanting to risk seeing Draco’s judgement. “I know we probably won’t — though I bet there’s plenty of women who would happily carry for the Boy-Who-Lived, but... I don’t care about heirs or lines or any of that. I just... I love kids, Draco. Can we—I mean, do you—“

Draco cut him off with a firm kiss, and the knot of tension in Harry’s chest began to unravel. “As many as you want, Potter,” he promised, grinning against Harry’s lips. Harry sucked in a sharp breath.

“Really?”

“We can certainly afford it,” Draco pointed out. “I... the only thing I know about being a father is what not to do, but I’ll learn. I want to learn.” He pulled back, smirking slightly. “I’d have more kids than the Weasleys with you, if we could.”

“Maybe we could adopt some,” Harry suggested. “Orphans. Like I was.” Like Tom Riddle had once been. Kids who deserved to be shown what a family really was.

“Magical orphans with no other family are rare, but I’m not adverse to it,” Draco replied. “And Pansy has already agreed to carry at least one for me. Granted, we made that deal when we expected to be betrothed to each other, but she’s told me she’ll still honour it. As long as I agree to father a Parkinson heir for her should she manage to avoid marrying. Not the traditional way,” he added hastily, seeing the alarm on Harry’s face. “With spells.”

“Oh.” Harry frowned, confused. “Does Pansy not think she’ll get married, then?” Harry didn’t know much about Pansy, but he knew she wasn’t dating anyone.

“If Pansy marries, it’ll be out of expectation, or financial security,” Draco replied. “She doesn’t do relationships, or sex, or anything like that. The muggles have a word for it, she told me. Ar...Ae... Asexual, I think she called it.”

Harry remembered seeing books and things with that in the title, back at Infinite. “Oh. But she’s always so flirty?”

“She thinks it’s fun. And it’s a power play thing,” Draco dismissed with a vague gesture. “People will do a lot for you if they think they’ll get something in return — especially if they think they might get sex out of it. I keep telling her it might backfire on her one day, but she’s not bothered. Her mother taught her a Castration charm when we were teenagers and adult men started leching on her.” Harry shuddered. “She would’ve been happy to marry me, if we’d been forced into it — I wouldn’t expect anything from her like that. And she likes the idea of being a mother. So we agreed that unless she was forced into another betrothal contract, I would father the Parkinson heir for her to raise unwed. A bit scandalous, but not the end of the world.”

"Is she likely to be betrothed to someone else?" Harry asked in mild horror. He knew marriage contracts were a pureblood thing, but they seemed utterly barbaric to him.

"If her father manages to survive the war with his reputation in tact, yes," Draco replied. "He's determined to marry her off as soon as she graduates."

Harry's nose screwed up in disgust, and he made a mental note to keep an eye out for Mr Parkinson on any future battlefields. "That's awful. None of our children are ever getting betrothed," he declared firmly. Draco gave him a fond smile.

"Yes, dear," he agreed obediently. "Though not all betrothals are bad. Millie's been betrothed to some German boy since they were twelve — he goes to Durmstrang — and she's absolutely head over heels for the bloke."

Harry hadn't known that, either — he really had to get to know Draco's friends better. Though it was difficult, with both girls still pretending to be loyal future Death Eaters.

"Well I'm glad for her, but we're still not forcing our kids into anything they don't want."

"Absolutely," Draco confirmed, all teasing gone from his voice. "Our children will be able to love whomever they please, or no one at all if that pleases them too." He dropped another kiss on Harry's lips, and pulled back smiling. "All twelve of them, or however many we manage to gather."

Harry laughed, and suddenly the blanket was tangling around their legs as he rolled them over, pinning Draco to the futon, stars utterly forgotten about. "I love you," he whispered, heart so full he thought it might burst. Draco smiled back, then paused.

"We can wait until I've finished my healer training though, right?" he checked, suddenly looking wary. "I'm not sure I can handle fatherhood and that at the same time."

Snickering, Harry nodded. "We can wait," he assured, stroking Draco's temple. "We'll have all the time in the world."

With a future so bright to look forward to, Harry would do anything to make sure they could have it. No matter how many Dark Lords or controlling headmasters stood in his way.

.-.-.-.

They should have seen it coming.

It was the last day before school was due to return, and the occupants of Seren Du were gathered for one last family dinner. Ceri had outdone herself, cooking all of Harry and Draco's favourites, and even Snape was in good spirits — as much as Severus Snape would ever express positive emotions, even in front of family.

Then, before they could even get to dessert, a huge silver lynx burst through the wall. Harry jumped to his feet abruptly — that was Kingsley's patronus. "The Ministry has fallen. We have Amelia at the Den. Medical help required."

The lynx faded, leaving behind a horrified silence. Then, Snape stood.

“I’ll get my kit,” he declared. “Charlie, Remus, I’ll need you two with me.”

“I need to go to the Manor,” Narcissa said, frowning. “Draco, darling, you too — we may have some new arrivals and I could use an extra wand.”

Draco nodded, following his mother without hesitation.

“I’ll go to Grimmauld; the Order is bound to gather once they realise what’s happened,” Sirius decided. “Sorry, Ceri; looks like cake will have to wait.”

The house elf’s ears drooped slightly.

“Remus, I’m coming with you guys,” Harry insisted, turning plaintive eyes on the werewolf. “I’m not sitting here all alone. I can be useful.” Kingsley had said we, but not said how many that counted. Or how many were in need of medical care.

Remus frowned at him, then gave a short nod. “Fine, I don’t have time to argue with you. But if it looks like there’s going to be any danger, you apparate back here, okay? I know you’re capable of it.”

Harry nodded; he wasn’t stupid.

Snape didn’t look completely surprised to find Harry striding out of the house alongside them, merely adjusting his satchel on his shoulder and disappearing as soon as he hit the ward boundary. Remus grabbed Harry for the trip — Harry had never actually been to the Den.

It was the name they used for Remus’ cottage, not that the werewolf had lived there for quite some time now. But it was a good stopping point for people who did not know the secret of Grimmauld or the Pottery, and could not be trusted to Seren Du. Though Harry wasn’t sure why they’d gone there instead of Longbottom Manor. Susan would want to know her aunt was safe.

Harry’s stomach churned as he hurried down the path behind Snape, unsure what they might find in there.

Kingsley met them at the door, looking grim. “This way,” he directed, heading straight into a cosy living room. Harry walked straight into Charlie’s back as the dragon tamer stopped dead in the doorway.

“Percy!”

Wide-eyed, Harry peered past Charlie; sure enough, Percy Weasley was lying on the floor, dangerously pale and holding a blood-soaked rag to his side. Beside him, Amelia Bones was unconscious, with strange black marks like veins stretching across her face and neck. Snape swore, going straight to the woman, opening his satchel. Remus went to his side, waiting for instruction, and the movement jolted Charlie out of his stupor — he hurried to kneel at his brother’s side.

“What the hell happened?” Harry asked, glancing at Kingsley. The bald auror didn’t look too worse for wear, though his robes were singed in several places and there was a thin cut on his head sluggishly dripping blood behind his left ear. Harry gestured to it, and the man grimaced, healing himself.

“No one was expecting it. I’m not exactly sure how it began; one minute I was in Amelia’s office discussing dementor sightings, the next someone’s running down the corridor yelling that the Minister’s dead and You-Know-Who is in the building. We were over-run with Death Eaters before we could even raise the wards.” Kingsley’s mouth turned in a disgusted scowl. “Tonks and I were the only aurors actually fighting on behalf of the Ministry.”

“Where is Tonks?” Harry asked worriedly, looking around as if the other auror might pop up out of nowhere.

“She went to Headquarters to muster the Order,” Kingsley assured. “There’s little good they can do now, but Dumbledore will suspect if we don’t go straight to him on the matter. But Tonks is fine, only a few bruises.”

Harry slumped in relief, looking back at the gathering on the floor. Whatever Snape was doing seemed to be working; the black veins had mostly receded, though Amelia was still unconscious while Snape waved his wand and murmured over her, Remus feeding potions carefully into her mouth. At least Percy’s injury seemed an easier fix, Charlie carefully directing his wand to knit the wound back together.

“How did Percy end up with you?” Harry knew from a few cryptic comments made by Charlie and Bill that the redhead’s devotion to the Ministry was not all it seemed, but he couldn’t see how that may have led to this.

“I was trying to escape the Death Eaters that killed the Minister,” Percy piped up. “And smuggle out some files at the same time. I bumped into Auror Shacklebolt and Madam Bones right as Madam Bones was hit with whatever spell made her unconscious. I carried her so that Aurors Shacklebolt and Tonks could keep fighting our way out of there.” He spoke clinically, like he was delivering a report on the subject, but Harry could see the fear in his eyes. “I—we didn’t expect them. Minister Scrimgeour just had a meeting with Augustus Rookwood. I knew he was a Death Eater, but I didn’t—I wasn’t expecting this to happen. There was nothing I could do. I had to get the files out safely.”

“Why, to stop Scrimgeour being exposed as a fraud after his death?” Kingsley asked sharply. Percy glared at him.

“I couldn’t give a fuck about Scrimgeour; those files are the only paper evidence we’ve got of Dumbledore bribing Ministry officials!” he retorted hotly. Harry wasn’t the only one who gaped at that.

“Easy, Perce,” Charlie soothed, squeezing his brother’s shoulder. “It’s alright. No one’s going to hurt you here, or turn you in; Bill and I can vouch for you.” He looked up at Kingsley, daring him to argue. “And I bet Amelia would love to see those files of yours, once she’s awake.”

Percy looked mildly offended that his brother was somehow on first name terms with Amelia Bones. Nonetheless, he reached into a pocket of his robe, pulling out a stack of shrunken files. “I hope I didn’t bleed on them,” he fretted, setting them aside to resize. His hands shook violently, crumpling the parchment. “They’re in a shorthand form I created. I’ll have to translate.”

“You can do that later,” Charlie scolded with a smile, ruffling Percy’s short curls. “Once you’ve had some sleep. Hey, Harry, can you see if there’s a Blood Replenisher in Severus’ bag?”

Harry hurried to kneel by the bag, digging through for the familiar crimson potion without disturbing Snape’s actions.

“Why did Severus come with you, anyway?” Kingsley asked, eyeing the man as he finally lowered his wand, flexing his shoulders. “I thought you were all at home.”

Harry froze, meeting Charlie’s panicked gaze. “He’s Draco’s godfather,” he blurted, thinking quickly. “He came to have dinner before school starts back up.”

Kingsley frowned slightly, but nodded.

“She will live,” Snape declared, sitting back on his heels. “She will be weak for the next few days, and should avoid doing too much magic. But she will live.”

Kingsley visibly relaxed. “Thank Merlin. We can’t lose Amelia, not after losing Scrimgeour too. Thank you, Severus.”

Snape just nodded. “Mr Weasley, do you have any other injuries?”

Percy became a deer in the headlights under Snape’s gaze, but he shook his head. “Uh, no, sir.”

“Good.” The Potions Master got to his feet, picking up his satchel. “I should get to Headquarters. Albus will want to know why I was not informed of this development,” he said with a sneer, giving Remus a quick glance that spoke volumes before he squeezed past Kingsley and left the room.

His words triggered something in Harry’s mind — or, rather, pointed out the glaring lack of something. “I didn’t feel it,” he realised, heart sinking. “This whole time — I didn’t have a vision or anything. And I can’t feel his emotions.” Voldemort would be happy — happier than he was even when he had broken his most loyal out of Azkaban. And yet there was no overwhelming feeling of triumph in Harry’s chest, not even a buzz of satisfaction. His scar didn’t ache, his head wasn’t pounding, his vision wasn’t blurring like he was about to drop into a vision at any time.

Nothing.

“Perhaps he’s finally started blocking you?” Remus suggested, mouth a thin line. “You haven’t had any sort of vision in a while, now, have you?”

Thinking back, Harry realised the man was right; it had been at least a week since his last vision. In his determination to be prepared for school to return, he hadn't noticed; merely been thankful for getting decent amounts of sleep.

"I... what does that mean?" Harry asked helplessly. Voldemort had known about the connection between them since he had used the false vision to try and lure Harry to the Ministry — had it taken him this long to realise that Harry could see into his mind even when uninvited? Was he using the same methods as Harry, now, to keep his side of the connection closed?

Did he know what the connection meant?

"It means I need to call Bill," Charlie declared, blue eyes daring Harry to argue with him. "We're taking you to Gringotts. Tonight."

Harry opened his mouth to protest, but his words quickly died; if Voldemort was going to block him out so thoroughly, what was the use in maintaining the link?

"Charlie's right, cub," Remus said, squeezing his shoulder. "If he knows how to block you, he might figure out the rest. We can't have that. Best to cut the link now to avoid the risk." He looked at Harry knowingly. "You couldn't help anyone anyway, if he's blocking you out now. The only things you'll see are things he wants you to see."

Harry's shoulders slumped; they were right, and he knew it, but it still felt like a failure to admit it. His visions had been the one thing that made him feel like he wasn't completely useless in this fight, tucked away behind the wards of Seren Du.

"I'm not going to ask what you're talking about," Kingsley cut in, frowning slightly. "It's not my business. But if you need to talk to Bill, you'd best move quickly; Merlin only knows what Albus will ask of the Order in the wake of all this."

Charlie nodded. "Perce, have you got somewhere safe to go?"

"I have my flat," Percy started, but Charlie shook his head.

"You live alone, that won't slide with me, kid. Come on, you can crash with Bill and Fleur for the night."

Charlie hauled his younger brother up to his feet, and the pair of them left the living room; a few moments later, Harry heard the whoosh of the floo.

There was silence, and then Kingsley let out a long sigh, sinking down into a nearby armchair. "Well, I think it's safe to say I won't be going in to work tomorrow," he remarked, and Harry let out a snort, even as fear tangled in his belly.

Voldemort finally had control of the Ministry. Where did they go from there?

It wasn't long before Charlie returned with Bill, both of them grim-faced. They had left Percy to be fussed over by Fleur, it seemed.

Harry expected Remus to come with him, but the werewolf shook his head. "I'm going to get Amelia back to Longbottom Manor," he explained, carefully lifting the unconscious woman. "I can explain everything to Susan and Augusta, so they know how to look after her." He looked up at Charlie, eyes serious. "Be careful out there. Bring him home as soon as you're done. I'll let Sirius know where you've gone."

Charlie nodded, hand settling on Harry's shoulder. "We'll keep him safe, Moony," he promised.

"I'll keep both of them safe," Bill assured with a small grin. "Come on, then, kids."

Bidding goodbye to Kingsley and Remus, Harry followed Bill and Charlie through the floo. They arrived in a part of Gringotts Harry had never seen before; an office block type room, full of goblins and humans alike. Their entrance drew some raised eyebrows, and one goblin hurried over.

"It's time for the ritual?" he asked in a voice like ground gravel. Bill nodded.

"As soon as possible. I'll get him prepped."

The word sent a shot of alarm through Harry — he was led down a narrow corridor and into a small room, empty but for a single metal wardrobe. Bill reached inside, pulling out a sleeveless grey robe. "Put this on," he urged. "Take everything else off, even your pants, and your glasses. We won't look," he added with a wink, him and Charlie both making a show of covering their eyes and turning around. Despite the seriousness of the situation, Harry snorted. His heart raced a mile a minute as he fumbled with the buttons of his shirt, but soon he was dressed in nothing but the robe, his clothes in a pile on the floor.

Bill nodded in approval, and rummaged through the cupboard a second time, coming out with a small clay pot. "Okay, now stand still. This might burn a bit."

With that ominous warning, Bill began to daub some kind of ointment on Harry's face. It did tingle, a little like the muscle balm he sometimes used after quidditch, but the sensation was bearable. It took a few moments to realise that Bill was drawing runes on him, rather than just swiping the stuff on at random. Harry tried not to even twitch, not wanting anything to smudge. Bill drew the runes all over his face and arms, then nodded again. "Good. Okay, you're ready. But... I'm going to need you to trust Charlie to look after your wand for a bit."

Harry's stomach lurched — surrender his wand? When Death Eaters had just taken the Ministry?

"I'm sorry, but it'll interfere with the ritual," Bill told him, crystal blue eyes sympathetic. "I'll be there the whole time, I won't let anything happen to you. Besides," he added with a smirk, "from what I've heard, you hardly need that wand to do damage."

He had a point. Harry squared his shoulders, then offered his wand to Charlie, who took it with gentle hands. “I’ll keep it safe,” he promised, tucking it securely into his breast pocket.

There was a knock on the door, and Bill opened it to see a stern-faced goblin, who took one look at Harry and nodded.

It was time for the ritual.

The Gringotts ritual room hummed with magic. Harry could feel it dance along his skin, the crystals embedded in the stone walls glowing with an ethereal light, making the polished stone floor glitter with a riot of colours. It was beautiful, but Harry could hardly focus; not just because he’d left his glasses behind in the other room.

In the centre of the room was a cluster of people, and Harry could make out a ritual circle drawn on the ground. It was too fuzzy for him to see the details, but he would hazard a guess to say it was the same circle that he’d found in the book in Salazar’s library; or at least based off that circle.

Bill led him to the centre of it, where two more humans were waiting with a goblin. “Harry, all we need you to do is sit down in this spot,” the eldest Weasley directed, helping Harry to sit exactly in place. “Hands on the floor — there you go, perfect. You don’t have to do anything to participate in the ritual; sit still and let us do the work. Just, y’know— if it feels like it’s trying to latch on, give it a bit of a shove for us, yeah?”

His jovial tone wasn’t enough to hide the undercurrent of worry, but Harry pretended it had, grinning back. “Will do.”

Hopefully after all his meditation and practice with recognising foreign magic due to Dumbledore’s compulsions, he would be able to feel the horcrux and give it a hand on its way out.

Harry heard a quiet squeaking noise, and craned his neck to see one of the other humans in the room bringing in something that looked like a small metal box. It squeaked louder, and Harry realised in horror that there was some kind of animal in there; a rat, or something similar.

Of course, the ritual had described transferring the horcrux from one living host to another.

“You ready, Harry?” Bill called. Harry tensed, then gave a hesitant nod. Butterflies swarmed furiously in his stomach, and he swallowed them down resolutely. He would be fine. Bill was confident this would work.

All at once, the room filled with murmurs of a language Harry didn’t recognise, and the ambient magic seemed to sharpen, focusing on Harry. Harry breathed deeply, sinking into the best meditation he could manage in such a nerve-wracking situation, making sure not to fight the magic as it washed over him. It felt like ants beneath his skin, searching, converging on his scar with an unbearable itching sensation. But Harry had endured worse, and Bill had told him not to move.

The chanting curse-breakers grew louder, the ants grew more vicious. Harry grit his teeth against the urge to cry out as he felt something start to tear inside his skull.

Bill was right that the magic would try and latch on. The horcrux had been in place for almost fifteen years, and it was not giving up without a fight — but Harry was ready, and he was stronger than this pathetic little scrap of Voldemort's soul. He gathered his own magic, shoving it alongside the ritual magic, forcing the soul out of his body. He could hear screaming — his own, perhaps, or maybe the horcrux's — and then there was a blinding wave of pain, like his head was about to split in two.

And then silence.

Harry sucked in a sharp breath, blinking his eyes open. He didn't dare move, in case the ritual wasn't over. He could hear footsteps, and the rat in the cage was screeching up a storm.

Then someone slid Harry's glasses onto his face, and the world came into focus; Bill stood in front of him, grinning, sweat glistening on his brow. "Hey, kid. How you feeling?"

"My head hurts," Harry replied, his voice raspy — maybe it had been him screaming. Bill chuckled, helping him to his feet, bracing him when he wobbled and almost fell over.

"Yeah, sorry about that. But you can take a potion when you get home, that should help. Hey, stand still a second for me, yeah?"

Bill moved away, and Harry planted his feet while the redhead checked him over with his wand. A huge smile broke across his face. "It's gone," he confirmed. "No trace of it left." He turned to one of his coworkers, calling something in what sounded like Arabic, and Harry was scanned a second time by an older man with a salt and pepper beard. The man frowned, doing another set of spells, then gave a decisive nod.

"No foreign magic," he confirmed, speaking English for Harry's benefit. "The horcrux has gone, and as far as I can see it has not left any damage behind. Bill, you will monitor his progress, yes?"

"As best I can while he's at Hogwarts," Bill confirmed, stepping in to sling an arm around Harry's shoulders once more. That seemed to satisfy his coworker, who nodded and went to help the rest of the team clear up.

"Snape can help with monitoring," Harry offered. "If there's any specific spells you need to use or anything."

"I'll get in touch with him about it," Bill confirmed. "We're not really worried, but considering none of us have done this before... it'll just be to make sure there's no lingering effects on your own magic. It was part of you for a long time, after all." He squeezed Harry's shoulder at the green-eyed teen's alarmed look. "Don't worry, magic is resilient — your magic especially. You've a strong core, I'm sure it'll plug the gap in no time."

He turned, directing Harry over to the side where someone had set the metal cage. It was indeed a rat inside; a huge grey one, its beady eyes staring at Harry as its tiny body heaved with panicked breaths. “Guess we’ve just got to dispose of this little bugger and then it’s another one ticked off the list.” The redhead glanced at Harry. “Any preferences?”

“As long as it’s definitely dead, I don’t care.” Harry just wanted it gone.

“Fair enough. Step back, then. Might as well make sure it’s done properly.”

Harry did so, and Bill raised his wand, blue eyes narrowed in concentration. The rat stared back, like it was aware of what was to come.

“Fiendfyre.”

...-.-.

Charlie and Harry appeared at the edge of the wards to Seren Du, and immediately Sirius lunged forward, wrapping them both in a hug. “How did it go? Are you okay?” he asked urgently, pushing back Harry’s hair to survey his forehead. The scar looked fresh and raw, like it did after one of his visions, but Bill had told him the wound would probably heal for good now the dark magic was gone. Harry would have to keep a glamour up, if he didn’t want Dumbledore to realise what he’d done.

“I’m fine. It’s gone,” Harry confirmed, leaning into his godfather’s touch. Merlin, he was exhausted. “How are things at the Ministry?”

“ Fucked, but there’s nothing we can do about it,” Sirius answered with a grimace, arm slipping around Harry’s waist to help him back towards the house. “He’s claimed the building, so anyone who works there will either follow orders or just not go back.”

“What do we do now?” Fear gripped Harry’s chest — if Voldemort had the Ministry, would it even be safe to go back to Hogwarts?

“We get you to school tomorrow, because as much as I hate Dumbledore, that snake-faced bastard won’t touch you if you’re in the castle.”

“What about everyone else?” Harry pressed — what about all the Ministry workers who didn’t support Voldemort?

Sirius’ face turned grim. “We’ll worry about that later.”

When they stepped inside the house, Draco was right at Harry’s side, grey eyes worried.

“I’m fine,” Harry assured, stepping out of his godfather’s embrace and into his boyfriend’s. “I’m just tired. The ritual took a lot out of me.” Even his magic ached, though he wasn’t sure how that was even possible.

“Go on up to bed, cub,” Remus urged — Harry hadn’t even realised the werewolf was there. He looked up, blinking, to find the entire household was gathered in the entrance hall, staring at him with varying degrees of concern. “It’s late, and you’ve got to go to school tomorrow.”

Harry coughed a laugh — it was hard to imagine something as mundane as riding the Hogwarts Express when the Dark Lord had just stormed the Ministry.

For once, he trusted the adults when they said there was nothing he could do. And he was tired. “Okay. I’ll, uh, see you all in the morning.”

“Come on, Scarhead,” Draco murmured, helping him towards the stairs.

Harry grinned. “You’ll have to think of something else to call me when this heals,” he retorted playfully, and Draco rolled his eyes.

“I’m sure I can think of something.”

He walked with Harry to the Gryffindor’s bedroom, deft hands unbuttoning Harry’s shirt, gently running over his shoulders as he eased the garment off. Whatever the stuff Bill drew runes on him with was, it had disappeared by the end of the ritual. Harry let Draco undress him, and crawled into bed to watch the blond strip down to his underwear, shuffling in beside him. “Won’t be able to do this when we get back to school,” Draco sighed, leaning in for a kiss. Harry hummed sadly — that was the worst part about going back, in his opinion. He’d grown entirely too used to having Draco around to cuddle all the time.

After a Headache Reliever followed by a Tooth-Cleaning charm and half a glass of water, Harry sank back against the pillows with a relieved groan, snuggling into Draco’s side.

“I expected to feel it missing,” he admitted quietly. Draco stroked his hair, humming.

“Maybe you will, once the dust has settled,” he murmured. “But maybe you won’t. It was never truly part of you, after all.” Dry lips pressed to Harry’s temple. “I’m just glad it’s gone. I hated the thought of him having access to your mind. Hated even more having to watch you get pulled into his.”

Harry burrowed closer, wrapping himself around Draco so excessively it made the blond huff with laughter. “I just hope I don’t regret it.” Whatever Voldemort did next, there would always be a small part of Harry wondering if he could have stopped it, if he’d kept the horcrux for just a little bit longer.

But he couldn’t let himself go down that path; not if he wanted to keep his sanity. Whatever was coming would happen, and they would face it the best they could.

Chapter 85

No one at Seren Du was particularly thrilled about taking the trip to King's Cross the next morning. Snape left before anyone else, as he would be heading to the castle directly; he dropped the Prophet in disgust and stalked from the kitchen, Remus following hot on his heel, and when the werewolf returned ten minutes later the Potions Master did not come with him.

Harry didn't blame Snape for being too angry to continue reading the newspaper; he himself almost set it on fire accidentally. The front page, naturally, declared that Minister Scrimgeour was dead. However, it also talked about Voldemort's take-over of the Ministry as if it were a mere staffing change; it was clear the Death Eaters had control over the newspaper, too.

There went any form of reputable national news — though the Prophet had been barely reputable to begin with.

With little information to go on, Harry was half expecting the aurors to come for him at Platform 9&3/4, to drag him kicking and screaming to Voldemort himself under some bullshit arrest warrant. On the contrary, the platform was quiet — far quieter than it should have been. It seemed like there were a fair number of students who had chosen not to return — or, Harry realised with sickening clarity, had not survived the summer.

Only Sirius and Narcissa came with them to the platform, Remus and Charlie saying their goodbyes at the house. The two boys garnered some looks, arriving together, but Harry ignored them; people would soon find out that he and Draco had been friends all along.

"Stay safe," Sirius murmured, pulling Harry into a tight hug. Harry hugged him back, desperately wishing that Sirius' first time seeing him off to school was under better circumstances.

Next year.

"You, too," Harry replied, giving his godfather a warning look. "Keep me updated on anything important."

"Will do, kiddo." Sirius reluctantly let go, kissing him on the forehead. "Love you."

"Love you, too."

Harry let Narcissa kiss him on the cheek, the Malfoy matriarch warning him to be careful and take good care of her son. That got a small smile out of him, and a sincere nod.

Harry saw a cluster of redheads approaching — much smaller than usual, just Mrs Weasley, Ron and Ginny, with Hermione walking alongside them. Harry wondered how Mr Weasley was taking the whole Ministry situation. At least thanks to Bill, they knew he'd made it out unscathed.

Mrs Weasley caught sight of them and sent a glare to Sirius, and the dog animagus rolled his eyes. “I think we’re gonna get going. Call me soon,” he added to Harry, squeezing Draco’s shoulder. “See you both at Yule, if not sooner.”

The two boys headed to find a compartment, and Harry smiled when they found Luna, Daphne and Blaise waiting for them in their usual spot. “Morning, gentlemen,” Blaise drawled in greeting. “Finally going public, are we?”

“Just as friends,” Harry explained, hoisting his trunk up into the rack. Daphne snorted.

“For now, at least,” she remarked. Harry didn’t have it in him to argue; she wasn’t wrong.

They didn’t have to wait long for Ginny and Neville to find them, Ginny letting out an exaggerated sigh of relief as she dropped into a seat. “Thank Merlin I can finally spend several months with people who are not Ron,” she announced, making Harry laugh.

“I’m sorry I left you to the wolves this summer,” he joked, “but at least you had Neville. And Susan.”

Ginny glanced at her boyfriend, who blushed faintly. “Yeah, and the twins were always willing to let me hang around, even if Mum went mental at the idea of me being in Diagon with things as they are.”

The train started to move, jolting Harry against Draco’s side.

“How’s Amelia doing anyway, Nev?” he asked, and the other Gryffindor’s smile faltered.

“She was awake long enough to say goodbye before we left, but she wasn’t up for coming to the station,” he relayed. “Gran’s called a healer friend of hers to come check on her, though.”

That was good; Snape might know a hell of a lot about both Dark Arts and Potions, but he was not a trained professional, and they didn’t want to risk missing something.

The questions prompted an explanation to the others about what had happened the night before; they only knew what they’d heard from the Prophet.

As with last year, the journey to Hogwarts was interspersed with visitors, several of whom looked taken-aback to see Draco sat so companionably beside Harry. Though truthfully, there weren’t many of their friends who didn’t know the truth by this point — far too many of them just looked smug at the sight of the pair.

Susan and Theo were some of their first visitors, Susan’s face a little drawn. Harry shuffled over, making room for them to sit. “Neville said your aunt woke up?”

Susan nodded. “I hated leaving her like that, but she said she feels okay, just tired. I suppose I have Professor Snape to thank for that.”

“I think he’d rather you never mention it again, in all honesty,” Draco drawled, making Susan giggle.

"We have some other news," Theo said, his hand in Susan's and his hazel eyes bright. "I got a letter from my family solicitor this morning. My father was one of the people killed in the Ministry yesterday."

Harry tensed. What could he say to that? Theo seemed to sense his dilemma, as he gave a sharklike grin. "Don't apologise; he was a piece of shit and he deserves to be dead. But the better news is, once I turn seventeen in January, I'll be free. And, like most idiot Death Eaters, his will handed both my guardianship and the house proxy over to Lord Malfoy — which in his absence goes to Lady Malfoy." He turned his grin on Draco. "Looks like we're foster-brothers until January."

Draco laughed. "Congratulations. Welcome to the family, I suppose."

"I can go back home, when this is over." The awe in Theo's voice was palpable.

"I'm happy for you," Harry said sincerely. Theo nodded to him.

"I wouldn't have lasted this far without your protection, Harry," he said solemnly. "I'm in your debt."

"There are no debts between friends," Harry corrected, smiling. Theo blinked. Then, slowly, he smiled too.

"Okay, then."

"Have you heard from the girls?" Blaise cut in, frowning. Theo shook his head.

"Got a letter from Millie a week into summer, nothing since. Ever since Draco and I defected, I think her dad is reading her letters."

Harry felt Draco's shoulders tighten at his side. "I hate that we've left them to put up with Crabbe and Goyle, and Tracey Davis."

"You and me, both," Theo agreed. "But they're safer that way. We all are. The Dark Lord needs to feel like he's got some kind of foothold in the school."

"Did Susan tell you about...?" Harry trailed off, and Theo nodded.

"Doesn't surprise me the Ravenclaws got turned first. They've always been closest to Slytherin."

"We'll have to keep an eye out." There were bound to be more students in all houses with parents who had turned, and possibly even some students who had turned entirely independently of their families. Harry wasn't so naive to think that Voldemort's rhetoric wasn't appealing to certain types of people.

Namely, people who were sick of Albus Dumbledore's bullshit.

This year, Harry would change that. He would offer an alternate option to both, and perhaps he could save a few souls from being Marked.

Susan and Theo left when the trolley came around, promising to pass everyone's regards on to the Hufflepuff contingency. Harry didn't miss the way both of them had their wands out when they returned to the corridor.

It was a sad day when even the train to school felt like a potential battleground.

Most other visitors didn't stay long, just sticking their heads in to say hello — there were no questions about peoples' summers, or joking complaints about resuming classes. Everyone knew that their summers had been grim, and after what had happened at the Ministry they all had bigger problems than classes. Harry hated how many of his friends had hardened gazes these days, tight smiles and slightly hunched shoulders.

Lavender was the most cheerful of the bunch, thanking Harry for the flowers he'd sent her and congratulating him on his OWL results. Harry had almost forgotten about the whole thing, it felt like so much had happened since then.

A few people stopped long enough to ask Harry about the HA, but he had very little to offer them — he wasn't supposed to know about Snape being the new DADA teacher, and he wasn't sure what his schedule was going to look like, so all he could say was 'we'll see'. He was starting to get a little sick of it all, and was just considering putting a privacy ward on the door when there was a knock and Sully stuck his head in. "Hi, guys," he greeted, smile flitting across his face. "I, uh, how is everyone?"

"You look like you have something you want to say, Sullivan," Luna said airily, ignoring the question, and Sully laughed.

"Never could get one past you," he sighed, running a hand through his hair. "But yes. I, uh — I've been talking to Tonks a lot this summer. About some stuff. And I think... I'm not a boy." Sully bit his lip, looking anxious. "Or a girl. I... I'm somewhere in the middle."

"...Okay," Harry said slowly, eyeing the fidgeting Ravenclaw. "So... do you want to switch pronouns sometimes, like Tonks? Or are you okay with he but just wanted us to know?" The books he'd bought from Infinite had a lot of information on the subject of gender, and Harry was amazed at how varied things could be, at how little he'd really considered it himself.

"I—I want to use they/them pronouns. So you say they and theirs instead of he or his," they added at Neville and Ginny's confused looks.

"Sounds good," Draco agreed, turning back to his book. Sully blinked, startled.

"I—that's okay?"

"Of course!" Luna beamed at them. "We just want you to be happy."

"I've never really heard of that before, but I'll try my best to remember," Ginny added. "And if anyone gives you shit for it, send them my way, yeah?"

Sully's frame visibly relaxed, a wide smile crossing their features. "Thanks. I—just... thanks."

"I've got some books back home you might like, if you want to borrow them," Harry volunteered, then glanced at the rest of the compartment. "Or if any of you want to take a look. To understand things a bit better."

"That would be great, Harry," Neville said, quietly relieved. He looked up at Sully. "Like Ginny said, I don't really know what that means, but I'll do what I can to make you happy. And I'll apologise now if I slip up or say something I shouldn't."

"Oh, no, it's fine," Sully assured quickly, going wide-eyed. "It's unusual, I know, it'll take some getting used to. But... I've never felt comfortable, being a boy. I didn't really know why until I met Tonks. And I'd like to see if this feels better." They laughed. "I still slip up sometimes, I'm not expecting you all to be perfect!"

"Then I'm glad you and Tonks met," Harry said with a grin.

"Me, too," Sully said softly. "And... thanks for getting me out of my parents' house. I... they sent a howler, once they realised I was gone. It was pretty brutal."

All of them frowned, and Ginny, as the closest to Sully, reached out to squeeze their arm. "That's rough, I'm sorry," she murmured. Sully shrugged.

"It's about what I expected — how I've let the family down, I should be smart enough to recognise what the winning side is, all that."

"You are smart enough," Daphne remarked, smirking. "That's why you're here with us."

Sully grinned back. "That's exactly what Theo said."

All of a sudden, there was a knock on the door, and a timid third-year Hufflepuff girl peeked in. "Hi. Sorry. I'm uh, supposed to give these to Harry Potter and Neville Longbottom," she said breathlessly, awe in her eyes as she handed parchment to Harry. Then she glanced at Draco, and squeaked. "Oh." Her wide brown eyes trailed the whole compartment. "Wait. Are you Blaise Zabini?" Blaise nodded, looking baffled. "There's one for you, too." She handed over the scroll, then disappeared.

"Well," Sully murmured. "On that note, I'm out before I get dragged into any of your weird shenanigans. See you later!" They left before any of the crowd could protest the shenanigans comment.

Harry frowned down at the scroll, opening it. As he read, his heart sank.

"So it begins," Draco murmured amusedly, kissing his cheek.

"Who's Professor Slughorn?" Neville asked, staring at his own scroll in confusion. "What does he want?"

"New Defence professor?" Blaise presumed, and Harry grimaced.

"Not quite. Potions."

The dark-skinned Slytherin's head snapped up. "Does that mean...?"

"Yup."

Neville groaned quietly. "Just when I thought I was rid of him," he said in despair. Harry chuckled.

"He's not all bad."

"You have to say that, you're dating his godson," Ginny retorted mutinously. "Well, have fun at your lunch date, boys." She kissed Neville, then shoved him to his feet.

Harry very much did not want to go, but he had promised Snape he would try and get on Slughorn's good side. So he pecked Draco on the lips, and the three of them left the safety and peace of their compartment, heading into the train corridor.

Harry had expected the staring. The whispering, the not-quiet-enough comments about his sanity or him going Dark or his supposed feud with Dumbledore.

He had not expected the giggles.

"Looks like you've still got fangirls, mate," Neville teased as a group of fourth year Gryffindor girls giggled and fluttered their lashes at him.

"Hello, Harry," one girl said boldly, her friends giggling even harder. "I'm Romilda Vane. You should come sit with us."

"Sorry, places to be," Harry replied breezily, hurrying past the compartment. He glared at Blaise and Neville when they snickered.

They weren't the only ones in Slughorn's compartment when they reached it; Marcus Belby from the Slytherin quidditch team was also there, as well as — much to Harry's dismay — Cormac McLaggen. Perhaps he was about to hear some of the bragging about Tiberius Ogden that Vicky had complained about.

"Ah, Harry, my boy!" Slughorn greeted jovially, as if they were old friends. He was a portly man, mostly bald and flushed in the cheeks, though surprisingly sprightly considering how old he must be to have taught Tom Riddle. But wizards aged differently, Harry supposed. "Delighted to finally meet you, I've heard so much about you!" He shook Harry's hand enthusiastically. "Come in, come in. Ah, and you must be Mr Zabini — you look just like your mother — and Mr Longbottom, of course! Glad you could all make it to my little party!"

The only one who looked even remotely happy to be there was McLaggen, which did not bode well. Harry shuffled in, taking a seat between Blaise and Neville. It seemed Slughorn had come prepared; there was a small buffet lunch laid out, and the new professor urged them all to take plates and napkins. "Please, help yourselves! I don't know if you know these fine gentlemen joining us—" Slughorn introduced Belby and McLaggen, neither of whom was particularly impressed by Harry or his friends.

Harry picked at the food while Slughorn continued his conversation with Belby; though it ended quite abruptly when Belby confessed he didn't have much contact with his apparently famous uncle. There was one person who likely wouldn't be getting an invite to the next gathering.

If only Harry could be so lucky.

McLaggen was happy to brag about some hunting trip he'd taken with his Uncle Tiberius, though it went south soon after he mentioned that Rufus Scrimgeour had also been on the trip. An awkward silence followed, until Slughorn cleared his throat.

"Well, then. You, my lad, need no introduction!" he announced as he turned to Harry, chuckling to himself. "The Chosen One, they're calling you now. Well, some of the time, at least. Seems the Prophet can't quite make their minds up about you!"

Harry gave a false smile, stabbing a little too hard at a piece of pheasant. "Of course, the Prophet has been known to print mistakes in the past," Slughorn continued. "But after what you and your little friends got up to at the Ministry, well—you just have to see how quiet they kept that to know there's a real story behind it!" He looked hopeful, like Harry might tell him that story. Harry cleared his throat.

"We stopped the Ministry getting taken. It's just a shame they tried again," he said, watching Slughorn's smile faltered.

"Yes, yes. Terrible business, truly terrible. But the rest of the stories about you; so sensationalised! Truly, I do wonder about them sometimes. But I asked Albus about you, of course, when I realised I'd be teaching you! Very fond of you, the headmaster — he believes with the right guiding hand you'll go very far indeed!"

Harry gritted his teeth, still smiling. Dumbledore had said that, had he? Well, he was mistaken if he thought Harry would ever let him or Slughorn be that guiding hand.

Luckily, Slughorn seemed to realise he wasn't going to get much out of Harry, then; he moved on to Blaise, asking about the Italian boy's mother with keen eyes.

It was an excruciating way to spend an afternoon, made only slightly better by Blaise's quiet snarky commentary whenever Slughorn wasn't paying attention. Harry had almost cursed the man when he'd started pestering Neville about his parents, despite how clearly uncomfortable the blond boy was with the subject. At last, when the setting sun began to stream through the train windows, Slughorn blinked owlishly.

"Goodness me, look at the time! You had all better go change into your robes!" He ushered them out with a genial smile, promising to lend McLaggen a book and assuring Harry and Blaise that his office door was open to them any time. It seemed Harry had passed the first test — and Neville had not, which seemed just fine by him if the look of relief on his face was anything to go by.

"Thank Merlin I'm not doing Potions anymore," Neville remarked, and Harry groaned quietly.

“Lucky bastard.”

The rest of their friends had already changed into their robes by the time the three boys returned, and they rummaged through their trunks for their own robes. “How was it?” Draco asked, shifting over so Harry could sit down once he had changed. Harry huffed.

“About as awful as expected. Apparently Dumbledore’s told him I need ‘the right guiding hand’,” he added, making a face. Draco sneered.

“Charming.”

“Isn’t he just.” Still, Snape thought it was important to be nice to Slughorn, so Harry would hold his temper.

They didn’t get any other visitors for the rest of the journey, and soon the train was pulling into Hogsmeade station. Before they opened the compartment door, Harry slid an arm around Draco’s waist, kissing him firmly.

“Merlin, give it a rest, you two!” Ginny exclaimed, poking him in the shoulder. “Godric only knows how the pair of you managed to keep this secret for so long.”

Harry grinned, unrepentant. “Some of us can’t snog our boyfriends in the middle of the common room,” he retorted pointedly. “It’s my last chance for a while, give me a break.”

But all the same, he reluctantly let go of Draco, and followed Neville out of the compartment.

Already, people were whispering about the pair of them sitting together for the train ride. As they headed to the thestral-drawn carriages, Harry spotted Ron and Hermione glaring daggers in his direction.

Seeing the castle looming on the horizon made something tighten in Harry’s chest — he hated feeling that way, when before the castle had been the one place he could truly relax.

He hated Dumbledore, for making him feel that way.

Discreetly, Draco squeezed his knee, gaze knowing.

The pair of them walked shoulder to shoulder into the castle, only stopping when they got to the door of the Great Hall. While Harry wished he could take a leaf out of Luna and Daphne’s book and kiss his partner goodbye, he had to settle for squeezing Draco’s shoulder before they parted for their house tables — and that was enough to set off a wave of whispers through the hall. Harry sat between Ginny and Neville, keeping his head down. He really didn’t want to know what people thought of him, these days.

Further up the table, Katie was sat with a few of her year mates, and she gave him a discreet thumbs up, tapping her chest where on Harry the Quidditch Captain badge was pinned proudly. Harry grinned back at her; Merlin, he was looking forward to playing quidditch again.

He looked up at the head table, trailing his gaze over the gathered staff. Snape looked as dour as always, back in full Hated Professor mode. Hagrid hurried in just as Harry was frowning at the half-giant's empty seat — he caught Harry's eye and offered a cheerful wink. A few other professors were staring back at him, too, he noticed, though none of them reacted.

He wondered what they thought of Dumbledore's insinuations in the Prophet.

The headmaster himself looked as delighted as ever at the start of a new school year, twinkling blue eyes surveying the gathering students. He didn't look Harry's way — did he still think Harry had Voldemort lurking inside his mind? Harry smirked to himself; if only he knew.

Once everyone was settled — a much smaller crowd than usual; there were definitely a high number of students absent this year — McGonagall led in the latest batch of first years ready for Sorting. They looked like a smaller crowd, too. Harry felt a pang in his chest; it couldn't be easy, starting Hogwarts at such a fraught political time.

He would do his best to keep them safe, however he possibly could.

The heartbreak cut a little deeper each time the Sorting Hat called Slytherin and a look of abject fear crossed the face of whichever child sat beneath it. Even those with names Harry recognised from historically Slytherin families looked uneasy at joining the silver and green table. Harry glanced across at Draco and Blaise, who both nodded fractionally.

Slytherin House would not fall prey to prejudice, not again. Not this year.

With so few first years, the Sorting didn't take long at all, and Dumbledore stood to welcome them for another year.

Harry's eyes went straight to the man's left hand, and he knew he wasn't the only one. Snape had vastly understated the condition of the headmaster's arm — the whole hand looked like it had withered and died, the fingers withered and black. It went right up beneath the sleeve of his voluminous purple robe; all the way to his elbow, Snape had told them. It had reached that far before the Potions Master had managed to dispel the curse magic.

What on Earth had possessed Dumbledore to put on that ring??

Dumbledore acted like he didn't notice half the school staring at his hand, sitting down again just as the tables filled with food.

"What happened to him?" Ginny asked, horrified. Harry pursed his lips.

"Looks like some kind of dark curse, I'd wager," he said evenly. The redhead narrowed her gaze at him, but wisely didn't ask anything more.

As they ate, it seemed everyone had an opinion on Dumbledore's gnarled hand; Harry heard everything from a duel against Voldemort himself to some sort of ritual gone wrong, to Harry himself having cursed the headmaster in retaliation for his words in the Prophet.

That last one made Harry snicker. “Should I be flattered that people think I know that kind of magic?” he asked Neville in an undertone.

“I don’t know, Mr Eight Os, would it really be such a surprise?” came Neville’s amused retort.

“Hey, Potter!” The call came from behind him; it was Zacharias Smith, at the Hufflepuff table. “So what’s the plan with the HA this year?” He dropped his voice a little, but Harry still saw several heads swivel in their direction. Harry bit back a sigh.

“Don’t know yet,” he replied, as he had done to everyone else. “Give me a few days to get my bearings, yeah? I don’t even know what my schedule is yet. But don’t spread it around, yeah? I don’t want things getting out of hand.” He didn’t want the entire school hearing about the HA and deciding it sounded like fun.

Zacharias didn’t look impressed, but merely sniffed, turning back to his food.

“You’re going to have to do something,” Ginny told Harry quietly, reaching past him as dinner vanished and was replaced by dessert, her gaze set on a decadent looking chocolate trifle. “People got way too much out of the HA to want to stop now, especially with the Ministry the way it is.”

“I know,” Harry agreed, grimacing. “I’ll figure something out.” He wanted to continue the meetings — Snape wasn’t going to be able to properly prepare everyone while still playing his role — but it was more difficult this year, with things the way they were. Many of the HA members would likely think that with Umbridge gone they could be open about the club, like it was as harmless as the Gobstones Club or Debate Society.

Harry doubted Dumbledore would let it continue that way, not if he thought Harry was turning Dark.

Then again, he might be delighted with the idea of his prize pawn training all his other pawns up, ready to die for the cause.

He shuddered, suddenly no longer as eager to eat his treacle tart as he had been a moment ago.

When dessert ended, Harry sat back to listen to Dumbledore give his usual welcome speech — and tried to act as surprised as the rest when it was announced Slughorn was taking over Potions, rather than DADA. The hall filled with the buzz of conversation, and Dumbledore let it go on for a few moments before clearing his throat pointedly.

“Now, as you all know,” he said, face turning grave, “the Ministry of Magic is now under the control of Lord Voldemort and his Death Eaters.” There were several gasps throughout the hall, and more than a few flinches. “These are difficult and dangerous times we live in, and I cannot emphasise enough how important it is to remain vigilant here at school. We may be safe from outside forces within these wards, but there is always darkness lingering within, and we must be careful.”

Several sets of eyes turned to Harry, who resolutely did not react.

“Luckily, the rather... independent nature of the school means we can continue as normal despite the interference at the Ministry, though I will ask that you all please do not fight any restrictions your professors or prefects may impose on you — we are doing it for your benefit, even if it may seem unfair at the time. And please, if you notice anything suspicious or unusual, do not hesitate to notify a member of staff as soon as possible.” He smiled warmly. “The staff and I will endeavour to keep you all as safe as possible, but that requires your cooperation. I trust you will all conduct yourselves appropriately, as I know you are all capable of.”

Harry grit his teeth — it was utterly galling, that the man could stand there and smile and assure the students he’d keep them safe, and not even offer for students who were in danger of falling under Voldemort’s thumb to speak to a teacher if they felt threatened or worried. Was he expecting the heads of houses to cover that? Or did he just truly not care which students he lost, as long as the right students did what he expected of them?

How many students would not have been sat in this hall if not for Harry or Narcissa offering sanctuary?

That seemed to be all Dumbledore had to say; he bid them a cheerful goodnight and stepped back from his podium, the cue for the prefects to begin herding first years. Harry glanced over at the Slytherin table, where Draco and Pansy were directing the new fifth year prefects to do their duties.

Ginny hooked an arm through his, dragging his gaze away. “Come on, loverboy,” she murmured under her breath, smirking. “Let’s get upstairs.”

Harry sighed, but did as bid. His bed in Gryffindor Tower was going to feel even colder than usual, tonight.

They went up to the tower within a larger huddle of Gryffindors, all sleepy and full of food and most of them too tired to care about whether Harry was secretly evil or not. In the common room, Harry smiled to himself; despite everything, it was good to be back. It felt weird, though, with all his older friends except Katie gone.

Even weirder, to look around and see how small the younger years seemed, how many there were that Harry hardly recognised. He was a sixth year, now; almost top of the pecking order. It made him feel ancient, looking at all those wide-eyed first and second years staring at him.

Stifling a yawn, he turned to head up to the dorm and get an early night — and almost walked right into Ron Weasley.

“You’ve got some nerve, y’know,” the redhead declared. Harry raised an eyebrow.

“Do I?”

Ron scowled at him. “Coming back to school, after hiding all summer like a coward.”

“I wasn’t hiding, I was at home,” Harry retorted waspishly. “Where were you all summer, then? Out fighting Death Eaters?”

Ron’s ears reddened. “I’m not the one they’re after!” he countered. “How many people died because You-Know-Who was looking for you, hmm?”

“What do you want me to do, walk up to Voldemort and hand myself over?”

Ron flinched at the name. “You could at least listen to Dumbledore, rather than just abandoning the war! He spent all summer trying to talk to you, Mum said, and you never left your bloody house!”

“I am doing more for this war effort than Albus Bloody Dumbledore,” Harry roared, temper snapping. “I’m not abandoning anything — I’m sixteen, Ron; I’m letting the adults handle things because I’m not even fucking old enough to use magic outside school! And I know exactly what Dumbledore wants to say to me, and quite frankly I don’t want to hear it.”

To Harry’s surprise, Ron’s gaze lifted up, just for a few moments, fixing intently on Harry’s scar. “Maybe he’s right about you, after all,” the redhead spat, “maybe you have got You-Know-Who inside your head.”

“If I did, we’d all be screwed,” Harry retorted hollowly. Then he pushed past Ron, sidestepped an indignant-looking Hermione, and stalked up the stairs to the dormitory, ignoring the eyes that followed.

He couldn’t shake the way Ron had looked at his scar — it wasn’t fearful, not like it was when he thought Harry was possessed after the incident with his dad and the snake.

It was knowing. Disgusted.

Exactly what had Dumbledore told Ron and Hermione, over the summer?

Chapter 86

Harry and Neville — and by association, Ginny — made sure to get down to breakfast early the next morning. Both to avoid the incessant gossip in the common room, and to make sure they gave Professor McGonagall plenty of time to sort out their schedules. The housemistress had to confirm with every sixth year that they had gained the necessary OWL grades to continue their chosen classes to NEWT level, and both boys had things they needed to confirm.

McGonagall looked a little stressed already by the time she reached them, the boys catching the tail end of a discussion with Lavender about the Divination NEWT and how Firenze would be taking the sixth years; it seemed Lavender wanted to learn from both Firenze and Trelawney this year. Or, rather, she wanted to learn from Trelawney and ogle Firenze. Harry smiled to himself at hearing her huff as she walked off to her first class.

“Ah, Mr Longbottom. Congratulations on your Herbology grade, I know Professor Sprout will be delighted to have you continue her class,” she greeted, making Neville smile bashfully. “I did want to discuss some of your other choices, however — while I’m very impressed that you managed an Exceeds Expectations in Transfiguration, I do have to ask if you’re absolutely sure about wanting to continue the subject. The coursework is quite intense, and being perfectly honest with you, Longbottom, I think you might struggle as the year goes on. Have you considered continuing Charms instead? Professor Flitwick has always been impressed with your work, and from what he’s told me you seem to enjoy the class far more than I can say you’ve ever enjoyed mine.”

There was no judgement in her tone, but Neville flushed.

“Gran says Charms is a soft option,” he mumbled, and McGonagall huffed.

“But you, Longbottom? What do you think?”

I— I like Charms. Um. Better than Transfiguration? Sorry, Professor.”

McGonagall’s lips twitched with faint amusement. “My class is not for everyone. Now, you could always continue both—” Neville shook his head in mild alarm, “I thought not. I suggest you continue Charms, and I will remind Augusta that just because she failed Charms, that does not make it a soft option.” Her gaze turned pointed, and Neville gaped. Evidently, his gran had not shared that part of her opinion on the subject.

“Y-yeah, that sounds great. Thanks, Professor,” he stuttered, shoulders slumping in relief. Harry grinned encouragingly at him; they both knew that only his determined studying with the heirs had brought his Transfiguration grade up from an A to a low E, and Neville had spent half the summer worrying about taking the NEWT and failing dismally.

McGonagall tapped his schedule with her wand to rearrange it, and handed it over. Then she turned to Harry, who straightened up under her gaze. There was pride shining in those dark green eyes, and he fought back a grin. “Mr Potter. Your OWL grades were as I expected they might be, very well done.”

“Thank you, Professor.”

She looked down his schedule, frowning. “This is going to be quite the busy schedule for you, Potter. Are you sure you want to continue seven subjects?”

“I, ah, was actually thinking about dropping Herbology. Sorry, Nev,” he added sheepishly, but his friend just waved him off.

“I’m ditching you in Potions, it’s only fair,” he joked.

McGonagall nodded in approval. “Sensible. Six is still a large course load, but considering your performance in recent years I can’t see you having a problem with it. Professors Babbling and Vector have both seen your OWL papers, and are very much looking forward to having you in their class.”

Across the table, Hermione Granger choked on her drink. “He what?” she spluttered, wide-eyed. “But— Professor, are you saying he’s taking Arithmancy and Ancient Runes for NEWT? But he didn’t even take the OWL classes!”

McGonagall narrowed her eyes, unimpressed. “Mr Potter self-studied for his OWLs in both subjects, which is a perfectly reasonable pathway. He has achieved the grade requirements for both classes.”

“But he’ll be so behind, he won’t know any of the things we worked on last year!”

“As they were OWL level projects, I daresay he won’t need to,” McGonagall retorted primly.

Hermione turned to Harry, brown eyes imploring. “Harry, don’t be ridiculous, really; you’ll just fall behind, they’re really difficult classes!”

“I got Os in both of my OWLs, Hermione, I’m sure I’ll be fine,” he replied evenly. That, if possible, made Hermione’s eyes widen even more.

“You— you got Os? But… but that’s not possible. I only got an E in Ancient Runes!” she screeched, and Harry had to pull on all of his Slytherin training to avoid smirking right in her face.

“Then I suggest you worry about your own class performance and leave me to mine.” He turned back to Professor McGonagall, who once again was pointedly not reacting to the conversation. “Six subjects sounds great, Professor. I’m excited to start NEWT Transfiguration.” He wished he could show her his animagus form. Perhaps later, once he knew she was truly trustworthy.

She adjusted his schedule and handed it over, a small smile crossing her features. “Glad to hear it, Potter. Oh, and by the way, I have a list of hopefuls for the Quidditch team, whenever you’re ready to organise tryouts.” She turned, facing the pair across the table. “Now, Mr Weasley — I thought you wanted to be an auror?”

Harry turned back to his breakfast, listening with half an ear as McGonagall gently harangued Ron into continuing Potions, since Slughorn accepted E students. The redhead didn't look thrilled by it, but obviously his desire to be an auror won out — and the hope that Slughorn might be less awful than Snape.

Harry looked down at his schedule; he had Ancient Runes first period. Annoyingly that meant dealing with Hermione all in a tizzy, but on the bright side he knew Draco would be in that class.

Bidding goodbye to Neville, who had a free period first thing, Harry set off. Unsurprisingly, Hermione hurried after him. "There's no way you got Os in both Runes and Arithmancy," she declared, and Harry kept walking, unfazed.

"Well, that's what my results said, so I guess I did," he replied.

"There must have been some sort of mix-up," Hermione insisted. Harry shrugged.

"If there was, we'll soon find out, won't we?" he said. "But again, I suggest you focus on your own classwork — it won't make any difference to you how well I'm doing, will it?"

Then he picked up his pace, grateful for his growth spurt giving him longer legs to get away from her nagging.

.-.-.-.

Runes was a much more enjoyable class than either Divination or CoMC had been, and Harry was excited to be able to study the subject properly rather than just working on summers and over the mirror with Sirius and Remus.

Draco was mostly just entertained by Hermione Granger glaring daggers at the pair of them through the entire thing.

The homework load was a little daunting, but Harry set the stack of books inside his satchel, thankful for the Feather-Light charms. Hermione kept looking at him as if expecting him to burst into tears at the prospect of so much reading and a fifteen inch essay on the first day. Harry ignored her, pulling out his schedule to compare against Draco's. "Hey, look, we've both got free periods this afternoon," he said cheerfully. "Library?"

"Works for me. I'm sure this won't be the only homework we've picked up by then."

The crowd outside the DADA classroom was much larger than the one for Ancient Runes. Harry and Draco joined Neville and Susan, both of whom had expressions of mild dread on their faces. "How bad are we expecting?" Susan asked grimly. Harry shrugged.

He wasn't going to lie and say that Snape would be even remotely bearable. "I mean, hopefully fewer explosions than Potions class?" he said instead, making Neville choke on a laugh.

No one had a response — the classroom door opened, and the sixth years filed in.

Harry was glad to see that every member of the HA in his year was present in the class, as well as a few other students.

Snape began his class with an appropriately worshipful speech on the Dark Arts, complete with picture examples of what could befall those who did not treat them with the correct respect. The fear in the room was palpable — good, as far as Harry was concerned. They needed to be scared. They needed to take things seriously.

One thing was for sure; this year, they would not have a teacher who would coddle them, or hold their hand as they explored the darker parts of wizarding life. Snape would make damn sure all of them knew exactly what was waiting for them outside the castle — what life would become, should Voldemort win.

He would just be saying it in a way that made it sound like he was excited for the prospect.

“...you are, I believe, complete novices in the use of non-verbal spells,” the man drawled, robes billowing as he paced around the classroom. As he mocked Hermione for her textbook-perfect answer, Harry felt the atmosphere shift, ever so slightly. Several of his classmates were hiding smiles, relief on their faces.

They were not quite the novices Snape expected them to be, thanks to Harry.

As tempting as it was to pair up with Draco, Harry turned to Neville instead; his friend had never quite got the hang of non-verbal casting. And no matter how much Snape glared and sneered at Harry and made disparaging remarks in his direction, they all knew Harry would have no problem with the kind of mental focus involved.

So the class got to work, Snape catching out every instance of a quietly-muttered spell — unless of course it came from one of his Slytherins. Harry kept one eye on Neville while the blond boy tried to cast a non-verbal jinx, while his other surveyed the classroom, pride filling him at the sight of the HA members picking up the exercise quickly.

Suddenly a Jelly-Legs jinx came shooting towards him, and Harry silently raised a shield in an instant. He grinned at Neville, offering a thumbs up. That was much faster than usual, for him!

Snape didn't seem to know how to handle the majority of his class succeeding within the first fifteen minutes. He strode through the pairs, dark eyes narrowing with every silent jinx or shield performed. The only members of the class who were struggling were those Harry had not taught — including, to his amusement, Ron and Hermione. Ron was purple in the face with the effort of trying to raise a shield, and while Hermione had managed a non-verbal Stinging hex, it was so weak Ron hardly even noticed it.

The professor suddenly appeared looming over Neville's shoulder, and Harry saw Neville's hand begin to tremble. Snape sneered. “Pathetic, Longbottom. Here, let me show you—“

He raised his wand quickly, but Harry was just as fast; his non-verbal shield leapt into action against Snape's Burning hex, which was strong enough to push both casters back a little. Harry's eyes widened.

“That wasn’t a jinx!” he protested indignantly. Snape’s eyes flashed.

“That wasn’t a jinx, sir,” he corrected pointedly. Unable to help himself, Harry smirked.

“There’s no need to call me sir, Professor.”

Several people gasped quietly. Out of the corner of his eye, Harry caught Neville’s horrified gaze — and behind him, Draco biting his lip to contain his laughter.

Snape’s eyes narrowed, and Harry braced himself for the fallout. “Detention!” the tall man snapped. “Saturday night, my office.” That had been easy enough. “Watch your mouth, Potter, or you will find yourself removed from my classroom. I’m sure the Prophet would have a field day,” he added in that dangerously smooth drawl. Harry schooled his face into something vaguely resembling contrition.

“Well,” Snape said curtly, striding back to the front of the room. “It seems that for once in your lives, some of you have actually come prepared for your class. We shall see how long that lasts.”

Harry glanced around, catching the eye of several pleased-looking HA members. It wasn’t often anyone got one over on Professor Snape — with any luck, that would continue. If it meant Snape got the perfect excuse to push them all even harder, well, that was a bonus in Harry’s eyes.

.-. .

“Did you see the look on his face when we all started casting?”

“Bet he wasn’t expecting that!”

“But did you see his face when Harry said that!”

The class barely waited for the door to shut on Snape’s classroom before they were muttering eagerly to one another, grinning and snickering. It was a far cry from the despondent, angry faces Harry was used to seeing after a DADA class.

“Do you have a death wish?” Draco asked quietly, sidling up to him. Harry laughed. “I’m serious — talking back to him in front of the whole class like that, are you mad?”

“It just sort of happened,” Harry confessed, unrepentant. “You know me — sometimes my mouth does things before my brain can tell it not to.”

Draco’s eyes dropped to Harry’s lips for the barest of moments, and he scowled, glaring at Harry with a clear ‘don’t flirt with me in public’ face.

Harry just laughed again.

He was interrupted by Jack Sloper, delivering a message from Dumbledore and asking Harry about quidditch trials. Harry grimaced — he’d have to arrange that soon, before Sloper and his friend got their hopes up about continuing on as Gryffindor’s beaters.

“Ooh, perfect timing,” he murmured to himself, reading Dumbledore’s request to meet him that Saturday evening. Snape’s detention was proving even more useful already!

Hermione was just as furious with Harry’s presence in the Arithmancy classroom as she had been at Ancient Runes — more so, even, after Professor Vector gushed over his OWL result, playfully scolding him for keeping his talent hidden from her for so long.

Luckily, Daphne and Padma were also taking the class, so Harry had some friendly faces to sit with.

Harry was glad when his first free period arrived, he and Neville heading back to the common room. It was the time slot for Care of Magical Creatures, which Draco was taking because it would look good on his healer application, so the two Gryffindors went up to work on their homework for Snape together.

“Here goes any hopes that there would be less homework than last year,” Neville sighed, unrolling some parchment. Harry hummed in agreement.

“At least this year we’ve got free periods to work in.”

Indeed, knowing there were breaks within his schedule was a relief to Harry, even though he was sure they wouldn’t feel like breaks once the year fully got going.

At the very least, it would make meeting with the other heirs much easier to organise.

. . .

After lunch, Neville was far too smug about returning to the common room with Parvati and Lavender while Harry headed down to the dungeons for Potions. Unsurprisingly, it was a fairly small group; a dozen of them in all. Ron didn’t look happy about being there, and his scowl deepened when Harry stood to wait with Draco, Blaise and Theo.

“Glad you can finally stop throwing shit in my cauldron, now?” he asked his boyfriend teasingly. Draco smirked.

“I don’t know, I might do it anyway. Keep you on your toes.”

Harry snorted, and Slughorn opened the door, happily welcoming them all in. To their surprise, there were already cauldrons bubbling away inside; four of them, each filled with something different. Harry sat with the three Slytherins, feeling bad for Pansy Parkinson as she was forced to sit with the three Ravenclaw boys — and feeling equally sorry for Padma and Ernie, who were left sharing a table with Ron and Hermione. Slughorn looked surprised by the arrangement, his gaze lingering on Harry for several seconds, a frown beneath his enormous moustache.

Did he think Harry’s guiding hand needed to direct him away from Slytherin House?

When Slughorn directed everyone to get their books and potion kits out, Ron stuck his hand up hesitantly, explaining his dilemma. Slughorn just smiled. “Not to worry, not to worry! You can use ingredients from the store cupboard today, I’ll get you set up. And we’ve got a few spare copies of old books that will do you quite nicely until you can get your own. Ah, Harry, my boy, would you mind grabbing Mr Weasley a copy of Advanced Potion Making from that cupboard over there while I find some scales he can borrow?"

Harry was the closest to the cupboard, so he slid off his stool and headed over. There were only two copies of the book, and both of them looked fairly battered. Harry picked up the one on top, flicking it open to see what state it was in; Ron would whine eternally if he thought Harry had purposefully given him the worse copy.

To his surprise, the pages were absolutely covered in handwriting — the previous owner had taken issue with practically every potion in the book, crossing things out and adding their own instructions, or writing tips in the margins.

It was very familiar handwriting, to Harry — the same handwriting he'd seen scrawled all over the notes in the lab at Seren Du, and on the labels of all the bottles in their Potions cabinet. Similar, but more rushed, to the handwriting that had littered Harry's Potions homework for the last five years.

His eyebrows rose, and Harry quickly tucked the book into the inner pocket of his robe, grabbing the other book; a flick through it proved it to be slightly dog-eared but otherwise unmarked, so Harry was happy to hand that copy over to Ron.

With everyone prepared, Slughorn began the lesson, proudly showing off the potions he'd brewed as an example of a successful NEWT education.

Harry very much hoped Slughorn would be keeping a keen eye on these cauldrons — Veritaserum and Polyjuice Potion would cause absolute chaos if they were snuck into the school population.

Hermione was in fine form answering questions, preening with every smile and chuckle she drew from Slughorn at her prompt responses. Harry had to crane his neck to look at the third potion, the one he didn't immediately recognise — as he did, the steam rising from the cauldron drifted his way. At first, Harry didn't recognise much of a change in smell; there was an underlying aroma of treacle tart, but it wasn't all that strong. Then he realised that the combination of the woody scent of broomstick polish and the familiar spicy notes of Draco's aftershave were not actually coming from the boy sat beside him, but from the cauldron of what was definitely Amortentia — as confirmed by Slughorn, chuckling over Hermione's enthusiasm.

Harry inhaled a little deeper; indeed, the steam made him feel like he had his nose pressed into the curve of Draco's neck, as he often did when they were curled up together. He felt the blood rush to his cheeks, and glanced aside, meeting Draco's gaze and raising one eyebrow slightly.

Draco's pale face flushed pink, and he nodded, the movement hardly noticeable as he watched Slughorn, pretending to pay attention. Under the table, Draco's knee bumped against his, just for a moment.

Harry grinned to himself, attention turning back to the professor — he knew, of course, but having confirmation like that made his stomach flutter happily.

“Ugh,” Blaise muttered under his breath, glaring at them both. Harry winked at him.

“I’m sorry, Blaise — I’m sure the smell of fireworks is going to make it really hard to tell whether your cauldron is burning today,” he replied quietly, snickering as Blaise’s glare intensified.

.-.-.

Potions class with Slughorn was far more relaxed than Potions with Snape — or perhaps it was that everyone in the room had chosen to be there.

Or maybe, it was because Harry was brewing using the altered instructions in Snape’s book, and it made the Draught of Living Death an absolute breeze to brew. Even Draco kept looking over at his cauldron in amazement. “Tell you later,” Harry promised quietly, stirring his cauldron — with the additional clockwise stir Snape recommended.

The result was a cauldron of flawless Draught of Living Death, which had Hermione — wild-haired and flustered after her frantic brewing process — glaring daggers at him across the classroom when Slughorn sung his praises, handing over the small vial of Felix Felicis.

“Inherited your mother’s talent, to be sure!” the old professor declared excitedly. “My, my, well done indeed, Harry my boy!”

Harry slipped the book carefully into his bag on the way out, already mentally rearranging his evening.

“How did you do that?” Hermione cornered him as soon as they were outside the classroom. “You— your potion was perfect, that shouldn’t have been possible in the time allotted!”

“I guess I just got lucky,” he replied, utterly straight-faced. Hermione glared at him, huffed loudly, and stormed off, dragging Ron along with her. When she was gone, Draco chuckled.

“No, really, how did you do that?” he asked, bumping Harry’s shoulder. “Don’t get me wrong, I know you can brew. But that was something else.”

Seeing Blaise and Theo looking equally curious, Harry beckoned them into an empty classroom and pulled out the book, showing it to them. “I found it in the cupboard when I grabbed a book for Ron. Whoever owned it last made some adjustments to the instructions,” he explained. “I just followed them, and it worked out well.”

“I’ll say,” Theo murmured, brows knitting together as he studied the spidery writing. “Well, that’s much less interesting than you suddenly developing incredible potion-making abilities.”

“Sorry to disappoint,” Harry replied with a chuckle, putting the book away. “I’ll share, if you like.”

“It’s fine,” Blaise dismissed, waving him off. “Better instructions won’t help when exams roll around. But if there are any other useful tips in there, let us know.”

“Will do,” Harry promised, glad his friends didn’t seem to be jealous or annoyed. Of course, they were Slytherins; they were all for using whatever resources you had at your disposal.

Blaise and Theo bid them goodbye and headed back to Slytherin, while Harry and Draco made their way up to the library. “You know who that book belonged to, don’t you?”

“Of course I do,” Harry replied amusedly. “Lived with him long enough, haven’t I? I can’t believe he just left it in a cupboard somewhere.”

“Thank Merlin Weasley didn’t find it, he’d be insufferable,” Draco agreed. Harry grimaced. Yes, Ron Weasley suddenly developing a talent for Potions was not something they needed.

.-. .

That evening, Harry snuck down to Snape’s quarters under the invisibility cloak just before curfew, earning raised eyebrows from the man. “If you have come to gloat about stealing my first lesson away from me in your little defence club, you needn’t bother; I have plenty more to torture your classmates with.”

Harry laughed, shedding the cloak. “No, no, I’m not here about that. Although you’re welcome, by the way. And thanks for the detention — I got a note from Dumbledore asking me to meet him then, so now I’ve got a great excuse to skip.”

Snape frowned at that. “You cannot avoid him forever.”

“I can sure as hell try,” Harry returned. Then he reached into his pocket, pulling out the battered copy of Advanced Potion Making. “Half-Blood Prince sound familiar to you?” he drawled teasingly. Snape’s eyebrows rose.

“Where did you get that?”

Harry explained the events of Slughorn’s class to the man. “I can’t believe you left this just lying around, but I’m glad you did; I won a bottle of Felix Felicis because of you.”

“Horace always was fond of bribery to win friends,” Snape muttered dryly. “I did not leave that lying around, I assure you. The last I saw of it, it was on my shelf, right here.” He gestured to the very bottom corner of his bookshelf, where Harry could see a couple of other tattered-looking schoolbooks.

“Then how did it get into the classroom cupboard?” Harry blinked, perplexed. Snape’s lips turned in a scowl.

“Who do we know with access to my personal quarters during the summer, and a vested interest in Ronald Weasley feeling superior to you?”

Harry stared at him. “You think Dumbledore left it there for Ron to find?” That seemed unnecessarily convoluted — and exactly the kind of plan Dumbledore might go for. Harry snorted. “Well, that backfired on him, didn’t it?” He looked down at the book, flicking through the heavily-edited pages. Some of the recipes were so heavily altered Harry could hardly read them.

He held the book out to Snape. “I suppose you want it back, then?” He knew how much Snape valued the few things he had left from his teenage years; most of them had previously belonged to his mother.

“Keep it, for now,” Snape insisted with a shake of his head. Then he smirked. “You could use all the advantages you can get, since I am no longer able to teach you. Besides — this is a sure way to get you right to the top of Horace’s favourites list. My talent, and your fame? He won’t be able to resist.”

“He— he said I’d inherited my mother’s talent for Potions,” Harry said tentatively, watching Snape’s face soften.

“Lily and I often adjusted recipes together. While the notes in that book may be my writing, some of them were her work.” His smirk returned, much fonder this time. “She could never quite beat me where it mattered, however.”

“Remus once told me she nearly did.”

Snape snorted. “And had she, he never would have let me hear the end of it,” he agreed. “Keep the book, Harry. But look after it. You do not want to know what I will do to you should that text become damaged.”

Harry gulped, nodding seriously.

“There are more than just Potions notes in there, too,” Snape added. “Some spells I created, you may recognise. If you do not recognise it, do not attempt them without asking me first. I was a ruthless little shite when I was your age — many of those spells are not safe for use.”

“Yes, sir.” Already, Harry was keen to give it a proper read through — even more so now he knew his mother had a hand in it, too.

. . .

For the rest of the week, Harry continued to be Slughorn’s new favourite student; much to Hermione’s outrage. One evening where he wasn’t drowning in homework, Harry carefully copied out every one of Snape’s notes into his own, newer copy of Advanced Potion Making — all the notes that were to do with Potions, at least. He wrote the spells in his own private notebook, sure that Snape’s warning had not been an exaggeration.

It was easier to decipher, in his own handwriting, but it also meant he could give the original copy back to Snape in his detention on Saturday. “I didn’t want to risk a cauldron exploding onto it or anything,” he explained as he handed the battered book over. “Also your handwriting was even worse then than it is now.”

Snape let out a quiet snort, though Harry could tell he was glad to have his book back, his long-fingered hands running fondly over the cover.

“Thank you,” he murmured, pocketing the book. “Now, the matter of your... detention.”

Harry grinned at the challenging smirk on the Slytherin’s face. It was time to get to work.

.-. .

Harry had almost forgotten about the meeting with Dumbledore he’d skipped, until the headmaster approached him at breakfast on Sunday morning with a disappointed frown. “Harry, my boy,” he greeted, “I was expecting you in my office yesterday.”

“Oh, sorry, sir. I had detention with Professor Snape,” Harry returned blithely. Dumbledore’s frown deepened.

“I asked Severus to rearrange that detention.”

“Oh. Well no one told me anything, so I just went.” All around them, Harry’s friends were watching the exchange warily. Dumbledore’s lips pursed.

“I suppose I can forgive the miscommunication, my boy. I really must speak with you, though — perhaps this afternoon?”

“Surely I haven’t been back at classes long enough for you to have anything to talk to me about, Professor?” Harry played oblivious, trying not to smirk as the twinkle in those eyes disappeared.

“It’s not about your classwork, which I’m sure is quite fine. Well done on your OWLs, by the way; I was very surprised to see your results.”

Wasn’t that just the most back-handed compliment Harry had heard? His smile tightened. “Sorry, sir, but my lawyer has advised me not to visit with you alone, after everything you’ve said in the Prophet. If you really need to speak to me, I’m sure Professor McGonagall would be happy to accompany me, as my head of house.” The woman in question was already on her way over, no doubt curious about what Dumbledore was up to. “Won’t you, Professor?”

Dumbledore straightened up, turning to offer a smile that didn’t quite reach genuine. “Now, Harry; Professor McGonagall is incredibly busy; there’s no need to add to her schedule just so the two of us can have a little chat.”

“Busy? Nonsense, Albus; I’m perfectly capable of rearranging things if there is a problem with one of my students. What did you need to discuss with Potter? Surely he isn’t in trouble already.” She eyed Harry suspiciously, and he gave his best innocent face in response.

“No, no trouble at all. I merely had some things I wished to discuss — truly, Minerva, your involvement is not necessary.”

“Mrs Frobisher has strongly recommended I not speak to you without another teacher present, sir,” Harry said, feigning apology. “She’s worried I might get misconstrued in the Prophet, again. And Sirius said if you had anything regarding the war to talk about, you should pass it on to him.”

Over Dumbledore’s shoulder, Harry saw McGonagall’s lips purse. “Mr Potter is a minor, Albus; if his guardian — and his legal counsel — have instructed against him meeting with you, I’m afraid as his housemistress I must abide by that. If you must talk with Potter, let me know and I will clear my schedule. Otherwise, I suggest you send a letter to Lord Black.”

There was nothing Dumbledore could say to that without causing a scene; even more of a scene, considering half the hall was watching at this point. Dumbledore smiled tightly, and bowed his head.

“If that is how you feel, Mr Potter, I can only oblige, though it saddens me to do so. If you change your mind, you know where to find me — I believe you will find what I have to say very enlightening indeed.”

Then he continued up to the head table. Harry glanced to McGonagall with a thankful look, but she said nothing, merely nodding and carrying on with her day. Finally able to turn back to his breakfast, Harry sighed, looking at Susan.

“I didn’t think he’d try something so blatant,” he mused in an undertone. Opposite him, the Hufflepuff hummed thoughtfully.

“Maybe he was hoping social pressure would get you. You wouldn’t want to look like there’s a rift between you in public.”

Harry snorted. “If he didn’t want that he shouldn’t have spent half the summer slandering me in the paper.”

“Well there’s no worry of that now,” Padma remarked, the morning’s copy of the Prophet open in front of her. “It’s even more of a Ministry mouthpiece than it used to be, these days.”

Several of the heirs shared a grim look — a Ministry mouthpiece was a Voldemort mouthpiece, now.

“Is there anything useful in there, or . . . ?” Neville trailed off, and Padma shook her head.

“More of the same. They’ve suspended Wizengamot meetings until further notice — probably because more than half the seats were absent for the last.”

With Voldemort in charge of the Ministry, it would be as good as suicide for anyone who did not support him to walk into the building. Harry was suddenly very, very glad that Lucius Malfoy had died in the Department of Mysteries back in June; had the Malfoy seats still been under the control of the Dark, it would have been just enough to keep the Wizengamot open and able to pass laws, with a bit of threatening of a few neutral seats.

Narcissa placing the seats firmly out of Voldemort’s reach was the only thing keeping the Dark from having true control of wizarding Britain. For now, the Death Eaters might have control of the Ministry buildings and its departments, but no new laws or regulations could be passed — it wasn't an ideal situation, but it could have been a whole lot worse.

"Oh, look, Harry," Sully piped up, pointing at a section of the open paper. "They've put a price on your head already."

Harry frowned, reaching for Susan's abandoned copy of the paper to take a look for himself. Sure enough, there was a small article declaring that a reward of five thousand galleons would be offered to anyone who could capture Harry Potter, on suspicion of 'conspiracy against the Ministry'. Harry snorted.

"Good to know how much I'm worth, I suppose."

"Can they even do that?" Parvati asked, wrinkling her nose. Harry shrugged.

"Probably not, but it's Voldemort; he's not exactly playing by the rules. Not like they can send aurors to the school for me." Or, rather, not like they would try; not with Dumbledore and a school full of students in their way.

Harry would just have to be careful in Hogsmeade, and when wandering the school alone. But he doubted any of the students would try anything with him.

"I just hate that we don't have a single source of unbiased news in this country," Susan muttered, scowling. "It's alright for us; we've got people in the know, and we've got Harry — we know the truth. Everyone outside the school, however..."

It was like the year before, but much, much worse.

"Why don't you bring the Quibbler into the mix, hun?" Daphne asked Luna, but the blonde Ravenclaw shook her head.

"I would like to help, but something awful will happen to Daddy if he gets involved. The nargles have told me."

Several of them grimaced; they knew better than to go against Luna's creature warnings, especially ones that were quite so explicit.

"It'll be fine, for now," Harry assured, sounding far more confident than he felt. "They don't have enough manpower to kill everyone at the Ministry who doesn't actively support them, not without running the country to the ground. Let them try and convince people to their politics — we'll get them, when the time comes."

Just under a year, until Harry turned seventeen. They could handle things until then.

.-.-.

There was one more person at the school Harry had yet to greet properly now he was back — after breakfast, with a promise to spend time with Draco after lunch, Harry snuck down to the Chamber of Secrets, happily greeting Salazar's painting; and immediately launching into a summary of everything that had happened since he'd last been in the office.

“Well, you certainly have been busy,” the man hissed amusedly. “And you said this is your sixth year; now? The year you and your friends will begin to turn seventeen?” He had an odd sense of urgency lighting his eyes, and Harry frowned at him.

“Yes. Why?”

Salazar shook his head. “The castle is keen,” he said, as if that was an answer. “You are a particularly powerful group, this year; I believe it is eager to have such a surge of adult magic.”

Harry continued to eye the painting suspiciously — that definitely wasn’t the full story. But he knew trying to get secrets from Salazar was like trying to draw blood from a stone, so he let it slide; from the sounds of things, he’d find out sooner or later, regardless.

“How is your search for my unworthy heir’s horcruxes going?” the painting asked, and Harry frowned.

“Well, the ritual we found in here worked. The one in my scar is gone.” He explained what had happened with the Ministry, and why they’d decided to get rid of it. Salazar looked pleased; at the end of the last school year, he had been one of the most firm advocates for removing the horcrux as soon as possible.

“The problem is, now we don’t know how many others there are, or where to find them. If there even are any others.” It could well be that Voldemort’s snake was the only remaining horcrux.

Salazar frowned in thought, stroking the head of his pet snake. “I wish I could help, but I confess I’m in the dark as much as you are, lad. But do not fear — with how many of the rest have fallen into your path, it seems like the universe is on your side. I’m sure that luck will continue.”

Harry wished he could have that sort of optimism.

Chapter 87

Even with free periods thrown in the mix, Harry felt just as busy with classwork as he had at the start of his OWL year. Now that everyone in the room was there by choice — and by achieving a certain level of competency — all the teachers seemed to have much higher expectations. Snape wasn't the only one insisting on the use of non-verbal magic; all of their spellcasting classes encouraged such, with the warning that they would be marked down in their NEWTs for any verbal casting.

On the bright side, Slughorn was fairly sure Harry was the greatest student he'd ever had the pleasure of teaching, thanks to Snape's notes. It was odd for Harry to have Potions become one of his best subjects so rapidly, but not unwelcome. On the whole, Harry was just glad that he was actually coping with the NEWT-level course load, especially with six classes. Part of him had worried his OWL results had been a fluke, just a product of excessive studying. But he was keeping up just fine, even if the homework was stressful. He was certainly doing no worse than any of his peers — a lot better than many of them, in fact.

It was a heavy burden, but not heavy enough for people to stop pestering Harry about the HA. Nor for the heirs to turn their study meetings into actual study groups, not just yet.

The free periods did make it easier for them to meet, however; with Cassius graduated, Luna and Sully were the only non-sixth-years in the group. So they met during the free period that was designated for History of Magic, which literally nobody took at NEWT — self-study was a much better route than listening to Binns for another two years.

"There's not much we can do, is there?" Anthony remarked flatly, leaning back in his chair. He seemed to be taking it remarkably well that his parents were now Death Eaters, and he was technically pretending to be one as well. Harry supposed it helped that most of his friends knew the truth; and the ones that didn't were oblivious anyway. "You-Know-Who has the Ministry — even when we turn seventeen, we can't take our seats."

"There's nothing we can do politically," Susan agreed, "but that doesn't mean we're dead in the water. It just means we need to change our approach." She turned to Harry, gaze knowing. "We're all yours, Potter. You promised me a clear path to the Wizengamot by graduation, so; what's the plan?"

For a moment, Harry could only stare. Susan was entirely serious — with the same sort of determination and Hufflepuff work ethic that she had previously dedicated to her future Wizengamot career, she would now do whatever he directed in the fight against Voldemort. Looking around, she was not the only one with that steadfast, expectant look in their eye.

This was not a room full of people who expected him to take down Voldemort for them, like Harry was used to. This was a room full of people ready to help him take down Voldemort.

How had he gotten so lucky, to have friends like that?

“Well,” he started, clearing his throat. “I’m aiming for it to happen in the summer. I need—I’ll have my best chance if I’m fully of age when I face him, with my whole family magic behind me.” Around the table, everyone was nodding, as if that made perfect sense. No one pointed out that his birthday was a long way away, that all manner of awful things could have happened by then. “There are a couple of things I need to take care of before we can reach that point, as well.”

“So as it stands, we’re looking at a summer battle,” Susan said, nodding resolutely. “At least it won’t mess with classes.” Harry snorted; that was one way to look at it.

“There’s nothing we can do about the world outside the castle,” Daphne cut in bluntly. “As much as we’d like to, we can’t. There are adults out there who can — adults we can actually trust — and we’re best leaving that to them. While I hate to admit it, with Dumbledore here, the Dark Lord isn’t likely to come after the school. No matter how badly he wants to get his hands on Harry.”

“So what can we do?” Ernie asked, puffing himself up indignantly. “Because I’m sure as hell not going to just sit around and wait for the battle to come!”

“We can train,” Harry said firmly, before an argument could arise. “Give me til the weekend to get my schedule sorted, then I’ll get the HA back together. Some of our older members might have graduated, but we can work with the ones we’ve got. The more capable fighters we have when the battle comes, the better.”

“But what if You-Know-Who comes before you turn seventeen?” Parvati asked worriedly. Harry’s brow furrowed.

“We’ll deal with that when the time draws closer. We know he’ll be too busy reorganising the Ministry for at least the next few months, that’ll buy us some time. I’ll be honest, guys; it’s not going to be easy. It’s going to be a hell of a long year. But we’ll do what we’ve always done — prepare ourselves the best we can, and keep trying to undermine both Voldemort and Dumbledore in the eyes of the students.”

Admittedly, Harry’s plans for destroying Dumbledore’s reputation were going to be a lot harder now Amelia and Mrs Frobisher couldn’t set foot in the Ministry, or leak anything to the Prophet.

But that was his problem, not the rest of his friends’. All they had to do was keep themselves safe.

.-.-.-.

With what felt like half of Gryffindor house pressuring him to hurry up, Harry managed to organise Gryffindor quidditch team tryouts for the second Saturday of term, right after breakfast. He and Katie met on the pitch in their training gear, brooms in hand — and Harry stared wide-eyed out at the crowd in the stands.

“Please tell me they’re not all here to try out,” he croaked, and Katie laughed.

"No, not all of them. Half of them aren't even Gryffindors, look," she said, gesturing to a cluster of Hufflepuff third years. "Pretty sure they're just here to ogle you. Mr Chosen One," she teased, winking. Harry groaned.

"Really?" he whined. "I thought I was back to being an evil head case again?"

"You were for a while," Katie told him, shrugging, "but then you came back after the summer and everyone remembered how hot you are, so I guess they're back to fawning over you again."

Harry felt his cheeks turn as red as his quidditch uniform, and Katie laughed, shoving his shoulder gently. "Get used to it, Harry. Now come on, let's see what they're made of."

Despite practically being his co-captain, and having been on the team for longer than Harry had, Katie insisted on trying out with the other chasers.

And, despite Katie's insistence that most of the crowd were just there to drool over Harry, most of them were also there to at least pretend to be interested in quidditch.

It was clear Harry was going to have to revise his plans a little bit. "Okay," he called, his voice magically louder. "Here's how this is going to go!"

Splitting the crowd into groups of ten helped; seeing whether they could actually fly before he got into anything complicated. Seeing whether they were even in Gryffindor House to begin with. He could hardly believe how many people were willing to pretend they wanted to play quidditch, just to flirt with him!

At last, Harry could start chaser trials. While he had agreed to give everyone a fair shot, it was obvious to him that Katie and Ginny were in a class of their own — along with them he chose a fourth year girl, Demelza Robbins, who had a lot of potential.

There were plenty of complaints from the rejected fliers, insisting he was just picking his friends for the team, but quite frankly he had little patience for them. "I'm starting the beater trials, and if you're still in the way, I'm not responsible for how many bludgers hit you," he declared bluntly, which served to clear the pitch fairly well.

To Harry's sheer relief, there were more options to choose from than just Kirke and Sloper. Not near as good as Fred and George, but Jimmy Peakes and Ritchie Coote were certainly better than the two boys who had played in the Ravenclaw match last year, and anyone else on the pitch. A glance to Katie saw her nodding as well, so Harry was confident with his choice.

At last — once all protesting beater rejects had been cleared from the pitch — it was time for keeper trials. Much to Harry's dismay, Ron was giving it another go. Cormac McLaggen was there too, as promised, looking far too confident in himself. Vicky stood further down the line from both boys, jaw clenched in determination, and Harry forced himself not to grin at her. He had to look like he was being fair.

One by one, he sent the applicants up to the goal hoops, while Ginny, Katie and Demelza tossed the quaffle around, Katie getting Demelza used to their flying style. Harry was immeasurably glad he still had her on the team; he wouldn't even know where to begin having to train a whole new team by himself.

The turn-out for keeper was, on the whole, as mildly disappointing as the chaser and beater crop had been. The first five had little success, heading despondently up to the stands where most of the rejected players — and plenty of students just looking for some entertainment — had made themselves comfortable.

Every time Ron looked at the crowd, he went a little greener. Harry remembered Angelina's description of his try-out the year before — as long as no one was watching, he did fine.

Well, plenty of people were watching.

Harry sent Vicky up next, offering a discreet nod of encouragement. The dark-haired girl positioned herself in front of the hoops, and Harry blew his whistle, signalling the chasers to begin.

The three girls didn't hold back. Vicky saved the first three without any effort at all, and even a tricky fourth shot from Katie was firmly blocked. Then, on the fifth, Harry watched wide-eyed as all of a sudden Vicky veered sharply in the opposite direction, letting the quaffle soar through the hoop. Ginny stared in shock at the goal she'd just scored. A low 'oooh' rumbled through the crowd.

When Vicky landed, she stumbled. Harry walked up to her, intending to ask what had happened — and then he noticed how dazed she looked, her eyes unfocused. He narrowed his gaze.

"Hey, Vicky, stand still a second," he requested. She did so, though she swayed slightly on the spot, her head cocked curiously. Harry waved his wand over her, and cursed. "She's been Confunded," he announced, his voice still enhanced from the Sonorus charm. Gasps rippled around the stands.

"There's no need to make excuses, Potter," McLaggen drawled pompously. "Just because your favourite didn't do perfectly."

"It's not an excuse, I'm telling you, she's been Confunded." Harry was familiar with the signs; Snape had made sure of it, after everything he'd been through with Dumbledore.

Rage burning through him, Harry turned up the volume of his voice. "I don't appreciate sabotage of the Gryffindor team, and if I find out who's responsible you can be damned sure I'm going to McGonagall!" He made sure to glare at everyone in the stands who looked like they might have been in a position to cast as far as the goal hoops. His gaze lingered on Hermione, sat behind the hoops by herself, her jaw clenched tightly.

He had no proof, but he certainly had suspicions.

Standing Vicky to one side to shake off the spell, he sent McLaggen up next, and shot off a Patronus up to the castle that had several people in the crowd clapping. The girls were equally ruthless, but the blond boy saved all five shots, and landed with a smug smile on his face.

“Ron, you’re up,” Harry said, gesturing for the redhead to take off. Ron looked like he might be sick, being the last candidate and having all eyes on him.

He did fairly well despite his nerves, but missed the fourth shot — and then, thanks to his embarrassment, missed the fifth as well. He was blushing as red as his hair as he stalked off the pitch.

“So the position is mine, then?” McLaggen drawled. Harry grit his teeth.

“No, because Vicky was Confused. We’re not done yet.” As he spoke, he saw a white-clad figure bustling across the pitch, and smiled. “Thanks for coming, Madam Pomfrey.”

“I have to say, it’s been a while since I’ve been summoned just for team try-outs,” the medi-witch muttered, shaking her head. “Someone’s been Confused, you say?”

“Vicky Frobisher,” he confirmed, an arm around Vicky’s shoulders as he brought her towards Pomfrey. The older woman studied the way the Gryffindor girl walked unsteadily, and waved her wand in the same test Harry had used.

“Yes, definite interference here,” Pomfrey confirmed in disapproval. “Not to worry, I’ll have her back to rights in just a moment.” She reached into her bag, tutting quietly. “Honestly, the lengths some people will go to for quidditch!”

She had Vicky drink a potion, and within moments the girl’s eyes were sharp once more. She was furious as she looked at Harry. “You’ll give me another shot, right?” she begged, and Harry squeezed her shoulder.

“Of, course, yeah. Are you up for it now?” Vicky nodded, and Madam Pomfrey confirmed that she should be in perfect mental faculties, so Harry sent her back up to the hoops.

Madam Pomfrey stayed just in case of any further problems, and Harry was glad — hopefully whoever had Confused Vicky the first time would think twice about trying again with a member of staff present.

Luckily, Vicky was back on fine form; she saved all five shots, and was grinning when she returned to the ground.

Harry eyed Vicky and McLaggen — he would love to just give the position back to Vicky, but he knew he’d never hear the end of it if he did. “Okay, both of you get up there. We’ll keep alternating penalties until someone misses.”

McLaggen gestured for Vicky to take the first attempt with a smarmy grin, and Vicky glared at him, heading to the goal hoops. Harry mounted his own broom, wanting to be sure he could properly see everything that was happening.

Katie took both first penalties, and both keepers saved them. Demelza went next, a little nervous, but still making good shots — still, neither made it through the hoops. Harry watched Ginny fly towards Vicky in goals, wondering how much longer this was going to drag out; they were already late for lunch.

Three penalties each, there was still no winner.

Katie lined up for the fourth round, feinting to the left before throwing at the right hoop — Vicky didn't fall for it, catching the quaffle on her fingertips. McLaggen was looking a little annoyed by the time he got in position for his turn.

Katie flew up, feinted to the right — and stuck with it, throwing at the right hoop while McLaggen lunged to the left. Katie had scored.

Vicky got to remain the Gryffindor keeper.

"I demand a retry!" McLaggen exclaimed as the whole team landed. "You only gave her a second round because she fumbled the first, I should have won from that!"

"She fumbled because she was Confunded, McLaggen," Harry bit out, resisting the urge to hex the idiot seventh year. "Madam Pomfrey confirmed it herself. Unless you think you know better than her?"

Madam Pomfrey put her hands on her hips, eyeing McLaggen expectantly, and suddenly the blond boy was all out of arguments.

"Right, then. That's the results, anyone who doesn't like it can bugger off!" Harry called, making sure he was heard by everyone in the stands. There were a few groans, but everyone began to take their leave. Harry turned to his new team, finally ending his Sonorus charm. His throat was scratchy, and he coughed. "Merlin. I'm glad that's over. Well done today, everyone; I'll let you know when first practice is once I've figured out what your schedules are like."

He shouldered his broom, and blinked in surprise when a small red sweet was held out towards him. "A cough drop, Mr Potter," Pomfrey declared wryly. "You sound like you could use it."

He grinned in thanks, popping the sweet into his mouth. Within moments, he could feel it soothing his sore throat. "Thanks. And I'm sorry for summoning you like it was some kind of massive emergency; I just didn't know what else to do. I'd have had a riot on my hands if I'd rescheduled try-outs after all that."

"No, no, you did the right thing," Pomfrey assured, falling into step beside him on the way back up to the castle. "I'm impressed you could spot the signs, and knew the test for it. That spell isn't on the Hogwarts curriculum."

"Draco wants to be a healer," he told her, the excuse coming easily. "He was practicing some medical spells recently, and thought that one would be useful. I helped him out, so I became pretty familiar with it."

"Indeed — I had heard the rumour that you and Mr Malfoy have buried the hatchet," Pomfrey remarked. "I didn't believe it at first; not after the number of times one of you has ended up under my care due to the other."

Harry laughed, running a hand through his hair. "Yeah, I can see how it would be a surprise."

"I hope this friendship with the Slytherins means I shall see less of you, Mr Potter. Though I will admit you did very well at avoiding the need for medical care last year." She narrowed her gaze at him shrewdly. "Or at least avoiding coming to me for such things."

Harry's stride faltered. "I, uh—"

"That awful Blood Quill should never have entered this school," Pomfrey continued. Relief filled Harry — she wasn't talking about any of the other issues he'd gone to Snape for, just his punishments at Umbridge's hand.

"Oh. Yeah, I— none of us wanted to get you in trouble, if you had to report it or anything," he said, shrugging helplessly. "We handled it ourselves. You were needed for everything else."

Pomfrey's gaze softened, and she patted his arm. "I understand, and I thank you, though I wish you had not been put in that position to begin with." They approached the open front doors of the castle, and Pomfrey paused on the threshold. "Look after yourself, Mr Potter," she said, a hint of fondness to her tone. "And if Mr Malfoy is truly planning a career in the healing arts, tell him I would always welcome an assistant, when he has free time. If he is interested, of course."

Harry grinned at her. "He will be. I'll pass on the message. Thanks, Madam Pomfrey."

She nodded, and the pair parted ways, Harry heading up to Gryffindor to shower and change out of his quidditch training gear.

He had a team. That was one problem solved. Thank Merlin he only had to do that once.

.-.-.-

The gates of the Pottery were wide open, and Sirius paced in front of them, a scrap of parchment in hand. Andromeda had warned him she was bringing a new family in need of sanctuary, and he was worried they'd been waylaid somehow.

At last, there was the crack of apparition. Sirius whirled around, seeing his cousin stood with a pair of women who were clearly related, sharing the same curly auburn hair and round freckled cheeks. The older woman was wide-eyed and slightly green in the face, while the younger looked barely old enough to be out of Hogwarts. "Good, you got my message," Andi said in greeting, her arm around the older of the pair. "This is Helen Ashford, and her daughter Niamh, recently graduated from Ravenclaw. Niamh believed herself to be muggleborn up until last week — an Inheritance test at Gringotts has revealed her to be the Rosier heir."

Sirius nodded in understanding; there was only one way a muggle woman would birth a Rosier heir, and it was not pretty. No wonder Helen Ashford looked so scared.

“I’m Sirius Black, it’s nice to meet you both,” he said, nodding at the pair. “Please, read this for me.” He held out the parchment, on which Harry had written the address. The younger Ashford read it first, and sucked in a sharp breath as the house came into view. Her mother squeaked when she suddenly became able to see the enormous manor house. “This is the Pottery,” Sirius said with a sweeping gesture and a slight smile, doing his best to put the two women at ease.

“I— like Harry Potter?” Niamh asked hesitantly. Sirius nodded.

“It’s his ancestral home, yes. Due to the extensive wards on the place, he’s turned it into a bit of a safe house for the time being.”

Niamh seemed to relax at the knowledge, and squeezed her mother’s hand. “It’s okay, Mum,” she assured quietly. “We’ll be safe here.”

Sirius led them up the drive, already thinking over which of the families there might be willing to help the Ashfords settle in. They had a couple of other muggles in residence; parents of muggleborn Slytherins who would be considered a disgrace to their noble house. And the two women would have to share a room, but that would be fine.

They would make it work. For their safety, they would have to.

. . .

Despite Hagrid’s insistence the year before that he didn’t begrudge Harry dropping his class for NEWTs, Harry still wanted to make sure there was no bad blood between them. So, after he’d changed and eaten lunch following the endless quidditch trials, Harry went back outside, heading for the hut at the edge of the forest.

He knocked on the door, raising his eyebrows when it only opened a crack, one dark eye narrowing at him. Then it opened all the way, revealing Hagrid’s smiling face. “Oh, it’s you! Come in, come in,” he urged, gesturing Harry inside. The half-giant was wearing a flowery apron, and seemed to have something cooking on his grill.

“Who did you think it was?” Harry asked in bemusement, scratching Fang between the ears as the dog lolloped over to him. Hagrid huffed.

“Thought it might be Ron and Hermione. Got a bit of a bone to pick with them. Neither of ‘em are in my class,” he added at Harry’s look.

“I’m not in your class, either.”

“Yeah, but you apologised for it, didn’t yer?” Hagrid retorted. “Those two, not a word! After I asked ‘em to help me with Grawp and all!”

Harry had no idea who or what a ‘Grawp’ was, and by the end of the explanation his jaw was practically on the floor. “You kept a giant in the forest for half of last year?” he said incredulously. “No wonder you were always covered in bruises!”

“‘E’s my little brother, I couldn’t just leave ‘im there!” Hagrid reasoned. “We was doin’ fine, right up until that Umbridge woman interfered. An’ then I asked Ron and Hermione, I told ‘em all they had to do was go and check on ‘im once in a while, see ‘e didn’t get lonely, maybe work on ‘is English if they were up to it. But they didn’t go see ‘im once!”

Harry shook his head in dismay, though in Ron and Hermione’s position he likely would have made the same call. “I’m sorry, Hagrid. But I’m glad you’ve managed to get him set up somewhere better, now.”

Hagrid brightened at that. “Yeah, the cave Dumbledore found is great for ‘im.” He fussed with whatever he was cooking. “I s’pose I’m not really mad at ‘em for dropping my class. It’s always a small one at NEWTs; not many careers involving creatures. I’m more upset they left Grawp on his own for so long.”

“Well I’m still not exactly on speaking terms with either of them, so I’m afraid you’re on your own with that one,” Harry said with a slight grimace. Hagrid looked him over in consideration.

“Aye, I suspected as much. What’s this I hear about you an’ Draco Malfoy bein’ friends?”

Harry fought a smile. “It’s a bit of a long story,” he admitted. “We’ve been friends for a while, just in secret. His dad… well, you can imagine how that would’ve gone if he’d found out.” Hagrid nodded, face darkening. “After Lucius died, and Narcissa made it clear where the family stood, Draco and I decided it was a bit pointless pretending to hate each other when we had no reason to. And Sirius and Narcissa are cousins, so I saw a lot of the Malfoys over the summer.”

“Well, I can’t say I’m too fond of him, but he did apologise for the trouble with Beaky an’ all. And he’s behavin’ himself in my classes, so far. Still can’t believe he’s actually takin’ Care for NEWTs.”

“Just give him a chance, Hagrid,” Harry asked earnestly. “He doesn’t deserve to be judged for the things his father made him do.”

“Aye, that’s fair,” Hagrid agreed, nodding.

A strange sort of squelching noise came from the corner, and Harry looked over at a barrel he hadn’t noticed before. It was full of huge white maggot-looking creatures. Harry’s stomach turned. “Uh— what are those for, Hagrid?” he asked, wondering if he should be warning Draco about the successor to the Blast-Ended Skrewt.

“Oh, I got ‘em to feed to Aragog.”

Harry frowned in confusion — and the next thing he knew, Hagrid was slumped in the chair opposite him, sniffling into a handkerchief. “He’s dying, ‘Arry. He got ill over the summer an’ nothin’ I do seems to help…” He sobbed, huge shoulders shaking, and Harry scooted over to pat him on the arm. “Dunno what I’ll do if he… we’ve been together so long!”

"I'm so sorry, Hagrid," Harry murmured — he couldn't feel any grief himself at the idea of the giant spider who had tried to eat him finally passing on, but he knew Hagrid had had Aragog for most of his life. It was never easy, losing a pet, no matter how bloodthirsty.

Hagrid took a big sniff, wiping at his eyes. "Circle o' life, innit?" he said morosely. "Not much I can do but just... keep him comfortable."

"I'm sure he appreciates it."

The foil-covered tin in Hagrid's grill began to smoke lightly, and Hagrid cursed, getting up to deal with it. Under the foil were a dozen blackened rock cakes. "Oh, bugger it," Hagrid muttered, scowling. "Lost track o' time." He tossed the tin in the sink, cakes and all.

"Is there, ah, anything I can do?" Harry offered a little helplessly. Hagrid sighed, shaking his head.

"Nah, I'll be fine. Is what it is." He tugged at his beard. "You can tell me one thing, though, 'Arry." Hagrid sat back down, watching him with an unusually serious gaze. "What's goin' on with you an' Professor Dumbledore? I been readin' the Prophet all summer, and... sounds like he's more than a bit worried about you, kid."

Harry scowled despite himself. "Dumbledore... he had a plan, for how things were going to go," he said slowly, not sure how much to give away. Hagrid idolised Dumbledore so much, Harry couldn't risk the half-giant taking his words back to the headmaster even if it was out of concern. "He thought he had it all figured out, but his plan involved... well you know how at the end of almost every school year I've had some sort of confrontation with Voldemort in one way or another?" Hagrid flinched, but nodded. "That was him training me up for my final sacrifice. As I've gotten older, I've decided I really don't want to be a pawn in his game, Hagrid. I've got other people who care about me; actually care, are willing to protect me and to teach me how to protect myself, so that when I do have to fight Voldemort — because we all know it's going to be me eventually — I might actually stand a chance at winning. Dumbledore never gave me that. And now he's acting like my refusal to play his games is due to me secretly going Dark. He thinks I've got Voldemort in my head, controlling me, making me into a younger version of him."

"That's bollocks!" Hagrid roared. "I knew You-Know-Who when he was your age, and you're nothin' like him!"

Harry smiled fleetingly. "Thanks, Hagrid. I know I don't have him in my head, but Dumbledore just seems so convinced that me not being friends with Ron and Hermione, and doing well in my classes, are all signs of me going evil. I... I'm worried what he'll do if he thinks I have more Voldemort than me in there. What lengths he'll go to get him out."

He was putting it on, just a little bit, but he couldn't help himself; he wanted to give Hagrid something to think about, without telling him the full truth about the compulsions.

He wanted Hagrid to have the other side of the story if Dumbledore tried to get Hagrid to do something to Harry for him.

"It's gotten worse, over the summer. I don't know if it's to do with whatever happened to his hand, or... he really doesn't like me being friends with Slytherins. Even though none of my Slytherin friends are Death Eaters, or even have family who are Death Eaters." Not now Theo's dad was dead, anyway.

"I dunno what happened to his arm, to be honest with yer," Hagrid said, frowning. "It could be... He's a great man, Dumbledore. Done some great things in his life. But, well — still human, ain't he? Still makes mistakes. Maybe he'll come 'round, once he realises you're still the same old Harry as always."

He sighed again, then forcibly brightened up. "An' on the subject of you doin' well in classes — an O, in Care! Made me so proud, you did!" He reached out with a grin, patting Harry on the shoulder with considerable force. Harry smiled back, ignoring the slight pain.

He didn't have the same faith as Hagrid in Dumbledore's ability to see the light, but that was fine. Harry wasn't about to press the subject any further.

.

Harry hoped he might be able to spend the evening with Draco, but clearly the universe was against him — before he could even reach dinner, he was accosted by Slughorn with an invite to an evening gathering, and Harry had no decent excuse to say no. So after eating dinner at the Hufflepuff table with a completely unsympathetic Susan, Harry headed up to Slughorn's quarters, bracing himself for a long and tedious evening.

It was a much larger group than it had been on the train; obviously Slughorn had had time to get to know the students a little better, and choose his prime candidates.

Harry was surprised to see Ginny in the mix, wearing the dangerous sort of smile that meant she was two steps shy of hexing someone. That could have been because Cormac McLaggen seemed to be trying to chat her up. "Harry!" she exclaimed at the sight of him, relief plain on her face. "Good, I was hoping you'd be here tonight!"

McLaggen was clearly still sore about the quidditch decision, as he glared at Harry and disappeared quickly. "Oh, thank Merlin," Ginny muttered. "He's spent the last ten minutes telling me every quidditch match he's ever played with his posh cousins, and how it's an absolute disgrace that he didn't make the team."

"Wanker," Harry replied, and Ginny snorted. "Why didn't you go chat with Blaise?" The dark-skinned Slytherin was stood by the buffet table, staring coolly at anyone who dared approach.

"I was trying to, but Slughorn was talking to him up until a minute ago." The pair of them sidled over to Blaise, and Harry quirked his lips in a rueful grin, reaching for a plate.

"He got you too, did he?"

"Seems to think I'd be willing to introduce him to my mother," Blaise drawled. "Even if she were looking for husband number nine, I don't think he'd like being chosen."

Harry snorted. “Anyone else worth rescuing in here?” If they all stood together, maybe Slughorn would think they were networking and leave them alone.

Taking a mouthful of some rather excellent chocolate mousse, Harry surveyed the room. Belby had not made the cut, it seemed, nor had Neville — which Harry was surprised by, considering Potions Masters were always looking for good deals with Herbologists. Perhaps Slughorn hadn’t spoken to Sprout about her best student. There was a Hufflepuff girl in the year below Ginny whose name Harry didn’t know, and a pair of Ravenclaw boys Harry thought might be brothers. And over talking to Slughorn was Hermione — not a surprise at all, with how enthusiastic she was in his classes. Hermione seemed to be taking advantage of having a teacher who hadn’t had five years to become weary of her need for academic approval.

Slughorn extricated himself from the conversation with her as soon as he spotted Harry, beaming at the green-eyed boy. “Harry! Wonderful, wonderful, glad you could make it — ah, Mr Zabini, I didn’t know you and Miss Weasley knew each other! How marvellous.”

“He’s dating one of my older brothers,” Ginny volunteered, almost daring Slughorn to react poorly. On the contrary, his bushy eyebrows rose, and he grinned.

“Ah, one of the infamous Weasley Twins, I assume? Yes, I’ve heard all about those boys — visited their shop, too! Some excellent products they’ve got there, very inventive indeed. Why, I’m quite disappointed to have missed teaching them by only a year! I’m sure they were a delight to have in class.”

Harry wasn’t sure Snape would have used such a description, and by Blaise’s smirk, he agreed.

“Have you tried the tiramisu, Harry? It’s simply divine — I had missed the Hogwarts elves’ cooking!” Slughorn grinned, patting his rotund belly. “Though perhaps not as much as I ought to,” he added with a chuckle. “Anyway, Harry, my lad; now you’re here, I have a book I’d quite like to show you — a young Potions prodigy such as yourself will find it very interesting, I’m sure!” With surprising strength for a man his age, he steered Harry away from his friends, chatting away quite happily about some friend of his who was the author of the book he wanted to show Harry. Harry glanced over his shoulder, gaze begging Ginny and Blaise for help. Blaise just smirked, while Ginny waved coyly at him, and turned to select a large portion of tiramisu.

Whatever Slughorn might know about Tom Riddle, Harry desperately hoped he figured it out soon so he could decide how to go about asking. He wasn’t sure how much more brown-nosing he could stand.

Chapter 88

On Sunday evening, Harry put his wand to the silver plate on the bottom of his HA inkwell for the first time that year.

On Monday morning, half his year mates — and plenty in the years above and below — had a certain kind of glint in their eye when they met Harry's gaze at breakfast. They were more than ready for another meeting, at last.

And with Dumbledore out of the castle most days it seemed, Harry couldn't think of a better time to start.

They were back in the Room of Requirement now — no reason to head down to the Chamber, not now they didn't have Umbridge trailing their every steps. Only a few faces looked disappointed; most people seemed relieved not to be in Salazar's enormous underground hideaway.

"It's good to see you all," Harry greeted, once he was fairly sure the whole group had arrived. "I'm glad you're all back. It was... a long summer." Several sympathetic nods and grimaces answered him. "You've probably noticed we've got a few new faces with us. I can promise you, they're all trustworthy — most of them were getting HA training in secret one way or another last year."

He gestured with an arm to the cluster of Slytherins stood behind him. Draco, Theo, and five of the kids from the Pottery. With their allegiances now known, there was no point in keeping things secret. Unfortunately not all of his Slytherin allies could be so open; especially not since he'd burned the HA contract at the end of the previous year.

"Just how long have you been befriending Slytherins in secret, Potter?" Terry Boot asked, looking more amused than anything else. Harry shrugged sheepishly.

"Longer than most of you would expect." He admitted. "And I'm sure none of you will be surprised that these aren't the only Slytherins I'm friends with. There are plenty more who aren't able to be quite so open with their friendships, so don't start assuming that everyone who isn't in this room is a Death Eater."

Several people snorted, Blaise being one of them, his lips quirking.

"So," Harry continued, "I know this group started as a way to make sure we all passed our exams. And I know we kept it secret because we didn't want Umbridge on our backs. But things are bigger than that now. There's a war coming."

Every face looking back at him was dead serious, determined. Harry resisted the urge to smile. "I'm not going to put another contract in place, but I'm going to ask you to continue to pretend this club doesn't exist. If you know someone who genuinely wants to be involved, send them my way. But we aren't just about passing exams anymore." He ran a hand through his hair, thinking over his next words. He didn't want to scare anyone, but...

"I'm not going to force you to fight in this war. No one should be forced into that kind of a fight. But I also can't promise that the war will leave you alone — we all know how ruthless the other side can be. All I can do is give you the tools to defend yourselves, whether or not you choose to seek out the fight when it arrives. The headmaster doesn't want me to do this — he thinks that if everyone sits back and lets the adults handle things, the Death Eaters will be perfectly happy to leave us kids out of it." He rolled his eyes, and was glad to see several expressions of disgust in his audience. "So if Dumbledore asks, we disbanded at the end of last year. If anyone asks, we disbanded."

"What's the deal with you and Dumbledore, anyway?" Cho asked boldly, raising her eyebrows at him. "All that stuff in the paper over the summer..."

Harry grimaced. "Let's just say that Dumbledore has been planning for his own glory far too long to consider I might not want to be used as a weapon." He didn't dare say anything more, not when half this group didn't know the truth, but he hoped that would be enough. It would certainly get them thinking.

Still, he didn't want their first session back to turn into an interrogation. He clapped his hands together, grinning. "Right, then. Let's get started."

They had a lot to get through, after all.

.-.-.-.

It was a rare evening that found Harry alone in the Gryffindor common room. Normally, he tried his best not to be in that space for any decent length of time, but Neville and Ginny had gone for a romantic walk by the lake before curfew, and Harry had been out doing something or another every night that week so far — he didn't want people to start getting suspicious about where he spent his evenings.

Unfortunately, being alone in the common room made him a target for exactly the kind of thing he was hoping to avoid.

"I know what you're doing, you know." Hermione stood over him, arms folded and eyes narrowed. Harry glanced at the parchment in front of him.

"...My Transfiguration essay?" His facetiousness made her scowl, and he fought a smile. There were any number of things she could've figured out that he was up to; which one had a bee in her bonnet now?

"All your new friends. I didn't think anything of it until I came across a book about the Wizengamot this summer. But it all makes sense — Susan Bones, Zabini and Greengrass, even Neville! And now you're all cosy with Malfoy; conveniently right after his mum takes over a whole load of seats!"

As she got more progressively worked up, Harry leaned back in his chair, setting his quill down. He had to admit, he was surprised it had taken Hermione this long to figure things out.

"Draco and I have been friends for far longer than just this summer," he pointed out. "There was just the minor issue of his dad wanting to kill me, so we didn't think to publicise it."

Hermione huffed. "So? He's still exactly what you're becoming; an uppity pureblood who thinks they're better than the rest of us."

"I'm still a half-blood, Hermione," Harry said, but she just rolled her eyes.

"A half-blood who's planning on joining the same government system that's been oppressing muggleborns for decades! We don't even get a say in how this country is run, we're just expected to shut up and let the purebloods walk all over us! How could you possibly support them, Harry — how could you think your mother would be happy about that?" It was clear she had a whole speech prepared, and Harry wished he could send her Justin's way and have her actually listen to his and Susan's plans for the future of the Wizengamot, but he knew she would just take everything straight to Dumbledore — if she even paused in her ranting long enough to actually listen.

"You have to have control of the government before you can change anything about it," he pointed out patiently.

"Like any of them would change a system they benefit from," Hermione dismissed, making Harry scowl.

"What do you propose, then, Hermione?" he retorted. "We should all just give up our seats and let the Death Eaters have full control? Or do you think all of us should give proxies to Dumbledore, so he can go ahead and do whatever the hell he wants with this country? Because he's done so much good with the seats he's had the last few decades." His disdain was blatant, and Hermione glared, hands on her hips.

"Professor Dumbledore knows a lot more about politics than you and your friends," she spat. Harry couldn't help but scoff.

"You're so sure about that, are you?" he shot back reflexively. "Look, Hermione, I don't care what you think of me or my friends, but I'd suggest you do your research before you start accusing people of oppression. My Wizengamot seats are part of my family heritage, and I'm not going to ignore them just because you think anyone who isn't a muggleborn is immediately out to get you. Especially not when you're just jealous I have decent friends that aren't you."

He started packing up his books and parchment; his essay would get done much faster in the privacy of his dorm, even if it would be a bit uncomfortable to have everything balanced on a conjured lap desk. Hermione continued to splutter at him, half-starting a dozen different sentences, her tirade utterly derailed by his complete lack of interest or defensiveness.

"I never thought you'd be such a blood purist, Harry," she declared as he stood — loud enough to draw the attention of the few people in the common room who weren't already watching their interaction. Harry rolled his eyes; wonderful, now he'd have that added to the rumours about him going Dark.

"And yet I'm entirely unsurprised by you shoving your opinions on people before you even know enough about the subject to properly understand it," he replied evenly, turning away and heading for the stairs to the dorms.

Let that start circulating for a while — his reputation couldn't get much worse amongst those who were already thinking poorly of him, after all.

.

It was unsettling to hear so many voices at Seren Du, Severus thought as he let go of Ceri's hand and looked around the entrance hall. For so long it had just been him and Remus and Sirius — Harry during the summer, but otherwise, quiet. Hell, for half of the year before, he and Remus had often been the only ones in the enormous house.

Now, Narcissa lived there full time, and Charlie Weasley, and the Tonks family were over so often it sometimes felt like they lived there. Indeed, they were there now; Andromeda and Narcissa and Sirius having tea in the kitchen like he was sure none of them imagined they ever would when they were teenagers. Out in the garden he could hear Charlie, Tonks and Kingsley — it sounded like they were duelling, the aurors putting the dragon tamer through his paces.

"Severus!" Narcissa greeted brightly when he entered. "We weren't expecting you home."

It still baffled him just a little bit to call this place home, let alone to have people there who might be expecting him in it. People other than Remus.

"For once, I don't have any miscreants in detention today." Something he'd done purposefully — he hadn't spent more than an hour with his partner since school had picked back up.

Sirius barked out a laugh. "Our godsons are otherwise occupied, then?" he joked — another baffling thing, joking around with Sirius Black. "Moony's up in the library, I think."

Severus tried his best not to blush as both women smiled behind their teacups — it had proven fruitless, over the summer, to try and keep his and Remus' relationship secret from those who frequented the manor, though as far as he knew Kingsley hadn't yet figured it out. He would, soon; it hardly made any sense for Severus to be living there just as Draco's godfather. He was still spying for both sides, he had no reason to be hiding, not like Narcissa.

And, as Remus kept reminding him, they were family now.

"Ceri will be sending up tea for Master Snape," the house elf chirped from her stool at the counter where she was rolling dough for what looked like scones.

"Thank you, Ceri." Severus nodded at her, then cast his gaze over the trio of Blacks. "Enjoy your afternoon tea. I'm sure I'll see you all at dinner." None of the Tonks' would pass up a free meal from Ceri, and if Ted Tonks finished work at a decent hour he was more likely to join them than expect his wife and child home.

He left the kitchen, heading for the stairs, unbuttoning the collar of his robe. Was this what his future was to be like? A house full of people, all of whom knew plain as day that he was in love with Remus Lupin — people he could trust not to use that knowledge against him.

After an entire lifetime of sneaking around and covering their tracks and blatantly lying to most of their friends, Severus couldn't fathom it. He wondered if Remus felt the same, sometimes. Then again, the damned wolf was probably counting down the days until the Dark Lord was gone and he could shout his feelings from the rooftops.

Severus would never admit to the warmth that filled his chest at the prospect.

Sure enough, his partner was curled up in his usual spot in the library, a book in his lap and a cup of tea on the side table. He looked up at the sound of footsteps, and the bright smile that took over his face at the sight of Severus was, as always, enough to make his heart stutter. “Severus!” Remus greeted, setting his book down. “I wasn’t sure you’d be able to get away this weekend. You’ve been so busy.”

“Too busy,” Severus groused, sliding into the space at Remus’ side, leaning in for a kiss. “But I told Harry and Draco to work amongst themselves for today. They both deserve a break — it seems the transition to NEWTs is just as jarring as it was when we were their age.”

Remus smirked, happily curling against Severus’ side. “I’m sure the boys are grateful.” His amber eyes danced playfully. “I certainly am, to have you home.”

Severus smirked, kissing his lover once more, relishing in the warm weight of Remus pressed against him. Merlin, a summer of sleeping by his wolf’s side always made the first month of school nigh on unbearable.

“Albus will expect me at breakfast tomorrow,” he relayed. “But I can stay the night as long as I leave early.”

Remus beamed. “Perfect.”

A second cup of tea appeared beside Remus’, along with a small plate of chocolate biscuits. Remus hummed happily, reaching for both and handing Severus his cup. “So how are classes going? Have you grown used to teaching outside your dungeons yet?” he teased, making Severus snort.

“It will take more than a few weeks to break that habit,” he said wryly. It was a good thing his quarters were still in the dungeons — that was no one would ever know how often he had automatically walked towards his old classroom to begin teaching. “Classes are... a mixed bag.” Nibbling on a biscuit, he thought back over the classes he’d taught since taking the DADA position. “The second and third years are exactly as dismal as you’d expect.” A year with Umbridge, and for the older students a year with Crouch posed as Moody — all too young to have been invited to Harry’s secret defence club. “The first years are appropriately terrified.”

Remus smirked. “Your legacy continues even without exploding cauldrons,” he drawled, making Severus match his expression. “And fourth year up?”

Severus' lips pursed. "The older students... it is inordinately clear to me which of them were involved in Potter's little club." He leaned back, arm settling around Remus' shoulders. "It's quite astonishing, to be completely honest. I had no idea how much work he'd managed to do with them. How quickly they all must have progressed to be as proficient as they are now." Most of his sixth years were already capable of non-verbal casting, while a good number of his seventh years seemed more competent than half the aurors he'd seen in recent years. Those in his fifth year classes who had studied under Potter could take their DADA OWL tomorrow and get at least an E, and while there were only a handful of fourth years who had been involved, the difference between them and their contemporaries was entirely too clear.

And if some of the whispers he'd heard were to be believed, the club had resumed once more. At this rate, Potter would be doing half his job for him.

"Didn't you talk to him about it over the summer?" Remus asked, one eyebrow raised. Severus shook his head.

"By the time I knew I would be taking over the class, we had bigger things to worry about," he said. "And truthfully, I did not expect it to matter quite so much." He had not expected those students to be so far ahead of their peers. "Harry told me he'd taught them the basics — shields, disarming, stunning. He never mentioned the rest." Once again, Harry Potter had downplayed his skills.

"I suppose you weren't there to see them fighting at the Ministry," Remus mused. "Then you might have seen what they're capable of, thanks to Harry." He kissed Severus' cheek, and swiped another biscuit. "I suppose you're just being even more of an evil git to the ones who already know the curriculum, to stop them getting too much of an ego about it," he teased. Severus' lips pursed.

"I am pushing them harder than their peers," he agreed slowly. "But..." and here was something he wouldn't admit to anyone other than Remus, "I confess, I'm not quite as stern as one might expect. I am keeping up appearances, of course. I certainly can't praise them for their abilities. But damn it all, I find I'm actually somewhat proud of the little buggers. They saw they needed to take their education into their own hands, and they did so without any of us figuring them out." He glared at his partner. "I blame you for this, you know. I never used to give a damn about most of my students before you shoved your way back into my life." A handful of students who were decent at Potions and didn't shrink under his death-stare, that was all he'd had the capacity to approve of before. Other than his Slytherins, of course. But even so, he'd never felt like this about students before Remus — before Harry, and the boy's earnest desire to better himself, to make Severus proud, to pass on that knowledge to his friends with the hopes it might keep them safe.

Remus did his best to look solemn, but his eyes were laughing. "I'm awfully sorry I've brought so much joy into that shrivelled up heart of yours that you're finding it difficult to be a dick to children."

Severus scowled, and Remus chuckled, cupping his jaw for a kiss. "It's not a bad thing, to care," he murmured fondly. "Especially not in the position you're in now. You may have to hide what you're truly doing, but you've got the chance to help Harry teach these kids to survive."

The Slytherin knew that all too well — a Hogwarts DADA education was patchy at best, had been since his own school days, since the position had originally been cursed by a young Tom Riddle before Severus was even born. It showed in their Ministry, in their culture, in the way they had been so easily decimated by the Dark Lord's forces; death on both sides, because neither truly had the advantage.

Severus might only have a year in the position, but he be damned if he wasn't going to cram as much useful information into their teenage heads as physically possible in that year.

"Classes aside," he drawled, before Remus could tease him further about having positive emotions towards students, "I'm concerned about Albus. He's planning something." The headmaster had been absent more days than not since school had begun, and on the days he was present he spent far too much time watching Harry at mealtimes for Severus to be comfortable.

"Has he mentioned anything to you about it?" Remus asked, and Severus shook his head.

"No, which is all the more worrying." Albus still believed Severus was his man through and through. If there was something the headmaster wasn't telling him, thought that even he might not approve of... it couldn't be good.

Remus' fingers slid into his hair, blunt nails scratching gently at his scalp. "All we can do is wait, love," he pointed out softly. "Whatever he's planning, we'll face it as it comes. But your position is too precarious for you to go snooping."

Remus was right and they both knew it, but that didn't make it any easier for Severus to hear.

It was hell, working for two masters and trusting neither of them. Severus desperately hoped Harry's plans worked out, that they were able to find all the horcruxes and destroy them, destroy the Dark Lord as soon as the boy turned seventeen. He wasn't sure he could bear this burden much longer, not now he had a life worth living outside the shadows.

He was so fucking tired.

.-.-.-.

Harry hadn't been able to take Draco down to the Chamber yet this school year, but the chance finally arose when Snape headed home for the weekend and told them to entertain themselves.

He tugged on his boyfriend's hand as they walked down the narrow stone passageway — Draco didn't know it, but Harry's heart was fluttering anxiously. "So, I know I said we could come down here and train," he started, pausing to hiss the command for the other end of the passage to open, revealing the Chamber itself. "And we can still do that, if you want to."

Draco pulled him closer, his silver eyes knowing, his mouth curled in amusement. "I suppose you've got better ideas, do you?" he drawled, his free hand slipping down to the small of Harry's back.

It took a moment for Harry to fight past the sudden haze of lust and remember his original point. “I mean, we can do that, too,” he assured, fighting a smile, “but also... I’ve finally got permission, to make some introductions. If you’re interested.”

The blond stared at him in confusion for a few seconds, until it all clicked. Then, he gaped. “You mean...?”

Harry nodded. “Salazar is happy to welcome you into his office.” The founder had loosened up a little once he’d seen how much care Severus had taken in his office, and Harry privately thought he was a little sad about the idea that Harry was the last true Slytherin heir left.

Draco’s jaw dropped, eyes going wide. “I— yes, of course! You couldn’t have warned me sooner?” he yelped, looking down at his slightly ruffled school uniform. Harry laughed, kissing him.

“And let you get all worked up about it?” he teased, heading towards the hidden office. Draco seemed to freeze once the door was open, and Harry had to gently nudge him through the doorway. Salazar surveyed them with intrigued dark eyes, a flicker of a smile beneath his short beard.

“Good evening, Harry, my lad. This is your better half, then, is it?” he greeted, thankfully speaking English. Harry grinned at him, while Draco’s cheeks went pink.

“Yup,” he said proudly, arm around Draco’s waist. “This is him. Draco, love, this is Salazar.”

Draco took a hesitant step closer. “I— it is truly an honour, Lord Slytherin,” he said reverently, and Salazar chuckled.

“Welcome to my office, young Heir Malfoy. It’s a pleasure to meet you; Harry speaks very highly of you indeed.”

It was Harry’s turn to blush, as Draco whipped around to narrow his gaze at the Gryffindor. “I’m just gonna...” Harry trailed off, gesturing vaguely towards the bookshelves. “You two can talk.”

Draco floundered slightly at that, but Harry urged him to sit on the sofa, and Salazar — no doubt sensing the teen’s nerves — happily asked him about the state of Slytherin house from a student’s perspective. That was all it took, and before long Draco was chatting away with the founder as if they’d been friends for months, hardly paying any attention to Harry as he browsed the shelves for anything that might be useful.

Like Severus, Harry had no doubt that once the shock of meeting Salazar Slytherin himself wore off, Draco would be voraciously going through the bookshelves himself, but until then Harry was happy to peruse them at his own pace. All the while, a tiny voice laughed in the back of his head, imagining what Voldemort might say if he knew how close he’d come to meeting his beloved ancestor — and how much that ancestor would have absolutely hated him.

.-.-.

Life at Hogwarts began to settle into some sort of a routine, as time went on. Harry got used to his classes, learned which of his free periods needed to be devoted to homework and which could be used to get half an hour with Draco; he worked out a schedule for quidditch practice and HA and training with Snape; and at least twice a week, he chatted to Sirius on the mirror, getting caught up on everything that was going on outside the school. Which, honestly, was very little outside the expected — the Ministry was essentially off-limits and utterly useless, with floo being monitored and the aurors under Voldemort's thumb. The Order were currently trying to get all muggle parents of magical children to somewhere safe, now that the Death Eaters had access to the student registry and the Muggleborn Identification Department. It made Harry's stomach squirm every time he thought about the visions he'd had in the summer of Death Eaters destroying muggle houses — how many of those young children had been future Hogwarts students? How many more were being attacked now they had the Ministry, that Harry was no longer aware of?

The Order could only do so much with the Hogwarts Book of Students, after all.

But Harry tried his best not to let it keep him up at night, even as the ball of guilt in the pit of his stomach grew harder and more painful with each passing day. He certainly had plenty of distractions from it, throwing himself into his classes and extra-curriculars the best he could.

“Mr Potter, a word, if you please.” McGonagall’s voice lifting over the chatter of students leaving the Transfiguration classroom was a surprise. Harry glanced over at her — as he did, his gaze caught on Hermione’s smug expression as the girl gathered her books. Had she reported him to their Housemistress for some perceived slight or another?

Harry stood in front of the desk, waiting patiently until the classroom had otherwise emptied. McGonagall shut the door with a wave of her wand, and Harry tried not to fidget too overtly. “Don’t worry, Potter, you’re not in trouble,” the Scottish woman assured him, lips curling when his shoulders visibly relaxed. “I merely wanted to talk to you. I did a lot of thinking, over the summer, about the things we discussed at the end of last year.”

Harry raised an eyebrow at her, heart leaping to his throat. Did he dare hope? “Can I assume you’ve come to some sort of conclusion, then, Professor?”

She huffed, lips pursing. “Only more questions,” she admitted, frustrated. “I… looking back, the way Albus has treated you throughout your school years. I should have seen earlier that things didn’t add up. The way he spoke about your home life, versus the way you’ve acted. The things I’ve heard from other… acquaintances, these past couple of years.”

Harry winced. That wasn’t the part of Dumbledore’s machinations he’d hoped to discuss.

“I feel I owe you more than a few apologies,” McGonagall continued. Harry tried to wave her off, but she narrowed her gaze. “No, Potter — you have been failed by many members of staff, but I am the one who is supposed to be responsible for you, and I have not lived up to that responsibility.”

“Professor, you did what you could,” Harry insisted. “You didn’t have all the information.” His smile tightened. “Dumbledore made sure of that.”

The stern woman frowned. "Indeed — I am beginning to realise that." She sighed quietly. "I will admit, I don't know how I can help. If I were to go against Albus' wishes—“

"You'd lose your job," Harry finished grimly. "No, it's not worth it. Just— honestly, I have most of it under control. It's just good to know you're on my side, even if you have to pretend you're on his." She wouldn't be the only person limited by their closeness to Albus Dumbledore. "We'll need someone trustworthy to take charge of the school once we get Dumbledore out."

McGonagall blinked, then slowly raised an eyebrow. "I'm sure I don't want to know who is involved in this 'we' you refer to, do I?" she asked, dryly, making Harry grin. "Well... I did think the headship may be coming for me in the next few years, though admittedly I assumed it would be due to Albus' age. How..." She paused, the topic clearly a difficult one for her. "How long do you expect to take?"

"He'll be gone by the end of this school year," Harry promised her. Whether that was due to his work discrediting the man, or the curse on his arm taking its toll, that remained to be seen — but that wasn't information McGonagall needed.

She gave a tight nod, shoulders tensing slightly. "Right, then." McGonagall straightened some papers on her desk, and when she looked at Harry her eyes were full of pure Gryffindor ferocity. "Whatever I can do to help, Potter, I shall. You only have to ask."

There was a small pain in Harry's chest, a knife worming between his ribs — how different would his life had been if he'd heard those words from her three years ago, or even earlier?

But it was too late to think like that. At least he had her on his side now, when it was truly important. "Thank you, Professor," he said sincerely.

If there were a way to achieve his goals without hurting the people he cared about with the realisation that their idol was a manipulative, selfish man bent on the destruction of magical Britain for the sake of his own glory, Harry would have jumped at it. But there wasn't.

The truth was hard, but it was necessary. He only hoped the rest of the wizarding world took it so gracefully.

.-. .

As term rolled on, the students of Hogwarts learned to dread the morning post.

The flurry of owls arriving in the Great Hall wasn't as big as it had been in previous years; fewer students, for one, but also many people not finding it safe to write. And plenty of students ending their subscription to the Prophet now that it was essentially Dark propaganda and misinformation.

But in amongst the usual cluster of post delivery, there were black envelopes.

These were a brand new development since the regime change at the Ministry. A way of informing Hogwarts students of a death in the family. Either a thinly-veiled taunt at the death of a muggleborn or blood-traitor parent at the hands of the Death Eaters — always described as an unfortunate accident — or a genuine letter of condolence for a child whose Death Eater parent lost their life.

No one was safe from the prospect of a black envelope. Except, of course, those like Harry — those who had no blood family to be notified about.

This morning, Harry spotted four in the delivery; two headed to the Ravenclaw table, one to Slytherin, and the last to a Gryffindor second year who went the colour of sour milk when the envelope landed on the table in front of him.

One of the Ravenclaws fled sobbing from the hall. Harry's stomach turned. He wasn't hungry anymore.

Ignoring the concerned look in Neville's hazel eyes, Harry shoved his plate aside and stood abruptly, trying not to shudder under the heavy gazes of those who watched him leave.

Were they thinking the same thing he was? Probably. They certainly hadn't been quiet about it in the past.

He was Harry Potter — the Chosen One. He was supposed to be stopping Voldemort, stopping the Dark before anyone else's parents or cousins or siblings could die. Before any more of those black envelopes could be sent.

Every single one was another nail right in his heart, another reminder that he was safe in school while the rest of the world was not. More than once, a recipient of a black envelope had screamed at him over breakfast, blaming him for the death of their loved one. Harry was never sure what to say to that — they were right, of course; he wasn't moving fast enough, was wasting time going to classes and snogging his boyfriend and just waiting to turn seventeen while outside the castle, the fight continued.

A hand suddenly gripped his shoulder, and Harry whirled around with a glare — a glare that faltered at the sight of knowing silver-grey eyes.

Draco tugged him into an empty classroom, warding the door and turning to face Harry, arms crossed over his chest. "Whatever self-flagellating bullshit you've got in your head right now, drop it," the Slytherin ordered. Harry grit his teeth.

"It's not self-flagellating bullshit," he sneered in response. "I could have stopped these, Draco — or at least helped! If I hadn't got rid of that bloody horcrux in my mind, I could've seen his plans. Some of those people might still be alive." It was a thought he had every single time black envelopes arrived. He had led the Order to help so many over the summer, by getting early insight into Voldemort's plans. How was that fair to all the attacks that came after?

Draco scoffed. "He was blocking you long before you got rid of it," he pointed out. "You wouldn't have seen shit." He reached out, and Harry only fought him for a moment, reluctantly letting the taller boy pull him close. "You aren't responsible for every person he kills, Harry,” Draco murmured, hand running soothingly through Harry’s hair. “Thinking like that won’t get you anywhere.”

“I’m the only one who can kill him,” Harry retorted, and Draco glared.

“But his followers are doing most of the work, and you’re not bound to them at all,” he argued. “You may be a key player, but this war is bigger than you. Hell, if you want someone to blame, blame bloody Dumbledore.”

Harry snorted, guilt faltering ever so slightly. It was true; Dumbledore’s insistence on making the wizarding world worship him as everything light and good was what had caused the shadows to grow so dangerous. He had upset the balance long before Harry had been born.

But Harry was the one who would right the balance, and he wasn’t moving fast enough. How many more people would die before he could fulfil his destiny?

Seemingly able to sense the turn of his thoughts, Draco held Harry tighter, kissing his forehead. “The Order are doing what they can. Kingsley and Tonks, your godfathers, my mother — all of them are doing their best to help people survive. Nothing can be done until you turn seventeen and have your full magic; no amount of hating yourself is going to change that, you ridiculous lion.” He smiled against Harry’s scar, and Harry leaned into him, a lump rising in his throat.

“I should be doing more,” he rasped. Draco shook his head.

“You’re doing so much already. You don’t even realise it,” he insisted. “Let the rest of us share your burden, alright?” He pulled back, meeting Harry’s eyes, a faint smile at his lips. “Honestly, Potter — I’m supposed to be the selfish one in this relationship. Stop thinking everything is about you.”

His tone was teasing, and a startled laugh slipped from Harry’s lips. Reluctantly, he relaxed into the embrace, trying to shed the guilt that was weighing down his shoulders and filling his chest. He took a deep breath — his boyfriend was right, of course, as always. Harry couldn’t make time go any faster. Couldn’t summon the remaining horcruxes with a click of his fingers.

It was war, and people died. He couldn’t take that personally.

That wouldn’t stop him having nightmares about it, though. Wouldn’t stop him wondering when the day would come that a black envelope arrived for someone he knew, someone he loved.

It was only a matter of time.

Chapter 89

The first week of October was a fairly ordinary one, as far as Hogwarts went.

At least, it started out that way.

Harry went to bed fairly late on the Friday night, after a HA meeting that culminated in him and Draco staying back in the Room for some alone time. He was exhausted when he finally collapsed on his mattress, looking forward to a nice long rest before he had to spend his weekend writing essays.

He was not expecting to be woken up at four in the morning by a strange, persistent sort of magic.

His hand went reflexively to his scar, alarmed, before he remembered it was entirely inert these days. And this magic felt... different. It didn't set him on edge — if anything, it was welcoming. But it was impatient. It needed him for something.

Trepidation brewing in his stomach, Harry pulled back his curtains, swinging his legs over the edge of his bed — and froze. Neville stood in the middle of the darkened room, pulling a dressing gown over his pyjamas.

Both boys stared at each other, wide eyed.

"I... do you feel it, too?" Harry asked tentatively. Neville blinked, then nodded.

"What is it?" he asked. Harry shook his head, shoving his feet into slippers.

"No idea." The rest of their dorm mates seemed utterly oblivious, Ron's snores drifting through his poor attempt at a Silencing charm.

Utterly bewildered, wands in hand, Harry and Neville crept down the stairs. The common room was empty — the boys' frowns deepened. The magic continued to push, like a guiding hand on Harry's shoulder, urging him to leave Gryffindor Tower. He followed, though his gaze was wary.

Once out in the corridor, the magic directed him to turn right. The feeling of intent grew — it was almost... excited. Eager.

Absently, a memory flashed through his mind. Speaking to Salazar at the beginning of the year — the castle is keen.

Was that what was happening? But what was the castle keen for? And what did he and Neville have to do with it?

His shoulders relaxed a little at the realisation that the magic was Hogwarts itself; it wouldn't hurt him. But where was it taking them?

They both halted immediately at the sound of footsteps, whirling around to see Hannah Abbott creeping towards them. She was in pyjamas, too, and an oversized black jumper with the sleeves rolled to her elbows, wand held aloft. She tensed as she spotted them, then relaxed, eyeing them suspiciously. “What’s happening?”

“No idea. Did the magic bring you up here?” Neville asked. Hannah nodded, cheeks flushing slightly.

“It sounds weird, doesn’t it? But I just felt like — like something needed me to be up here.”

“Not weird at all,” Harry assured. The two boys flanked her, and the trio continued.

Harry realised they were headed to the Room of Requirement only a turn before they got there. His exhausted brain whirred frantically to try and figure out what was happening — then he saw Luna, waiting outside the door to the Room, and a suspicion began to grow.

“Luna?” Neville greeted, perplexed. “Are you the one who summoned us here?”

The blonde girl smiled, shaking her head. Her eyes seemed to almost glow in the dim moonlight. “No, it wasn’t me.”

“But you know why we’re here,” Harry presumed. He could feel it, now, with the four of them stood together. That pressure in his chest, the flood of magic in his veins. Family magic.

Slytherin magic.

Luna’s smile turned knowing. “So do you.”

“Well, I don’t,” Hannah cut in impatiently. “So if you’d care to share...”

Harry turned to her and Neville, quietly surprised. Luna, he half-expected; she was appropriately mysterious and ethereal to be hiding a secret Ravenclaw bloodline connection. Neville too, to an extent; the Longbottoms had been rumoured to be connected to Gryffindor’s line for centuries now. But Hannah was unexpected.

“It’s your birthday today, isn’t it, Hannah?” he asked, making her blink.

“I— yes? I got my magic surge about an hour ago.”

Harry smiled slightly. “Looks like the castle is eager for a shake-up,” he mused. It was growing impatient, too; practically screaming in his head for him to open the door to the Room. He reached for the handle, pushing it open, then stepped back. “After you, Lady Hufflepuff,” he said softly, gaze fixed on Hannah. She gasped, and so did Neville.

“How did you...?” She trailed off, stepping through the door. As Harry walked in behind her, making sure Neville and Luna were following, his breath caught in his throat.

The castle had led them to the Wardstone.

It was nothing like any Wardstone he'd seen before. Not that he'd seen many — just the Pottery, and Grimmauld. But the Hogwarts wardstone was easily twice the size of either of those, a perfect crystal sphere sat on a stone pedestal, shining with internal lights; blue and red and green and yellow, all dancing around each other, pulsing with the faint rhythm of the castle's magic. The heartbeat of Hogwarts.

"This shouldn't be possible," Neville murmured, astonished. "Hannah's the only one of us who's of age!"

"When things become necessary, the castle has ways of speeding up the inheritance process," Luna declared, that strange Other tone to her voice. Harry looked up, hopeful, and she shook her head at him. "Not for the rest of your family magics. Only Slytherin." She was apologetic — she knew how important it was for Harry to reach his full potential quickly.

"Slytherin?" Hannah repeated, staring at Harry incredulously. Harry nodded.

"Conquering heir," he confirmed. He turned to the Wardstone, the magic washing over him like a tidal wave. "Looks like it's time for us to take up our duties." The first time in centuries the Hogwarts heirs had been needed.

Of course it was him. Of course it was now.

As if he needed anything else to make him special.

"What... what do we do?" Neville took a half-step closer. Harry wondered if he was feeling the call, too — the urge to press his hands to the Wardstone and just sink into it.

"We answer the call," Luna replied, as if it were obvious. "But we must do it all together."

No one argued, and within moments the four of them were stood around the Wardstone — stood at the four cardinal points, the points that felt right, had the castle humming with satisfaction. Harry had a strong feeling of deja-vu — only it wasn't him he was remembering, but Salazar himself, and all the Hogwarts heirs that had come since. All the Slytherin-blooded wixen who had once stood in this exact spot, who had lent their magic to the castle, drawn magic in return.

Each of them raised their dominant hand, and in unison, pressed it to the surprisingly warm surface of the Wardstone.

Immediately, Harry's spine stiffened with the force of the power that rushed through him. It was jumbled at first, a discordant clash of magics and wards and sensation that made him dizzy — then, as it began to twine with his own, the sensation calmed down.

It was at that point that he realised just how desperate the wards were.

It made his heart hurt, to feel such incredible wards so clearly languishing. Huge holes ripped in the tight weave, patched clumsily by a somewhat recent-feeling magic, certain aspects flooded with power while others were utterly ignored.

Dumbledore had been manipulating the school wards for his own gains for decades.

The castle knew what it wanted — Harry was just a vessel, his magic reaching for the threads of emerald green magic within the stone, the colour pooling under his fingertips inside the crystal. In his mind's eye, he could see the wards start to rebuild themselves; the wards keeping dangerous creatures out of the school reforming; the wards to alert the staff of students in danger filling with magic once more. So many aspects of the school that had been ignored for so long, to the point where most people alive had likely forgotten they even existed to begin with.

None of the trials Dumbledore had put him through in his years at Hogwarts would have been possible under the wards at full strength.

Now he was much deeper within them, he realised they had not begun to fade just when Dumbledore had become headmaster — some time before that, likely during Grindelwald's rise to power. When Dumbledore was just a Transfiguration teacher.

Had he done something then, to disrupt the wards' connection with the actual headmaster? Started seeking his power even at such an early point?

Started supplementing his own power with that of the Hogwarts wards?

For it was inordinately clear that was what Dumbledore had been doing, at least for the last few decades — with the amount of ambient magic around the students, not to mention the magic naturally within the land Hogwarts was built on, it shouldn't have been possible for the wards to get so weak without the magic being directed elsewhere. That was why the founders had built Hogwarts on this spot — that was why their family magics were so strange, so deeply intertwined with the castle. After everything the founders put of themselves into it, and all those decades of them living within the castle while the magic was so new and volatile, it had changed the family magics so they were unlike anything seen elsewhere; so they were all interlocked, and far more sentient than any other magics had been discovered to be.

The magic tangled through the four of them, pulling the wards away from Dumbledore and linking them to those of founders' blood. Harry wondered with a panic if Dumbledore might notice, but the castle soothed him in his mind, a flicker of mischief dancing across his skin. Things would be fine.

With their power imbued in the castle, with the wards finally allowed to flourish once more, Hogwarts would handle everything. The heirs just had to protect themselves, and protect the school from Dumbledore and others like him.

They could have been in there for hours. Days, even. Time lost all meaning as Harry descended into the castle's magic, his brain filling with an awareness unlike anything he'd ever felt before. The kind of awareness the head of school was supposed to have — awareness of the students and their safety, of the ghosts and the elves and the lake and the forest.

The kind of awareness that kept students safe. The awareness that had been lacking for the entirety of Dumbledore's Hogwarts career.

At last, the magic melted back into the Wardstone, and Harry was able to remove his hand. But the awareness was still there, in the back of his mind, waiting for him to need it. Hogwarts was there, waiting.

It didn't feel like the oily, suffocating press of foreign magic, not like he'd experienced before. It wasn't his own, that much was clear, but it nestled in beside his without issue. It felt like an extension of his Slytherin family magics, almost — magics that were now fully functional and coursing through him, as if he were of-age, though his other family magics remained dormant.

"Wow," Hannah breathed, reminding him of his company. Harry surveyed his three friends, noting the way they stood that little bit straighter, their eyes bright and their faces flushed. They felt more powerful, too. They felt like family.

"The wards were so broken," Neville breathed, horrified. "He let them get that way. He made them that way."

Harry understood his disgust — now, aware of all the things the Hogwarts wards were supposed to do, he couldn't believe Dumbledore had taken all that away. Not just sneaking dangerous artefacts and creatures into the school — the wards were old enough not to have the same ideals of Light and Dark as modern day — but even as far as making sure students couldn't seriously harm one another, or themselves.

How many student injuries could have been prevented with the wards at full capacity? How many sexual assaults? He wasn't so naive to think it didn't happen.

How many suicides had there been in the last seventy-odd years, that could have been avoided?

Harry felt sick at the thought of it.

"His reign is over," Luna declared quietly. "The school is ours, now."

Harry reached out, placing one hand on Luna's shoulder and the other on Hannah's. Opposite him, Neville did the same, and the girls reached out too until all four of them were huddled together around the glowing Wardstone.

"This is going to turn the whole world upside-down, once word gets out," Hannah mused. Then she smirked, laughing quietly. "Susan is going to flip."

Harry snorted; yes, the future Chief Warlock was certainly going to have plenty to say about the Founders' seats being active for the first time since the eighteenth century. Once it was safe to go to the Ministry and claim them, after all.

"We should keep it secret, for now," he suggested. "No one will know what's happened. Even Dumbledore won't know the truth." He would feel his connection to the wards had changed, but he wouldn't understand why. The castle would protect them. "It's an advantage we can't afford to give away."

“You’re right,” Neville agreed. “But… blimey. I never expected this.”

Harry hadn’t, either — he should have, though, with his track record.

When they reluctantly pulled themselves away from the Wardstone, they headed to the door — and all four of them stopped as they were hit with such a strong surge of gratitude it left them breathless. Hogwarts was so very glad to have heirs again.

The school was ready to fight. And now, with them at the wards, they might actually win.

.-. .

Breakfast should have been unbearable, on so little sleep — when Harry and Neville had returned to their dorms after bidding goodbye to the girls, they were so wired from the influx of magic the sun had been creeping over the horizon by the time they’d finally nodded off.

But nonetheless, Harry had woken at the usual time feeling refreshed and invigorated; more so than he had in weeks, quite honestly. Neville, too, seemed bright-eyed and bushy-tailed, greeting Ginny with a hug so tight it lifted her off her feet for a moment. She squealed and laughed, eyeing her boyfriend in confusion.

“Someone’s in a good mood,” she commented, looking at Harry for an explanation, but he just grinned at her.

Down in the Great Hall, Harry laughed at seeing Hannah sat at the Hufflepuff table wearing a ridiculous hat shaped like a birthday cake, complete with charmed candles flickering on top. She glanced up when they entered, and beamed widely, her brown eyes knowing.

Over at the Ravenclaw table, chatting happily to Sully, Luna was practically glowing with energy — but that wasn’t unusual for the odd girl, so no one seemed to take note of it.

Feeling a little smug, Harry looked up at the head table; Dumbledore was present for once, and he looked a little grey in the face, nursing a cup of tea with a half-eaten slice of toast going neglected on his plate.

It had to hurt, being cut off from a source of magic you’d been shamelessly abusing for decades.

As Harry sat down, he caught the headmaster’s gaze, and automatically raised his Occlumency shields against intrusion, shifting his eyes away. Dumbledore scowled slightly behind his beard. Harry ignored him, reaching for a plate of sausages — the headmaster could glare suspiciously as much as he wanted, he wouldn’t discover the truth of the night before. It wasn’t surprising that he was just assuming Harry had something to do with it.

Harry smiled to himself, wondering what the old man might do if he discovered who else had been involved in cutting him out of the Hogwarts wards. Wondering how long it might take him to figure out that was what happened — with the castle itself shrouding the truth, Dumbledore likely thought it was just more side effects from the curse slowly ravaging his body. He may never know; not until he tried to draw even more magic, or manipulate the wards further, only to find them out of his reach.

In the back of his mind, Hogwarts was laughing.

.-.-.-.

Naturally, the first person Harry went to after breakfast — for a generous stretch of the definition of person — was Salazar, who took one look at him and smiled wider than Harry had ever seen from him before.

“You knew this was going to happen,” Harry accused, and Salazar laughed.

“I did not know when,” he confessed, “but I could feel the change coming. Even as a portrait, my magic is connected to the castle.” His dark eyes fixed knowingly on Harry. “It feels good, doesn’t it?”

Harry flopped down on the sofa, letting out a long breath. “It feels amazing,” he said honestly, running a hand through his hair. “I— is this what my full adult power will feel like?” He couldn’t imagine it, having that much magic running through his veins. Killing Voldemort would feel as easy as swatting a fly.

“Not quite. Your Slytherin magic is strengthened by the connection to the castle; your other family magics won’t have that. But the boost is quite similar — always elevated for the first forty-eight hours. It’s a good thing it’s a weekend, or you’d have a lot of explaining to do when you cast spells in class.”

Harry grimaced slightly; yes, he’d have to make sure he had his power properly contained before Monday’s classes began.

“Can I pour that extra magic back into the wards?” he asked. “I don’t need it, not now — and the wards have been lacking for so long.” His despair was audible; the whole concept of Dumbledore binding and warping the castle’s magic like that hit a little too close to home for Harry’s comfort.

Salazar’s eyes were sympathetic, and he stroked his pet snake’s head, leaning back in his chair. “Of all the heirs I have met in recent centuries, I am most glad this power has found you, Harry,” he said solemnly. “Often the ambition of a Slytherin can become warped, surpassing their own good sense — it gladdens me to see you care more for this school’s wellbeing than your own magical ability.” He smiled; a sad, wistful thing. “Dear Hogwarts does so much for the magical youth of this country, it deserves to have such a steadfast champion.”

Harry blushed, even as something warm and happy swelled in his chest. “Hogwarts was the first place I ever truly called home,” he replied softly. “It deserves better than what it has become under Dumbledore’s thumb.” He would see it become better, if it killed him.

“It certainly does,” Salazar agreed, smile turning into one of pride as he looked down at his heir. “Come; tell me about the other heirs — I can only assume they share your same devotion to this school, if Hogwarts has decided to awaken you all. And I am curious which families have ended up carrying my friends' lines with them." Then he smirked, that Slytherin deviousness returning. "Then, if you have no pressing engagements, I shall teach you how to properly utilise your new connection to the wards — for the castle's benefit, and your own."

Harry grinned, making himself more comfortable. His homework could wait.

.-. .

Carrying even a fraction of the wards of Hogwarts took a little time to get used to, for all four of the heirs. Even with the tips from Salazar, Harry had to work hard not to accidentally pull from the wards, or focus too hard on trying to feel them. It was exhausting, having a low-level awareness of the entire school in the back of his mind.

But already, the castle felt better — stronger, happier. The students seemed to feel it, too, even if they didn't know why. And Dumbledore certainly felt it, if the thinly veiled confusion on his face was anything to go by.

The Hogwarts heirs were getting used to it. It would be easier, Salazar assured, when all of them were seventeen and fully developed; right now it was a bit of a strain on their adolescent magical cores, but the castle would do its best to ease that strain. Either way, it was just another oddity on the list for Harry to get used to.

By the first Hogsmeade weekend near the end of October, Harry was both desperate to leave the castle and terrified of doing so. He wasn't sure how the connection would stretch, even though Salazar assured him it would be fine. The wards hadn't been designed to keep them trapped within the castle, after all.

"It'll be fine," Neville assured optimistically as the pair of them headed down to breakfast, dressed for a day in the village. "Come on, Harry; you've been looking forward to this for ages. Hannah and I are both staying here, it'll be fine."

He was right, and Harry knew it. Forcing his anxiety away, he managed a smile, nodding tightly. Neville grinned, gently bumping his shoulder. "Stop being such a control freak," he teased, making Harry stick his tongue out. He wasn't a control freak! He was just... usually the epicentre of trouble, and liked to be on top of things when it occurred.

Still, he kept silent, not sure Neville would see it his way.

Reaching the Entrance Hall, Harry had more of a spring in his step, remembering the reason he'd been looking forward to the Hogsmeade weekend for so long. Draco stood near the doors, two wrapped sandwiches in his hands, his Slytherin scarf wrapped around his neck to ward off the late October chill. His grey eyes looked even more vivid against the dark green wool, and Harry felt a tingle travel down his spine.

"I'll see you later, then," Neville drawled, amused. Harry snapped back to attention, feeling heat rise on his cheeks. Neville just laughed. "Be careful out there. Remember, you're just friends, yeah?"

Harry scowled lightly at him. “We’ll be fine,” he insisted. “See you at dinner.”

They parted ways, and Harry strode over to Draco’s side, offering the blond a grin. “Morning,” he greeted, taking one of the sandwiches from his boyfriend. It was still warm, carefully wrapped so the bacon and eggs wouldn’t fall out. “Thanks. Didn’t feel like eating breakfast in the hall this morning?”

Draco shrugged, falling into step beside Harry as they headed out onto the grounds, huddled close against the freezing wind sweeping across the landscape. “I’ll take any excuse to skip sitting in that damned hall these days,” he replied, eyes darkening. Harry hummed in sympathy; he understood the feeling. Between everyone staring at him like he was about to crack, Dumbledore’s suspicious gaze, and the potential delivery of black envelopes, Harry was getting sick of mealtimes at Hogwarts too.

The boys ate as they walked, falling into the steady stream of students heading down to the village. Even now, nearly two months into term, they got strange looks just for being together, being friendly. Harry tried his best to ignore the eyes on him, focusing on enjoying his time with Draco.

Hogsmeade, when they reached it, was quieter than usual — not only because many students had seen the temperature outside and decided to give the weekend a miss. Zonko’s Joke Shop was boarded up, and they weren’t the only ones; it seemed even the village’s proximity to the school wasn’t enough to leave people feeling safe.

“Or Zonko’s has gone under because the twins are putting them out of business,” Draco remarked when Harry said as much, making him blink.

“That quickly? You think so?”

“From what Blaise has told me about how business was going over the summer, it wouldn’t surprise me,” Draco mused, shrugging. “Of course, Zonko’s has — or had, rather — the upper hand with a physical presence so close to the school, but the twins got so good at sneaking owl-orders under Umbridge’s nose last year, their customers don’t have to worry about deliveries getting caught.”

Harry knew the twins were still paying Dobby a small fee to deliver within the castle, and he smirked to himself. “Maybe they can buy out Zonko’s, have a second shop here.”

“Blaise would certainly like that,” Draco agreed, matching his expression. Harry laughed.

“As if George living in Diagon is stopping those two from meeting up,” he said, shaking his head. He knew the redhead was somewhere around the village — or perhaps had already snuck into the school to visit his beau, given the terrible weather.

A particularly strong gust of icy wind made him shiver, leaning in a little closer to Draco. He had to stop himself from sliding an arm around the blond’s waist to properly cuddle up for warmth — he couldn’t do that in public. They were just friends, as far as the rest of the school was concerned. Though, truthfully, Harry was caring less and less about keeping that secret with every day that passed. People gossiped enough about him as it was; why not add one more thing to the list?

Luckily, while Zonko's was closed, Honeyduke's was open; the pair hurried over to take refuge from the cold, as even Warming charms couldn't do much about the wind. Harry let out a quiet sigh as they squeezed into the already crowded shop, getting hit with an immediate blast of warmth. Beside him, he felt Draco relax ever so slightly.

"Maybe we should've stayed in the castle," Harry joked under his breath — it seemed that half the students who were visiting the village had sequestered away inside the warm, delicious-smelling shop. There was hardly room to move, let alone browse the shelves for treats.

"Harry, my boy!" The jovial call made his heart sink; it was Slughorn, wrapped up tight in a furry hat and coat, clutching a box of crystallised pineapple. "Good to see you out and about! I was starting to think you spent all your time on the quidditch pitch, these days. Or in detention!" Slughorn chuckled at his own joke. "You keep missing my little suppers; I'll have to have a word with Severus if he keeps it up. I'm sure you don't deserve half the detentions he gives you. Or do you only behave in my classes?" he chuckled again, and Harry echoed the sound, forcing a smile.

"Some classes are easier to behave in than others," he joked, and Slughorn winked at him.

"Quite right, quite right. Not to worry, I'll get you eventually — how about Monday night? You can't possibly be out playing quidditch in this weather!"

Harry, who had mostly been scheduling quidditch practices specifically to clash with Slughorn's little parties, knew he wouldn't be able to get out of this one. He couldn't even use the HA as an excuse, as Slughorn didn't know it existed and he'd rather like to keep it that way. "Monday night it is, sir," he confirmed, trying to sound more enthusiastic than he felt.

"Excellent!" Slughorn beamed, clapping him on the shoulder. "Good to hear it, lad. Now, I suppose I'd best let you get on with your day, I'm sure you'd rather chat to your friends than your old Potions Professor!" He peered around, as if expecting Harry to be hiding a gaggle of adoring fans behind a shelf somewhere, and blinked at Draco as if he'd only just noticed him. "Mr Malfoy! My, I had no idea the two of you were, ah, friends outside the classroom!"

Harry stifled a snicker; if only he knew. "Draco and I have been friends for ages, sir," he replied, smiling. "Slytherins and Gryffindors do get along on occasion. I'm sure you'll agree that their reputation isn't always deserved — you were a Slytherin, weren't you, sir?" He remembered Snape mentioning Slughorn had been his head of house, back in the day. "Indeed I was," Slughorn confirmed with a slightly awkward chuckle. "Many years ago, mind. The inter-house rivalry wasn't quite what it is now, back in my day. Still, a little friendly competition never hurt anyone, eh?"

Harry would argue that the current view of Slytherin house was more than 'friendly competition', but he was still trying to get on Slughorn's good side, so he just laughed. "As long as we don't start talking about quidditch, we'll be fine," he remarked, slinging a companionable arm around Draco's shoulders. Slughorn's gaze followed the movement, and Harry wondered what he was thinking. Did he see this as a sign of Harry sinking further into the Dark, or of him playing the saviour and redeeming the previously irredeemable?

Slughorn stuttered out a few more platitudes, then squeezed past them and left the shop. Once he was gone, Draco let out a quiet noise of disgust. "I'm so glad I don't have to deal with those suppers of his," he muttered derisively.

"You should be," Harry agreed, reluctantly dropping his arm from the blond's shoulders when a pair of Hufflepuff girls eyed them strangely. He was still probably being too obvious, practically pressed against Draco's back as the pair of them surveyed a display of fudge, but he didn't care. He was hanging out with his boyfriend in public, even if they were pretending to be just friends. It was more than he could have hoped for last year, for sure!

"Has he told you anything useful, yet?" Draco reached for some dark chocolate and cherry fudge, then grabbed a packet of the chocolate-orange flavour with a quick grin to Harry, tucking it in with his own purchases even though they both knew it was for the Gryffindor. Harry smiled back, forgetting the question for a moment.

"What? Oh. Uh, not really?" Snape was so sure that Slughorn had to know something important, that there was a reason Dumbledore had brought him back to the castle, but if there was he was keeping it close to his chest.

Then again, Harry was struggling to find a non-suspicious way of asking for information about Tom Riddle, so perhaps he just hadn't found the right questions yet. It was hard, when he was fully aware of what lies Dumbledore may have filled the man's head with.

"Maybe if I stop skiving off his suppers he'll warm up to me a bit," he admitted, making Draco snort.

"Yes, that would help."

With all their layers of clothing, it was starting to get a little too warm in the shop, and with the crowd pushing them so close together Harry was finding it increasingly difficult not to settle a hand on Draco's hip or brush a kiss across his temple. So they wrestled their way to the till, had a brief but silent argument about Draco paying for all of Harry's sweets — which, naturally, Draco won — and braced themselves with more Warming charms before heading back out into the street.

It was jarringly quiet, compared to what both of them were used to in Hogsmeade. The street was practically empty — no one lingered, keeping their heads down and heading straight for their next shop. Harry doubted the weather was entirely to blame.

The only people who weren't hurrying to get out of the open were the guards patrolling the village. Harry grinned to himself at the sight of Kingsley leaning up against a lamp-post, wrapped up tight in heavy robes and a wool hat covering his bald head. "Hey, Kings," he greeted cheerfully, heading towards the man. Kingsley straightened up, nodding towards him.

"Harry. Mr Malfoy." He had to pretend he hadn't seen Draco dozens of times over the summer; people weren't to know just how involved he was with Harry's true family. "Enjoying the weather?" he asked wryly. Harry snorted.

"Hardly. How long have you been out here?" The man had to be absolutely freezing.

"Since eight," the auror — or was it ex-auror, technically, since he couldn't go to the Ministry without being killed? — replied, shrugging. "I'll switch with Vance in an hour or so. Can't see the students staying long today."

"You're only here for the Hogsmeade weekend, then?" Draco asked, but Kingsley shook his head.

"Oh, no; Albus has a constant guard in the village, just to keep an eye on things. But we've doubled up protection while the students are about. Tonks is around here somewhere. Fletcher's supposed to be on guard, too, but I'm pretty sure he buggered off a while ago. He was bitching about frostbite." Kingsley rolled his eyes, and Harry scowled. He still had not met Mundungus Fletcher in person, and hoped it stayed that way.

"Typical," he muttered derisively.

"What are you boys up to, then?" Kingsley's dark eyes travelled pointedly between them, and both boys flushed beneath their scarves.

"Just out and about. Getting a break from the castle. Not that this is much better," Harry added, turning to glare at a pair of fourth years whispering a bit too loudly about him on their way past. Kingsley frowned.

"Yes, Sirius mentioned you'd been having some trouble," he murmured.

"It's nothing I can't handle," Harry assured. "Just gossip. The usual."

"But the headmaster isn't helping," Draco cut in with a dark look. "Watching you like you're about to start throwing Unforgivables around the Great Hall."

"I can handle it," Harry insisted stubbornly.

"Wish you didn't have to, kid," Kingsley sighed, shaking his head slightly. "But you're doing alright, otherwise? All things considered?" His gaze was pointed — there were so many things Harry didn't dare write in letters, and he wasn't sure how much Sirius shared.

But those same things were far too sensitive to be talked about in the middle of Hogsmeade, and they both knew it.

"Doing fine," he assured. "Keeping my head down, my grades up, all that jazz." He flashed a cheeky grin, and Kingsley chuckled.

"Glad to hear it. Look after yourselves, both of you. Now get out of this bloody cold — just because I have to stand here freezing to death doesn't mean you need to join me." His voice was jovial, but he was looking around at the street — at the students who were staring curiously at Harry Potter and Draco Malfoy stood talking to this strange adult.

He was right; they should get inside, try and pretend to be normal students for a while longer.

“Give the rest our love,” Harry said quietly, and Kingsley nodded, bidding them goodbye. The two boys turned away, wincing at the bitter sting of wind on their cheeks.

“Three Broomsticks?” Draco suggested, already headed for the pub. Harry smirked.

“Not Puddifoot’s?” he teased, earning a scowl.

“You couldn’t pay me enough to go in there.”

Harry laughed, the sound ringing through the quiet street, earning them even more strange looks. People seemed surprised that Draco could draw such a bright sound from him.

They didn’t know Draco like Harry did.

The Three Broomsticks was just as busy as they expected it to be, but there was enough space for them to squeeze in at the bar and order a couple of butterbeers. Harry ended up pressed to Draco from hip to ankle, trying not to get jostled by the crowd, stopping himself a dozen times over from putting his hands somewhere inappropriate for mere friendship.

Merlin, pretending to be friends was even more exhausting than pretending to hate each other, sometimes.

.-.-.

Honestly, Remus was quite surprised he and Sirius were still invited to Order meetings.

The atmosphere in the Burrow was tense — Albus had moved meeting to the Weasley house when it became clear Sirius was not going to rescind his ban against Molly in the Grimmauld wards. Molly seemed equally displeased about having to let Sirius into her house; especially since he and Charlie made no moves to hide their relationship in front of her.

He wondered how Albus couldn’t see the divide within his own people; was he truly that blind, or had he stopped caring? Decided he was so close to defeating Voldemort by himself that the rest of them no longer mattered? The old man seemed more evasive than ever, these days. Severus was right to worry about what he was planning — whatever it was, he wasn’t sharing with the Order, and that was not a good sign.

“Now, I trust everything in Hogsmeade went as planned?” the headmaster asked, once Joseph Hawthorne had finished giving his report on the Ministry. That was another thing; over the last few months Albus had inducted more people into the Order, people the rest of them hardly knew. He claimed it was because all his previous Ministry informants were now out of the job, which was true, but Remus wasn’t sure he trusted these new ones entirely.

“Quiet as a mouse,” Kingsley confirmed. “Clearly the Death Eaters didn’t want to be out in that cold any more than we did.”

There were a few chuckles around the table, but Albus' lips only twitched briefly. "Glad to hear it. Although — I heard several of the students mention that Harry had been talking to strangers in the village."

"He stopped to chat a moment," Kingsley assented, face as impassive as always. "Him and the Malfoy lad."

"What did he ask about?" Albus pressed.

"Nothing in particular. Just wanted to say hello, ask how everyone was doing outside the castle. Like I said, he only stopped for a moment."

"He said hi to me in the Three Broomsticks," Tonks volunteered. "But there weren't any free seats, so they left after one drink."

"Just him and the Malfoy boy?" Moody asked suspiciously, bright blue eye fixed on Tonks. "Didn't meet any of his other friends there?"

"Not that I saw."

Moody's lips thinned. "Boy's headed down a dangerous path."

"The Malfoys are on our side," Sirius cut in, irritation clear in his voice. "Narcissa has more than made amends for what she was forced to do while her husband was alive. There's no reason Harry and Draco shouldn't be friends."

Moody scowled, but before he could say anything Albus cleared his throat. "Harry's friendships aside," he cut in, "you must not draw such attention to yourselves. And you must be careful what you say to him. All of you," he added, surveying the group with that condescending, disappointed-grandfather face that made Remus' hackles rise. "I understand that Harry is used to seeking out information for himself — and indeed, seems to have decided he no longer wants the information I am willing to give him — but you must be careful what you say in front of him. We cannot be certain he can be trusted."

"Oh, not this again," Sirius groaned loudly. "Give it a rest, Albus. He doesn't have Voldemort in his head!"

"The nature of Harry's connection with Voldemort is strange and mysterious magic, Sirius," Albus insisted. "With the recent changes in his behaviours, it is not something we can rule out entirely. Even if Harry himself is not aware of the influence, it could be affecting him."

"That poor boy," Molly fretted. "Ron and Hermione are so worried about him — he won't even talk to them anymore!"

Remus stifled a snort; worried, sure. So worried they were calling him a blood supremacist to anyone who might listen. But they wouldn't have told Molly about that.

It wasn't the first time the argument had come up in an Order meeting — indeed, as the same old points were hashed over for the dozenth time, Sirius getting increasingly furious in defence of his godson. Remus wondered how much longer the Order could last. He could see it in peoples' eyes — those who knew the truth about Dumbledore, those who were on Harry's side, all of them sat with varying degrees of veiled rage as Albus and Moody and Molly insisted that Harry was under Dark influences and needed to be managed carefully.

It would be so easy to just get up and leave. All of them, make their stand, make Albus realise how many of them were no longer working for him. Leave the man and his sycophants to their slow-brewing disaster, turn away and get some real work done. Already they were having meetings of their own, gathering at Seren Du or Grimmauld whenever they could manage, discussing their continued efforts to get at-risk people to safety. The Order knew nothing about those in hiding at the Pottery, or Malfoy Manor, or the handful of other properties they had begun using all over the country. They certainly didn't know about their contact with Mrs Zabini, with Mr and Mrs Delacour, with some of Charlie's friends in Romania and some of Viktor Krum's teammates in Bulgaria — all working to help smuggle people out of the country, if there was truly too much danger for them to stay.

They would get so much more work done if they could leave the Order to crumble, and it was tempting. But Remus knew they couldn't. They all knew they couldn't.

As long as Harry was outwardly taking a stand against Dumbledore, even if he had not yet started to dismantle the man's reputation, he would need as many of them as possible on the headmaster's good side to stay in the loop, in case Albus' plans took a drastic turn. Right now, he just wanted to keep Harry out of the way, oblivious — hardly much different than previous years, in all honesty, except for his insistence that Harry was dangerous.

But the moment that changed, the moment he decided Harry was too dangerous, they needed to know. They needed to be ready.

Harry's life could depend on it.

.-.-.

Slughorn's Monday night supper was just as dreadfully boring as Harry anticipated it would be. This one was a more formal sit-down affair, and much to his dismay Harry had been seated between Hermione Granger and Cormac McLaggen. Cormac had no desire to talk to Harry after being denied a place on the quidditch team, so Harry was stuck trying to ignore Hermione's attempts at befriending him — clearly someone had told her she needed to be nice to him again, because it was a drastic turn from her previous behaviour.

How stupid did Dumbledore think Harry was?

Annoyingly, with Hermione nattering away at him, Harry didn't even get much of a chance to talk to Slughorn. Not that he knew what he might say. He had no idea how he was supposed to get information from the man, especially when he barely knew what information he was looking for to begin with.

If he outright asked Slughorn about horcruxes, he'd go straight to Dumbledore, and Harry would be screwed.

He hurried from the man's office as soon as Slughorn started making noises about dismissing them all for the night. Hermione tried to follow him, but Harry ducked into a side passage that conveniently made itself available for him — an unexpected perk of holding the Hogwarts wards was the castle's willingness to accommodate him, however it could. Harry had been sneaking around using Salazar's passages since he'd discovered them, but it was nice to have the other secret hide-aways available too. The other heirs certainly enjoyed it. The other day Hannah had delightedly told them she could get an extra twenty minutes of studying done after lunch most days thanks to passages to take her quickly from the Hufflepuff dorms to the upper levels of the school.

Speaking of the wards, as he walked through the passage, Harry began to feel an insistent sort of tugging in the corner of his mind the castle now occupied. It didn't feel urgent — it wasn't a student in trouble. More... the castle had something to show him.

Well, Hogwarts hadn't led him wrong yet. He followed the tug obediently, eyebrows rising when, once again, he was being led to the Room of Requirement. He was alone — the other heirs hadn't been called along too. It wasn't a problem with the Wardstone, then.

When Harry opened the door, his jaw dropped. He was staring at a seemingly endless room, full of piles of assorted stuff. Books and clothes and furniture and Merlin only knew what else; prank items and strange potions and sinister-looking weapons. Most of it was junk, and a lot of it looked older than even Dumbledore.

The room of Hidden Things, a voice supplied in his head. Harry looked around, and snorted.

"Hogwarts Lost and Found, more like," he muttered — everything the castle occupants had ever forgotten about, or tried to hide from teachers. Everything abandoned and unused and probably some stolen things in there, too; it seemed to have all wormed its way into this room. He peered closer at a stack of books, letting out an impressed whistle. He recognised many of the titles from the Seren Du library — they were rare books, old books.

"When was the last time someone sorted this place out?" he asked, feeling a vague negative sensation from the castle. A long time, then.

Another thing on the list of things to do once the war was over.

But there had to be a reason he'd been brought here, past just being shown to this treasure trove of odds and ends. He opened his magic up to the castle, waiting for more guidance. Slowly, Hogwarts began to nudge him down the aisles of junk, a clear destination in mind.

When Harry turned a corner, he knew immediately what the problem was. Thick, oily magic sidled up against his own. Familiar darkness — even without the matching darkness residing in his scar, Harry could tell immediately what it was.

"Another one? Here?" He stepped up to the bust of an ugly old man, beside which lay a tarnished silver tiara.

A tiara that was leaking with dark magic. Horcrux magic. Harry stared at it, wide-eyed. How long had this been within the school? Room of Hidden Things indeed — clearly Tom Ridde had thought he was the only person to find such a place, despite clear evidence of how many students over the years had done the same thing.

He wondered how long the castle had been aware of this foul magic within its walls, crying out for someone to do something about it, but too weak to be heard.

Looking around, Harry saw a slightly moth-eaten silk scarf, and quickly wrapped the tiara up in it. Sending a mental thanks to Hogwarts for the tip-off, he hurried out of the room, only one destination in mind. He only paused once — to check the person he was after was actually present. Then he made a slight detour; not to Snape's quarters, but to his personal lab a few doors down. He knocked, stepping back to wait, not caring that he didn't have his invisibility cloak with him. He hardly needed it these days; the castle would warn him if he needed to hide.

Snape answered the door with a scowl, which deepened at the sight of Harry. "Potter," he spat, then narrowed his gaze, no doubt catching the feel of the dark magic Harry carried with him. "Get in here."

He ushered Harry inside, warded the door, and turned to him. "What's the matter?"

Harry set his wrapped bundle on the nearest workbench, carefully dislodging the scarf until the tiara was visible. "Found it just now. Or rather, the castle showed it to me." He hadn't kept his new status as true Lord Slytherin secret from his family, or Draco. Snape knew about Harry's new connection with Hogwarts' magic. "How many more of these damned things can there be?"

"This may well be the last," Snape murmured, scanning it with his wand. "Other than the snake, of course. But you remember what Bill said — any more than eight or nine splittings and the soul becomes too unstable to exist."

Harry did a mental count — his scar, the locket, the diary, the cup, the ring, the snake, and now this. Seven horcruxes. Only six made intentionally. The number clicked in his brain, a trickle of cold running down his spine. "I think there's one more."

Snape raised one dark eyebrow at him. "What makes you say that?"

"Voldemort knows Arithmancy, right? Think about the numbers of magical power; three, seven, nine. He's definitely made more than three, we know that. And nine would be too many — also if he was going for three threes, the objects would probably come in threes, but they don't. But seven... it's more powerful than the other two, and it makes sense. Seven horcruxes — seven anchors to the mortal world. And if mine was an accident, that makes it an extra — so that gives him eight."

The Potions Master's lips thinned in thought, his brow furrowed. "You're forgetting, of course, that there is another anchor. The original soul piece, within him. Seven horcruxes would make eight soul pieces in total. And eight is a terrible number for such things. It is far more likely that he intended for six horcruxes — totalling seven pieces of soul — and, as you say, the fragment within you was an unintended extra, shaken loose from his already fractured soul when the Killing curse rebounded on him."

He was right, of course. Voldemort might have lost his sanity in the process of splitting his soul, but if the numbers were important to him, he wouldn't have upset that balance. And the numbers likely were important to him — someone as obsessed with magical strength would not ignore such a basic tenet of magical power, a fundamental law of their existence.

"So... you think this is the last one, then? Truly? Other than the snake." Harry bit his lip.
"That's a big assumption to make about something so important."

"Indeed," Snape assented. "But it is not unreasonable. And we have precious few other ways of determining the number otherwise."

Harry snorted to himself. "Yeah, can't exactly just stroll up and ask him." He glanced back at the tiara, shuddering at the magic bleeding from it. "What's so special about this thing, anyway? Everything else has had meaning." Slytherin's locket, Hufflepuff's cup. A family ring, and his childhood diary.

"If I am not mistaken, this is the lost diadem of Rowena Ravenclaw." Snape's lips twisted in a sneer. "Another priceless artefact we will have to destroy to end the Dark Lord's reign."

Harry frowned — he'd heard of Ravenclaw's diadem. Read about it, somewhere, perhaps. Or maybe heard his Ravenclaw friends talk about it. "That's the one that's supposed to give you infinite knowledge if you wear it, right?" Snape nodded. "Blimey. You'd think he might have bothered to put it on before he cursed it, maybe realised this whole thing was a bad idea."

A reluctant twitch of amusement flickered across Snape's face. "Quite. Nevertheless, we must deal with the matter quickly." The tall man straightened up, striding across his lab past the gently simmering potion, waving his wand to reveal a hidden niche in one of his shelves. From that niche he pulled a wooden box, and from that box came a crystal vial filled with vivid yellow liquid.

Basilisk venom.

Snape's hands were perfectly steady as he brought the vial over. "Harry, get the crystal slab out, would you? It's beside the gold cauldron."

Harry turned, peering at the rack of cauldrons until he saw the shimmering piece of crystal tucked away between them. The size of a regular chopping board, Harry knew the slab was the strongest, most magically resistant material available, used for working with volatile ingredients.

He set the slab up on the worktop, then carefully shifted the diadem atop it, making sure not to touch it with his bare skin.

"Stand back," Snape warned. Harry didn't need telling twice. Wand raised in case the horcrux tried to put up a fight, Harry took a large step backwards, watching as Snape uncorked the vial and poured its contents over the diadem.

Immediately, it began to hiss and bubble — and then scream, a black cloud of smoke seeping from the twisted metal, the same scream the diary had given, and his scar, and all the other horcruxes as they died. Harry tried not to flinch, didn't dare look away until the smoke had dissipated, even as the wards went haywire in his mind at such a strong concentration of danger. He hoped the other heirs didn't get alerted, hoped the castle knew he had this handled.

Then there was silence, but for the slow hiss and sputter of the silver and jewels melting to nothing under the power of the basilisk venom, creating a disgusting puddle on the crystal slab. After a few moments, Snape flicked his wand, vanishing the mess. Both of them stared at each other grimly.

"Well, then," Harry murmured eventually. "Just the snake left, you think?" He wanted to believe Snape's logic, wanted so much to know that they were almost done.

"We shall do what research we can to confirm," Snape replied. "But I truly do think so."

It would be a disaster, if they were wrong.

But if they were right.

If they were right, it changed everything.

Chapter 90

Chapter Notes

Warning for non-graphic discussion of sexual assault (RE Amortentia use)

All through Tuesday, Harry wished he could find a chance to tell Draco about the previous evening's events. He trusted Snape would get word back to the crowd at Seren Du, to Bill and his team investigating the matter. Draco was the only other person in the school who knew about horcruxes — except Salazar, of course. But the founder's portrait had already admitted he didn't know of a way to track existing horcruxes, and he would probably agree with Snape's sensible logic about seven soul pieces.

It just seemed too easy. Too neat, the way Harry had found all the horcruxes — and Dumbledore had found the one he would have struggled to hunt down. Perhaps it was a sign of Voldemort's arrogance, to have such obvious hiding places for his precious treasures. He certainly hadn't shown good sense in giving one to Lucius Malfoy to keep safe.

Could he really be so close to ending it all for good?

He tried to force the subject from his mind, especially when Dumbledore was around. He couldn't risk the headmaster catching even the tiniest fragment of a stray thought from him, not about that. And Dumbledore was getting less and less discreet about his dislike of Harry.

It wasn't just Harry he had problems with, either. Whether he believed Hermione's idea that Harry and the other Wizengamot heirs were planning the next stages of pureblood supremacy within the Ministry, or he just didn't like the idea that soon this group of teenagers would have more political power than he could even dream of, he was starting to get terse with the rest of the heirs to the point where even the other students had begun to notice.

Of course, it was nothing drastic — nothing that could lead to people thinking the esteemed Albus Dumbledore was bullying a bunch of schoolchildren. But he would stare at them through mealtimes, frowning; he would take points from them for ridiculous reasons, and scold them for no real reason at all.

The rumour mill was working furiously with each new incident, and Harry was happy to add fuel to that particular fire.

"You should start spreading it around that he tried to give me a detention just to force me to spend time with him," Harry suggested to Parvati in their heir's meeting that afternoon. The Gryffindor girl raised an eyebrow.

"When did he do that?"

“Oh, he didn’t,” Harry replied, shrugging. “But it sounds like something he would do, doesn’t it?”

Parvati giggled. Beside Harry, Draco rolled his eyes. “Add in too many false rumours and it’ll backfire on you,” he warned, but Harry wasn’t bothered.

“The rest are all real.” The current topic of gossip in the school was Dumbledore trying to corner Sully to ask about their parents — and constantly misgendering them in the process. It was a foolish move on Dumbledore’s part — those who knew the truth of the Fawleys’ allegiances would know Dumbledore was sticking his nose in and clam up, while those who thought the Fawleys were still light would think Dumbledore was getting too paranoid in his old age.

Along with the number of rumours revolving around Dumbledore’s withered hand, there was a growing consensus that the headmaster was finally losing it.

Harry couldn’t be happier.

“Have you thought up an excuse to get out of Slughorn’s Christmas party, yet?” Blaise asked, directing an amused look at Harry, who blinked.

In the drama of the horcrux, he’d entirely forgotten Slughorn announcing his plans for a Christmas party at the supper the night before. “Oh, fuck. I’m gonna have to go, aren’t I?”

Daphne cackled. “Don’t look so smug, darling,” Blaise warned. “I’m dragging you in with me. We’re allowed to bring a guest to this one.”

“I hate you,” the blonde Slytherin announced, but Blaise just winked.

“Slughorn’s letting us have a plus one?” Harry asked, surprised. He must have zoned out through that part of the announcement. “Well, that might make it a little more bearable.” He turned to Draco, grinning teasingly. “You want to finally see what all the fuss is about?” he joked.

Draco gave a thoughtful frown, then nodded. Harry choked. “Alright, then,” Draco agreed, eyes sparkling. “It can’t be any worse than some of the parties my father used to throw.”

Blaise, Theo and Daphne all nodded in vehement agreement, but Harry was too busy staring incredulously at his boyfriend. “You— really? You’d go with me?” He suddenly looked doubtful. “Like, as a friend, or...?”

Grey eyes softened. “I think we’ve both had enough of that ruse, don’t you?” he mused wryly. “I’m ready if you are.”

Harry swallowed thickly. This felt like part of a much bigger conversation — a conversation they really shouldn’t be having in front of their entire friend group. But at the same time, it seemed so simple; Draco was right, they were both tired of pretending.

Was Slughorn’s Christmas party really the best place to go public, though?

After a beat, Harry snorted. “I suppose people can’t hate me much more than they already do.” Those who thought he was going Dark wouldn’t care if Draco was his friend or his boyfriend, they’d see it as validation all the same. And it would probably piss Dumbledore off, which was a good enough reason to do anything as far as Harry was concerned. “You’re really sure you’re ready for that?” he checked anxiously. Being Harry’s boyfriend — his first ever confirmed romantic partner — would be a huge deal in the eyes of the public. Even though the Prophet was a bunch of Death Eater propaganda these days, there would still probably be gossip in Witch Weekly once the news got out.

“I’ll have to face it sooner or later, won’t I?” came Draco’s easy response. He was much calmer about all this than Harry had expected — how long had he been thinking about this, without Harry even knowing?

The Slytherin’s hand covered his on the tabletop, their fingers tangling together. “Think of it this way; we can go to the party, scandalise all of Slughorn’s little worshippers, then bugger off home for Yule and let the gossip hounds wear themselves out before we come back in January.” He smirked. “And then we can scandalise them all over again by snogging in the library where anyone can see us.”

Harry laughed. “You’re sure, then,” he said again, making Draco huff.

“If you ask me one more time, I’ll hex you,” he declared in annoyance. “I’ve always known this day was coming. Allow me the opportunity to gloat about snagging the hottest guy in school, alright?”

Harry’s cheeks burned, but he couldn’t hold back his smile, leaning in for a chaste kiss. “You’re on, then,” he agreed happily. Maybe having Draco at the party might make it halfway bearable.

A throat cleared pointedly, and Harry snapped his gaze away from Draco, belatedly realising that the entire group was still there — and had been for the duration of that whole conversation.

“Are you quite finished?” Susan asked, eyebrows raised. “Because if you’re going to start feeling each other up under the table again, you can leave.”

“We never— that wasn’t—” Harry spluttered helplessly, and several of his friends laughed, the traitors. They hadn’t been feeling each other up, they had just been sitting together, and it wasn’t his fault Draco had decided to put a hand on Harry’s thigh while he studied. “All of you are the worst friends,” he declared, glaring at them. Neville snickered.

“Too bad we’re the only ones you’ve got,” he replied, entirely unsympathetic.

Harry scowled, but it didn’t last long — not when he looked back at Draco and thought about going to the party with him, properly with him, being able to hold his hand and kiss him in public and finally stop holding himself back.

For once, he was actually looking forward to one of Slughorn’s get-togethers.

.--.

It was like the run-up to the Yule Ball, but worse.

As soon as word got out that Slughorn was having a party and that the invitees were allowed a plus one, suddenly Harry was fending people off all over the damned castle. The only bright spot was that this time it was mostly guys asking him — though a fair few bold girls gave it a shot, too. Some were guys he knew through the HA, or other Gryffindors, but some were total strangers. Every time, Harry apologetically told them he already had a date.

Unfortunately, because he and Draco wanted to keep things secret until the party just to have some modicum of peace, the entire school was eager to know who his mystery date was, and until someone could produce a name Harry was considered fair game. His friends were no help — they all knew the truth, but were far too amused by the whole situation, and had a habit of throwing random names into consideration just for fun.

Harry wished he could just ignore it all, but with Draco plotting the murder of every boy who even thought about asking Harry to the party, it was hard to avoid the subject even when they were alone. Not that they got many chances to be alone, lately; between classes and quidditch and HA and Harry's detentions with Snape, he and Draco hadn't had time for more than a quick hand-job in an empty classroom in weeks.

Harry was very much looking forward to the holidays.

Still, there was almost two months before that glorious freedom arrived. Almost two months of having to deal with people asking him out, or trying to wheedle the name of his mystery date out of him. Why had Slughorn announced the party so early? Perhaps to guarantee Harry couldn't find an excuse to get out of it — he had seemed awfully delighted when Harry had confirmed his attendance.

It did start to die down after the first couple of weeks, at least. People seemed to realise Harry wasn't just saying he already had a date just to let them down gently; only the truly persistent were still trying. And the rumours about Dumbledore soon became even more interesting than Harry, especially after Dumbledore lost his temper quite spectacularly at some seventh year Slytherins and forcibly checked them for Dark Marks.

So classes continued, and Harry did his best to keep on top of everything he had going on. It was a relief to know that the horcrux hunt was being put on the back-burner — Bill and his Gringotts team had agreed with Snape's theory, after they had apparently spent some time studying the results of the ritual Harry had undergone to estimate the power of the soul fragment in his scar, to give them an idea of just how shattered Voldemort's soul was. Six intentional horcruxes and one accidental one seemed to be the sensible answer for everyone involved. Harry just hoped they weren't being optimistic.

With the first quidditch match of the season drawing ever closer — naturally, against Slytherin, because Merlin forbid they have an easy start — Harry spent more and more time with his team out on the pitch, wanting to make sure they were as ready as he could get them. With so many new members this year, he knew he wasn't going to get the same level of beautiful cohesion he was used to out of the Gryffindor team, but he was damned well going to try. He'd missed quidditch so much, when Umbridge had banned him last year. He was determined to make up for everything he'd missed.

And equally determined to win against his boyfriend, both of them eager for another locker room tryst regardless of which team's showers they ended up in.

"Did you hear the latest?" Ginny asked by way of greeting when she arrived for practice that evening, broom slung over her shoulder. Harry raised a curious eyebrow. "Apparently Hermione asked Ron to Slughorn's party. Or, well — whether she asked is unclear, they might have just bickered their way into it, but I think they're going together."

"Really?" Harry asked, mildly impressed. "Blimey. Didn't think they'd ever get their heads out of their arses."

"Right?" Ginny agreed, snorting. "It's weird — they've been mad about each other for ages, anyone can see that, but I can't actually imagine them dating. They just fight so constantly now they don't have you as a buffer."

Harry knew what she meant; every third conversation between the pair seemed to end in some kind of argument. He wasn't one to judge bickering as foreplay — not when he was dating Draco — but even so... "I guess we'll have to see how it goes."

If it crashed and burned, well, at least it was something else for people to talk about that had nothing to do with Harry. There was such scarce relationship drama these days, with half their year either happily paired off or having no intention of sticking with one person any time soon.

The rest of the team began to arrive, and Harry turned his focus to more important things. He could get the Gryffindor gossip from Parvati and Lavender later.

.-.-.-.

At last, the time had come — the Gryffindor/Slytherin quidditch match was upon them.

For once, the Gryffindor table was a solid block of red and gold when Harry arrived at breakfast, Ginny and Neville at his sides. They cheered at the sight of him, Katie shuffling up so they could sit with the rest of the team.

"How you feeling, Harry?" she asked, bright-eyed, and Harry grinned.

"Brilliant. The weather's looking perfect, too." Not too bright, not too windy, nice and crisp; excellent quidditch conditions.

"That's not the only thing. One of the Slytherin chasers — Vaisey, the fourth year kid — he's got a concussion from a bludger to the head in yesterday's practice, so Pomfrey's said he can't play. And Malfoy's called off sick, too, so they've got Harper as seeker." Katie paused, wide-eyed, suddenly realising that Harry might not see that as good news. "Malfoy's fine," she hastened to add, "as far as I know. Just got a sudden flu or something."

Harry bit his lip — Draco had been fine when they'd met up last night. He glanced over at the Slytherin table, where the team sat in their green and silver uniform jumpers; sure enough, Draco wasn't there, but fifth year Harper was suited up and ready to play, looking a bit queasy himself.

"I'm sure he's okay, Harry," Ginny said, bumping his shoulder with hers. "You can check on him after the match."

Harry hummed, still worried. "He must be feeling really shitty to miss the game, though. Playing Gryffindor is the highlight of his year." The opportunities to fly seeker against Harry in a proper game were few and far between, these days.

"There's always next year," Katie said, shrugging. "I wouldn't have thought it would be that big a deal, now you two are friends and all."

Heat rose in Harry's cheeks, and he tried to will it away. "I'd still rather fly against him than Harper," he retorted evasively. "Some kind of challenge would be nice."

"Oh, just shut up and let us take this easy win, Captain," Ginny teased. "Draco will get over it. You never know, he might appreciate the save to his pride — at least this way when they lose to us no one can say it's his fault."

Despite his worry, Harry laughed. Then he noticed a familiar green and silver clad figure heading in his direction — some of the other Gryffindors booed and hissed, but it was light-hearted; Blaise was dating a Weasley, that made him practically a Gryffindor, even on quidditch days.

"He's doing fine, just in the dorms feeling sorry for himself," the Italian boy declared, leaning down to talk to Harry quietly. "But he says if you want to throw the match because of his illness, you're more than welcome to do so." He sounded amused, and Harry's shoulders relaxed — if Draco was up for making jokes, he clearly wasn't too ill.

"He wishes," he retorted, smiling. "What's wrong with him?"

Blaise frowned slightly, shaking his head just a fraction. "Nothing Pomfrey could pinpoint. But nothing she could declare foul play, either. He just woke up with a fever and a headache, potions didn't shift it so Pomfrey wouldn't clear him for the match."

Heart aching in sympathy, Harry ran a hand through his hair. "That sucks."

"Even magic can't cure everything," Neville remarked. "Some colds are just extra potion resistant."

Harry hoped it was just that, and not anything more sinister.

Either way, he didn't have any time to worry about it further — he and the rest of the team had to get down to the changing rooms and get ready for the match. The Gryffindor table cheered again when they left, several people wolf-whistling at the kiss Neville and Ginny shared before they parted ways.

It was a different atmosphere than Harry was used to, before a match against Slytherin. There was hardly a fraction of the animosity against the snake house that there had been when he'd first started at Hogwarts — though there were still enough genuine Death Eater supporters on the team to make the match dangerous.

Harry gave his best attempt at an Oliver-Wood-worthy Captain's speech, Katie giving him a discreet thumbs up at the end of it, and then they were headed out for their first game of the season. It was weird, stepping up to shake hands with Urquhart, not seeing Draco's grey eyes narrowed in challenge amongst the opposing team. Harper was taller and broader than Harry, and Harry quietly thought he would have no trouble at all catching the snitch before the fifth year boy.

The match began, Harry's Firebolt responding quickly under his grasp as he soared into the air, circling the pitch and watching his team spring into action. Despite his worry about Draco, he was feeling confident. They had a great team — certainly better than Slytherin, down two of their main players.

He could have done without Zacharias Smith on commentary, but it was easy enough to tune the Hufflepuff boy out. His chest swelled with pride as his team were on fine form, the chasers easily scoring three early goals, the new beaters wrangling the bludgers competently, and Vicky with honestly very little to do because of it.

Harper's strategy seemed to be an attempt to follow Harry around and harass him as much as possible; but he wasn't nearly as annoying as Draco had been in their youth, and with his superior broom Harry was able to shake him easily.

Slytherin tried their best, but it wasn't good enough — when Gryffindor were already up 80-20, Harry caught a flash of gold out of the corner of his eye, and immediately spun to chase after it. Harper tried to follow, but it was no use; by the time he was on Harry's tail, Harry was halfway to the snitch. His hand closed around the fluttering gold ball and the stadium exploded into cheers.

As Harry steadied his broom and raised the snitch in triumph, Harper scowled at him, glaring hard. Harry just grinned all the wider — and then he lost sight of the Slytherin player as he was bundled in a hug from half a dozen red-and-gold clad players.

"You all did brilliantly!" Harry enthused, clapping the shoulder of anyone he could reach.

"You too, Captain!" Vicky returned, beaming at him. They all lowered themselves to the ground, and Harry ruffled Ginny's hair on the way to the changing rooms.

"Your brothers will be so proud of you," he told her, and she beamed at him. It was a shame, really — due to the political climate outside the castle, Dumbledore wasn't letting any spectators come to the student quidditch matches this year. Harry was sure all the Weasley boys would have come, if they could.

Next year.

He shot a somewhat wistful look at the showers as he stripped off his quidditch robe — there would be no post-match romp with Draco, unfortunately. That was another thing that would have to wait a year.

As with any Gryffindor win, there was a party in the common room to follow. Harry had already put Dobby on snack duty, and it was the work of only a few moments to sneak out to Hogsmeade for the usual delivery from the Three Broomsticks; he had promised the twins he'd keep up the tradition, after all.

Rosmerta gave him a scolding look, even as she brought out the crate of butterbeer. "You shouldn't be sneaking around, Potter, with things the way they are. The target on your back is big enough."

"They won't get me in the village," he assured confidently. The woman didn't look convinced, and chided him to hurry back to school.

"Next time just send a bloody owl-order in advance," she told him, rolling her eyes, "it's not like your team ever loses, is it?"

Harry laughed, offering a wave and ducking out of the pub, butterbeer securely in his pocket.

The party was in full swing when he arrived, cheers exploding through the packed common room. He set up the butterbeer and swiped an armful of bottles, then turned to try and find his teammates.

In his search, he was briefly accosted by an enthusiastic pair of Creevey brothers, keen to show him the pictures they'd taken during the match. There were some great ones in the mix, and Harry made them promise to get copies for him — there was one of Ginny scoring an amazing goal that he knew Charlie would love to have.

Eventually, he did make it over to the team gathered by the window. He handed out the butterbeers he'd brought over for them, making sure there was an extra for Neville, who had Ginny quite happily perched in his lap. Katie shuffled over to make room for Harry between her and Vicky on the sofa, with Jimmy and Ritchie sat on the arms of the armchair Demelza had claimed.

"Not a bad start to the season, then!" Katie declared happily, clinking the neck of her bottle against Harry's. "Even if Slytherin weren't playing their best team, they still gave us a run for our money."

"We play like that against Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw, and the cup is in the bag," Harry assured, beaming at his team. "You were all fantastic, honestly."

There would be time for criticisms and improvements at the next practice; right now, Harry wanted them all to enjoy a match well played. Especially the new members, who had improved so quickly since the start of the year.

Harry stayed and chatted for the time it took him to drink one butterbeer, accepting congratulations from all the Gryffindors who came up to pat him on the back and talk to the rest of the team. At one point, he noticed Ron and Hermione kissing in a corner, and he stared with a wide-eyed sort of fascination.

“Looks like he’s eating her face, doesn’t it,” Ginny remarked. “But I guess everyone has to start somewhere.”

“Hasn’t he spent most of the last year and a half giving you shit for kissing in public?” Vicky asked, brows raised, and Ginny nodded.

“Yup,” she agreed, popping the ‘p’. “Maybe this is him trying to get back at me for it. Or he’s just a big ‘ol hypocrite who’s just trying to brag about finally getting someone to kiss him.” She watched the pair keep going, looking increasingly disturbed. “Really, though, there’s no way watching me snog Nev is more gross than that.”

Harry, who wasn’t particularly inclined to enjoy watching either snogging session, still had to agree.

“Well, on that note,” he declared, patting his thigh and getting to his feet. “I’m out. I’ll catch you all later.”

There were several disappointed groans. “Oh, come on, Harry! Don’t let them put you off your party!” Demelza insisted.

“Oh, he’s not,” Ginny cut in smugly, “he’s just heading off for a private party of his own. Aren’t you?” Her brown eyes met his challengingly, and he raised his hands in a ‘you got me’ gesture.

“Maybe I am, maybe I’m not,” he drawled, winking.

“Don’t keep him up too late,” Neville called. “Both of you need your rest! You’ve classes in the morning.”

Harry barked out a laugh, merely waving goodbye, squeezing his way through the crowd. He had to go and grab his invisibility cloak from his dorm, first.

“Hi, Harry!”

He resisted the urge to groan as Romilda Vane stepped in front of him, blocking his path. “Hi, Romilda. Excuse me, sorry, I need to go upstairs.”

“Want some company?” she asked, giggling flirtatiously. Harry levelled her with a flat look.

“I’m going to take a piss, so no,” he returned evenly, getting a small spark of satisfaction when she blushed.

“Oh. I, uh—I got these for you!” She held out a thin rectangular package. “As a congratulations. For winning the match. You’re a really great captain, Harry.” She giggled again. Harry looked down at the box of chocolate cauldrons she’d forced into his hands.

"Uh, thanks. Bye, then." And, ignoring her stuttering, he neatly side-stepped her and carried on towards the dorm.

Slughorn's party couldn't come soon enough. Maybe then people would finally leave him alone.

Tossing the chocolate cauldrons aside, uncaring of where they ended up — he certainly had no intention of eating them — he dug through his satchel for his invisibility cloak and the map, and paused for a moment. What else could he bring Draco? What did you bring people when they were unwell?

He had vague memories of Aunt Petunia plying a poorly Dudley with endless soup and ice cream. But Draco wasn't a big fan of ice cream, and he'd probably already eaten. Anyway, bringing food wasn't that impressive when Draco had full access to the same house elves Harry did.

What else? He stared at his trunk, as if it might hold all the answers. There was no point in bringing potions, not when he'd likely had all he could take from Pomfrey and Snape. A book, maybe?

Then, Harry's gaze landed on the blanket balled up at the bottom of his bed. It was a new addition; Andromeda had quilted it for his birthday, a patchwork of monochrome fabrics with the Black family crest in the centre.

Perfect. It wouldn't even look out of place if Crabbe or Goyle saw it — they would just assume it was a gift from his mother.

Harry folded up the blanket, shrinking it down to put in his pocket, and hurried from the dorm.

It was a little difficult getting out of the common room — far too crowded to try and sneak out under the cloak, but being visible meant people trying to talk to him — but he managed it with a few brusque remarks, and once he was in the corridor outside he headed to the nearest Parseltongue passage.

Sneaking into the Slytherin common room was easy, with the castle wards negating the need for a password. The snake pit was a much more morose sight; they had nothing to celebrate, after all. But nobody noticed the door open for no one, and Harry was entirely silent as he snuck towards the boys' dorms. He had the Marauder's Map open in one hand beneath the cloak, edging towards the room that only held one single dot; he had been correct to assume Draco's dorm mates would seek refuge elsewhere, just in case he was contagious.

He crept through the door, shutting it firmly behind him, murmuring a privacy ward under his breath. He heard a quiet, muffled call. "Blaise, that you?"

"Not Blaise," Harry said softly, shrugging the cloak off.

The lights were dimmed, but he could see Draco lying in his bed, the drapes only half-closed. He was propped up on some pillows, his face paler than usual and his hair ruffled and haphazard. The Slytherin's eyes widened at the sight of his unexpected visitor. "Harry! How'd you get in here?"

"Slytherin's heir, remember?" Harry teased, striding over. He sat on the edge of the bed, reaching out to stroke Draco's cheek gently. His skin was a little warm. "How are you feeling, love?"

Draco groaned quietly. "Like I've been hit with about eight bludgers," he admitted honestly. "How was the match? I heard you won." His glare was about as powerful as a kitten's, and Harry's heart melted.

"We did. Sorry." He toed off his shoes, and leaned in to kiss Draco's forehead. "Brought you a present, though." Removing the shrunken blanket from his pocket, he returned it to its usual size as he shook it out, draping it over Draco's bed. "Thought you could borrow it 'til you feel better."

Draco's breath hitched as he looked down at the blanket. Harry didn't doubt that by Christmas Draco would have one of his own, but still; it was the thought that counted. "Oh," he murmured. "I— thank you. You didn't have to." He frowned slightly. "Shouldn't you be partying up in your tower, right about now? How late is it?"

Harry chuckled, running a fond hand through his boyfriend's mussed hair. "I partied for a little while. But I was worried about you. I know Blaise said you were fine, but... it's not like you to miss quidditch." It wasn't like Draco to get sick.

"These things happen, sometimes," Draco groused. "Pomfrey says it's just a virus, should work its way through my system in a day or so. I just wish taking potions would help any."

"It's no fun, being sick," Harry sympathised, and the kitten-glare returned.

"You wouldn't know, you've never been sick a day in your life."

That was true — even at the Dursleys, Harry had never got ill, even when everyone in the house had come down with something. He'd had infections due to injuries, and had the usual side effects from starvation and dehydration, but colds and viruses and stomach bugs had always passed him by.

"Still." Harry frowned slightly. "Hey, budge over."

It took a little nudging, getting Draco to shift over enough for Harry to burrow under the blankets beside him, pulling the blond's head gently down to his chest. Draco gave a weak protest. "Don't wanna give you my germs," he insisted, but Harry just kissed his hair and held him closer.

"We just established I don't get sick," he pointed out. "And if I do, I'll deal with it." Missing a day or two of classes wouldn't be the end of the world.

Draco sighed, the argument apparently over, and curled into Harry's side. He was warm — too warm, really — but Harry could feel his faint shivers. He stroked the blond's hair soothingly, wishing there was more he could do. “I’m sorry you missed the match today,” he said quietly. Draco hummed.

“I’m more sorry I missed our plans for after the match,” he retorted, making Harry grin despite himself.

“Those plans will keep,” he assured, cuddling Draco close. “If Harper’s going to be your replacement when you graduate, though, he’ll need a fair bit of work.”

“Harper’s an idiot,” Draco groaned, fingers curling in the hem of Harry’s t-shirt. “It was a last-minute thing.”

“I’ve always wondered why we don’t have reserve teams, y’know. Back up players who train with the main team.” It seemed unfair to Harry, that the only people who got to play quidditch were those on the main house teams. What about the kids who weren’t very good, but enjoyed the game anyway? Or the kids who had never played before and didn’t know whether they had any skill or passion for it. At muggle schools, everyone played sports, regardless of whether or not you were on the teams.

“It is a bit stupid,” Draco agreed. “Maybe we can make reserve teams next year. McGonagall won’t mind, she likes quidditch.”

Harry hummed thoughtfully; it was certainly an idea. Though after how the tryouts this year had gone, he dreaded the idea of trying to find an entire reserve team.

“Something to think about.” He shuffled further back against the pillows, adjusting his hold on Draco in the narrow bed until the blond was sprawled almost entirely on his chest, and Harry could run a gentle hand up and down his back in the way he knew turned Draco to a puddle of goo. “I’ve missed this, y’know.” They’d taken it for granted, over the summer, how easy it was to get time to just lie in bed and cuddle. Sure, they had the conjured sofa in the Chamber, and sometimes the Room of Requirement, but they rarely had the time to lie down together like this, without giving in to the urge to rip each others’ clothes off. It was just a shame Draco’s illness was the reason for it.

“Me, too.” He could hear the drowsiness in his boyfriend’s voice, and kept stroking his back until he felt the blond go fully limp, his breathing only a little laboured.

He couldn’t stay the whole night, in the Slytherin dorm. Eventually the other boys would want to get back into their room, and there would be hell to pay if Crabbe or Goyle found Harry in there. But he stayed as long as he dared, and when it got late he reluctantly wriggled his way out of Draco’s grasp, trying not to wake the other boy. It didn’t work — Draco’s grey eyes blinked groggily up at him, a cute frown tugging at his lips. Harry leaned down, kissing him chastely. “I have to go to bed,” he whispered. “Go back to sleep.”

Draco sighed, settling back down, and Harry tucked the blankets up around him properly. He didn’t miss the way Draco’s hand fisted in the patchwork quilt, pulling it up to his face and inhaling Harry’s scent lingering on the fabric. Harry’s heart stuttered, a smile tugging at his lips. He couldn’t resist leaning in for one more kiss before he left. “Feel better soon. I love you.”

“Mm, love you,” Draco replied dazedly, already halfway asleep again.

Reluctantly, Harry tore himself away from the blond’s bedside, covering himself with the invisibility cloak and reactivating the map. With one last look at his drowsy beloved, he dismantled his wards on the door, and started the journey back up to Gryffindor Tower and his cold, empty bed.

. . .

Thankfully, Draco’s illness only seemed to last the one day — he was at breakfast the next morning, still a little pale but insisting he was ready for classes. Harry winked at him from the Gryffindor table, and he rolled his eyes in response.

“What did you do, snog him back to full health?” Ginny teased under her breath, earning a glare.

Harry was saved having to respond by a commotion starting at the other end of the table — they looked over, seeing Ron stood in front of Romilda Vane, looking at her with awe-filled eyes. Harry couldn’t hear what he was saying, but it had to be good, judging by the incredulous faces surrounding them.

“But Romilda!” Ron continued, more audible now as the whole hall began to hush, watching events unfold. “We’re meant to be together, can’t you see? You’re the most beautiful girl in the whole school!”

Harry sucked in a sharp breath — as Ron had spoken, Hermione had walked through the door. She stopped in her tracks like she’d been slapped, her hand moving to her mouth as her boyfriend continued.

“Why are you acting like this?” Romilda asked, utterly bewildered. Ron reached for her hand, grasping it in his own.

“Because I love you, and I know you love me too!”

“You’ve never even spoken to me before!” Romilda protested.

“What the hell is going on here?” Hermione screeched, stalking up to Ron and grabbing him by the shoulder. Ron shrugged her off with a glare.

“Leave me alone, Hermione.” He turned back to Romilda, unperturbed. “Look, come on, if you just give me a chance I know we could be happy together. You’re the love of my life, Romilda Vane!”

All of a sudden, Romilda went pale, and let out a horrified squeak. She stood, and to Harry’s utter bewilderment, hurried towards him. “You gave him the chocolates I gave you!” she accused. Harry blinked at her.

“You what?”

“The chocolate cauldrons!” Romilda repeated. “They were specifically for you. You let him have them, didn’t you?” She gestured back at Ron, who was hurrying towards them now, looking furious.

“Of course, you’re after Harry. It’s always Harry bloody Potter,” he grumbled, glaring. “You know he’s not even into girls, right? He can’t love you the way I do, Romilda!”

Hermione caught up with him then, and slapped him hard across the face, the sound echoing through the hall. “How dare you!” she hissed, turning around and hurrying from the hall, shoulders shaking with sobs.

“What is the meaning of all this?” McGonagall thundered, striding over with Dumbledore hot at her heel. “Mr Weasley, Miss Vane, what in Merlin’s name is going on here?”

“It’s all Harry’s fault!” Romilda accused. “If he’d just eaten the chocolates I’d given him rather than letting him find them!” She glared at Ron, who looked like he might cry.

“But— but Romilda,” he croaked.

“And what, exactly, was in these chocolates, Miss Vane?” McGonagall asked icily.

Romilda froze, suddenly seeming to realise just how much trouble she was in. “Um. Nothing?”

“Indeed. So if I were to ask Madam Pomfrey to test Mr Weasley for the presence of love potions, it would come back negative, would it?” The Gryffindor housemistress’ stare had broken stronger people than Romilda Vane — the fourth year girl crumbled after only a few seconds under the piercing gaze.

“Alright! I stole Amortentia from Slughorn’s classroom!” she blurted, tears welling in her eyes. “I just — if Harry would just give me a chance!” She turned to him plaintively, and he recoiled back.

“I’m gay, Romilda!” he reminded, horrified. “And even if I wasn’t, you don’t get to drug people into loving you. That’s basically rape!” This wasn’t a Weasley twins’ love potion, only powerful enough to embolden feelings that already existed. Amortentia was the strongest love potion in the world; continued dosing could turn someone into a mindless slave!

“I think we all need to just calm down a moment,” Dumbledore cut in, but McGonagall ignored him.

“Amortentia is illegal, Miss Vane! If you were of age you’d be facing time in Azkaban for such a crime!” she told her student, who gasped and continued crying.

“I—I didn’t mean to!” she wailed. “I just wanted him to like me!”

“Now, Minerva,” Dumbledore soothed genially. “I’m sure Miss Vane is very sorry for what she’s done. And really, if Mr Potter had not been so irresponsible in leaving the chocolates lying around his dormitory, poor Mr Weasley would not be in this predicament.”

“You’re trying to blame this on me!” Harry yelped, furious. “She’s the one who drugged the chocolates in the first place!”

“Feelings can make people do silly things; especially young ladies of Miss Vane’s age,” Dumbledore replied, shaking his head.

“Albus, you cannot be serious!” McGonagall argued. “Potter had nothing to do with this. He was unaware there was anything wrong with the chocolates. And I certainly expect young ladies of Miss Vane’s age to have better sense than to use illegal love potions under my very nose! Not to mention stealing from a professor! You’ll be lucky not to be expelled for this. You’ll be lucky if no one presses charges!”

Romilda burst into louder tears.

“Now, now, that’s a little bit drastic,” Dumbledore was fumbling, now, and they could all see it. He looked up, realising for the first time that the entire hall was staring at him in disgust, that he would so easily try and dismiss what was essentially attempted rape. “Why don’t we all take this up to my office, get everything straightened out?”

“I’m not going anywhere with you, or her,” Harry declared, glaring at Romilda. “And I really think someone should take Ron to the Hospital Wing.”

“Right you are, Potter. Miss Weasley, take your brother up to Madam Pomfrey, will you?” McGonagall instructed, and Ginny nodded, pale behind her freckles as she grabbed Ron by the arm. He was reluctant to leave, calling Romilda’s name — eventually Ginny had to resort to Stunning him, levitating him from the hall.

“Mr Potter, will you be pressing charges?” McGonagall asked plainly. Harry grit his teeth.

“Not this time. But I will if she tries anything again.” He would give her the benefit of the doubt, assume she didn’t know what Amortentia was truly like, how helpless it would have left Harry. McGonagall gave a curt nod, and gripped Romilda hard by the shoulder, frog-marching her out of the hall. No one else moved.

“The rest of you, off to class!” the Scottish woman barked in the doorway. “My seventh year class, take a free period. Go, you’re all running late!”

As soon as she disappeared, there was a scramble of activity, everyone hurrying to shovel down as much of the breakfast they’d abandoned before they had to go. Harry didn’t realise he was shaking until Neville eased him down to sit on the bench, and Parvati and Lavender appeared at his side.

“Are you alright, Harry?” Lavender asked, voice trembling. He nodded jerkily.

“Potter.” He looked up to see Professor Babbling, frowning down at him in concern. “Don’t worry about making it to class. Missing one period won’t kill you, and I daresay your mind would be elsewhere regardless.” Her frown deepened, and she patted him on the shoulder. “I’ll give your homework back to Mr Malfoy to pass on to you.”

"I— thanks, Professor," Harry croaked, and she left. Across the hall, Harry could see Draco staring at him with pained eyes, clearly torn between coming to check on him and not being late to class. Harry flicked his gaze towards the door pointedly. He could find Draco later. If the blond tried to talk to him now, Harry might lose it.

If he had eaten a single one of those chocolate cauldrons... how many had Ron had, to be so head over heels so quickly? Harry might not like the bloke, but he still felt bad — he didn't deserve to be love-potioned. Hopefully Hermione would understand once she heard what really happened.

But if it had been Harry... if he had been dosed, if he had approached Romilda somewhere a little more private than the Great Hall... how far would she have let it go on?

"How did Slughorn not notice there was some missing from the cauldron?" Parvati remarked quietly. Harry grimaced — the Potions professor hadn't been in the hall during the drama, but Harry was certain McGonagall would give him one hell of a dressing down for leaving Amortentia unsupervised in a school full of children.

How many other people could have snuck some out of there?

"Y'know, I think Romilda got lucky, there," Neville said, and Harry goggled at him.

"Her? I was the lucky one!" He'd been too busy worrying about Draco to even remember the chocolates existed.

Neville's hazel eyes were serious as they met his. "Yeah, but imagine what your boyfriend would have done to her if she'd succeeded," he pointed out. "Way worse than anything Hermione could come up with."

Harry sucked in a sharp breath; Neville was right, of course. Hell, there was nothing to say Draco wouldn't destroy her just for trying, and Harry was of half a mind to let him.

Even Lavender, who didn't know who Harry was dating — though he wouldn't put it past her to have figured it out by now, perceptive girl that she was — looked nauseous at the prospect.

"Next HA meeting," Harry murmured softly, "we're learning detection spells. Alright?" He knew a few, thanks to Snape and Sirius, but he'd never anticipated having to use them regularly at school.

He didn't want anyone getting ideas from Romilda's little stunt, though.

"Sounds good, Harry," Lavender agreed, squeezing his shoulder gently. "Why don't we go up to the common room for a bit? We've got Snape second period, I don't think he'll go easy on you after this."

Harry grimaced — he wasn't sure he had the energy to pretend to hate Snape, not now. But he'd have to find it somewhere.

"I don't know why I'm so shaken by this," he muttered, scowling as he got to his feet. "I didn't even take the potion."

"But you might have," Parvati said, voice sympathetic. "It's scary. I... I can't believe Romilda would do that. I can't believe anyone would do that." She shuddered, wrapping her arms around herself.

"I hope she gets suspended," Neville muttered darkly.

"Doubt it," Harry replied. "You saw Dumbledore — he was all ready to sweep it under the rug. Fuck, he thought it was my fault for letting Ron eat the chocolates!"

All four of them scowled. "Dumbledore's losing his mind," Lavender declared. "I never thought I'd say this, but he really needs to retire."

Harry glanced up, meeting Neville's gaze. It wasn't the most ideal situation to start shattering peoples' trust in Dumbledore, but Harry would take it.

.-.

It was decided that the current political climate made it too dangerous to suspend Romilda, so she was given a month's worth of detentions with McGonagall and was banned from Hogsmeade for the rest of the year. She was also, so he heard, strongly discouraged from trying to speak to Harry ever again.

Even if McGonagall hadn't ordered as much, Harry felt sure she wouldn't have spoken to him again anyway; when she saw him in the common room after lunch, she turned bright red and fled to her dorm.

Harry, on the other hand, spent most of the evening angrily duelling Snape in the Chamber, having earned a detention of his own in class. His friends were all ready to riot, but Harry was secretly glad for the chance to blow off steam.

"Do I need to go over your detection spells?" the Potions Master asked, when they took a break from duelling. Harry shook his head.

"I know them. And I would have used them, if I'd planned to eat the chocolates at all." He wasn't so stupid to have just blindly eaten the gift from a girl he barely knew.

"I want you using them at every meal. And on anything else you might consume, unless it has come from Ceri or Dobby."

"Yes, Severus." That was a rule Harry would happily follow.

He straightened up, intending to ask for another duel, then cocked his head as the castle nudged at his senses. He was shown a mental image of Draco pacing outside the Room of Requirement. Blinking away the image, he grimaced up at the tall man. "I, uh— Draco's in the Room, I think he wants to see me. Can I..."

Snape's scowl softened, as much as a man like that could soften for anyone that wasn't Remus. "We're done here," he confirmed. "Be careful when you return to your dorm — Weasley has been released from the Hospital Wing, and he may blame you for his predicament."

Harry grimaced — he hadn't even thought about that. "I'll be on my guard," he promised, heading over to his to the passage that would let the professor back out in his office. Harry walked him back up to the school proper, opening the passage at the other end for him, then bid him goodnight and hurried to take a passage up to the Room. As the castle had promised, Draco was there waiting for him, and the blond slumped in relief when Harry entered.

"I wasn't sure you'd know I was here."

"Hogwarts told me," Harry assured, happily sinking into Draco's arms. A sofa appeared beside them, and the pair made themselves comfortable, Harry burying his face in Draco's neck.

"I want to kill her," Draco muttered, fingers tangling in Harry's hair.

"Not this time," Harry chided. "If she tries again, she's all yours." Draco snorted, and Harry felt lips press to the crown of his head. For the first time all day, Harry properly relaxed, stopped pretending he was unbothered by what had almost happened. Let himself shudder and cry in Draco's arms.

Later, when he was done crying, he would kiss his boyfriend hard, tug impatiently at his shirt, beg for a reminder that Romilda hadn't succeeded — that his body was his own, and his love was Draco's, and nothing in the world would change that. Draco would give him that reminder, whispering his own words of love, his hands on Harry's skin proof that nothing would tear them apart.

But even after that, sleep would be hard to come by.

Chapter 91

Chapter Notes

Here it is, the moment you've all been waiting for ;)

Life went on. Far quicker than Harry anticipated, the students of Hogwarts moved on from the drama of the Amortentia — once Ron was out of the Hospital Wing and he and Hermione had made up, there wasn't really much to gossip about. Romilda hardly showed her face outside meals, and Harry ignored anyone who tried to ask him about it.

Since nothing awful had happened, only Ron making a fool of himself in front of the whole school, everyone seemed perfectly happy to just brush it off as a prank gone wrong, look to the next bit of juicy gossip — look back to the question of who Harry was taking to Slughorn's party.

Part of Harry didn't blame them for not wanting to dwell on it. But another part of Harry — the part that was still diligently checking every meal, every drink, refusing anything that was handed to him from anyone he didn't trust — couldn't believe how little they cared about how catastrophic it could have all been.

Then again, with Dumbledore as their example, how could he expect anything less?

As the Christmas holidays — and Slughorn's party — drew closer, the students began to get restless. Harry didn't doubt many of them would be staying at the castle over the break, their homes too dangerous to return to. Since the Floo Network was now being monitored, Professor Flitwick had offered to create portkeys for everyone who wished to go home; which was technically illegal, but so were half a dozen other things the staff were doing, including harbouring Harry Potter. Harry had already been assured that Snape would take him and Draco home with a portkey of their own, and the matter had been cleared through McGonagall. That also meant that McGonagall would assume Harry was spending Christmas at Malfoy Manor, but considering how tight the manor's wards were locked down, Harry didn't see that being a problem.

Ordinarily, Hogwarts would have been abuzz with children eager to go home for Christmas, to have a break from classes and homework. And they were still eager for that, but it was... more wary. Fragile. Like wounded animals waiting for a chance to slink away and heal in private.

Everyone knew what lurked beyond the castle walls. Not everyone was confident in their own safety should they step past them.

But they were all trying their best to get into the holiday spirit. Especially for the younger years, who knew enough to be scared but not enough to properly understand why. The castle was decorated as cheerfully as ever, and Slughorn was pleased to assure everyone that his party would bring just the jolt of festive cheer they all needed.

"It'll be a bit quieter than I had hoped, of course," he added apologetically during one Potions class. "I originally wanted to invite some friends of mine from outside the castle — ex-students, you know, who have an interest in helping the next generation find their feet — but of course, with safety concerns being what they are, that hasn't been possible. But not to worry! I'm sure we'll all still have a smashing time!"

Harry wasn't so sure about that, but he'd committed to the thing now. At least he was dragging Draco with him; he wouldn't have to suffer alone.

It was quite impressive, how many people cared about who Harry was taking to the party, despite how few of them would be attending as well. He knew why, of course — he'd made it pretty clear that his date was a boyfriend, not just a friend the way he'd taken Susan to the Yule Ball — but it still baffled him to have so many people interested in his love life. People who just a few months ago had been hissing insults at him in the corridors, accusing him of going Dark.

There were dozens of eyes on him at dinner. As if he was going to reveal his secret now, an hour before the party, in front of the whole school. Harry kept his head down and focused on his meal, ignoring Ginny's quiet cackling at his side.

"I can't wait to see everyone's faces," she muttered, making him glare at her.

"Surely it won't be that much of a shocker?" he remarked. Across the table, Lavender giggled.

"Sorry, Harry, but if it's who I think it is, it will be," she told him. He sighed.

"It's probably exactly who you think it is," he said mournfully, watching her eyes dart across to the Slytherin table. The brunette girl let out a quiet squeal of delight.

"God, that's hot," she said, then blushed. Far from being offended, Harry laughed.

"He is," he agreed, well aware of how ridiculously attractive his boyfriend was.

"She meant both of you," Ginny told him, elbowing him in the side. "And she's right." When Harry raised an eyebrow, she just winked. Lavender giggled again.

They headed up to Gryffindor Tower to go and get ready for the party, Harry loudly declaring in the common room that he was meeting his date at the party so there was no reason for people to linger.

Neville was Ginny's date, so the two boys put on their dress robes together, ignoring Ron scowling at them as he did the same — Neville in a chocolate brown set that made his eyes look extremely bright, and Harry in deep purple robes that had been a present from Narcissa, so he had to assume they were incredibly fashionable. He took some extra time to try and tame his hair.

“You’re putting in an awful lot of effort for a bloke who’s seen you at your worst, y’know,” Neville remarked in amusement. Harry shrugged.

“We don’t get dressed up very often. And it might only be Slughorn’s party, but… this is a big deal, for us.” Their first time in public as a couple. He didn’t want Draco to have a single ounce of regret about standing at his side.

“Well I think that’s about as good as it’ll get, mate,” Neville told him bluntly. Harry looked in the mirror, turning his head to check his hair from several angles, then sighed.

“I suppose.” He put away his hair potion, washing his hands with a quick spell. “Let’s go, then. Don’t want to keep Ginny waiting.”

The redheaded witch was indeed waiting for them, her face lighting up at the sight of Neville. She wore pretty gold dress robes Harry hadn’t seen before, but they complemented Neville’s robes well enough Harry wondered if that had been an intentional matching. Perhaps Neville’s gran had been involved?

“Well, you two scrub up nicely,” she said approvingly. “Shall we go find you a man, Harrikins?”

She sounded so much like George for a moment, Harry had to do a double take. Then he snickered. “Good thing I know exactly where to find one,” he joked.

“Oh, I wish I was going tonight,” Parvati moaned enviously, sprawled on the sofa in front of the fire with Lavender. “You all look so good! There’s never any excuses to dress up around here.”

“We need another Yule Ball,” Lavender agreed with a wistful sigh. “You three have fun.”

Just as she said that, Hermione started to descend the staircase from the dorms, and the trio exchanged a look, then hurried out of the portrait hole. The last thing they wanted was to get stuck walking to the party alongside Ron and Hermione.

“I wonder who McLaggen’s taken,” Harry mused, thinking of the only other Gryffindor in the Slug Club.

“One of the Hufflepuff girls in my year, but I can’t remember which,” Ginny supplied. “Pretty sure all the girls in sixth and seventh know better than to agree to anything with him.”

That wouldn’t surprise Harry one bit.

“You ready for this, then?” Ginny asked, looking excited. “Your official coming out. Well. Y’know. Your other coming out.”

Harry snorted. “Yeah. I’m ready.” He’d been ready for ages, to be honest. But this felt like the right time — a big event, where it would be extremely impolite for people to ask questions, and he could leave for two weeks almost immediately after.

He wanted everyone to know Draco was his.

Still, his stomach fluttered anxiously as they grew closer to Slughorn’s office. And then he saw him.

Draco was waiting in an alcove, slightly shielded from view, his hands clasped in front of him. He looked up at the sound of footsteps, and his lips curled in as wide a smile as he dared show in public. He stepped out of the alcove, giving Harry the full view of him in perfectly tailored slate-grey dress robes, the tie knotted at his throat the exact same colour as Harry’s own robes.

Definitely Narcissa’s doing, there.

“I can hear the hearts of half the students of Hogwarts breaking already,” Ginny remarked teasingly. “Godric, you look smitten. Go on, if you must.”

Harry snickered, but happily crossed the distance between him and Draco, offering his date a smooth bow. “May I?” he asked, offering an arm. Draco cocked an eyebrow at him, then snorted, stepping closer and resting his hands on Harry’s shoulders, kissing him firmly.

“I really need to find more excuses to get you in formalwear,” he drawled, smoothing his hands over the front of Harry’s robes. They were high-collared, with no need for a tie or anything, but surprisingly comfortable.

“Only if you’re there with me,” Harry returned without missing a beat.

“I should’ve nicked Colin’s camera on the way out,” Ginny sighed, approaching with Neville’s hand in hers. “One picture of the two of you looking like this sent to Witch Weekly, I’d never have to work a day in my life.”

Draco laughed, neatly tucking his arm into Harry’s. “Please; that rag doesn’t pay nearly as well as it should.” He stepped back, gesturing for the other pair to go ahead. “Ladies first.”

“Only if you give us a minute to get in there before you make your big entrance,” Ginny replied, patting Harry on the cheek before letting Neville escort her into Slughorn’s office, where music and quiet conversation were already drifting through the open doorway.

Harry let out a long breath, glancing up at his boyfriend. “Sure you want to do this?”

Draco rolled his eyes, kissing him again. “I have spent the last two years waiting for this, Potter. Don’t chicken out now; you’re supposed to be the brave one.”

A slightly breathless laugh escaped the Gryffindor. “Fair enough.” It was easy. He just had to walk through that door, and they would be out. They had friends in the party; Ginny and Neville, and Blaise and Daphne. It would be fine.

He steadied his shoulders, squeezed Draco's arm, and stepped forward.

Slughorn's office had been magically expanded for the occasion, the walls draped in jewel-toned fabrics to give the illusion of some sort of huge tent. It was vaguely smoky within, but not nearly as crowded as it might have been if Slughorn had been able to invite his friends along.

As such, every single person in the room could see Harry and Draco walk in together.

"Harry, my boy!" Slughorn was right there, wearing a velvet hat and matching smoking jacket, and he almost dropped his glass of port as he looked at Draco. "Well, well — Slytherins and Gryffindors getting along, indeed!" He laughed, wiggling his bushy brows salaciously. "You have been keeping a tight lid on this one, haven't you, my lad."

Harry flushed. Luckily, Draco was a pro at these kinds of situations. "Harry has so little of his private life kept truly private, Professor," he said earnestly, "I'm sure you can understand his want to let our relationship grow without prying eyes."

"Quite right, Mr Malfoy! My, my — I had, of course, heard the rumours of the Black family reuniting after the death of Lord Malfoy. My condolences, Mr Malfoy," he added hastily, but Draco shook his head.

"Thank you, Professor, but there was little love lost between myself and my father — or, indeed, him and my mother. We are much happier without him forcing us both to stand at his side." The insinuation was clear; neither remaining Malfoys agreed with Lucius' beliefs. "Mother was delighted to get back in touch with her cousin Sirius, and that certainly made things easier for Harry and I — but we had eyes for each other long before then." Draco winked, and Slughorn chuckled.

"Say no more, lad," he teased, winking exaggeratedly. "Well, wonderful to have you both; please, enjoy the party! Ah, Miss Granger, good to see you!"

The only thing stopping Harry from whirling around on the spot to see Ron and Hermione's faces when they saw him with Draco himself, pointedly escorting him away from Slughorn and over to the side. "Don't stare yet," Draco warned in an undertone, expertly moving them to stand in a place they could easily see the door from without looking too obvious. Everyone was still staring at them — including Ron, now, who was blatantly ignoring Slughorn's attempts to talk to him as he gaped at the two of them.

"You're far too good at this," Harry accused, making Draco smirk.

"This was what I was raised with, darling. Lord Malfoy is always a master of the art of conversation." He brushed a stray curl off Harry's forehead. "Slughorn is an easy target to win over. Let him think he's privy to some great secret and you have him — I daresay we've made him the envy of his entire social circle, giving him such juicy inside knowledge before the gossip rags."

"Then I should've done this ages ago, if it'll win him over," Harry muttered. "Maybe now I'll be able to get him to talk." Though about what, he still wasn't sure.

"I suppose we have been a bit remiss on your pureblood etiquette lessons, all things considered," Draco mused. "Once things are quieter, we'll have to pick that back up. You'll need to know how to handle people like Slughorn going forward."

Harry groaned quietly — he'd been perfectly happy with those lessons being abandoned in favour of more important things, like how to kill Dark Lords. Draco laughed fondly. "Chin up, love. I'm sure I'll find a way to make it fun for you." His grey eyes darkened, and Harry couldn't help but kiss him, even as it set off a wave of gasps and whispers throughout the room.

"Having fun, are we?" Daphne and Blaise appeared beside them, both looking far too amused by the whole affair. "I thought Becky Arncliffe was going to cry when she saw you two walk in together."

Harry frowned, looking over at the seventh year Ravenclaw girl. "I've never spoken to her in my life."

"No, but she's had a crush on Draco for forever now," Daphne told him smugly. Harry blinked, surprised by the sudden flare of jealousy within him.

That was unexpected. He hadn't had to worry about that before; none of Draco's admirers were as bold as his own. But of course, there were people who fancied his boyfriend; Draco was gorgeous and the perfect pureblood and obnoxiously wealthy and the epitome of Slytherin. It made more sense for people to fancy him than Harry.

He liked the idea of those admirers being disappointed at the news that Draco was taken, a lot more than he thought he would. He'd never taken himself to be the possessive type.

It seems he was learning all sorts of new things, tonight.

Ginny and Neville sidled over, both holding flutes of what looked like champagne. "Have you seen Hermione's face? She looks like she's going to explode," Ginny said gleefully. "Also, Daphne, you look offensively gorgeous tonight, those robes are amazing."

"Thank you," Daphne replied, quietly delighted. "You two are a very stunning couple. You should get a picture to send to your grandmother, Neville; let her show off her handsome grandson to her Bluff club."

"I'm not even going to ask how you know about my gran's Bluff club," Neville said, shaking his head. All of a sudden, Harry remembered a conversation from half a lifetime ago now; sat in an abandoned classroom with Draco Malfoy, their friendship still fragile, being told never to play Warlock's Bluff with Daphne Greengrass or she would rob him of everything he owned. His insistence that he would never be in a position to play cards with her in the first place.

How naive he'd been.

Trying his best to be discreet, Harry looked over at Hermione and Ron, now they had escaped Slughorn's grasp. Hermione did indeed look like she would explode — or perhaps like she'd eaten something very, very sour. It was surprisingly reminiscent of his Aunt Petunia, and Harry had to swallow the laugh that threatened to burst out. Beside her, Ron was as red as his hair with fury, thankfully wearing a less hideous set of dress robes than he had to the Yule Ball. He was glaring daggers at Harry and Draco, and Harry wondered if the pair would be brave enough to confront him over his choice in boyfriend while surrounded by all these people.

It wasn't just students in attendance; some of the other professors were floating about, too, with glasses of something alcoholic in hand. Harry's brows shot up at the sight of Professor Sinistra stood with her hand low on Professor Babbling's back, the two women chatting with their heads close together in a way that could only be described as intimate.

Was that new? Did everyone know about that, and Harry had missed it?

He turned to Draco. "Did you know about Sinistra and Babbling?" he asked, and Draco hummed, following his gaze.

"What? Oh, yes, those two have been together for ages now. Theo swears he once caught them snogging in the Astronomy Tower back in second year."

"Theo's a filthy liar," Blaise cut in. "It was a brief peck at best."

"Maybe he didn't know the difference at the time," Ginny suggested. "I'm sure he does, now."

"Susan's made sure of that," Neville agreed ruefully, making Ginny giggle.

Slughorn didn't seem to quite know what to do with himself, now they had all arrived — it was clear he'd hoped for this party to be a much bigger event, with lots of impressive people to introduce them to.

Harry was inordinately glad it wasn't.

This was bearable — stood with his friends, drinking champagne offered to them by a house elf carrying a silver tray, pretending the rest of the room didn't exist. It wasn't quite what he'd call a party, but it was bearable. Certainly, with Draco's arm around his waist, he would've put up with much worse.

At one point, Slughorn did drift towards their little cluster, looking just as surprised by the pairing of Neville and Ginny as he was by Harry and Draco. Harry wondered if he was starting to reconsider Neville, as he drew the Gryffindor boy into a conversation about Herbology. Not that Neville wanted to be reconsidered.

"What about you, then, Harry? Grand plans for Christmas, or kicking about the castle?" the professor asked, once Neville had told him about the work he planned to do in his greenhouse over the break.

"Sirius and I are spending Yule with Draco and his mother," Harry replied, watching Slughorn's moustache twitch at his pointed use of the wizarding holiday.

"Well, that's marvellous — I've not been to Malfoy Manor in many a year, now; your grandfather Abraxas used to throw quite the soiree, back in the day!" he added to Draco, chuckling. Then his gaze grew sad. "I never quite approved of the company, you know, but they were still excellent parties all the same. Such a shame about Abraxas; he was such a bright lad, one of my best students! Then he fell in with young Riddle, and... well," he shook his head, as if trying to banish the thoughts. "No use thinking about what once was."

Harry's eyes widened, and he sent a discreet look at Draco, urging him to keep the conversation going.

"I didn't spend much time with Grandfather — he passed when I was quite young, as I'm sure you remember — but I do seem to remember he spoke highly of you. You were the Slytherin housemaster at the time, were you not?"

"Indeed I was!" Slughorn confirmed, brightening up. "Back when I had a little more energy to spare!"

"Yes, he always spoke so fondly of his time as a Slytherin. I don't believe he ever mentioned anyone named Riddle, though. A classmate of his?"

"Yes, yes — but I suppose he wouldn't have called him that, now, would he?" Slughorn reached for a new glass of wine off a nearby tray, his rosy cheeks only getting redder the more he drank. "Now, there's a story of wasted potential if I've ever seen it. A young man who could've had everything, if he'd only been a bit more polite about asking for it. I tried my best, so I did, but there's only so much you can do with one as determined as Tom Riddle!"

Across from him, Harry saw Ginny's face turn chalky, her hand gripping tightly to Neville's.

"Did this Riddle boy come to you for advice, then?" Harry asked tentatively, heart hammering against his ribs. "I'd imagine you had plenty of it, for someone with as much... potential as you say he had."

"Oh, I tried, but he wanted advice on the kind of thing it's not polite to speak of!" Slughorn ran his fingers over his moustache, sipping at his wine. "No, no — I thought I could help him when he was young, but by the time he was set to graduate he'd already gone too far down the wrong path. Terrible, terrible shame." He peered up at Harry, eyes a touch unfocused. "I think old Albus is jumping at shadows when it comes to you, my lad — telling me to watch out for the past repeating itself. Bah! He's looking for trouble where there isn't any. You've a good head on your shoulders, Harry, my boy — don't let anyone tell you otherwise."

He blinked, then shook his head, straightening up suddenly. "Good lord, how much have I had to drink? Listen to me, getting maudlin — it's being back in this castle, does funny things to an old man's head!" He chuckled, the sound a touch strained. "I think I'd best grab something to eat; line the stomach and all that. I'll see you all later!" He gave that awkward chuckle once more and retreated quickly, and all six of them let out a collective breath when he was gone.

“What the hell was that about?” Ginny hissed, staring urgently at Harry. He pursed his lips. That hadn’t been nearly as enlightening as he’d hoped.

“Dumbledore asked him back for a reason. I’m trying to find out what it is.”

“And you think it has something to do with this Riddle bloke?” Daphne asked, frowning. “Who is he, anyway?”

“It’s You-Know-Who’s real name,” Neville piped up, surprising Harry. “Ginny told me,” he added, seeing his friend’s confusion. “About the diary and stuff.”

Of course, that made sense.

“Slughorn taught the Dark Lord as a child?” Blaise realised, eyes following the tipsy professor across the room. Harry nodded.

“Yeah, and I think he taught him something he perhaps shouldn’t have, but I can’t figure out how to get him to tell me.” He sighed, leaning against Draco. “Bugger, that was the closest I’ve gotten in ages.”

“There’s plenty of time after Yule,” Draco pointed out. He brushed a kiss over Harry’s cheek. “I doubt you’ll get anything more out of him tonight, though.”

“Yeah, you’re right.” Harry frowned, but cheered up at the sight of Ron glaring at him. “Well, at least the night wasn’t a total waste. Ron’s been so busy trying to kill Draco with his eyes, he’s ignored Hermione all night. And she doesn’t look happy about it.” She was tugging on her boyfriend’s arm, trying to get him to dance with her; a few couples were drifting around the small dance floor space.

“That’s a win if I’ve ever seen one,” Ginny agreed, amused. “Count yourselves lucky — I have to spend all bloody Christmas with him. I can’t even floo to Neville’s, with the network under watch.” She pouted, and Neville dropped a kiss on her hair.

“I’m sure one of your older brothers will apparate you,” he pointed out.

“Yes, be glad you’re not staying under apparition wards,” Blaise added, distinctly unimpressed. He was staying at the castle for the holidays, and while Harry knew George had plans to sneak in at least once, it couldn’t be easy for them.

“Do you think we’ve stayed long enough?” Harry asked, surveying the room critically. No one else had left yet — but that didn’t mean they couldn’t be the first.

“I think if you stay long enough for Weasley to have one more glass of wine, you’ll regret it,” Daphne replied, nodding in Ron’s direction. Harry grimaced.

“Yeah, okay, we’re leaving.”

“We can’t all leave at once, Slughorn will notice,” Neville said, then sighed. “Go on; you two get out of here, we’ll cover for you.”

"Knew I liked you for a reason, Longbottom," Draco remarked. Neville snorted.

"While I merely put up with you for Harry's sake," he lied cheerfully. "Will I see you back at the dorm, Harry?"

"I think it'll piss Ron off more if I'm not," Harry said. It was too good an opportunity to pass up. No one argued the point, and Harry offered a smile to the group. "Good night, then. Thanks for making this evening surprisingly entertaining. And if I don't see you before we leave, Merry Yule," he added, mostly to Blaise and Daphne, who returned the sentiment.

With that sorted, the two boys slipped away from the party, hand in hand. Harry was just a touch bubbly from the champagne, and he leaned into Draco's side as they walked away, grinning to himself. "This time tomorrow, we'll be back home, and the whole damned castle will know I'm in love with you," he declared happily. Draco smirked at him, eyes fond.

"Whatever shall we do until then?" he drawled, voice turning a little husky, sending shivers of arousal through Harry's body.

"I can think of a few ideas." He stopped abruptly, shoving Draco back against the wall and devouring his mouth, fingers sliding into the blond's perfectly parted hair, messing it up in a very satisfying way.

He could do this, now; snog his boyfriend in the middle of corridors, without having to worry about someone walking across them and telling the whole school. And God, it felt good.

"Let's go somewhere more private," Draco urged, breaking the kiss and taking him by the hand. "Put a few of your ideas to the test."

Harry didn't need asking twice, and the castle obliged by pulling a passage to the seventh floor into the space behind a nearby tapestry.

It had been one of Harry's smarter ideas, making sure the rest of the HA didn't know how to access the Room of Requirement outside of meetings. It meant the place was almost guaranteed to be empty when he wanted to use it to fuck his boyfriend in peace.

It was certainly more comfortable than the Chamber, at any rate.

.--.-.

Despite what he'd said to Neville, Harry and Draco did eventually return to their dorms; they might want to make a statement, but not the kind of statement made by turning up to breakfast in last night's dress robes. They parted ways long after their dorm mates would have gone to sleep, and in the morning Harry made sure to be out of Gryffindor Tower well before Ron awoke, his trunk packed and shrunk in his pocket. He wanted to avoid that particular meltdown as long as possible.

As he strolled leisurely down to breakfast by himself, he wondered how long it would take for word to properly spread. Already it had clearly reached a few people — several of the students he passed on his way down began whispering to each other as soon as he passed them.

He wasn't surprised to see Lavender and the Patil twins sat at the Gryffindor table when he arrived, the hall sparsely occupied otherwise. With portkeys to take instead of a train to catch, the students weren't as worried about being late.

He joined the girls at their section of the table, letting himself look as satisfied as he felt.

"So how was the party, then?" Parvati asked archly. Harry winked at her.

"I'm sure you've heard all about it already," he returned. The Indian girl grinned impishly.

"Hermione was furious when she got in last night," she confided. "I swear, Sophie had to hex her silent just so we could all get some sleep. Apparently you and your boyfriend looked far too smug and handsome at the party last night."

"Smug and handsome," Harry repeated, then chuckled. "That's him in a nutshell, yeah."

All three girls tittered — Harry knew the twins were pretending the information was as new to them as it was to Lavender, so their friend didn't feel left out.

"I can't believe you managed to keep that secret! I mean, I always thought there was a spark between you two but I was never sure if it was just a hate-attraction sort of thing. And then you became friends and I wasn't sure what to think!" Lavender said, running her fingers through her curls. "How long has that been going on?"

"How long do you think?" he retorted. She mock-scowled, hitting him lightly on the arm.

"Don't play with us, Harry," she pleaded. "Not after all we've done for you!"

"Not after all we can do for you, working damage control here while you're cosied up with your boy all Yule," Parvati added pointedly. "If we have the truth we know what to do with the more outrageous lies."

She had a point and they both knew it; if the rumours were left to their own devices, Merlin only knew what they might come back to after Christmas.

"Oh, alright then," he relented playfully. "Only because I can trust you."

"I bet it was this summer," Lavender cooed. "Once your godfather and his mum reconnected."

"Earlier," Harry told her, watching her eyes widen.

"Really? Sometime in fifth year? He did help us out when Umbridge found the HA room, I suppose... was it after that?"

He shook his head again. "Earlier."

All three of them goggled at him, now; even the Patil twins didn't know how long the relationship had been going on, they'd just known about it for longer than Lavender.

"More than a year?" Parvati pressed keenly. "Was it the summer before last year?"

Harry had kept them in suspense long enough. "Fourth year, day after the first task," he revealed, smile going a little goofy just at the memory. The girls gaped at him.

"Never!" Padma gasped, stunned. "All that time and no one knew?"

"Almost no one," Harry confirmed. "Fred and George knew almost from the beginning, and Neville figured it out after the Yule Ball. Apparently I spent half the night staring at Draco's arse. Good thing no one else saw me, to be honest."

"You've spent most of the last three years staring at my arse, Potter; I'm sure no one noticed the difference."

Harry brightened immediately, looking up at his boyfriend; he hadn't heard Draco approach — nor had he noticed the entire hall go hushed at the Slytherin's walk towards the Gryffindor table. Harry didn't pay them any mind, urging Draco to sit by him and leaning in for a kiss, heart thumping hard and smile threatening to take over his entire face. "Good morning," he greeted, whole body going warm at Draco's fond gaze.

"Good morning, love. Ladies," Draco added, nodding to the three awestruck girls. "I suppose you're grilling him for details, then? If he's talking about my arse."

"You know me; any excuse," Harry said, winking. He reached for the teapot, pouring Draco a cup without needing to ask.

"You've been waiting for this moment for ages, haven't you, Harry?" Lavender said knowingly, her lips curling smugly. "Merlin, you're practically glowing."

"Wouldn't you be?"

"It's like something out of a romance novel," Parvati sighed. "Star-crossed lovers from opposite houses, having to hide their love for their own safety. Oh." She practically swooned, and Harry caught Draco's eye, trying not to blush as he thought about the other type of romance novel he had once compared their relationship to.

"Oh, Merlin, I'll never escape it now," Neville groaned as he sank into the seat beside Padma, glaring tiredly at Harry and Draco. "Gone are the days where you two could only be disgustingly adorable in private."

"Yup," Harry declared proudly, kissing Draco's cheek. "Sorry about it."

"No you're not."

"No, I'm not," Harry agreed, unrepentant. Draco sighed.

"You're going to ruin my reputation," he despaired, making Harry grin all the wider.

“You’ve known that for years, and yet here you are.”

The hall was getting busier now, more people coming down from breakfast — anyone who hadn’t heard the news about Harry and Draco was quickly informed, their eyes swivelling straight to the pair at the Gryffindor table. Harry and Draco both tried not to react overmuch, but they didn’t hide themselves either. Harry still swiped Draco’s toast with a jam-sticky kiss to the blond’s lips, and Draco didn’t shy away from getting right into Harry’s personal space as more people joined them at the table, many of their friends pretending to be surprised by the revelation.

“So who won the betting pool, then?” Harry asked, and suddenly the group went silent.

“What betting pool?” Ginny queried, just a touch too innocent. Draco snorted.

“Daphne won it, of course,” he revealed. “Really, all of you should know better than to let someone dating Luna enter a betting pool.”

“What! But she’s your friend, she wasn’t supposed to enter!” Susan blurted in protest.

“No one told me not to,” Daphne said breezily, appearing as if summoned. “You’ve made me a very rich lady, boys.”

“Buy us something nice for Yule and we’ll call it even,” Draco retorted instantly.

Several people didn’t look impressed, but none of them could say anything without admitting that the reason they hadn’t entered the pool themselves was because they already knew who Harry was dating. Clearly, Daphne had no such morals holding her back.

“Bloody Slytherins,” Ernie muttered, rolling his eyes.

Harry glanced down at his watch, then frowned, seeing Snape striding away from the head table. “We’d better get moving, love. Portkey to catch,” he reminded.

“Don’t want to be late,” Draco agreed, neatly setting his cutlery down on his plate. “We’ll see you all in the new year, then. Happy holidays.”

The table rang with well-wishes returned, and the two boys stood to leave, heading for the doors. As they passed behind Ron, the redhead jerked his elbow back, catching Harry in the leg. He glared up at his ex-best friend. “You really ditched us for him?”

“I didn’t ditch you for him,” Harry retorted icily. “I ditched you and found him. Entirely unconnected. But honestly, Ron — you sound awfully jealous. Is that something Hermione should worry about?”

And with that bombshell, he practically skipped from the hall, Draco’s hand in his.

Their break was off to an excellent start.

.-.-.-.

Leaning against the doorway of the conservatory, watching two figures on brooms zoom about the air over the pitch, Sirius smiled to himself, wrapping his chunky cardigan tighter around his body. There was snow on the ground — four or five inches at least, and more to come overnight — and the garden already held the signs of a snowball fight abandoned in favour of quidditch.

He didn't mind this kind of cold. The crisp, bright cold of winter, the kind that came with laughter and fun and curling up by the fire with hot chocolate once everyone was exhausted and soaked through with snow. This was a good kind of cold.

It was made even better by having his pup home. His boys, really; they came as a pair by now, and with Remus and Severus being what they were it was much easier for all of them to just claim both and be done with it.

He heard familiar footsteps, and then muscular arms wrapped around his hips, a warm chest pressing to his back. He sighed slightly, leaning into the embrace, melting into Charlie as he always did. “Glad to have them home?” the redhead asked knowingly, kissing his cheek. Sirius hummed in affirmation.

“Wish we could keep them here,” he mused wistfully. The next two weeks would fly by.

“You’d get sick of them eventually,” Charlie teased. “Trust me; a full house isn’t as fun as it sounds after six weeks stuck together. I used to beg to go back to Hogwarts early, every summer.”

Sirius laughed, trying to imagine what it must be like, being the second oldest of seven, having so many siblings around all the time. He’d only ever had Regulus, and the occasional visiting cousins.

“I dunno — full house sounds nice these days,” he mused, hands covering Charlie’s. “Before long, those two will be done with school and ready to move out into their own place. Don’t know what I’ll do then.” He was happy enough to move back into Grimmauld once it was safer — now he’d reclaimed the house from his horrific childhood there, made better memories, made it a home — but he doubted he’d be able to convince many people to move back with him. Remus and Severus would want their own place once they could go public... Narcissa would move back to her manor... it would just be him and Charlie, rattling around that big old townhouse.

“I’m sure we’ll think of something to keep you occupied,” Charlie assured. “Once we’ve gotten bored of having the place entirely to ourselves.”

A frisson of excitement ran down Sirius’ spine; both at that prospect, and what might come after.

He knew what he was getting into, falling for a Weasley.

“It’ll start getting dark, soon,” he said instead. “Want to grab our brooms and join them for a bit?”

He turned, seeing Charlie grin, cheeks dimpling. “I’d love to.” He kissed Sirius quickly. “You get the brooms, I’ll get our coats.” His blue eyes softened. “Don’t want you catching a chill out there.”

Sirius smiled, watching him go — as if that were possible, when he had Charlie around, warming every single inch of him from the inside out.

. . .

Dinner that evening was a raucous affair; the whole family was at Seren Du to celebrate the start of the holidays, even the Tonks family and Kingsley were there. Harry couldn’t be happier, surrounded by his loved ones, eating delicious food and cheerfully regaling them all with the story of his and Draco’s coming out right before they had left the school.

“I just wish we’d been able to see Dumbledore’s face, but he wasn’t at breakfast,” he said, shaking his head. “Ah well; I’m sure he’ll have something to say about it when we go back.”

“And I’m sure he’ll soon realise that hardly anyone gives a damn what he thinks anymore,” Tonks declared with a grin. Sirius barked a laugh at her side.

“Too right! You should’ve seen how many letters I had after the love potion incident; parents whose kids had written home about it, wanting to tell me they’d support our family if we wanted to pressure Albus into expelling the girl.”

“Really?” Harry asked, surprised.

“Amortentia is serious business, cub. She’s lucky she’s underage, or it would be an automatic Azkaban sentence,” Remus explained.

“Horace is the lucky one,” Snape sneered. “It’s bad enough brewing Amortentia to show to students, but leaving it unsupervised long enough for a fourth year to steal some! He’s fortunate he’s ancient enough that the International Society of Potions Masters can’t be bothered to properly reprimand him for it.”

“I didn’t realise they regulated that sort of thing,” Harry mused, and Snape nodded.

“He’s lost his license to brew it, after this incident. Not an enormous loss — I can’t see him brewing it often, even for demonstration purposes. But now that’s on his record he’ll lose his Mastery if he’s caught in possession of it again. Or if any students of his are caught with it.”

“Do you think anyone else managed to steal some?” Draco asked.

“Highly unlikely,” Snape assured. “He’s an idiot, but he’s not that incompetent. And after the spectacle the Vane girl made of herself, anyone who might have some will think twice about using it.”

“Good,” Harry declared vehemently, stabbing a roast potato. Under the table, Draco squeezed his knee sympathetically.

“Enough about that,” Sirius waved off, sensing the dip in the mood, “we’ve got two weeks of freedom ahead of us!” He turned to Harry, grinning. “If it’s alright with you, pup, we thought we’d do proper Yule celebrations this year, rather than the more muggle Christmas?”

Harry beamed at him. “That would be brilliant!” There weren’t many of the Old Ways he could follow while at school — Dumbledore didn’t let anyone celebrate Samhain at the stone circle anymore, let alone anything else — and he’d been hoping they could work Yule celebrations into their family traditions, if Sirius was willing.

He looked around the full dining room; there were far too many of them to keep eating in the kitchen, on nights like this. This was his family — missing a few members, if he counted the other Weasley siblings he cared about, and their partners. Even in his wildest dreams, shut away in his cupboard while the Dursleys spoiled Dudley all Christmas, Harry had never imagined he would ever have this many people who loved him.

The world might be getting darker out, the war escalating, but there was still plenty of joy in Harry’s life. He’d forgotten that, a little bit, cooped up in the castle with Dumbledore and all those people who glared at him and all those damned black envelopes.

And now, he had a whole two weeks of that joy to look forward to.

Chapter 92

Even after just a few days of Christmas break, Harry knew it was going to be so very hard to leave when the time came to return to Hogwarts.

Still, he was determined to make the most of it, and his family were happy to oblige, slipping back into their summer routine of spending the time after dinner all together in the main living room, playing chess or Bluff or just sitting together and reading.

During the day, however, most of the occupants of the house still had work to do of some kind, so often Harry and Draco were left to their own devices. That suited them perfectly well — knowing they would be out to the school when they got back didn't have either of them under the assumption that they'd find it any easier to spend time together privately.

But not all of their time was spent being hormonal teenagers. Just some of it. The rest was spent flying, or studying, or getting up to some kind of mischief.

Or, like now, working on Draco's animagus form. The blond was so close, and he was determined to get the transformation before they went back in January. Every free minute was spent in Harry's room with his eyes closed, meditating as hard as he could in search of that owl form.

Harry didn't mind; he was eager to see Draco transform, too. And in the mean time, he got to be a soppy idiot and stare at his boyfriend for ages while said boyfriend was too busy concentrating to notice.

Usually, Draco didn't even mind too much when Harry got bored of just looking and disrupted said concentration. As long as he waited long enough for Draco to give it a decent attempt.

This time, he hadn't been meditating for very long, however. Harry was amusing himself with wandlessly levitating increasingly heavy objects to try and find his limits — he was just wondering if levitating the bed he sat on would break Draco's concentration, when suddenly the boy's body blurred.

The next thing he knew, there was a snowy owl sitting on his bed.

"Draco!" Harry jumped to his feet, the desk rattling as it hit the ground abruptly. The owl hooted. "You did it!" He beamed at his owl-shaped boyfriend, throwing himself on the bed to get a closer look. "Oh, you're gorgeous, look at you."

Draco preened, letting Harry stroke gentle fingers down his feathers. He was larger than Hedwig, with wickedly sharp talons, and Harry smirked. "Mayhem, indeed," he drawled, earning a light glare from the owl. Draco would accept the nickname eventually; he insisted that of the two of them, Harry caused more mayhem. Which, he wasn't entirely wrong, but it was too late for that now.

He splayed his wings, as if to show off their impressive span, and gave a couple of unsteady hops. “You want to try flying?” Harry presumed, and Draco’s head bobbed. “It’s really windy outside, love. Maybe wait for a calmer day?” He didn’t want Draco getting hurt. “Practice getting in and out of the form first. Make sure you can transform back.”

The owl’s eyes narrowed in a glare, but after a few moments Draco was human once more, kneeling on the mattress. Harry didn’t waste any time in pouncing on him, pinning him down and kissing him. “I’m so proud of you!” he enthused, watching Draco grin up at him.

“It’s so weird, being a bird,” he said, tone a mix of perturbed and reverent. “I should show Mother. And Uncle Sev!”

“In a minute,” Harry agreed, peppering more kisses down the Slytherin’s jaw. “I’m not done being proud of you yet.”

Draco snorted, but didn’t argue, splaying his knees slightly to cradle Harry between them. “If you must,” he mock-sighed, biting at Harry’s lower lip. “But then we’re going to show everyone. And teach me to fly. The ballroom’s big enough for it.” He gasped softly as Harry sucked on the sensitive spot on his throat.

“Sounds like a plan,” the dark-haired boy agreed, grinning against Draco’s skin. Snape was brewing anyway; they had some time to kill before Draco could go show off.

.-. .

It was only years of experience that kept Severus’ hand steady as he poured fresh-brewed Nerve Tonic into a vial while the Mark on his forearm burned with pain. He grit his teeth against it, finishing up his work. At least the summons had come at the end of his brewing session, not in the middle. He hated when he ruined work because of the Dark Lord.

Only when everything was safely stored did he summon his robe and mask, sweeping from the lab. Sirius happened to be in the main hallway, and he grimaced at the sight of Severus buttoning his dark robe. “I’ll let Moony know. Be safe,” he offered. Severus merely nodded. Then, he was headed briskly down the darkened driveway, footsteps muffled by the snow. The Mark burned hotter, more urgent; following its call once he was past the wards felt almost involuntary.

He arrived to a much larger gathering than expected, and his heart began to sink.

“At last, Severus,” the Dark Lord drawled, beckoning him closer. “I was beginning to think you would not arrive.”

“Apologies, My Lord,” Severus murmured bending to kiss the hem of the monster’s robes. “I was in the middle of a sensitive potion, it had to be stabilised before I could leave it.”

“Indeed.” The response was noncommittal, and Severus braced himself for a Cruciatus, but it never came. “No matter; you are here now. We can leave.”

“Leave, My Lord?”

Voldemort's thin lips twisted in a dangerous smile. "They keep you so busy at that castle. I'm sure you have plenty of frustrations at those brats — at the Potter boy, so close and yet you cannot harm him. At the Malfoy boy... you must be so disappointed in his... choices."

Severus expertly pushed back all his pride and love for Draco behind his Occlumency walls, letting himself scowl. "You have heard of his romance with Potter, then, My Lord?" he replied, trying to sound utterly disgusted. Red eyes burned.

"They will both be destroyed, in due time," the Dark Lord promised him. "For now, however, I offer you another outlet for those frustrations."

Severus' heart sank even further as several Death Eaters whooped eagerly behind him, Bellatrix Lestrange the loudest among them. "You honour me, My Lord."

That hideous face grew even more so with the grotesque expression of glee, and when the Dark Lord offered his arm, Severus had no choice but to take it.

They reappeared in what seemed to be a perfectly ordinary muggle residential area. Fairly affluent, by the looks of it; middle-class, nothing enormously fancy, but certainly far nicer than where he'd grown up. Several houses had lights on, the families curled up watching TV in the winter evening. Many of the houses had coloured lights strung up outside — it was a cheerful scene. Peaceful.

It would not remain so for long.

A series of cracks heralded the arrival of the rest of the Death Eaters. There had to be at least twenty of them; Voldemort had started bringing larger groups on these things in the last few months, since the Order had started thwarting them so soundly.

If only there were a way for Severus to alert them now, without blowing his cover.

"Enjoy yourselves, my loyal subjects," Voldemort instructed, raising his wand. "You have earned it."

And then the chaos began.

Immediately, one of the houses burst into flames. The Death Eaters around him started to fan out, shouting and cackling as they blew up cars and destroyed gardens. A few curious — or stupid — muggles stepped out of their homes, some holding knives or cricket bats or even, in one case, an umbrella. All of them stopped in their doorways, staring agog at the terrifying physical impossibilities happening before them, then screaming as their torture began.

Severus could not allow himself to think. He had a cover to maintain; he had his own life to protect.

He made a beeline for a house that had not yet been claimed by his fellows, blasting the door open with an unnecessarily showy flourish.

Maybe if he was loud enough, the muggles inside might run before he reached them.

But that was not the case. He found three of them, huddled upstairs in the smallest bedroom — a man, a woman, and a young child. Bile rose in Severus' throat, but he pushed it away. They would not survive the night, no matter what he did. Had he been younger, more foolish, he might have tried some elaborate ruse for them to feign death until the danger had passed. But he knew better now.

The best he could offer them was a quick, painless death.

Three flashes of green light, and the room was hauntingly silent. Severus grit his teeth, and got to work, his magic cutting into their skin and tugging at their clothes, twisting the child's neck at an unnatural angle.

If he worked well enough, none of those with him would realise all the damage had been done post-mortem.

Just in case, he set fire to the child's bed, letting the flames leap from one polyester stuffed toy to the next, catching the corner of the curtains and melting the brightly coloured plastic play contraption beneath.

He turned away, confident the whole room would be ashes before anyone could stop it.

If only his night could end there.

Stepping back out into the cold street, he saw the other Death Eaters had rounded up a whole cluster of muggles, jeering at them as they huddled together and cried. Many of them were dead on the outskirts of the group — those who had tried to fight back, perhaps.

“Come, Severus!” Bellatrix cackled, her mask abandoned and her features rapturous as she held a muggle under a Cruciatus curse. “Pick one, pretend it’s that foul brat of Cissa’s! Look, there’s a blond one for you!” She jerked her wand, and a teenage boy was separated from the rest — he looked a little younger than Draco, his hair a little darker, but the similarities were enough to almost break Severus’ composure. He grit his teeth, raised his wand, tried not to look the boy in the eye.

“Sectumsempra!” he called curtly — no one would begrudge him using his signature spell, the creation he had been so proud of as a teen.

Huge gashes appeared across the boy’s chest. Severus made sure the magic cut deep enough — the boy was dead in less than a second. Someone in the crowd wailed; a mother, perhaps. Beside him, Bellatrix pouted exaggeratedly.

“That’s no fun!” she cried, like a child denied their toys. “You’re supposed to make it last!”

“Forgive me,” Severus drawled, as cool and unruffled on the outside as always. “My temper seems to have... overtaken me. As you suggested, I was imagining the Malfoy boy.”

Bellatrix cackled again, grinning a bloodthirsty grin. “It’s so easy to slip, isn’t it? They’re so weak.” She shot off a Cutting curse into the huddle, and a scream answered. “You’ll have to do better with the next one, Sevvie — you’ve been out of the game for far too long!”

The Dark Lord didn't often send Severus on raids such as this; his position at the school, his ability as a Potions Master, it all made him far too valuable to risk just on a bit of muggle slaughter. Clearly he thought Severus deserved a reward.

That, or he was so confident in his hold over the Ministry that he thought it wouldn't matter even if Severus did get caught.

Severus braced himself for another round, mind working frantically to think of how he could make this one look more torturous — then a shout of alarm went up that wasn't from the muggles.

“Order's coming!” someone warned, their voice magically amplified. “Scatter!”

His knees almost buckled with relief, but he didn't have time to be thankful. The Death Eaters around him began to apparate away, many of them throwing one last lethal curse at the group of muggles before they vanished. Severus turned on the spot, envisioning Voldemort's manor, and with a squeezing sensation he was gone.

Privately, he hoped Bellatrix stayed long enough to get caught. Long enough for one of the Order to kill her. But he doubted it — she was too clever for that, even in her insanity.

Sure enough, she returned only a few beats after him, holding something that dripped blood on the floor. It took Severus a few moments to realise it was the decapitated head of the blond muggle boy he'd killed. “Picked out an early Christmas present for myself,” she declared proudly, holding it up. “Do you like it?”

“...Charming.”

She giggled, then straightened up as the Dark Lord strode out in front of the gathered crowd. Severus hadn't counted, but it seemed like there were fewer of them than they'd started with.

Good.

“One day, we shall show Dumbledore's precious Order exactly how little they can do to stop our glorious future,” Voldemort remarked in his chilling, sibilant voice. “For now, we will let them clean up our messes and think they are succeeding.” A few cheers burst out, but were quickly silenced by a red-eyed glare. “Severus,” the monster called, and Severus walked forward obediently, trying to stop his heart from hammering. “You seemed... unenthusiastic. Did you not like your reward?”

“I enjoyed it deeply, My Lord,” he replied, bowing his head. “I am very grateful for the opportunity. It has been so long... I wanted to take in the atmosphere, before I dirtied my hands.”

The Dark Lord smirked, and Severus knew that would not be enough. “Crucio.” He was on his knees, screaming, his nerves turning into a hundred thousand acid-coated knives. The pain lasted so long he thought he might die from it. When it finally ended, he gasped for breath, muscles shuddering with aftershocks. “You disappoint me, Severus. I cannot have one of my best men losing his touch, now, can I?" Voldemort drawled, to chuckles from the crowd.

"Next time I will do better, My Lord," Severus rasped, keeping his gaze on the floor. Waiting for another curse. Knowing it was coming didn't make it any easier to bear.

"The school has made you soft," his master told him. "But no matter. Before long we will have the school much as we have the Ministry, and you will be free to truly indulge yourself."

Severus had not yet heard anything about a plan to take Hogwarts, and terror shot through his trembling form — was there a plan going on that he didn't know about, or was the Dark Lord just pontificating about his vague and glorious plan for the future?

He hoped it was the latter. He didn't want to dwell on the implications of the former.

Painfully, carefully, he dragged himself to his feet, trying not to stagger too obviously as they were all dismissed. He couldn't show weakness here, not if he wanted to survive. Putting all his remaining strength into his thoughts of home, he apparated away, falling to his knees over the ward boundary of Seren Du.

"Oh, Master Severus!" Ceri gasped, and his vision was a blur as a small hand gripped him by the arm, the strange feeling of elf transportation overtaking him, sending another wave of aftershocks through his body.

"Fuck! Severus." That was Remus, and Severus recoiled from the familiar touch — he couldn't, he was filthy, he was a murderer, Remus shouldn't touch him. "Ceri, get the Nerve Tonic, highest strength." A moment, and then a vial was pressed against his lips. Severus swallowed clumsily, the potion instantly burning the pain and the trembling from his limbs. His heart rate began to return to normal. His fogged vision cleared. Remus' handsome face came into focus barely a foot away from him, those amber eyes full of worry and love so plainly it made Severus ache. "What happened?"

"Muggle hunting," Severus croaked out, keeping the contents of his stomach within him only through sheer force of will. "He thought I needed a reward for having to put up with the students and Dumbledore. He was not pleased with my performance — apparently I have lost my touch."

Remus' face twisted in fury, and for a moment Severus' heart stopped as he thought it might be directed at him. Then those features softened — not pity, never pity, but something close enough to make Severus' heart clench. "Come on, love. Let's get you out of those robes, into a nice hot bath. Can you stand? Can— can I help you up?"

Severus flinched. "I have killed four muggles tonight," he said flatly. "Two of them children."

Remus flinched too, a small movement he couldn't hide from Severus' keen eyes. "I'm sure you gave them a cleaner death than anyone else would have allowed them," he replied all the same, not a trace of doubt in him.

What had Severus done, to deserve such stalwart loyalty?

“Come here,” the werewolf urged, voice cracking — heart breaking, much like Severus’, much like it always did on nights like this. Over and over again, an endless cycle, one the foolish wolf wouldn’t remove himself from no matter how often Severus begged him to leave, insisted he deserved better.

Severus was too tired to be that noble, right now. He collapsed into Remus’ waiting arms, shoulders shaking with silent sobs. Remus held him, cried with him, eased him up the stairs and out of his robes and into the bath. He didn’t judge Severus’ murderous hands; just held them lovingly, kissed his palms, murmured his devotion and his understanding and his assurances that he would always be there to pick up Severus’ shattered self. He didn’t promise it would never happen again. That was a promise none of them could make.

Seven months. Seven months until Harry turned seventeen, until it could finally be over, one way or another.

He could cope with seven more months of this.

As long as he had Remus, he could cope with far worse.

.-.-.-.

T’was the night before Christmas, and all through the house, not a creature was stirring — except Sirius, padding barefoot down the stairs in search of his wayward partner. Everyone had gone to bed; though with the strength of the Silencing charm on Harry’s room, Sirius knew better than to expect everyone was sleeping. He had gone up to shower, fully expecting his gorgeous boyfriend to be waiting on the bed for some antics behind a Silencing charm of their own, only to find their room empty.

Charlie had been quieter, lately. He was trying to hide it, but Sirius could tell.

He found the dragon tamer in the kitchen, a mug of tea cradled in his large hands. He looked up at Sirius’ entrance, face turning sheepish. “Hey. I was on my way up, I just...” He trailed off, shaking his head, smiling lopsidedly. “Never mind.”

Sirius snorted, glad they weren’t going to bother with the feeble excuses. He shuffled forward, perching on the edge of the table beside the shorter man, pressing their shoulders together. “Talk to me.”

Charlie sighed, his head tilting to lean against Sirius’. “I... when I lived in Romania, I knew I’d miss family Christmas most years. I was single, no kids — I was the natural choice to stay on the Reserve over the holidays. It didn’t bother me. But... I’m not in Romania any more. I can’t kid myself into thinking I’m missing family Christmas because I can’t get there — I wasn’t invited, my own bloody mother doesn’t want me there, I—“ He broke off, breath hitching, and Sirius’ whole chest ached for him. He turned, worming an arm around Charlie’s back, kissing his temple.

“I’m sorry, love. This is my fault—“

“Don’t even start,” Charlie interrupted stubbornly. “The only thing you ever did was love me, and don’t you dare apologise for that. This is on her. She’s had it out for you long before we got together — whatever she thinks she is to Harry, you threatened that, and she hates you for it. And part of me hates her for that, a bit. For stealing from him, for lying to that poor kid who just wanted to be loved. For treating you like shit. When I was younger, I always thought my mum was perfect.” He gave a bitter snort. “I know better, now. I... I love you, Sirius, and I love being here with you. I’m honoured to be involved in your Yule celebrations — you’ve made me part of your family, and that’s amazing. I’m not saying I don’t want to be here, but I —”

“You miss your family,” Sirius finished for him. “Fuck, Charlie, of course you do! Your relationship with your mother might be difficult, but you’ve still got your dad, and the rest of your siblings. Even if Ron is a little berk.” Charlie snickered tearfully. “I wish I knew how to make it all better, love,” Sirius murmured, running a hand through Charlie’s hair, tucking the man’s head under his chin. Sometimes he felt ancient compared to his boyfriend — but this wasn’t even about age. This was just Sirius’ own years of experience having his parents hate him. He’d pretended it didn’t bother him, as a kid, but James had always seen through that bullshit in a heartbeat.

He couldn’t imagine what it was like to be Charlie, to have grown up in a loving family and only now have it fall apart as an adult.

“Things will get better,” he promised. “Once the war’s over.” Once they stopped having to live in Seren Du for their own safety. Once Dumbledore was gone and Molly could be forced to confront the consequences of her own actions. “I can’t promise your mother will come around. But when it’s all over, at least you’ll have the rest of your family with you.” He kissed Charlie’s fiery hair. “We’ll have Yule at the Pottery next year. Invite all your siblings over for dinner.” It would be chaos, and they would love every second of it.

“That would be nice,” Charlie agreed softly. “I... I know things will be different. We’re all getting older. Bill will be married next year, and even the kids are pairing off like nobody’s business. Soon we’ll all be alternating family holidays and starting our own traditions and we might not even bother doing the big family thing at the Burrow anymore. But this year...” He sighed, and Sirius held him tighter.

This year he was missing it not because he was busy, or there were other plans, but because Molly didn’t want to see him as long as he was still with Sirius. Sirius couldn’t help the guilt that pooled within him, but he ignored it; he’d done his time convincing Charlie not to get involved with him. It was too late to try again. He was in far too deep, now.

“Think of this year as a fresh start,” he offered, nudging the younger man up to look him in the eye. “Starting our own traditions, like you said. It’s the first Christmas me and Harry are having here. First Yule I’ve had since Jamie died. First one Moony and Severus have actually been able to spend together in I don’t even know how long. And the less said about the Malfoys’ Yule traditions, the better.” He kissed Charlie’s cheek, then his lips, soft and tender. “I’m not trying to replace your family. Next year we’ll have a home where all your siblings will be welcome, and your dad too.” He’d make no promises about Molly. “And if you want to go see them tomorrow, you're more than welcome to. But if it helps any, think of this as the beginning of our family, rather than missing out on yours."

He wasn't sure if that was even remotely helpful, but he couldn't think of anything else to say. He personally was overjoyed at how the Yule period had been going so far, but he knew it wasn't that simple for Charlie. He hadn't felt as much heartache through their Yule dinner and rituals on the solstice — the Weasleys hadn't celebrated Yule in generations, now — but with the newness past, and Christmas coming in the morning... the redhead was clearly starting to feel the separation.

Slowly, a smile crept over that gorgeous face. The dimples didn't show, but it was much better than the sadness that had been in his eyes a moment ago. "The beginning of our family," he repeated. The words made Sirius' heart stutter in a way it hadn't when they'd been in his own mouth. Our family. "I like the sound of that."

When Charlie leaned in to kiss him, Sirius melted into it, their tongues twining lazily. "I love you so much," Charlie breathed, sending warmth all the way to the tips of Sirius' toes.

"Let's go to bed," Sirius suggested, smiling slightly. "Before Ceri comes down to scold us for sitting on tables."

Charlie snickered, hopping down and tugging Sirius with him, setting his cold mug of tea aside. The house elf was giving them privacy, bless her, but Sirius didn't want to push their luck. She had a lot of food to prep for tomorrow, after all.

He tangled his fingers in Charlie's, leading the way to the stairs, his thoughts now no steamier than just cuddling the hell out of his love until they fell asleep.

He couldn't do anything about Molly, but he could make sure Charlie had the best Christmas possible regardless.

.-.-.

Waking up on Christmas morning at Seren Du wasn't the same as at Hogwarts, or even the Weasleys' — there was no pile of presents at the end of his bed. Those were all under the tree, in the living room.

But there was a warm Draco curled tight around him, which in Harry's opinion was far better than any present.

He ran a hand through blond hair, gently nudging Draco awake. "Hey, sleepy," he teased. "Get up, it's Christmas."

Grey eyes blinked hazily, and Harry couldn't resist the urge to kiss those softly pouting lips. "Good morning."

"What time is it?" Draco asked suspiciously, and Harry chuckled.

"Half seven. Not too obscene, I promise." Harry was definitely more of an early riser than Draco; the Slytherin would sleep til noon most days of the holidays if they let him.

Draco groaned anyway, burrowing his face in Harry's neck. Harry laughed, rolling them over to pin Draco to the mattress playfully. "Come on, it's Christmas!" he wheedled. "The sooner we get up, the sooner there's presents!"

That perked Draco up a little bit. "Only once everyone else is up," he pointed out. "No one is allowed to touch their presents until Mother has had her coffee."

Considering Sirius' childhood festivities had been almost as depressing as Harry's, they were modelling their new family traditions on the Malfoy household's way of celebrating the winter season — namely, celebrating both Yule and Christmas. According to Sirius and Remus, the Potters had done something similar; the solstice held the burning of the Yule Log, the traditional dinner of roast boar, the midnight ritual to strengthen magic on the Longest Night and ask for blessings to help them through the deepest part of winter. Then, Christmas Day would hold gift-giving and another big dinner, in the traditions Harry was more familiar with.

As far as he was concerned, it meant double the celebrations, so Harry was more than happy to adopt this form of holiday cheer. The Yule ritual had been a real eye-opener; his magic still felt like it was buzzing a little, even now.

There was a loud knock on the door, startling both boys. "I hope you're decent!" was all the warning Sirius gave them before opening the door, and Harry laughed — if they weren't, the dog animagus would have never made it through Harry's wards and both of them knew it. "Merry Christmas, boys!"

"Merry Christmas, Sirius," Harry chirped brightly, rolling off Draco and dragging himself into a sitting position. Draco just buried his face in Harry's hip, making them both laugh.

"Come on, kiddo," Sirius teased, playfully yanking Draco's leg beneath the duvet. "Ceri's got breakfast going and coffee brewing."

"Fine, fine, I'm getting up," Draco relented, yawning.

"I expect you both down in ten minutes, alright?" Sirius instructed, grinning devilishly. "Don't get distracted."

Harry tossed a pillow at him, sending the laughing man from the room.

With the promise of delicious food and presents, they didn't linger in bed, putting dressing gowns on over their pyjamas. Apparently Lucius Malfoy had been insistent that everyone be fully dressed for Christmas breakfast, and that was one aspect of the tradition the remaining Malfoys were happy to throw out the window.

The kitchen was full when they reached it, the air full of incredible smells. Sure enough, Narcissa had a mug of strong coffee cradled in her hands, looking unfairly elegant in a silver velvet dressing gown over her blue silk pyjamas. It was something in the Black genes, Harry decided — even Sirius, hair loose and wearing a grey t-shirt and red plaid pyjama bottoms, looked the kind of attractively dishevelled that Harry would never be able to accomplish.

Season's greetings were exchanged, and the congregation was moved to the living room, where the staggering pile of presents beneath the elaborately decorated Christmas tree awaited. Sirius and Narcissa had gone all out — the two of them left unsupervised were a dangerously competent team.

"Go on, boys," Narcissa prompted, smiling indulgently and gesturing to the tree. Harry and Draco didn't need telling twice — they hurried to kneel by the pile, levitating presents to their recipients.

The next half hour was a riot of wrapping paper and sounds of delight. Harry goggled at his own pile of presents; books and clothes and sweets and all sorts of things he'd never even anticipated. "One of these days you're going to run out of things to buy me," he told his godfathers laughingly, opening another box from the pair of them, this one containing an Astronomy globe — a device that would project the stars of any given day up on the walls of the room he put it in. Sirius would never let him live down that E in Astronomy!

"Not possible," Sirius assured him, beaming. "We'll just have to get more creative as you get older."

Harry almost made a joke about Sirius soon having his own kids to spoil rotten instead of Harry, but he held his tongue — he knew Charlie was a bit sensitive on the subject of family these days, and he didn't want to put his foot in it.

He saw Draco open a patchwork quilt from Andromeda much like the one she'd made for Harry himself, except this one was in shades of green rather than black and grey. "Oh, good, I can have my blanket back now," he teased, kissing the blond's cheek. Ever since Harry had brought it to Draco when he was unwell, it had stayed in the blond's dormitory. Harry didn't really mind, glad it could bring some comfort to his boyfriend.

Suddenly, Remus let out a loud gale of laughter, and all of them turned to see Snape holding a wooden sign on a ribbon — 'Brewing in Progress; intruders will be diced and used as ingredients'. There was even a little cartoon cauldron beneath it, with a human leg sticking out of it.

"Where the hell did Tonks find that?" Remus crowed delightedly. Snape wasn't nearly so impressed, though Harry thought he could see a flicker of amusement in those dark eyes.

"I bet Ted made it," Sirius offered, grinning. "He does all kinds of woodwork and stuff."

"Perhaps this will mean I actually get some privacy in this house," Snape drawled, making Narcissa scoff.

"There is only one person in this house who dares interrupt your brewing without good reason, and I would like to see you turn him into ingredients." Her gaze landed pointedly on Remus, and a pale flush rose on Snape's cheeks.

"Not many potions call for werewolf parts," Remus assured cheerfully, winking.

As the piles of unwrapped gifts grew higher and the shreds of wrapping paper began to take over the remaining floor space, Sirius set a record of muggle Christmas songs on the player, declaring it was time for eggnog.

Apparently even in the Black family traditions it was standard to start getting drunk before noon.

Harry looked over his own pile, feeling a small pang in his chest at one glaring absence. He glanced over at Charlie — he, too, was missing the annual Weasley jumper. The redhead caught Harry's eye, blue gaze turning knowing, smile tightening at the corners. Getting to his feet, Harry moved to claim Sirius' vacated seat beside the redhead, squeezing him around the waist. "I'm sorry."

Charlie's huge arm slung across Harry's shoulders. "Not your fault, kid," he insisted. "She'll come around." He gave a short, somewhat hollow laugh. "Merlin, she sent a jumper to Percy even when he told the whole damn family to go fuck themselves in favour of the Ministry. Nice to know where we stand, eh?" He ruffled Harry's hair, then stood up. "Don't worry about it, Harry. No need to let her being petty ruin our day, yeah?"

As the dragon tamer wandered over to assist Sirius in pouring eggnog, tugging him into a playful dance as soon as he was done, Harry smiled to himself. Charlie was right — there was way too much happiness around him to let Mrs Weasley spoil it. He was spending Christmas with Draco — more importantly, Draco and Narcissa didn't have to spend it with Lucius and a bunch of Death Eaters. Remus and Snape could spend the whole day together, and he could be with them and Sirius. The Tonks' would be over for dinner later. And he'd see his friends and the rest of the Weasleys he cared about at New Year's.

He laughed as Sirius dipped Charlie exaggeratedly, both of them almost spilling their eggnog.

They'd never have everyone with them for Christmas, not the way their family had grown. But this was a damn good start.

.-.-.-

Dinner itself, starting at precisely one in the afternoon under Ceri's keen eye, was a loud and cheerful affair. Different to a Weasley Christmas dinner, but no less full of love and laughter. Especially not with Tonks at the table — there was no way Charlie could get properly maudlin with his best friend sat beside him, making far too many jokes and almost spilling the entire gravy boat over herself.

By the end of it, his belly was full to bursting and his heart was the same, a wide grin on his face as he watched Harry try and trap Remus and Severus under enchanted mistletoe.

"You're gonna end up with detentions if you're not careful," Tonks teased, making Harry snort.

"I already have regular detentions with him," he pointed out.

“You have training sessions disguised as detentions,” Snape cut in, setting fire to the mistletoe with a wave of his wand. “I can always change them to actual detentions, since you clearly miss them so much. There are plenty of cauldrons that need scrubbing, even though I no longer teach the subject.”

Harry grimaced, hurriedly setting his hands in his lap. Across the room, Remus snickered.

When the Tonks family started making noises about leaving, Charlie sidled over to Sirius, kissing his partner’s cheek. “I’m going out for a bit,” he warned. Sirius’ grey eyes turned knowing.

“Want someone to come with you?”

Charlie knew that if he asked, Sirius would join him. Even if that would be a total disaster. Hell, any of them would join him; Tonks, Remus, even Narcissa would happily stand at his shoulder while he went to face his mother. But he couldn’t ask that of them.

“Nah, think it’s best if I go alone. I won’t be long.”

The dog animagus frowned slightly, but nodded, kissing him chastely. “Send a Patronus if you need me. Give the family my love.”

“Will do.”

He stayed long enough to see off their guests, then slipped away while the kids were cajoling Narcissa into a game of Bluff. It was brisk outside compared to the warmth within, and his shoulders hunched as he walked to the wardline, his heart beating a staccato in his chest.

He never thought he’d feel this anxious about going to his own family home.

Charlie apparated away, arriving at the gate of the Burrow. He paused to stare up at it; the same lopsided structure he’d grown up in, as always looking like a strong wind might knock it all down.

Home.

Was it home, now?

Even when he’d lived in Romania, the Burrow had been home. But this last year... When he thought of home, he thought of family, yes. But he thought mostly of grey eyes and a bark-like laugh, of the welcome he got whenever he stepped through the doors of Seren Du.

His stomach churned. But he wasn’t a Gryffindor for nothing. He’d faced dragons, he could handle his mother.

He started walking towards the house, and knocked on the front door.

Charlie could hear the bustle of the whole family on the other side of the door — his mother calling for someone to answer it, then yelling at the twins to stop whatever it was they were doing. Ginny laughing.

The door opened, and Charlie found himself face to face with his father, who practically crumpled in relief at the sight of him. “Oh, Charlie,” he sighed, wrapping his second eldest son in a crushing hug. It took everything Charlie had not to break down in tears right there. “I hoped you’d stop by.”

“I... I wasn’t sure if I should,” Charlie admitted. “Didn’t know if I’d be welcome. I— Mum didn’t send a jumper.”

Heartbreak flashed across Arthur Weasley’s face. “My boy,” he murmured, patting Charlie’s cheek. “Your mother is... upset. But you will always be welcome in this house, you hear me? No matter what.” His gaze turned pointed. “As will Sirius Black.”

Charlie grimaced. “Don’t know about that,” he muttered, imagining how that might go down.

“Arthur! Who is it?” came the call from inside the house. Arthur looked back at his son.

“Are you coming in? Everyone will be pleased to see you.”

Charlie loved his dad, right then, for phrasing it like a question — for giving him one last chance to turn around and avoid the fallout. He almost took it.

“I’ve come this far,” he said instead, and his dad smiled, stepping back to let him inside.

“We have a visitor, Molly!” he replied, and Charlie heard the frantic scramble within as they all tried to guess who it might be.

He followed his dad through to the kitchen, stopping in the threshold, hands clenched tight at his sides.

The family was just at the tail end of their own Christmas dinner, a mostly-eaten Christmas pudding at the centre of the table. Charlie felt like he was having an out-of-body experience, looking in at his siblings all sat around the table without him. The only break in the sea of red hair was Hermione at Ron’s side, and Fleur, tucked under Bill’s arm, the couple staring at him wide-eyed.

Stood at the sink, Molly froze.

“Hi, everyone,” Charlie greeted awkwardly. “Uh. Merry Christmas. Thought I’d just... pop in.”

“Charlie!” Ginny was the one to break the tension, jumping to her feet and launching herself at her favourite brother. Charlie hugged her close, nose pressed to her strawberry-scented hair. Merlin, he’d missed her.

That was the trigger for the rest to follow — the twins hugged him, delighting in reminding him they were now taller than him. Bill ruffled his hair like he was twelve again, kissing his temple. “Good to see you, Char,” he murmured softly. Fleur hugged him, too, kissing both his cheeks and thanking him for the bracelet he’d sent her. Even Ron clapped him on the shoulder, looking uncomfortable.

Through it all, his mother didn't move.

"I would've thought you'd have other places to be today," she said tersely, once things had quieted down and Charlie had let himself be talked into a small slice of pudding. He winced.

"I wanted to see everyone. But I can leave, if you'd prefer."

"No one is leaving," Arthur cut in firmly, his hand on Charlie's arm. "We're delighted to have you here, as long as you're willing to stay."

Molly's lips thinned, but she didn't argue.

Charlie wasn't sure what he'd expected, honestly. For her to scream the house down? For her to pull out a jumper and say how sorry she was?

He forced his gaze away, smiling at his siblings instead. "Harry and everyone send their love," he told them. "And he loves the pranks you sent him," he added to the twins, who smirked. "I don't know if the rest of us are quite so grateful, mind."

"It's market research!" Fred insisted cheerfully.

"We can always give you something to get back at him with?" suggested George.

"I'll keep that in mind." Charlie wasn't sure more pranks was the solution to that particular problem.

"I suppose you're staying with the Malfoys, then?" his mum piped up. "We've all heard the news. If you're with him, you must be with them."

"You can say his name, you know, Mum," Charlie retorted. "But yes, Sirius and I are spending the holidays with the Malfoys. And Harry and Remus, of course." They didn't need to know that they weren't doing so at Malfoy Manor.

"Well Sirius ought to be careful about the kind of people he's letting influence poor Harry," Molly replied in the same tone.

"If you're about to start in on Slytherins, Mum," George warned, and she huffed.

"So it's silly of me to be suspicious of people who have spent the last few decades supporting You-Know-Who, is it?" she argued. "People who have made a point of tearing down our family at every chance they got!"

"That was only ever Lucius," Charlie defended.

"That's a lie; Malfoy had it out for us since we started school!" Ron said hotly. "I don't know what he's got over Harry but he's always been a git!"

"He was eleven, Ron," Ginny sniped. "He's grown up since then, which is more than I can say for you!"

“Now, Charlie, you can’t tell me you think it’s normal, how quickly Harry has gone from practically being part of our family to refusing to talk to Ron! He was so rude to me last year when we were all at Headquarters — he’s ignoring Professor Dumbledore, even! I can’t be the only one who’s concerned about his behaviour; his friendship with the Malfoy boy can’t mean anything good!”

“He was rude because he knows you stole from him, Mum!” Charlie blurted furiously. Silence fell abruptly. Charlie’s eyes widened in horror, Bill and the twins mirroring his expression, while the rest just looked confused.

“What?” Arthur spluttered, bewildered. “Charlie, what do you mean?”

He shouldn’t have said anything, but it was too late to take it back now. “Dumbledore gave Mum Harry’s vault key every summer, and she stole money from his account. Multiple times,” he confessed, staring his mother down. “He found out about it ages ago. He didn’t want you to know that he knew — didn’t want to cause trouble in the family. But I can’t sit there and listen to you talk about how concerned you are about him when you were perfectly happy to steal from a twelve year-old who thought the world of you!”

“What does it matter if Mum took a bit of money?” Ron scoffed, rolling his eyes. “He’s loaded, it’s not like he’d miss it.”

“That’s not the point, Ron!” Charlie snapped. “I’m sure if anyone had asked, Harry would have given you all the money you needed! He’s that kind of person. But to take from him without so much as a word, to pretend to welcome him into the family just to get access to him...” He shook his head, disgusted.

“Molly,” Arthur started, eyes narrowing. “Is this true?”

“I— it was just the money for his school things! And a bit extra — we had an extra mouth to feed, after all. I didn’t think he’d mind. Albus said it would be fine.”

“Almost two hundred galleons,” Bill said suddenly, drawing everyone’s attention. “Between Harry starting school and getting the security changed on his vault.”

Molly’s face reddened. Arthur stared at his eldest son. “You knew about this, too?”

“Harry told us not to tell you,” Bill replied. “He wasn’t sure if you knew — and if you didn’t, he didn’t want to cause problems, like Charlie said.”

“I never should have brought it up,” Charlie said. He was going to have some serious apologising to do when he got back home. “It wasn’t mine to share. But I just — you get so bloody high and mighty, Mum. Like you’re the only person who could possibly have Harry’s best interests at heart — you hated Sirius even before we got together because having him around meant that Harry might not need you as much anymore. And knowing what I know, I can’t be sure if that hate comes from a genuine care for Harry, or just because you’re mad at losing access to the Boy-Who-Lived and everything that comes with it. And that doesn’t even touch on how shitty you’ve been about my relationship — about all our relationships. Bloody hell, Mum; Ginny is going out with Neville Longbottom and you're still mad about it!" He ran a hand through his hair, shaking his head incredulously.

"I'm sorry, I didn't mean to burst in here and derail Christmas," he said, grimacing. "But I'm done with letting you pretend you care so much about Harry's wellbeing when really you only care about what Dumbledore's told you."

"There's more to that boy than you realise, Charlie," his mother warned him, voice shaking. "You'll get hurt, if you're not careful."

"I think I know Harry a hell of a lot better than you do, Mum," he retorted.

"So you know he's got You-Know-Who in his head, then?" Ron sneered. "Or has he turned you, as well?"

Charlie just shook his head sadly. "Harry hasn't turned, and neither have I," he said simply. "And maybe one day, Ron, you'll grow up enough to understand what real friendship is. It sure as hell isn't reporting your friend's every bloody move to people like Dumbledore." In the chair next to Ron, Hermione let out a tiny gasp — had she really thought Harry wouldn't figure it out?

Charlie turned away, squeezing his dad's shoulder. "I'm sorry, Dad. I'll go."

"I'll walk you out."

He didn't say goodbye to the rest — he'd see them soon enough, anyway. So he let his father walk him back to the door, the man looking decades older than he had when Charlie first showed up. "I— how long have you known?" Arthur asked, voice cracking. "About your mother?"

"Harry told me when I saw him before the first task of the Triwizard," Charlie replied honestly. Arthur sucked in a sharp breath.

"You should have come to me, son."

"I couldn't. Harry couldn't. If Dumbledore found out that he knew..." Harry had been far too vulnerable for the truth to come out back then.

His father looked grim. "I've been putting my trust in the wrong man for far too long, haven't I?" he realised. Charlie nodded.

"If it helps, so has everyone else," he said, shrugging. "He's very good at being trustworthy." Charlie had trusted him, too, until Harry showed him the truth.

Arthur gripped Charlie's hand tight for a moment. "Will you give Harry a message for me?" he pleaded, and Charlie nodded. "Tell him... tell him I had no idea, about any of it. I'm so sorry for any harm my family may have done him. If he wants recompense—"

"He doesn't," Charlie assured quickly, knowing his dad didn't have that kind of money, but he'd give it up regardless if Harry asked. "He doesn't care about the money, not really. It's the lies that hit the hardest.” The money was pocket change for Harry. The broken trust was not.

“Right. Then… tell him I’m sorry, and I will deal with Molly, and I love him. He’s still family, no matter what.” Arthur’s blue eyes softened behind his glasses. “You’re still family, Charlie. Albus Dumbledore can go hang — nothing will get between a Weasley and his kids.”

Charlie grinned, pulling his dad into a tight hug, a few tears sneaking from his eyes. “I love you, Dad,” he murmured. He felt lips press to his hair, arms squeezing around him.

“I love you too, son. Always will.” When he pulled back, Arthur was grinning. “And between you and me, I think Sirius is brilliant, and I’m delighted you two have found happiness together. I always thought about writing to him, but I didn’t want to upset Molly.”

That was his father’s only flaw — not wanting to upset his wife. Maybe now he might realise what he stood to lose by standing by her like that.

“You should. Write, that is. To Sirius. And to Harry. He’d like to hear from you.” Harry had never said it, but Charlie could tell how terrified the kid was that Arthur knew about his wife’s duplicity, that he supported it. Harry was so quick to believe that anyone who appeared to care for him had an ulterior motive.

With his track record, Charlie couldn’t blame him.

“I’ll do that, then,” Arthur assured with a decisive nod. “Don’t be a stranger, Charlie. Even if you need me to meet you somewhere. I’m only an owl away.”

“I’ll remember that. See you, Dad.”

With one last squeeze to the shoulder, Arthur let his son go, and Charlie trudged back out to the edge of the wards.

He couldn’t go home yet. Not after that. He couldn’t disrupt two family Christmases with that sort of drama.

An idea sparked in his mind — there was one other sibling missing from the Weasley family table. One sibling who was probably working on something, but would be happy to let him sit and bitch about their fucked up family.

He was going to visit Percy.

.-.-.-.

Draco’s fingers were running through Harry’s hair, and Harry was hard pressed not to fall asleep from the sensation.

This had definitely been the best Christmas he could ever remember having. Not that he had that many to compare it to, but even so.

They were all sprawled out in various parts of the living room, now; full of food and good cheer and — in some cases — significant amounts of alcohol. Even when Charlie had disappeared for three hours and come back quite a bit drunker than he'd left, confessing to letting the cat out of the bag with his mum and passing on an apologetic message from Arthur Weasley, that wasn't enough to bring Harry's mood down. It was bound to come up eventually, and he didn't really care if Dumbledore figured out he knew the truth about that — he was so close to getting rid of Voldemort he didn't really need the old man to think Harry was oblivious to his inheritance, to the blocks on his magic.

Maybe he'd care a bit more in the morning, when he wasn't quite so tired and blissed out from Christmas, but that was a problem for the future. Right now the only thing he cared about was Draco's hand in his hair, his head in the blond's lap.

He might have laughed, had he seen that on the other sofa, Remus and Snape were in almost the exact same position as he and Draco, the werewolf dozing as Snape's fingers scratched gently at his scalp, a book in the Potions Master's free hand.

"I think I'm going to call it a night," Narcissa sighed, getting to her feet with a graceful stretch. "It's late, and I'm not as young as I used to be."

Several people in the room snorted. "You're young enough that that excuse is bullshit," Sirius told her playfully. "But go on, go to bed. You might have the right idea, to be honest; we leave it much longer and we'll be carrying the boys to their rooms."

"I'm awake," Harry insisted sleepily, eyes still closed. He felt more than heard Draco's chuckle.

"Only barely, by the look of you," Narcissa remarked. There was a shuffling of fabric, and Harry cracked an eye open long enough to see the blonde woman lean down to kiss her son's forehead, then pat Harry's cheek gently. "Goodnight, darlings."

"Goodnight, Mother."

"G'night, Cissa," Harry murmured, smiling slightly.

She left, and Sirius let out a big sigh. "Come on then, you lot. Everyone to bed. Too many damn good mattresses in this place for us all to be sleeping on sofas."

"Now who's not as young as they used to be," Draco teased, yelping at the very weak Tickling charm that earned him. "Rude."

"My godson's a terrible influence on you," Sirius declared. "You never used to be such a mouthy little git."

Harry snorted. "That's what you think. Ow!" Draco poked him in the ribs, jerking him out of his pleasantly sleepy state. "Please, you know I love you because you're a mouthy little git, not in spite of it."

Draco jostled his leg pointedly until Harry dragged himself upright, his glasses crooked on his face. The blond's expression turned fond, his hand reaching out to straighten them, fingers brushing affectionately across Harry's cheek.

It was such an innocent gesture, something he'd done a hundred times before, but for some reason this time it made Harry's breath catch in his throat. Stunned, it took a moment to gather himself — luckily, Draco thought he was just tired.

"You go up," Harry murmured, kissing him softly. "I'll help Pads tidy up in here, meet you in a bit."

The Slytherin cocked his head with a curious expression — they both knew Ceri would clean up once they'd all gone to bed. Then he just shook his head. "Okay. Don't blame me if I'm asleep when you get there." As if to make his point, he yawned, and Harry chuckled.

Remus and Snape bid them goodnight, making their own sleepy way out of the room, and Harry took the record off the player, setting it carefully back in its sleeve.

"What's up, kiddo?" Sirius appeared at his shoulder, voice low, eyes concerned. Harry glanced around — Charlie was nowhere to be seen, either. Evidently Harry was not as subtle as he thought he was.

No matter. They all probably just thought he wanted a quiet moment with his godfather on Christmas. Which wasn't untrue, but...

Harry leaned back against Sirius, looking up at him. "I was wondering... would it be safe for us to take a trip to Gringotts, sometime before I go back to school?" he asked, watching the confusion flicker across his godfather's face. "Just me and you," he clarified.

"I... I don't see why not, yeah. We'd have to time it right, but— it's certainly doable." Sirius frowned, one hand coming to rest in Harry's hair, ruffling it lightly. "Anything in particular you wanted to look at? I—" His expression faltered. "I know things have been a bit of a jumble of everyone's family stuff while we're figuring out how to do the holidays now. If you wanted more Potter stuff involved — there's a Hindu celebration they used to do, but it's in mid-January, so you'll be back at school by then."

"No, no, it's not that," Harry assured. Though he made a mental note to come back to that Hindu celebration thing. "I did want to go to the Potter vault. But it's not about the holidays — this has all been brilliant, honestly." He bundled up the nerves coiling in his belly, along with the words he hadn't even known he'd been bottling up for so long until just now. "I— it's not that I don't want Remus there. Because I really do, he means as much to me as you do, but I don't want to make him keep secrets from Severus, not about this, it's not fair on him—" Harry saw the glint of amusement enter Sirius' eyes, the one that said he was rambling and the older man found it adorable. "I wanted to look at the jewellery. In the Potter vault," he blurted.

The amusement faded, replaced by shock. "Oh. Oh." Grey eyes widened. "Are you sure, pup? There's no rush for it." He snorted quietly. "I don't think he's gonna change his mind any time soon."

Harry's cheeks burned. "I know. And I'm not saying I'll do it now, or even soon. But... I want to look." Now that he'd started thinking about it he couldn't stop — though really, if he was being completely honest, he'd been thinking about it ever since his birthday party, seeing that ring on Oliver's finger and how happy it made him and Cassius both. Thinking how perfect Draco's narrow fingers would look with a band of silver there.

He fully expected Sirius to tell him they were far too young for all that, that he needed to shelve that thought for at least a couple of years. So he was surprised when the dog animagus pressed a kiss to his temple, humming quietly. "You know, pup — everything else, you're your mother's son, no doubt about it. But when it comes to romance? You're Jamie's boy, through and through." He chuckled. "You little sop."

Harry grinned. "So you'll take me?" he asked, hoping Sirius was as willing to indulge his romantic nature as he had been his father's.

"Alright, then," Sirius agreed. "I'll figure out a good time to sneak off and let you know. And I won't tell anyone. Not even Moony," he promised, winking.

"I— really?"

"Like I said, I don't think he's gonna change his mind any time soon," Sirius repeated with a smirk. He nudged Harry's shoulder, urging him in the direction of the door. "Go on, go snuggle up with your boy. Dream about putting a ring on his finger next Christmas," he teased, making Harry's blush brighten.

"Only if you do the same," he challenged. Sirius faltered, then laughed, his gaze getting a little wistful.

"Y'know what, I just might," he retorted, sticking his tongue out. "Sweet dreams, pup. Love you."

"Love you, too." Harry rocked up on his toes, pressing a kiss to Sirius' stubbled cheek, then left the room, heading for his bedroom.

Maybe he would have those dreams. If he did, it certainly wouldn't be the first time.

Chapter 93

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

On New Year's Eve, all those in Harry's trusted circle who weren't staying at the castle for the holidays made their way to Longbottom Manor, which was decorated as elegantly as one might expect from Augusta Longbottom.

Harry bowed to the elderly woman, then offered up the bottle of sherry he'd brought with him. "Happy holidays," he greeted. "Thank you for inviting us into your home."

"Your family is always welcome with mine, Heir Potter," she assured, a hint of a smile on her stern face. "Posy will show you to the parlour." At her word, a house elf appeared at her side, smiling bright up at Harry and his family.

"Guests be following Posy, please," she chirped, leading the way.

Harry was much less anxious on this visit to Longbottom Manor — unlike his birthday party, people weren't here specifically to see him. Also, he wasn't going to be psyching himself out about having sex with Draco this time. That ship had well and truly sailed, many times over.

So he was relaxed as he followed the house elf to the parlour, which was already full of people, a second house elf fluttering around with a tray of drinks.

"Harry!" Neville strode over, grinning. "Good to see you, mate." He glanced back at the rest of the group. "No Professor Lupin tonight?"

"Too close to the moon," Sirius explained. "But he sends his regards."

Harry rather thought it was less about the full moon the night before and more about wanting to ring in the new year with Snape, but he wasn't going to say anything.

Off to the side, Harry saw Amelia Bones stood with a glass of water in hand, and he waved to her, heading over. "I'm glad to see you back on your feet," he said by way of greeting.

"Thank you. I'm fully recovered, thanks to Augusta's friend. And, so I'm told, the efforts of Severus Snape." Her eyes narrowed expectantly, and Harry shrugged.

"There's little I can say without giving away what isn't mine to share," he told her. "But I trust Professor Snape with my life."

"Good to know," she replied. "Now, I won't take up your whole evening talking business; that would be far too rude of both of us." She chuckled. "Go, spend time with your friends."

Harry grinned at her, obligingly heading to greet the rest of his friends, wondering how many more would make it. To his surprise, Percy Weasley was there, chatting with Bill and Fleur. "Hi, Percy. Wasn't expecting to see you here."

"I've been helping Madam Bones," he explained, fiddling anxiously with his glasses. "Going through paperwork to make sure everything can be processed properly once the Ministry is accessible again. She, ah, invited me along."

"And then she told me so I could make sure he actually came," Bill joked, ruffling Harry's hair in greeting. "Wasn't going to let him spend New Year's alone in his flat."

Percy blushed.

"We've got all the Weasleys together again!" Fred declared, appearing out of nowhere on Harry's left, while George popped up on his right. "Well, all the good ones, anyway."

"Except Dad. Couldn't sneak him out," George added. "Mum's been on a bit of a warpath since Charlie dropped the bomb at Christmas."

Mr Weasley had written to Harry as promised, apologising endlessly for his wife's actions — and for Ron's, as evidently Bill and the twins had explained to the man that his son had been spying on Harry for Dumbledore. Harry didn't blame him; he was so busy working to support his family, it was easily missed.

He wasn't sure how Dumbledore was going to take it all, but quite frankly at this point that was fairly low on Harry's list of worries. Lately everything Dumbledore did to try and get back at Harry only made the headmaster look more senile in the eyes of the students — students who would write back to their parents about how odd the headmaster was acting these days.

The crowd for the party wasn't quite as large as it had been for Harry's birthday, nor as energetic; they were all just here to spend some time together outside of the castle's oppressive atmosphere, be with their loved ones all together before they were separated once more. George and Blaise were practically attached at the hip, commiserating with Cassius and Oliver about how much it sucked to have one of them stuck in school while the other was graduated.

It was nice, catching up with people he hadn't seen in a while. The bubble of Seren Du was wonderful, but it could feel a little isolated after a while, when he was hardly able to leave. The last few years of having Christmas at Hogwarts or Grimmauld, he was used to the holiday involving all sorts of people stopping in.

And as much as he loved Draco, it was great to spend time with people his own age who weren't Draco.

And as midnight drew nearer, they moved out to the patio drenched in Warming charms, ready for the fireworks show the twins had put together. Harry bet they made a killing in fireworks this time of year.

He slipped his arm around Draco's waist, a glass of champagne in his other hand. "I've never had someone to kiss at midnight on New Year's before," he remarked, grinning — the one time they might have come close, in fourth year, there were far too many people around for them to sneak away and kiss as the clock struck twelve.

“Who says I’m going to kiss you?” Draco drawled, screwing up his nose.

“If you don’t, I’m sure someone around here will,” Harry retorted, making a show of surveying his options. Draco rolled his eyes, hand slipping into the back pocket of Harry’s jeans.

“No they wouldn’t. They know better than to throw their lot in with you,” he said, lips brushing Harry’s jaw. “I’m the only one foolish enough for that.”

“Everyone ready?” Sirius called suddenly, and the room went hushed. The dog animagus waved his wand, and suddenly a timer floated overhead, glowing gold numbers ticking down closer to midnight. Harry’s grip on Draco tightened.

“Ten! Nine! Eight!” They all shouted along with the countdown, which exploded into sparkles when it hit zero — Harry turned, sealing his mouth over Draco’s, champagne bubbles still on their tongues. Overhead, fireworks whizzed and crackled and banged, but half the audience weren’t even paying attention, too engrossed in each other. Harry let the kiss go on as long as he dared while still surrounded by his friends and family, then pulled back, green eyes meeting lust-hazed grey. “I love you,” he whispered, watching Draco smile in response. His first words of a brand new year.

“I love you,” came the reply, Draco’s arm holding him close. They tilted their heads up to watch the rest of the fireworks, faces lighting up in blues and greens and reds with every flash of colour in the sky.

When the show ended, they all cheered, and the twins stepped forward with overdramatic bows. “Here’s to 1997!” they cried, raising their glasses in unison. Everyone else copied the motion, toasting to a brand new year.

“And here’s to having the people we love here to share it with us,” Sirius added in a toast of his own, sending a fond smile Charlie’s way. They were all more than happy to toast to that.

Harry sipped his champagne, then raised his glass a third time, looking around his gathered friends. “Here’s to the end of the war,” he said, everyone falling silent. “It’s going to happen this year. One way or another, things will be over by this time next year. That’s a promise.”

It was a sea of solemn faces that raised their glasses in return. “To the end of the war,” they echoed, and they drank.

“Bold promise,” Draco murmured, once they were all headed back inside. “Sure you can keep it?”

“Absolutely,” Harry said confidently, grinning.

He turned seventeen in the summer, after all.

Voldemort wouldn’t last much longer than that.

.-.-.-.

Even though reading the Prophet was often an exercise in extreme restraint of one's temper, a copy still arrived at Seren Du every morning. On the morning of January second, the front page declared that Riots Against Ministry In Rochester had occurred the night before.

Riots against the Ministry meaning that people had actually defended themselves against Death Eaters. Harry furrowed his brow at the paper, reading what he could while Snape held it. "What's all that about?" he asked, gesturing to the article. Snape lowered the paper to peer at him, smirking.

"It seems the Dark Lord's minions met their match in their attempted raid last night," he drawled. "The public are teaching themselves to fight back."

"Tonks was telling me about that, at the Longbottoms'," Sirius piped up. "Said something about a bunch of just-graduated Hufflepuffs running a sort of defence tuition business. A pay-what-you-can type deal, all hush-hush of course. But they're going around teaching people the basics — Disarming, Stunning, snapping wands. Tonks said they're telling people you taught them everything they know," he added, glancing to Harry. "I meant to ask you about it, but I forgot. You know anything about it?"

"Hufflepuffs, Tonks said?" he clarified, gaining a nod. A slow grin crossed Harry's lips. "That'll be Patrick and the guys, then. Cho said they'd gone into business together on something. They're Cedric's dorm mates," he explained, smile faltering at the memory of his Hufflepuff friend. "They were in the HA last year. I guess I made a bit of an impression." He shook his head, amazed. "That's brilliant!" It was perfect — he'd often despaired in the HA about how many average magic users had no idea how to defend themselves in a fight. Clearly, the Hufflepuff boys had been listening.

He hoped they reached more people. He hoped they kept themselves safe.

"Doesn't take much to undo fifty years of shoddy Defence education," Remus remarked ruefully, giving Harry a grin.

"Maybe the Death Eaters will think twice about going after magical families if this is what they get from it." Of course, that just meant more attacks on muggles, but those were harder — even Voldemort didn't want to expose the magical world, so he had to be careful where he chose. If his options were so limited, he would struggle to do much real damage at all.

"Between those lads and the twins' Defence Range, maybe he will indeed," Sirius agreed.

They could only hope.

.-. .

The first few days of January flew by, and before Harry knew it they were facing their final day at Seren Du before heading back to Hogwarts. It was also the most horrendous weather outside, like nature itself understood Harry's feelings about returning to the castle.

There was another full family dinner planned for the evening as one last farewell, but until then the boys were mostly left to their own devices. And, with quidditch off the agenda, that left them with somewhat limited options. Not that they minded.

Harry lay flat on his back on the bed in Draco's room — a place they didn't often go, but if Sirius was going to be a pest he would likely check Harry's room first. So they'd set up decoy wards on that door and scurried away to Draco's, hands already tugging at clothes.

"What's the rush?" he drawled teasingly as Draco tugged at the zip of his trousers. "We should take the opportunity to go slow while we still have it." Once they were at Hogwarts, their only free time would be snatches in the evenings and the occasional weekend. There was little opportunity for lazy lovemaking in a castle full of three hundred people.

"The rush is I want you in me," Draco growled in retort, smirking as Harry's cock jumped beneath his hand. "We can do slow on the second round."

Now Harry liked the sound of that. "Well, in that case." He flipped them over, wriggling out of his trousers and boxers and flinging them aside. Draco's eyes darkened, and he arched up into Harry, kissing him hotly.

"While I do love having you on top of me like this," Draco panted, cutting himself off with a gasp as Harry peeled down his underwear, "I had something else in mind, actually."

Harry cocked his head in confusion. "But— you said—" They had tried it both ways, and usually their preference was for Harry to be on top.

Draco smirked wickedly. The next thing Harry knew, he was flat on his back, Draco straddling his hips. The Slytherin reached over for the vial of lube, bracing himself with one hand planted just above Harry's shoulder, his other hand between his own legs. Harry could do nothing but watch with lust-blown eyes as Draco stretched himself, pushing against his own fingers. Then, he clasped a slick hand around Harry's straining cock, kneeling up higher, and suddenly Harry realised where this was going.

"Oh holy God," he breathed, watching Draco position himself, slowly sinking down onto Harry's length. He wasn't sure where to look; at the space between them, gradually growing smaller as he pressed deeper inside his partner, or at Draco's face, painted in rapturous ecstasy. "Fuck." His hands clenched at his sides with the effort of keeping his hips still — he didn't want to move, not when Draco was taking his time to adjust, didn't dare do anything that might upset this glorious vision. Every centimetre more sent sparks of white hot pleasure through him — every time Draco shifted, his breath hitched. Every moan he made went directly to Harry's core.

Eventually, Draco was fully seated, opening hazy grey eyes and shooting Harry a painfully attractive smirk. "Okay?" he checked, knees splaying a little wider. Harry gulped.

"Tell me I can move," he begged breathlessly. "Tell me I can touch you. I— Draco, please."

Draco adjusted his position, steadyng himself, letting out another little half-moan as Harry's cock brushed his prostate. "You can move," he assured. "Just— slowly."

Harry wasn't sure he'd last long enough to do anything but. He propped his shoulders up on the pillows, just a little bit, so he didn't have to strain his neck to see. Then, with one hand gripping Draco's hip, he started to buck his hips ever so slightly. Each movement made Draco jerk and gasp, angling his body better until he was crying out in pleasure. He leant forward, bracing against Harry, pushing down with every thrust up to get deeper still. His own cock bobbed between them, dripping onto Harry's stomach, and as Draco leant forward a little more the pressure around Harry hit perfectly, wringing his pleasure from him with one final thrust, his whole body going tense as a bowstring as he spent inside his lover. Draco froze, watching him, and when the haze of orgasm began to fade Harry looked up; Draco was still impaled on his rapidly softening cock, his own still rock hard and flushed.

"Hang on," Harry gasped, reaching down with both hands to ease Draco off his sensitive flesh, head buzzing. Before Draco could move away, Harry dragged the blond up his chest, forcing him to fling his arms out and grip the headboard to avoid falling face first.

"Harry, what the— ohhh." His words were lost to a moan as Harry took Draco's length in his mouth, the Slytherin straddling his shoulders. Harry gripped his thighs, taking as much as he could manage, begging for more. Draco's movement was tentative at first, but when Harry didn't choke or protest he grew bolder, fucking into Harry's mouth — he didn't last long, his fingers tugging at Harry's hair the only warning before he arched his back and came.

Harry did his best to swallow, but some still dribbled out of the corner of his mouth, and as Draco shuffled backward the blond let out a low moan, looking down at him. "Fucking hell," he groaned, pupils so wide there was hardly any grey visible. "You are... fuck."

Harry smirked, tongue darting out to catch the mess he'd made. "Like you can talk," he retorted, voice a little husky.

Draco leaned down and kissed him, uncaring of the taste in his mouth, and for a moment Harry wondered if their second round might not be just as fast as the first. But the heat between them soon simmered, Draco pulling back and settling down on his side, legs tangled with Harry's.

"So, that was new," Harry remarked breathlessly, lips quirking. "Been planning that for a while, or...?"

Draco flushed, the colour trickling down his chest. "I've been reading one of the books you picked up at Infinite in the summer," he admitted. "It sounded... intriguing."

Harry's eyes widened. "You mean the, ah romance books, or...?"

Draco grew even redder. "The instructional one," he confessed quietly. Harry's cock made a weak attempt at an early recovery.

"Oh." He hadn't thought Draco was interested in that one. Hell, it had taken him six months into their relationship to even be up for looking at the book Harry had been given by George, and that was tame compared to some of the stuff from Infinite. "You didn't do that just for me, did you?" he asked, stomach sinking in concern. Draco scoffed.

“Did I look like I wasn’t enjoying it?” he retorted, one eyebrow arched. “Though I was not expecting... that.” He bit his lip. “Did you... like it?”

“Sucking you off like that?” Being pinned down beneath Draco, having the blond fuck his face like that? “Yeah. Yeah, I liked it.” He’d only ever imagined something like that in his more daring fantasies.

Most of the time when they were together, he and Draco stuck to what they knew. It wasn’t boring, by any stretch of the imagination — even the familiar things were still relatively new enough to be exciting, so much of their bodies to still learn. But some of the books from Infinite just made Harry realise how much they didn’t know, hadn’t tried yet.

And that wasn’t even touching on the books that talked about kinks.

“Well any more new things you want to try, you go right ahead,” Harry assured him, mouthing a kiss against his jaw, his magic sliding over them in a lazy Cleaning charm. “If we don’t like it, no big deal, we do something else. It doesn’t have to be hard.”

“Pretty sure it does, for most of the things in that book,” Draco argued, giving a pointed glance downward that made Harry chuckle.

“You know what I mean.” He slid a hand into Draco’s silky hair, admiring the line of his boyfriend’s high cheekbones. “Don’t feel like you can’t ask me for stuff like that. Worst I can do is say no.” He grinned cheekily. “Maybe we could read the book together, note down things we both like.”

“Are you trying to give me sex homework, you fucking nerd?” Draco asked flatly, and Harry cackled with laughter.

“I’m saying, that first idea of yours was ridiculously sexy, and I want to see what else looks good.” He pounced, pinning the Slytherin playfully. “You’re always telling me to expand my palate.”

“I didn’t mean like that,” Draco argued, rolling his eyes. Then, his humour faltered, a guarded edge to his expression. “You’re not... bored, with what we do, are you?”

“What? Merlin, no!” Kissing Draco softly, Harry stroked his hair. “Draco, love, I could just kiss you for hours and never get bored. Hell, I think you underestimate how much time I spend just looking at you. Neville says I have a problem,” he added, smiling lopsidedly. “I love everything we do. But new things can be fun too.” His smile softened, hand cupping Draco’s cheek. “We’re past the point where I’m worried you’ll be freaked out by any part of me,” he confessed — his scars, his body, the literal piece of the Dark Lord he’d had in his head. Draco hadn’t batted an eyelash at any of those. “I feel like that extends to my dirty fantasies about you, too. I certainly want to hear your dirty fantasies.” He leaned in for another kiss, loving the way Draco’s lips parted for him so easily. “We’ve got our whole lives to figure out what we like and don’t like,” he said, thinking of the little velvet box that now lived in a hidden compartment in his desk drawer. “No need to be shy about asking for it now.”

Draco's Adam's apple bobbed. "I—I suppose." His fingers trailed up the ridges of Harry's spine. "And—that whole kissing me for hours thing... is that an offer?" Pale blond brows rose. Harry smirked.

"It absolutely can be."

He hadn't been lying — he would never, ever get bored of kissing Draco. And they had hours before they were expected at dinner.

.-.-.

Taking the portkey back to school the next day felt like being forced from the most amazing dream by a bucket of cold water to the face. They arrived in Snape's private quarters, and Harry kissed Draco goodbye before heading up to Gryffindor Tower — now they were back, no one could know that Snape had been with them over Christmas. No one except McGonagall.

In the common room, everyone was staring.

"Is it true you're going out with Draco Malfoy?" Colin asked bravely. Harry chuckled.

"Yup," he confirmed, prompting a wave of whispers. "Since fourth year," he added, in case that rumour hadn't gained enough traction.

"Blimey," Colin breathed, his pale eyes as round as a house elf's.

"Is that all everyone's been talking about all break?" Harry asked in amusement. Flushing, Colin shrugged.

"Not the only thing. But — well, you weren't really around for us to ask about it."

That was fair. "Well, here I am," he said, spreading his arms demonstratively. "Very much in love with Draco Malfoy, who is absolutely not a Death Eater, neither is his mother. We were pretending to hate each other because his father would kill him if he knew the truth — and, quite frankly, any other questions any of you might have about our relationship are probably none of your damn business."

He saw several people redden throughout the common room; no doubt people with the exact kind of questions Harry was never going to answer in public.

"I've got one more question," Colin said, and Harry raised an eyebrow. The usually shy boy gave a surprisingly bold grin. "Do you think Vicky Frobisher would go out with me if I asked her?"

A surprised laugh slipped from Harry's lips. Colin was definitely a Gryffindor at heart! "I think you should give it a try and see what happens," he retorted, winking. "But fair warning; if you break our keeper's heart, our beaters may break your face."

Colin paled a little, but his smile didn't falter.

..

Harry only really had enough time to chat with Colin and drop off his trunk before it was dinner time. He found Neville in the dorms already, having arrived with an earlier portkey. He was glad to have his friend to walk down to the Great Hall with — it was just the two of them, as Ginny's portkey wouldn't be until later.

As they reached the Entrance Hall, Harry spotted a familiar head of blond hair approaching from the corridor down to the dungeons. "Oi, Malfoy!" he called, and several heads turned, including Draco's.

Despite the rumours that had been flying, half the people in the vicinity seemed to be expecting a fight. Draco's eyes glittered, and Harry didn't miss the long-suffering expression Theo shot Neville — which Neville no doubt returned. "What do you want, Potter?" Draco sneered. Harry couldn't hold his hard-eyed expression for long, breaking out into a grin.

"Sit with me?" he asked sweetly, batting his eyelashes. Draco snorted.

"If you insist," he agreed, rolling his eyes.

"Is this how the two of you are going to be, now?" Neville complained half-heartedly, walking with them into the Great Hall.

"Until Harry gets bored of shocking people, most likely," Draco agreed — he seemed entirely resigned to the prospect, but not all that upset by it. Harry knew better; he was getting just as much joy out of shocking people as Harry himself was. He was a Black, he lived for drama.

Not all of the students had returned yet, but most of them had. Harry was just glad he'd get to avoid Ron and Hermione for a while longer.

As he and Draco made themselves comfortable at the Gryffindor table, Harry chanced a look up at Dumbledore. The old man looked even more worn than he had before Christmas — Harry wondered how badly the curse on his arm was hitting him, now he didn't have the castle wards to bolster him. Maybe he wouldn't even last until the end of the year.

But the lack of twinkle in his eye was not due to his clear exhaustion; it had died the moment Harry and Draco had walked in, their hands linked between them.

Harry smirked to himself. Let Dumbledore think of that what he would. Harry was done hiding parts of himself for his own safety. He was stronger than that, now — stronger than Dumbledore.

It was like any other dinner at Hogwarts, chatting with his friends about how things had been in the castle while he was gone, except for the fact that he didn't have to constantly fret about how close he was sitting to Draco and whether his comments could be taken as too flirty — and that half the hall was staring at them like they were aliens.

Harry didn't know what all the fuss was about. It wasn't like he and Draco had gone from hating each other to boyfriends in the blink of an eye; they'd given the school a few months of their friendship to get used to.

Ginny arrived partway through dinner, squeezing her way onto the bench beside Neville and greeting them all cheerfully. Several feet behind her, much less cheerful, were Ron and Hermione — they sat far up the other end of the long table, shooting the occasional glare Harry's way but mostly pretending he didn't exist.

Not for the first time, Harry thought Charlie's little outburst at the Burrow might have been a blessing in disguise; now everyone knew that he wasn't an oblivious little idiot, he might finally get some peace from their heavy-handed attempts at burying the hatchet.

As Harry reached for the water jug, a sudden hush descended over the students around him. "Mr Malfoy." Harry jumped — Snape had appeared, staring down his hooked nose at the pair of them, his cold gaze fixed pointedly on Draco's hand on Harry's back. "Ten points from Slytherin. For conduct unbecoming of your house."

He kept walking, robes billowing behind him. Even though they both knew it was coming, Harry still felt Draco flinch minutely.

Snape had to do it, had to publicly disapprove of them now they had drawn such a blatant line in the sand. His reputation depended on it.

But for him to take points from his own house, in front of the entire school... he'd as good as said Draco was no longer a Slytherin in his eyes. Harry's heart clenched in sympathy as his boyfriend's eyes dulled, his shoulders hunching ever so slightly. "You okay?" he asked softly, brushing a butterfly-light kiss across his cheek. Draco nodded, jaw clenched.

"Fine. It's fine."

Still, he hardly touched the remainder of their dinner.

Even when Draco and Harry had been publicly friends, there was still some kind of hope among the genuine Voldemort supporters that he could be swayed around. They treated him with respect, in case he did come back to their side. Snape was neutral with him. All that would change, now.

Draco would handle it. He was strong. But that didn't mean Harry had to like it.

They stuck around until the hall started to clear out, though all their friends could tell their hearts weren't really in the conversation anymore. On the way out, Harry paused in the Entrance Hall, tugging Draco into a firm kiss. He could feel eyes on him, but he didn't care — he didn't want Draco going to bed sad. "I'll see you in the morning," he murmured, trying desperately not to blush, knowing everyone could hear him. "I love you." He wasn't ashamed of it. He wasn't going to hide his feelings anymore.

That earned a flicker of a genuine smile. "Sap," Draco accused, squeezing his hand. "I love you. Don't forget to finish that Transfiguration essay tonight."

Harry snorted quietly. “And they say romance is dead.” Reluctantly, he let Draco go, watching him head towards Slytherin for a few moments before Neville and Ginny nudged him towards the stairs.

Only six months left of term. They could handle it.

.-.-.

They were only a week into the new term, and already Severus was being summoned to the headmaster’s office.

Wondering what the latest problem could be — privately, guiltily hoping it was the progression of the dark curse on the old man’s arm — Severus swept up the revolving stairs, stepping inside the office. Albus didn’t look in pain, more than usual anyway. He looked as weary as he always did, showing his age in a way he never had.

“Ah, Severus,” he greeted, smiling. “Glad you could make it so promptly. Please, sit.”

Severus did so, ignoring the usual offers of tea and lemon drops. “Did you have need of me for something, headmaster?” He couldn’t help but notice Fawkes’ perch was empty — when was the last time he’d seen the phoenix? It had certainly been a while...

“Of a sort,” Albus replied, clasping his hands together on the desk. “It is in regards to Mr Potter.”

Severus raised an uncaring eyebrow. “Indeed? What had the brat done now?” How much damage control was he about to have to undertake?

Albus chuckled, though his heart wasn’t in it. “It is nothing he has done. More something that was done to him, many years ago, now.” His gaze grew serious. “Have you ever heard of horcruxes, Severus?”

The Potions Master’s blood turned to ice. “The term is familiar, though I’m not sure where from,” he replied, keeping his voice even, trying not to react outwardly. Had Albus realised Harry had hunted down several horcruxes?

He put on an appropriately disgusted face as Albus explained horcruxes to him, eventually revealing that the Dark Lord had created a number of his own. “The ring I so hastily put on over the summer was one of them,” Albus told him, shaking his head. “I admit, my foolishness got the better of me with that one.”

Severus resisted the urge to snort — that was an understatement. “I appreciate this information, Albus, but I will admit I am not sure why you’re sharing it with me. Should the Dark Lord learn that you know...”

“I have faith that you can continue to keep my secrets from Voldemort, Severus,” Albus assured, smiling slightly. “This one in particular. There is, in fact, one horcrux even Voldemort himself is unaware of.” His smile faded, his eyes meeting Severus’. “It resides within Mr Potter’s curse scar, and has done since the night his parents died.”

Severus tensed, letting the shock show on his face — not shock at the knowledge, but shock that Albus was sharing this with him. “I... how is that possible?”

“I believe that due to the number of horcruxes Voldemort created, his soul was unstable enough to splinter off a fragment when he was hit with the rebounded Killing curse. In search of a host, that fragment attached itself to the only living thing in the proximity — young Harry himself.” Albus sighed, leaning back in his chair. “I became aware of the fragment as I was performing some medical scans on Mr Potter before I placed him with his relatives. That, too, is how I knew the Dark Lord was not as deceased as everyone had hoped. I took some precautions — I had hoped, as small as that fragment of soul was, it would dislodge itself as Harry grew older, and not be a problem in later life. Sadly, I fear that is not the case.”

Severus bit back a sneer; took precautions indeed. The kind of precautions that involved binding the family magics of an infant, leaving him with people who would beat every ounce of self worth out of him.

“This fragment still resides within Potter, then?”

“It is stronger than ever, I believe,” Albus confirmed, so much feigned dismay in his voice that Severus almost laughed. “I have watched Harry closely, over the years — at first, I thought he had overpowered the fragment. When he arrived here, so much like his father, and sorted into Gryffindor...”

Because of course, no one evil could ever go into the house of the lion.

“I am telling you this, Severus, because you are the only person who knows I am dying. And the only person I can trust with the absolute truth.” Albus looked him dead in the eye, and Severus instinctively raised his Occlumency shields. “In order for Voldemort to truly be gone, Harry Potter must die.”

A long, poignant silence. “I thought you liked the boy, Albus.”

“I do. Despite our recent... differences, I care for him very much.” It amazed Severus, then, how the headmaster could say that with such a straight face, like Harry hadn’t been a pawn in his game since the moment the life left Lily Potter’s body. “I wish there were an alternate solution. But I have come to the conclusion that all of my precautions were for naught, and the soul fragment within Harry is strong enough to influence him — perhaps, given time, strong enough to overtake him entirely. Turn him into a host for the Dark Lord’s remaining soul. That cannot be allowed to happen; both for the sake of the world, and for Harry’s own sake. The boy I knew would never be able to live with himself should his body be used for evil.”

The boy Albus knew was a lie and always had been, but Severus schooled his face into a grave frown. “Must he die in any particular way?”

“I had once thought that his death must occur at Voldemort’s hand, to truly destroy the soul fragment within him. A tragic event, but a necessary one. Now, however, I don’t believe it matters as much. But he must die before anyone can attempt to destroy Voldemort’s current mortal form. I am working on discovering the rest of his horcruxes — I am confident that by the time this curse gets the better of me, I will have destroyed all but the one in Harry's scar."

Severus sneered at him. "So you wish me to end your life, and the Potter boy's?" he presumed drolly. "Anyone else you would like to add to the list, while you're at it?" Any other acts to truly damn his soul in the eyes of the world.

"I would not ask this of you if I had any other choice, Severus," Albus insisted apologetically. "And I may not need you to end Harry's life. I feel a certain level of responsibility for him — if the time comes when the influence of the horcrux within him becomes too dangerous to ignore, I shall bear that burden myself, if I am still able. I only wanted you to know in case this curse strikes me down before that chance arises."

To hear Albus so casually talk about killing a student made Severus' gut churn. "If the boy is to die before the Dark Lord, who shall strike the final blow? The Prophecy..."

"Prophecies are tricky things, Severus," Albus replied. "Not always interpreted the way you might expect. I believe the power to defeat the Dark Lord spoken of within the Prophecy is, in a sense, the horcrux; Voldemort cannot be defeated until that is dealt with, so truly that power lies with Harry."

Severus doubted Albus honestly believed that — surely he hadn't convinced himself that the full Prophecy meant Harry needed to die in order for the Dark Lord to be killed?

"I understand," he confirmed solemnly. "So once the boy is gone, once these horcruxes are gone — then anyone can defeat the Dark Lord?"

Albus' eyes twinkled, a pale imitation of his usual brightness. "I daresay even you yourself could commit the act, so to speak."

A forced smirk, as if that was all he could ever ask for. As if he would welcome the death of a child just to get the final revenge on one of his hated masters. "Perhaps," he agreed.

"Thank you, Severus. You are the only one I trust with this knowledge." Albus leaned forward, eyeing him imploringly. "The only one I know who is strong enough to do what needs to be done."

More like the only one whose soul was already damned enough.

Nonetheless, Severus acted like he appreciated the headmaster's faith in him, and waited to be dismissed. On the walk back to his quarters, he mentally rearranged his evening plans to spend an hour or two back home — Remus and Sirius would need to hear of this.

If Albus decided he needed to make sure Harry was killed before he himself died, they would need to protect him.

.-.-.-

If the first term of the school year had found Dumbledore hardly present in the castle at all, the second term found him everywhere.

The headmaster seemed to constantly pop up in the corner of Harry's vision; crossing him in corridors between classes, watching him during mealtimes — he'd even been caught strolling away from the quidditch pitch one evening, right after a practice that Harry had ended prematurely due to one of the bludgers acting particularly aggressive towards him.

Snape had warned him of Dumbledore's revelation that Harry needed to die, but Harry could hardly believe the headmaster was trying to kill him already.

"I think he's trying to put me in the Hospital Wing," Harry told his friends in the heir's meeting, his face grim. "He tried to trip me at the top of the sixth floor staircase earlier today." Only Harry's quick reflexes had saved him from plummeting several floors down.

The Patil twins gasped, horrified. Even Daphne looked ill.

"But why? What could he possibly gain from injuring you like that?" Anthony asked, brow furrowed.

"Maybe he wants to put the magic blocks back on me," Harry thought aloud, shrugging. "Or maybe there's some new ritual he wants to do to me. Fuck if I know — either way, he needs me alone and unconscious, I'd bet. The old man's plans are getting wilder and wilder the closer he gets to popping his clogs. Merlin only know what he's got up his sleeve these days."

"We won't let him get to you," Neville declared vehemently. Harry shot him a quick smile.

"I appreciate that. But I was thinking... if he's upping his game, so should we." A cluster of perplexed faces stared back at him. "I think we should let out the information that he put compulsions on me as a first year."

Susan sucked in a sharp breath. "Just the compulsions, or the magic blocks too?"

"Just the compulsions, for now. Telling people about the magic blocks might make it sound too unbelievable." The general trust in Dumbledore might be waning, but he wasn't sure it was that low yet. "We can even throw in that he got Ron and Hermione to pretend to be my friend, to keep an eye on me. They know that I know about that, now." If it meant the rest of the school hated them, even better.

"We can do that," Parvati assured him. "How much detail do you want to go into? Y'know, about the result of the compulsions."

"Don't say too much," Draco piped up. "If the rumours are too detailed, it'll look suspicious. Let it lie at having Harry hate all Slytherins, and trust the headmaster. The gossip mill will supply the rest."

Harry nodded in agreement — the ideas the rest of the school could come up with would likely be far more damaging than anything he could spread.

"That should be easy enough," Parvati said with a devious smile. "If there's one thing the people at this school love to talk about, it's Harry Potter."

Harry snorted; wasn't that the truth!

.-

With a plan in place, the heirs began to disperse, wanting to get on with the rest of their afternoon. Draco had promised to study with Theo and Ernie, so Harry kissed him goodbye and headed towards Gryffindor with Neville.

"Hey, Harry," Neville began, and when Harry glanced at him he stopped in his tracks, seeing how anxious the taller boy looked. "Can we— can I talk to you about something?" A blush crept all the way up to Neville's ears. "It's... kind of private."

"I— yeah, sure." Harry frowned — he thought he heard footsteps, and when he turned his head he could've sworn he saw the tail of bright purple robes. "Come on." Heading for the nearest Parseltongue passage, Harry hissed to open it. "Doesn't get much more private than this," he joked, once they were safely inside. Neville chuckled half-heartedly. "So, what's up?"

"I... you and Draco have been together for a while now, yeah?" Neville started. Harry blinked at him.

"...Yes?" What did that have to do with anything?

"And you... you and him, have you... y'know..." Neville stuttered, helplessly flustered, and it took a few minutes before Harry got the gist of his insinuation.

"Are you asking if we've had sex?" he asked, raising a bewildered eyebrow. Neville's face grew impossibly redder.

"I— maybe?" The blond boy covered his face with his hands. "It's none of my business, I know, but..."

"Look, Nev," Harry said, patting him awkwardly on the shoulder. "You're my best friend, and I love you, but... if you're having some sort of sexuality crisis, I don't think I'm the person to talk to about that." Ginny surely needed to know before Harry did.

Neville's head snapped up, his eyes wide. "What? No! I'm not— not that there's anything wrong with it! But I'm straight," he insisted. Harry's frown returned — if not that, then what?

Finally, Neville let out a long, unsteady breath. "I... I think Ginny wants to have sex. With me."

"Oh." Harry was the one blushing, now.

"I mean, we've done... stuff," Neville continued, and Harry desperately wished he didn't get the mental image of said stuff. "And it's great, really! But she keeps dropping all these hints, and I just— I think she wants to, y'know. Do it."

"Do you not?" Harry asked, wondering if he needed to have a conversation with his pseudo-sister about consent and pressure in a relationship. Surely Fred and George had covered that with her by now?

“I do! At least, I think I do?” Neville ran a frustrated hand through his hair. “I know I want my first time to be with her. And it’ll be hers, too, so we can figure it out together, but... I know she did some stuff with Michael, when they were together. Sometimes it just feels like she had this head-start and I’m still trying to catch up with her.” He grimaced. “Am I making too big a deal out of it? I don’t want to make her feel bad for being with Michael before me.”

This was absolutely not how Harry had expected his afternoon to go, and he wished he had been given some kind of warning, some time to prepare an answer.

But Neville was his best friend, and he’d helped Harry with so much. And while most of the books about sex and relationships Harry had read — which was a surprising amount, these days — were about queer relationships, he figured most of the basics had to apply to straight ones too.

“Look, Nev, if you’re really nervous about it, just talk to her,” he said, shrugging. “Ginny won’t want to do anything you’re not completely on board with. Maybe she’s dropping hints because she thinks you want it — you are sixteen now and everything. If you want to slow down, tell her you want to slow down. There’s definitely something to be said for going slow.” He grinned to himself, remembering all the fun he’d had with Draco before they’d even thought about penetrative sex. “It’s not a competition, no matter what anyone tells you. As long as you’re both having fun.”

“I don’t... I don’t completely want her to slow down,” Neville admitted hesitantly.

“Then I think that’s a conversation you need to have with her, rather than me,” said Harry diplomatically. “And, as usual, I have books if you need them.”

That made Neville snicker. “You’re practically a Ravenclaw,” he teased, bumping his shoulder against Harry’s. “I... thanks, Harry. That really helps.”

Harry wasn’t sure how, considering most of his advice had just been ‘talk to your girlfriend’, but he smiled all the same. “Anytime, mate.”

“So... you two have, right?” Neville checked. “You’ve been together for ages, you must have.”

“We have,” Harry confirmed, his blush returning.

“What’s it like?” Neville blurted the question before he could think better of it.

“Bit different for me than for you, I think,” Harry teased, laughing when Neville’s eyes bugged. “It’s— I mean, it’s brilliant. Best thing ever. But that’s more because it’s Draco, I think, than because it’s sex.” He didn’t have any comparison, but he doubted anything could possibly feel even half as good with anyone else.

“Does... does it hurt?” The question was far more tentative. “Some of the things I’ve heard, from the other guys... I don’t want to hurt her.”

"Nev... I'm gonna be completely honest with you here. I don't know what happens with a woman's downstairs bits and I don't ever want to know," Harry told him bluntly, making a face. "I— you know about like, preparation and everything, right. What about lube? Do straight people use lube?" Neville looked like he might die if Harry continued that line of questioning, so he changed track. "Surely there's someone with more knowledge than me you could ask about this. Hell, I'll even let you borrow the mirror to talk to Sirius, if you want. He's slept with people with vaginas before." Not all of them had been women, Sirius was very clear on that, but from the stories Remus had told him about Sirius' wild youth, Harry was fairly certain his godfather would have more useful advice on the subject.

Neville shook his head vehemently. "I am absolutely not close enough with your godfather to even think about that."

Harry frowned in thought. "What about Susan?" His taller friend stared at him. "You two are close, right? Since her and Amelia have been living with you and all. And I'm like, ninety-five percent sure her and Theo have done it." He shrugged. "She can probably help you out. Hell, definitely more than I will." Not only was it discussing sex with only one penis involved, something he had zero experience of, but it was Neville and Ginny, his best friend and his little sister, and he honestly might be scarred for life if he had to get too in depth on the details there.

"What if she laughs at me?"

"It's Susan," Harry pointed out flatly. "She won't laugh at you." She'd probably be delighted to impart some knowledge, and embarrass the hell out of Neville in the process. "It's that or just ask Ginny herself."

"I can't do that!" Harry was about to set in on the whole 'if you can't talk about it you have no business doing it' speech, but then Neville continued, "I don't want her thinking it's like, her responsibility to make it not hurt. She may not know any more than I do! I just... I want it to be good, for her."

Harry's heart melted, just a little bit. "Then you're already ten steps ahead of most blokes, the way I've heard Lavender and Parvati talk about it," he said wryly. "And look on the bright side — Ginny's head over heels for you, mate. Even if you're crap at it, I'm sure she'd give you another go— hey!" He dodged the Jelly-Legs jinx Neville shot at him.

He glared, and Neville glared back, and the next thing they knew both boys were laughing, leaning into each other from the force of it.

Harry was glad, truly, that Neville felt comfortable enough to come to him about those things.

But if he ended up having a similar conversation with Ginny, he wouldn't need Dumbledore to kill him off — the force of his blush would manage that just fine.

....

As always, thanks to Parvati and Lavender, the rumours about Dumbledore using compulsion charms were flying around the school before the end of the week. And Dumbledore was furious.

Privately, Harry thought that was what fuelled the rumours so quickly — the only thing that would make Dumbledore so visibly mad was them being true, and everyone knew it.

Of course, there were attempts at retribution. Only days after the first rumours began, more began to crop up — rumours that Harry had gone Dark, that he'd spend his Christmas break with Voldemort himself, making plans to take out the headmaster and rule the wizarding world together.

Harry wasn't as bothered by those rumours as Dumbledore probably hoped he would be. Hell, similar things had been floating around for months already; the people who thought that were always going to think that, and he was done with trying to convince them otherwise.

They were in a minority that was getting smaller and smaller with every day that Dumbledore acted strangely.

Still, all of the whispers were starting a sort of civil war within the school — a stand-off between those on Dumbledore's side and those on Harry's, a clear divide amongst the students. Ron and Hermione were the guiding force behind the Dumbledore-supporting side, countering the accusations of false friendship with angry diatribes about how they'd tried their best to be friends with Harry but he'd started pulling away from them after Voldemort returned, leaning more and more towards Dark magic and pureblood ideals.

Had anyone been paying attention, they would have realised that half the stuff they used as evidence — the rift in their friendship, Harry's relationship with Draco — had all begun before Voldemort's resurrection. But, well; details like that were rarely necessary in such juicy gossip.

The teachers, to their credit, were trying to stay out of things. Likely because they thought they'd be fired if they supported Harry publicly. He knew which ones were on his side, though — he could see it in their eyes, the ones who thought he was evil. Likewise, he could see the solidarity in those who stood by him.

He hadn't seen much of Hagrid, lately. Harry hoped that wasn't on purpose. They were both busy, after all.

Through all this, classes continued. The HA continued. Harry's training sessions with Snape continued.

And, to keep him sane, his late night rendezvous' with Draco continued. Perhaps a few more nights than they really should, considering how much work Harry had to do lately, but... school sucked, and the only real peace he could get these days was in his boyfriend's arms, as disgustingly cliché as that was. An hour or two with Draco before bed was sometimes the only thing stopping him from hexing every nosy little shit who muttered insults under their breath when he walked past them.

Harry was on his way back from one such encounter, crossing the fairly short distance between the Room of Requirement and Gryffindor Tower. His step was light, his head still hazy from the force of the orgasm Draco had wrung from him. They had almost fallen asleep together, there — only a pointed nudge from the castle itself had prompted him to drag himself out of Draco's arms and back towards his common room.

The castle was still nudging him, in the back of his mind, and he scowled at the sensation. "I'm going, I'm going," he muttered quietly, jaw cracking in a wide yawn.

As he did, he didn't notice the shadowed figure behind him, shrouded by magic. And he didn't notice the jet of spellfire headed towards him until it was too late.

Chapter End Notes

Aren't y'all glad this is a midweek update ;)

Chapter 94

Finishing up a rather late breakfast — after Charlie had gone to work, Sirius had decided he needed ‘five more minutes’, which turned into almost an hour — Sirius was just considering his options for the day, when he felt something warm vibrating in his robe pocket. He frowned — what could Harry want at this time of the morning? Surely he was in class... he racked his brain, trying to remember if his pup had a free period first thing on a Wednesday. His stomach churned uneasily as he dug out the mirror, hoping it was just a friendly chat and not an emergency.

Only, the face that appeared in the mirror’s glass was not his godson’s. “Neville?” Sirius greeted, surprised — the churning of his stomach grew fiercer. The Longbottom heir was pale-faced and anxious.

“Lord Black,” he replied, only a hint of a waver to his tone. Sirius had told the boy to call him by his first name a dozen times, but he didn’t think this was the time for another reprimand. “Sir. I think Harry’s missing.”

Sirius’ heart sank. “What do you mean?”

“He wasn’t in the dorm when I woke up this morning,” Neville told him. “And he didn’t show up to breakfast.”

“And you’re sure he didn’t just sleep over with Draco and decide to have a romantic breakfast in the kitchens together?” The hope in Sirius’ voice was plain, but Neville shook his head.

“Draco was at breakfast. I asked him, he said he hasn’t seen Harry since last night. And, the castle — the castle isn’t happy. It feels... wrong.”

“Fuck.” The panic began to rise, and Sirius shoved it down. Freaking out wouldn’t help anyone. “Fuck. Oh, Merlin. I— where’s Dumbledore?”

“He was at breakfast, didn’t even seem to notice Harry was missing.” Neville looked as suspicious of that as Sirius felt. From the amount of attention the headmaster had paid to Harry lately, him not noticing was a tell in itself.

“Neville, do you know about the Marauder’s Map?” Sirius pressed, relief hitting him when the boy nodded. “Do you know where Harry keeps it?”

“I— he usually has it on him, honestly,” Neville said, face falling. He disappeared for a second, and Sirius heard rummaging. “It’s not in his nightstand. Nor is the cloak.”

“Bollocks,” Sirius hissed. Of course, the one time it would be useful for Harry not to have those things on him, they were shit out of luck. “Neville, listen to me.” There was only one option left, now.

The boy's hazel eyes were alert as they met Sirius' .

"I need you to go to Professor Snape," Sirius told him, watching him gape. "I promise you, he's not what you think he is. He's on our side."

Neville bit his lip, visibly conflicted. "I... I heard Amelia say he saved her life, when the Ministry fell."

"He did. He's the only damn adult I trust at that school these days — and if you knew what we were like as students, you'd know how big a deal that is," Sirius added with a bitter twist of his lips. "Go to Snape. Tell him about Harry. If anyone there can help you, it's him. I'll... I'll raise the alarm here." He'd figure it out, somehow. They would figure it out.

Harry wouldn't be missing for long, not on his watch.

"Keep the mirror with you!" he added, before Neville could cut the connection. "Be safe, kid."

Neville nodded, and the mirror went blank.

Sirius barely resisted the urge to throw the fucking thing across the room.

He hurried into the main hall, heart pounding in his chest. "Remus!" he yelled, pushing magic in his voice to carry through the whole house, tugging at the wards in his mind to track the man down. Was he even home? He could have gone out. Narcissa was out, he knew that much — over at the Manor, dealing with her secret stash of refugees. Was Remus at the Pottery?

How long had Harry been gone?

"Remus!" he called again, more urgently this time. He started up the stairs, and halted when he saw the werewolf come out of the library.

"Padfoot, what's the matter?"

"Harry's missing." Sirius explained the conversation he'd just had, watching the blood drain from his best friend's face.

"Neville's an heir, same as Harry is," Remus pointed out. "If Harry's still in the castle, he'll find him."

Sirius wondered which of them the werewolf was trying to reassure. "And if he's not in the castle?"

Remus' face hardened. "Then it's up to us." His eyes flashed gold for the briefest moment. "Call Tonks and Kingsley. I'll go talk to the twins, see if they might have anything to help."

Sirius nodded, but before he could turn away Remus had him bundled in a crushing hug. "We will not lose him, Sirius," he declared strongly. Sirius gripped him tight in return, just for a moment, hoping desperately that could be true.

.--.

Of all the people to knock on the door of his office in the middle of a school day, Severus would not have placed Neville Longbottom high on the list.

The boy was lucky Severus wasn't teaching — and that he hadn't interrupted anything important.

Then again, looking at the determined set of the Gryffindor's jaw, Severus wondered if that might be half the problem. "Harry Potter is missing," the boy declared, not a hint of the usual trembling stutter he spoke to Severus with.

The Slytherin's heart stopped.

"And why should I care?" he drawled dispassionately, stepping back and beckoning the boy inside. Longbottom hesitated only for a moment, but screwed up his courage and followed his most hated professor, only whimpering a little when Severus shut and locked the door.

Gryffindors, honestly.

"I— Lord Black told me to come here. Said I could trust you," Longbottom said, hands screwed into fists at his sides. "Harry's missing, I don't know how long for. He wasn't in the dorm, wasn't at breakfast. I... I know he's not in the castle." The boy's gaze dropped evasively.

"The wards confirmed that?"

Hazel eyes widened. "You know about the wards?" Severus nodded impatiently, and Longbottom seemed to bolster. "Then, yeah. The castle is worried. If he were here, I'd know about it. And—I asked Luna and Hannah, at breakfast. They can't feel him anywhere, either."

That was... concerning, to say the least. Thinking quickly, Severus scrawled a note on a piece of paper, tapping it with his wand. It vanished in a flash of silver light. "Can Hogwarts show you what happened?" Severus wasn't sure what the heirs' connection with the castle was like, but he knew Harry had talked about being shown things before.

Longbottom closed his eyes, face screwing up in concentration. "It's... foggy. Distorted. And dark. I can tell where he is — in the seventh floor corridor, not far from the Room of Requirement. But I can't properly see what happened. It's like—it's like I'm being blocked, or something."

Severus pinched the bridge of his nose — that did not bode well for any of them.

A knock on the door startled both of them. Gesturing for Longbottom to stand out of view, just in case, Severus dropped his wards and went to open it. Luckily, it was just Draco. His godson's face was pale, his lip slightly swollen where he'd been worrying it between his teeth. "Is this about Harry?" he asked urgently.

Severus let him into the office, where he did a double-take at the sight of Longbottom. “You still can’t find him?” Draco pressed.

“He was with you last night, yes?” Severus asked his godson. It was a testament to how serious the situation was that Draco didn’t even blush.

“In the Room of Requirement,” he confirmed, nodding. “We both left just after midnight. I went through the shortcut down to the dungeons, he left through the main door.” His grey eyes were fearful as they met Severus’. “Uncle Sev, what if it’s Death Eaters? I know there are loyal students in the school. What if… what if He has Harry?”

Severus placed a hand on his godson’s shoulder, squeezing gently. “If the Dark Lord had a plan to kidnap Harry Potter, I would know about it,” he assured confidently.

“Sir—“ Longbottom cut in hesitantly, “what— what if they’re not working to You-Know-Who’s plan? What if they decided to… y’know. Take initiative?”

Severus snorted. “Death Eaters are not known for their initiative, Mr Longbottom. Young Death Eaters most of all.” He didn’t know all of the loyal students within the school, but he knew enough to know that they did not have the brains nor the skill to catch Harry unawares, not even if the boy was… distracted. Not after all the training Severus had put him through.

“Unfortunately, gentlemen, I believe we’re looking at something worse than Death Eaters,” he told them grimly. “There’s only one person who can manipulate the school wards in a way that even an heir cannot fight back.”

The two boys shared a look of slowly dawning horror.

Albus Dumbledore had finally reclaimed his Chosen One.

.-. .

The world returned to Harry in fragments, fuzzy around the edges and ringing in his ears.

He was horizontal. Not on the floor — something soft. His limbs were splayed, a tightness around his wrists and ankles that grew tighter when he tried to move.

He was tied to a bed. Blinking away the fuzziness, he craned his neck, confirming the suspicion. A plain double bed, pale grey sheets, ropes thick with magic wrapped securely around him, connected at the other end to the sturdy wooden posts at each corner of the bed.

His attacker had let him keep his glasses on. How kind of them. He looked around — the room was nondescript, with cream-coloured walls and no features but the door directly opposite. No portraits, no wardrobe, not so much as a side table. There was a candle bracket on each wall, but that didn’t do Harry much good.

Beyond that, everything was… muffled. Like Harry was in a jar with the lid on, trapped away from the rest of the world. He couldn’t feel his connection to Hogwarts, outside of a faint persistence in the very back of his mind.

He could barely feel his own magic.

That, more than anything else, set his heart racing in terror. He closed his eyes, trying to steady his breathing, to look inwards at his own magical core. It was like trying to swim through cement. The very attempt made him exhausted, slumping back against the mattress. It wasn't gone, he could feel at least that much. It was just... blocked. Restrained, much like he himself was.

When the door opened, Harry wasn't surprised at who greeted him.

"Ah, Harry, my boy. You're awake." The headmaster swept into the room, face the epitome of a kindly old grandfather — except for the threat in his eyes, of course.

"Where am I?" Harry asked, glaring at the man. Dumbledore smiled, conjuring a chair to take a seat beside the bed.

It wasn't the room that blocked magic, then. That was good to know.

"Somewhere safe," Dumbledore assured, making him scoff. "I'm sorry for the somewhat... unorthodox method of getting you here, but I did not think you'd be willing to come quietly."

"Unorthodox," Harry repeated cynically. "Kidnapping, you mean."

The old man's beard twitched as he frowned. "It is for your own good, my boy. You will come to understand that, soon." Then, he smiled, a somewhat unhinged light in his eyes. "I must say, you gave me far more than I expected, bringing you here like this."

Harry's stomach turned. "What do you mean?" Fear gripped him. "What did you do to me while I was unconscious?" Had he stolen Harry's magic? Linked himself to it, like a parasite, like he once had the castle wards?

"Oh, nothing sinister," Dumbledore said with a chuckle. He reached into an inside pocket of his robe, pulling out a folded pile of silky fabric — Harry's invisibility cloak. "Merely, I did not expect you to be carrying this little marvel. My, if only I had known what it truly was, when it was last in my possession. I should never have given it back to you — no matter how necessary it was for my plans. Letting you sneak about the castle, hidden even from me. I should have known then what it was..."

Harry stared at him, utterly bewildered. It was an invisibility cloak — of course Harry was hidden beneath it? That was the whole point!

"Now that I know the truth, now I have the knowledge of the Peverell family secret. I have all three artefacts." He smiled, the expression sending a shiver of unease down Harry's spine. "I have become the Master of Death, my dear boy," he declared in a reverent tone. "A lifetime of searching, and you held the final piece all along. So you understand why I had to claim it back."

He'd gone mad. Dumbledore had truly lost it — Master of Death, what did that even mean? What did it have to do with the Peverells? And Harry's cloak?

Dumbledore leaned forward, and Harry wished he could scramble away, do anything to defend himself, but he was tied to that stupid bed! He was utterly helpless, alone in a room Merlin only knew where, with a madman who had kidnapped him for—what, exactly?

He flinched when Dumbledore's good hand patted him on the arm. "I wish things had gone differently, my boy," the headmaster said mournfully. "Truly, I do. Had you not gotten so... headstrong, perhaps this all could have been avoided."

"Had I not broken all your compulsions, you mean," Harry spat, glaring. "Had I stayed your good little Gryffindor pet, ready to sacrifice myself for the greater good — and your own damn glory?"

Dumbledore didn't react, merely sighing. "Those compulsions were for your own protection, Harry," he insisted. Harry wondered if he truly believed that, if he had genuinely convinced himself he was still doing the right thing. "There is a great evil within you. Within your scar. I had hoped, when I placed that magic on you, that it would be enough to help you shed that evil. To grow stronger than its influence, to remain firmly within the Light. Sadly, that is not the case. I'm afraid we have no other choice, my boy — you must die, for the evil to truly be vanquished. You must die for Lord Voldemort to be killed. The Prophecy demands it."

Harry goggled at him, but the headmaster didn't notice, continuing his sad stare. "I wish it did not have to be this way. I wish you had been given the chance to face your destiny in battle, as a true Gryffindor should," Dumbledore told him apologetically. "But you have long since proven that your own selfishness — the influence from the evil within you — will win out. I cannot trust you to do the right thing anymore, Harry. I must take that burden upon myself." He gripped Harry's forearm tighter. "Please, forgive me."

"Bullshit!" Harry argued. "I already know about the horcruxes. I know all about the evil you think is within me. It's gone, now — the goblins removed it this summer. Just like they removed all your compulsions, and the blocks on my family magic, back before my third year. It's not the influence of evil that's pulled me away from you, it's your own damn actions! You're the one who manipulated me, who influenced me — you changed my entire personality to fit your schemes, to turn me into the perfect little pawn — your weapon!" Dumbledore's fingers dug in painfully. "The only selfish one here is you, Dumbledore. Raising a child for slaughter just to make yourself the hero once again."

To his surprise, Dumbledore just chuckled, shaking his head. "You're just like him, you know," he said — Harry doubted he meant James Potter. "He always thought he knew absolutely everything; that only his viewpoint was the truth, and everyone else was just lying, manipulating him. I can see now his soul has tainted yours on a deeper level than I ever imagined possible."

"Tom Riddle's soul is nowhere near mine," Harry snarled. "The only taint on it was yours, and I freed myself from that long ago."

"It saddens me that you think so, Harry," Dumbledore murmured. "But that just proves even further that I must do what is necessary." He finally released Harry's forearm, stroking his beard. "The difficult decisions have often fallen to me — it is a burden that most would not bear, but it is necessary nonetheless. Once I have dealt with you, I can find the remaining horcruxes and finally rid the world of the darkness that has plagued it for so long now.” His smile turned sharp. “Maybe then everyone will stop believing those silly lies of yours and be properly grateful for everything I’ve done for them.”

He paused, chuckling to himself, glancing at Harry. “The thing they don’t tell you about power, my boy, is that once you have it, the people who gave it to you often have no idea what it truly takes to keep it. They think you can solve all of their problems, without the faintest idea of the work you do just to keep them alive and well.” He chuckled again, shaking his head. “But it is no matter.”

The headmaster leaned back in his conjured chair, expression turning thoughtful. “It surprises me to hear you speak of horcruxes — though perhaps it shouldn’t, considering how long you have been one. How long has he been whispering in your mind, I wonder?” He surveyed Harry sadly. “You never stood a chance, did you, my boy.”

Finally, he stood, pulling his wand from his pocket. Harry tensed. “I must return to the castle for a while — no doubt someone has noticed your absence. I must calm the students and direct the search to the appropriate places.” With a wave of his wand, the chair vanished. “Perhaps, if I play this carefully, your tragic demise at the hands of Death Eaters will be enough for Horace to finally tell me the truth of what he knows.” He pursed his lips. “How the man doesn’t see that we’re running out of time, I’ll never know. He’s always been a fool.”

Abruptly, he seemed to remember where he was, that he had company. He smiled that grandfatherly smile at Harry, raising his wand. “I am sorry about this, my boy, but I cannot risk you doing anything reckless before I can return.”

As magic began to gather around him, a stream of Latin pouring from his lips, Harry could do nothing but lie there and scream.

.-.-.-.

Neville didn’t care that he was missing classes. His teachers would understand — they, too, knew that Harry was missing by now. Everyone knew that Harry was missing by now.

After he’d left Snape’s office, Neville had gone to the Room of Requirement, asking for the Wardstone, hoping against hope that with his hands on the crystal he might be able to get a better view of what happened. Hogwarts obliged, but there was nothing more it could offer — just that darkened vision of Harry getting hit in the back with a Stunner, falling like a sack of soil.

That vision would haunt Neville’s sleep for a long time, after this.

He called Lord Black — Sirius — again, to tell him he’d gone to Snape as asked. Sirius was with Tonks and Kingsley Shacklebolt, which instantly made Neville feel better. He’d told them, what Snape said, about it being Dumbledore rather than Death Eaters. They looked like they’d come to that conclusion all on their own.

Neville felt so useless — he wasn’t powerful like Harry, or connected like Draco. He didn’t know half of what really went on in Harry’s life these days, only the things it was safe enough for him to know. Snape had told him to keep his head down and look out for anything suspicious. How was that possible, when everything could be suspicious? Ron and Hermione not looking remotely bothered by Harry's disappearance was suspicious. Lisa Turpin and Tracey Davies laughing about it was suspicious. The continuation of daily Hogwarts life was suspicious.

How could they all be expected to just keep going to classes as if nothing was wrong??

Finally, it was lunch time, and Neville immediately went to Hannah at the Hufflepuff table. Luna was there too, and half their friends, all with anxious and drawn faces. "Still no sign of him?" Susan asked Neville, and he shook his head.

"There's people on the case. Outside the school. The usual crowd," he told her, not willing to use names in such a public space. Susan nodded, brow furrowing.

"That's good. Merlin... how could this happen? Harry's usually so careful. You've seen what his reflexes are like!"

Indeed, it had become a bit of a game for a while in the HA, trying to catch Harry off guard. Sending spells at all moments, from all angles — every time, Harry was too quick on the draw with a shield or just ducking out of the way. Neville knew he'd trained for it — now, thanks to Draco, he knew it was Snape who'd done most of the training — but that meant it had to have taken a hell of a lot of power to take him down in one spell.

"He was a bit preoccupied," Neville did point out; Draco had admitted that they'd both been sleepy and satisfied when they'd parted ways, that Harry might not have been at his most alert.

But Neville had seen Harry go from dead asleep to awake and fighting within seconds before. With the castle's awareness around him, even being addle-brained from orgasms wouldn't leave him that unguarded.

Then again, this was Dumbledore they were talking about. Even with the heirs taking the wards, he was still headmaster of Hogwarts, still connected to the castle. And he had been doing shady business around the school for longer than all four of the heirs had been alive.

"Have you Seen anything, Luna?" he asked in an undertone, but the Ravenclaw shook her head sadly.

"There's too many wrackspurts," she told him. "Things are so shrouded. So many paths it could take."

That, more than anything else, made Neville feel sick. A future so uncertain... it didn't bode well for Harry at all.

"Budge up." He turned — it was Ginny, and she had Draco with her, the blond's face drawn. "You need to eat something. Both of you."

Neville looked down at the empty plate in front of him, then guiltily meet his girlfriend's brown eyes. "I can't stomach anything, Gin."

She huffed, and in a few moments there were two sandwiches in front of her — she nudged one towards Draco, then practically forced the second into Neville's hands. "Eat," she repeated firmly. "Starving yourself won't help Harry any."

She was right, and they both knew it. The sandwich tasted like cardboard, but Neville ate it anyway, his mind firmly elsewhere.

He hated this part of being Harry Potter's friend. The waiting. At least last year, when shit went down, he'd been able to go along, able to help and be useful and stand at Harry's side. This was like the third Triwizard task all over again — staring at a maze, worry bubbling in his gut, knowing Harry was in danger but not able to do anything about it.

Neville finished his sandwich, and was just about to ask Draco if he'd heard anything else, when all of a sudden the tension in the hall seemed to rise abruptly. He looked up, and saw red.

Dumbledore had just entered the hall, looking entirely unbothered, that damned genial smile on his face like there was nothing wrong at all. He strolled between the house tables as if it were any other day — as if he hadn't just kidnapped Neville's best friend.

Before he knew it, he was on his feet and stalking towards the headmaster. "Where is he?" he demanded, drawing his wand on the man. Dumbledore paused, brows rising — like Neville was a mild surprise, and not a legitimate threat.

He didn't know what Neville could do. He didn't know what Harry had taught him.

"Mr Longbottom, I'm quite sure I have no idea what you mean," Dumbledore began, but Neville wasn't cowed.

"Harry," he spat. "What have you done to him? I know you took him!" Everyone was staring at them. A vein in Dumbledore's temple twitched.

"You're mistaken, Mr Longbottom — perhaps Mr Potter has merely left of his own accord? His behaviour has been rather... erratic, this year. It is entirely likely he has decided the castle is no longer where he wishes to be." He frowned sadly. "I know how upset you must be by his betrayal, Mr Longbottom, and I would be happy to offer you a friendly ear. Or perhaps Madam Pomfrey; she understands how difficult grief can be to process."

Neville growled, and it was only the headmaster's quick reflexes that prevented his silent stunning charm from hitting. "Really, now!" Dumbledore scolded, frowning at him. "Attacking your teachers, no matter how upset you are, is not acceptable in this school! Ten points from Gryffindor, Mr Longbottom, and detention with Professor McGonagall tonight."

"I don't care about detentions!" Neville shouted. "I just want to know where you've taken Harry! I know it was you — you've wanted him out of the way ever since he broke out of your compulsions!"

“That is enough, Mr Longbottom,” Dumbledore scolded, his booming voice sending shivers down Neville’s spine. “Control yourself, and cease spreading the lies Harry Potter has told you.”

He strode past Neville, his lurid blue robes swishing as he went, and while Neville desperately wanted to throw another hex he knew it would be no good.

He turned away, eyes trailing over the students who had watched the entire exchange. They stared back, silent, knowing.

No one would believe that Harry had left Hogwarts of his own accord. Not after everything he’d done to protect it — not after everything he’d suffered within these walls without breaking. And especially not without taking Draco with him.

Dumbledore might have given him detention, but the damage was done. Neville could see the last vestiges of trust in the headmaster die a hundred times over, fading away in every pair of eyes looking back at him.

He straightened his shoulders, nodding decisively. He didn’t care what it took, how many detentions Dumbledore might put him in.

He would find Harry if it killed him.

Chapter 95

Albus Dumbledore was a very intelligent man, but he had been underestimating Harry Potter for most of the boy's life, and that didn't seem to have changed.

Harry lay on the bed, ropes still holding him down, his eyes closed as he sank through the thick, crushing barrier between himself and his magical core.

Or, rather, between his magical core and the outside world, the ability to actually use that magic.

He wasn't sure how long he'd been unconscious, after Dumbledore had left. There was no window, no way for him to tell the time. It could have been days, for all he knew. His stomach didn't ache yet, but he'd faced starvation before — he knew he could go at least a couple of days before he'd really start to feel it.

He'd woken with a strong, unquestioning faith in Albus Dumbledore, and a burning desire to do whatever the man bid. Even through the thick blanket keeping his magic locked up tight, he knew that sensation wasn't right, squirmed at the constriction of the brand new compulsions, stronger than anything he'd felt before. So strong it took a long, long time for him to even notice there was something wrong.

Harry dreaded to think what might have happened had Dumbledore returned while he was in that state, pliant and trusting with every truth he knew about the headmaster turned to insignificant chatter in the back of his mind.

But his magic was strong, now. His awareness of himself even stronger. He recognised the compulsions for what they were, spent what felt like hours trying to slough them off his magic. Had to use all his strength of will to dive deep within himself despite the barriers in place — whatever blockers Dumbledore had put on him, it stopped him using magic externally, stopped him blasting his way to freedom. But the magic within him, the magic trying to dig tendrils into his mind and whispering for him to trust his headmaster — that was a whole different matter. That was something Harry could work with.

And once those were out of the way, he could work on the rest.

He was sweating with exhaustion, straining everything he had within him. His muscles ached, his head pounded, but none of it mattered. His only awareness was his own magic, pushing as hard as he could against Dumbledore's vice grip. Harry had no idea how much time he had before his captor returned; every second was vital. Sure, if Dumbledore returned soon Harry could pretend to be under the compulsions, hope the old man let his guard down long enough for Harry to make a move. But that was relying on far too many chances.

Namely, the chance that Dumbledore wouldn't immediately kill him, determined to rid Harry of the evil within.

He could do this. He was far more powerful than Dumbledore realised, with the Slytherin family magic within him — the full family magic, awakened by the connection between the heirs.

Dumbledore, on the other hand, was old and dying and not nearly as strong as he once had been.

Harry could do this.

He pushed even harder, feeling things start to shift, like water pressing against a dam with a single crack in it. All that pressure, focused on the weakest spot, and eventually... it breaks.

The candles on the walls streamed with fire as Harry's magic surged out of him. At the same moment, the door slammed open — Dumbledore stood there with a thunderous expression, his wand raised. "How?" he gasped, gaping at Harry. Harry just smirked.

In an instant, his form twisted, shrinking down and sprouting fur — the ropes around him might be magical, but they still fell loose to the mattress when his skinny fox limbs slipped through them. He jumped off the bed, becoming human once more; his animagus form was good for subterfuge, but right now he needed to fight.

His wand was still in its holster, invisible to all but Harry, and it shot out at the twist of his wrist, smacking into his palm.

"Impossible," Dumbledore murmured, making Harry laugh.

"Not hardly," he retorted, ducking the spell sent his way and shooting one back in return. "You're not as strong as you think, old man."

He danced to the side, trying to draw Dumbledore in closer. He had to get out of there. He'd used up so much magic just breaking the spells on him, he didn't have much left for a proper duel.

As soon as Dumbledore stepped further into the room, Harry barrelled past him, putting up a shield at his back — stronger than anything they were taught in schools, enough to block even the dark hexes that Dumbledore was sending his way. The headmaster was not holding back; he wanted Harry under his control, or dead in the process.

Harry wasn't a fan of either of those options.

They seemed to be in a small cottage; at the end of the hallway was a cosy living room, and Harry's eyes widened at the sight of the front door. Then a spell seared past his temple, and he cursed, whipping around and firing a sickly yellow Compression curse in return. Dumbledore's eyes narrowed.

"And you say you haven't fallen to his influence," he said. Harry scoffed.

"It's no worse than what you've tried to hit me with," he taunted, gaze flicking between Dumbledore and his way out.

“You’re making a mistake, Harry,” the headmaster insisted, charming the curtain ties to try and wrap around Harry’s wrists. Harry burnt them to cinders, snarling. “You must accept the sacrifice you’re destined to make. For the sake of your loved ones, if nothing else. Whatever Tom has promised you, he’s lying.”

Harry couldn’t believe Dumbledore was still so stuck on the idea of Harry being warped by the horcrux in his head, having some sort of alliance with Voldemort because of it. Was he so arrogant, so blinded by his own actions, that he truly thought the only way Harry would turn against him was if he’d gone Dark? Not just because he was pissed the man had been controlling him since he was a baby? Had left him with the Dursleys, tried to separate him from the few people who genuinely loved him?

Dumbledore might have been a great man, once, back when he’d first fought Grindelwald. But he’d lost that long ago, in his search for more.

“He hasn’t promised me anything,” Harry spat, edging closer to the door. The Marauder’s Map, entirely blank, was on a table nearby, and he whipped out a hand to grab it. “But I’ve promised him death, and I can’t do that if you kill me for nothing. The horcrux is gone — all the horcruxes are gone. Barring one or two.” He didn’t need Dumbledore knowing the specifics, lest he do something foolish. “I’ve done more for this war in the last year than you’ve done in the last decade, and I will end this. And then I’ll end you, too. Everyone will know the truth of what a manipulative, selfish, dangerous person you really are. Your legacy will be nothing but ashes and spite.”

He grinned at the rage in the headmaster’s blue eyes, dodging the spell fired his way — straight towards the door, which opened under another strong blast of his magic, so strong it almost made his head spin.

Severus always told him that fury was a person’s worst enemy. It made them sloppy, impulsive. It seemed even the glorious Albus Dumbledore was not immune to such flaws.

Harry ran through the open door, stumbling on weak legs, clumsy as the adrenaline burning through him finally began to run out. His magic was barely a sputtering flame within him. But as he crossed the line of the wards around the property, felt them tingle on his skin, he hoped it was enough. He thought of home, turning on his heel, and with a sensation like being turned inside out and a crack as loud as a gunshot he was gone.

He hit grass, and fell to his knees. It was dark, but a faint sliver of sunshine brushed the trees around him — sunrise. He’d been gone more than twenty-four hours.

There was a shout, his name maybe, and footsteps. A hand on his shoulder, amber eyes glowing in the low light. Harry smiled. “Remus,” he rasped, reaching up to grasp the man’s cardigan. His shoulder burned with the effort. “Was Dumbledore. Got me. Wants me dead.”

“Harry, what happened? Are you hurt?” Remus kneeled in front of him, but Harry’s brain finally decided it had had enough.

The world turned sideways, and Harry was out before his head hit the ground.

.--.

Remus stared at the boy in the bed before him. Sleeping — or unconscious — the blanket pulled up over his bare chest, several thin pink lines tracing across his dusky brown flesh.

Harry was lucky. Whatever he'd done, wherever he'd apparated in from, he'd been so close to magical exhaustion he'd splinched himself to high hell. Chunks missing from his arms, his legs, his sides — only that damned Potter luck had kept him from losing anything important.

He'd been lucky, too, that Severus had been at the house for the night, the pair of them headed back out for another day of searching — Severus to the school, Remus to talk to Aberforth Dumbledore and see if he knew where his brother might be hiding away. Any later and Harry would have laid there all morning and bled to death. Much earlier and he'd have done the same all night.

So many things could have gone wrong; so many ways he could have lost his cub. Remus swallowed back a sob, squeezing the bony hand wrapped securely within his own.

The door creaked. He looked up, something in his chest easing at the sight of Severus sweeping in, black teaching robes billowing out behind him, The Slytherin's dark eyes trailed over the unconscious boy, lips pursing in a worried frown. Then he turned to Remus, gaze softening. "No change, then?"

"Not so much as a twitch," Remus reported. Two long strides had Severus across the room, standing at Remus' side. The werewolf leaned his head against Severus' hip, shoulders slumping. "I just want him to be okay, Severus."

"You and I both," Severus agreed quietly, his hand settling on Remus' shoulder. "Word has reached the school — of Harry's return, and Albus' betrayal. The headmaster's office has been emptied; he's fled, it seems. In and out before anyone even knew to look for him."

Remus scowled. "Fucking coward."

"Quite." Severus' long fingers squeezed his shoulder, sliding up to stroke the back of his neck. "But at least we no longer have to put up with him. He will never set foot on Hogwarts grounds again — Longbottom and his compatriots have promised that much."

That cheered Remus up a bit — Severus had told him all about Neville standing up to the headmaster at lunch the day before, even going so far as to trying to hex him. Harry would be proud of his friend, when he woke up.

If he woke up.

He shook the thought off — Harry was stable, they'd healed his injuries. He only had the magical exhaustion to recover from, and that would come with time. He would wake up.

He leaned further into Severus' side, burying his face in the soft wool of the man's robe, inhaling the scent of potions ingredients that always lingered on his partner. Severus stood as strong as always, holding Remus up, never faltering. He had to be just as exhausted — more so, even, after the magic he'd expended keeping Harry alive.

"Where's Sirius?" he asked absently, arm winding around Severus' leg.

"Spreading the word amongst the Weasleys," Severus replied. "He promised he would not go off on his own in search of revenge. Let's hope he has not persuaded one of those red-headed idiots to do so on his behalf."

Remus snorted weakly. He opened his mouth to reply, but his breath caught in his throat.

Harry's hand had tightened around his, just a bit.

He sat up, eyes intently on his cub, looking for signs of wakefulness or distress or anything. "Harry? Harry, love, can you hear me?" Beside him, Severus tensed. The pair of them waited — Harry shifted ever so slightly, his lips curling in a faintly pained expression. Remus ignored his partner casting diagnostic spells, gaze fixed hopefully on the closed eyelids behind wire-framed glasses, watching them twitch until they eventually fluttered open, revealing confused green eyes.

He saw the moment of panic, felt Harry's hand clench around his. "It's okay," he soothed. "You're safe. You're home. We've got you, cub."

Harry's gaze flicked towards him, tension draining from his shoulders. "Hurts," he said, grimacing.

"Yes, I'd imagine it does. Drink this," Severus instructed, pulling a vial from his pocket and holding it to Harry's lips. The Gryffindor boy drank without hesitation, the pain potion flooding his system and bringing a relieved smile to his lips.

"Thanks, Sev," he murmured, and Remus hid a smile at the faintly taken-aback look on his lover's face — hardly anyone dared call him Sev, these days. "What happened?"

"We were rather hoping you'd tell us, actually," Remus said, thumb stroking the back of Harry's hand. "Neville called Sirius on the mirror yesterday morning — he said no one had seen you since the night before, and they were worried. He knew you weren't in the castle, so we searched everywhere; every known residence of Dumbledore's, every connection we could think of, every lead we dared follow with the Ministry under Voldemort's control."

"You apparated in to the wardline just before eight this morning, told us that Dumbledore wanted you dead, and passed out," Severus revealed. "You'd splinched yourself in eight different places, you foolish boy."

Harry grimaced again. "Explains why I feel like I've been sent through a wood chipper." He craned his neck, looking down at himself. "I was only gone a day, then? Good. That's— that's good."

Remus' stomach clenched; how long had he thought it had been. "Cub," he started softly. "Can you... will you tell us what happened? What he did to you?" The longer he sat there imagining it, the worse it got in his mind.

Pain flickered across Harry's face. "Help me sit up," he requested. Eagerly, Remus did so, piling up the pillows and bracing Harry as he shuffled up the bed. "I... I was out of it for most of the day, I'll be honest. But I'll tell you what I remember. And—and then I need to go back to school."

"Harry, you need to rest—"

"I need to see my friends," Harry insisted stubbornly. "I need them to know I'm okay. I'm fine, I'm just tired and a bit sore. I can rest at school." He reached up a hand to rub at his face. "I need to go back, Moony. I—I can't let him win."

His heart clenched fiercely in his chest. This boy... he'd already dealt with so much, and he still got up fighting.

Lily and James would be so very proud of their son.

"Once you have told us everything," Severus drawled, "then we shall see if you can remain awake long enough to get dressed. Then we will consider returning you to school."

Harry grinned at them both, and Remus knew then that he would absolutely be escorting the determined little idiot back to school before the day was up.

God, what he wouldn't give for his cub to just get a break, for five minutes.

.-.-.-.

As soon as Harry let go of Ceri's hand when they arrived in Snape's office, he was crushed in a tight hug, the scent of Draco's aftershave tickling his nose and turning him to jelly in his boyfriend's arms. "Don't you dare scare me like that again, Scarhead," Draco growled, lips pressed to his temple. "Fuck. I thought you were dead!"

Harry swallowed tightly — he'd thought the same, for a while there. "I'm okay," he promised instead, pulling back to give Draco a soft, tender kiss. "I'm back. It's fine."

"It's not fine." Harry's head snapped up in surprise — Neville was there too, glaring at him. "Do you have any idea how worried we all were?" The tall Gryffindor squeezed his way past Draco, giving Harry a brief hug of his own. "Swear to Merlin, you're not allowed to go anywhere on your own anymore." The relief in his hazel eyes was clear, and Harry chuckled lightly.

"If you want to wait outside the Room of Requirement while I'm with Draco, by all means, be my guest," he drawled teasingly. "But people will talk."

Neville snorted. "Git." He squeezed Harry's shoulder. "Are you okay? Are we taking you to the Hospital Wing?"

A look of disgust flashed across Harry's features. "Merlin no. Dinner's still going, right?" It had taken him long enough to convince the two overbearing fusspots he called his godfathers that he was fine to go back to school. Only Snape's assurance that he would keep a stern eye on Harry and make sure he didn't get up to any shenanigans kept them from coming to Hogwarts with him!

Harry was fairly sure that between Snape, Draco and his friends, he wasn't likely to be able to do much as take a piss by himself without someone trying to help.

He knew it came from a place of love, but it was going to get old very quickly if they kept it up.

After a nod of approval from the Slytherin professor, the three boys left the office, taking a castle-provided passage to make it look like they were coming to the Great Hall from upstairs; there would be far too many questions if Harry arrived from the dungeons. Snape was still keeping cover as a Death Eater, after all.

"Harry's back!"

"Look, it's Potter!"

"He's alive!"

All through the hall, shouts of Harry's name went up, all in varying levels of surprise and awe. Harry grimaced to himself; the rumours that were likely to come from this little escapade were going to be ridiculous. Already people thought him some sort of super-human; now he'd have to admit he sort-of duelled Albus Dumbledore and lived.

He barely made it ten feet in before he was surrounded by his friends, all of them skidding to a halt just shy of actually hugging him, curtailed by Draco's glare. "Give him space," the blond muttered, and Harry rolled his eyes.

"I'm fine," he said, kissing the boy's cheek. Then he raised his eyes to the rest of the group. "I'm fine," he repeated, louder. "Not allowed to use magic for a day or so, but fine." His core was recovering nicely, Snape had assured him. By Monday he'd be totally back to normal — he wouldn't even have any scars from his splinching.

"Are you actually fine or just pretending because Merlin forbid Harry Potter show weakness ever," Ginny cut in sharply, rolling her eyes.

"You can come with me to get checked out by Pomfrey in the morning if you want?" Harry offered, shrugging.

"I think I will." Only then did the redhead's stern expression crack, and she darted forward for a quick hug. "Good to have you back, Harry."

"Thanks, Gin."

"What happened?" Parvati asked, then blushed brightly as all eyes turned to her. "Sorry. You don't have to tell us."

"No, it's fine. I was going to," Harry assured. "Just — let me sit down, first?"

He was all too aware of the entire school watching him; he only wanted to have to tell this story once. Relaying it to Remus and Snape had been bad enough. So, with that in mind, he sat on top of the Ravenclaw table, his feet on the bench, his body half propped up by Draco at his side. The blond thrust a plate of shepherd's pie in his lap, giving him a pointed look. Harry could eat and talk, he supposed.

"I was walking back to Gryffindor late on Wednesday night. After curfew, sorry professors," he added with a wink towards the blatantly eavesdropping staff table. A few people giggled. "I was tired, so I wasn't really paying attention. Next thing I know I'm getting a high-powered Stunner to the back."

He told the enraptured crowd everything he remembered — glossing over the specifics of horcruxes and the weird Master of Death thing, just saying that Dumbledore kept insisting there was evil in his scar and he needed to die to get it out. He made it clear that the headmaster had admitted to the compulsions, with his reasoning that it was a 'precaution' to stop Harry going evil. He also, finally, confessed about the blocks on his magic. That revelation caused more than a few horrified faces in the crowd; those who understood exactly what it would mean to block the family magics of someone like Harry.

"His original plan was to keep the blocks up and then release them while I was fighting Voldemort — kill me, kill the Dark Lord, end it all. Probably kill everyone in a thirty-foot radius, too, but... I don't think Dumbledore really cared about those kinds of consequences, anymore," Harry said with a shrug. "When he realised I'd broken the blocks, I guess he decided he had to kill me himself."

"That's barbaric," someone whispered, their voice carrying over the shocked silence in the hall. Harry's lips twisted wryly.

"So now everyone understands why I've been ignoring the headmaster all year, yeah?" he joked, earning a few weak chuckles.

"Why didn't you say something sooner?" came a bold call from the Gryffindor section of the hall. Harry raised an eyebrow.

"Would anyone have believed me?" he retorted. "Half of you thought I was mad anyway." A lot of people ducked their heads abashedly. "It doesn't matter, now. Dumbledore's out of Hogwarts, and he's going to stay that way." There was no way the headmaster would recover from this. Harry wasn't going to let him.

"What happens now?" someone asked loudly. "Dumbledore was the only reason You-Know-Who stayed away from the school!"

That sparked a flurry of worried mutters, but Harry didn't falter. "If Voldemort thinks the school is vulnerable now that Dumbledore's gone, he should remember that I just duelled Dumbledore and won," he said plainly. "We don't need Albus Dumbledore to protect us. We can protect ourselves."

He looked down at his left, where Luna sat on the bench, her pale eyes intent. She nodded, ever so slightly. Harry smiled. "More than that, Hogwarts can protect itself," he added. "The castle has woken the heirs for the first time in centuries.” He smirked, eyes flashing. “And for all Lord Voldemort calls himself the heir of Slytherin, only one of us has the family magic running through our blood.”

He flicked his fingers, and — much like at the end of year feast — all the drapes in the Great Hall turned green and silver, replacing the school crest with the Slytherin crest. Gasps rang through the room.

Then, Hannah scoffed. “Stop showing off, Potter,” she scolded, getting to her feet. With a flourish of her hand, half of those drapes were black and yellow, flying the badger rampant.

“Both of you are ridiculous.” Neville waved his arm, bringing the Gryffindor banners into the mix. Amused, all three of them stared expectantly at Luna. She giggled, clapping her hands together, completing the set — all four houses were represented equally, as they should be.

“This is fun!” she enthused.

You could have heard a pin drop. Harry looked to his fellow heirs, chin tilting in a slight nod; they knew what they had to do. He got off the table, taking Luna’s hand, Neville and Hannah joining them as they walked towards the staff table.

“Minerva McGonagall,” Harry called, and the woman sat up straighter in her chair. “You stand as deputy headmistress of Hogwarts school. Due to the unsuitable nature of Albus Dumbledore to continue his position; we, the heirs of Hogwarts, entrust our school into your protection. You have served the castle well for many years, and we know you will continue to do so for many more. For the benefit of your students, not for yourself.” He grinned at his housemistress. “Do you accept, Headmistress McGonagall?”

McGonagall sat there for a moment, speechless - a first for the Scottish witch. When she regained her senses, she stood, bowing to them. “I am honoured to accept, and vow to do everything within my power to protect the inhabitants of Hogwarts school, to see them safely through their education and prepare them for life to follow.”

A spark of magic shuddered through Harry, through all four of them, into McGonagall — connecting her to the wards of the school. And, more importantly, disconnected Dumbledore for good. At once, the drapes all furled up again, and when they unrolled they were back to their usual black, proudly displaying the Hogwarts crest. A school united once more.

Hogwarts had accepted the appointment. Minerva McGonagall was the new headmistress.

As a cheer went up around the hall, particularly loud from those dressed in red and gold, Harry watched McGonagall blink, no doubt startled by how intimate the connection to the castle truly could be. “It takes a bit of getting used to,” he told her, and her eyes narrowed in his direction.

“And how long exactly have you been getting used to it?”

He laughed, winking. “Only since Hannah turned seventeen,” he assured. “As far as the castle is concerned, one of us of age is as good as all of us of age.”

She shook her head in faint amazement. “Just when I think you’ve run out of ways to surprise me, Potter.”

He laughed again, louder this time — and swayed, his shoulder bumping Neville’s. His taller friend steadied him with an arm around his waist. “That’s enough for you for one day, then,” he declared, voice lightly chiding. “Pretty sure even castle-magic counts as magic that you’re not supposed to be doing.”

Harry wanted to argue, but his vision was starting to swim, his blood feeling sluggish in his veins. Maybe he had overdone it a little bit.

“You disaster of a wizard.” That was Draco, as affectionate as he was deeply unimpressed, and Harry smiled when he half leaned, half fell into his boyfriend’s embrace. “Come on, up to bed with you.”

“Mm, as long as you’ll be there too.” This whole damn problem had started because Harry couldn’t stay the night in the same bed as Draco; to hell with that, now.

He gave a vague wave to the people who called out to wish him goodnight, letting Draco lead the way out of the hall. The blond poked him gently in the side. “Go on, then, give us a shortcut.”

Harry grinned, nudging the castle in the back of his mind. Hogwarts was more than happy to oblige — he thought it still felt bad for not doing more to warn him about Dumbledore lurking in the dark. He tried to send reassuring thoughts in its direction; the castle couldn’t be blamed for that. Dumbledore was a tricky little bastard at the best of times.

One staircase behind a tapestry magically took them up seven whole flights, spitting them out behind the tapestry of the trolls doing ballet. The Room of Requirement was already waiting for them, looking exactly like Harry’s room back at Seren Du. Harry let out a long sigh as he collapsed onto the bed, the strain finally starting to catch up with him, pounding at his temples. “I’m going to feel like shit in the morning,” he announced.

“Good thing you promised Ginny you’d go to Pomfrey, then, isn’t it?” Draco replied, unsympathetic, even as he pulled Harry’s shoes off his feet. Harry undid his Gryffindor tie with clumsy fingers, feeling almost drunk as he tried to help Draco undress him, the blond patient and gentle even as the worry returned to his grey eyes. Draco stripped himself quickly, tugging back the duvet and crawling into bed in just his underwear. Harry rolled over, claiming the blond like his own personal teddy bear, burying his face in the curve of Draco’s neck.

“For a while I thought I’d never have this again,” he admitted in a heartbroken whisper. “Never hold you again.”

Draco’s arms wound around him, pulling him impossibly closer, like the two of them were trying their best to merge into one being. “You’re stuck with me, Potter,” Draco reminded fiercely. His voice was thick — was he crying? Harry couldn’t tell. “You promised me that.”

The lights dimmed of their own accord, and the only sound was the steady breathing of the two boys, entwined together like they would never again let go, slowly drifting off to sleep.

.-.-.

McGonagall's first act as headmistress was to cancel all of Friday's classes, so everyone could adjust to the events of the week. None of them were going to argue with that. At breakfast — after a brief detour to the Hospital Wing, where Madam Pomfrey confirmed Snape's findings on Harry's health — Harry sidled up to the staff table, where the new headmistress was reading a scroll with one hand and eating toast with another. "Is there anything myself or the other heirs can do to make things easier for you?" he asked, earning a keen-eyed look from the woman.

"I daresay you've enough on your plates as it is," she returned. "Not to worry, Mr Potter — there has been enough disruption to this school year that I feel a little more cannot make things much worse." Her lips quirked ruefully. "Though for future disruption, a warning would be appreciated."

Harry laughed. "I'll do my best, but no promises." In response, McGonagall just clicked her tongue and shooed him away, back to where Draco sat with their friends. The mood in the hall was somber, almost shell-shocked. Even those who knew the truth of Dumbledore had not expected him to fall so far so fast.

"I wonder how long it'll take for word to spread," he mused, glancing around as the morning post arrived. It was barely a handful of owls these days, most of which were Prophet delivery birds. Since returning after Christmas, the whole population of the school seemed to have agreed that they were buckled down for the long haul, a small pocket of sanctuary away from the disruption of the rest of the world. Letters to loved ones were risky, now.

The news that Albus Dumbledore had kidnapped and tried to murder Harry Potter would likely make it out of the castle sooner rather than later, but with practically everyone outside of Hogwarts either in hiding or under Voldemort's thumb, it may not make it much further than that.

"Likely just rumours, until after the war," Draco pointed out. "Even if the Prophet did write anything, no one would believe it these days." He sent a disparaging glance at Susan's copy of the paper; she was the only one of their group who bothered, insisting that someone needed to be aware of the enemy's propaganda.

"It's a shame we can't spread word some other way," Harry sighed. "I can't—I don't want this getting swept under the rug as just more war bullshit." A lot of questionable actions would be forgiven in the name of wartime, and he worried most of Dumbledore's crimes would end up under the same umbrella. Even with the old man dying from a dark curse, the idea of people heralding his name and idolising him long after he was dead made him sick to his stomach.

Albus Dumbledore deserved to be thought of with disdain, posthumously.

Better yet, he deserved to be forgotten. A footnote in the passage of history. At best, a tale of warning about how power could corrupt even those who seemed the most trustworthy of souls.

“Over Christmas, Fred and George were talking about setting up a secret Wireless station,” Ginny volunteered. “But I don’t know if they’ve managed. Whether they could do it safely.”

That was an interesting idea. Harry had mostly given up listening to the Wireless these days — all of the stations were either pretending everything was fine, or broadcasting from mainland Europe with very little understanding of just how dire things were in the UK.

“Daddy will have to go into hiding soon anyway,” Luna piped up, in her usual dreamy voice. “The time is coming. He won’t mind one last rebellion in the Quibbler.”

Harry’s eyes widened. “Are you sure? I don’t want to put him in danger.” He’d never met Luna’s dad, but she spoke so fondly of him, and he was the only family Luna had left these days.

She smiled and nodded. “It will be worth it.”

“If he needs somewhere to go,” Harry said, meeting Luna’s gaze seriously, “I can get him in and out in less than an hour.” It would only take a quick message to Sirius and Mr Lovegood would be safe at the Pottery.

“Thank you, Harry. But I think Daddy is going to take a nice long trip to Finland. He’s been wanting to get a close look at the Peikko for a while now anyway.” She smiled sweetly — a smile that brightened when Daphne strolled over, dropping a kiss on her girlfriend’s lips.

“I’m going to get some air, since we don’t have classes. Care to join me, hun?”

“Bring me whatever you write before dinner, and I’ll make sure it gets to Daddy safely,” Luna said to Harry, before slipping her hand into Daphne’s and skipping from the hall.

Harry turned back to Susan, who already had a quill and parchment out, an eager light in her eyes. “Guess I know what we’re doing today, then,” he mused. Turning to Draco, he gave an apologetic half-smile. “You’re welcome to go find something else to do, love. This is probably going to take most of the day.”

“If you think I’m letting you out of my sight for even a second, you’re more of an idiot than I thought you were,” Draco replied without hesitation. Susan wasn’t quick enough to mask her giggles. Harry just sighed, swiping a quick kiss across Draco’s cheek.

“Your loss. Let’s find somewhere more private, then, shall we?”

There was a lot of work to do in a very short time.

.-.-.-

Despite Draco’s insinuation that he was just there to make sure Harry didn’t get into trouble again, he ended up being a huge asset to the process — as Lucius Malfoy’s son and heir, he knew a lot more than either of them about political machinations and how best to uncover them.

Between the three of them, they managed to write out a fairly large exposé of Albus Dumbledore's true crimes, as they pertained to one Harry James Potter — with the note that a full legal case against the ex-headmaster, including other crimes, was being assembled by Harry's lawyer and Amelia Bones.

"Will your aunt appreciate us naming her like this?" Harry asked warily. Susan gave a sharklike grin in response.

"Oh, she'd kill me if we didn't," came her cheerful reply. "She's safe as houses at the Longbottom's, and it'll be one hell of a feather in her cap once we're back to having a Ministry that actually cares about these sorts of things. She'll want to be at the head of the whole affair." She reached in with her quill, correcting a sentence regarding Dumbledore's belief that Harry had evil in him due to his brush with the Dark Lord. Harry was most wary of including that part — he didn't want Voldemort to catch wind of it and start making assumptions. Even though there was no longer a horcrux in Harry's scar, if Voldemort grew concerned... he might decide to go and check on the rest of his precious treasures.

Much better to paint it as the ramblings of an old man who decided to condemn a toddler to death before he reached maturity, just because he'd decided that was the way the world must be.

"Your lawyer is already in hiding, isn't she?" Draco checked, a small frown worrying at his lips. Harry nodded.

"Called Sirius about it just before Yule." It was the reason Vicky had stayed at school over Christmas — not that she seemed to have minded, considering how close her and Colin had grown over the break. Mr and Mrs Frobisher were safely at one of the smaller Black properties, a cottage off the coast of Devon. There were one or two others hiding out there with them, as far as he knew. With their known connection to Harry from the Rita Skeeter debacle, no one had wanted to risk them.

"Good. Then go ahead and name them, it'll give it more clout."

Harry's eyes were drawn to the cobalt blue tail of Draco's quill, resting lightly against the swell of his lower lip. It would be so tempting to knock it out of the way, replace that touch with his own mouth. As Draco leaned in to write something else, Harry's gaze trailed lower, down to where the sleeves of his green silk shirt were rolled up to his elbows, revealing porcelain-pale forearms dusted lightly with fine blond hair. His right hand held his quill, his left splayed on the table beside it, and for a while Harry fantasised about the ring in his room back home, how it might look sat on that fine-boned hand.

"—rry. Harry?" He snapped back to attention, blushing slightly under Susan's knowing gaze. "Come on, Harry. We just need to finish this up, then you can ogle your boyfriend all you like."

That made Draco whip his head around to look at Harry, almost—surprised? Harry just shrugged unrepentantly at both of them.

“Why are you ogling me, I’m not even doing anything,” Draco muttered, rolling his eyes, a faint flush rising in his cheeks. Harry winked.

“You’re pretty, I can’t help myself. And you’ve got your sleeves rolled up. You know how I feel about that.”

“His sleeves?” Susan snorted. “What are you, a Victorian maiden, going faint at the sight of bare skin?”

“Look, I can appreciate a man with great forearms, alright?” Harry defended. “Let me stare at my boyfriend in peace, honestly. Give that over.” He held out a hand for the parchment they’d been using, brow furrowing as he read through what they’d written so far.

“I think this ought to do it.” Any more detail and they risked exposing one of the many things Harry would prefer to keep hidden. “God, this is weird. We spent so long trying to hide this stuff...”

“Feels strange to just put it all in the open like that,” Susan agreed. “But Dumbledore kind of forced your hand.”

“Understatement,” Draco muttered derisively. “You’re happy with it, though, Harry?” His face was earnest, concerned. “None of that has to go public if you don’t want it to. I’m sure Amelia has plenty of other things to pin on him once the Wizengamot can safely reconvene.” He placed a hand — the hand Harry had just been daydreaming about — on Harry’s knee, squeezing gently.

Much like his previous articles for the Quibbler, Harry knew he just had to say the word and the whole idea would be scrapped. No one was going to force him to air his personal trauma for public consumption.

He shook his head. “Dumbledore might have targeted me, but his actions impacted all of us. I don’t want to risk even the chance that he might worm his way out of this one — and that means piling as much shit on him as possible.” Amelia might be able to find plenty more to bury Dumbledore with, but Harry doubted much of it would be quite so cut and dry as what had been done to him, nor half as impactful. Especially once he killed Voldemort and became the darling of the wizarding world once more.

Giving the statement one last scan over, he set it back on the table. “I’m happy with it if you two are.” He paused, smirking. “And I’m not just saying that so I can go back to ogling my boyfriend.” As he spoke he twined his fingers with Draco’s, bringing the blond’s hand to his lips. Susan just huffed.

“One day the two of you will get over this honeymoon phase thing you’ve got going, and the rest of us will be able to spend time with you without wanting to vomit,” she declared bluntly, making Harry laugh.

"I dunno, Sooz — it's been over two years. I think this might just be us forever," he said, only half-joking. The Hufflepuff's only response was a despairing groan, and her chair scraping stone as she got to her feet.

"If we're done with the article, I'm out," she said, throwing her hands in the air. "Don't forget to take that to Luna, alright?"

Harry murmured an affirmation, gaze fixed on Draco's — only once the redhead was out of the room did the two boys start laughing.

"We're not that bad, are we?" Harry asked. Draco's answering look was fond.

"Darling, we're exactly that bad," he informed his boyfriend.

"Oh. Well, I'm not sorry. You're gorgeous and I like looking at you."

The blond boy preened, smirking in satisfaction. "You're not so bad yourself," he returned magnanimously, leaning in for a languid kiss. "Besides, Susan's just jealous. The only kind of PDA Theo understands is offering to murder her enemies for her."

Harry snickered — the quiet Slytherin wasn't that reserved, just a bit... aggressively bloodthirsty, sometimes.

Theo and Susan were alike in many ways, except she preferred to go for the metaphorical jugular while he went right for the literal one. Harry felt very sorry for any politician that dared attempt to stand in their way.

And very sorry for any of his friends that were hoping he and Draco were going to get less sappy in future — Harry had zero intentions of reeling that in, and with a role model like Sirius Black, he was fairly certain he couldn't even if he tried.

.-.-.-.

Since he'd promised his friends and family that he would take it easy in the wake of his kidnapping and near-death, Harry declined the afternoon invitation from some of the quidditch team to go flying with them, instead lying on the sofa in Snape's private quarters, working on plans for the HA while Snape and Draco brewed together. Then, an hour before dinner, he promised both of them he would do his level best to not get kidnapped again, and set off to find Luna.

With the castle pointing the way — the heirs were always the easiest to find — Harry discovered the blonde girl out by the edge of the lake, her bare feet dug in the muddy bank despite the fact that it was still January and there was snow on the ground. "If you get frostbite, Daphne is going to kill me before Voldemort can," he said, and Luna giggled.

"I put on a Warming charm," she assured. "Sometimes I just like to feel the earth between my toes."

"If you like." Harry shrugged, then held out an envelope containing the article he and Susan and Draco had spent all morning working on. "It's all in there. Your dad can tweak it a bit if he wants, but... that's all the important facts.”

“I doubt Daddy will need to edit anything. You've always been a very compelling writer.” Luna tucked the envelope safely in her cardigan pocket.

“Thanks, Luna. I hope everyone who reads it thinks the same.” There was still a very stubborn, very real part of Harry that was convinced everyone who read it would think he was a lying, attention seeking little brat.

That part of him usually spoke in Dolores Umbridge’s voice.

“Your voice is going to change the way that thousands of people view the world,” Luna told him, a confident Otherness to her voice. “Not just in this article, but in many things.”

Something uneasy squirmed in Harry’s stomach. He leant back on his hands, the wet dirt cold under his palms. “I just want to kill a Dark Lord and play quidditch,” he sighed forlornly. “I don’t want to change the world. That’s for people like Susan. All I want is to have a world I’m happy to live in.”

“And that’s why you’re the best person to help change it,” Luna insisted with a secretive curl of a smile. “You’re not like him, Harry. You’re not like either of them.” Her eyes fairly glowed in the evening light. “Don’t let his poison stop you from doing the right thing. Trust your instincts.”

It was like a hand reached in between his ribs, gripping his heart tight. Harry coughed out a startled laugh. “Can never get anything past you, can I, Lu?” There was no use hiding from a Seer. “You’re sure, this isn’t too much?” The last thing in the world he wanted was to get into the habit of using his influence as the Boy-Who-Lived to sway public opinion around to his way of thinking. He didn’t want to become like Dumbledore. Or worse, like Tom Riddle.

“Presenting people with the truth and allowing them to make up their own minds is never too much,” Luna assured. “It’s not your fault the truth leads to only one sensible way of thinking.” She smiled, covering Harry’s hand with her own. “If you can’t trust yourself, trust that none of us who love you will let you turn into the thing you’d hate.”

Her words echoed through Harry’s mind, quashing the cruel, Umbridge-like voice into silence. The tension in his shoulders eased, a long breath escaping him.

She was right. He had plenty of people to keep him grounded. He would be alright.

He was only sixteen, after all. Even if most days he felt three times that age. He still had plenty of growing to do.

Chapter 96

Things were very different, with Dumbledore gone.

The heirs adjusted the wards as soon as Harry was cleared to do magic again, making sure the former headmaster couldn't set a single foot on Hogwarts grounds. Luna sent off the article for her father, assuring it would likely be out fairly soon — one last issue, and then Xenophilius Lovegood would pack up his printing press and hide out until the storm had passed.

By Monday, Harry was more than ready to get back to classes and start doing something normal again. Draco had finally stopped watching him like he'd disappear if the blond turned away for more than a few seconds.

He could have done without their mutual decision to go back to their dorms at night instead of sleeping in the Room of Requirement, but it was necessary. If only to stop giving Neville a tiny heart attack every time he woke up and saw Harry's bed empty.

It was a relief, to walk into the DADA classroom after Ancient Runes. Finally, someone who wouldn't treat him like fucking glass.

At the front of the classroom, Professor Snape sneered at Harry in contempt, dark eyes flashing. Harry smirked back. He might be 'taking it easy' on his magical core, but there was still a lot of wiggle room there. A lot of ways Snape could take out his annoyance at Harry's continued existence, though they both knew Voldemort would have thrown a fit if Dumbledore had taken away his opportunity to destroy his fated enemy.

It was a mildly exhausted, but much more relaxed Harry who slumped into a seat at the Gryffindor table for lunch. Neville slid in beside him, looking shell-shocked. "That was brutal," he whispered, making Harry chuckle.

"He doesn't mean it," he said quietly, grinning. "It's fun."

Neville shot him a look that said he thought Harry had lost his mind, but didn't question it.

Potions after lunch was the opposite. Slughorn was bending over backwards to accommodate Harry, practically going so far as to brew his potion for him. "Just do whatever you feel up to, Harry, my lad!" the man kept saying, smiling slightly anxiously every time.

It would have been supremely annoying, had Harry not decided this was a perfect chance to get some answers.

When the class ended, Harry took his time packing up, brushing a kiss across Draco's cheek and murmuring that he'd follow in a moment. Draco caught on quickly, though still didn't look thrilled about leaving Harry alone with their teacher.

Maybe he hadn't quite stopped watching Harry like he'd disappear. But they'd get there.

“Can I help you, lad?” Slughorn asked when it was just the two of them. Harry perched on the edge of one of the worktables, thinking over his next words carefully. He’d only get one shot at this.

“I... I had a question, sir,” he started tentatively. “About— well. About something Dumbledore said when he...”

Slughorn paled behind his moustache. “Indeed? Something you think I can help you with? Not, say, Professor McGonagall?”

Harry shook his head. “He said... he was going to kill me and blame it on the Death Eaters. And then he said something about that prompting you to ‘finally tell him the truth about what you know’.”

“Oh.” Slughorn inhaled sharply, one hand flying out to brace himself on his desk. “He, ah, said that, did he?”

Harry fixed his features in a politely bewildered expression. “Do you know what he means, sir? He said that we were running out of time... what does he think you know?” He turned the full force of his plaintive green eyes on the man. “Is it something important?”

He tried not to fidget, as the silence stretched between them. This was the tipping point. This was where Slughorn either dismissed it as the ramblings of an insane old man — or Harry finally got some answers.

Slughorn sighed, running a hand over his balding head. “I never wanted it to come out like this,” he confessed. “A mistake of a much younger man, drawn in by a startlingly bright student of mine.”

“Tom Riddle,” Harry guessed, and Slughorn’s lips quirked.

“Indeed. You know who he became, I suspect?” Harry nodded. “Yes, well. These awful truths have a way of catching up to a person — remember that, Harry, when you get to my age.”

Harry was patient, watching Slughorn as the man’s eyes filled with the haze of nostalgia. “Tom was such an incredible young lad. Top of every class, liked by most students, absolutely adored by his teachers. Except Albus — he managed to see what the rest of us couldn’t.”

A sneer fought to take over Harry’s mouth, but he forced it away; how much of that was Dumbledore’s insight, and how much was him pushing young Tom Riddle away due to his dislike of Slytherins, and his distrust of those who could become more powerful than he was.

How much of Voldemort was Dumbledore’s creation, after all?

“The standard Hogwarts curriculum was child’s play for Tom, you understand. Much like I’m sure it is for you, eh, my boy?” Slughorn added with a chuckle, which faded with an awkward croak as he realised who he was comparing Harry to. “What I mean is, he often did his own research about forms of magic not commonly taught in school. And, as his housemaster, I was often the one he came to with questions on such things.”

Harry held his breath, not daring to interrupt in case it knocked Slughorn back into his shell. “One day, after one of my little suppers... Tom asked me about a rather obscure piece of magic he’d read about in a book. Dark, dark magic. Magic I was horrified he’d even heard of.”

Immediately, Harry knew what that was. “Horcruxes,” he whispered, and Slughorn flinched.

“You know about them, then?” he asked, voice wavering. Harry nodded. “I suppose you’d have to, considering...” The Potions Master shook his head. “Albus is a very persuasive man, you know. He wormed it out of me that I’d told Tom about them. Of course, I told him I’d shut Tom down and sent him packing!” He chuckled bitterly. “My greatest shame, Harry, is that one conversation with a fifteen year-old boy. Had I truly done what I told Albus I’d done, perhaps the world would not be where it is today!”

“He would’ve found the information elsewhere, sir,” Harry said gently. “People like him always do.”

Slughorn looked up, attempting a weak smile. “Kind of you to say so, my boy. And perhaps true. But perhaps not.” He sighed. “Nothing I can do about it now, though, is there?”

“So... what happened, when Tom Riddle asked about horcruxes?”

“Truly, Harry, I thought his questions were all academic,” Slughorn whispered. “Boys his age, of his ability — it’s not unusual for them to be drawn to the darker side of magic. Particularly the Slytherins. Ambition does not always follow morality, I’m sure you understand. But Tom was a good lad — I never... I didn’t think. Even after he graduated, when the whispers started rising... I truly thought he had dismissed that type of magic when I warned him away from it.”

The old professor shook his head mournfully. “It wasn’t until the night your parents were killed that I even thought of the possibilities. I spent years telling myself to stop worrying, stop assuming the worst. I almost believed it, too. And then he came back.”

When Slughorn met Harry’s gaze, it was with haunted, watery eyes. “This may not surprise you, Harry, considering what you must know by now. But when Tom Riddle asked me about horcruxes, he was not satisfied with the idea of only creating one.”

Harry’s breath hitched, but not from shock. “How many?” he pressed, hoping against hope that he would finally have a confirmation, an answer. Some relief. “How many did he want to make?”

“Tom was fascinated with Arithmancy,” Slughorn said, and it would have sounded like an entirely different conversation had Harry not known where it was leading, his heart in his mouth. “The way numbers could change the flow of magic. And by then, he knew that seven was the most magically powerful number...” The man trailed off, voice shaking too much to speak the rest aloud. Harry leaned in closer.

"Sir, this is really, really important," he said quietly. "When he spoke of the number seven — did he mean seven horcruxes, or seven soul pieces?"

Slughorn gaped at him soundlessly for a moment, then swallowed. "Soul pieces," he rasped. "He only mentioned soul pieces. I — you truly think he did it, then?"

When Harry nodded, Slughorn let out a gasp like a wounded man. "I know he did, sir. But if he only made six... that's very good news for us."

"Only," Slughorn echoed, choking on a laugh. "I suppose six murders were nothing compared to the rest he's done." He reached out, gripping the front of Harry's robe. "Please, Harry, do not think poorly of me for my mistake, terrible though it may have been. I didn't know. I couldn't know. He was only fifteen!" There was a wildness in Slughorn's eyes that alarmed Harry, and he put his hands over the man's pudgy fingers.

"It's okay, sir." How long had Slughorn been carrying this weight, this knowledge?

How long would he have kept it quiet, a bitter voice muttered in the back of Harry's mind.

If the Order had had this information back in the first war, when so many capable fighters were alive...

No. He couldn't think like that. They were still headed by Dumbledore, then, and the old man would have been just as tight-lipped on the subject as he was even now, determined to be the one to save everyone else.

But if Slughorn had taken the knowledge to a curse-breaker, to Gringotts...

Harry could go mad, thinking over the possibilities, the what-ifs. Looking at Slughorn, he wondered if the old professor hadn't done just that.

"Can you kill him, Harry?" Slughorn breathed, grip tightening. "Knowing what you know, what I've told you — can you truly destroy him? Is it... I could rest easier, knowing I may have absolved myself, just a little. Knowing there is a chance for someone to right the deep wrong I began all those years ago."

"I can do it," Harry said, not an ounce of doubt within him. "I'm a lot more prepared than Dumbledore ever thought I was. When the time comes, I can kill him."

Slughorn stared at him for such a long time Harry began to feel uncomfortable, the man's fingers still tight around his robe. Then, slowly, the professor released his grip. "Your mother was one of my favourite students, you know," he said softly. Eyes glassy, looking at Harry but not seeing him. "You're so much like her."

Harry smiled slightly. "So I've been told, sir."

Suddenly, Slughorn pulled back, wringing his hands anxiously. "You mustn't share what I've told you, Harry," he urged. "This knowledge — this knowledge should die with me. With us. With Tom Riddle. Should any of his followers discover the truth, decide to try their own hand at it... we would never be free."

It was too late for that, Harry wanted to say, but it was no good telling Slughorn how many people already knew about horcruxes.

Besides, they could all keep a secret.

“My lips are sealed,” he promised, watching the professor slump visibly.

“Good. Good lad.” Slughorn was shaking, eyes darting around nervously, desperate to get out of the conversation. “Merlin, is it too early for a drink?” he muttered to himself, turning towards his desk.

“Thank you, sir, for your honesty,” Harry said, shouldering his satchel. Slughorn scoffed.

“It’s far too late to be thanking me, Harry. Not after what I’ve done.” He smiled a thin, fragile smile. “But I appreciate your compassion. Now, off you go, before that young man of yours sends out a search party.” His eyes bulged, like he was worried he’d offended the Gryffindor, but Harry just laughed.

“Yeah, you’re probably right. I’ll see you later, Professor.”

Then he left the classroom, hardly daring to breathe until he was at least a corridor away. Only then did he lean against the wall, letting out a long sigh of relief.

That was the big reason Dumbledore had brought Slughorn back. Just horcruxes — conclusions Harry had already come to himself, though it was reassuring to have that confirmation.

He hadn’t realised until Slughorn had spoken just how afraid he was that there was something more, some other aspect to Voldemort’s immortality that he hadn’t known about, something Slughorn knew that Dumbledore wanted that would change everything for Harry.

He shouldn’t have worried. As always, he was several steps ahead of Dumbledore.

A breathless, slightly giddy laugh escaped him, head tipping back to hit stone.

Six horcruxes. Seven, including his scar. Only the snake remained.

They might actually be able to win this war, after all.

.-.-.-.

He didn’t tell Draco what he’d spoken to Slughorn about, promising his boyfriend it was nothing urgent. He would tell Snape later, assure him that it was just confirmation of what they already knew. Something Dumbledore didn’t know, evidently.

The Slytherin part of Harry took a great deal of amusement in imagining Dumbledore hiding out there, trying frantically to find horcruxes that no longer existed, with no idea how many there might even be.

But with the mystery of Slughorn's return from retirement finally solved, there was another mystery lingering in the back of Harry's mind. A far more recent one.

When he was alone that night, safely behind the drapes of his bed and a thick layer of privacy spells, Harry whispered a name.

With a quiet pop, a house elf appeared at the foot of his bed. "Master Harry is needing Ceri?" she asked, keeping to a whisper, glancing around fearfully. "Is Master Harry in trouble?"

"No, I'm fine," he assured. "I— could you bring me a book from my room, please? It's the Peverell family book. Should be on my shelf." He was going to get to the bottom of Dumbledore's weird Master of Death comments, one way or another.

Ceri brightened up, nodding exuberantly and disappearing, only to reappear moments later with the book in hand.

"Thanks, Ceri."

The elf's expression turned chiding. "Master Harry is not to be staying up late reading on a school night," she scolded. "Master Harry needs his rest."

He bit back a smile. "I won't stay up much longer, promise." It wasn't a particularly large book, not like the Potter or Black books.

Ceri eyed him shrewdly for a moment more, but was apparently satisfied with that vow, as she vanished once more.

Eagerly, Harry propped the book open on his lap, skimming the contents page. 'Family tree... History and Origins... Three Brothers and Death'. Well, one of those things was not like the other.

He flipped it open to the page indicated, which was headed with a strange symbol — a circle inside a triangle, with a line neatly bisecting both. Harry had seen that symbol before; it was all over the things in the Peverell vault. It was even in the family crest. But what did it mean?

In the silence of his dorm, Harry read a story — a story of three Peverell brothers, and a river. The story said that while future tales would declare the brothers had conjured a bridge over the river to cheat death, the truth was that the youngest fell in, and died. His two older brothers rescued and revived him, almost expiring their family magics to do so. This burst of energy summoned Death himself, who was curious about these men and their love so strong it could thwart his clutches. Death offered the men a boon each — supposedly, a reward for having escaped him. It would not be for decades more that they would discover Death's true plan.

The eldest brother asked for a wand. More powerful than any other. And his wish was granted; a wand, crafted by Death himself, from a branch of elder off a nearby tree.

The second brother, believing his magic the strongest and the true reason Death had been denied, decided to take that a step further and ask for a way to recall deceased loved ones from beyond. Death granted his wish, in the form of a stone from the riverbank.

The youngest brother, still shaken from his experience, merely asked for a way to avoid such a traumatic thing happening again — he asked for something that would let him leave, and stop Death from following. So Death granted his wish, too, and gave the brother a cloak torn from the fabric of his own. A cloak that would make him invisible to all — even Death.

Harry was enraptured as he read about the power-hungry eldest brother killing his enemy, bragging about his unbeatable wand and then being killed for it that very night. About the arrogant second brother, who went mad in front of the shade of the girl he had once loved, unable to fully breach the gap between life and death — except by joining her at his own hand.

And about the third brother, who avoided Death using his cloak, until he reached a grand old age. Only then did he pass the cloak down to his son, and greet Death willingly.

And only then did he learn the truth of the boons Death had offered.

It seemed, in rescuing their younger brother, the Peverell boys had tied all three of their magics to Death himself, sacrificing part of it for the life of their brother. Death became the head of the family, in a sense — the brothers had no one left but each other. So in those boons, Death left enough of his own magic to strengthen his connection to the Peverell boys, and their offspring. He had always known how things would play out, he told the third brother — but he'd been waiting for such an opportunity for a very long time.

With those three objects now in the world — the stone and the cloak passed down through the family, the wand leaving a trail of death and destruction behind it — Death's magic could spread further, grow stronger, understand the strange thing called humanity better. The Peverells would always have an... affinity for death, thanks to their ancestors' works.

And one day, so Death told the third brother, a person would come along who could unite all three objects — all of Death's Hallows — and the cycle would be complete. That person would have Death's power at their fingertips. That person would have earned it, Death insisted. That person would know what to do with it.

But Death did not tell the third brother what would happen when that time came. He only sounded far, far too pleased about the outcome.

At the very end of the story, there was a warning.

Our family has been Changed by our connection with Death. We are followed by Him in our every waking moment. Many a Peverell has greeted Him far too soon.

Only a Peverell can truly understand the power of the Hallows. This bloodline has been tasked with the solemn duty of keeping the Hallows safe and protected and apart from one another. To betray their knowledge is to betray the family — to seek their union is to seek only Death. This is our family's power, our curse — we are friends of Death, but Death is not always a friend to us in return. Be wary of the Hallows, and teach your children the same. Such power does not come without a price.

Harry set the book down, eyes wide. That was... quite the story.

It was familiar to him, of course. He'd read the Tales of Beedle the Bard, after seeing so many copies of the book in the Peverell family vault. He knew the Tale of the Three Brothers — altered, sanitised to become a children's story. Had Beedle been a Peverell? Or merely spoken to one, thinking it a fanciful tale?

To think that the Hallows were real... a sick sense of clarity curled within Harry, icy and sharp. His cloak, handed down from father to son — making him invisible to even Dumbledore's eye. The true Invisibility Cloak.

Dumbledore's wand, rumoured to be won in the battle with Grindelwald himself.

He flipped to the front of the book, to the family tree, following generation after generation down from Cadmus Peverell all the way down, eventually marrying into the Gaunt family — culminating at one Tom Marvolo Riddle, Jr.

The ring horcrux, the one Dumbledore had been so obsessed with, had almost died over. Snape had said there was a stone set in it, hadn't he?

A wand, a stone, a cloak. Three Hallows — all now in Dumbledore's grasp. Harry's blood ran cold.

Was he truly the Master of Death, now? If so, what did that mean for the future? What power would that give him?

And why hadn't he used it against Harry while he had him?

Unless it took more than just the Hallows. A spell, or a ritual. The book just said that the person who united the Hallows would know what to do with them.

Harry had promised Ceri he wouldn't stay up all night reading. But even when the book was returned to Seren Du by the elf, Harry lay there for a long time, staring at the crimson drapes above him, mind full of all the horrible things that could come from Dumbledore having access to the power of Death itself.

Sleep did not come easy, that night.

.-. .

Sirius had to hand it to old Xeno Lovegood — he might be mad as a box of frogs, but he was a brave bugger.

The Quibbler's final issue had arrived in the talons of every owl they could afford, printed as many times over as the printing press could handle. Copies spread far and wide, through the UK and beyond — to European magical newspapers, telling them the sordid truth of Albus Dumbledore and the lengths he would go to just to remain a hero in the eyes of the world.

Since then, Sirius could hardly keep up with all the requests for sanctuary. The Pottery was full to bursting, and the other safe Black properties close to the same. Malfoy Manor held dozens of people, most of whom the general public would swear up and down were Death Eaters — some of whom were even Marked, but Narcissa did not judge. She knew better than most what it was like to have no real choice at all.

With Dumbledore out of the way, he'd finally been able to break and reset the Fidelius on Grimmauld Place, with Remus as the Secret Keeper this time. When a pair of healers asked for refuge, Grimmauld quickly became the place for the trusted members of the Order to bring those who had been injured trying to flee, who needed somewhere safe to recover. Most days, Sirius was there, helping the healers the best he could.

Charlie helped where he could, bless his enormous Weasley heart. With the dragon reserve on high alert, he did his best to bring healing supplies to Grimmauld when he could — the reserve had its own greenhouses for ingredients used in the most common remedies, as it liked to be as self-sufficient as possible. Sirius didn't see his partner nearly as often as he'd like these days, despite the reserve only actually being perhaps twenty miles away from Seren Du itself. They had to be careful about moving through the wards, now that Voldemort had control of the Ministry and its ability to track magic use throughout the British Isles. More than once, Sirius had seen dark cloaked figures skulking about the woods on the other side of the Seren Du wardline, muttering about having seen apparition signatures in the area.

Luckily, Ceri was always good to aid with transportation, and very few wizards had thought to design wards to track or deny elf magic.

At the sound of the front door opening, Sirius straightened up — he was at Grimmauld again, waiting for Charlie and Fred to return with a group of muggleborns Kingsley had tipped them off about. They hadn't had new attacks to fend off in a while — either Voldemort had run out, or he had bigger plans to focus on now — so most of their work was just finding people who needed safety.

He hurried into the main hall, skidding to a halt in the doorway, jaw dropping.

Kingsley hadn't said they were children.

The two redheads each held a child on their hip, around six or seven years old. At their feet stood three more kids, all of whom looked old enough to be at Hogwarts. "What happened?" Sirius pressed. "Where are their parents?"

The tallest child, a spindly-limbed boy that reminded him painfully of the first time he'd ever seen Harry, storming out of the Dursleys' looking like he hadn't eaten in months, scoffed.

"Haven't had those for a long while, sir," he replied mulishly.

"We've been on our own since the summer," the auburn-haired girl beside him explained, softer, her eyes full of apology for the boy's attitude. "When my parents — they're muggles — found out about the war, they pulled me out of Hogwarts and decided that was that, I was done with the whole magic business. But I knew it wouldn't be that simple — not with my address on record at the Ministry. Not since the twins started doing accidental magic of their own." She glanced up at the kids still held by the Weasley brothers. Sirius could see the family resemblance. "When muggleborn families started getting targeted, I figured it wouldn't be long 'til they came after us. So I took the twins with me and ran away, to keep my parents safe. I went to Frankie's house — his big brother is his guardian, and he's never around anyway." From the scowl on the tall boy's face, Sirius figured he was Frankie. "Kevin found us about a month in, and we've stuck together ever since. We— thank you for saving us, sirs." She glanced back at Charlie and Fred, dark blue eyes wide with fear. "I don't know how much longer we would've lasted."

Sirius' heart broke for her — for all five of the kids, half-starved and terrified, having been on their own for months. It was a miracle they'd lasted this long, especially with the two little ones. He felt sick when he thought about how many other kids were in the same boat, stuck running for their lives with nowhere safe to go, no adults around to help them. Hopefully most of the muggleborns would have slipped into the muggle world, hiding in plain sight, keeping their magic tightly under wraps.

"How old are you?" he asked, and the girl smiled tightly.

"Thirteen, sir. Frankie and I are supposed to be third years now. Kevin would be in his second. The twins are only seven, but I know they've both got magic, I can tell." Her gaze dared him to argue, and Sirius held up his hands.

"I believe you," he assured. "Come on, let's get you fed and checked over by the healers, then we'll find rooms for you."

"We're staying together," Frankie insisted immediately, his hand reaching for the girl's. The boy in Charlie's arms squirmed to get down, and as soon as his feet hit the ground he was at his sister's side.

"We can do that," Charlie said, keeping his voice even — the kind of voice he used with startled dragons, or Sirius on Cold days. "There's rooms big enough to fit all five of you. It's fine." An amused flicker crossed his lips. "Just thought you might want a bit of space from the little ones, now you're somewhere safe. I have younger twin brothers, and they were a nightmare growing up," he conspired with a wink.

"Oi!" Fred yelped, offended. "You just didn't appreciate our enthusiasm, is all."

The girl in his arms giggled. "You're a twin?" she asked, voice filled with wonder. Fred beamed at her.

"Sure am! So identical even our own mum can't tell us apart," he said proudly.

"Amy, he's one of the Weasley twins," the older girl told her sister, a mischievous grin on her face that made Sirius' breath catch with its familiarity. The younger one gasped, her eyes going impossibly wider as she stared up at Fred.

"No way!"

"I see my reputation precedes me," Fred crowed in delight. "Tell you what — I'll ask my brother to come over tonight, and maybe he'll even be able to bring a few presents for you all. Did your big sister tell you we own a joke shop?"

With the youngest children utterly captivated, and the older three practically trembling with exhaustion, Fred had little trouble leading them through to the kitchen, where Sirius was sure Ceri would have food ready in an instant.

Sirius looked at Charlie, brows knitting together. “Are you thinking what I’m thinking?” he asked. Charlie sighed, stepping closer, forehead pressing to Sirius’ chin.

“Depends; are you thinking those kids need an inheritance test as soon as this damned war is over?” came his wry response. He tipped his head back, blue eyes knowing. “Fred and I thought we were imagining it, but we’re not, are we? Those eyes, Sirius. That smile. Those freckles. And twins.¹”

Sirius hummed in agreement, hands resting on Charlie’s hips. “Those are Prewett eyes if I’ve ever seen them,” he agreed quietly. It might not be obvious at first, with the tightly curled hair and tawny skin under the freckles that suggested one of their parents wasn’t white. But looking closer, something just felt so achingly familiar about those kids.

“They might be family, Sirius,” Charlie whispered, pressing in closer. “Long-lost squib descendants.” Thanks to Narcissa’s inheritance test push over the summer, they had discovered most muggleborns had connections to at least one magical bloodline, even if they were weak ones.

“We don’t want to jump the gun, sweetheart,” Sirius murmured, smoothing a hand up Charlie’s back. “Red hair and blue eyes aren’t exactly rare in Britain, y’know. Nor are twins.” They could be chasing ghosts — the kids could be nothing to do with the Prewett family. Other old pureblood lines carried the red hair gene; the Bones’, the Yaxleys, even some branches of the Goldsteins.

“I know,” Charlie agreed. “But, even if they’re not...” He swallowed tightly. Sirius knew what he was thinking.

“Their parents might be alive,” he reminded, talking more to himself, his traitorous heart that had picked up the moment Charlie had said the word family.

“I know.” Charlie’s voice was a heartbroken whisper. He rocked up on his toes for a kiss. “No getting ahead of ourselves. The important thing is they’re here, and they’re safe. Anything else... anything else can wait.”

When he pulled away, it was with a decisive set to his shoulders and jaw, and he squeezed Sirius’ hand before heading towards the kitchen.

Sirius stared after him, a vice tightening around his chest as the tiniest whispers began brewing in his mind, building a fragile possibility of after. He was only startled out of it by one of their healers coming down the stairs and squeezing past him, giving him an odd look on her way through.

Entering the kitchen, he saw soup and sandwiches had been shared around, the kids falling on the food like a pack of starving dogs. The girl immediately requested her siblings be seen to first, once the healer opened her kit. Casually, Sirius reached over the redhead for a bowl, glancing her way.

“I never caught your name, Miss,” he said politely. “Or gave mine. I’m Sirius.”

She eyed him amusedly. “I know who you are, Mr Black,” she told him. “You’re Harry’s godfather.” Her casual, slightly starstruck use of Harry’s name made him strongly suspect she was a Gryffindor. Then she stuck out a hand. “My name is Nashira.” Her smile brightened, and she giggled. “Like the star in Capricorn. Our names sort-of match!”

Sirius shook her hand, hoping it didn’t show on his face how wildly his heart was beating. “They do, don’t they?” he croaked.

Some higher power in the universe was playing a fine trick on him, to be sure.

.-.-.

As always, Seren Du was a blissful sanctuary in the wake of the constant unease of Hogwarts, and Severus felt the tension drain from his exhausted shoulders the moment he and Ceri rematerialised. He snorted upon the realisation that the elf had deposited him straight in his bedroom, startling Remus, who was stretched out on the bed with a book in his hands — a sight that sent a strong shock of affection and want right through Severus’ whole body.

This was what he wanted to end every gruelling teaching day with; that man, in his bed, for the rest of forever. Having that would make everything worth it.

Instead of voicing any of these thoughts, Severus instead let himself fall face-first onto the empty side of the mattress, fully clothed. He heard Remus chuckle, warming Severus down to his bones, and a hand rested on the back of his neck, massaging the tense muscles. “Long day, love?” Remus asked lightly.

Severus groaned in reply, giving himself a few minutes of the glorious sensation before reluctantly rolling over, running a hand down his chest and murmuring the spell to undo all his buttons along the way. “I thought playing double-agent was exhausting before Albus left,” he grumbled. “This is worse.” With Albus gone, the levels of authority and power within the school were all to be rearranged; Slytherin house was in a quiet uproar as the students tried to figure out their standing now that all they knew had been turned on its head. They were pushing boundaries — with Minerva, with him, with Harry as the true heir of Slytherin. And those who were truly loyal to the Dark Lord were gathering, deciding their chance had come with Dumbledore no longer watching over things.

They were all idiots, thinking there was no reason to be wary of Harry Potter himself. Severus would enjoy watching them fail.

Not that he could do so publicly. He had to support those who came to him, and play his part flawlessly for those who didn’t — those he had no idea about, who would be reporting his every move back to their master. His master.

He said all this to Remus as the werewolf helped him out of his teaching robes, getting more and more irate with every thought that spilled from his lips. He was so used to having to keep such things bottled up tightly, locked in his own mind, his own burden to bear. Even after more than two years, he was still remembering how to share that burden.

"I know he's going to summon me soon — he'll want to know the truth about what happened with Harry. I'm surprised he hasn't already. Surprised I didn't get the Call the second he got wind of Harry being Slytherin's true heir." It still gave him a glimmer of smug pride to think about, remembering the moment the hall had draped itself in green and silver at Harry's command, the absolute shock on his Slytherins' faces.

"He probably just wants to make sure you get your loyalty cemented with Minerva, while the school adjusts," Remus pointed out, sending Severus' robe to hang on the wardrobe door with a wave of his wand. "Albus was always the one who vouched for you, after all. He may worry the headmaster being discredited has also put suspicion on you."

Severus snorted. "The Dark Lord has not worried about me for even a moment of his hideous life," he said firmly. "More likely he is occupied with trying to find Albus himself, now the old fool doesn't have the castle keeping him safe. He'll Call me when he's good and ready — and want to know why I did not give him all this information sooner. My job is to know things about Hogwarts that others do not, and I have been slacking as of late." He could already feel the Cruciatus burning through his veins, the punishment he would face for not letting his Lord know of Potter's family status, of Albus' machinations. He would not accept 'I did not know' as an answer.

A growl rumbled through Remus, his eyes flashing gold. "Have you considered it might be time to give up your spying, soon?" the greying man suggested tentatively. A spike of guilt drove its way through Severus' heart.

"I cannot, until the Dark Lord is dead." He shoved up the sleeve of his shirt, baring his greatest shame to the eyes of his love. The Dark Mark, black as night on his pale forearm. "I am bound to him, and he to me, tighter than most of his followers — he could kill me through this Mark, if he so chose. Until he is truly destroyed, I must pretend to be loyal — for him to doubt me is for my life to be forfeit." His dark eyes met Remus' intently. "And I find I have too many plans to allow that."

Remus' nostrils flared. "Damn right you do," he agreed roughly. "Merlin, I hate this. The only claim on you should be mine." That was said with a hint of a growl and another flash of gold.

"Soon, it shall be," Severus vowed. "Yours and no other." Harry's seventeenth birthday was creeping ever closer.

He ran a hand through his hair, grimacing at the feel of the fine strands clumped together with the greasy residue of hours worth of potion-steam. "I need a shower," he declared, then let his gaze trail slowly over Remus' supine form. "Care to join me?"

Remus perked up, book falling forgotten to the mattress as he scrambled to his feet. His eagerness had Severus' blood pounding, rushing southwards, following the broad line of the werewolf's shoulders. Shoulders that, once the moon rose that night, would break and twist and reform into something most would consider monstrous.

They only had a few hours, before Sirius would come home and the pair would retreat off to play outside in the moonlight.

Remus' hand tightened around his, tugging him towards the bathroom. They had best make the most of those few hours.

.-.-.

The spring term began to earn its name, as January's chill started to thaw out into the first blossoms of a fairly mild February. The students got into a good routine, the staff banding together to help McGonagall run the school while still maintaining her positions as Head of Gryffindor and Transfiguration Professor. With secrecy no longer as vital, and the whole school shocked at their ex-headmaster's blatant move against Harry, more and more people begged to join the HA — so many that Harry eventually decided to hold weekly sessions in the Great Hall, for anyone who wanted to join. He still kept training with the smaller group, and many of them would help him out with the larger sessions, teaching students of all ages the basics of Stunning, Disarming and Shielding, as well as a few healing charms for good measure.

Despite all that, Harry was left feeling horribly guilty, as his fellow sixth years complained about how they would normally be learning to apparate at this point in their educations, ready to get their licenses as soon as they turned seventeen.

With the way things were at the Ministry, it was not safe to invite the usual apparition instructor into the castle. Nor was it safe to adjust the wards so the students could practice inside the castle.

"We are truly sorry," Professor Flitwick sighed for the dozenth time. "We can, of course, teach you all the theory of it. But I'm afraid the practical will have to wait."

Draco and Harry shared secretive grins, amongst the disappointed groans of their peers.

Still, the upset didn't last for too long, not with the arrival of the next quidditch match of the year. Slytherin versus Ravenclaw, with most of the school rallying behind the eagles.

But not Harry, who showed up to breakfast the morning of the match wearing a deep green hoodie with Slytherin Quidditch Team on the front and Malfoy emblazoned across the back, a green and silver scarf draped around his shoulders. Several of his friends booed and hissed playfully at the sight of him.

"How long have you been wanting to wear that in public?" Neville asked knowingly, and Harry grinned.

"Long enough." The hoodie was a little big for him, and it still smelled of Draco's aftershave. "I don't think he's getting it back."

“You better believe this means war when we play you,” Cho called from the Ravenclaw table, making a face at the sight of him in all that green.

“You’re on, Chang,” Harry replied, smirking. “Sorry, but boyfriend trumps friend in the loyalty department.”

“Understandable.” She winked devilishly at him. “I’ll let you off this time, only because we both know your boyfriend would dump you if he saw you in my team colours. I think green suits you better, anyway.”

“He does look good with my name on him, doesn’t he?” a familiar voice drawled smugly. Harry turned, eyes trailing over his boyfriend in his tight quidditch uniform, throat going dry. “We’re headed to the pitch. Kiss for luck?” Draco asked, grey eyes playful. Harry grabbed him by the front of his jumper, pulling him down into a kiss that had more than a few people wolf-whistling.

“Go get that snitch,” Harry said, smirking at the lust in Draco’s gaze.

“What do I get if I do?” The blond’s voice dropped to a husky baritone, too low for anyone but Harry to hear, sending delicious shivers across Harry’s skin.

“Oi, Malfoy! Get off Potter and let’s go!” Urquhart yelled impatiently, and Draco sighed. With one last kiss, he hurried to join his team.

“Where’s my lucky kiss, then?” Cho taunted, getting to her feet with the rest of her team. Harry shot her a sickly-sweet smile.

“Come over here and I’ll give it to you.”

A loud cackle came from the Ravenclaw girl. “You wish, Potter. Sorry in advance for kicking your boyfriend’s arse.”

Harry laughed, standing when he saw Blaise, Daphne and Theo headed over — they had promised he wouldn’t get murdered if he sat with them in the Slytherin stands.

“If you say so.” He waved her off, still grinning — this was how house rivalries should be. Good-natured competitive teasing.

Sadly, Cho’s prediction did not come true; Draco caught the snitch forty-five minutes into the game, making the final score 300-190 to Slytherin. Ravenclaw put up a fair fight, but after their loss against Gryffindor the Slytherin team had something to prove.

Filing out of the stands in a crowd of rambunctious, celebrating Slytherins, Harry felt a tug on his sleeve. “Fancy braving the victory party?” Daphne asked, wiggling her brows playfully. Her little sister Astoria was at her side, green and silver ribbons woven through her hair.

“I think that might be pushing it a bit,” Harry replied; just because most of the Slytherins tolerated him by now, didn’t mean there weren’t at least a handful that would happily see him dead. “You guys have fun, though.” He smirked to himself — he had a different sort of victory party planned, and he had to move fast.

Once they were out of the stands, Harry ducked through the crowd, heading to the Gryffindor changing rooms. He had to be quick; he didn’t want to risk Draco leaving before he could get there.

He changed into his own quidditch gear, then put a Dissillusionment charm on himself and hurried around to the Slytherin changing rooms. This was the hardest part; sneaking into enemy territory.

Luckily, Harry was pretty good at sneaking, these days.

The door opened, Crabbe and Goyle barrelling through, and Harry slipped in before it could swing shut behind them. His heart raced at the sound of voices echoing from inside — Draco hadn’t left yet. Good.

It seemed only he and Vaisey were left in there, Vaisey taunting Draco about how long he spent worrying about his skin and his hair.

“It takes work to look this good,” Draco sniffed, and Vaisey laughed.

“Making yourself pretty for Potter, are you?” he drawled, leering. “Should I tell the lads not to expect you at the party, then?”

“No, I’ll be there,” Draco assured, buttoning up his shirt. Vaisey hummed.

“See you in a bit, then.” The fourth year left the changing room. When he was gone, Harry locked and silenced the door.

“Wouldn’t bother with those buttons, if I were you,” he called quietly, dropping the charm keeping him invisible. Draco jumped, whirling around, going wide-eyed at the sight of Harry in his Gryffindor gear. “I thought, since you were indisposed for our actual match, we could just pretend we played each other instead,” he said, stalking closer. Draco’s hands dropped from his buttons, leaving the shirt open to the base of his sternum. “I did say I’d come to the Slytherin changing rooms if you won, after all,” he added, winking. He was right in front of Draco now, and one gentle push had the blond sat on the bench. Harry straddled his lap, fingers tangling in still-damp hair. “Shame you’ve already showered. I was hoping to catch you all sweaty.”

Draco lunged up, pressing his lips to Harry’s, forcing his tongue into the Gryffindor’s eager mouth. “I beat you, then, in this fantasy of yours?” he breathed, hands sliding up beneath Harry’s jumper, skating up his abs. “Slytherin beat Gryffindor.”

“You did,” Harry purred, sucking in a sharp breath as fingers tweaked his nipple. “Means you deserve a reward.” He ground down against Draco, both of them moaning. Harry’s skin-tight quidditch trousers did absolutely nothing to hide the prominent bulge straining at them, and when Draco dropped a hand to squeeze his arse, he frowned, finding something hard in Harry's back pocket. He reached in, pupils blowing wide when he plucked out a vial of lubricant.

"Oh." His breath hitched. "That kind of reward, hmm?"

"Whatever kind of reward you like," Harry promised, arousal curling hot in his belly at the calculating look that crossed Draco's face.

"Get your kit off, Potter," he instructed, tugging at Harry's jumper. "Your arse looks good in those trousers, but it'll look even better bent over these benches for me."

Harry's head spun with the force of the rush of blood to his cock at those words. "Fuck, yes," he gasped, leaning back as Draco's fingers started working on the buttons of his trousers.

This was definitely better than whatever party was going on in the Slytherin common room.

Chapter 97

Chapter Notes

To make up for last Friday's cliffhanger, this week you can have a nice cute interlude of all our faves celebrating Valentine's Day. You're welcome ;)

This year, Valentine's Day fell on a Monday. That was generally regarded as a terrible thing by most of the occupants of Hogwarts — at least, the ones who cared about such things.

It was so terrible because the way the term scheduling worked out always had the February Hogsmeade weekend landing after Valentine's; which meant this year, couples would have to wait almost an entire week after the day itself if they wanted to go on a date in the village.

The younger years, still dazzled by the newness of being allowed to visit the village, happily delayed their plans until the weekend. But the older students just got a little more... creative.

Harry wasn't exactly sure how he was going to beat last year's Valentine's date — he didn't have anything as impressive as the Chamber of Secrets to show Draco this time around. And every time he mentioned the day, Draco just smirked at him and changed the subject, so he assumed the blond had something up his sleeve.

Needless to say, Harry was not expecting the truly enormous bouquet of roses to arrive with the morning post, carried by two owls who expertly deposited the arrangement in front of him. The roses were a mix of deep velvety crimson and bright shining gold, bound securely with green paper and a silver ribbon. A small red card was tucked into the ribbon, and Harry plucked it out, opening it. This year it's my turn, was all it said, and Harry laughed.

"Bloody hell, Harry," Ginny exclaimed, having to stand up to see him over the huge display of flowers. "He's not subtle, is he?"

"Not when he's being possessive, no," Harry replied with a chuckle, stroking careful fingers over the smooth rose petals. The handful of cards that had been delivered for him from other admirers went entirely ignored — exactly as Draco intended, no doubt.

"That's so romantic," Lavender sighed, further down the table. "They're so pretty!"

Looking up, Harry could see several envious glances being sent his way — and quite a few annoyed looks sent at partners.

"You like them, then?" Harry now knew why Draco had gone to sit at the Slytherin table that morning — the blond approached, as calm and confident as always, though Harry could see the uncertainty in his eyes. Harry beamed up at him.

"They're gorgeous," he complimented. "I love them, thank you."

The uncertainty vanished, and Draco took Harry's hand in his, kissing the back of it. "I did warn you you were in for a lifetime of grand romantic gestures," he said lightly. "I am a Black at heart, after all."

Harry pulled him down for a kiss, then reached for the bouquet and pulled out a single red rose — one charm had the stem cut off, and another had it affixed to Draco's robe, directly over his heart.

Others might have thought it was cliché, or overdoing it, or showing off — such a huge assortment of roses at this time of year had to cost a pretty penny, after all. And a year or two ago, such things might have embarrassed Harry, making a big deal out of him in public, putting him in the spotlight. But it wasn't about that — it was Draco showing his love in the best way he knew how, putting his heart out there for the whole school to see.

There was always one person who got embarrassed in the Great Hall on Valentine's Day with an over-the-top display, and Harry was quite happy for it to be him this year.

"You are worth far more than roses, darling," Draco murmured, a whisper of a kiss brushing his lips. "But they make a fine start."

Harry blushed, keeping still as Draco's deft fingers reached for a gold rose from the bouquet, clipping and pinning it to Harry's chest to match. Faintly, Harry thought he heard several people sigh dreamily.

"Need I remind you all," McGonagall's exasperated voice cut in, "that it is, in fact, still a school day. Class starts in five minutes."

That broke the spell, everyone scrambling to hurry out of the hall. Harry rose to his feet, looking wistfully at his flowers. There was no way he could carry those around all day.

"I'll take them up to Gryffindor for you, Harry," Neville assured. "Get them situated. You two go to Runes."

If there was anyone he could trust to take good care of his roses, it was Neville, and Harry beamed at the blond. "Thanks, Nev." He turned to Draco, twining their fingers together. "Shall we?"

They left the hall, hand in hand, uncaring of the stares that followed them.

. . .

Draco Malfoy did not have the monopoly on gifting flowers on Valentine's Day. After classes ended, Neville hurried to the greenhouses where his own bouquet was waiting for him under stasis charms, Professor Sprout giving him a cheeky wink as he eased it out of its hiding place. He kept it Dissillusioned on the way up to the castle — still quietly amazed he was actually able to pull off such a spell — and caught Ginny just coming out of the Charms corridor. With a flourish, he dropped the spell, holding the vibrant bouquet out to his girlfriend. “Happy Valentine’s Day, Ginny,” he said, already feeling his cheeks go red. Ginny dropped her bag in shock, brown eyes wide.

“Oh, Neville, they’re stunning! I— when did you order that in?”

“I, uh, made it myself. Professor Sprout lets me grow what I want in the back corner of greenhouse four. So I thought… well. Yeah,” he finished awkwardly.

“You grew all these, just for me? But that must have taken weeks!” Ginny’s classmates were all staring now, and Neville tried not to squirm.

“I started planning early,” he said with a shrug. “I— you deserve pretty things on Valentine’s Day.” He hadn’t wanted to just buy her something — Ginny was amazing, and there was nothing in the world that would show her how much she meant to him more than plants. He hoped she knew that. He suspected she did, by the light in her eyes.

Next thing he knew, her hands were on his shoulders as she leaned up for a passionate kiss, right there in the hallway. “I love you,” she murmured, face almost as red as her hair as she too realised how much of a scene they were making. “Why don’t we, ah, go somewhere private, and you can tell me what all these flowers mean, yeah? I know they all mean something.”

The blood rushed to Neville’s face — they did all have meanings, of course they did. Red chrysanthemums, edelweiss, hibiscus, red salvia, violets. His heart laid bare in a single bouquet.

All the things he wanted to tell Ginny, but always found his tongue tripping over the words.

But blood rushed to other parts of him, too, at the idea of being alone together. At the spark in those gorgeous brown eyes.

“Yeah,” he croaked, Ginny’s small hand taking his slightly sweaty one, the bouquet still tucked in the crook of his arm.

“Ginny!” Colin called. “You forgot your bag!”

But Ginny’s stride didn’t falter as she half-dragged her boyfriend down the corridor. “Don’t care!” she yelled over her shoulder in response, face alight with joy. Neville’s heart thudded hard in his chest.

He’d never get over the feeling of utter bliss that hit him when he made Ginny smile like that. He wanted to see that smile for the rest of his life.

. . .

Several floors below them, behind a painting of a bowl of fruit, a cluster of house elves tried not to laugh as two teenagers stood amongst them, absolutely covered in flour.

“Oops,” Hannah said meekly, looking at the huge bag of flour that was now mostly empty. “I — sorry.”

Opposite her, Ernie looked down at himself; his Hufflepuff tie now as white as his shirt, his trousers suffering a similar fate. Then he looked back up, slowly, staring at his girlfriend. “Well,” he said, the flour on his lips making his mouth go dry. “It’s a good thing we hung our robes up before we started, I suppose.”

A quiet giggle escaped Hannah’s mouth. Then another. Then, both of them were laughing their heads off, getting even more flour on themselves as they leaned against each other, gasping through laughter — then choking on flour, which prompted even more laughter. A few of the elves sniggered too, though quickly clamped their lips shut.

“Winky will be cleanings this up!” one of the elves announced, stepping forward with her hands on her hips. With a snap of her fingers, the flour disaster was gone, leaving the workbench and their clothes spotless. The elf huffed, her huge brown eyes staring up at the two students. “Yous is being lucky that we elves is having a soft spot for badgers,” she muttered warningly. Ernie fought a smile — the relationship between the Hogwarts elves and Hufflepuff house was long-standing, with their common room being so close to the kitchen. All new badgers were taught about the importance of respecting the castle elves.

And since his girlfriend had become one of the four heirs of Hogwarts, that had only increased the elves’ eagerness to make her happy. Ernie doubted anyone else would be allowed to get away with making such a big mess in the kitchens during dinner prep, otherwise.

“Thank you, Winky,” Hannah said, bestowing her sunny smile on the elf. No one could stay mad in the face of that smile. “We’ll try and keep the mess to a minimum, from now on. I really didn’t mean to drop it.”

Winky huffed again, though she didn’t look nearly as scolding as before, and with one last nod she turned back to her kitchen duties. Ernie looked at the workbench they had been set up with, at the ingredients to bake chocolate chip cookies still laid out before them. “Let’s try this again, shall we?” he said wryly, and Hannah giggled once more. “Maybe I should pour the flour, this time.”

“That’s probably for the best,” Hannah agreed sheepishly. “And, wait a minute.” She waved her wand, and suddenly both of them were wearing butter-yellow aprons, the ties undone at their sides. “Just in case.”

Ernie wasn’t sure it was a look he could pull off — but Hannah looked adorable in hers, a cute frown of concentration on her face as she tied the strings at her hip. When she was finished, she glanced up with a smile, which soon became impish. “You’ve still got a little...” She reached up, cupping his jaw, thumb swiping at a spot just below his eye. Ernie stepped closer, settling his hand on the curve of her waist, while the other tucked her honey-blonde hair behind her ear.

“And you’ve got a little...” He tilted his head down, covering her lips with his. Her hand slid to the back of his neck, deepening the kiss while the sweet flowery scent of her perfume filled his senses.

The rest of the world fell away, the baking ingredients temporarily forgotten as the pair kissed, oblivious to the fond eyes of the house elves cooking dinner.

It was going to take them a while to get around to making those cookies, but Ernie didn't mind. The more time he got to spend with Hannah, the better.

.-. .

The bank of the lake was a popular spot for romance at Hogwarts; generations of students had taken romantic strolls along the edge of the still water, been waved at by the giant squid on their way.

It was cliché, but that made it all the more romantic in Susan's eyes, and she was glad her Slytherin was willing to indulge her on this.

It probably helped that they weren't just walking beside the lake — Susan had done one better, and set up a privacy warded blanket in a quiet spot on the grass. The best spot to watch the sunset from.

"I think the squid is a voyeur," Theo announced, eyes cast suspiciously towards the water. When Susan turned to follow his gaze, she saw the squid in question, drifting lazily across the surface of the water, its eerie unblinking eye visible.

"I don't think it's looking at us," Susan assured him wryly. "It probably can't even see us. I warded us in pretty tight." She didn't want to have to deal with lovestruck second years on their awkward first dates interrupting them. Private time at Hogwarts was a rare thing.

Theo's gaze darkened. "You did, did you?" he drawled. "Good to know."

They had a picnic basket, but Susan wasn't particularly hungry, especially not with Theo looking at her with that intense stare.

Everything about Theo was intense. She thought she'd be used to it after a year, but it still made the hairs on her arms stand on end, to have such undivided attention directed her way, from such a handsome boy.

Theodore Nott was the picture of pureblood elegance, the dark foil to Draco Malfoy's silver grace. He was tall and willow-thin, cheekbones sharp enough to cut glass, dark brown hair always effortlessly falling into his eyes. Those gorgeous, all-consuming eyes.

It still amazed Susan that a boy like that gave even a moment of attention to a girl like her, let alone the fierce devotion that Theo had.

"Are you mad I didn't get you flowers, like Draco did?" he asked almost carelessly, and she scoffed.

"Draco's a show-off, and I don't even like flowers." She sidled closer. "Should I have gotten you flowers?"

He laughed, a quiet sound, one she always cherished for its rarity. “What would I do with flowers?” he retorted, bemused. He beckoned her closer, cupping her cheek, his bright eyes studying her keenly. “The necklace suits you as well as I thought it would,” he said, satisfaction purring in every word. “I wasn’t sure, but I hoped.”

Susan’s fingers came up to play with the pendant, the silver twisted artfully around the most incredible polished piece of amber, making it look like the stone had captured fire itself. “It’s beautiful.” She hadn’t anticipated a Valentine’s present. She hadn’t thought Theo was that kind of a guy. “I’ll wear it always.” The only boy to have gifted her jewellery before was Harry, with the earrings he gave her for Christmas back in fourth year.

“Good.” Theo’s lips curled in a contented smile. “My fire-hearted badger.”

She blushed, ducking her gaze, and a startled sound between a yelp and a laugh bubbled from her lip as Theo suddenly pulled her onto his lap. She squirmed — she always felt like she would crush him, like this. Theo was so fine-boned, like a china doll, though she knew better than to think there wasn’t muscle hidden in that whip-thin frame. But she was taller than most other girls, with wide hips and thick thighs and belly rolls that Sally-Anne Perks had been quietly mocking since third year. She tried to pull away, to lift some of her weight off him, but Theo’s hands were firm on her waist. He shifted, and she gasped, his hardness pressing against her inner thigh.

“How good are your privacy wards?” he asked, voice low and urgent, strained around the edges. One of his hands slid up her thigh, under her uniform skirt, and her breath caught in her throat.

“Pretty damn good,” she told him breathlessly. He laid back fully on their blanket, hips canting up against her, a tease of what was to come. Susan’s blood ran hot — while she knew they had wards up, knew that no one could see them, it still felt like they were out in the open there, where anyone could stumble upon them. “We’re supposed to be watching the sunset,” she scolded lightly as Theo’s thin fingers untucked her shirt, starting on the buttons.

“I’d much rather watch you ride me,” came his immediate retort. The hot twist of lust in her belly hit her hard, and she bent over, kissing him hard, trapping his hands between them as her breasts pressed to his chest.

“If my wards fail and we get detention, I am absolutely blaming you,” she warned him, reaching behind herself with one hand to unclasp her bra. Theo’s lips curled, that smug look she couldn’t wait to wipe off his face as it turned to unguarded passion.

“It’d be worth it,” he replied, not missing a beat. He bucked up into her again, like he was trying to get started before she could even get his trousers undone.

People always thought Hufflepuffs were the meek, innocent ones.

People always thought that Theo was the shy, quiet Slytherin, reserved and restrained and overshadowed by Draco Malfoy’s shining silver brilliance.

Susan grinned as she stood up to slide her underwear off, settling back down over Theo, pulse racing as his fingers danced across her skin.

People didn't know shit.

.-.-.-.

Past the lake, in the Forbidden Forest, Daphne watched her girlfriend feed chunks of bloody meat an invisible flying skeleton horse and wondered how this had become her life, that she wouldn't want to be anywhere else.

She didn't like Valentine's Day. It was overly-sappy, commercialised bullshit.

This wasn't a Valentine's date. It was just a regular date, a chance for the pair of them to get out of the castle, for Luna to surround herself with the wild magic of the forest. Hell, it was hardly even a date; Luna came out here most evenings, and Daphne often followed, the lovesick disaster that she was.

Her fourteen year-old self would be ashamed to see her now, so utterly gone on another human being.

But her fourteen year-old self didn't know how great sex was, so quite frankly, Daphne didn't care.

"Daphne, come here," Luna called, and like a devoted sap, Daphne obediently followed. Her girlfriend beamed at her, reaching out a hand. "Come, stand where I'm standing." She stepped aside, just enough to stand with her chest pressed to Daphne's back, her hands on Daphne's wrists. "Persephone had a foal, look."

"I can't see them, honey," Daphne reminded dryly. Luna giggled in her ear.

"Look with your other senses, silly," she urged, moving Daphne's hand out to the side. Suddenly, her fingertips hit something warm and velvet-soft and alive.

"Oh," Daphne breathed, letting Luna guide her into petting the thestral foal. It had to be a small thing — she could feel its wing tip brushing her calf, feel its spindly body and tiny ears. It wasn't like petting a regular horse — more like a horse-shaped snake, though there were little tufts of fur at its ears, and its nose felt just like any other horse's. She heard a quiet whinny, then a huff, and something nudged her shoulder.

"That's Hades," Luna informed her, giving another quiet giggle that slid over Daphne like silk. "He's very proud of his baby."

"As he should be," Daphne agreed, lips curving ever so slightly. Hades nudged her again, and Luna moved Daphne's hand over, setting it on a large, muscular shoulder.

"He likes getting scratches there most," she whispered, letting go of Daphne's wrists so the Slytherin girl could figure out the creatures for herself. Luna hugged her from behind, pressing a kiss to Daphne's neck. "They like you," she confided. "I think Hagrid and I are the only ones who visit them. But they like people."

Before Luna, Daphne never would have thought twice about thestrals — would have recoiled from the idea of them, the omens of death that they were thought to be.

She turned around in Luna's embrace, dipping to kiss her, the hot breath of the thestral foal still puffing against her shin.

She could maybe do Valentine's day, if it looked like this.

.-. .

It was awfully handy, being pseudo-brothers with one of the heirs of Hogwarts. And being good friends with the other three. Certainly, it made sneaking into the castle a whole lot easier when the wards welcomed him like he was still a student.

George popped his Dissillusioned head out from the statue of the one-eyed witch, checking the coast was clear before hauling himself out entirely.

It might have been easier with the Marauder's Map, but he was George Weasley — he could do this in his sleep.

Quiet as a mouse, he hurried to the main staircase, heading down, dodging the students in his way. He made it to the third floor, then turned towards what, once upon a time, was a room the headmaster had threatened pain of death upon entering.

Now it was just a room. A room with a few scorch marks on the walls and ceiling from various Weasley experiments over the years.

A room with a double bed, and the most gorgeous man in the world inside.

George dropped the charm concealing him as soon as the door was locked behind him, throwing himself into Blaise's embrace. "I've missed you," he declared, loving the feel of Blaise's strong arms wrapping around him.

"I missed you too, tesoro," Blaise chuckled, his deep voice doing things to George's insides.

Before he could throw his whole wooing plan out the window entirely and shove Blaise onto the bed to have his way with him, George put a little space between them, trying to catch his breath. From his pocket, he drew a bottle of red wine, watching Blaise's eyes light up. "Ooh, my favourite."

"Only the best for my Valentine," George insisted, winking roguishly. "Got you these, too." From the same pocket came a box, which Blaise opened to find a dozen large chocolate-covered strawberries.

"Mm, delicious," Blaise murmured, stealing another kiss. "You'll share them with me, won't you?"

George imagined watching those lips close around a plump, juicy berry, a whimper creeping from his throat. "If you're willing to share. They're yours, after all."

"Then perhaps I will eat mine and you will eat yours, and we'll drink the wine together." Blaise was suddenly holding a chocolate box of his own — where the hell had that come from?

Inside were the incredible melt-in-the-mouth chocolate caramels that Blaise had introduced him to in Italy that summer. George's mouth watered just at the smell of them. "You do spoil me," he sighed, making Blaise smile.

"Every day I can," he promised. "Come on, let's get comfortable."

George's brown eyes trailed over Blaise's form. "Comfortable, or comfortable?" he drawled, wiggling his eyebrows.

Blaise set both boxes of chocolates on the end of the bed, then pulled his t-shirt over his head in one fluid motion. "Get naked and get in that bed, Weasley, or I'll drink all the wine without you."

George didn't need telling twice — in moments, his clothes were a heap on the floor and he tackled Blaise to the mattress, wanting to get his mouth on that smooth, ebony skin. Blaise's cock was already very much interested in the events, and George pinned the Slytherin down, sliding so his face was level with the impressive length.

"Thought you wanted wine and chocolates?" Blaise drawled, even as he made himself comfortable, bending his knees up to give George a better angle. George hummed deep in his throat.

"I can have those too," he pointed out. "But this first." Then, without hesitation, he took his boyfriend down to the root.

Blaise made the most incredible sounds like this. And George really had to learn Italian — he knew bits and pieces, knew the dirty words and the sweet words, but Blaise babbled in bed and George never remembered enough to look it up afterwards, his orgasm forcing it all from his mind. He worked Blaise's cock thoroughly, fingers slipping lower, playing with his balls in the way he knew drove his boyfriend wild. Soon, Blaise's hips jerked, his whole body going taut as he came down George's throat. George hummed in satisfaction, crawling up the Slytherin's muscular body — and reaching right past him for the open bottle of wine, necking it back like it hadn't cost a small fortune. Blaise had such expensive tastes.

He took a few swallows, then offered it to Blaise, who pushed his hand aside and lunged up for a hungry kiss.

"Wine always tastes better from your lips," Blaise breathed, fingers twined in George's hair tugging just the right side of painful. "I wonder if it'll taste better from the rest of your skin."

Oh, George liked the sound of that. He liked the sound of that very much — Blaise pushed him flat on his back, straddling his thighs, taking the bottle of wine and pouring a thin stream into the hollow of George's throat, chasing it immediately with his tongue.

Maybe the wooing part of the plan had ended up a little shorter than anticipated. George was only human, after all.

.-. .

One Valentine's date in Hogwarts was not a date at all. Rather, an avoidance of dates — an avoidance of everyone. Pansy and Millie sat together in their dorm room, an obscenely large plate of brownies between them, while Pansy watched Millie write a letter.

"Do you think you'll get to see him this summer?" she asked, somewhat hesitant. Millie sighed.

"I don't know. Depends what Potter's up to, doesn't it?" she pointed out with a derisive snort. "If it's all over 'round his birthday, like he says it will be..."

The two of them pretty much only saw Harry at heirs' meetings, these days. Everyone still believed them to be loyal Death Eaters in training, and that meant no socialising with Gryffindors. Or with other Slytherins who had turned their backs on the cause.

No socialising with any of their true friends, really. Not where anyone might see them.

At least they still had each other. Pansy wouldn't have survived half as long without Millie by her side.

"Harry's usually right about these sorts of things," Pansy said, reaching for another brownie. "If he says he'll be done by the end of summer, I believe him." She could hardly believe they were talking so casually about the defeat of the Dark Lord.

Being friends with Harry Potter made one do crazy things like that.

"Then maybe I'll get to see Otto at the end of summer. Or even Christmas." A dreamy, hopeful sort of smile took over Millie's face. Once upon a time, Pansy would have been eaten alive with envy, with a desperate need to find someone who made her feel the way Millie looked. Before she understood how much that was never going to happen, how much she didn't even want it to happen.

"Oh, you should invite him over for Yule!" Pansy urged excitedly. "He can meet everyone!" Sure, most of their Slytherin cohort had met Millicent's German fiancé at least once, but that had been a number of years ago now. And their friend group had expanded enormously since then.

Millie looked doubtful. "I'm not really sure I want to inflict everyone on him." Pansy snorted. Sure, they were friends with an astonishing number of Weasleys these days, but it wasn't that bad. "But having him around for the holidays would be nice." She sighed again. "I just want to see him."

Pansy knew that Millie hadn't seen Otto since the summer before their fifth year, when her mother had taken her over to stay with his family in Berlin — to avoid everything going on back home. She also knew that despite what Millie's father thought, Otto's family were not actually the avid Dark Lord supporters they had once claimed to be.

The only reason they had not publicly turned away like everyone else — other than their own safety, of course — was that doing so would make Mr Bulstrode dissolve the betrothal for sure, and nobody wanted that. Not with the risk that he might betroth Millie to some other boy.

Not like Pansy was facing.

"I'm sure you'll see him soon," she soothed, offering her best friend a brownie. "But forgive me for hoping it's because he comes here, not because you've buggered off to Germany."

"I'm not going anywhere until things are safe here," Millie insisted firmly. She reached out, covering Pansy's hand with her own. "I'm not leaving you. If it gets bad, we'll go to Lady Malfoy, together."

It would have to get very bad, for that to happen. Going to Draco's mother, turning away from their parents, would get them disinherited in a heartbeat. They were at the mercy of their fathers, until they were married. At least for Millie that was something to look forward to.

"Harry will sort it," Pansy insisted once more. She shuffled in closer, peering over Millie's shoulder. "Now show me what you've written so far. Even the saucy bits. Especially the saucy bits." Millie's cheeks burned red as she tried to hide her parchment, and Pansy laughed.

They would have their happy endings. Even if she hadn't quite figured out what she wanted hers to be yet. She would have the chance to find out.

Draco would be awfully sad if they didn't, and Harry would rather burn the world to pieces than see Draco sad.

Pansy approved wholeheartedly.

.-. .

Technically, they could have gone out somewhere fancy. One day, they would — Charlie deserved to be taken to incredible restaurants where Sirius could shower him with good food and expensive wine, and ogle him in dress robes, and make all the other patrons uncomfortable with their blatant flirting.

But while that did sound fun on occasion, neither of them were really fancy restaurant people, and quite frankly it wasn't worth the risk or the faff that came with Sirius going out in public.

So with a little help from Ceri, Sirius had the conservatory at Seren Du decked out to the nines, a table for two with a crisp white tablecloth and two silver candles set in ornate holders, and the most incredible dinner waiting for them.

And this was so much better, because Charlie was in a t-shirt and well worn jeans, candlelight flickering gorgeously over the ink on his forearms and biceps, relaxed and smiling and looking at Sirius like he'd just handed him the world on a platter.

"You romantic old dog, you," the redhead teased.

"Oi, less of the old," Sirius mock-scolded. "Just because I'm in my late thirties now."

Charlie gave an over-dramatic gasp. "Practically ancient," he agreed dryly. Sirius barked out a laugh, pouring wine for them both.

"Happy Valentine's, Charlie," he said, raising his glass to clink against Charlie's own.

"Happy Valentine's, sweetheart. You didn't have to go to all this fuss."

"I wanted to," Sirius insisted. "We might not be able to do the traditional dating thing while the whole damn world is on fire, but that's no excuse for me to slack off." He always felt like he wasn't doing right by Charlie, wasn't doing enough — he didn't want to let their first Valentine's go uncelebrated.

"If you insist." Charlie's dimples returned, sapphire eyes sparkling. "Then I suppose you deserve your present, too."

Sirius' brows rose in surprise. "You didn't have to get me anything!"

"Technically I haven't, yet." Charlie pulled a folded piece of parchment out of the pocket of his jeans, handing it over to Sirius. Confused, Sirius opened it, and gasped.

It was a pencil drawing of a grim. His grim, Padfoot, stood proudly with his head held high, the level of detail incredible. "This is amazing! Did you do this?" He saw Charlie sketching sometimes, but it was mostly dragons.

"No. My, uh, tattoo artist did. He's a friend from Hogwarts, we kept in touch. He did most of my tattoos — there's a few I got out in Romania, but for all the big ones I came back home to see Nick."

Looking at the drawing closer, Sirius could see the similar art style to the tattoos over the rest of Charlie's body. When his gaze returned to Charlie's, the redhead seemed suddenly unsure. "I, uh, have a slot booked for next week. World-on-fire permitting and all. But I wanted to run it by you first. In case you think it's weird."

For a few seconds, Sirius had no idea what he was talking about, and then it clicked. "You want to get this tattooed on you?" he asked, holding up the drawing. Charlie nodded.

"Yeah. If you're alright with it."

Sirius couldn't think of anything hotter than seeing his grim on Charlie's skin, and he said as much, watching Charlie flush lightly. "Where were you thinking?" There weren't many spaces left, not for something that size — perhaps somewhere on his back, or maybe a calf piece.

Charlie bit his lip, anxious. “Well, ah. I’ve got some prime real estate here, I was thinking.”

And he held his hand up to his chest, right over his heart.

Sirius sucked in a sharp breath. Oh. “Chest tattoos hurt like a bitch,” he said with a weak chuckle, watching Charlie’s lips twitch.

“I know. But I can handle it, for this.”

Another good thing about not being in a restaurant was that there was no one around to care when Sirius abandoned his meal entirely and pounced on his boyfriend, straddling his lap there at the table. Sirius’ skirt, already scandalously short, rucked up around his hips, his arms twining around Charlie’s neck. Large hands pressed hot against his bare thighs.

“You like that idea, then?” Charlie gasped, tilting his head back so Sirius could attack his neck.

“Just a bit,” Sirius agreed breathlessly. “Your artist, how far in advance does he book?” He let his teeth rasp over Charlie’s jaw. “Been thinking it was a while since I got my last tattoo. Thought I might look good with a bear on my thigh.”

Charlie’s hooded eyes dropped to the thigh in question, fingers running reverently over the unmarked flesh, pushing the skirt up even higher. “Right there,” he murmured, stroking the upside of Sirius’ right thigh. “Low enough to see just a peek when you’re in a skirt. High enough that anyone looking to see your cock knows it’s mine.” He looked up, grinning devilishly. “For me? Give Nick a reference and he’ll have you booked in straight after mine.”

“Easy enough,” Sirius assured, excitement building in more ways than one. “I’m sure I’ll have no trouble conjuring a Patronus for him to look at.” Something he hadn’t ever thought possible, not after twelve years in Azkaban, but Charlie Weasley was a miracle in himself.

“One of these days I’m gonna take that damned Animagus potion and you’re gonna look really daft when I’m not even a bear,” Charlie teased, and Sirius snorted.

“That’s a bet I’m willing to take.” He knew his Patronus, knew exactly why it was the way it was.

His magic, his soul, his heart — they all belonged to Charlie. It was long past time he dedicated some skin to the man, really.

.-. .

Sat at a fairly similar table to his brother, but hundreds of miles away and definitely in a very public place, Bill Weasley tapped his glass of champagne against his fiancee’s, beaming.

“Our last Valentine’s before we’re married,” he said teasingly, feeling light as air every time he so much as thought the words. Fleur giggled, tossing her silky hair over her shoulder.

“So you keep saying, and yet we ‘ave not set a date.”

Bill waved a hand dismissively, still grinning. “Pfft, minor detail.” They hadn’t organised much for the wedding, in all honesty, but they knew it would be something in England; something fairly small, pretty informal. Bill might be a Wizengamot lord now and all, but he didn’t want all those airs and graces intruding on his wedding day.

“Tell that to Maman,” Fleur muttered, giving her steak a dark look for the moment. Bill grimaced — Fleur’s mother was not impressed by their wedding plans, or lack thereof.

“She knows we’ve been a bit busy, right? War on and all that?”

Fleur rolled her eyes. “She knows, she just does not care.”

The quarter-veela raised a hand, and immediately a waiter was at their side. A quick exchange in French had the waiter headed to get more water for the table. As he left, Bill looked around, catching several peoples’ eyes and smirking when they looked away hurriedly. It was something he was increasingly used to these days, whenever he was out with Fleur — people looking at him, blatantly trying to figure out what it was about him that made such a gorgeous woman spend time with him.

If they ever figured it out Bill would love to know, because he sure as hell had no idea even after a year and a half. All he knew was, he was here with the most beautiful person in the room, and that made him one incredibly lucky bastard.

“I love you, you know,” he told her, making her blink, her smile turning soft.

“I love you as well,” she said, reaching across the table to touch the back of his hand, just for a brief moment. “What brought that on?”

“Nothing, just — I really can’t wait to be your husband.” Despite his huge family, Bill had always thought it would take a bit longer for him to settle down. Thought that maybe he wouldn’t ever really do so, not in the way his mum wanted him to — wife, kids, the whole thing. He’d thought he’d keep travelling as a curse-breaker for another few decades, at least. The pay was great, and Gringotts were a fair employer. He liked his team, and the goblins. But he’d figured with all the people in the world, everyone he hadn’t met yet, it would take a while to find the one that he thought he could spend forever with.

Then he’d met Fleur.

When they were kids, his dad had joked that Weasleys were destined to find their soulmate early and stick with them through anything. Bill and his siblings had rolled their eyes and made gagging noises, especially as it had usually ended with their parents being mushy and gross in front of them.

Looking at his siblings, how their lives were playing out, Bill wondered if there might be a bit of truth to that whole destiny thing.

Fleur’s smile lit up the whole room. “I really can’t wait to be your wife,” she replied, whispering like it was some special secret, just between them. The waiter returned, pouring water, and Bill didn’t miss the way the man’s eyes dropped to the engagement ring on Fleur’s hand, and then darted to Bill in consideration. Measuring him up, wondering if it was his looks or his money or something else entirely.

He snorted to himself — that could give a man a complex, being eyed up like that all the time. He was decent-looking enough!

“Stop paying attention to them,” Fleur interrupted his thoughts. He frowned, sheepish, leaning back in his chair.

“Sorry. I didn’t mean it. It’s just— they’re not even trying to be subtle.” He looked over Fleur’s shoulder, glaring at a pair of men a little older than him outright goggling in his direction.

“They are jealous, that is all,” the blonde dismissed. “They are not worth your worry.”

“I’m not worried,” Bill said. “I just wonder what they’re thinking, is all. What sort of story they’ve concocted for why a bloke like me is here with a lady like you.” He smiled lopsidedly. “Whether they think I’m actually loaded and you’re just with me for the cash. Planning on running away with it all as soon as we’re married. Or maybe they think I’m someone important in a business and you’re trying to get ahead.”

“All of these options make me sound like a terrible person,” Fleur remarked, unimpressed.

“And they make me sound incredibly desperate, so we’re even,” Bill replied, winking.

“Maybe they think we are both models, deigning to bless their restaurant with our beauty this evening,” Fleur suggested, and the curse-breaker cocked a skeptical eyebrow. “You are easily the most ‘andsome man in the room, Bill, look around.” The confidence with which she spoke made something in Bill puff up in pride, even as he smirked.

“You have to say that, you’re marrying me,” he pointed out.

“Because you are the most ‘andsome man in the room, yes, I am glad you follow,” Fleur agreed, giving him a mischievous smile that never failed to make his blood race. Suddenly, her foot was stroking his ankle beneath the table, sliding up the hem of his trousers. “Or maybe,” she continued, lowering her voice to a sultry murmur. “Maybe they are looking at us, deciding a pretty girl like me can only be interested in one thing, and assuming that you ‘ave a very big—“

Bill cut her off with a kiss — not because he didn’t want to hear it, but because hearing that word come from his future wife’s mouth in that tone would do things to him that were not remotely appropriate for a public space.

“If you want to stay for dessert, my love, you’ll change the conversation.”

Fleur leaned back, reaching for her champagne and draining the rest of the glass, looking back at him with a satisfied smile and come-hither eyes.

“My darling, who said anything about dessert?”

Bill had never paid for a meal so fast in his life.

.-.-.-.

“Oliver, we are not flying in on broomsticks.”

“Come on, Cass — where’s your sense of fun?”

Cassius sighed at his partner’s dancing turquoise eyes. “My sense of fun is in the quaffle centrepieces, and the quidditch-themed cake, and in letting you literally marry me at a quidditch stadium, which is your workplace, might I add,” he said pointedly, leaning over to kiss the pout off Oliver’s lips. “I plan to look so fucking incredible in my wedding robes that you will stop and stare in amazement. If you’re on your broom, you could end up being so gobsmacked by my beauty that you crash into a post. Then where would the fun be.”

Oliver laughed, squeezing Cassius’ thigh. “Fair point, love.”

They hadn’t intended to spend Valentine’s Day wedding planning, but they couldn’t exactly go out anywhere, and Ollie had a game in the morning so he couldn’t even drink.

Secretly, Cassius sort-of liked it; the pair of them in their pyjamas, surrounded by lists and pictures of flowers and cakes and Merlin knew what else, drinking hot chocolate and thinking up increasingly outlandish suggestions for their future nuptials.

It was so fucking domestic it was going to make Cassius’ teeth rot, and he wouldn’t change a second of it for the world.

“Have you picked out your robes, then?” Oliver asked curiously, tucking one leg beneath him to face Cassius a little better, even as he reached over to double check the menu. The stadium staff were going to cater the event, which was amazing, but also gave them a million options to choose from.

“I’ve narrowed it down to three,” Cassius told him. “How about you?”

“I thought I had it sorted. Then Da asked if I was gonnae wear the family tartan.” Oliver shrugged, cheeks going pink. “Said I’d ask how you felt about it.”

Cassius’ eyes roamed over his fiancé, mentally exchanging the Puddlemere t-shirt and quaffle-patterned pyjama bottoms for a kilt and all the accompanying regalia. Lust stirred within him. “If you’re wearing a kilt, you’re definitely not flying in on a broom,” he said decisively. “No one’s seeing your arse but me.”

Oliver laughed, winking at him. “Yes, dear.” He kissed his cheek, raising an eyebrow. “So you wouldn’t mind it? Having me in muggle-wear and all?”

“Ollie, love, at this point quite frankly I’d be so glad to call you mine officially I’d take you in your Puddlemere kit,” Cassius told him bluntly, watching the pleased and surprised glow chase across his partner’s face. “It’s our wedding. Yours and mine. If you want to wear a kilt, I’m entirely happy with that. Just be prepared for me to be grabbing your arse most of the night.”

“You’d do that even if I had robes on,” Oliver challenged. Cassius smirked, conceding the point.

“True. But all jokes aside for the moment, I don’t mind what you wear. Or if you want to add any other muggle traditions to our wedding, if they’re important to you.” Oliver’s dad was a muggleborn, and even though his grandparents had passed a few years ago, Cassius wasn’t so stupid to think that meant the family’s muggle connection was gone.

“I— but I’m already asking so much of you. With the pitch, and the cake, and all that.”

“Do you think I’d agree to it all if I really didn’t want it?” Cassius retorted. “Hell, love, do you think I’d be marrying you if I wasn’t at least halfway as quidditch obsessed as you are?” He pulled Oliver closer, their legs slotting together somewhat awkwardly, and pressed their foreheads together. “A Slytherin always gets their way,” Cassius murmured. “Everything I have strong opinions about, we’ve already sorted. I like the quidditch theme. I like the Puddlemere colours. And if you’re looking for an opinion, I very much like the idea of you in a kilt.” He smirked, kissing Oliver lightning-fast. “Not just because I know the whole thing will have my father rolling in his fucking grave.”

Oliver caught him before he could pull away, lips sugar-sweet and tongue languid and hot against Cassius’ own. Large hands held Cassius’ shoulders, grip achingly gentle despite the strength in those fingers.

“You’re a lord now, Cass,” Oliver breathed, voice cracking. “I don’t want to let you down with my nonsense on our wedding day.”

“You’ve never let me down, Ollie, and you won’t start now. I don’t want all that pureblood bullshit. The Warrington traditions I like, we’ve kept. The rest can go hang.” His brows drew together playfully. “Plenty of room for your nonsense.”

Oliver’s breath came out long and shaky, his eyes bright, full of love for Cassius. As always, Cassius’ heart clenched painfully tight.

“I’ll tell Da to book me a fitting at the kiltmaker’s, then. He didnae want to be the only one in a kilt, but he’ll get his out if I’m in mine.”

Cassius could see it now, the two men stood side by side in their family tartan, Ollie’s dad beaming with pride — beaming at Cassius, welcoming him into the family, like he’d always wanted but never truly felt he deserved.

Oliver’s parents had known about them since the beginning. Called Cassius another son of theirs before they even got engaged. Oliver’s sister was the same, calling him brother, teasing him just like she teased Ollie.

He didn’t deserve any of it, but he’d be so fucking grateful regardless.

“That’s settled, then,” Cassius agreed. “Kilt for you, dress robes for me, and no bloody brooms.”

A burst of laughter wrenched from Oliver, and then he was wrapping Cassius in a bear hug, kissing his neck. “I think that’s enough wedding planning for one night,” he decided huskily. “Don’t have to get it all done right now.” They didn’t even know when it would be possible, just a vague ‘after the war is over’, but by Cassius’ reasoning if they got it all ready to go early, they could move quickly once it was safe. He was not waiting an age to make Oliver Wood his husband once Voldemort was finally in the ground.

“Mm, you got a better idea, then?” he asked archly — and yelped when he was suddenly lifted off the sofa, Oliver’s hands under his arse as the keeper carried him towards the bed.

“Aye, I might.” He tossed Cassius on the mattress, following immediately after.

“Think I like this idea of yours,” Cassius said, gasping as hands yanked down his pyjama bottoms, a heavy form pressing on top of him.

It was the last coherent sentence Cassius formed all night.

.-. .

Valentine’s Day wasn’t really one you would usually associate with a joke shop, but Weasley’s Wizard Wheezes wasn’t an ordinary joke shop. With the breadth of their product range, business was booming — as much as it could in these difficult times, at least.

But it was all quiet now on Diagon Alley, the shops closed for the night, locked up tight until morning. And number ninety-three was no different.

Angelina liked to cook. She liked to cook family recipes; her mother’s recipes and her grandmother’s recipes — nothing remotely close to the food Fred had grown up with from Molly Weasley, or even at Hogwarts. But after several months of living with his girlfriend in this flat, both of the twins had been introduced to proper food as Angelina called it. Nigerian food.

Fred liked eating it very much, but cooking it still looked like some sort of sorcery he was not yet versed in.

“Go sit down,” Angelina said laughingly, batting away his hands as he tried to cop a feel while she checked the jollof rice. “I’ll be done in a minute.”

She’d been cooking since not long after George had left for Hogwarts, filling the flat with delicious aromas, and Fred’s stomach was rumbling. But she danced as she cooked, humming to herself with a smile on her face, and he could watch that quite happily for the rest of his life.

“Okay,” she declared, five minutes later. “Help me bring this to the table and it’s all yours,” she lifted one large pan, while Fred grabbed the pot — with his hands, not his magic. Angelina insisted that all parts of the cooking were better when done by hand, even the serving.

All her food was delicious, so Fred wasn’t going to argue.

They hadn't set the table in any fancy way, but there was a decent bottle of red set out to breathe, and Angie didn't know about the chocolate fudge cake he'd hidden in the back of the cold box.

"My lady," Fred said, pouring wine with an exaggerated flourish that made her giggle exasperatedly. He winked. "Happy birthday."

"Thank you." She tapped her glass to his. "Happy Valentine's."

When they were kids, Angelina used to get annoyed sharing her birthday with Valentine's Day. Claiming it was barely even a holiday, that it didn't exist to her.

When she'd learned the twins were born on April 1st, that eased the way a bit. The special birthdays club, they'd called themselves. Even when Angie got a bit older and hit the age where she might want all the fuss that went along with Valentine's, the twins always made sure her birthday didn't get lost in the noise. Especially once she finally agreed to be Fred's girlfriend.

"I'd say sorry for making you cook on your birthday, but this is delicious, so I'm not going to," he told her, and she beamed.

"I like cooking on my birthday," she insisted. "You did breakfast, so we're even."

Fred smirked — George had called in Alicia for the day to cover the shop with him all morning, so Fred and Angie could have breakfast in bed and a long birthday lie-in. Twin brothers were good for something, it turned out.

"Successful day, then?"

"Yeah, not bad." Her smile faltered, just for a moment, and Fred knew what she was thinking — she hadn't seen her parents since they'd taken an illegal portkey to Nigeria over a month ago, going to hide out with her grandmother's family.

"I wish you could chat to them, Angie," he sighed, knowing how much she missed them. "If I could find a way to make it safe, I'd do it for you in a heartbeat."

"I know. It's fine, really." Angelina reached over, taking his hand. "It won't be forever."

"Just a few months," he agreed, as they always said.

In a few months, the war would be over. One way or another.

Things were getting too tense to last much longer than that.

But those were far too dark thoughts to have on such a joyous day, so Fred gave his girlfriend a cheeky grin. "Want to go over and see the kids on Thursday?" he asked. "I thought I might take them some pygmy puffs."

Angelina raised an eyebrow. "Careful, there; Charlie will fight you for them."

Fred laughed. "He's fine, he knows I'm going for favourite uncle." All five of the kids had settled in now, and they were all great, but the Weasleys all had a soft spot for those twins and their big sister. Inheritance test be damned — if Sirius and Charlie didn't adopt the whole trio after the war was over, Fred would eat his broomstick. "So what do you think?"

"I did promise Nashira I'd come braid her hair soon," Angelina mused. "You sure we can take Thursday off?"

"Lissy's still around, she'll cover," Fred assured. Alicia had the whole week off work, she'd told him. And if not, Lee and George would handle it. There were so many of them willing to pitch in, so many friends working to help the twins' dream happen. They were the best.

"Then it's a date," she confirmed brightly.

"A date to go hang out with some kids — you sure you're not getting broody on me?" he asked, raising a teasing eyebrow.

"Merlin, no!" Angelina laughed. "That plan hasn't changed." No kids until they were thirty at least, was the plan. So they could enjoy life as adults for a while. Angie didn't want to go straight from being a student to being a mum, and Fred agreed wholeheartedly.

Thank Merlin for extra-strength contraception potion, to counteract that famed Weasley fertility.

"Also, you call them kids, Nash and Frankie are third years," she continued. "It's not that long since we were there ourselves!"

"Feels like it." Fred could barely remember third year at this point. "Blimey, those were the days. The year Harry showed up and everything got all dramatic." It felt so long ago, now. So much had happened — that scrawny little scrap of a first year was out and fighting the two most powerful wizards in the country.

"Honestly, still better than the year before, where we were all new on the team and had the shittiest seeker in the world and couldn't win a match to save our lives," Angelina said, shrugging. Fred laughed.

"Merlin, I'd forgotten about that."

With plates cleared and wine almost empty, Fred turned his eyes to his girlfriend. "Now, then, birthday girl," he drawled, "important question. Do you want bed," he wiggled his eyebrows salaciously, "or do you want cake?"

Her eyes sharpened. "There's cake?"

"Of course there's cake! What kind of man do you take me for!" He made an offended face, directing their dishes to the sink to wash themselves. "So what are you after?"

Angelina leaned back in her chair, giving him a once-over that had his jeans growing uncomfortably tight. "Cake," she declared, and he tried not to show his disappointment. "In bed,” she continued, smiling wickedly. “Oh, I knew I loved you for a reason,” he declared vehemently. She stood, pressing against him in a steamy kiss, her braids tickling his neck.

“You get the cake,” she said, squeezing his backside. “I’ll meet you in the bedroom.”

His eyes trailed after her, too dazed to even think about following her instructions. In the doorway to their room, she paused, looked over her shoulder, then reached back and waved her hand to undo the buttons of her dress.

It fell to the floor with a soft thud. Angelina smirked. “Hurry up, then.”

In his haste to get to the bedroom, Fred almost impaled himself on a fork. Twice.

.-. .

One good thing about the Ministry being taken over by Voldemort was that Tonks and Kingsley no longer got stuck working alternate shifts. Or any shifts, really.

Sure, they kept busy — Kingsley was still working security for the muggle Prime Minister, as much as he could without drawing the Ministry’s attention for it. And then they had their work for the war effort; getting people safely into hiding, hunting down Death Eaters, doing what they could to stop the darkness from taking over before Harry even got the chance to face it. But they didn’t have to pretend they weren’t going home to the same place every night. Didn’t have to carefully check their schedules so no one realised they were spending their off days together.

Tonks could get used to life like that.

Valentine’s Day was something they’d never really done before. Something Tonks had never really done before, in all honesty. Not since Hogwarts, when it was just cards and chocolates and maybe flowers if someone was feeling really fancy. A trip down to the village, avoiding the god-awful display at Puddifoot’s, a bit of snogging and then life goes on.

He had thought, for a while, that perhaps they should go to some kind of effort for this one — get dressed up and go out, or do something. Since Sirius had introduced him to some of the muggle clubs he liked to go to, he’d gotten Kingsley into it, who turned out to enjoy it a hell of a lot more than Tonks thought he would. He’d considered making a night of it — dinner somewhere, clubbing, a whole muggle night out.

But honestly, they were both so fucking tired these days, it seemed like far too much effort.

Then Kingsley, the absolute god among men that he was, had picked up Chinese from the muggle takeaway down the road, brought it home and declared that they were going to eat it in bed like complete heathens, and then sleep for at least ten hours.

So they did. With bowls and take-away containers balanced precariously on their laps, they sat in bed in nothing but their pants and ate far too much Chinese food. It almost veered into dangerous territory when Kingsley spilled sweet and sour sauce on Tonks’ chest and decided to clean it up with his mouth, but there was still more food to be eaten — and then when all of the food was gone, both of them were too full to even think about doing something so vigorous.

They cleaned up, sharing lazy kisses, abandoning their underwear now there was no risk of getting hot things on sensitive bits. Tonks amused himself by cycling his body hair through all the colours of the rainbow, taking requests from his snickering partner. They listened to the Wireless together — some audio drama about a quidditch player solving crimes, fun for them to pick apart for how utterly inaccurate it was. Kingsley pillowied his head on Tonks' flat chest, Tonks' hand absently rubbing his bald head like a strange, hairless cat. When the Wireless show ended, Kingsley announced that he was ready for dessert, and before Tonks even had the breath to point out that they didn't have dessert Kingsley's head was between his thighs, swallowing down his cock like it was the greatest thing he had ever tasted.

He brought Tonks off with his mouth, making his toes curl with pleasure, then crawled up his body and went back to his chest-pillow, throwing a leg over him and falling asleep before Tonks had even fully finished feeling the aftershocks, Kingsley's semi-erection jutting into his thigh.

Tonks stroked the smooth skin of his head again, heart full with how much he loved this man, how fucking lucky he was to get to see him in a way no one else in the world ever would.

And then he fell asleep, too. On top of the covers, Kingsley sprawled over him, before the sun had even finished setting.

It was the best Valentine's Day Tonks could have possibly imagined.

. . .

The waxing moon was high in the sky, its silvery light overshadowed by the yellow-tinted glow of the fairground-ride lights at the end of the pier. Most of the attractions were closed by now, the noise level barely a hum around them as the few late-night tourists went about their business.

Remus leaned his head against Severus' shoulder, cheeks aching from the force of his continuous smile. "No one would ever believe me," he murmured, playing with Severus' fingers in his lap. "I could show them a million pensieve memories and still no one would believe me if I told them about this."

Severus laughed, tilting his nose down to Remus' temple. "As it should be, wolf," he returned. "No one but you should ever know."

"What, that Severus Snape is an absolute demon at the penny arcade?" Remus teased, the sea breeze tickling his face. They were sat on a bench, facing the water, and not a single person who passed by gave a damn about them sitting cuddled up like that. It was Brighton, after all.

No one knew anything about them. They were just two ordinary men in their thirties, on a date at the pier. Remus had held Severus' hand in front of people, even kissed him on the cheek a few times, never having to worry about who might see them.

He could cry from the joy of it all.

Letting go of those long, slender fingers, Remus dropped his hand to the grey denim of Severus' jeans, immediately seeking the soft spot that had almost but not quite worn through to a hole in the knee. "Stop picking at it," Severus scolded half-heartedly, batting his hand away. Remus grinned into Severus' leather jacket.

"Never," he murmured, sliding his hand up to squeeze Severus' thigh. Then he exhaled a long, slow breath. "Fuck, I needed this, Sev."

Severus' arm curled around his shoulders, propped on the back of the bench. "So did I. More than I realised, I think."

"I feel like we're nineteen again." Waiting impatiently for Severus to finish work. Spending an afternoon at Palace Pier, playing the arcade and eating ice cream even though it was February, pestering Severus to go on the rides with him. Drinking cider and eating fish and chips on the beach as the sun set. "We should go dancing."

"If you like," Severus agreed. "Though I will remind you we are not nineteen again, and may be a little past the mark for some of our old haunts."

Remus scoffed. "Please; our old haunts were full of ageing queers back when we were teenagers, I doubt they've changed much now." The clubs around here were more forgiving of that, more understanding that not everyone had been able to go out and be themselves when they were the age for it, and some had to grab their happiness a little later.

"We'll soon see," Severus said wryly. Leaning back, looking at him in the low light, Remus could almost see that rail-thin, angsty teenager with the chip on his shoulder the size of a small country; the boy Remus had been so desperately in love with, so determined to pull from the dark and fumble a life together with.

He wondered what their teenage selves would say if they could see them now. They would be proud, he hoped.

"I'm going to spend the rest of my life with you, Severus Snape," he declared, a vow as much as a statement. Severus glanced down at him, raising one of his dark eyebrows.

"I should hope so," he drawled. "I've grown rather accustomed to you by now."

Remus laughed, cupping that angular jaw and pulling him in for a kiss — this was something they'd done as teenagers, too. Necked on the pier until someone yelled or threw something at them, far less tolerant of such things than they were now. Hardly anyone was around, and those who were didn't seem to care, and Severus certainly didn't seem to mind reliving this particular part of their youth. Back then it had been a rebellion, a defiant attempt to prove that they could be together despite their differences, that they didn't care what anybody thought of them, not in the muggle world. An attempt to prove to each other that things could work, even when they thought they might crumble.

Now, it felt like a promise. Like hope.

Eventually, they parted for air, and a seagull screeched as it hopped right by Severus' leg to steal a chip off the floor. Severus kicked out at it, but as always the bird was far too fast for any of that, grabbing its prize and taking off. Remus snorted.

"Can't take points from Gryffindors, has to resort to kicking seagulls," he teased, earning a scowl.

"I take plenty of points from Gryffindors," Severus retorted mulishly.

"With our cub in your class, I don't doubt it." Remus was amazed Gryffindor had any points left, some of the things Severus had relayed back to him. The mouth on that boy when he was angling for detentions, honestly.

Remus blamed Sirius. And Lily. Even from beyond the grave, she'd somehow instilled her un-ending snark in her son.

Gods, he missed her.

"Come on, then," he said suddenly, hauling himself to his feet and dragging Severus up with him. "Let's go see what entertainment is to be had for a couple of old homos in Brighton on a Monday night." He shivered against the evening chill, no longer using Severus' body for warmth.

The next thing he knew, a leather jacket was draped around his shoulders. He glanced over, seeing Severus in just a dark green long-sleeved t-shirt. "Chivalry, from a Slytherin? Why, I never," he mock-gasped. He shoved his arms into the sleeves — it was a little tight across the shoulders, but other than that it fit just fine. "Sure you're not cold?"

"Warming charms exist for a reason, wolf," Severus pointed out. Remus nudged him gently.

"Why didn't you just cast one on me, then?" he retorted knowingly. Severus' cheek twitched, an attempt not to scowl.

Remus laughed, tucking himself under the taller man's arm, feeling like he was walking on air as they headed down the pier towards the city.

Now he just had to get a bit more alcohol in his partner, get him on a dance floor, and everything would be perfect. He grinned to himself — the night was still young, and Severus was feeling very obliging it seemed.

He may regret that in the morning, when he had to teach second years with a hangover. But Remus wasn't going to remind him of that. They had Hangover potion in the medicine cabinet, after all. And he hadn't seen vodka-drunk Severus in years. He missed that handsy bastard.

No real trip down memory lane would be complete without it.

.-. .-

Harry was getting very good at conjuring beds.

It was not, perhaps, a talent he could show with pride to his Transfiguration professor. But it was a talent all the same. His latest attempt — a wonderfully comfortable king-sized bed with a small mountain of pillows to match — had certainly held up well to everything he and Draco could think to test it with in one evening, and Harry was fairly certain it would hold up long enough for them to get a few hours sleep, too.

He hoped so. Draco was awfully cranky when he woke up due to the bed disappearing.

He cuddled his Slytherin love closer, both of them boneless and sated but no longer sticky thanks to the joys of magic. On the floor beside the bed was the book of sex positions Harry had bought from Infinite — they'd ticked a couple more off the list, with resounding success.

"Can you believe we've only four months left of term?" Harry sighed, fingers running down the ridges of Draco's spine.

Draco groaned. "Don't. Four more months in this bloody powder-keg of a castle and I may never want to come back."

Rolling his eyes, Harry poked the blond gently. "As if. You wouldn't miss your seventh year. You wouldn't miss my seventh year."

"I'm sure I could convince you never to return, as well," Draco replied, reasonably confident.

"Not likely. Seventh year is going to be the first school year of my life where I won't have to deal with Dumbledore's bullshit or some sort of fight against evil. It's going to be brilliant." Just a normal year at Hogwarts, his biggest concerns passing his NEWTs and winning the quidditch cup.

"That does sound nice," Draco agreed, and Harry loved him for not even suggesting that there might be either of those things.

Harry had his heart set on that perfect, normal year. He was going to do whatever he had to this summer to make it happen.

He wouldn't let Dumbledore ruin his entire Hogwarts career.

"There's another World Cup the year after next, too," Draco told him. "Think it's in... Greece, possibly? Maybe Turkey."

"That would be fun. Do you think we could get tickets?"

Draco propped himself up on Harry's chest, looking at him like he was a complete idiot. "I think you'll be on the damned team, you clot." Harry started to grin, and Draco huffed. "Honestly. The only question is how badly it'll clash with my healer training and whether I'll be able to go with you for the whole thing. I shan't have you seeing all the sights without me."

"I've never been to Greece. Or Turkey," Harry said, a little bemused.

“The list of places you’ve never been to could fill a book. Does, in fact, fill a book — it’s called an atlas.” Draco snickered at his own joke, dropping his head to kiss Harry’s chest, right above the thatch of dark hair growing on his sternum. Draco’s chest was still baby-smooth, and he insisted it likely always would be.

“Can we go to them?” Harry asked.

“To all of them?” Draco asked, raising an eyebrow. “Might take a while.” Harry shot him a flat look, and he smirked. “I’m sure we can go to plenty of them. You’ve certainly got connections — France, Italy, Bulgaria, Egypt, Romania. Fairly sure my family owns an island in the Caribbean.”

“Of course you do,” Harry agreed, rolling his eyes. “Can we— can we go to India?” His voice grew hesitant. “Parvati and Padma said I could stay with their family if I ever went. I... I think I’d like that. But I think I’d like you to come with me. If you want. Sirius, too, maybe. See... see where my family came from.”

“Harry,” Draco sighed, voice achingly fond, “darling. I would follow you to the ends of the Earth with a smile on my face and then to Hell and back for good measure. Yes, I’ll go to India with you.”

There was nothing Harry could do about that but kiss him, so he did. Draco moaned softly, rolling onto his side to tip his head back, deepening the kiss at a much better angle.

“I love you,” Harry whispered against his lips, feeling the blond’s answering smile.

“I love you, too, you daft Gryffindor.” He squeezed Harry’s hip. “Now, are you absolutely sure this bed will last the night? I don’t want a repeat of the last time — I swear I still have bruises, and not the good kind.”

Harry laughed, kissing Draco again, smothering him with hundreds of tiny kisses until he was laughing too, until he agreed the bed was magnificent and wonderful and absolutely capable of carrying them through a night of slumber without fading to nothingness. Then Harry curled up in Draco’s arms, and fell asleep, dreaming of seventh year and quidditch and travelling, all with the boy he loved at his side.

Chapter 98

Despite most of them having done something to mark the occasion on Valentine's Day itself, a Hogsmeade weekend was still nothing to turn their noses up at — the idea of getting out of the castle was an excellent one.

So, weaving in between the third and fourth years holding hands and stealing shy glances at each other, Harry and Draco strolled down to the village — once again, Harry was wearing Draco's Slytherin scarf. Draco had developed a bit of a thing for seeing Harry in his house colours, ever since the Slytherin/Ravenclaw match.

When they reached the village, Harry saw two familiar heads of fiery red hair, and grinned, heading right over. The twins were a surprise — the two girls with them even more so. "Angie! Lissy!" Harry laughed as he was barrelled in a hug by the two chasers. "I didn't know you were coming down! What about the shop?" He cast worried eyes to Fred and George, who just smiled.

"Lee's manning it by himself today, no big deal. Alley hardly gets visitors anyway, these days." Fred's expression faltered ever so slightly, but then he was beaming, looking over Harry's shoulder. Harry didn't have time to turn around — a blur of dark hair sped past him, and Katie Bell bodily threw herself at her two best friends, screaming in delight. The noise was drawing attention, but none of them cared.

"Oh my God, I've missed you two. Ginny and Demelza are great but they're not you!" Katie enthused, still hugging the two girls, somehow dragging the twins into the mix as well.

"Don't suppose Ollie's gonna pop up somewhere, make this a proper reunion?" Harry half-joked. Angelina shook her head apologetically.

"He's got training. Sends his love, though."

Suddenly, George rocked up on his toes, darting off up the street. None of them even bothered looking — they knew exactly what had happened.

"That'll be Blaise, then," Draco sighed.

"Yup," Alicia confirmed, rolling her eyes. Then she turned to Draco, eyeing him appraisingly. "You're on our side, then, Malfoy?"

Of course; Harry forgot she hadn't yet met Draco as his boyfriend.

"Stand down, Liss," Katie assured, smirking. "Blondie's absolutely gone on our Harry, he's fine. Only time we need to hate him is quidditch."

Alicia blinked, gaze darting down to Harry's gloved hand brushing Draco's own. "Fair enough, then." She grinned, clapping her hands together. "Should we go fetch the lovebirds and grab a booth at the Broomsticks, before it gets too busy?"

“We’d better, yeah.” With the four graduates in town, Harry anticipated quite a big cluster gathering throughout the day. Glancing over his shoulder, he saw George and Blaise approaching, bringing Daphne, Luna and Sullivan with them.

“Ginny and Neville are on their way down,” Sully reported cheerfully. “Nev had to check something in the greenhouses. We didn’t ask.”

Harry snorted — that meant they’d be anything from five minutes to over an hour behind. “To the Broomsticks, then,” he declared, hoping there would still be a table free big enough for all of them.

They had to get a bit creative with the seating, squeezing tight into booth seats and dragging another table over for extra space, but Rosmerta didn’t seem to mind, greeting them all with a big smile and a wink at the twins when they began to flirt outrageously. Soon, Harry had a mug of warm butterbeer between his cold hands, Draco pressed close on one side and George on the other.

“How you doing, kid?” the redhead asked quietly, kissing Harry’s temple as he leaned forward to grab his drink.

“Well enough, all things considered,” Harry assured. “How about you? How’s the shop doing?”

“Keeping Diagon’s post office in business single-handed, it feels like, sometimes.” George gave a lopsided smile. “Foot traffic could be better, of course, but we’re still doing just fine. All thanks to you, naturally.”

“Oh, shut it,” Harry said, shaking his head. “I just gave you a boost — the genius is all you two.” A thousand galleons had been a great start, but it wouldn’t have gotten anywhere without the twins’ great ideas and solid business sense. “How’s the family? How... how’s your dad?”

He’d only heard from Arthur Weasley once more since the initial letter after Christmas. The man was still incredibly apologetic for everything, even though absolutely none of it was his fault.

George’s smile faltered. “It’s... difficult. We haven’t been home much since Christmas, but Dad’s come over a couple times. It’s hard for him — he loves Mum still, but he hates what she’s done to you. To all of us.”

“He knows Dumbledore was the driving force behind it, right?” From everything Harry knew about the Weasley matriarch, he doubted she would have gone quite so far in her manipulations of Harry without Dumbledore assuring her it was for his own good. Of course, that didn’t mean he was even remotely ready to forgive her for it or trust her again, but he didn’t want to destroy her relationship with her husband and kids. In a way, she’d been a victim of Dumbledore, just like everyone else.

“We’ve told him, yeah. Honestly, I think that made it worse — just made him think he should’ve done more to see what was happening. He’s been feeling guilty ever since he found out how the muggles treated you, everything's just sort of piled on top of that."

Harry frowned. "None of that matters anymore, though. I'm done with the Dursleys. It wasn't your dad's fault." Sure, maybe at the time Harry might have raged at the whole Order guard who said nothing about a teenage boy not leaving his house once in an entire month, but even by then he knew not to expect anything. Dumbledore had them all too tightly wound in his web.

He couldn't let grudges like that linger, or they'd eat him alive.

Speaking of grudges — the pub door opened, and Ron and Hermione walked in, holding hands. Harry saw the moment their eyes landed on the large gathering; Ron froze, turning as if to leave, but Hermione tugged on his arm and took him over to a small table on the other side of the room.

Harry felt the same way about them, to a certain degree — they had been kids, manipulated by Albus Dumbledore. But they also should have had enough sense to know that being asked to stay friends with someone, to report back on their movements and keep them in with the right crowd was not normal, not something they should have been completely okay with.

Things would have been different, if they'd apologised for it and tried to work past everything. But instead the pair had doubled down, insisting they were in the right and Harry needed them, that none of Harry's other friends were good enough.

He wouldn't ever be their friends, wouldn't ever like them. But he was far too tired to hate them as much as they were determined to continue hating him. He preferred to just forget they existed.

"I'll talk to your dad over the summer, if I can," he said, turning back to George, who had followed his gaze to his youngest brother with an almost disappointed look on his face.

"I think he'd like that. I know he's trying to get Mum to be a bit more rational; I think he's starting with the easy stuff, really. Talking to Bill and Fleur about wedding stuff. Having me and Fred and Angie over for dinner. She even asked me about Blaise, once." He smirked. "Don't think he's worked her up to talking to Charlie and Sirius, though."

"Charlie hasn't told her about the kids, then?" Harry presumed. He'd heard all about the kids at Grimmauld from Sirius, knew how taken with the three siblings his godfather and Charlie were. Harry remembered Nashira Forrester, if only vaguely — he didn't interact much with the younger years, but he remembered her being one of the few Gryffindor first years in his fourth that hadn't gaped in either awe or horror at the sight of him. That was always nice.

George snickered. "Merlin, no. You've heard the story, then?"

"From Padfoot." Harry raised an eyebrow. "You really think they might be related to you?"

"I'd put money on it, honestly," George said. "But even if they're not, those two are hooked. The kids love them just as much — those twins think Sirius is even cooler than me and Fred! It's insulting, quite frankly." He winked. "You ready to be a big brother, then?"

“Can’t be too hard, if you manage it,” Harry teased, yelping at George’s elbow dug into his ribs. “It all sounds a bit too easy, though. I mean... we don’t even know if their parents are dead, do we?”

George’s smile faded, eyes growing serious. “Tonks and Kingsley are looking into it, but... it’s not looking encouraging.”

A lump formed in Harry’s chest. “Fuck. That’s terrible.” No matter how great it would be for Sirius and Charlie to adopt some kids, they would all much rather their parents be alive.
“What about the other two? Frankie and Kevin?”

“Kevin ran in an attack — he’s known his parents were gone for a while now, but he just got back in touch with an aunt who’s going to come take custody of him.” George’s lips pursed. “We haven’t found Frankie’s older brother, but the kid told us to stop looking. Blaise said Frankie was on the house watch list even before things went to shit; when he didn’t show up to school, they assumed the worst.”

Harry grimaced — Slytherin house, by nature, tended to get more abused kids than any other house. They were keen-eyed for the signs, and Frankie being on the watch list didn’t bode well.

Everything he’d heard about the third year boy hit a little too close to home, for Harry’s liking.

The dour turn of the conversation was interrupted as Ginny and Neville finally arrived, and everyone had to squeeze in a bit tighter to make room. Draco took the opportunity to place a hand on Harry’s knee, quirking an eyebrow in his direction. “You okay?”

Of course he’d been keeping one ear on Harry’s conversation. He was a Slytherin, after all. “Fine,” Harry assured, covering the blond’s hand with his own.

Draco didn’t look convinced, but he let it drop, turning his hand over to hold Harry’s as he went back to his conversation with Daphne and Sullivan.

They stayed at the Three Broomsticks for lunch, their table easily the loudest in the room — other Gryffindors dropped by to say hello to the graduates, not to mention a few of the heirs and their assorted social groups. It was quite possibly the most jovial crowd Harry had been part of since his birthday party; even at New Year’s, there had been the strong undercurrent of melancholy, the awareness that the coming year would bring a lot of dark things.

This was just light, simple, easy fun with his friends. Catching up with his old teammates, getting the gossip from the outside world, trying not to laugh as the twins teased Neville and Ginny hexed them under the table in retaliation.

Because of that, Harry didn’t notice the screaming at first. None of them did.

Then there was a thunderous crack from outside, and conversation died in an instant. Harry looked around his friends, colour draining from his face. “The wards,” he realised in horror. “We’re under attack.”

Immediately, they all began to scramble into action. Harry almost fell flat on his face in his urgency to get out of the booth, wand shooting from his holster into his hand. “Katie, Sully, get the younger kids safe inside,” he instructed immediately. “We need to clear the streets.”

They flooded out of the pub, right into a battleground.

Black-robed Death Eaters were everywhere. Flashes of spellfire lit up the street, while students and Hogsmeade residents alike screamed and fled for safety. He could see Flitwick and Vector, the two staff chaperones, holding bright blue Shield charms over a cluster of students fleeing from Puddifoot’s.

Harry threw himself in front of a pair of terrified third years, raising a shield and sending a Severing hex straight back at the Death Eater who had attacked them. “Get inside the Three Broomsticks,” he told the kids. “Now!”

They finally snapped themselves out of their fearful stupor, sprinting across towards the pub.

“Potter!” someone roared, voice echoing over the shouts of spells and cries for help. “We were wondering if you’d come play the hero!”

“Well, you’ve got me,” Harry snarled, dropping into a defensive position, shooting off spells at whoever was within distance. Proper combat spells, not the stuff he taught the HA.

Harry wasn’t going to pull his punches with people who came to attack children.

Around him, he noticed familiar faces standing their ground with their wands raised — those who had been with him in the pub, sure, but other members of the HA who had been in the village at the time. Cho with one of her yearmates; Justin Finch-Fletchley and the fifth year Slytherin girl he was currently dating; the Creevey brothers and Vicky Frobisher. All of them taking to the fight without fear or hesitation.

The Death Eaters didn’t seem to know what to do. One of them yelped loudly as Vicky hit him with a Stinging hex, distracting him enough for Colin to Disarm him and snap his wand over his thigh. Another ended up with enormous bats flying from his own nose, attacking his face — that had to be Ginny.

Harry grinned, sending an Impediment jinx at a Death Eater before they could finish casting a fire spell at Dogweed and Death Cap. What the hell kind of idiot set fire to a herbology shop; did they not know what kind of reactions that could cause?

It was clear they had not expected this kind of resistance in Hogsmeade. “Has your master gotten so desperate he’d send his lackeys out to torture and kill a bunch of third years?” he taunted, firing a curse that would shatter the bones in one Death Eater’s hand, making them drop their wand with a scream.

“You watch your mouth!” The screech was familiar, sending ice through his heart.

Bellatrix Lestrange was in Hogsmeade.

It looked like she had just arrived — back-up, perhaps? Or had she come late simply to gloat at their success? She must be disappointed, if that were the case.

As she sauntered down the cobblestone streets, two masked Death Eaters stayed close behind her. Harry wondered if it was the other two Lestranges; the brothers, Rodolphus and Rabastan.

He stepped up to face them. There was no way he was going to let the three of them loose on Hogsmeade. The HA could handle the rest — these three were all his.

“I’m only saying the truth,” Harry drawled, keeping his wand raised as he stood merely feet away from Bellatrix. “Hardly seems like a fair fight. Does he even care that some of those third years might be his followers’ kids? Or is he finally admitting that the whole pureblood supremacy stuff is just bullshit, and all he really wants is destruction.” He ducked a jet of bright green magic, smirking. “Ooh, naughty Bella! Your boss won’t like that; he wants to kill me himself, you can’t take that from him.”

Bellatrix scowled, and the next spell headed his way was a Cruciatus. Harry dodged that, too. “You don’t understand the Dark Lord’s master plans, you stupid half-blood!”

“Neither do you, by the looks of it,” Harry retorted. “Killing magical kids just to make a point? So much for preserving the bloodlines.¹”

The woman screeched, firing another spell, which Harry deflected. It left a huge gouge in the cobblestones when it hit the ground. “We don’t care about the ickle babies,” Bellatrix spat. “We’re here to make sure you and your blood-traitor boyfriend get what you deserve.”

Harry’s instinct was to look for Draco, but he didn’t dare turn away from the Lestranges. Draco would be fine. He could handle himself.

“Leave the others alone, then,” he challenged. “I’m right here. Leave them, and come get me.”

Not all of the Death Eaters took up the challenge. Some were clearly having too much fun terrorising the village — those ones didn’t last long against the HA.

But within moments, Harry found himself utterly surrounded. Bellatrix’s smirk was sharp as a knife, her wand drawing close to her face.

And the fight began.

All of Harry’s training could not have prepared him for this — there were more people after him than he could count, spells coming from every direction. He shielded and dodged and deflected, trying to send their spells back at them where he could, sending his own spells out when he got the chance. He wasn’t creative; Cutting curses, Bone-Breakers, Disarming charms. Anything quick, easy, and not likely to have him called a Dark Lord when the dust settled.

The HA were trying to help, picking their own fights with Death Eaters, those brave idiots. Fred and George were stood protectively over a huddle of kids who looked too injured to make it to safety, working almost as one singular being they were so in tune.

Suddenly, Harry caught a spell to the side, and fell to his knees with a scream of pain as all his nerves caught fire at once. Bellatrix cackled delightedly — a sound that was cut off with a wet thud, ending Harry's pain just as abruptly.

When Harry looked up, he saw Neville stood over him, blood splattered across his face. In front of them, Bellatrix was hunched over, hand grasping at her chest and face going chalky as she gasped fruitlessly for air.

"You will not use that spell on anyone ever again," Neville growled, helping Harry roughly to his feet. Bellatrix dropped to the ground — the two Lestrange brothers didn't like that one bit, and Harry was given no time to recover as he jumped right back in to defending himself. But at least this time, he had Neville there, too.

The Death Eaters were outnumbered, their resolve weakened by the felling of their leader. Harry's limbs burned with exertion, but it was easier with Neville at his side. Easier still when a tall, pale blond form appeared on his other side, face set in fierce determination, wand slashing down in a movement Harry recognised but hadn't dared use himself, couldn't without giving away where he'd learned it.

Rabastan Lestrange's left arm dropped to the ground, his wand going with it. The man screamed, while his brother snarled.

"You!" he roared at Draco, firing a Killing curse — Harry immediately summoned a broken bench to take the curse, though Draco ducked all the same. "I'll kill you, you blood-traitor scum!"

"I'd like to see you try!" Draco retorted, eyes blazing as he aimed another Sectumsempra, at Rodolphus this time.

Rodolphus screamed, arching his wand high above him, even as his chest split open from shoulder to stomach. There was a sound like a tree snapping, then the two Lestrange brothers huddled together over Bellatrix's slumped form, and with a crack of apparition they were gone.

Within a heartbeat, several more cracks of apparition sounded — Harry whipped around, wand raised and ready for the next round of the fight, but it wasn't more Death Eaters. It was the Order of the Phoenix, headed by Alastor Moody.

They looked around, blinking at the destruction surrounding them — and at the assortment of Death Eaters on the ground, some dead, some merely bound with magic, all with hard-eyed Hogwarts students standing over them.

"Potter!" Moody barked, limping forward. "What the bloody hell do you think you're playing at?"

“Playing at?” Harry repeated incredulously. “I’m not playing at anything — I’m saving lives, because your lot were too fucking slow to get here!”

“This isn’t a fun little training exercise for your bloody duelling club, boy!” Moody argued. Harry blamed his exhaustion for the way that he flinched at the word.

“Does it look like we were training?” he retorted, spreading his arms wide. “We’re the only damn reason Hogsmeade is still standing. You should be thanking us.”

Moody scoffed. “For putting yourselves in danger because you think you can stand up to a real fight, just because you’ve done it in your classroom? You’re going to get them all killed!” He looked around, glaring at the HA members. “All of you! Idiot children, involving yourselves where you’re not wanted. And you!” He rounded on Fred and George. “Where the hell were you two? You were supposed to be guarding the place, not reliving your glory days with your little friends!”

“Mad-Eye, I think you need to calm down,” Kingsley started, placing a hand on the man’s shoulder only to be roughly shrugged off. “Potter and his friends did good work here.”

“Potter and his friends need to keep their heads down and their noses out of other peoples’ business!” Moody snapped.

“They came here for me,” Harry said hotly. “They made it my business. Regardless, I wasn’t going to stand by and let them torture a bunch of third years!”

“You had no right to ask students to fight your battles for you! It’s one thing to take on Death Eaters yourselves; it’s another to throw kids in their way. Or do you want another Diggory on your hands?”

“Harry didn’t ask us to do anything!” came Ginny’s furious response. “We fought on our own decisions. And we won.” For good measure, she kicked the bound and unconscious Death Eater at her feet.

“And don’t you dare talk about Cedric like that!” Cho added, voice shaking only slightly.

Moody growled, turning back to Harry. “I knew something like this would happen. Before he left, Albus said—“

“Albus?” Harry repeated, wide-eyed. “You’re still listening to what Dumbledore told you, after he tried to kill me?”

Moody’s gaze narrowed, his electric blue eye darting up to Harry’s scar. “Don’t think because you’ve got the rest of the world convinced every word out of your mouth is bloody gospel, that you can hide the truth from those of us who know it.”

“Mad-Eye, that’s enough,” Kingsley cut in sharply. Another Order member scoffed.

“You would say that, wouldn’t you?” she muttered, glaring at Kingsley. “Still bitter you’re not leading the Order yourself, Shacklebolt?”

As the tension rose, the Order began to shuffle unconsciously into two sides — those with Moody, and those with Kingsley.

Harry wondered if he was being premature in thinking the fighting was over.

“You can’t say you condone this!” one of the wizards on Moody’s side exclaimed. “Just because we all know Potter needs to fight You-Know-Who doesn’t mean he should let kids in the fight as well!”

“I don’t think those kids had a choice when the Death Eaters started attacking them!”

They argued all at once, only snippets even audible over the combined din. Meanwhile the crowd gathered, staring incredulously at these grown adults bickering like children over a fight they’d been too late to help with.

It was too much for Harry. With an impatient growl, he raised his wand, creating a loud cracking noise that had everyone going silent at once. “Look. I don’t care what you think. The fact is, you were too slow. We had to fight, or we would have died. Children would have died. What’s done is done. Now, you can either fuck off back where you came from and sulk about a bunch of students stealing your thunder, or you can help us get our injured back to Hogwarts where they can be seen to. And you can deal with these scum,” he added, glancing at the downed Death Eaters in disgust. “I don’t know what you want to do with the alive ones. Can’t exactly take them to Azkaban these days.” Later, he might worry about how many of them weren’t truly loyal, were working for Voldemort just to save their own skin or their family’s. But right now he was in pain and tired and pissed off, and it was tempting to just kill every one of them and be done with it.

“We’ll handle it, Harry,” Kingsley assured. Then he turned to Moody, scowling. “And if this is the direction you’re taking the Order, you can count me out. I refuse to let children die just because the adults want to shelter them from reality.”

With that, Kingsley strode off towards the nearest group of students, healing charms already on the tip of his wand. A beat, and Sirius stepped forward. “What he said,” he agreed, glaring at Moody. “You can take whatever Albus bloody Dumbledore has told you and you can shove it up your arse. Stay the hell away from my godson.”

One by one, the Order fractured — Remus, Tonks, the Weasley siblings; all of them gave the rest of the Order disgusted looks and went to work on clearing up the aftermath.

“Throw your lot in with him, then!” Moody snarled. “You’re only signing your own death warrants!”

Then he glared at Harry one last time, bent down to grab a dead Death Eater, and apparated away.

The remaining Order members looked uneasy — some of them did the same, picking up a corpse and leaving to dispose of it. A few went to go aid in the repairs, but they were eyed with distrust.

Harry was glad to see Tonks carefully rounding up the still-living Death Eaters. He trusted her with them a hell of a lot more than he trusted Moody's people.

"Are you hurt, pup?" Sirius asked, rushing towards Harry and grabbing him gently by the shoulders. "Draco, Neville, are you boys okay?"

"Nothing major," Harry assured, giving himself a once-over now the adrenaline was beginning to fade. There was nothing he couldn't heal himself, he didn't think.

"I'm fine," Draco confirmed.

"I—I think I killed her." Harry turned to Neville, who looked like he was going to faint. His hazel eyes were glassy with tears as he looked back at Harry. "Did I kill her, Harry? Did—did I kill Bellatrix Lestrange?"

Sirius sucked in a sharp breath. Harry bit his lip. "I don't know, Nev." He would hazard a guess and say yes, but he wasn't completely sure what spell Neville had used. She certainly hadn't looked alive when her husband had apparated her out. "But if you did, good fucking riddance is all I can say." He placed a hand on his best friend's shoulder, meeting his gaze intently. "You saved my life, Neville. Saved dozens of lives, if you got rid of her. Don't you dare feel guilty for putting that bitch down. Not after what she did to your parents."

Neville nodded jerkily. Still, his whole body began to tremble.

"Come on, kid," Sirius soothed, putting an arm around Neville's shoulders. "Let's get you sat down, yeah? Give you a minute to breathe. Look, there's Ginny." He glanced back at his godson. "Get yourself up to the Hospital Wing, I'll meet you there."

Harry nodded, but when he turned, it wasn't to head up to the school. It was in the direction of the Three Broomsticks. The pub was a little charred and damaged out front, the sign nothing but splinters, but the line of students defending the doors had stood strong. Rosmerta stood with them, and now the fight was done she approached Harry. "I don't care what that idiot thinks — you're a damned hero, Harry Potter, and this whole village owes you our lives. You and all your friends." Around her, other shopkeepers who had dared venture out of their premises nodded.

"We just did what we had to do," Harry said, shrugging somewhat awkwardly. He wasn't used to being thanked for throwing himself into danger.

"Darn sight more than most would dare," Rosmerta returned. Then she straightened up, squaring her shoulders. "Let's get this mess cleaned up, then, shall we?" She looked at the crowd. "Anyone who doesn't have the strength to get back up to the school yet, come on in. I'll get butterbeer and sandwiches going, on the house." She smiled slightly. "And anyone who can fix my window gets a bottle of Ogden's Finest for their troubles. I was never any good with glass."

Several people perked up at that, including some of the students.

A hand on Harry's arm made him turn, meeting Draco's concerned gaze. "Sirius was right; you should get back up to the castle."

"Only once I know everyone's okay," he insisted. He might have told Moody that he hadn't asked his friends to fight, which was true, but that didn't mean he didn't feel some measure of responsibility for them. They were his students, of a sort.

For a moment, he thought Draco might argue. Then the blond merely sighed, pulling Harry in to a tight hug. "Fucking Gryffindors," he muttered. Harry laughed against the collar of his jumper.

Someone must have sent word up to the castle — McGonagall, Hagrid, Snape and Pomfrey arrived, Pomfrey immediately setting up a triage station just outside Honeyduke's as Draco hurried to assist her, the unconscious Professor Vector their first patient. The sweet shop was the least damaged of all, and Mrs Honeyduke was handing out bars of chocolate for the shock. When he drifted by to get a headcount of HA members, Harry found himself getting a huge bar of his favourite milk chocolate pressed into his hands. "Thank you, Mr Potter," Mrs Honeyduke murmured. "We wouldn't have stood a chance without you and yours." Then she was off, herding up a group of fourth years, sending them to catch up with the group Flitwick was leading back to the school.

Harry pocketed the chocolate, shaking his head bemusedly as he turned.

And immediately found himself at the end of the Hogwarts Matron's wand. "Sit down before you fall down, Potter." She gestured towards a conjured cot in front of her.

"Madam Pomfrey, I'm fine."

"I'll be the judge of that. You're limping." Over her shoulder, Draco scowled as Harry backed away from the mediwitch.

"There's students in far worse shape than me. Pass me a Healing potion, I'll be fine."

Pomfrey didn't look happy, but she couldn't deny the crowd of students needing her services was growing, so she let Harry be with the potion and a Nerve Tonic, as well as a mild threat to see her before he snuck away to the castle.

He stayed as long as he could, helping gather frightened students from their hiding places and offering what limited healing magic he knew. He levitated the corpses that hadn't been taken by the Order off to the side, where no one had to look at them. When some of the masks fell off, he recognised students who had graduated within his time at the school, and had to swallow back the bile that rose in his throat.

He conjured sheets to cover the two dead students, still held in the lifeless arms of a stout woman he vaguely recognised as a clerk at Gladrags, her protection clearly not enough.

The hand on his shoulder was McGonagall's this time, her weathered face drawn. "I can take it from here, Potter. You four are the only students left in the village; we've accounted for everyone else."

He blinked — waiting by Pomfrey's triage tent were Draco, Katie and Blaise. “I...” He trailed off, looking back down at the cloth-covered bodies. “I’m sorry I didn’t save them, Professor.”

McGonagall’s lips pursed, her fingers tightening on his shoulder. “Far more of them would have died had you not been here, Potter. Unfortunately, even the best of us cannot save everyone.”

He gave a stiff nod, barely a jerk of his chin. He understood that, but it didn’t stop the guilt. The Death Eaters had come for him, after all.

McGonagall released him, and he headed for his friends, stumbling a little as his quivering muscles began to protest a little too much, the ache in his hip turning sharp with every step. Now the adrenaline was starting to wear off, he was starting to realise he was not quite as unscathed as he’d thought.

“Don’t make me send you back to the castle on a stretcher, Potter,” Pomfrey called, not looking up from the patient she was dealing with.

“Oh, for Godric’s sake,” Katie huffed, stepping in front of Harry and turning her back to him. “Go on, on you get.”

He stared. “Sorry, what?”

“You’re no heavier than my little brother, and I give him piggybacks all the time. It’s me or a stretcher; you’re in no shape to make that walk under your own power.”

Blaise had his arm in a sling, and Harry could admit there was no way Draco was strong enough for that. He groaned.

“This is ridiculous,” he muttered. “I can walk!”

“Me or the stretcher,” Katie reminded. “So button it, Potter.”

Harry could count on one hand the number of times he’d been given a piggyback. But that was how he left Hogsmeade after his heroic battle against the Death Eaters — clinging to the back of Katie Bell, body slowly making its protests known, too tired to even argue at this point.

He would get Draco back for laughing at him, though. After he’d had some sleep.

.-. .

Dinner that evening was a subdued affair. To no one’s surprise, McGonagall announced that all future Hogsmeade weekends were cancelled for safety reasons. There was a small group of quietly crying students at the end of the Ravenclaw table, mourning the two kids that had died.

Harry couldn’t look at them without his chest hurting.

He ate mechanically, half propped up by Draco, wondering how the hell a day that had started out so wonderful could end so tragically.

“I was going to go up to the Hospital Wing, to visit Daphne,” Draco told him quietly. “Did you want to come with me? Pomfrey can get you checked out properly.”

Harry groaned, but nodded — the mediwitch was bound to get him eventually. Might as well get it over with. And he was pretty sore.

Then the rest of the sentence filtered through his foggy brain, and he stiffened. “Daphne’s up there? Is she okay?”

“She will be in a few days. She got caught by an Entrail-Expelling curse, but whoever cast it botched it, so it was reversible.”

Harry’s stomach knotted tight in horrified sympathy. “Fuck.” That was incredibly lucky. Draco nodded, eyes hollow.

“Yeah. You coming?”

As always, eyes followed Harry on his way out of the hall. But this time, instead of being suspicious or accusing, they were all filled with respect.

The Hospital Wing was far more full than Harry would have liked to see, most of the beds curtained off as their occupants rested. Daphne was at the far end, in the same bed Harry usually ended up in. Luna was sat in a chair beside the bed, braiding glittering purple wool into Daphne’s hair. At the foot of the bed, Astoria Greengrass sat with her knees tucked up beneath her, worried gaze stuck on her sister.

“Oh, good. I was hoping Mr Malfoy might be able to bring you up here tonight,” Pomfrey said to Harry, patting the bed beside Daphne expectantly. “Come on, let’s get this over with.”

Daphne gave a weak smile at Harry’s grumbling. “It’ll go quicker if you quit bitching, you know,” she teased. Her face was pale, the sheets pulled up to her chin, but she looked in fairly good spirits for a girl who had almost died.

“Can I help with anything, Madam Pomfrey?” Draco asked politely, and Pomfrey shook her head.

“Be glad you’re not sat right here next to Mr Potter — don’t think I didn’t notice you healing your own curse wounds down in the village.”

Harry turned accusing eyes on his boyfriend. “What curse wounds?” He hadn’t seen more than a few bruises on the blond when they’d snuck off to the prefect’s bathroom to clean themselves up, once they got back to the castle.

“Minor things,” Draco assured evasively. “As Madam Pomfrey said, I healed them all.”

That wasn’t nearly as reassuring as he probably thought it was. “You should have said something.”

“Pot, meet Kettle,” Draco said succinctly, making Astoria giggle. He turned to Daphne, gaze softening. “How are you feeling?”

“I think I’m going to go vegetarian,” Daphne answered, making all of them but Luna stare at her in confusion. “After seeing my insides on the outside, the idea of eating meat has become quite unappealing.”

A beat, then Draco snorted. “I told you not to look at it.”

“Yeah, but I wasn’t going to just close my eyes and let you rummage around my intestines.”

“Quite frankly, Miss Greengrass; Mr Malfoy’s rummaging is the only reason you’re still able to eat at all,” Madam Pomfrey remarked. There was pride in her eyes as she looked at Draco.

“Wait, Draco reversed the curse?” Harry asked, wide-eyed. “You didn’t mention that part!”

Draco blushed under his scrutiny. “It was before help arrived. There was no one else there to do it.”

“You saved your friend’s life, Mr Malfoy,” Pomfrey told him. “Did a very fine job of it, too. You’ve the instincts of a battlefield healer to you.” Then she glanced askance at Harry. “I suppose you’d have to, willingly tying yourself to this fool.”

“Hey!” Harry protested. Pomfrey clucked her tongue.

“You’ve been walking around all day on a fractured hip, Mr Potter,” she told him bluntly.

“...Oh. Thought it was a bit sore.”

The matron rolled her eyes heavenward for a brief moment. “Hold still.” She tapped his hip with her wand, murmuring a spell — there was a strange cold sensation, then the pain began to fade. “You’ll take it easy for a week, Potter,” she instructed. “No quidditch. No duelling practice. No other strenuous activity.” Her pointed gaze moved to Draco, and Astoria giggled again. “A week, and then you’ll come see me again. Clear?”

Harry swallowed. “Yes, ma’am.”

“Good. Now, if you’ll excuse me, I’ve got other patients to see to. Miss Greengrass, your guests can only stay another twenty minutes; you need your potions and then rest.” Pomfrey hustled off down the other end of the ward, leaving the teens alone.

“A whole week? Not sure you’ll cope,” Daphne teased feebly.

“It’s going to be even longer for you, so don’t be smug,” Draco scolded. He perched on the bed with Harry, leaning to take Daphne’s hand. “Are you sure you’re alright? I didn’t — I didn’t mess anything up in there?” Nerves strained his voice, and Harry squeezed his knee.

“You heard Pomfrey,” Daphne insisted, “you did a very fine job.” Her smile was tired, but genuine. “Thank you, Draco. I owe you my life.”

Draco swallowed tightly, squeezing her hand. “I’m just glad you’re alright.”

“It was a close one,” Daphne agreed. Her sister whimpered softly. “Tori, I’m okay. Draco patched me up, yeah? Good as new. Don’t even need to tell Uncle about it.”

Astoria’s eyes narrowed. “Oh, I’m telling him,” the fourth year insisted. “Daph, you almost died. In Hogsmeade! What if next time—“ She cut herself off, shaking her head defiantly.

“The war will be done by the new school year,” Luna said suddenly, confidently, knowingly. Harry’s spine straightened.

“You See it?” he asked, and she nodded.

“By summer’s end, the fighting will be done,” she said in that same Other sort of voice.

“Don’t suppose you See us winning, do you, hun?” Daphne asked. Luna shook her head apologetically.

“There are too many paths, too many wrackspurts. The outcome is unclear.”

Ignoring the ache in his hip, Harry slithered an arm around Draco’s waist, hugging the blond to his side. That was good news, of a sort.

But it still made his stomach churn with unease, imagining the battle to come.

Chapter 99

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

“The house is full, but we’ve got some tents set up in the garden.” Sirius flashed a grin through the mirror’s surface. “Even had a couple more elves come along, which I think Tinker appreciates.”

“Not Essie?” Harry asked, grinning. Sirius snorted.

“Not hardly. Thinks we’re implying she isn’t up to scratch.”

It was late, and Harry was in bed chatting to Sirius, getting an update on life outside Hogwarts. He was glad the Pottery was helping so many people, even if it was a bit horrifying to imagine just how many families had been displaced by the Death Eaters.

How many hadn’t made it as far as safety.

“And how are the kids at Grimmauld doing? Did you end up moving them over?” Harry knew his godfather was torn on whether to take the five children to the Pottery, too — Grimmauld was more of an emergency hospital than a true safehouse, and the healers there couldn’t be expected to keep looking after the kids as well as their patients. Even though the kids insisted they could look after themselves just fine.

They would be better off at the Pottery, where there were others their own age there.

But Sirius was attached to them, now. He liked having them at Grimmauld.

Harry watched the dog animagus bite his lip. “Yeah, we took them over at the weekend, when Kevin’s aunt showed up,” Sirius sighed. “One of the other boys at the house is one of Frankie’s dorm mates from Hogwarts, so they were pleased to see each other. I don’t—I don’t think Nashira was as happy about being there. I don’t think any of them know how to cope with so many people around, after how long they spent by themselves.” He ran a hand through his long hair. “Poor kids. It’ll be good for them to have proper company, though.”

“But you miss them,” Harry finished knowingly.

“But we miss them,” Sirius agreed. “Merlin, pup. I hope you get to meet these kids soon. You’ll love them. Nash is a little sass-monster, just like you.”

Harry laughed. “I hope so, too.” He cocked his head, curious. “Have we figured out yet what the plan is for any other war orphans?” The ones at the Pottery weren’t the only ones by far. Most were safe at Hogwarts, but that wouldn’t help when summer came around. “It’s not like there’s an orphanage or anything for them.”

“We’ll keep them safe wherever we can, for now. If they can go to friends’ houses, or stay at a safehouse. When the war is over... inheritance tests for the muggleborns, to see if they’ve any family connections that may take them in. And looking in the muggle world, of course — aunts, uncles, grandparents. We'd have to make sure it's safe to let them in on the secret, but that usually turns out alright. Same for the other kids; we'll look for family to take them in, or godparents."

"And if they have none?" Harry asked, well aware that a lot of children of Death Eaters had entire extended families in Voldemort's service.

"Then we find people willing to take care of them. The older kids will be easy enough to foster; they're at Hogwarts most of the year. But we're hoping to find enough people willing to adopt. Depends how many we end up with, when the dust settles. Amelia's suggested we contact squibs, or families of other muggleborns who know about magic. With stringent checks, of course," Sirius added, seeing the panic flicker across Harry's face. "We won't leave any of them alone, pup. We won't let what happened to you happen to another kid." His grey eyes turned soft. "Trust me, yeah? They'll be alright. Hell, I'd adopt every one of them myself before I let another Dursley situation happen."

Harry managed a smile. "From the sounds of things, you're already well on your way to doing that." He laughed when that drew a blush up Sirius' olive cheeks.

"Don't be a brat."

He laughed harder, the tension draining from him.

Privately, Harry cursed the timing of it all — he and Draco wanted a whole quidditch team full of kids, and couldn't count on finding women willing to surrogate for that many. But they weren't even seventeen yet; all these war orphans needed homes now, and there was no way two boys who hadn't even graduated school could provide that for them.

It was a shame. But he believed Sirius when he said they'd find places for all the kids.

Maybe having a whole bunch of new siblings would be a nice warm-up for when he and Draco decided to get started on that quidditch team.

"I've got to go, pup. Charlie's just got home," Sirius said, gaze looking at something beyond the mirror, out of Harry's view. "Looks like the baby dragons got the better of him a bit."

"Rude!" Harry heard faintly through the glass, and chuckled.

"I'll leave you to it, then. G'night, Pads."

"Night, kiddo."

The mirror turned to plain glass once more, and Harry tucked it in his nightstand with the Marauder's Map. It still made his chest ache, seeing those items without his invisibility cloak tucked in with them.

What was Dumbledore up to, with all three Hallows? Had he discovered whatever power they held once combined?

Harry sighed — everyone else in the dorm was asleep, but he still felt restless. Silently, he crept out of bed, sitting on the ledge of the curved window, staring out at the night sky. Somewhere out there was Dumbledore, plotting Merlin only knew what. Possibly with the power of Death itself at his disposal.

If only Harry had left his cloak behind that night. He hadn't even been wearing it!

Scowling to himself, he focused back on the stars — beating himself up wasn't going to help him sleep any.

He saw a pale blur in the sky, and smiled as he squinted at it — it was Hedwig, out for a late night hunt.

Then a second pale blur joined the owl. Another snowy owl. Harry raised an eyebrow.

Well, it seemed he wasn't the only one who couldn't sleep, tonight.

Slowly, silently, Harry undid the latch on the window, hissing when the cool night air touched his skin. Then he whistled — not too loud, but enough to carry through the quiet.

An owl hooted in response.

The two pale forms changed direction, heading towards him. The one that wasn't Hedwig was showing off a little, flying graceful arcs and dives, making Harry grin. Hedwig landed on the window sill first, cooing softly at Harry. He scratched the back of her head where she liked it best. "Hello, sweetheart. You showing him how it's done?"

The second owl's landing was a little more unsteady, and he butted imperiously at Harry's hand. Harry chuckled, giving him a scratch, too.

Hedwig hooted softly at the pair of them, hopped up to gently nip Harry's ear, then took off in the direction of the Owlery. The second owl watched her go, then turned back to Harry, bright amber eyes studying him.

Harry shuffled backwards, opening the window a little further. "You coming in then, or what?"

The owl didn't need asking twice, hopping through the window and giving a graceful little glide over to Harry's bed. Harry shut the window, heartbeat picking up.

By the time he turned around again, Draco was fully human, draped attractively over Harry's crimson duvet, wearing grey silk pyjamas and a lazy smirk. "So this is the Gryffindor dorms, is it? Charming."

Harry hurried to join him, pulling the drapes and raising a Silencing charm, arousal already coursing through him. This was exactly what he needed to deal with his restless energy. He straddled Draco's hips, mischievously kissing his nose. "Do you have any idea how many times I've fantasised about having you up here?" he murmured, playing with the button at Draco's throat. Grey eyes turned the colour of a summer storm, hot with lust. "Splayed out on my Gryffindor sheets, no one else knowing you're in here." He kissed Draco's jaw, suckling at the tender spot just below his ear. “Do you know how many times I’ve jerked off in this bed thinking of you? How many dreams of you I’ve had in here? How many times I put my own fingers inside me imagining it was you, before I was brave enough to ask you for it?”

“Harry,” Draco moaned, rocking up into him.

“I don’t know what I want more,” Harry confessed, biting at Draco’s throat, kissing his way down his chest as he opened the shirt one button at a time. “To pound you into my mattress, or to have you do it to me. Something very sexy about the idea of my Slytherin boyfriend fucking me in the Gryffindor dorm.”

“Do you have lube up here?” Draco rasped, and Harry smirked. He sat up, pulling off his t-shirt in one fluid motion, then reached over Draco’s head to the hidden shelf behind the headboard, grabbing the vial he knew was in there. He watched Draco’s eyes follow the flex of his shoulders at the movement.

“Do I have lube, he asks,” Harry said, rolling his eyes, holding up the item in question. “As if I’d survive without it, all those lonely nights up here thinking of you.”

“Tell me about it,” Draco urged huskily. “These fantasies of yours.”

Harry’s eyes lit up. He finished undoing Draco’s shirt the rest of the way, letting it fall open to reveal the blond’s pale chest. Merlin, he looked good against the bold red duvet. “Well,” he began, keeping his voice low. “There’s quite a few of them. Sometimes I imagine we’re the only ones in the dorm, and I bend you over the end of the bed and fuck you til all of Gryffindor can hear you begging for it.” He let his fingertips trail down the soft trail of silver hair on Draco’s stomach, tugging gently at the waistband of his trousers. They were tented obscenely, a wet spot soaking through already.

“Sometimes I imagine I’m up here getting myself off and you sneak in to surprise me and catch me right in the middle of it. Sit right at the end of my bed and watch me til I finish.” He peeled the pyjamas down, baring Draco entirely, and sat back on his haunches to survey his boyfriend in satisfaction. Draco looked just as perfect in his bed as he’d always imagined.

“I’ve thought of all sorts of dirty, dirty things up here involving me and you. Didn’t even consider your new animagus form might make it easy to get you up here and actually do them.” He winked — if only the same could be said for his form making it as easy to sneak into the Slytherin dorms. That was something for another night.

“But the very first fantasy I ever had, once I knew enough to start properly fantasising,” he whispered, startling Draco when he reversed their positions, bringing the blond on top of him and then lifting his hips to take off his own trousers. “I imagined we were just like this, middle of the night, sneaking around behind my dorm mates’ backs. And you were just like this, over me, all gorgeous and Slytherin silver against my red and gold drapes, and you fucked me like I was the most precious thing in the entire goddamn world.” It was such a sweet fantasy, such a juxtaposition to the many other dirty thoughts he’d had of Draco in this bed. A fourteen year-old’s ideal of the perfect first time, not hot and heavy and wild but slow, sensual, loving.

Draco's breath hitched, his hands on Harry's thighs. He looked exactly as Harry envisioned he might, beautiful and flawless and utterly in love, haloed in the gold brocade along the top of the drapes. He leaned down, lips pressing to Harry's, nose brushing Harry's cheek as he opened his mouth and kissed him like he was trying to devour Harry's entire being. "You are," he breathed once they parted, smoothing reverent hands over Harry's bare chest. "You are the most precious thing in the entire world to me, Harry James Potter. Don't ever think otherwise."

Harry couldn't breathe, his chest was so tight with love for this boy above him, his beautiful Slytherin, his shining light in the darkness. Draco knelt between his open thighs, and his kiss-swollen lips curled at the corners. "Look at you," he murmured. "Letting me think you're about to ask for something scandalous, and all you want me to do is love you."

"Please," Harry gasped, hands fisting in his sheets. He felt so exposed, lying there naked in the bed he'd spent most of the last six years in, with Draco just looking at him with his eyes so warm. "We can get to the scandalous stuff later, if you like. Just— please." He hadn't realised how much he wanted this, needed this. Needed Draco to fulfil this teenage wish of his, to prove that loving Harry like that wasn't just something that happened inside Harry's own head.

Draco adjusted himself, hooking Harry's legs up over his shoulders, gently kissing the inside of his knee. Then he reached for the lube, abandoned on the bed beside Harry. "This good?" he checked, uncorking the vial. Harry keened quietly, heart beating so hard he was amazed Draco couldn't hear it, couldn't tell how it begged to leap right out of Harry's chest and into the blond's waiting hands, where it belonged.

"Perfect."

.-. .

Harry wouldn't say that Draco sneaking up to Gryffindor Tower in owl form became a routine after that... but he learned to expect that quiet tap on his window on Wednesday nights. Always Wednesdays — they had a free period first thing Thursday morning, so it wouldn't matter as much if Draco stayed the night.

He was pretty sure Neville suspected something, even if the other Gryffindor wasn't sure what. He didn't know about Draco's animagus form, after all. But Harry's sudden shift to always staying in the Tower on Wednesday nights did not go uncommented on. Nor did the Slytherin tie that Draco accidentally left up there one week, having come up still in his uniform so Harry could get the proper effect of having his snake in the lion's den.

It made the week more bearable, that was for sure.

It wasn't exactly the most comfortable thing in the world, squeezing two teenage boys into a single bed, but it just gave Harry an excuse to hold Draco even closer while they slept, after they'd properly exhausted themselves. But Harry could definitely get used to having one guaranteed night with his boyfriend — even if they didn't get up to anything sexual, it was nice having him there, without having to worry about being intruded on in the Room of Requirement or sneaking back up to their dorms from the Chamber. Sure, Draco always had to leave before sunrise, but that was easy enough. With a bit of begging on Harry's part, Hogwarts was kind enough to squeeze a little owl-sized passage into the existing dungeon vent system, so Draco could come and go as he pleased.

Harry could hardly believe it had taken them so many weeks to figure out.

Plenty of people noticed the spring in Harry's step in the following weeks, but most of them seemed to attribute it to Gryffindor's success against Hufflepuff, leaving them in perfect position to take the quidditch cup unless Slytherin absolutely trounced the badgers in April.

That was nice, too. As was the blowjob Draco gave him for an impressive snitch catch.

With the rest of the world falling to shit around them, Harry needed bright spots like that to keep him going. To keep all of them going — because if he looked like he was starting to falter, the entire castle's morale would plummet.

They were counting on him to lead them to victory against the Dark, and he needed to look like he had that well in hand. There was no room for him to be scared, or sad, or exhausted. Not in public, at any rate.

He was Harry Potter, the Boy-Who-Lived, and he had a duty to uphold.

.-. .

The Dark Lord was angry.

Severus was just glad it was aimed at someone other than him, for once. His last few summons, his master had not been impressed with the lack of information Severus had to offer — about the school, or Dumbledore's whereabouts, or Potter's progress in classes.

He didn't believe that no one had heard from Albus since the man's disappearance, even though that was perhaps the only genuine truth Severus gave him.

Last time, when he had been summoned after the attack on Hogsmeade to discover Bellatrix dead and Rodolphus mere moments from the same, Rabastan missing his casting arm from the mid-bicep down — the punishment Severus had received for not warning his lord how capable the students of Hogwarts were had been intense.

But tonight, the Dark Lord's ire was directed at Fenrir Greyback. Just looking at the man made Severus' blood boil — this was the monster that had turned Remus when he was just a child, revenge for a father's slight against wolves. Greyback was exactly the reason werewolves had such a bad reputation as bloodthirsty, savage beasts. The reason Remus struggled to get a job, to be served in shops, to be given a modicum of respect by the wizarding world at large.

This man was the reason that Remus had learned to hate himself, and Severus despised him for it.

"You have always prided yourself, Greyback, on being the alpha," Voldemort sneered at the hulking form kneeling at his feet. Even as a man, Greyback had more of the wolf to him than Severus had ever seen. There were rumours of experiments, done years ago — done to make him closer to his wolf form, able to transform at will, able to infect even in his human form. Severus had no idea how much of it was true, but if even half was... Fenrir Greyback could barely be called a man at all.

“Yes, My Lord,” Greyback agreed, bowing his head.

“And yet,” Voldemort continued coldly, “you have failed to get the werewolf packs to follow you. To follow me. You told me you were an alpha, that none would dare go against your will, that any who would try would die at your claws. But you are weak!”

“I’m sorry, My Lord,” Greyback said, daring to look up. Severus wondered how he could call himself an alpha of anything when he took to subservience so quickly at the Dark Lord’s hand. “They have banded together — I am strong, but I cannot fight them all at once. The packs have formed an alliance with the Potter boy. He has promised them rights, and the choice to stay removed from the fighting. He has promised them freedom.”

Oh, the Dark Lord did not like that, not one bit. Greyback screamed under the Cruciatus, but not a single Death Eater so much as twitched. No one wanted that fury directed their way. “Potter,” Voldemort spat. “How can he promise them this? How can he offer them freedom and have them believe it? How can he offer them peace? I, Lord Voldemort, am the one who decides where blood is shed!”

“I believe it is Lupin’s doing, My Lord,” Greyback snarled. Severus’ shoulders tightened. “That impudent little runt is close with the Potter boy, and I know he’s visited the packs in the past. No doubt he has persuaded them that his relationship with Potter means the boy cares about what happens to them.”

Another Cruciatus, this one shorter but no less agonising. “Of course. Lupin,” he sneered, and Severus hated hearing his love’s name in that filthy mouth. “He will die, in good time. And so will the wolves who believe Saint Potter can convince the world to care for beasts and creatures.”

“Of course, My Lord,” Greyback agreed, voice little more than a growl after his prolonged screams of pain. It amazed Severus, how a man so proud of his creature status could bow to a master they all knew would wipe werewolves off the face of the earth in a heartbeat if he had the power. “How may I assist you in your bloodshed?”

Thin, colourless lips twisted in a snarl. “You are mistaken if you believe you are worth anything to me, Greyback, now that you come with no pack at your call. If they will not support you, I have no need for a weak, useless pup. Avada Kedavra!”

Greyback hit the wooden floor with a soft thud. No one dared move. Severus wasn’t sure his heart was even beating anymore.

“Mulciber!” Voldemort snapped, and immediately the dark-robed figure was at his side. “Clean this up.”

“Yes, My Lord.” Mulciber pulled his wand, levitating the body away.

The Dark Lord paced in front of his loyal followers — a diminished group, now, thanks to Potter and his ilk. Severus felt a swell of pride in his chest whenever he thought about it. But this was not the place for such things.

“Severus,” the steel-silk voice called, and Severus locked up that pride along with all his other positive emotions in a tight box in the deepest part of his mind, where the Dark Lord would never find it.

“How may I serve you, My Lord?” he asked, moving straight to kneel where Greyback once had. His heart pounded in his throat as he hoped he would not suffer the same fate.

“Tell me of the school,” Voldemort urged. “What more is being done to put that Potter brat in his place?”

“I humiliate him in classes as much as I am able with the headmistress breathing down my neck,” Severus reported. “There are whispers that Dumbledore tried to kill him because he is a threat to the Light. I believe your loyal few within the school are perpetuating their own work in the student rumour mill. He is getting cocky, My Lord — he is well guarded, but he believes himself to be above the need for it, now he has drawn blood in battle. He will slip, My Lord, and you will get him.”

“You had best hope so, Severus,” Voldemort warned. “And still no word of Dumbledore?”

“None, My Lord. It seems whatever his plan is, it does not involve others.” And that was a whole other worry in itself.

The Dark Lord frowned, and Severus wondered if he was about to be screaming on the floor. Or worse. He braced himself, keeping his head bowed.

“Stay vigilant, Severus. You may not know who my loyal followers are within the student body, but they may call for your assistance soon. I shall task them with capturing the Potter boy; if he is as cocky as you say, they should not fail. You are dismissed, for now.”

Severus got straight to his feet, offering one last bow. “You are gracious, My Lord. I will await their word.” Why wouldn’t his master tell him which students to look out for? Was it a matter of trust? Surely he would have killed Severus by now, as unhinged as he had become, if he believed him to be suspect.

Or did he value a Potions Master more than he valued loyalty, these days?

It was difficult for Severus to tell, and he could not test his boundaries. Luckily, his allies in the Light had little need of information from him these days — they weren’t like Albus, expecting him to recount every second of his summons in case something useful popped up. But they understood how precarious Severus’ position was, and didn’t ask him to reveal information that might cost him his life.

He would have to tell them about this, though. He would have to tell Harry to stay vigilant.

Instead of apparating back to the castle, Severus made for home, shrinking his mask as he strode across the lawn. Unsurprisingly, Remus was waiting in the kitchen. “How was it?” his partner asked, jumping to greet Severus. He hesitated, scant inches away. “May I...?”

Severus closed the distance between them, ducking his head down to press his nose to Remus’ temple. “Fenrir Greyback is dead,” he declared, quiet but strong. Remus tensed in his arms.

“What?”

“The Dark Lord decided he had no use for a werewolf who could not bring him an army,” Severus relayed, meeting Remus’ honey gaze. “The packs have sided with Potter. Greyback’s punishment for failure was death.”

A hitch of breath, a flash of eyes. “Oh.”

“He blamed you for his failure,” Severus warned, hating the panic that welled in him when he thought of the idea of the Dark Lord having a personal grudge against his wolf, against another person Severus loved. “Greyback told him you were the one who swayed the packs to Harry’s side.”

Remus nodded slowly. “He’ll be after me, then.” No fear. Gods, this man was a marvel.

“In due time, so he said. I believe he has other priorities, first.” Like Dumbledore, and Potter. The loss of the werewolves was a blow, especially with how thin on the ground the Dark Lord’s ranks were looking these days, but it was not the biggest blow his master had suffered lately. Not since losing two Lestrange and watching the third have to retrain himself to duel with his off hand.

Remus nuzzled his jaw. “Let’s get you out of those robes. In the bath. Get the scent of that monster off you.” Severus wasn’t sure if he referred to Voldemort or Greyback, but he had no protests either way.

There were no more words between them until they were both naked, Severus in the bath and Remus kneeling at its side, washing his hair. Severus cracked an eye open, looking up at his partner. “You are taking the news that the Dark Lord wants your blood remarkably better than anticipated.”

Remus laughed, leaning down to kiss Severus, the angle awkward. “He wants the blood of anyone who stands against him. Anyone who stands with Harry. I am hardly in more danger than I was before.” He smiled, sitting back on his heels. “I spent half my childhood imagining Greyback’s death. Of course, most of those imaginings were at my hand, but the end result is the same.” His hand went to the back of Severus’ neck, squeezing gently, his smile turning soft. “It may be too late for me, but I have made a wonderful life for myself regardless of circumstances. But now, no more children will be turned on purpose for that beast’s amusement, or his vengeance. There will always be werewolves — but he was the worst of them, and now he’s gone, and the world is a better place for it.” Remus paused, cocking his head. “Does that make me a bad person, to relish in his death?”

Severus reached out of the water, sliding a hand into greying hair and twisting, yanking Remus down into the most ravaging kiss he could manage without accidentally pulling him into the tub. He pressed up into the kiss, and Remus gave as good as he got, meeting him beat for beat as he always did.

"If it does, that makes two of us," he said eventually, breathless and dark-eyed. "Join me in the bath, wolf."

Remus smirked, clambering into the tub, settling against Severus' chest with a hand over the Slytherin's racing heart. "Turns you on when I get all bloodthirsty, doesn't it?" he drawled, knowing and fond and not at all judgemental, because somehow the universe had discovered all the weaknesses of Severus Snape and rolled them into one being, one cardigan-wearing chocoholic werewolf of a man.

Later they would talk about Potter, and how to keep him safe. But there was celebrating to do, first.

.-. .

Training down in the Chamber was the only challenge that actually seemed worth Harry's time, these days. It was April now, three months until summer — four months until his birthday. Spending time doing Charms and Ancient Runes seemed... wasteful.

But everyone around him insisted he needed to keep as much normality to his life as possible, so Harry continued going to classes, playing quidditch and studying with his friends as if he was going to give even a single fuck about his end of year grades. And he mouthed off constantly in DADA, getting himself put in at least one detention a week, sometimes two.

His classmates clearly thought he had some kind of death wish, to act so brazenly against Snape. Some thought it was his own arrogance, his belief that he had nothing to learn from the man, that he could teach the class better. That always made Harry snort — if only they knew.

He'd heard a couple of Ravenclaw boys once discussing if Harry had some sort of masochism kink, if that was why he was dating someone like Draco Malfoy, if baiting Snape was some kind of a turn-on for him. There had even been a half-joking whisper of a threesome happening in Harry's detentions.

Harry had laughed himself hoarse at that one, then called Remus over the mirror just to tell his godfather the juicy gossip. Which had backfired slightly, as Remus had suggested that while Harry might not have a masochism kink, Severus was no stranger to such things, which was more information than necessary jesus fucking christ Remus.

Forget Snape playing double agent. The biggest deception in the wizarding world was Remus Lupin convincing everyone that he was mild and innocent and responsible.

So he got himself in detention as often as he could, as often as Snape would let him; the Potions Master had his own things to do, after all. Potions to brew for Voldemort, things to do for whatever they were calling the Order now that it had broken away from the actual Order.

And when Harry got down to the Chamber and was able to really put his back into duelling, he came alive.

Ever since the attack on Hogsmeade, he had pushed himself harder and harder. He had held his own, defended the village, and that was great — though he still saw the faces of those two students in his nightmares, sometimes — but he had also given away his skills. He had shown the Death Eaters that he wasn't just a silly little boy with an OWL-level defence education.

They knew he was good; that meant he had to be better.

Snape didn't seem thrilled with Harry's logic, but he also didn't argue with it. Especially not after the night he had shown up to their training session and told Harry that the loyal students within the school had been given the task of kidnapping him and bringing him to the Dark Lord.

Harry had already known that thanks to Anthony, but it was nice to have confirmation. He would be vigilant. He wasn't going to let anyone else get the better of him, especially not in this castle. Salazar's castle. His castle.

"I'm worried, Severus," Harry said one night as they healed their wounds and cleaned up their debris. Snape cocked an eyebrow. "I don't know if I can hold the war off until I turn seventeen. If there's another attack — if Voldemort decides to stick with the tradition of messing with me before the school year ends... I can't exactly tell him to bugger off and come back when I'm of age, can I?"

Snape's lips pursed. "Right now, the Dark Lord seems to be focused on finding Albus. He will not admit it, but he is intrigued by the idea that Albus believed so wholeheartedly in this influence he supposedly has over you. Especially now the connection he used to manipulate for his own gain is now no longer there."

"Do you think he suspects?" Harry asked, heart in his throat. But Snape nodded.

"I doubt it. He is not as erratic as I would suspect him to become should he start to fear for his horcruxes. He thinks the connection died when he began to purposefully block it. That is what I told him, after all." The tall man smirked. "He wants to see for himself if Albus has gone senile — to gloat, most likely. With that occupying his time, that should give you a grace period. Just don't get yourself kidnapped — again."

Harry gave a flicker as a smile, even as his worry remained. He didn't like the idea of Voldemort finding Dumbledore any more than he liked the idea of Voldemort coming for him.

Senile or no, if Dumbledore was now the Master of Death... either he would kill Voldemort before the final horcrux could be destroyed, or Voldemort would overpower him and kill him and perhaps gain the Hallows for himself.

Then they would truly be fucked.

Snape's long-fingered hand clasped his shoulder. "If the time comes early, Harry, you will be ready for it. We will be ready for it. Having you at full maturity would help, but I have faith that should the situation call for it, you will rise to the challenge regardless."

Harry leaned back into the firm touch, just for a moment. "I hope you're right."

He wished he could have that kind of faith in himself.

.-. .

The seventh of April brought the Hufflepuff versus Slytherin quidditch match — and also a notice in every common room, asking for all students fifth year and up to meet in the Great Hall for an assembly half an hour before dinner. Provided the quidditch match didn't run all day, at least.

Harry was curious, but too excited about quidditch to worry overmuch. If it was something dire, he would have heard about it by now.

Once again, he wore Draco's team hoodie, though it wasn't cold enough to need the scarf to match.

"I want you to win," he told Draco over breakfast, "but not by too much. Just a little bit. Then we don't have to get a massive lead over Ravenclaw."

Draco smirked amusedly. "I'm sorry, darling, but if you think I'm not going to do my damnedest to make your entire team work your arses off for that cup win, you've got another thing coming. If I can't get that cup myself, I'm sure as hell making sure you've really earned it."

Harry gave an overdramatic sigh. "Why do I love you more when you're an asshole," he despaired. Behind him, Ginny snorted so hard she choked on her pumpkin juice. "Go on, then. Go destroy some badgers." He leaned in for a kiss that was probably toeing the line for appropriate-at-the-breakfast-table, pushing Draco to his feet and smacking him lightly on the arse to shoo him off to join his teammates.

"If we lose the cup because you got lovesick, Harry, I swear to Merlin," Katie warned, and he laughed.

"We won't lose," he said confidently. "Even if Slytherin get a massive point lead. Our team is too good for that."

Katie couldn't argue with that.

With Gryffindor mostly decked out for Hufflepuff solidarity, Harry spent this match with friends from all houses in a corner of the Ravenclaw stands. Slytherin wasn't the fondest of him, since Gryffindor was still their main competition for the cup.

The match didn't last all day, but it stretched a decent way towards lunchtime. Hufflepuff were fierce competition, their keeper working his arse off to block the Slytherin chasers, their beaters surprisingly fearless against Crabbe and Goyle.

But it wasn't enough. Slytherin were as ruthless as always, skirting the edges of acceptable conduct and gaining a steady lead — a lead that only grew larger when Draco's hand clamped around the snitch, to thunderous applause from roughly half of the stadium. Harry cheered and whooped right with them, blowing a cheeky kiss to his boyfriend when he caught the Slytherin's eye on his way to landing. Draco held his gaze, tilting his head ever so slightly in the direction of the changing rooms, question in his eyes. Harry smirked, nodding just barely enough for the Slytherin to catch it. A quick smirk was his only answer, and then Draco was headed off the pitch with his team.

Harry wasn't going to dress up and pretend it was another Gryffindor match, but he would quite happily sneak into the changing rooms and drop to his knees for his boyfriend. There were only a few more chances for that, after all.

He did some mental math on the way down — as it stood, Gryffindor would have to beat Ravenclaw by at least 180 points in order to take the cup. That was going to be a tall order — but he could manage it. His team could manage it.

If only to wipe that smug look off Draco's pretty face.

. . .

Putting a somewhat premature end to Slytherin's quidditch celebrations — though Draco assured him that most of their post-match celebrations were much more refined than Gryffindor's, unless it was for an actual cup victory — all of the older students found their way to the Great Hall a half hour before dinner, eyeing their headmistress warily.

After the year they'd had, it could be anything.

They didn't sit like they were going to have a meal; with so few, it felt ridiculous to spread out over the tables. Instead they huddled in close to McGonagall, some perching on the edge of the platform the staff table sat on, others sat straddling the ends of benches or even on the floor. Harry sat on the end of the Gryffindor table, Draco sat on the bench leaning back against his legs, Susan at his side with an anxious hold on Theo's hand. "Any idea what this is about?" she asked under her breath, and Harry shook his head.

"Not a clue."

Once everyone had arrived, McGonagall cleared her throat. "Thank you all for coming. This won't take long, but it seemed like more information than would be fair to give you in a common room notice."

Harry leaned forward a little, concerned. Was it bad? Had someone else died?

Was the school closing?

"As I'm sure you are all aware, exam season is approaching. Ordinarily, I would be encouraging you all to put your best foot forward and begin your studying efforts — however, that is not the case this year, I'm afraid." Her lips pursed, her eyes trailing over her gathered students. "Considering the current political climate, we have come to the difficult decision that it is not safe to allow the examination board access to the school at this time. The usual examiners have been... replaced, and I refuse to lose any more of the students under my care. As such, I am sorry to say that OWL and NEWT examinations will not be possible this year."

"What?!" Sully yelped, alarm in their eyes.

"But what about graduation?" Katie exclaimed worriedly. "If the fifth years miss OWLs they can just take them next year. Will we have to come back to school?" None of the seventh years looked happy about that idea, grumbling quietly to each other.

"I will be completely honest with you, Miss Bell, I cannot say," McGonagall said frankly.

It was jarring, for Harry, to have the Transfiguration professor be so upfront with them. Dumbledore as headmaster had always been so mysterious and omnipotent — he had all the answers, and was just waiting for the world to slot neatly into place at his command. He was also condescending as anything, treating even the older students like small children.

McGonagall, on the other hand, spoke to them like the capable almost-adults she knew them to be after having watched them grow in her classes for several years. She didn't sugar-coat things, didn't bullshit them. Even when it meant admitting she couldn't fix everything.

"While I would like to say that it will be possible for the current seventh year students to take their exams over the summer, I cannot guarantee that will be the case."

Harry tried not to squirm as almost every head swivelled in his direction. McGonagall folded her arms over her chest. "However," she continued pointedly, "We will make sure that as soon as it is safe, we will arrange for examinations to be held, and for accommodations to be made for returning seventh years. Myself and the rest of the staff will do whatever we can to help you prepare for those exams, no matter how long it has been since you were last our student." She smiled tightly. "Hogwarts will not abandon you. Any of you. It just might take a while for things to catch up."

"What about the sixth years," Ernie asked, frowning. "This doesn't really affect us, does it? I mean," he chuckled nervously, "by the time our exams roll around, everything will be back to normal."

Again, everyone stared at Harry. He clenched his jaw.

"I am informing the sixth years because there may come a point next year where you are joined in your classes by the current seventh years, for a revision session, so to speak. I would hope that you would help your fellow students cover any content they may have gotten rusty on in the interim."

"Can we take our exams independently?" A seventh year Slytherin girl asked, sat with several of her housemates. She looked entirely bored by the whole thing. "Not all of us have to hide from our own Ministry, you know."

Harry wasn't the only one who glared at her. It was bold to be so open with her allegiances, but then everyone knew her family were Death Eaters. She wasn't subtle about it, regularly muttering death threats towards Harry in the halls.

McGonagall remained stone-faced. "Should you feel comfortable in applying to take your exams at the Ministry of Magic this summer, you are of course welcome to do so," she assented curtly. "Similarly, if you choose to go elsewhere — that is to say, to a foreign Ministry you may have access to — I wish you the very best of luck in your examinations. But for those of you who do not have those options, do not fear. We will figure something out. And, of course, if you have any concerns you wish to bring to me privately, you are more than welcome to do so. You all know when my office hours are."

That seemed to be the end of it all, especially when a few nervous fourth years peered through the doors of the hall to see if dinner was ready yet. The students hopped off the tables, leaving room for the elves to send dinner up, and already McGonagall was surrounded by seventh years asking her questions.

"Well, no pressure or anything, then," Harry muttered dryly, sharing a glance with Susan. "Just got to off a Dark Lord and reform the Ministry proper so that our friends can graduate."

She bumped her shoulder with his. "Piece of cake," she replied, grinning. Harry snorted.

"I hope the seventh years don't get too complacent," Theo drawled quietly. "You did say summer after all, Potter."

"I did, didn't I?" Harry agreed.

It was a huge blow to those who had exams to take, of course — they wouldn't be able to relax for the summer knowing they had done the hard work.

Then again, Harry doubted anyone would be relaxing this summer, what with the whole Dark Lord situation.

Chapter End Notes

Legally Blonde the Musical voice ~It's time to get serious~

Last ten chapter, folks. Buckle up ;)

Chapter 100

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

It was the second week of May when it finally happened.

They were stupid, really. Impatient. If these students were the best Lord Voldemort could gather, Harry wasn't worried at all about his chances of success.

That afternoon, Harry had decided it was long past time he go visit Hagrid. He hadn't been... avoiding his friend, exactly. He was really busy. And Hagrid hadn't exactly made any overtures to seek Harry out, either.

But it had been months since they'd had more than a brief hello at mealtimes, so after dinner Harry balled up his Gryffindor courage, kissed his boyfriend for luck, and headed down to the hut at the edge of the forest. He knocked on the door, and waited. As always, Fang barked excitedly at the prospect of visitors, and Harry smiled to himself as he heard Hagrid lightly chiding the dog, getting him away from the door. He pulled it open, and faltered. "Harry."

"Hi, Hagrid. Can I come in?" Harry's hands were in his robe pockets so that Hagrid wouldn't see them shaking. The half-giant blinked at him.

"Yeah. Yeah, o' course. I'll put the kettle on."

That was a good sign, and Harry's hummingbird heart slowed down a little. Fang nosed at his legs, slobbering all over his robes, demanding ear-scratches which Harry was more than willing to provide. He couldn't not smile when faced with the cheerful dog, who flopped his head in Harry's lap with a blissful look as soon as the Gryffindor sat down.

Hagrid fussed with the kettle and two mugs, one significantly larger than the other. With the large man's back to him, it was easier for Harry to make the first move. "I'm sorry, Hagrid."

Hagrid whirled around, beetle-like eyes incredulous. "What. You're sorry? Harry, you ain't got a jot to be sorry for!"

Wait, what?

Hagrid ran a hand through his tangled mane of hair, giving a gusty sigh. "Every time you came 'ere, you let me natter on about Dumbledore and how great a man he was, and that whole time you knew it was nothin'. I was so ruddy proud of having been the one to drop you off with Dumbledore after— after your parents died. If I'd've known..." He shook his head, scowling. "I'm the one who's sorry, Harry. You shoulda been able ter trust me, an' I gave you no reason to, blathering away with my blind faith like I was. I kept pushin' you towards the headmaster, and I never questioned why you might not want that — not even after you said you an' him was havin' some disagreements. You tried to warn me an' all! Idiot I was, I didn't listen."

The kettle whistled, cutting off Hagrid's self-flagellation.

"It's not your fault, Hagrid!" Harry insisted while the huge man poured. "There was so much I couldn't tell you. And you've known Dumbledore for a long time, after all. He did a lot of good things for you. I... I didn't want to ruin your view of him, not if I didn't have to." He had known it would come eventually, but he wanted to soften the blow as much as he could.

"Aye, he did, but that don't mean much when he's out there trying to kill you!" Hagrid protested. "All that about you havin' evil in you is absolute codswallop, anyone who knows you can see that!" Hagrid passed Harry his teacup, and sat down opposite him, shoulders slumping. "I shoulda come talk to yer as soon as you got back to school, but — well, everythin' with Grawp, and then Aragog..."

"Is he still not well?" Harry asked, and Hagrid gave a great big sniff.

"He died, actually. Jus' last week. Buried him out by the forest," he said shakily, wiping at his watery eyes.

Though Harry felt nothing but mild satisfaction at the knowledge that the huge man-eating spider was dead, his heart clenched for his friend's grief. "Oh, Hagrid, I'm so sorry. You should've sent a note, I would've come. You shouldn't have been alone."

Hagrid smiled weakly. "Means a lot, Harry, but it's alright. Was only a small thing, really. Just for me own peace o' mind. Acromantula eat their dead, and... well." He made a face. "I — I thought about it. Writin' you. Didn't know if you'd wanna talk to me, is all. Worried you might think I was still Dumbledore's man."

"I never thought that," Harry insisted — which was a tiny lie, but Hagrid didn't need to know about the doubt in Harry's chest. "I figured you were mad at me for not telling you the truth."

The half-giant chuckled, shaking his head. "Right pair, aren't we?" he mused, reaching out to pat Harry's back with one of his massive hands. "I told you, Harry — I'm on your side. That's what friends are for."

Harry grinned up at him. "I'm glad, Hagrid. Really."

The first adult to ever give a damn about him still cared. That was more than he'd hoped for.

He stayed long enough to finish his tea at a leisurely pace, catching Hagrid up on the things he might have missed in the time they weren't really talking. As the hour grew later, the sky turning burnt orange, Harry decided to head back up to the castle.

And that was when things went a bit pear-shaped.

He didn't quite wander about with his head in the clouds anymore, not after the first time — so he was vigilant when he heard muffled footsteps tracking him. He veered off course, heading closer towards the greenhouses. He knew where Neville planned to spend his evening, could feel the other heir's solid presence through the wards. Hogwarts was so much stronger now, with a headmistress who cared about it thriving.

Then a twig snapped and Harry moved, whirling around and cancelling any secrecy or camouflage charms in the area with a handy little spell Sirius had taught him a while ago. It revealed six students — the Slytherin seventh year girl who had spoken out about taking exams at the Ministry, a seventh year Slytherin boy Harry vaguely recognised; Crabbe and Goyle; and to his complete astonishment, Lisa Turpin and Fay Dunbar. His housemate had a shaking hand as she pointed her wand in Harry's direction.

"Come quietly, Potter," the older Slytherin boy snarled. "Or it's going to hurt."

Harry snorted despite himself. "That's really the best threat you have?" he taunted. "I faced Bellatrix Lestrange, you think you idiots scare me?"

The Slytherin girl smirked, like that was exactly what she wanted him to say. "Wiping that cocky look off your face is going to be very satisfying. Crucio!" She pointed her wand, but to Harry it was barely more than being hit with the old handshake buzzer Dudley used to have. He grinned — that would be a huge red alert to Neville, Hannah and Luna.

He hadn't seen the new wards in action, really; which is why he was pleasantly surprised when the girl suddenly froze in place, wand outstretched. She stared at Harry. "What did you do?" Her companions were eyeing Harry warily, and he laughed.

"I didn't do anything. The Hogwarts wards, on the other hand, really don't like nasty spells being cast at students." Thank Merlin the wards were at full strength, now.

Crabbe and Goyle didn't get the memo; they both tried to hit Harry with simultaneous Stunners, which he deflected into the grass, and they too were frozen in place.

"What the fuck! We cast Stunners in class all the time," Dunbar exclaimed.

"Wards are about intent," Harry replied mockingly. "You're not trying to actually harm anyone in class. Also, I'm an heir."

The seventh year boy let out a snarl. "There are ways around it," he muttered, and then he threw himself bodily at Harry.

Harry might not have had to run from Dudley for a long while now, but he still had the reflexes of a boy who had spent a lot of time dodging someone much larger than himself. He ducked under his outstretched arms, and the boy took a lumbering step to the side to try and grab Harry. "Turpin, Dunbar, get him while he's distracted!" he growled. "I don't care about the ruddy wards — it only takes one of us to drag him to the ward line!" He tried to throw a punch, but he was far too slow.

Neither of the girls seemed entirely keen to risk firing at Harry and missing, losing their only shot. It was only when there was a shout from near the greenhouses that Harry jerked his head up, and Dunbar took her chance. But Harry wasn't that much of an idiot; he deflected the tangle of ropes that flew from her wand, sending them right back at her. Not that he needed it, really, as the wards did their work.

Someone was running towards him, and the older boy got desperate; he charged right at Harry, fury on his face. A classic move of Dudley's, too. Harry used his own classic response — ducking aside at the last minute, and sticking his foot out to trip the large boy and send him sprawling. It was easy to catch him with a Stunner then, turning to face Turpin, the last Death Eater standing. She goggled at him.

“Why didn’t the wards get you?” she screeched, making him grin.

“Self defence,” he replied simply — then with one last Stunner, she was downed too, right as Neville and Professor Sprout came skidding to a halt at his side. Neville took in the scene quickly, then shot a grin Harry’s way.

“New wards?” he presumed, and Harry nodded. “Nice. Bloody hell, is that Dunbar?”

“Yup.” Harry turned to Professor Sprout. “Would you mind alerting the headmistress, please?”

The Herbology professor stared at him for a long moment, then turned, sending a Patronus off towards the castle.

“She’s probably already on her way,” Neville pointed out. “See, look; there she is.” Indeed, she was marching across the lawn towards them. Harry had forgotten she held the wards now, too.

It was quick work between Sprout and McGonagall to properly secure the six students, levitating them back to the castle. Neville fell into step beside Harry on the way up. “You alright, mate?”

“Fine.” Harry grinned. “That was laughably easy, to be honest. Hadn’t realised the wards would be so sensitive; they couldn’t even cast Stunners with intent.”

“Blimey,” Neville said, awed. “I got worried when I registered the Cruciatus, thought they might all be using the same sort of stuff.”

“They didn’t want me dead. They wanted to take me to their master,” he said, giving a disparaging look at the immobile group.

They were met by Luna and Hannah at the doors, as well as Daphne and Draco. “Oh, good, I thought you might have it handled when I felt the wards stop yelling at me,” Hannah remarked. “What happened?”

“Kidnapping attempt,” Harry replied cheerfully. Draco put his head in his hands.

“I swear to fucking Salazar, Potter, I’m never letting you out of my sight again.”

“Not a scratch on me, promise,” Harry assured, giving him a leering look. “I’ll let you check, if you like.”

“Mr Potter,” McGonagall snapped, more exasperated than anything else. “I need you to come with me, to provide insight into what happened. Mr Malfoy is going to have to wait.”

Harry mock-pouted, looking back at his boyfriend. “You heard the headmistress. Rain check on that, I’ll catch you later.” Then he stepped up to McGonagall’s side, not a hint of his previous teasing on his face. “Let’s go, Professor.”

McGonagall was still using her original office for the time being, not wanting to intrude on what everyone still saw as Dumbledore’s — and not having the time to go through the numerous things he left behind there in case any were sinister.

So Harry, the headmistress, and the six bound attackers all squeezed into the room, and McGonagall turned to Harry. “Explain.”

Harry did so, beginning with the moment he noticed he was being followed, reporting everything right up until Sprout and Neville arrived. McGonagall’s face got more severe with every word.

When he was done, she turned to her captives, adjusting her spells enough for them to talk but not move. “And what do you have to say for yourselves?”

“He’s lying, Professor!” Dunbar exclaimed. “Potter attacked us out of nowhere! He used his weird Slytherin magic to stop us from fighting back! He’s dangerous, and he needs to be expelled!”

McGonagall looked distinctly unimpressed, even as the other five backed up Dunbar’s words.

“I can provide pensieve memories, if you like,” Harry offered, but the headmistress shook her head.

“I am attuned to the wards as well, Potter — I can tell when students are in danger, and I can certainly tell when the Cruciatus curse is being cast on school grounds! Miss Wilkins, your wand, if you please?”

The Slytherin girl went milk-white. McGonagall snatched the girl’s wand, holding it up in front of her. “Priori Incantatem.” Smoke blossomed from the end of the wand, forming a tableau of Harry on his knees and screaming — her intention for the spell, if not the result.

“Potter stole my wand and cast it,” Wilkins tried immediately, cowering against McGonagall’s raised eyebrow.

“I highly doubt that.” She set the girl’s wand on her desk, surveying them sternly. “You six leave me no choice. For the attempted kidnapping of a fellow student, I hereby expel all of you from Hogwarts School, effective immediately.”

Harry felt it, the moment the magic kicked in, the moment they became other to the wards. Not students, not staff. Intruders. They all flinched in unison.

“As such, I have the right to destroy your wands. The house elves will pack your bags, and you will return to your homes as soon as possible.”

“You can’t do that!” Turpin argued.

“Believe me, Miss Turpin, I can and I will. Be thankful there is no competent Ministry to speak of — Miss Dunbar is the only one of you under the age of seventeen. In an ordinary world, you’d be facing Azkaban for this.”

Turpin turned a little green.

“Professor, please! I—I didn’t mean to! They talked me into it, threatened my family!”
Dunbar tried her best, but McGonagall was stone-faced.

“Then you should have come to me, Miss Dunbar, instead of deciding to be party to the kidnapping of your housemate,” she snapped. “I do not have the luxury of giving you the benefit of the doubt — not with the safety of our other students at stake.”

Harry was amazed by the woman’s composure as she ignored all of their protests, snapping each wand one by one without a hint of hesitation. He could do nothing but watch, waiting for the house elves to bring their trunks — and then waiting for Professor Flitwick to come and escort them to the gates. Lisa Turpin took one look at her housemaster’s disappointed face and flinched as if hit.

One by one they shuffled out of the office, until finally Harry was left alone with the headmistress. She shut the door with a wave of her hand, and stood with a steel-straight spine, staring at the worn wood. Harry didn’t dare move, watching her carefully. Did she even remember he was there?

“Did I just make a mistake, Potter?” she asked suddenly. When she looked at him, she looked older than he had ever seen her look, even when she had returned from St Mungo’s after taking four Stunners to the chest. The haunted gaze of the headmistress made Harry shudder.

“I—I don’t think it’s my place to say, Professor.”

McGonagall’s lips pursed, and then her whole body slumped, the fight leaving her in one sharp motion. She rounded her desk, sinking wearily into her chair, and the tartan biscuit tin floated over off the shelf. “Much as I hate to stereotype, the Slytherins... they were not a surprise. Miss Turpin and Miss Dunbar, however...”

“He gets in everywhere,” Harry pointed out sadly, sitting in the chair opposite when the biscuit tin was offered, grabbing a chocolate-coated shortbread. “For what it’s worth, I don’t think he really threatened Dunbar’s family. Her dad has been in hiding since November, and I know she knew he was safe.”

McGonagall quirked an eyebrow. “I’m not even going to ask how you know that.” Harry’s lips twitched. “I did assume as much; Miss Roper has come to me a few times this year out of concern for her friend, but there was little I could do — I’ll admit, I thought it was just stress.” She sighed, and Harry tried not to outwardly react when she summoned a bottle of whisky from a hidden corner of her shelf, pouring a generous finger. “It feels like sending them away from the school is doing them a disservice,” she said, shaking her head. “I know exactly where they’re going to go. Snapping their wands won’t keep them out of things for long.”

He pursed his lips — indeed, Voldemort would be furious with them for failing to kidnap him, but he would also appreciate six new recruits into his ranks outside the castle. “They couldn’t stay here,” he reasoned. “This is a school, not a stronghold. We don’t have prison cells in the dungeons.” His joke fell flat. “You had the rest of the students to think about.”

McGonagall sipped at her whisky. “I have still condemned those students — those children to death, or a fate worse than it. I was supposed to protect them.”

“You can’t save everyone,” Harry said grimly — that was something he knew all too well. “Everyone in this castle has been given a chance to do the right thing. Not all of them are going to take it.”

The Scottish woman was silent for a long time, even after her glass was empty. “You should go and find Mr Malfoy, Potter,” she said eventually. “He will be keen to make sure you are unharmed.”

Harry coloured, amazed she could say that with a straight face after his exchange with Draco on the way up. “I... will you be alright, Professor?” He stood, but hovered in front of the desk. The smile McGonagall gave him was tight, strained, barely lasting a moment.

“I must go and explain to Professor Snape that Slytherin house is now four students smaller,” she declared, standing as well.

That wasn’t an answer, but then Harry shouldn’t have expected much more. She was a professor, after all, and he just a student.

He just hoped she had someone to go to, to lean on after having made the difficult call.

.-.

The word had spread by dinner. Harry forced himself to sit through the meal, even as Sophie Roper cried into her lasagne ten feet down the table, even as half of Slytherin house glared daggers in his direction.

“What’s it turned into, then?” he asked Lavender quietly, knowing there was no way the story had been reported accurately.

“Depends who you hear it from,” she replied, frowning. “Anything from you exposing all six of them with Dark Marks, to you lying to McGonagall just to get them expelled after she caught you duelling them.” Harry snorted. “I... was Fay really working with them?”

There were tears in her eyes. She had been Fay’s dorm mate for nearly six years, after all.

“She was, yeah.” Harry wished he could say for certain whether she’d been threatened into it. He wished it mattered — as he had told McGonagall, they had all had chances, and made choices.

He just hoped desperately that those six teenagers lived long enough to learn from their mistakes.

....

As it always does in Hogwarts, life moved on. Now, the only people willing to so much as talk to Harry were the original HA and his professors. Even those who showed up to the expanded HA sessions on Saturdays barely spoke to him, just staring wide-eyed and mutely obeying instructions.

He didn't mind, really. His existing friend group was more than enough social interaction for him — with the end of the year drawing closer, there were plans to be made for after school let out.

The last quidditch match of the season was a nice break from it all, though. A return to normalcy. Privately, Harry hoped it might be enough to put a smile back on McGonagall's face, if Gryffindor won. She hadn't been the same since having to expel those students.

Harry surveyed his team over breakfast, quietly confident. "One hundred and eighty points, guys. Just keep the goals in our favour, and I'll do the rest." As long as they stayed at least three goals ahead of Ravenclaw, Harry catching the snitch would win it for them.

"We've got this, captain," Katie declared determinedly.

The shoe was on the other foot this time, with Draco looking mildly disgruntled to be wearing Harry's crimson quidditch hoodie. "Red is not my colour," he said in disdain, and Harry leered.

"I dunno," he murmured into the blond's ear, "seems to suit you well enough when you're in my bed."

The blond swallowed tightly, ears flushing.

"Come on, Harry. Quit flirting, time to go," Ginny urged, smirking at the pair of them. He gave a sigh, looked to Draco.

"You heard the lady. Time to go."

Draco gripped him by the front of his jumper, kissing him hard, ignoring the wolf-whistles. "Impress me, Potter," he challenged, cocking one pale brow, expression very similar to the one he had when he was in bed and daring Harry to fuck him harder. Heat pooled in Harry's gut, and he had to will away the stirrings of an erection that would be all too obvious in the tight uniform trousers.

"Yes, sir," Harry purred, giving him one last kiss before standing.

"Good luck, Harry," Neville said, offering a thumbs up. He still had a bit of Ginny's Gryffindor-red lipstick on his mouth, but Harry wasn't going to be the one to tell him that.

The lead up to the match was a rush of nerves, even as he gave a pep talk to his team that would rival even Oliver. The crowd roared when they strode onto the pitch, standing opposite the blue-clad team.

“Captains, shake hands!”

Harry stepped forward, grinning at Cho as she offered her hand to him. She had gone all out on the house pride; blue streaks in her hair, bronze war-paint on her cheeks. Even vivid blue nail polish with tiny black eagles painted on. “Don’t start celebrating too soon, Harry,” she told him, “Ravenclaw isn’t going down without a fight.”

“I’d expect nothing less,” he replied.

And then they were off.

Harry swooped around the pitch, keeping an eye on the main play even as he began his hunt for the snitch. It was a bright, sunny day — great for the rest of the team, terrible for the seekers. At least his goggles stopped the glare getting too bad.

All he could do now was wait, and hope to hell Cho didn’t spot the snitch early.

His girls were in fine form, scoring two goals right off the bat. Ravenclaw came back hard, though, and the quaffle careened past Vicky’s outstretched arms straight through the right-most goal hoop.

“And Ravenclaw are on the scoreboard!” Zacharias Smith declared. “Gryffindor had better pick up the pace if they want to secure the cup!”

Ravenclaw only needed a win of 150 or more to beat Slytherin to the cup, so Cho would be playing the waiting game almost as much as he was. They circled each other, flying laps in opposite directions.

Another goal for Gryffindor, and Harry beamed at Demelza for it. The chasers were blue and red blurs across the pitch, ducking bludgers and passing frantically.

The goals kept stacking up, Ravenclaw determined not to let Gryffindor keep a three-goal lead for very long. But slowly, goal by goal, Gryffindor hit their breakaway.

100-60. Harry was free to look for the snitch, now.

Cho seemed to realise that, hovering close by Harry. He surveyed the sky, looking for that little flash of gold. Then he smirked to himself, and dove.

Cho followed immediately, hot on his tail — her speed wasn’t a match for his Firebolt but she pushed on regardless, the pair of them heading closer and closer to the ground. He wondered how far he could get her to go, fearlessly plunging straight towards the grass.

She pulled up sharply five feet before the ground, and Harry sighed to himself, doing the same. “False alarm, folks! Potter was just feinting,” Smith announced, to groans from the crowd.

“Almost had me worried, there!” Cho called lightly. He laughed.

“All’s fair in love and quidditch!” And then he was off, zooming across the pitch, making a nuisance of himself for the Ravenclaw chasers on the way.

The beaters didn’t seem to know what to focus on most, and their split attention between Harry and the chasers gave Gryffindor a chance to score another goal. Unfortunately, Ravenclaw picked one up right after.

The snitch was being a tricky little thing, today. Dragging the game out far longer than Harry would have liked.

140-120. Harry caught a flash of gold out of the corner of his eye, and cursed. He couldn’t catch it yet. His only saving grace was, neither could Cho. A Slytherin win would almost be worse than a Gryffindor one in her eyes.

Still, just to be safe, Harry led her on a merry chase of death-defying loops and dodges, getting dangerously close to the stands in the Hufflepuff section. It was a good distraction for Ravenclaw’s keeper, too, allowing Katie to put a goal through the centre hoop.

150-120. Showtime.

All through his madcap adventures around the pitch, Harry had kept an eye on that little glint of gold, and now he was off. He wasn’t sure when Cho noticed the difference between him playing distraction and him going for the win, but she soon appeared at his side, leaning low on her broom, trying to catch up.

It was no use. Harry plucked the little golden ball out of the air, and the whole stadium exploded.

Apparently, while he’d been after the snitch, Katie had found the time to score one last goal in the chaos, making their lead an even more comfortable 310-120.

“And Potter does it again, folks! Gryffindor takes the game, and takes the cup! Honestly, one more of year of him and then maybe someone else can get a look in,” Smith groused into his megaphone. Harry threw his head back and laughed, surprised when Cho barrelled into him for a mid-air hug.

“Damn good game, Harry. Thanks for sending me out with a fun one, even if I couldn’t win,” she said, beaming with tears streaking her eyes. He hugged her tight, then held out the snitch.

“A keepsake,” he offered. “Your last match as a Hogwarts student.”

“A snitch caught by Harry Potter. Wow.” Then she grinned impishly. “Maybe it’ll be worth something some day, I can sell it.” She swiped it before he could rescind his offer, pressed a smacking kiss to his cheek, and flew off to join her team in commiserating, laughing as she went.

That was all the signal the Gryffindor team needed to pile on their captain, lowering to the ground in one huge red huddle. “I knew we could do it!” Katie sobbed. “One last cup! Fuck, I’m gonna miss this.”

“Any time you want to get the team back together, I’m there,” Harry vowed, pressing his forehead to hers in the middle of their team huddle. “Couldn’t have done this without you, Kit-Kat.” He used the nickname Oliver had given her, the one only the team ever used, and she sobbed even harder.

As was tradition, she and Cho flew their victory lap together to riotous applause, the two soon-to-be graduates saying one last goodbye to their school pitch.

While they were up there, Harry slung one arm around Ginny and the other around Vicky, beaming at Demelza, Ritchie and Jimmy. “So,” he said, “same time next year, then?”

The two boys shared a look, then gave identical salutes. “Aye, Captain!”

Harry laughed, releasing the girls to go ruffle their hair. They were no Fred and George, but he was damn proud of them all the same, and they had a promising career with the team now they’d played a year together.

On his way off the pitch, the crowd still screaming, Harry looked up at the staff box, right at Professor McGonagall. There it was — that curl at the corner of lips, the glimmer of pride in her eyes. The thing that made all their hard hours of training worth it.

They didn’t linger in the changing rooms, taking lightning-fast showers and having one last group hug while Katie cried her way through packing up her locker, all of them headed out with red and gold duffle bags full of quidditch gear over their shoulders.

There was an honour guard there to escort them up to their victory party, and in the sea of Gryffindor colours Harry didn’t notice Draco until the blond sidled up beside him. “Pretty good catch,” he said, knocking Harry’s shoulder with his own. “Didn’t think I could delay you in the changing rooms this time.”

Harry wound his arm around Draco’s waist, kissing the side of his head. “Not for this one,” he agreed. “But you can come up to the victory party if you like.” He had done as Rosmerta suggested and ordered drinks in advance, so he didn’t even have to make a detour.

Draco looked at him, startled. “It won’t cause problems?”

“Sweetheart, my house put up with me snogging you all over the place, pretty sure they’ll be fine with you coming up to the common room,” Harry teased. “Besides — I just won us the quidditch cup, they won’t argue with me!”

Draco hummed, fingers playing over the bright gold C stitched on the shoulder of the hoodie he wore. Harry’s hoodie. “Well, I suppose I’ve got nothing better to do,” he drawled, as if it were such a hardship. Harry beamed, squeezing him.

“Such enthusiasm, I can hardly stand it,” he said dryly. Draco shot him a look beneath hooded lashes.

“I’ll show enthusiasm once the party dies down,” he promised huskily.

Harry swallowed tightly. “Impressed you enough, then, did I?” he asked, lips brushing Draco’s temple as they squeezed through the castle doors, surrounded by exuberant Gryffindors.

“You weren’t bad, I suppose.”

Gryffindor House certainly knew how to throw a party, that was for sure. Dobby had outdone himself setting up the snacks and drinks tables, and there was a huge banner of a roaring lion taking up the entirety of one wall. Music was playing from somewhere, and the team were greeted with a wave of sound as they walked through the portrait hole.

Harry lost hold of Draco as he was bundled on by his housemates, and a spark of panic shot through him — but then he made it clear of the sea of people, and saw Draco happily ensconced in a corner with Parvati and Lavender, butterbeer in hand as he surveyed the common room with interest.

“Bit different to yours, isn’t it?” Harry said, striding over. A few feet away, Ginny pounced on Neville — and a few feet away from that, someone turned into a giant canary with red and gold feathers.

Harry wasn’t sure who had put Wheezes in the food, but he appreciated them staying on theme. Maybe the twins had sent them over special.

“I’m amazed all this red doesn’t give you headaches,” Draco commented. The girls giggled.

“It’s not as bad when we aren’t all dressed to match,” Lavender pointed out, gesturing to her red and gold t-shirt with a grin.

“I’ll take your word for it.”

Harry eased the bottle of butterbeer out of Draco’s hand, taking a swig from it, and the blond scowled. “Get your own.” He snatched it back, and Harry pouted.

“Do you have any idea how long it’ll take me to get through that crowd and back?”

All that did was make Draco roll his eyes. “Are you a wizard or not?” A wave of his wand, and a bottle came sailing over the heads of the crowd, neatly into Harry’s hand.

“Oh. Cheers, love!” Harry beamed, popped the cork, and tapped it against Draco’s before taking a large gulp.

It was still strange, having a quidditch victory party without the twins and Angelina and Alicia. But his new team were equally deserving of praise, and he made sure to spend time with them — and to be the loudest cat-caller in the room when Colin Creevey dipped Vicky in a Hollywood-worthy kiss right in the middle of the room, Dennis lifting his brother’s camera to capture the moment with a grin.

“God, they’re adorable,” Harry said happily, leaning back against the edge of the sofa behind him, pulling Draco to stand between his legs. The blond relaxed against him, at ease even in the lion’s den with their friends gathered around them.

“What’s he doing at a Gryffindor party?” The sneering voice cut through Harry’s effervescent joy, bringing a sour curl to his stomach. Ron was nearby, having clearly just been to the snack table, and he glared at Draco.

“Celebrating, Weasley,” Draco replied evenly. “My boyfriend caught the snitch, in case you missed it.”

Those bubbles of joy returned to Harry’s belly at the pride and possessiveness in Draco’s voice.

“This is the Gryffindor common room. You shouldn’t be in here,” Ron argued.

“I can always take him up to the dorm, if you’d prefer?” Harry suggested, tone full of innuendo. A chorus of ‘oooohhh’s and whistling met his statement, while Ron blushed as red as the flag draped around his shoulders.

“Walk away, Ron,” Dean suggested, appearing at his back. With a mildly apologetic look in Harry’s direction, the dark-skinned Gryffindor tugged Ron back into the crowd, over to the other side of the room.

“I hope one of those biscuits he had stacked up has a prank in it,” Ginny muttered, glaring after her brother. “Would serve him right.”

“Ahh, don’t worry about him,” Harry dismissed, not wanting Ron to ruin his happy buzz. “Although...” he drawled, hand on Draco’s stomach, pressing his hips forward just enough for the blond to feel it, “going up to the dorm isn’t a bad shout, now that I think about it.”

“You’ve had enough of being worshipped then, have you?” Draco asked. Harry bit his earlobe playfully.

“Not hardly,” he murmured. “But I’ve a different kind of worship in mind.”

“Oh for fuck’s sake — you’re still in public, boys,” Ginny reminded pointedly.

“No, don’t stop them,” Parvati protested, flapping a hand in Ginny’s direction. Harry laughed, cocking his head towards Neville.

“You mind, Nev?” The only one of his dorm mates whose opinion Harry actually cared about. Neville rolled his eyes.

“Go on, then. I doubt the others’ll be up any time soon, but just in case, please lock the door.”

It would almost be worth the interruption to see the horror in Ron’s eyes if he did catch them fucking in the dorm, but Harry decided that would be too much of a mood killer.

He slipped his hand into Draco’s, wandlessly transfiguring his empty butterbeer bottle into a bright red rose. “Shall we?” he offered, holding the rose in Draco’s direction. Draco snorted, reluctantly impressed.

“Fucking show off.” But he took the rose and went willingly, following Harry through the crowd towards the staircase.

People noticed them leave. The cat-calls that followed them proved that, but Harry didn’t care. Let the whole damn Tower know that he was going up to his room to celebrate with his boyfriend.

“It’s strange, coming in through the door,” Draco remarked, making Harry laugh. He had said door locked in an instant, though he didn’t bother with the silencing charms. Everyone knew what they were doing; the perverts could listen if they really wanted. As loud as the common room was, the sound wouldn’t carry.

He kicked off his trainers, gently pushing Draco until his back was against the wooden post at the corner of Harry’s bed. Their lips met tenderly and the rose dropped to the floor, Harry’s hands mussing the blond’s hair, rucking up the hem of the Gryffindor hoodie, unsurprised to find a Slytherin-green t-shirt beneath. He pulled the hoodie over Draco’s head, the bold shock of emerald even brighter in this room full of red and gold.

“What’ve I earned, then?” he asked softly, thumb stroking Draco’s jaw. “What do I get for impressing you?”

“Mm, depends what you want,” Draco returned, eyes bright and thumbs hooked into the back belt loops of Harry’s jeans.

The Gryffindor frowned thoughtfully — for the first time, they weren’t confined by the drapes of Harry’s bed, and he wanted to make the most of it. He liked the way Draco looked leaned up against the post like this, remembered a hot flash of a dream in which he had the Slytherin bent over the end of the bed.

But then he turned, looking around the rest of the room, which was surprisingly tidy for once.

Looked at the centre of the round dormitory, the clear space in the middle of the room, with the enormous rug in the middle of it proudly bearing his house crest. Measured up the space in his head.

A wicked smirk crossed his face as lust coiled low in his belly. “So, I’ve got an idea...”

He stepped back, into the middle of the room, watching confusion turn to understanding and arousal in wide grey eyes as he went to his knees in the centre of the rug, beckoning Draco down with one hand and summoning the vial of lubricant with the other. Draco huffed a laugh, but didn’t protest.

“I’m going to get carpet burn on my arse, aren’t I?” he asked knowingly, even as he unbuttoned his trousers.

“I’ll heal it,” Harry promised with a grin, manhandling Draco onto his back right in the centre of the rug, pinning him to the floor with a hot, sloppy kiss.

Merlin, Harry was going to enjoy this even more than quidditch.

Chapter End Notes

Merry Christmas, friends! :)

Chapter 101

While it was often tempting to avoid the Great Hall and all the attention that came with it, Harry tried to make a point of putting in at least a short appearance at every meal — both for the people who might worry for his safety, and the people who were waiting for a sign of his weakness to begin picking apart.

So Harry hadn't been down to the kitchens in a fair while. The route was familiar enough, though, and he couldn't help but grin as the giggling pear in the fruit bowl painting allowed him entry, revealing the hive of activity within. Several elves stopped to stare at him with their huge eyes. "Master Snakey is in need of food?" one elf asked, making Harry stifle a chuckle — Hannah had told him about the new form of address since their taking of the wards, getting a great amount of amusement over being called 'Missy Badger' by the tiny creatures.

"No, not food right now, thanks; lunch was brilliant, I'm still stuffed," he assured them, scanning the crowd for the bright explosion of colour that usually signified his elf friend. "I'm here for two reasons, actually. I—I was looking for Dobby. And also... whichever one of you is in charge? If you have a system like that?" He wasn't sure of the hierarchy of house elves, or if they even had one.

A quiet pop, and suddenly Dobby was at his side, wearing a pair of lurid green football shorts beneath a bright pink unicorn-printed tank top. "Harry Potter sir is needing Dobby?"

At the same time, an elderly elf shuffled through the crowd — this one wore the same white toga-like uniform as the rest of the elves, printed with the Hogwarts crest on the bottom. "I is being Lula, Master Snakey. I is the oldest elf at Hoggywarts."

"Oh, brilliant. It's nice to meet you, Lula." Harry smiled at the elf, who looked at him like he was just as strange as Dobby. "Can we— will you sit with me? I have some questions. If I'm not interrupting anything, of course."

Lula eyed him appraisingly, then nodded. Harry and the two elves went over to the small table nearby — they both looked deeply uncomfortable at sitting on stools at the same table as a wizard. All around the kitchen, elves were watching them.

"Well, the first thing I wanted to ask... I'm sure you're all aware of the war, right?" Several heads bobbed, not just Lula and Dobby. "Okay. Well, I'm fairly sure there's going to be fighting at Hogwarts, when it happens. Probably quite soon. And, well, I wanted to make sure you were all safe. And ask if there was anything you all would be willing to do to help."

Dobby almost fell off his stool with the force of his gasp. "Harry Potter sir is asking elves to fight with wizards?"

"Not if you don't want to," Harry hurried to assure. "It's our fight, not yours. I won't have you putting yourselves in danger for our sakes. But... there might be people in the castle who don't want to fight, either. Or people who are too young to fight." Harry couldn't guarantee that the fighting would wait until the students left — or that the students would even be able to leave. “I was hoping the elves might be willing to help move them to somewhere safe. I know you can’t take students off the grounds, but if you could grab all the young students and take them to the same place — maybe down here, where the fighting isn’t likely to touch. And maybe be willing to help injured people up to the Hospital Wing? Your ability to travel within the wards is really amazing.” They could save lives, with that kind of speed.

Lula frowned at him, huge blue eyes a little rheumy. “Master Snakey is... asking? These is not orders?”

“Merlin, no! Like I said, it’s not your fight. If you all want to huddle up down here, that’s absolutely fine by me. Wizard magic is dangerous. But... this castle is your home, too. You deserve the chance to help defend it, if you want.” He looked over the crowd of elves, almost all of whom had stopped their work to listen in. “If any of you are willing to help, we would be in your debt for it. But regardless, we’ll do what we can to keep this castle safe. Keep your home safe.”

With elves like Dobby amongst them, Harry didn’t doubt that the Hogwarts elves knew exactly how many of the people on Voldemort’s side treated their elves. They wouldn’t want the castle to be taken any more than he did.

Lula hummed, tugging at their ears. “Elves will discuss. Think it over. We is... never has a wizard spoken so plainly to an elf. Like equals.” Many elves nodded, muttering quietly to each other. Harry flashed a grin.

“Well, that’s something we’ll have to work on once the war’s over, then,” he said cheerfully. “This castle would be nothing without you lot!” The food, the laundry, the cleaning — the hundreds of other things the elves kept in order that he probably didn’t even consider in his day to day life.

“Dobby will fight with Harry Potter sir,” Dobby declared boldly. “Dobby would be honoured to help!”

“Thanks, Dobby,” Harry said, patting the elf on his skinny back. “I appreciate it.”

Dobby looked like he might faint from joy.

“Master Snakey is saying he wants to talk about two things,” Lula piped up, somewhat hesitant, like Harry’s second request might be so much bigger than his first. Harry chuckled, running a hand through his hair.

“Oh, the other thing is simple, really,” he assured. “See, I’m planning a little birthday party...”

.-. .

Draco was used to his birthday being somewhat overshadowed, as a student. June 5th might not be an exam day itself, but it was close enough to it — usually by now everyone was far too busy studying to do anything in particular.

This year, there were no exams. In solidarity with the OWL and NEWT students, McGonagall had cancelled exams for all year groups, claiming they had enough on their plates as it was. This decision made her wildly popular, even amongst Slytherins. And that little spark of hope within Draco caught alight.

He was turning seventeen. Coming of age in the wizarding world. He had the day off classes, to welcome in his maturing magic — which would set in at 11:02 in the morning, a perfectly respectable time to be born — and he thought maybe, this year might be different. This year he could sit publicly with his boyfriend and his friends and not have to pretend to hate any of them. He didn't have to hide birthday presents in his trunk to avoid questions about who they had come from.

He woke up at his usual time in the morning, his fingers and toes tingling, a strange bubbling sensation in his chest. At first he thought it was just excitement — that foolish hope he was far too old for — but then he realised it was his magic, preparing for his maturity to arrive. The Malfoy magic, and the Black magic, and smaller echoes of other families that had married into both lines along the way. A deep, old magic.

“Happy birthday, Draco,” Blaise said with a grin, tossing a silver-wrapped present his way before Draco could even properly sit up.

Things were much lighter in their dorm, now that Crabbe and Goyle were gone.

“Thanks.” Draco shuffled into a sitting position, glancing at the other bed in the room, which was empty. “Theo in the shower?”

“Oh, no, he never came in last night,” Blaise drawled with a wriggle of his eyebrows.

“Oh, I see.” Fair enough. It wasn’t like he could judge. “And both of you are still happy with giving me my other birthday present?”

Blaise laughed, reaching into his trunk for a white uniform shirt. “Yeah, yeah, don’t worry. We’ve made other arrangements, the dorm is yours.” He winked. “I doubt it’ll be too much of a travesty for Theo to spend another night in whatever love nest he and Susan have holed up in.”

“True. I still appreciate it, though.” After all the times Draco had been up in the Gryffindor dorm by now, he rather thought it was about time Harry came down to his level for once. Harry didn’t know about his plan yet, but Draco couldn’t see him complaining.

With no classes to get to, he had a leisurely morning, taking his time in the shower and strolling up to breakfast far later than he normally would. It surprised him, how many people wished him a happy birthday on his way up to the Great Hall. How many of them weren’t even Slytherins.

Entering the hall, he couldn’t help the way his eyes immediately sought out a head of wild jet-black hair, nor the way his heart swelled in his chest at the beaming smile bestowed upon him, those vivid green eyes lighting up at the sight of him. Harry Potter would be the death of him, honestly.

There was an empty seat waiting for him at the Gryffindor table, and he stepped gracefully over the bench, bum barely touching wood before he was being kissed firmly. “Happy birthday, love,” Harry murmured. “I’ll give you your present after classes, yeah?”

A tiny, childish part of Draco wanted to pout and demand it now, but he pushed down the urge. He was an adult now, he could wait.

His present might not be something fit for public consumption, after all.

Several others sat at the Gryffindor table wished him birthday greetings, Ginny even conjuring a ridiculous spray of green and silver confetti that he would no doubt spend the next several days finding on his person.

It amazed him, sometimes, how comfortable he had come to be sat at the table of red and gold, a place he had long regarded as the seat of his enemies. How things had changed.

The morning post came, though there was nothing for Draco. He hadn’t expected it. His mother’s present — along with presents from anyone else in the family who thought to send something — was waiting in his godfather’s quarters, where he would go to safely await his maturation.

Again, once upon a time he might have kicked up a fuss about not getting such things in public where everyone around him could be jealous. But he wasn’t the spoiled brat he had once been, and over the years he’d learned the joys of keeping things private.

“Here, something you can have now, though,” Harry whispered conspiratorially, pressing something into Draco’s hand beneath the table. Draco glanced down — it was the two-way mirror. “Your mum’s expecting a call sometime this morning.”

Draco’s breath hitched — he would get to speak to his mother on his birthday, see her face. “And this isn’t my present?” he checked, amazed. Harry laughed softly.

“Course not, silly. This is just me wanting your mum to like me,” he joked.

“My mother adores you and we both know it.” Far more than they expected, far more than Draco had ever dared hope back when he’d first started feeling that fluttery sensation when he looked at Harry Potter.

“Yeah, but this certainly helps.” Then, Harry checked his watch, and groaned. “Ugh, gotta go to Charms.” He squeezed Draco’s thigh, pecking him on the cheek. “Good luck with your magic. I’ll see you at dinner.” A lopsided grin, a wink that still made Draco’s heart flutter even now. “Enjoy your day off.”

“I’m sure I will,” he replied, waving as his boyfriend left, as his friends left with him. The only people who remained were those who had a free period first thing, none of whom Draco was particularly close to. He glanced up at the head table, seeing his godfather striding away from it. He had to teach, too — he couldn’t sit with Draco while he waited for his magic to grow.

What to do with his morning, then?

. . .

Having a whole day off classes wasn't nearly as fun as he'd anticipated, Draco decided; largely because everyone else was still going through a normal school day.

He called his mother from Uncle Severus' private quarters, surrounded by wrapping paper and presents — presents from Sev, from his mother, but also from Sirius and Remus and more Weasleys than he'd ever anticipated, from Andromeda and Tonks and Kingsley.

His mother had laughed fondly, teasing him for making a mess, and cooed with appropriate enthusiasm over each and every present. The brand new watch on his wrist, a gorgeous black and silver creation with the Draco constellation studded in tiny diamonds on the face, felt strange and heavy with the weight of its symbolism, catching the light every time he moved his arm, reminding him that he was seventeen now. An adult in the eyes of the world. Old enough to be Lord Malfoy, as soon as the Wizengamot was safe to enter.

Old enough to start leaving his mark.

They talked for a while, and Sirius popped in to wish Draco well too, but then the morning drew on and the time drew nearer, so Draco ended the call and placed the mirror somewhere safe, somewhere away.

He wasn't sure how his magic might react to his maturation, how the magic around him might respond. Severus had accounted for this, setting up the spare bedroom of his quarters without anything magical inside it. Draco sprawled out on the bed, his wrist already feeling naked without his new watch. He stared at the muggle clock on the wall, and waited.

When it hit, it was less... dramatic than he anticipated.

Of course, he knew it wasn't going to be some flashy light show or miraculous influx of strength. While the maturation hit at the moment of birth, his body had been preparing for it for years now.

It was weirdly like an orgasm, without the pleasure. The white hot rush of something from the tips of his toes to the roots of his hair, pulsing through him as magic burned new pathways and filled his body. The bed beneath him rattled, but didn't break. The clock on the wall shattered. With nothing else in the room, he didn't get to see if his boost would be enough to cause damage worth bragging about.

It didn't feel as foreign as he thought it might. The magic within him, while stronger than he'd ever felt before, was like a long awaited growth spurt; now it had happened, he felt more like himself than ever.

He smiled, sparks tickling over the backs of his hands. This was the kind of power he needed to keep Harry safe.

Severus returned to eat lunch with him, wishing him a happy birthday and barely letting their food settle before he was putting Draco through his paces, seeing what he could achieve now. Letting out the build up of new magic and feeling how fast the well refilled.

The strength felt so good. He understood, now, why so many of his friends and housemates started holding themselves differently after their coming of age. He had thought it was just them trying to project their maturity, looking down on their younger peers. But it was a bone-deep thing, an awareness of the body that could hardly be described.

“Harry’s going to blow up half the school when he comes of age, isn’t he?” he remarked wryly, watching his godfather’s lips curl.

“We are hoping to avoid that scenario,” Severus told him. “Harry insists the wards will have it in hand.”

That wasn’t a no.

Draco didn’t feel jealousy over it, not like he might have done once. He felt only pride, and satisfaction — with that kind of power, Voldemort didn’t stand a chance.

Severus had to leave for his afternoon classes, and so Draco went for a walk, trying to get used to the way his body felt now. There was still a strange discomfort in his chest; nothing to do with his magic, but a kind of sadness, one he barely even wanted to admit to.

Turning seventeen was nice. Getting the day off classes was nice. But... where was the celebration?

It was fine, he told himself. He had the evening to spend with Harry, the dormitory for just them. They could celebrate wonderfully by themselves, all night long.

But... he had hoped for just a little more fuss, he thought quietly to himself at dinner, which felt like any other dinner at Hogwarts. Some presents from his friends in other houses, perhaps. Certainly not the ridiculous cake hat that Hufflepuff house delighted in forcing upon newly adult students, but something more than a quick ‘happy birthday, Draco — pass the potatoes, would you?’

As dinner came to an end, Harry’s arm curled around his waist. “You feeling up for a walk?” the Gryffindor asked.

“I’m of-age, Potter, not an invalid,” Draco pointed out dryly. Harry made a face, kissing Draco’s nose.

“That a yes, then?”

A walk sounded nice. A stroll by the lake, perhaps; a quiet celebration, watching the sun set on his youth or some poetic bullshit like that. So he agreed.

Only Harry didn’t lead him outside. He turned instead towards a suit of armour nearby — or rather, the passage behind the suit of armour, which certainly had not existed before in Draco's living memory. Dating an heir to the castle was convenient and baffling in equal measure.

"Where are we going?" he asked warily, wondering if Harry was going to absolutely scupper his plan to have his way with his Gryffindor in the Slytherin dormitory by leading him to some romantic bedroom setup elsewhere in the castle. Perhaps he shouldn't have kept his birthday plans secret after all!

"Just for a bit of a wander. I want to show you something." Well, then. That sounded less like an intention to ravish him and more like Harry had found something weird and possibly extremely ridiculous, knowing that Potter luck. Like another secret chamber from the founders' era, or something left behind by Merlin himself.

Draco was braced for the extreme, and thus surprised when the passage ended in a familiar corridor. The seventh floor corridor, on the way to the Room of Requirement.

Had Harry been rooting around the room of Hidden Things again? Draco knew his boyfriend had looked into it once or twice, since finding the horcrux. Had he unearthed some other lost treasure?

Harry took him by the hand, opening the door and leading him inside.

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY DRACO!"

He stumbled against the wall of sound, wide-eyed at the sight of a room full of people; all his friends, even Pansy and Millie — even the Weasley twins, which explained both the fireworks exploding above his head and also Blaise's lack of complaints about vacating the dorm for the night. The room was decked out in silver and green, with a table groaning with snacks and drinks along one wall, a huge cake in the middle of the table decorated with snakes and snitches and the words 'Happy 17th Draco' in neat icing on top. Beside it was a smaller table, stacked with wrapped gifts.

Draco turned to Harry, who was beaming at his side, eyes sparkling. "You... you planned this?"

"Couldn't let you turn seventeen without a decent party, could I?" Harry said with a wink.
"Do you like it?"

A long stare, and then Draco pulled his boyfriend into a toe-curling kiss, their friends whooping and whistling when it dragged on far too long. Harry's mouth was swollen when Draco let him go, hair even more wild than usual, green eyes bright behind his glasses. He was gorgeous, and he was Draco's, and this was the best birthday ever.

"Let's get this party started, then!" Fred announced, letting off another firework and starting up the record player in the corner, filling the room with fast-paced muggle music Draco vaguely recognised. Draco couldn't stop looking at Harry, wondering what in the world he had done to deserve this life he now lead.

"Not too much? Harry fretted. Draco scoffed.

“When has anything been too much? I’m a Black,” he said proudly, making Harry laugh.

“Good. I know next year your birthday is gonna be a bit mad with NEWTs and everything, so I thought... well, this year is a special one. You deserve to make a big deal out of it.” He looked bashful, and Draco kissed him again, hand at the small of Harry’s back, loving the way the shorter boy just melted against him.

“Are you two gonna suck face this entire time, or would you like to join the rest of the party?” That was Susan, grinning far too devilishly for a Hufflepuff, a pair of drinks in her hands that were bright coloured and very likely alcoholic. She thrust them towards the two boys. “Come on. You’ve got plenty of time for that later,” she added with a suggestive wink.

Harry looked a little confused by that, glancing at Draco, who just smirked and sipped his new drink. Definitely alcoholic. “I’ve got the Slytherin dorm to myself tonight,” he whispered in Harry’s ear, leaning in close enough to brush his lips against the delicate skin. “Thought you might like to join me. Let me repay all your hospitality up in the Gryffindor dorms.”

He watched Harry’s eyes darken, and lust flared hot within him, tangling up in the rush of the new magic in his system. Everything felt that much more intense, and Draco couldn’t wait to see how that translated to getting Harry’s hands on his skin.

But he had a party to enjoy, first.

. . .

They were very lucky that Harry was the heir of Slytherin — they likely never would have made it down to the Slytherin common room without getting caught otherwise, as tipsy as they were. Neither of them had wanted to get too drunk, very aware of their evening plans. But Draco was buzzing, with alcohol and magic and sweet sharp arousal simmering below the surface, rearing up every time his gaze caught on the line of Harry’s neck or the sliver of skin below the hem of his t-shirt that flashed tauntingly when he danced.

The party ended just before midnight, the Room providing safe passage back to common rooms, though with the number of couples involved Draco doubted everyone would be returning to their own beds, or even beds at all. He didn’t care, as long as Blaise and Theo found other places to be.

Harry was handsy as they crept towards the entrance to the common room — he hadn’t been drunk often, and wasn’t truly drunk now, but he was an affectionate little sop at the best of times and with his inhibitions lowered that just made him all the more eager to press himself against Draco and whisper sweet nothings in his ear, all while grinding a huge erection against his hip.

It was a miracle they didn’t fuck right there in the corridor. But the desire to have Harry in his dormitory bed — and the fear of possibly getting caught by his godfather — had Draco pressing on, murmuring the password, feeling Harry’s magic trickle over both of them as the stone archway revealed itself. That shouldn’t have been such a turn on, knowing that even drunk and half-blind with lust Harry was still capable of a Dissillusionment charm to cover them both, wandlessly at that. But Draco had long since stopped denying that he was attracted to power, especially the power that poured off Harry in waves.

There were only a couple of people in the common room, and neither of them noticed the two invisible sixth years creeping towards the boys' dorms. Harry's breath was hot on the back of Draco's neck as they hurried through, slipping into Draco's room and shutting the door behind them. Immediately, Harry burst into giddy giggles, leaning back against the door.

Draco felt the flare of magic, the privacy wards springing to life. He swallowed, surveying his boyfriend. Merlin, he was exquisite. "I want you naked," Draco growled, reaching for the hem of Harry's t-shirt — one of the slogan ones from Infinite, with rainbow lettering bold across the chest, declaring that 'the first Pride was a riot'.

"Where and how?" Harry asked without hesitation, so trusting as he looked at Draco, the openness of his face and eagerness in his eyes making Draco's cock twitch in his jeans.

For a brief moment he hated Albus Dumbledore for tying Harry up when he kidnapped him — the Gryffindor would look incredible all trussed up in Draco's bed, restrained by the drapes or perhaps a Slytherin tie or two. But that kind of restraint was absolutely not fun for Harry anymore, so Draco didn't even suggest it, leaving that play firmly in his fantasies and reaching for the next thought. He had so many, battling for space in his brain, all the while Harry was revealing more of that glorious burnished bronze skin and making it impossible for Draco to think through the lust clouding his mind.

One thought stood out above the rest. "I— remember the last day of Yule break?" he gasped, gaze dropping lower as Harry shucked his trousers. He wasn't wearing any underwear, and Salazar, if Draco had known that sooner they never would have made it through the party.

"Yeah," Harry breathed, stalking closer to Draco now that he was naked, the blond still far too dressed. It felt so forbidden, having Harry here, in the heart of Slytherin. Bare and unashamed and staring at Draco with such fire in his eyes. They would be in so much trouble if they got caught, but that just made Draco's blood pump that much faster. "You want that?"

For a moment, Draco forgot what they were talking about. Then he remembered — Harry, in his bed, beneath him. "Your mouth, like that," he confirmed, shoving Harry down onto his bed, kicking off his trousers and boxers as quickly as he could, wanting to match his boyfriend's nakedness. "Then— then I want you in me, up against the wall. Right there." He pointed to the space between the two tall wardrobes, the patch of stone wall with a Slytherin banner hung on it, directly opposite the door. The place where they had no chance of hiding if anyone walked in. Not that anyone would, not with Harry's wards, but it made the fantasy so much hotter to think about it.

They hadn't fucked against a wall before. Draco was keen to find out what it was like.

A growl rumbled in Harry's chest, the sound hitting Draco hard. The Slytherin took a moment to admire his nude boyfriend lying against his green and silver sheets, then joined him on the bed, straddling his chest, feeling desperate hands grip his thighs.

Bracing himself with a hand on the headboard, Draco locked eyes with that vivid green stare, sinking into the hot wet welcome of Harry's eager mouth.

Best birthday ever.

.-. .

If the world was normal, Ginny would be taking her first OWL exam in the morning.

Instead, she would be going to class just like normal, teachers going over things they'd already learned — the staff were just as adrift as the students, with these extra two weeks to come up with lesson plans for. She couldn't even adjust her schedule to prepare for when she would take her exams; none of them had any idea how long it would be before that was even possible.

"I thought I'd be a lot happier about not having to do exams than I actually am," she sighed, curling a lock of hair around her finger.

Neville, knelt nearby over a raised bed filled with more plants than Ginny could remember the names of, looked back over his shoulder with concern in his hazel eyes. "It's weird, isn't it?" he agreed. "Last time they were cancelled was, well, y'know."

Ginny grimaced — exams had been cancelled after the whole Chamber of Secrets situation, but she had been in no fit state to notice or care by that point.

"Didn't really matter as much back then. Second year exams and all," Neville finished, shrugging. Ginny hummed in agreement.

"I just... I just want to get them over with. Do my OWLs, get my results, start working on the next things. I don't want to waste my first term of sixth year having to revise everything all over again." That would just leave her behind in her NEWT studies, which would make her last two years of Hogwarts that little bit more gruelling. Ginny wasn't a swot, but she still wanted decent grades, and having such disruption felt supremely unfair.

"It probably won't be the whole first term," Neville said. "Just the first month or so. I can't see it taking that long to get everything back up and running."

Ginny's gaze darkened sadly. "Depends how bad things are over the summer. There might not be a school to come back to for a while." She wasn't stupid, she could see Harry and her older friends and all the professors quietly preparing for war. She was part of the HA, she felt how their training became more and more serious as time went on. And there was no way Harry was with Draco every time he was out past curfew. Those boys were insatiable, to be sure, but they weren't that bad.

"Don't talk like that, Gin," Neville protested. "Everything's going to be fine."

There was such confidence to his voice, such utter faith in his best friend. Ginny had faith in Harry, too, but that didn't stop her worrying. Even a battle won could do irreparable damage.

She sighed, but didn't say anything else, watching Neville tend to his plants. She knew it calmed him to work in the greenhouses, and it was oddly soothing for her just to watch; his repetitive motions, his sure and steady hand, the quiet murmurs of encouragement to the plants that he probably didn't realise she could hear. He was adorable, honestly.

Professor Sprout didn't mind her sitting back here with Neville, not now she'd proven quiet and trustworthy and unlikely to damage any of the more delicate specimens. The first few times, she'd had the Herbology Mistress' keen-eyed stare on her the entire time, worried that she and Neville might be using the quiet space to get up to something scandalous.

Not that it wasn't tempting, in the back of Ginny's mind. Since falling for Neville Longbottom she'd developed a disturbingly high number of greenhouse-related fantasies. But most of those worked just fine in his greenhouses at Longbottom Manor, where they weren't likely to be interrupted by a teacher or another student.

Ginny just wanted to hang out with Neville, really. Watch him enjoy his happy place. Especially when her own emotions were restless, her quick temper battling with her disappointment in a confusing muddle of moroseness. She just wanted to be able to take her exams and have the owl come with her results in July like normal, a little piece of paper she could show to her parents and her big brothers and have them be so proud.

She wanted life to go back to normal.

She felt bad for thinking it, sometimes. She wasn't that badly affected by things — her family were in the thick of it, but they were all still around. She wasn't like Harry, with such a huge burden on his shoulders. She would fight when the time came, but through her own choice, not because anyone expected it of her. Most of her family would probably prefer she didn't, in all honesty. And she didn't even have it as bad as the seventh years, who couldn't graduate until the whole mess was over, had to put their futures on hold in this already uncertain time.

She didn't have that much to sulk about, but she still felt it all the same. She had been able to pretend, up to this point; pretend she was a normal fifth year with a great boyfriend and a spot on the quidditch team and a solid friend group, the teenage life she'd dreamed of as a child when all her older siblings went off to Hogwarts and left her with Mum, coming back at holidays with stories about all their cool friends and cool classes and cool student life.

But OWLs being cancelled due to the Ministry being run by Death Eaters was not something that happened to normal fifth years.

Ginny shook her head slightly, ridding herself of the depressing thoughts. Her brown eyes went back to Neville, a smile tugging at her lips as he leaned over to trim some dead leaves off a tall plant with bright blue flowers. He was humming to himself, speaking softly to the plant, promising it would all be over soon and it would feel so much better when he was done.

When the plant looked perfect, the boy ran a hand through his dark blond hair, sitting back on his haunches and downing tools, lifting the hem of his t-shirt up to wipe the sweat off his face. Ginny's smile widened — he never would have done that, a year ago. Not in front of her, and probably not by himself. He'd been so self-conscious of his soft belly, it had taken a while for him to stop flinching whenever Ginny touched it, and even longer for him to be comfortable shirtless in front of her.

Even now, after they'd been naked in front of each other more times than she could count — after Ginny had given him a part of her that no one else would ever have — she still wasn't sure he believed her when she said he was handsome, gorgeous, sexy, any of the words he'd never use for himself.

But he was starting to. And him not even thinking twice before baring that swell of stomach in such an innocent gesture made her think that he was finally starting to be comfortable in himself.

"You're staring at me again."

She blinked, cheeks going red as she met Neville's amused gaze. He was done with his plants now it seemed, sat on the wooden edge of the raised bed and spelling his hands clean. "Sorry," she said, tucking her hair behind her ear.

He smiled. "It's okay. I don't mind." His face flushed a little, and not from the heat. "It's not the kind of staring that makes me worried we'll get in trouble with Sprout."

A laugh burst from Ginny's mouth. "It could be," she drawled salaciously, giving him an obvious once-over. He just rolled his eyes, and started packing away his gardening tools.

"Not in here," he scolded. "I'm not having you get me kicked out of the greenhouses right as I've just got my laceflowers finally blooming."

"Which one's that again?" Ginny asked, peering at the bed full of all of Neville's Herbology projects.

"The one with all the little purple buds. Which you should know, because they're definitely on the OWL curriculum," he teased, hoisting himself to his feet, offering her a hand up. Ginny just grinned.

"Well I've now got ages before my exams, so you'll just have to remind me in a couple of months time," she teased, brushing a smudge of dirt off his face. His jaw was getting stubbly again, which meant he'd probably shave that evening, which was a damned shame. Neville thought his scruff was still too patchy, but Ginny thought it looked extremely sexy.

"I will," he promised. "I'll help you study as much as you need. Probably won't be much help with subjects that aren't Herbology, mind, but I'm sure the others will chip in."

"I'll pester Harry about it." Then Ginny paused, frowning. "Or— maybe not him. He might be a bit busy. Killing a Dark Lord is probably more important than my OWL results."

"Only a little bit," Neville agreed. "When he's done with all that war nonsense, though, I'm sure he'll help."

All that war nonsense. Merlin, she loved this boy.

“You good to go?” she asked, wondering if he had any other projects to tend to. He nodded, squeezing her hand.

“All set, yeah. Thanks for coming with me — it’s nice to have company, even if you’re just sitting there.” Some of his plants he didn’t mind her helping with, but most were too fragile for her heavy-handed enthusiasm.

“It’s way too sunny to be up in the castle,” she returned, tilting her head up to feel the sunlight warm her face through the glass roof. She closed her eyes a moment, and when she opened them again the look in Neville’s eyes made her breath catch in her throat.

“You’re so pretty,” he murmured, reaching out to tangle a hand in her hair, watching the way the light shimmered off the copper-coloured strands.

“And you’re far too handsome for your own good,” she said, watching his nose screw up in denial. “Did I tell you I overheard Leanne Moon and Mandy Brocklehurst talking about you in the girls’ bathroom the other day? Mandy was considering starting some rumour about catching me with Michael in the Ravenclaw dorms so that you’d break up with me and go out with her instead.”

“That can’t be true,” Neville denied, shaking his head. Ginny nodded, grin widening. “Seriously? But— she thought I’d just believe that?”

“She was going to make it very convincing,” came Ginny’s airy response. “Get Michael in on it and everything. I think she’s got some kind of blackmail on him, she was pretty sure he’d be up for it.”

“Blimey.” Neville blinked, shaking his head once more. “That— Mandy Brocklehurst? Really?”

“You reconsidering your options?” Ginny teased; Mandy was cute, after all. Neville scoffed.

“Don’t be daft,” he said, not a second of hesitation. “I just... Mandy went out with Roger Malone, what’s she looking at me for?”

“Malone has weird hair,” Ginny said, grimacing; whoever had told the Ravenclaw boy that curtains suited him was committing a crime against humanity. “And she’s looking at you because you’re hot. Speaking of,” she added, feeling sweat trickle down her back beneath her top. “Fancy going for a dip in the lake before dinner?”

Neville arched his brows, hands settling on her hips. “Are you just trying to get me wet and half naked?” he asked with a sigh. Ginny beamed.

“Yup,” she chirped. “What do you think?” She tried not to look too eager, wondering if being shirtless where anyone could see them was too far out of his comfort zone.

“Go on, then,” he relented, kissing her forehead and directing her towards the greenhouse doors, hand moving to the small of her back. “I swear, I’ve got no willpower when it comes to you.” He didn’t sound mad about it, more resigned to his fate. Ginny wound an arm around his thick waist, squeezing lightly, already imagining the bikini she could transfigure for herself. Something that would make Neville far too distracted to think about his own bare-chested state.

Mandy Brocklehurst could go suck a dick; she wasn't getting anywhere near Ginny's boyfriend.

.

With summer break so close, and no exams to direct their focus, the tension amongst the students was getting to unbearable levels. Two weeks before the end of term, McGonagall called a school-wide assembly after dinner one evening.

"It has been decided," she announced, "that Hogwarts will remain open for those in need for the duration of the summer holidays."

Immediately, the hall burst into noise. McGonagall cleared her throat pointedly, staring them all down until the students hushed again. "This does not mean you will be forced to stay. Nor does it mean that, should the battle come to our doors, you will be forced to fight. If you have alternate arrangements made for your own safety, I will do my best to help you keep to those arrangements. But, if you have nowhere else to go, we will not close our doors to you at the end of the year."

Her gaze turned intent, fierce. "However, I will warn you that this school intends to stand as a stronghold against the forces of Lord Voldemort, and as such it may well not be the safest or best place for you. Make your choices wisely; I know all of you are capable of having bright futures, and I would hate to see those futures crushed by the false promise of superiority."

Harry was reminded of the way McGonagall had looked when expelling the six students who had attacked him, stony and yet so hopeful for her students to make the right decisions. There was some dark muttering in amongst the worried voices as they all got up to leave — not just from the Slytherin corner of the room, either.

He wasn't so stupid as to think those six students were the only loyal Voldemort supporters in the school. The others were just biding their time, aware that Harry was practically untouchable here.

As the first students reached the doors, all of a sudden there was a boom so loud it rocked the very foundations of the school. At the same time, four students dropped to their knees with gasps of pain, and the headmistress swooned back into her chair.

Harry hardly registered the smack of his knees hitting the stone floor, his head ringing with the force of the pressure on the school wards. He thought he felt a hand on his back, heard a voice calling his name. "Attack," he croaked, squeezing his eyes shut as there was another assault to the web of magic surrounding the castle. Hogwarts cried out for help in his mind, and he did his best to provide strength.

Had he been more coherent, he would have noticed his friends banding tight around him, protecting him from view. What he was aware of was the connections around him, as his friends moved Neville and Hannah and Luna close to him, the four of them immediately locking their arms around each other, leaning in together as they worked to offer what they could to the school. It was easier, with his fellow heirs beside him.

Harry's entire awareness narrowed down to the Slytherin magic within him, and the foul magic trying to tear a hole in the castle's protections. Nothing else mattered, nothing else even existed.

The headmistress was handling things better than the heirs, though it was clear the strain was on her, too. She hauled herself to a standing position, leaning heavily on Professor Sprout, and hobbled her way over to the four heirs huddled tight together in the middle of the hall. "We need to move them," she said, unsurprised at the solid ring of students shielding the heirs, their wands raised and ready for attack.

"It's You-Know-Who!" Someone came running in — Dennis Creevey, his eyes as wide as dinner plates. No one had even noticed him leave the hall. "There's Death Eaters at the gates!"

Harry had no concept of the panic, sucking the air from the room in an instant. He had no concept of the teachers and the prefects trying to organise their students. He was only vaguely aware of a tiny hand pressing to his back, and the feeling of house elf travel. He remained locked in the embrace with the other three, but the place they arrived was... easier. He strained his neck up, forcing his eyes open, and found himself looking at the Wardstone, its colours swirling angrily. At his side stood Dobby, big eyes round and scared.

"Heirs will hold the wards," the elf said solemnly, "elves will keep Hogwarts safe."

And then he disappeared.

The castle's magic was strongest in this room, the pressure easing slightly, enough for the heirs to disentangle themselves and look at each other.

"We need to outlast him," Luna said, eyes glowing with ethereal light. "If he breaks the wards, it's over."

That didn't sound like the good kind of over. Harry grit his teeth, stumbling to his feet, moving to the same compass point he'd stood at when he'd claimed the wards so many months ago.

"We have all of Hogwarts at our hands," Harry reminded, looking at his friends as they took their positions. "He's just one man. We hold, or we die."

Across the Wardstone, he met Neville's gaze, giving his best friend one last solemn nod. Then he pressed both hands to the wardstone, and sank.

.-. .

The siege on the wards lasted almost twenty-four full hours. A whole day of Voldemort standing at the gates of Hogwarts, drawing the magic from all of his Marked followers — and several Dark ritual-based sources — trying to force the wards to crack, his followers waiting around him for their chance to claim Hogwarts School for good.

Had the wards been the same as they were when Dumbledore was in charge, they likely wouldn't have lasted more than an hour or two under the onslaught.

Inside the school, the teachers did their best to maintain some semblance of calm. The students were kept in their common rooms, prefects guarding the doors — for Slytherin and Hufflepuff it was torture, trapped in the bowels of the school with no idea what was going on. Up in the towers of Gryffindor and Ravenclaw house, students jostled at the windows, trying to see the crowd of black-clad figures at the very edge of the school grounds. There had to be at least a hundred, perhaps more. Voldemort's army, ready for battle.

No one knew where the four heirs had been taken, just that the school elves had moved them 'somewhere safe'. No one except Draco, who had called Dobby in the privacy of his bathroom and begged for information on his boyfriend. Dobby told him that the heirs were at the Wardstone, though he couldn't tell Draco where that was. That Draco wouldn't be able to go in even if he knew — only the heirs and the heads of school could enter.

So for almost twenty-four hours, they waited. Wondered if this would be it, the beginning of the end. For almost twenty-four hours, four teenagers stood in the heart of the castle, pouring every ounce of strength they had into the wards surrounding them. Channeling all the wild magic of the forest and the ley lines beneath it, the echoed magic from hundreds of years of students growing within these halls, coming of age right here in the castle, leaking magic to be absorbed by the stones and fed back to Hogwarts itself.

Finally, a figure dropped to the floor in a dead faint.

Outside the wards, a hundred or more black-cloaked figures watched in shock as their master crumpled to the ground. For a moment, none of them moved. Then one hurried forward, crouching beside the unconscious Lord Voldemort, gesturing with an arm that ticked like the winding of a clock. "Retreat!" Rabastan Lestrange shouted, trying not to show his panic. "All of you, out! I will take our Lord to safety!"

The students in the tower windows watched the black-cloaked figures disappear, one by one.

Back in the heart of the castle, four teenagers gasped in unison as the pressure in their heads finally abated. The wards settled down, weak but still in tact. The heirs lifted their hands from the Wardstone, groaning as their stiff limbs protested.

"How long...?" Hannah trailed off as Harry did a wandless Tempus charm, and all four of them swore loudly.

"A whole day!" Neville exclaimed. "No wonder I'm bloody starving!"

Harry laughed, the sound rusty. He wanted to walk away, but he wasn't sure his legs would support him if he moved even an inch. "I hope it fucking destroys him." He could hardly believe how much magical power was at Voldemort's disposal, with so little of his soul left.

Sure, he had his connections through the Dark Marks, drawing on his followers' power when his own faltered, but even so...

Harry hoped his maturation was as big as they expected. He'd need every last bit of it to win that fight.

Suddenly Hannah's knees buckled, the Hufflepuff girl caught at the last minute by a divan the Room provided. "Ohh, I'm dizzy," she groaned, clutching her head.

"Dobby," Harry called, and the elf was there in an instant. "The school, is it safe?"

Dobby's ears flapped as he nodded. "The students is safe in they's dorms. The wards is not being breached." He looked at Harry worriedly. "We is taking you to Hospital Wing now." It was a statement, not a request, but Harry didn't have it in him to argue. Three more elves appeared, one for each heir.

Madam Pomfrey shrieked in alarm when four patients appeared suddenly in beds in her ward, house elves at their sides. Her hand flew to her face when she realised who those patients were. "It's over, then?" she asked, rushing to aid them. Harry nodded, a grim look on his face.

"For now, at least."

Voldemort would try again, that was for sure — he would not take well to being denied entry, to being made to look weak in front of his followers.

But after that, it would take him quite a while to recover. They had bought some time, at least.

.

Lord Voldemort sat in a high-backed, throne-like chair. Severus, stood in the front row of the gathered Death Eaters, could see the faint tremors running through the man's form.

He had been unconscious for three days straight, after failing to breach the Hogwarts wards. For two days after that he had refused to be seen by anyone but Severus and Rabastan. Severus had been sent a request for restorative potions, and they seemed to have helped — he himself had needed a few, after the drain on his magic through his Mark. He had another one brewing back at the school, one that would take another two weeks to prepare.

But none of them had seen their Lord cast a single spell since.

"Severus," came the hissing voice, halfway to Parseltongue, barely louder than a whisper. "Come forward."

Severus did as bid, kneeling in front of the chair. Rabastan stood at their master's side like an honour guard, wand held in the clockwork hand of the arm Voldemort had so graciously provided him.

He expected the Cruciatus that ripped a scream from his throat. The only mercy was that it came from Rabastan, not the Dark Lord himself. There was a different feel to the magic — just as painful, but not quite as sharp in the aftershocks.

“When my loyal subjects were expelled for their attempt at kidnapping Potter, Severus, you told me the wards had grown stronger. You did not tell me they had grown strong enough to keep me out!”

“My Lord, I did not know,” Severus murmured with the appropriate amount of fear and remorse. “The full extent of the heirs’ capabilities has been a closely guarded secret. I had no idea they could combine together with such strength.” It still amazed him, even now, that the four students had held fast against such a power.

“What use is having a spy within the school if you do not provide me with this vital information!” Voldemort snapped, his voice quiet but his fury as strong as ever. “You made my followers look like fools when they were curtailed by the wards. Now you have made me look like a fool with the same! One might wonder if you wanted to keep me out of Hogwarts! I know how... fond you are of the castle, after all these years.”

“No, My Lord,” Severus said desperately. “I would like nothing more than to see you in charge of that school, turning it into the great academy of Dark Arts it deserves to be. I will do better, My Lord. Minerva is keeping the school open over the summer, a gathering point for the forces of the light. I will stay with them, My Lord, and learn their weaknesses. I will find a way in for you, and if I cannot do that then I will bring you Potter myself.”

When he dared look up, Voldemort was smirking. “You will indeed, Severus — this is your last chance to redeem yourself. With the old fool gone, there are few who trust you within the school; if you have not changed that by the end of the summer, have not given me something useful, then you will deliver the brat to my feet or I will kill you myself.” His thin lips sneered dangerously. “And if I hear even a whisper that you are no longer loyal to me, your life is forfeit. I do not like it when my plans do not work, Severus. Especially when it is due to information that my spy should have provided me!”

“I am sorry, My Lord. Please, forgive me.”

Knowing what was coming didn’t make it any less painful.

“Learn from your punishment, Severus. Lord Voldemort does not suffer incompetence.”

Severus couldn’t answer — he was too busy screaming as Rabastan’s magic tore into his skin, ripping at muscles and burning his very bones.

It might take more than just Remus to piece him back together, after this.

Chapter 102

No one was excited for the end of year feast. No seventh years eager to graduate and join the adult world, no homesick first years keen to see their parents again. Gryffindor won the house cup, but it was not a celebrating matter.

There would be no Hogwarts Express in the morning. It was too dangerous, too big a target for attack. Voldemort would happily endanger children if it meant drawing the Light out to defend them.

Not everyone was staying. A lot of students, Harry knew, had families in safehouses already, and were desperate to join them. The parents at the Pottery were looking forward to having their children back with them.

And of course, there were those students who had nothing to fear from the wider world. Those who would go home to their families quite happily, live a fairly ordinary summer while their parents or cousins or siblings went off to serve a madman. The lucky students were the ones too young to be expected to fight.

Many students would be going home only to offer their arms up for branding. Marking themselves for death.

So it was a solemn affair that closed out the school year, Harry sat at his table with Neville on one side and Katie on the other. He kept his head down, stayed silent, ignored the whispers. His thoughts were already on the days to come.

At least he had recovered from the attack on the wards. Two days in the Hospital Wing, some potions, and a full twelve hours sleep had done wonders for him, and the other heirs. They had not bled themselves dry, not even close — they were reinforcing the wards with their strength, not offering up all their magic — but it was still an exhausting process.

Harry lingered in the hall after the empty dessert plates vanished from the table. He waved off the gentle concern of his friends, promising to see them back at the common room soon. He made his way up towards the staff table; McGonagall was lingering, too.

“All set for tomorrow?” he asked. The headmistress nodded sharply.

“I now understand how you were so sure of Miss Dunbar’s father’s whereabouts.”

Harry’s lips flickered in a weak smile — McGonagall had finally been made aware of the Pottery, and Grimmauld. Not of the secrets themselves, but of their existence, their purpose. It was the only way she would accept allowing Sirius to send over the portkeys for the students. “This war began long before the Ministry was taken, Professor,” he said, thinking back on the days when Voldemort had been just a vague threat, and the need to hide from Dumbledore was almost as urgent.

“Indeed.” Together they watched the students file out of the hall, not a single one of them excitedly discussing their summer plans, as they would in a normal year. Even the ones who would be leaving looked like they were going to battle.

They looked as exhausted as Harry felt.

“What will the housing situation be, once the students are set?” Harry queried — he had left those sorts of decisions up to the staff, as they were none of his business.

“All remaining students will be moved down to the Hufflepuff dormitories. Slytherin house will remain open for any adults seeking refuge who are not here to fight. The rest we will split between Gryffindor and Ravenclaw.” McGonagall’s lips pursed. “I have offered your godfathers rooms within the empty staff quarters.”

“I’m staying in Gryffindor,” Harry told her. “I’m not going down with the students.” He needed to be a leader, not a child.

To his relief, McGonagall nodded. “I expected as much. Yourself and Mr Longbottom shall remain in your dormitory, along with anyone you wish to join you. I trust I can expect the pair of you to behave responsibly.”

A brief flicker of a smile. “No wild parties, promise.” Then a thought. “It’s not us you have to worry about. The twins are coming back.”

The headmistress gave a long-suffering sigh. “I have realised that, yes. My hope is that Miss Johnson and Mr Zabini will keep them from causing too much trouble. Failing that, their elder brothers.”

“Good luck with that,” Harry said with a snort.

A head of silver-blond hair approached him as the last of the students left the hall. Harry held out a hand, twining his fingers with Draco’s. “Pack your trunk tonight,” Harry requested, watching confusion cross the Slytherin’s face. “You’re moving up with me tomorrow.”

Grey eyes darted nervously towards the headmistress. “That— that’s allowed?”

McGonagall eyed them knowingly, the barest hint of a smile. “I daresay even if I said no, you’d find yourself up there anyway.” She looked a little sad, gaze dropping to their joined hands. “Times like these, we should hold on to the joys that we have even tighter. I shall not begrudge you that, Mr Potter, with the task you have to face.”

Harry nodded, squeezing Draco’s hand that little bit tighter.

At last, the hall was empty but for the three of them.

“It begins, then,” Harry murmured, looking up at the magical night sky of the ceiling. It was a clear night — a full moon night. Part of him wished Remus had come early, so that he could take his fox form and run with his godfathers, feel that freedom.

One last chance before his birthday to do so.

But there would be more chances, after. He was sure of it. He had to believe.

Suddenly, a slow smile crept across his face. “Would you like to see something cool, Professor?” he asked. McGonagall blinked at him, bewildered.

“I— pardon?” Harry just grinned wider, awaiting an answer. “I get the feeling you will show me regardless, Potter.” She looked to Draco, as if expecting an explanation, but the blond was equally baffled.

Harry stepped back, and where he once stood, there was suddenly a fox on the floor. He jumped up onto the end of the Gryffindor table, standing proud for his professor to see. She gasped sharply. “Oh, my.” Harry yipped happily, turning a circle to show off his beautiful tail. “Well, then,” McGonagall murmured, and if Harry wasn’t mistaken she was a little misty-eyed. “I suppose that’s Sirius Black’s doing, is it?” Harry yipped again, giving a fox grin. “Indeed. You do your parents proud, Potter. Even if you’re more trouble than all the Weasleys combined.” Harry barked in a laugh, then began running down the Gryffindor table, headed towards the doors. He stopped halfway, looking over his shoulder at Draco, barking pointedly.

Draco sighed. “So demanding,” he muttered, rolling his eyes. “Have a good night, Professor.”

And then he turned, transforming mid-stride, and a snowy owl soared across the room, gliding gracefully between the floating candles, hooting as the fox began running once more.

McGonagall could do nothing but stare at the animals, watching them disappear from the hall. Then, once she was alone, she laughed.

.-. .

None of Harry’s friends were leaving. When they packed up, it was only to relocate, and they didn’t have to bother with goodbyes in the morning. Most of them were prefects, so they took on the job of making sure the students got to their portkeys on time, and organising the ones remaining down in the Hufflepuff dorms.

Harry was not a prefect, and therefore had more pressing matters to attend to.

“Sirius!” He hugged his godfather crushingly tight before the man could even let go of Ceri’s hand.

“Hello, pup.” Sirius held him for a long moment, nose buried in the wild Potter hair. “Let me look at you.” He studied Harry at arms length, as if checking him over for injuries, then winked. “Handsome bugger, just like your dad.”

Harry laughed, wriggling out of Sirius’ gentle grip and hugging Charlie, who ruffled his hair. “Good to see you, Harry. Where’s Draco at?”

“We’re not attached at the hip y’know,” Harry muttered indignantly. Two sets of eyebrows rose, as if to say ‘oh really?’ “He’s prefect-ing. Moving kids into the Hufflepuff dorms.”

“Ahh, of course. Where have you ended up, then?”

Harry walked with the pair through the halls towards their new quarters, explaining the plans for the school now that summer had arrived. “You two have one of the empty staff suites,” he added. “You’re supposed to be sharing it with Moony, but...”

Sirius snorted — there was no way Remus was going to sleep away from Snape in the same damn castle. “Guess we’ve got a spare room, then. Lucky us. You want it, pup?” he offered. Harry made a face.

“And see you two wandering around naked in the mornings? I’ll pass, thanks. Besides, if I moved in there everyone would know about Moony in a heartbeat.”

“Ha! Fair point. Ah well, might be useful for something,” Sirius mused, hitching his bag further up his shoulder. “So, what sort of numbers are we looking at?”

It was a long morning, getting everyone settled in the appropriate places. Several of the older students kicked up a fuss about being moved to Hufflepuff when they fully intended to fight, so McGonagall relented and agreed anyone of-age could bunk up in the Ravenclaw dorms.

Of course, that led to Ron Weasley throwing a tantrum about having to go to Ravenclaw when Harry and Neville were staying in their Gryffindor dorm, but by that point the twins had arrived and were happy to loudly describe the type of things Ron might see should he stay in Gryffindor — namely Draco; Draco and Harry performing various sexual acts; and even the possibility of Ginny and Neville performing various sexual acts. It worked to deter Ron, but also the twins managed to gross themselves out at the thought of their baby sister in such situations. Harry just laughed.

“What do you think, Gin?” he asked, smirking. “Wanna move in with your boyfriend and a couple of queers?”

“Mum would kill me,” Ginny said with a snort. “I’ll pack my trunk after lunch.”

Across the table, Neville turned pink.

.-. .

The first few days were awkward, to say the least. The younger students weren’t sure what to do, with no lessons and a whole bunch of strange adults gradually filtering into the castle. There was very little supervision, other than the fifth year prefects still living down in the Hufflepuff dorms, and Professor Sprout herself.

Surprisingly, it was Neville who provided an answer. “We’ll work the HA with them,” he suggested. “Obviously, not at the level the rest of us are doing. But they’re here, and they need to be kept busy. And— they might need the practice, if worst comes to worst.”

“It’ll help, Nev, but I really don’t have time to teach a bunch of second years how to Stun each other,” Harry sighed, running a hand through his hair.

“We’ll do it,” Neville suggested, looking surprised by his own answer. “I mean— we know enough to teach the kids. And we can work on a rotation. You’ve got your own training and all. I'll talk to Sully, they're still down in Hufflepuff and from what I've heard the kids love them. Between us we'll sort something out."

Harry wasn't going to argue with that; it was one less thing for him to think about.

Mrs Weasley did indeed go apoplectic over the idea of her not-quite-sixteen year-old daughter sharing a dormitory with three older boys, one of which was her boyfriend. Harry felt sorry for Professor McGonagall having to deal with that one; they all knew that even if Ginny was ordered down to the Hufflepuff dorms, she'd find a way to sneak back up to Gryffindor anyway.

"Mum's trying to make me share a dorm with her and Dad, like I'm five," Ginny grumbled as she stomped into the dorm that evening, not even bothering to knock.

"Technically you are underage," Draco pointed out diplomatically.

"So's Neville, for another month! And Harry!" Ginny argued hotly.

"Yeah, you cradle-robber," Harry teased, nudging Draco's hip with his foot. Draco grabbed it, tickling the bottom of his foot in revenge.

"What does your dad say?" Draco asked.

"I told him we were in separate beds, but I think even he knew I was lying through my teeth. We had a really awkward conversation about pregnancy and Weasley fertility, and then he said that he knew I was too stubborn to do as I was told regardless so he just hoped I'd be sensible about things."

With a bit of magic, the boys' dormitory had transformed from a room holding five single beds to a room holding two doubles, with a makeshift partition in the middle that could be warded for privacy. Ginny didn't seem to give a single shit about any of the boys seeing her in various states of undress — Harry supposed after living with six brothers she had relegated Harry and Draco into that zone — but it was still good to have that boundary, if only at night.

Some things Harry didn't ever want to hear.

"Honestly I think they're more worried about me deciding to fight than where I'm sleeping. As if I'm going to let everyone I love step on that battlefield and just twiddle my thumbs down in Hufflepuff with the firsties," Ginny said, face a picture of disgust.

"Wait until they see a proper HA session," Harry told her with a smirk. "They'll realise they've got nothing to worry about." He would guarantee that his HA were more prepared for battle than most of the people coming to the school preparing to fight.

Harry scheduled that first session a week into summer, just as people were beginning to get restless. He made sure to check with McGonagall that they could claim the Great Hall for it — the headmistress had the tiniest of smirks when she agreed, and Harry suspected she knew exactly what he was trying to do.

So he reached for his inkwell, and etched a message on the silver plate. Training. Great Hall, Tuesday, 3PM. He made sure to clarify, not wanting those outside the castle to think it was an emergency meeting. To his surprise, many of them turned up at the Hogwarts gates on Tuesday morning, bags slung over their shoulders. “Alright, Potter,” Cassius greeted, nodding in his direction. “Room for one more?”

“Always,” Harry said, grasping the Slytherin’s forearm in welcome. “Where’s...?” He trailed off, not sure if he could name Cassius’ partner where others could hear.

“Finishing out the season, best he can,” Cassius explained. “I left him my inkwell, he says he’ll come when it’s time.”

Harry grinned — of course, even a war wouldn’t tear Oliver Wood away from quidditch.

At 3PM on the dot, Harry stood on the raised platform at the head of the Great Hall, looking at the cluster of students in front of him. Around the edges of the hall lingered a number of the adults now living in the castle; either because they didn’t know where else to go, or they were curious about what Harry Potter was up to this time.

“Alright, everyone. Welcome back, to a few familiar faces,” he added, nodding to the returned graduates. “I thought we’d start off easy, get warmed up. Some of you might be a little rusty.” His voice was teasing, and Patrick flipped him off from the back of the group. “Pair up, get going. Aiming to disarm, for now — Madam Pomfrey has better things to do than reattach limbs. Although Draco’s gotten better at it, so y’know. If you fancy your chances.” He wiggled his eyebrows. “I’ll be roaming.”

They got to work straight away, and Harry stayed where he was, watching with no small amount of pride as his students began duelling. He could see the exact moment their onlookers realised they weren’t just sticking to student-level spells, watching their eyes widen and their jaws slacken. Molly Weasley looked like she might faint as she saw Ginny ducking a Reductor curse and sending back a sickly orange hex that would have dislocated both of Cho’s kneecaps if she’d let it hit.

Harry walked between the pairs, pointing out weak spots, offering advice. Occasionally a spell came his way, forcing him to dodge or deflect — perhaps their spectators thought it was sloppy casting, but Harry knew it was intentional. They were all checking Harry was still paying attention.

“When this is all over,” a deep baritone murmured, and Harry looked up as he reached the edge of the group to see Kingsley approaching him, “I’m going to need names. Any of these kids want to be an auror, they’re in.” He squeezed Harry’s shoulder. “I’d offer the same to you if I thought you’d take it. You’ve done a damn fine job with them. What year is that scrawny kid in?” He was pointing at Dennis Creevey, who was duelling against Justin Finch-Fletchley and holding his own remarkably well.

“Just finished his third,” Harry answered. Kingsley let out a low whistle.

“Fucking hell, Potter. Aren’t his parents stopping him from fighting?”

"Muggleborn. They're in hiding," Harry explained. "His big brother isn't thrilled — Colin, over there, year below me — but I don't think he'd trust anyone else guarding his back. You should see them duel together, you'd swear they were twins." Colin and Dennis working as a team was truly a force to be reckoned with.

Kingsley just shook his head in astonishment, folding his arms over his broad chest.

Harry walked back to his platform, stopping the duels with a firework from his wand. "Not as rusty as I thought," he joked. "Good to see it."

"Are you gonna give us a challenge, or what?" Lee Jordan taunted playfully.

"Well, if you insist," Harry mock-sighed. "Groups of four, rotate through some three-on-ones."

There was a reshuffle of positions, and the duelling began again. Harry didn't want to push them too hard too soon, but he needed them to be ready.

Harry let them go on with that for another twenty minutes or so, then called break time — immediately, house elves filled the staff table with drinks and snacks.

"Well, well, this does look like fun," drawled a voice from the doorway. Bill had arrived, with Fleur at his side, both of them looking impressed. Harry was right beside the cluster of redheads sprinting to greet the pair excitedly.

"What are you two doing here?" Harry asked, raising his eyebrows. "Last I heard, you were in France until at least next week."

"Cut it short," Bill said with a shrug, Fleur leaned into his side, beaming.

"We are getting married," she announced in delight.

"Yes, dear, that's usually what that big shiny rock on your finger means," Harry teased. She huffed, shooting him a glare.

"She means here," Bill supplied. "Now. This weekend." He looked at his gathered family. "If... if you're up for it."

"I— this weekend? As in four days away?" Mrs Weasley asked, flabbergasted. Bill's returning smile was sheepish.

"Yeah? McGonagall says it's fine, and... we never really wanted anything big or fussy. But, hell, if I'm gonna die, I want to do so as Fleur's husband."

Fleur smacked his arm, rolling her eyes. "No one is going to die," she insisted, "stop being dramatic." She looked back to Mrs Weasley. "We know it is short notice. But we do not want to wait any longer. I... I hope you are willing to join us."

"You're sure you want me there?" Mrs Weasley asked, voice sad. "After everything?"

Harry didn't miss how Bill's gaze flicked his way for just a moment.

"There's still a lot I'm mad at you for, Mum," Bill admitted. "But we're working through it. And I don't want to look back on my wedding day and regret that you weren't there."

Mrs Weasley clasped her son's hand between hers, nodding tearfully. "Then I'd love to."

"Brilliant. Dad? You in?"

"...Is Fleur pregnant?" Mr Weasley asked suspiciously. "Because if she is, that's still no reason to rush."

Fleur laughed. "Non, Arthur, I am not pregnant. Just ready to be married."

"Well, then. We've got a lot of work to do in a short space of time!" Mr Weasley clapped his hands together, beaming. "What's the plan, then?"

Harry grinned — some may think the timing wildly inappropriate, but he rather thought a wedding was exactly what they needed to boost morale.

. . .

Because of their wedding plans, Fleur had already brought her parents and sister with her on the trip back from France. Mr Delacour turned out to be an ex-duelling champion, and he was more than happy to stay and fight, while Mrs Delacour was a healer who gladly agreed to assist Madam Pomfrey. Gabrielle, now almost twelve, was delighted to see Harry — if a bit put out by meeting his boyfriend, proving her crush had not yet faded entirely.

The day after, another surprise arrival came in the form of Viktor Krum. Harry met the Bulgarian seeker in the Entrance Hall, having felt his arrival through the wards.

"Viktor," he greeted warmly, shaking his hand and pulling him in for a quick hug. "You heard about the wedding, then?"

"I did, but I am here for more than that," Viktor replied, his English coming easier than it had when Harry last spoke to him, though his accent was still present. "I told you I would fight with you."

Harry's face turned serious. "Then thank you; we're glad to have you with us." Viktor had been chosen as Triwizard champion for a reason, and his skill with a wand would be a boost for their side. "Come on in, we'll get you set up with a bed somewhere. I'm afraid it's likely to be dorms, but I can probably get you a single. Or at the very least, sharing with someone who isn't likely to fawn all over you."

Viktor's smile didn't falter. "Dorms are fine; I'm sure I haff done worse for quidditch!" He chuckled. "It is good to see you again, Harry. Good to see you are finally tall enough for that Firebolt of yours," he added teasingly.

"I am a respectable five foot eight, thank you very much," Harry told him archly. He was hardly two inches shorter than Viktor, now; seekers weren't usually very tall.

Harry led the way up the stairs, going over his mental checklist to be sure there was room in Gryffindor. “We’ll have to catch Fleur at dinner tonight, if she’s not too busy with wedding stuff,” he mused. “Cho’s around too, somewhere. We can have a proper little reunion.” His voice was sad; Cedric should have been there, preparing to fight with them. He would have loved to see everyone coming together again.

“We will raise a glass in Cedric’s honour,” Viktor suggested quietly, smile dimming at the corners.

“Yeah. I’d like that.”

Harry was glad, in a way, that Viktor had returned — this war had begun in the tournament, with the resurrection of Voldemort, the manipulation of the four champions. It was right that they be together again to end it.

“There are more waiting, at Durmstrang,” Viktor told him. “Word of your war has spread; many of your people have turned to Europe, as you know. We did not know if reinforcements were needed, but — you have allies, should you need them.”

“That’s... that’s good to know. Thanks.” Harry wasn’t sure if there would be time, when the battle came, but he wouldn’t turn his nose up at more help.

And it would be good to have people in other countries ready to receive people, if the worst came to pass.

“However, I do also come bearing better news,” Viktor said, brightening up a little. “Let us call it an incentive for you to win this battle quickly.” Harry raised a curious eyebrow. “I was talking to a friend, the other day. A player for the Vratsa Vultures, but English. He knows the manager for the English national team, and mentioned to me that they have begun preparing for the World Cup next summer.”

Harry’s heart stuttered, and he stopped in his tracks. Viktor grinned at him. “You have a tryout for seeker, on August 23rd. If such things are possible by then.” He gripped Harry by the shoulders, pressing their foreheads together for a brief moment. “So survive this war, Harry Potter, so I can face you on the pitch once more and reclaim my pride. Yes?”

“You’re serious?” Harry asked incredulously. Viktor nodded. “Hell. I — that doesn’t give me much time, if I get injured in the fight.”

“Then do not get injured,” Viktor challenged, smirking. A snort escaped Harry.

“I’ll try my best.”

Seeker tryouts, for the England team. Draco was going to lose his mind. “I — don’t tell anyone, yeah?” He didn’t want that kind of pressure on top of everything else.

He didn’t want people mourning one more thing if he wasn’t there to make it happen.

Viktor mimed zipping his lips shut. “Our secret,” he promised.

They stopped outside the entrance to Gryffindor Tower. “This is the quieter of the two dorms we’ve got set up for adults. Not as many people, more married couples and the like. The other one, Ravenclaw Tower, that’s holding all the of-age students, younger single people, that sort of crowd.” It was much more packed in there, but no one seemed to mind.

“But not you?” Viktor presumed, and Harry’s smile turned wry.

“Not me,” he confirmed. “I’m in here. Bit more peace and quiet. We haven’t been bothering with passwords,” he added, knocking on the edge of the frame and smiling at the Fat Lady as she waved at them both. “Just knock, the dorms will open.” Hufflepuff was the only place with a password, being home to many younger children.

Harry was not anticipating the Weasley family gathering in the Gryffindor common room; it seemed they were planning wedding things, if the parchment in Mrs Delacour’s lap was anything to go by. All of them froze, and then Fleur squealed.

“Viktor! You made it!” She jumped up, throwing herself at the Bulgarian man.

“I would not miss it for the world,” he promised, kissing her on both cheeks. “I am sorry to interrupt; Harry was just finding me a room.”

“If there’s nowhere free, you can stay with us,” Bill offered, getting up to shake Viktor’s hand.

“When you are getting married in three days?” Viktor asked skeptically. Bill laughed.

“Maybe not on that night,” he corrected with a wink. “But the rest of the time, sure. I mean, if we wanted a honeymoon, we’d have waited.”

Viktor glanced to Harry, who shrugged. “Works for me.” With how many new people had shown up lately, Harry wasn’t sure there was enough space for Viktor to have his own room. At least this way he’d be staying with family.

“That’s settled, then,” Viktor agreed. “Should we leave you to your planning?”

“Nonsense! We are practically done,” Fleur insisted, taking him by the hand. “Come, join us. You too, Harry! We were just deciding on music. Bill insists on throwing muggle bands into the list and I do not know enough to know if I should let him!” She giggled, shooting her soon-to-be husband a fond look.

“Don’t worry, I have a lot of opinions about muggle bands,” Harry assured her.

He almost walked straight into Viktor’s back as the broad-shouldered seeker stopped in his tracks. Peering over his shoulders, Harry tried not to grimace. He hadn’t noticed her before, but Hermione was sat with the group, squeezed into a large armchair with Ron. She was looking up at the Bulgarian in shock, while Ron was steadily turning redder, jaw clenching with poorly-hidden jealousy.

“Hi, Viktor,” Hermione greeted, her voice thin and a little too high. Viktor inclined his head.

"Hello, Hermione." He had finally got the hang of pronouncing her name. "You are looking well."

Ron looked like he might explode, grabbing Hermione's hand possessively. Harry winced, climbing over the back of the sofa to squeeze himself in between George and Ginny. "That's a disaster waiting to happen," he muttered under his breath, watching warily as Viktor was led to a seat beside Fleur. Ginny snorted.

"I hope there's popcorn," was all she said, eyes lighting up with glee.

.-. .

Between the combined power of Mrs Weasley and Mrs Delacour, everything was set for the wedding on the afternoon of Saturday the 9th of July. Harry, Draco and Neville got ready together in their dorm; Ginny, as a bridesmaid, was getting ready with Gabrielle and Fleur elsewhere.

Harry was wearing the purple dress robes he wore to Slughorn's Christmas party, and it didn't take much convincing for Draco to wear his grey ones. Neville, too, seemed to have decided to wear the same robes from the party, shrugging and pointing out that they were hardly two events within the same social calendar.

Despite the rising number of people now living within the castle, they had made it very clear that the wedding was a family affair. McGonagall had organised a private marquee out by the lake, and also agreed to officiate. Harry hadn't realised that was within her skill set — the headmistress was full of surprises.

Just as it had for Slughorn's party, walking through the castle in full formalwear felt incredibly strange to Harry. At least he was part of a group; Viktor left the common room with them, but they were joined by Blaise and Angelina at the top of the staircase, and by Sirius, Remus and Narcissa on the second floor.

"Oh, those robes suit you so nicely, Harry, darling," Narcissa cooed happily, and he grinned.

"They're really great, thank you. Way better than anything I probably would have picked out," he added with a rueful smile that made both Draco and Sirius snort.

"Don't you all clean up nicely," Sirius told them, eyes trailing over the group.

"Not so bad yourself there, old man," Harry teased; indeed, Sirius looked incredibly handsome in his cobalt blue dress robes, embroidered with very subtle constellations.

"Less of the old, thank you," Sirius growled playfully, "or I'll ruin that hair you worked so hard on."

"Touch it and I'll cut your hands off," Draco warned. "I spent half an hour making that mop look presentable." He offered his mother an arm when they reached the Entrance Hall, but she waved him off.

"Stay with your beau, sweetheart. I already have a charming gentleman to escort me." She looped her arm through Remus', and set off out the door.

Harry wondered how much of that friendship was based around embarrassing childhood stories of one Severus Snape — a man who had been invited to the wedding, but may not actually show his face. He was still dancing the thin line between both sides, and didn't want to cause a fuss with his presence.

Also Harry was pretty sure he just didn't like weddings.

The marquee awaited them, with a twin at each side of the entrance in identical dark gold dress robes. Angelina and Blaise had absolutely no trouble telling them apart, greeting their respective partners happily.

"Well, well, what a fine looking bunch we have here," Fred drawled, winking. "Go on in, sit wherever, just leave the front row clear. And save me a seat, gorgeous," he added to Angelina. As Harry made to enter the tent, George caught his elbow. "Hey, go sit with Cass, would you? Ollie's running late and I think he's feeling a bit awkward."

The Slytherin was sat by himself in the third row, looking handsome but mildly uncomfortable. Harry nodded, and he and Draco went to join the dark-haired boy, Viktor following along — with Fleur otherwise occupied and Cho not yet arrived, Harry was the only person he really knew all that well, unless he decided to send Ron's blood pressure through the roof by sitting with Hermione.

"No last regrets about not stealing her away at the Yule Ball?" Harry said by way of greeting, startling Cassius. He chuckled, tension in his shoulders easing as Draco sat beside him.

"No, none of that. Just wondering if they might have the right idea — small affair, family only. Well, family and me, apparently," he added.

"Oh, hush, Fleur loves you," Harry said with a roll of his eyes; the pair had kept in touch after the Yule Ball and now Cassius was easily one of Fleur's favourite people. "You deserve to be here just as much as we do."

"Alright, mates," Tonks cut in quietly, shuffling into the row behind them. "Don't you look nice."

Tonks' light green dress robes were fairly masculine in style, though the body beneath them was more feminine-shaped. Harry propped his arm on the back of his chair to turn around properly.

"Hi, Tonks. What we going with today?"

"Oh! She's fine, thanks," Tonks assured, grinning. Harry grinned back.

"Cool. I like your robes. And the hair." Tonks had decided to go back to her family roots with a jet black pixie cut, though her eyes were a similar shade of green to her robes.

"Thanks! You look great, too. All matchy-matchy, very cute," she teased, patting Draco's cheek.

Into the seat beside her dropped Kingsley, wearing moss-green robes with two wide bands of bold black and gold geometric pattern running vertically down the front, and a hat to match. His knee knocked against Tonks', making Harry grin.

"We not hiding this anymore, then?" he asked, looking pointedly at the pair of them.

"Don't know what you're talking about, Harry," Tonks said breezily. "Totally normal, two co-workers sitting next to each other at a friend's wedding. Nothing suspicious at all. Those co-workers might even dance together at said wedding."

"And when those co-workers get caught snogging round the back of the marquee?" Harry teased.

"Then the four-eyed little twerp who catches them had better keep his mouth shut," Tonks continued in the same tone. Harry snickered.

"Noted."

There was a bit of noise, and a burgundy-clad figure hurried into the tent — Cassius' shoulders slumped in relief as Oliver hurried around the edge of the seats, sinking into the empty one at his partner's side. "Sorry, sorry, I know I'm late, things ran over," he whispered, kissing Cassius' cheek apologetically.

"You're lucky it's not started yet," Cassius said, though he wasn't truly mad. Oliver squeezed his thigh and winked, then looked down the rest of the row.

"Alright, lads," he greeted. "Aye up, Viktor, when did you get in?"

"Wednesday," Viktor replied, thick brows furrowed. "I did not realise you knew Bill and Fleur."

Oliver's grin widened. "I know them well enough, but I'm mostly here for this one," he explained, jerking a thumb towards Cassius — his left thumb, so he could uncurl his hand and show off his engagement ring. Viktor made a quiet noise of realisation.

"Ahh, your mysterious partner is Cassius? I did not know. Congratulations."

"Hang on, how do you two know each other?" Harry cut in, confused — if Viktor hadn't known about Cassius, then how? Oliver had graduated by the time the Tournament happened.

Oliver and Viktor exchanged a look. "Quidditch," they said in unison.

"It's a small world, even internationally," Oliver elaborated. "And remind me, Potter, to catch you when the party starts. I need a word," he added with a pointed look.

Harry wondered if, in this small world of quidditch, Oliver might have heard about the tryout Viktor had arranged for him.

Suddenly, Professor McGonagall appeared at the head of the aisle, beneath the archway threaded with white and gold flowers, and the whole room went hushed. “Please be standing for the entrance of the bride and groom.”

Harry, who had only ever seen muggle weddings on telly but who was sure that wasn’t how it went, stood all the same, Draco’s fingers finding his. Soft music began to play, and the curtain of fabric covering the entrance was lifted.

Bill entered, walking between his mother and father. His dress robes were bright gold, embroidered with runes all around the cuffs and hem, and the Prewett family crest on his left breast. His parents wore darker gold, a similar shade to the twins. When they reached McGonagall, they hugged their son tightly, and moved to sit down. Mrs Weasley was already crying, pulling a handkerchief from her sleeve as she sat.

The music changed, and the curtain was lifted a second time. Harry’s breath caught in his throat.

Fleur did not need a single ounce of her veela charm to have everyone in the room utterly captivated.

Her wedding dress was a gorgeous, form-fitting piece with lace over the shoulders and low back, ending in a long lace train. A silver tiara held her veil in place, sparkling with diamonds, and her silver-blonde hair was loose down her back in a perfect curtain of silk.

Glancing back at Bill, Harry was unsurprised to see the redhead looking absolutely gobsmacked.

Like Bill, she had her mother on one side and her father on the other. Coming up behind her was Gabrielle in a pretty pale gold dress robe, just barely tall enough to be escorted by Charlie, who looked incredibly handsome in identical robes to Fred and George.

Bringing up the rear was Ginny, her robe the same as Gabrielle’s, and beside her—“Percy!”

The quiet gasp blurred from Mrs Weasley, who immediately covered her mouth with her hand. Percy Weasley resolutely did not look in his parents’ direction, stepping perfectly in time with Ginny, all the way up the aisle. When they reached the front, Percy continued to escort Ginny to her seat, making sure he was sat beside her — as far from his parents as possible.

Harry had to hand it to the man; he had balls of steel, making an entrance like that. He wondered how long ago Bill and Percy had planned that.

As Best Man, Charlie stood off to the side while Bill and Fleur faced each other in front of McGonagall.

“Welcome, friends, and thank you for gathering for this wonderful occasion,” McGonagall began, “where we will join these two here in matrimony, by magic and by life, with the full permission and blessing of their family lines. Please, be seated.”

They all sat, the music fading out. Her speech continued, talking a lot about magic and the soul and things that sounded like very traditional wording but went right over Harry's head — the muggle stuff he'd seen was all about God and heaven and stuff, and there was none of that in a magical wedding. He had no idea if what was happening was a standard wedding or not.

He should probably research that, when the war was over. All things considered.

He let the headmistress' words wash over him, reaching for Draco's hand once more and leaning slightly against him, smiling when Draco brought their joined hands up to his lips, pressing a soft kiss to the back of Harry's.

At last, it came to a part that was more familiar to Harry. Bill reverently moved Fleur's veil off her face, properly revealing her shining blue eyes, a few tears already escaping.

"William, please offer your vows," McGonagall prompted. Bill swallowed thickly.

"Fleur Apolline Delacour," he began, voice husky with emotion. "I vow to you my magic and my life, my heart and my home — whatever is mine we shall share, whatever I am is yours to keep. I will share in your joy, and also your sadness. I will walk at your side, in this life and that which comes after. I will hold my duty to our family above all other loyalties — any challenge to you is a challenge to me also, because we are one in spirit and mind."

He paused, swallowing again, wiping quickly at his face in a way that made several people chuckle quietly. "I vow to protect you, to cherish you, and to love you until the last of my magic fades. This I vow by the magic in my blood, so mote it be."

Fleur was definitely crying by now, but her voice didn't waver as she offered her own vows in return.

Then, instead of asking for rings, the couple joined both hands together between them, and McGonagall raised her wand. "These vows have been made by magic, and by magic will they be kept," she declared — gold light shot from her wand, wrapping around Bill and Fleur's joined hands like a thick rope. "We who gather here today do offer our blessings upon this union, and all that follows from it. We offer our witness of their vows, and our magic to aid in their keeping. So mote it be."

"So mote it be," came the murmur of the crowd. As he recited the words, Harry felt a small spark within him, and the gold light around Fleur and Bill flashed even brighter, changing shape; it shrank down, becoming the wedding rings on their fingers, bright gold and glimmering in the light.

"Lord William Arthur Weasley, and Fleur Apolline Delacour, by the will of Magic I pronounce you wed," McGonagall said, finally breaking into a smile as Bill cupped Fleur's face and kissed her. The whole tent broke out into applause, the twins wolf-whistling in loud unison when the kiss just kept on going.

Finally they parted, and Bill offered his new wife his arm. Draco nudged Harry into standing and once all the guests were out of their seats, the pair began their journey down the aisle.

Wands were raised, shooting gold and silver sparks over the pair as they walked. Harry couldn't stop the smile taking over his face — Bill and Fleur both looked so happy.

He glanced to Draco, catching a suspicious glimmer in the blond's eye. "Are you crying?" he murmured, leaning in close to be heard over all the cheering. Draco glared at him, wiping at his eyes.

"It's not a crime to cry at weddings," he muttered petulantly. Harry chuckled and kissed his cheek.

"No, but it is very cute," he informed him. Draco blushed. "So what happens now?"

"Now we go outside, probably pose for some pictures, while the house elves move things around for the party in here," Draco said, following Viktor out of the aisle. At the front of the tent, Mrs Weasley had finally made her way to Percy, and Harry could hear snippets of her talking — he couldn't tell if she was scolding her son or apologising to him, not through all the crying.

He wisely decided it was none of his business, and let his boyfriend lead him out onto the lawn.

Harry was surprised to see Colin Creevey out there with his camera, wearing a muggle tux that was very likely transfigured. He grinned at Harry, holding the camera up in a gesture, then turned back to Bill and Fleur — the pair were stood arm in arm, looking like a true fairytale couple, smiling like they had never been happier in their lives.

Harry found himself stood with Draco, Remus and Narcissa, while the group spread out a bit. Sirius had gone off to go and paw at Charlie in his dress robes.

"So that's a magical wedding then, is it?" Harry remarked, looking at the gathered crowd. Perhaps thirty of them in all; still a decent turnout for such a last minute decision.

"Pretty much," Remus said. "Obviously they vary from case to case. Bill and Fleur kept it fairly simple; often there's a bit more pomp and circumstance, and sometimes even a ritual in the really old-fashioned pureblood ones."

"Just some runes on the hands and drinking from the same cup," Narcissa added, seeing the slightly perturbed look on Harry's face. "Nothing unseemly."

"Wonder how different Cass and Ollie's will be," Harry mused, looking over at the couple who were chatting away with Viktor.

"Oi, Harry!" He turned around at the call, seeing Bill looking at him expectantly. He was already surrounded by his siblings and parents, a beacon of red hair and gold cloth, Fleur's white dress standing out in the very centre. "Family picture," Bill urged. Harry stared at him blankly — yes, that was indeed a picture of them all, what was his point?

George huffed, rolling his eyes. "Get over here, you clot!" he called, gesturing to a space in beside him and Ginny. "Every sibling counts, even the not-ginger ones!"

Several people snickered, and Draco pushed Harry forward until he was stumbling dazedly towards the group. “I— really?” he asked at Bill, still hesitant. Bill’s grin widened.

“Yes, now hurry up before the twins start hexing eyebrows.”

Ginny grabbed Harry, situating him properly in the midst of the family, and George elbowed him gently in the side. “Told you, little brother,” he said under his breath. “Stuck with us forever. Now smile and look pretty.”

Harry faced Colin’s camera, and beamed.

..

After the photos, they were allowed back into the tent, which had transformed into an elegant ballroom. A magical record player was set up in the corner with a stack of records waiting beside it, and tables laden with drinks and food lined the sides, leaving plenty of room for a dance floor in the middle. Smaller round tables were dotted about as well, with chairs tucked under them in case not everyone wanted to dance.

They had all eaten lunch at the castle, so there was no formal wedding meal; just finger-foods, and of course the cake, which was a masterpiece of a dessert — three-tiered and decorated with delicate white chocolate feathers, no doubt as a nod to Fleur’s veela heritage.

Bill and Fleur moved to the centre of the dance floor, and after a thumbs up from his big brother, Charlie set the first record on the player.

Harry didn’t recognise the song, but he wasn’t paying much attention to it anyway; the happy couple swayed in each others’ arms, whispering to themselves and smiling soppily. It made Harry’s chest ache in the best of ways, watching them like that.

Arms looped around his waist, pulling him back against a familiar chest, the spicy-sweet smell of Draco’s aftershave tickling his nose as the blond rested his head against Harry’s, body just barely swaying to the rhythm of the music. One by one, couples began to join Bill and Fleur on the dance floor; the Delacours, Mr and Mrs Weasley, Sirius and Charlie, Ginny and Neville. Draco kissed his cheek, then stepped away, offering his hand with a bow.
“Dance with me?” he asked, grey eyes shining.

Harry was more than happy to oblige, accompanying his love to the dance floor.

The music didn’t stay slow for long, moving effortlessly between wizarding and muggle music, throwing in a slower song every now and then to ease things off. Harry was more than happy to dance with Draco — and with plenty of others who offered.

When he danced with Fleur, she was practically glowing with joy. “Thank you,” she said earnestly. “Had I not met you, Harry, I would never have found my Bill. I owe all this happiness to you.”

“I’m just glad that you’re happy,” he told her, kissing her cheek. “And I know he’s my brother, but feel free to call me if he ever needs his arse kicked.”

She laughed, the sound ringing out over the music and the chatter like a chorus of bells. “I will keep that in mind.”

Later, when the sun was beginning to set and the twins were making noises about fireworks, Harry stood with Sirius, who had miraculously removed himself from Charlie for a while. They were watching Draco dance with his mother, two elegant blondes in a sea of fiery red hair.

“You made a plan on that, yet?” Sirius asked in a low voice, insinuation clear.

“Not yet.” Nothing concrete, anyway. He had the ring and a few vague ideas, but he also had other priorities. Then, louder, “I wonder who’s going to end up with the next one. Other than Cass and Ollie of course.” The pair were dancing, too, lost in their own little world. Oliver had already cornered Harry to talk about the England team, saying that he was almost definitely secured as the Scottish team keeper and Harry had better work his arse off in his tryouts so they could give Scotland a proper challenge.

“Certainly a lot of couples to choose from,” Fred remarked, appearing out of nowhere with Angelina on his arm. “Not us, though. Wild and free for a few more years, right, Angie?” he teased. She laughed.

“That’s right. Got to make absolutely sure I’m willing to throw my lot in with this lunatic for the rest of my life.” Fred feigned being wounded.

Harry lit up as Draco and Narcissa finished their dance and Draco glanced over to him, Narcissa claiming Remus for a turn about the floor.

“The rate things are going, you’d better be thinking about it, y’know,” Fred said, elbowing Sirius with a leer. “Make an honest man of our Charlie before you start adopting little’uns.”

Sirius blushed, though he was smiling. “Don’t go getting ahead of yourselves, now,” he insisted, as he always did when the subject of the Forrester kids was brought up.

Draco wound an arm around Harry’s hips, greeting him with a kiss to the cheek.

“I’d put a fair bet on these two,” Angelina piped up, staring pointedly at Harry and Draco. Harry felt his cheeks burn hot.

“Fair bet for what?” Draco asked, having missed the start of the conversation.

“Fair bet for the next wedding, not counting Ollie and Cass,” Fred elaborated. Harry tried not to tense in Draco’s arms as the Slytherin blinked in surprise.

“I’m certainly not getting married until after I’m graduated,” came Draco’s immediate response. Oblivious to the mild panic rising in Harry, he continued. “So I’d save your money, because that’s at least a year and knowing some of these lovestruck fools I highly doubt they’ll hold out any longer than that.”

The conversation paused when George came to fetch Fred for ‘twin reasons’, the two of them disappearing with identical mischievous grins.

Harry turned in Draco's arms, offering a somewhat stilted smile. "At least a year, hmm?" he asked in an undertone, raising an eyebrow.

"No marriage before we're eighteen," he said imperiously. Then he softened, gaze growing tentative. "Engagement, however, is a little more flexible."

For one heart-stopping moment, Harry wondered if his boyfriend was onto him.

"Mother might possibly kill me if I propose at school where she can't properly shriek about it, though, so there's that to keep in mind."

Trying not to relax visibly, Harry held Draco close. "Good to know," he murmured.

Draco thought he would be the one to propose, did he?

Harry would have to see about that.

Chapter 103

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

If Harry hadn't known better, he would not have realised Hogwarts was supposed to be a school, in the days that followed. The wedding seemed to be the last grasp of lightheartedness in the face of war — once that was out of the way, giving everyone the Sunday to bask in their happiness, it was all business.

Harry felt like a military general, organising training groups depending on ability — intermixing the HA with the adults, letting them learn from each other, making sure everyone was aware of the others' skill level. Now was not the time for a grown adult to get embarrassed by a fifteen year-old casting a better Shield charm than them, only the time to improve it before it really mattered.

He had Sirius and Remus around to help, making sure he took time to eat and sleep and get some time away from it all when he could. Draco helped, too, but he had his own matters to deal with, splitting his time between duelling with the rest and helping Madam Pomfrey prepare the Hospital Wing for all eventualities.

Every day, more and more people showed up — either for safe refuge from the war, or to lend their wands to the fight, People Harry had never met, people he wasn't sure he could even trust, but luckily the adults around him usually knew enough to get a good measure of them. The teachers especially; between McGonagall and Slughorn, they had memories of just about every British wixen of a certain magical ability for the last sixty years.

Of course, as had been proven many times over, looks could be deceiving. But they just didn't have the capacity to properly vet every single person who came to Hogwarts.

The guilt from expelling those six teenagers still hung heavy in McGonagall's shoulders. They didn't want to risk condemning people to Voldemort's clutches. And, quite frankly, they needed every capable wand they could get.

The only place Harry could truly be alone anymore was the Chamber of Secrets. He still had his training sessions with Snape down there — often with Draco joining them these days, both boys pushing themselves ever harder — but Salazar's office was a quiet, solitary retreat that he desperately needed by the latter half of July.

"What if he doesn't come?" he asked plaintively, stretched out on the sofa and staring up at the portrait of the founder. "Snape says he's recovered from the attack on the wards, but what if he decides it's not worth the risk and decides to lure me out instead?" It was all well and good preparing for a fight at Hogwarts, but Voldemort may not want to meet them on their terms.

"Then you beat him to it and lure him here," Salazar said immediately. "Honestly, lad; you're a Slytherin, now act like one. There's ways to get a man like that to dance to your tune — especially as mad as he is now.”

“I suppose.” Most of the new arrivals to the castle were those here for safety, so their numbers for the fight hadn’t swelled that dramatically. Even with any spies in the castle reporting on their training progress — Harry wasn’t so naive to think Snape was the only Death Eater still around — Voldemort would likely be arrogant enough to think his sheer numbers could win it for him. Especially if the rumours were true, and he had the dementors on his side.

If Harry could give him enough of a reason to come here, enough of a reason to think he’d win...

“I’ll have to think on it, see how things go.” If Snape didn’t start hearing word of movement soon, Harry would have to take matters into his own hands.

His throat went dry at the thought of what came after. The battle itself. Him versus Voldemort — an entirely different animal to fighting Death Eaters. Most of Voldemort’s Old Guard, his original best duellers, had died either of age or battle; his current army were younger and inexperienced, and not all as dedicated to the cause as their predecessors were. He could handle Death Eaters.

Voldemort, however, had fifty years on Harry and knew more magic than Harry could even dream of knowing. Had done all sorts of rituals to strengthen himself, to expand his power, to draw magic from his Marked followers in times of need.

“I don’t know if I’m strong enough,” he admitted in a rasping whisper; words he had not said out loud to another living being, not even Draco. Words that lingered in the back of his mind at all times, reared up in his darkest moments of doubt.

“Look at me, lad,” Salazar said firmly. Harry did so. The founder was steel-eyed, his snake draped over his shoulders. “You are a Slytherin,” he hissed in Parseltongue, repeating his earlier words. “You have the ancient blood of several strong families running through your veins, and when you are ready, the magic in that blood will rise to assist you. You are the most powerful young man I have seen in a very long time — you are dedicated, and talented, and you have far too much to live for. That filth is a stain on my lineage, with a shattered soul and magic so foul the family rejected him entirely. He is a shadow of a man, with false power and little sanity to speak of. You are already at an advantage.” He didn’t blink, and Harry didn’t either, not daring to look away as the founder spoke so vehemently. “Trust your magic, Harry Potter. It will not fail you. And you will not fail your family.” He leaned back in his chair, smirking. “Do you understand?”

Harry nodded, drawing his shoulders up, feeling Salazar’s faith settle something in his soul. “You know the spell I taught you. And you know damn well that he’s going to be too busy gloating to see you as a legitimate threat. Don’t let that ridiculous Gryffindor nobility make you wait to take him in a fair fight — find your opportunity, and take it,” Salazar instructed, looking down his regal nose at the boy. “I finally have an heir I actually like, and you have promised me you will help restore my legacy. I expect you to keep that promise.”

Slowly, a smile crept across Harry’s features. “Yes, sir.”

Find his opportunity, and take it. He could do that.

He hoped.

.-. .

Technically, Luna wasn't supposed to be in the Ravenclaw dormitories. As an underage student, she was supposed to be down in Hufflepuff, safely tucked away in case of invasion.

But, much like Ginny, Luna wasn't going to listen to anyone telling her where she was supposed to be.

No one could keep Lady Ravenclaw out of her own damn tower.

She lay on her bed, in the dorm that she and Daphne shared with Susan, Hannah and the Patil twins, her eyes closed against the cloud of colours and shapes in her vision. Gentle hands massaged her temples, and while it felt very nice, it wasn't doing much to help the problem.

Nothing but time would help this particular headache. The future was so fraught, the paths ahead so numerous and so uncertain... Luna was usually pretty good at not getting overwhelmed by the wrackspurts, but right now she was drowning in them.

"Will a potion help?" Daphne fretted, kissing her brow. "Or, hell, a cup of tea? Burning some incense? What's all that stuff Trelawney uses to clear her inner eye?"

Luna giggled, letting her eyes flutter open to look at her girlfriend in the dim light of the room. Daphne had blacked out the windows for her, conjuring a ball of soft silver light overhead instead. Daphne was so sweet to her, so attentive. She didn't treat Luna's Seeing like it was some oddity or fun quirk.

"I don't need any of that," she assured softly. "Though I could go for some ice cream. Pistachio sounds nice."

Daphne's lips turned up at the corners. "Luna, honey, I don't think that's going to help your Sight."

"No, but it'll make me feel better," Luna said brightly. With the castle so in tune to her, the elves always listening, she barely had to think it before a bowl of pistachio ice cream was on the nightstand. "Thank you," she murmured, feeling the wards brighten in response. Hogwarts was such a friendly thing, so welcoming to its students, so eager to please. Now the wards had been cleared, the whole castle felt like one big hug.

She sat up carefully, reaching for her ice cream, shuffling over so Daphne could squeeze in beside her in the narrow bed. Daphne's chin tucked against her shoulder, her body a warm line against Luna's.

"I'm worried about you. About how clouded things are for you. I... what does that mean?" Daphne asked, voice barely louder than a whisper. "Does it mean we won't win?"

"Even in the shadows, I don't see darkness looming that large." Of course, that could mean any number of things. But Luna liked to think it meant that Voldemort would fall, somehow, when the battle came. "What worries me more is who we might lose along the way." Every dream was the same, yet every dream was different. A thousand permutations of possible events, endless tiny actions that could sway things one way or another, knock little choices into bigger ones into even bigger ones that had the whole thing falling apart. She had seen all her friends die in a hundred ways, by now. Seen herself die more than a few times. At this point, she wasn't sure what was Seeing and what was her own nightmares. Her dreams were never trustworthy — it was the Seeing she did while awake that mattered most, but that Sight was frustratingly murky these days.

"Are..." Daphne's heavy sigh brushed Luna's neck. "Are there any futures where we all make it out alive? Everyone we care about?"

"Yes," Luna replied, eating a spoonful of ice cream. The cold helped clear things, a little bit, but mostly she just liked the flavour. "Not many, but some." She hadn't Seen a future in which nobody on their side died, but she had Seen ones in which the only deaths were people who weren't attached to her.

"Focus on those ones, then," Daphne urged softly, squeezing Luna's hand. "Try and See those ones. Maybe then, they'll come true."

That wasn't how that worked and they both knew it, and even to try felt enormously selfish — those deaths might not be her loved ones, but they were someone's loved ones, someone's family — but Luna closed her eyes and leaned against her girlfriend and tried not to let the weight of the future carry her away, and she imagined those futures. Imagined the warmth and light and laughter that came with all her friends, all her family, making it through these next few weeks.

She ate another spoonful of ice cream, and offered the next to Daphne. Felt her girlfriend's warmth, her heartbeat, her magic twining lazily with Luna's own. Felt her love, so clear, so strong Luna could hardly stand it.

It was hard, for a Seer, to live in the now. But it was much, much easier with Daphne by her side.

.-. .

The HA was training, once again. Though Harry couldn't really call it a HA session anymore — it had expanded to include far more than just his group of rebellious Hogwarts students, now.

The whole Great Hall was full of people, spellfire flashing all over the room. Harry was glad he wasn't the only one roaming the groups to keep an eye on things; Kingsley and Tonks, as the only qualified aurors in their little group, were doing the same. It still baffled Harry that these people put him, a boy who wasn't even seventeen yet, on the same level of authority as someone like Kingsley Shacklebolt.

Harry was just considering calling an end to the mock-duels, when suddenly someone screamed. Immediately, everything stopped, and the problem became clear — Hannah Abbott was on the ground, screaming in pain, while her duelling partner stood chalk-faced and horrified. “What happened?” Harry asked, dropping to his knees at Hannah’s side. “Draco!” He called for the blond, the only person in the room he knew had any kind of healing experience. Draco was at his side in a flash, wand already scanning Hannah’s prone form.

“I don’t know!” her duelling partner, a middle-aged man who Harry was pretty sure was the father of some Ravenclaw third year, exclaimed in fear. “It wasn’t my spell — I used a Freezing hex on the floor, trying to slip her up. Something hit from the side and she just went down! I swear, I didn’t hurt her!” He looked so terrified at the prospect, Harry shook his head in assurance.

“I believe you.” He looked back to Draco, whose face was set in concentration.

“Bone-Melting curse,” the Slytherin gritted out. “Get Pomfrey.”

The blood drained from Harry’s face. That was not a spell he expected to be used in a group like this.

He turned, raising his wand, but Kingsley’s hand came down on his shoulder. “I already sent for her,” he assured. As if in answer, the mediwitch appeared suddenly, an elf at her side. She took in the scene quickly, dropping down beside Draco to get to work, both of them muttering spells over Hannah as the blonde girl clenched her jaw in an attempt not to scream.

Harry tore his eyes away from her, looking back up at the rest of the group with fury burning in his eyes. “Did anyone see who did this?” he roared, gesturing to his friend on the stone floor. “Who used that curse in here, in training?”

No one moved. No one answered.

“I... it had to be an accident, right?” Lavender piped up hesitantly. “Otherwise the new wards would have reacted. Like you said they did with Fay and the others. They read intention.”

“The wards are lax around here while we’re training.” It was Neville who answered, voice hollow. “There’s too many people, too many offensive spells going on — it’s almost impossible to tell what’s self-defence and what’s not. Making a mistake on that judgement and freezing someone mid-duel could lead to more harm than good.”

Everyone looked around uneasily. Still, no one owned up to casting the curse.

“I can only assume,” said Harry in a tight, harsh voice, “that this silence means this was an attack, not an accident.” He stared at the group at large, eyes burning Avada Kedavra green. Several people flinched. “Whichever one of you did this, don’t think you’re safe. There are ways of finding out what happened.” He took a steady breath before his temper could get the better of him. “Go. We’re done for today.”

They didn’t need telling twice. As the rush began to leave the hall, chatter rising, Harry turned back to the two healers. “How is she?” Fear churned in his stomach — the Bone-

Melting curse could be fatal, if not reversed immediately.

Draco sat back on his heels, looking exhausted. "She'll live," he said. Behind him, Harry heard someone let out a sharp, relieved breath. "I... I don't know what state she'll be in. How well she'll recover. But she'll live."

"We'll move her up to the Hospital Wing, get some Skele-Gro in her," Pomfrey declared, conjuring a stretcher and carefully levitating Hannah onto it. The Hufflepuff was unconscious now, her face frighteningly pale. "Time will tell how she responds to it."

A whimper, and Harry glanced over his shoulder; it was Ernie, looking at his girlfriend with watery blue eyes. "I— what can I do?" he asked, taking a hesitant step forward.

"You may come with me, Mr Macmillan," Pomfrey told him gently. "I do not know when Miss Abbott will awaken, but I'm sure she'd appreciate a familiar face when she does."

Ernie nodded, falling into step behind Pomfrey and Draco with the stretcher, heading out of the hall.

It was only Harry, Neville and the two aurors remaining, now. Neville looked especially grim. "I don't think it's a coincidence that it was Hannah who got hit," he declared, voicing the words that were rattling in Harry's mind. "Seems a bit suspicious that out of everyone in this hall, that curse hit one of the four people connected to the castle wards."

"They always think Hufflepuffs are the weakest," Tonks muttered, scowling.

"I was facing that area, but I didn't see who the curse came from," Kingsley admitted.

"Could you pull a memory?" Harry asked, brain whirring. "I have a pensieve."

The auror perked up. "It's worth a shot."

The Potter family pensieve was down in Snape's quarters, where they'd been using it to go through his memories of Death Eater meetings in the hopes of identifying any potential spies within the castle. It was a good thing Neville had been let in on the secret when Harry had been kidnapped, or he would have been incredibly surprised when Harry stepped up to the statue guarding Snape's rooms and gave her the password.

"I heard about what happened," Snape said in greeting; he was sat on the sofa, with the pensieve already on the coffee table. "I thought you might be on your way."

Ignoring Neville's trepidation at being in his feared professor's personal rooms, Harry walked over to the stone bowl, raising an eyebrow at Kingsley. It was the work of only a few moments for the broad-shouldered man to raise his wand to his temple, extracting a strand of silver memory and dropping it into the pensieve. All five of them gathered around it, and in unison they put their hands in the liquid.

Immediately, Harry was right back in the Great Hall, stood beside the memory version of Kingsley and watching the training duels at work. "Spread out," Kingsley instructed. "The spell came from somewhere behind her."

Harry hurried over to memory-Hannah to get a better look, trying not to instinctively duck at spells that could not hurt him. It was weird, walking right into the middle of a battle like that, and it set him on edge.

He looked around, noting the faces of all the people within range to potentially hit Hannah from behind, annoyed by how many he barely recognised. What if it was one of the newcomers? What if they had let a Death Eater into the castle in their attempts to offer a safe haven?

What if that Death Eater cost Hannah her life?

“I saw it!” The shout came from Neville, and Harry whirled around, seeing the horror on his friend’s face. “I saw the spell,” Neville stuttered, aghast. “It— it came from Terry Boot.”

“What?” Harry gasped, the word almost lost in the sound of Hannah’s screaming. He hurried over to Neville. “Are you sure?”

“Positive,” Neville insisted, stony-eyed. “Terry was duelling with Charlie, and he cast a flash-bang to distract him, then shot the Bone-Melting curse at Hannah. I saw it.”

“Which one’s Terry Boot?” Kingsley asked, “that’s not a name I’m familiar with.”

“This one,” Snape answered, stood by memory-Terry in the crowd around Hannah, glaring disparagingly at the boy. Terry was remarkably blank-faced — someone else might excuse it as shock at what happened to his yearmate, but they knew better, now. He was trying not to give himself away.

“A student?” Tonks exclaimed in shock. “Are you serious?”

“It was him,” Neville said again. “Watch the memory back again if you don’t believe me.”

They did, exiting the pensieve and re-entering at the beginning of the memory. All five of them went straight to Terry, studying him closely — sure enough, it happened exactly as Neville said. Terry half-blinded Charlie with a flash-bang, and while the redhead was blinking the spots from his vision he locked his eyes on Hannah, murmuring the curse under his breath. Harry couldn’t help the shudder that racked him as the vibrant yellow spell hit Hannah right in the small of her back, her scream ringing in his ears for a third time now.

He was going to hear that sound in his sleep, he was sure of it.

“Well, then,” Kingsley muttered, once they were back in Snape’s living room. “What do we do with the boy?”

“I have a small supply of Veritaserum,” Snape offered coolly. “You are welcome to it, should you need to confirm his guilt verbally. I recommend asking for the names of his accomplices — I was not aware of Boot’s... connection to the Dark Lord, nor do I know of anyone else in the castle who may be suspect.” His frown deepened. “At this point, I believe they’re here to spy on me just as much as they are Potter. Making sure I’m doing my duty,” he snarled. Harry scowled.

"Will it be a problem for you, if we kick them out?" he worried. The last thing he wanted was Boot and his allies going back to Voldemort and insisting that Snape was no longer loyal.

The Potions Master's face was drawn as he looked at Harry. "I cannot say for sure, but I doubt it. If they had the evidence to condemn me, they likely would have done it by now."

"We'll ask Horace for Veritaserum," Kingsley suggested. "If he doesn't have any, we'll tell him to pretend yours came from him. Save you having to explain why you didn't sabotage it so that Boot could cover his arse."

Snape gave a curt nod. "Thank you."

Kingsley turned to the two Gryffindor boys. "Can you find Amelia? She'll need to be involved in this."

Harry closed his eyes, reaching out to the wards in search of the familiar magical signature of Amelia Bones. It ached, connecting to Hogwarts' magic while it was aiding Hannah. A searing pain at the base of his spine — merely an echo of what his friend was feeling.

"She's in the Hospital Wing," Neville said, coming to the conclusion the same time as Harry. "I guess she heard what happened." Amelia hadn't been at the training session, as she was in a meeting with McGonagall elsewhere about things that weren't Harry's business to know.

"Right, then. Off we go," Tonks declared. "Then we can find this Boot kid."

Snape didn't come with them up to the Hospital Wing, but when they arrived they found a cluster of people around Hannah's bed. The girl was still unconscious, spelled rigid in the bed while Pomfrey's potions and spells did their best to repair the damage.

"What did you find?" Susan pressed, rushing over to Harry. "You know who did it, right? Who hurt Hannah?" She had puffy red eyes and tear-tracks down her cheeks, and Harry had to swallow the lump in his throat that formed.

"It was Terry, Sooz. Terry Boot."

There was a beat of silence. Then, Ernie swore. "That filthy little— we trusted him! He was Hannah's friend, he... we've known each other since we were eleven!" He looked absolutely wrecked, his hands clenched around the rail at the foot of Hannah's bed. Harry's heart twisted in sympathy.

"I know," he murmured. "But it was him." He looked back to Amelia. "We confirmed through pensieve memory. Kingsley's memory," he explained. "I... we don't know how to proceed."

There was the sound of a throat being cleared, and they all turned around to see Horace Slughorn tentatively approaching. There was a vial of clear fluid in his hand. "I— excuse me, but I was asked to bring this to you, Amelia, dear." He held the vial out to her. "I always keep some tucked away — for emergencies, you know. Especially in these difficult times." A quick, humourless smile flitted beneath his bristly moustache. “I understand the culprit has been identified. I... let me know if you need more, won’t you?”

Slughorn folded the vial into her palm, patting her closed fingers gently. Then he cast sad eyes in Hannah’s direction. “If there’s anything I can do to help the poor girl — more Skele-Gro, or— I have contacts at St Mungo’s. If it’s safe to send her over. Just... whatever you need, don’t hesitate to ask.”

The ageing Potions Master gave a helpless little shrug, then quietly left the Hospital Wing.

Harry didn’t argue when Amelia took Kingsley and Tonks to go find Terry for questioning. He may be somewhat of a leader in this rag-tag rebellion they had pulled together, but in any other circumstances this would be a Ministry matter, and he was still just a student.

More than that, Harry didn’t want to watch Terry’s questioning. He didn’t want to sit there and listen to a boy he’d shared classes with for six years declare his allegiance to the man who was trying to destroy everything he held dear. He didn’t want to hear who else was involved, or what Terry had been asked to do by Voldemort. He would find out the details sooner or later.

He already had so many burdens on his shoulders by the very nature of this war. He didn’t want to add another.

A thin-fingered hand slipped into his, and he blinked away his dark thoughts, meeting concerned grey eyes. Draco led him over to a quiet corner, away from Susan and Ernie’s quiet vigil at Hannah’s side.

“How is she really?” Harry asked, keeping his voice low. Draco sighed.

“It’s bad,” he admitted. Harry’s stomach sank. “I’ve only read about this curse — I knew the counter, but I’d never done it. And the time it took me to identify it... it hit her right in the spine. The curse got halfway to her shoulders and down through most of her pelvis before Pomfrey and I could stop it.” He was stark white, hand clenching tight around Harry’s. Bile rose in Harry’s throat — that was a lot of bone to be damaged.

“But... it can be grown back, right? Once the dark magic is filtered out?” He only knew bits and pieces of healing theory from listening to Draco, but he knew that the thing that made dark curses so dangerous wasn’t the effect itself, but the dark magic that lingered in the affected area and prevented healing. That had to be dealt with before anything could truly be fixed.

“We got her stabilised,” Draco said. “Poppy’s said we’ll get Uncle Sev up here to help — he knows dark magic scrubbing far better than I do. The Skele-Gro won’t set while it’s still a cursed injury, but it’ll grow enough to keep everything in place. We hope.” He swallowed tightly. “She... Hannah probably won’t be able to walk again. It’s possible, of course, with time and therapy and the right course of potions. It would be more possible if we could get a specialist from St Mungo’s out to see her, but... this is what we’ve got.” The tense line of his shoulders crumpled, ever so slightly. “Harry, if I’d just been faster, if I’d—“

Harry cut him off, pulling the blond into a tight hug. “Don’t even,” he scolded. “You did everything you could, Draco. Fuck, you probably saved Hannah’s life. Pomfrey was quick but even that short space of time...” The curse could have made it to Hannah’s knees and shoulder blades by then. “You did amazingly, sweetheart. You’re not a healer yet, you’re not even in training for it! And yet you identified the curse and stopped it in under a minute!” He pulled back, cupping Draco’s face. “That’s incredible. You’re incredible. And I won’t have you blaming yourself for any of this. Pretty sure Hannah would kick your arse if she heard you trying.”

That earned a flicker of a smile. After a beat, Harry ran his own words back in his mind. “Hell, is that what it’s like for you when I get on my saving-people bullshit?” He made a face, and Draco chuckled.

“Pretty much, yeah,” he confirmed.

“Oh. Well. Sorry.” No wonder it annoyed everyone so much when Harry did it. He couldn’t stand Draco putting himself down when he’d already done so much good!

He wrapped his arms around his boyfriend again, looking over at Hannah’s bed, at Susan and Ernie clutching each other because Hannah’s state was too delicate for either of them to hold her hand.

Harry was so ready for this battle to be over.

..

There was a meeting, that evening. It couldn’t really be called an Order meeting, since those who had once been part of the Order had since eschewed Dumbledore and all that he stood for — the existing Order were out there, somewhere, perhaps with the ex-headmaster but perhaps not. Either way, they hadn’t shown up to fight, and that said it all.

But it was everyone who Harry associated with the Order, plus a few extras; himself and Neville and Luna, whom the adults had kicked up a fuss about but were promptly reminded of why the attack had targeted Hannah. Amelia and Narcissa, both women glaring fiercely at anyone who dared question their inclusion. Professors Flitwick and Sprout — and McGonagall of course — wan-faced at the two very different but awful fates of their charges.

“For anyone who is unaware, Terry Boot has been confirmed under Veritaserum as a supporter of Lord Voldemort, though he does not yet have the Dark Mark,” Kingsley declared in the tense silence of McGonagall’s office. “He admitted that he intentionally cast the Bone-Melting curse at Miss Abbott, with the intent to kill her. Apparently, he was under orders to weaken the new school wards however possible, and believed that killing one of the heirs — especially the only one who is currently of age — would sever the connection. The founders’ lines are linked, after all.”

“Cut down one of us, cut us all off,” Neville murmured, grimacing.

“Who else?” Harry asked flatly. “Who else in this castle is working for him.”

"Boot had only a few names to share," Amelia said. "Severus Snape was the first. But we knew that," she added, giving a pointed glare at several people who turned dark gazes on the Potions Master. Snape, to his credit, did not flinch under their accusations. "He named three more students — two seventh years and his dorm mate Kevin Entwhistle. Along with four of the adults supposedly seeking refuge here. They have all been apprehended, and are under guard in the Potions classroom."

Eight people. Out of the hundred and fifty odd staying in the castle — about half of whom were either underage students or non-combatant adults — it was more than Harry would have liked to hear, but honestly less than he had expected.

"What if there are more he doesn't know about?" Bill piped up, brow furrowed. "We know from Severus' reports that You-Know-Who isn't sharing all his plans with all his followers. There could be even more."

"How much Veritaserum have we got?" Fred added. "We'll just question everyone, weed them out!"

Several people nodded in agreement around the table, but Kingsley shook his head.

"Something like that would need to be public, and we all know who everyone would want to be the first under questioning." His eyes landed on Severus, who again remained straight-backed and unflinching. "We cannot risk it."

"Why not?" Emmeline Vance pressed. She was one of the few Order members who had broken away from Dumbledore without hearing the truth of things from Harry. "If we question Snape under Veritaserum, all he'll do is admit to being a spy for the Light. It breaks his cover, but we can keep him protected here." Her face twisted in an ugly sneer. "Unless you think he'll say what we all suspect and admit he's only ever been the Dark Lord's man. Then good fucking riddance to him."

Harry wished he could jump to the man's defence, but they still had to maintain cover, even in this group of trusted individuals. There were Order members Harry didn't trust as far as he could throw them.

Luckily, McGonagall wasn't having any of it. "Severus Snape is not the one under suspicion here," she snapped. "He is a valued member of this group, and I daresay he's done more for the Light than you have lately, Miss Vance." Turning back to the rest of the group, she clasped her hands together. "Kingsley is right — we cannot afford to have Severus questioned in front of witnesses. They may misconstrue things."

"Surely the point is moot?" George said, looking askance at Snape. "Unless we plan on keeping Boot and his buddies locked in the castle until things are over — which I am entirely in favour of, by the way — they'll run back to their Master and tell him that they were forced to reveal Snape's supposed loyalty. He'll have to go back regardless, won't he?"

Fear gripped Harry's chest at the idea of Snape having to return to Voldemort's side so close to the end.

“The Dark Lord believes that I am a double-agent for him; he believes that I have fooled you into thinking I have repented my Dark ways and have offered myself as a spy, feeding you only the information he gives me,” Snape declared curtly. Looking around the room, it was clear Voldemort wasn’t the only one who believed such a thing. “If Boot goes back and admits he named me, the Dark Lord will just believe that I have convinced you of my innocence despite the accusations. However, if you question me in front of the entire population of Hogwarts and I am forced to reveal my true loyalties, you will be signing my death warrant.”

“Yeah, because we’ll kill you ourselves when you confess you’re a loyal Death Eater,” someone muttered, though Harry wasn’t sure who. It might have been Sirius, keeping up appearances.

“No, because when word reaches the Dark Lord that I am not as loyal to him as he thought, he will drain the very magic and life from me through my Dark Mark,” Snape retorted icily. “There is nowhere I can hide from him, not with this connection. Breaking my cover and keeping me in the castle will not protect me.”

“Moreover,” Amelia interrupted loudly, before a proper argument could brew. “It is completely unethical — not to mention illegal — to question that many people under Veritaserum without due cause. There’s a reason it’s such a tightly controlled substance.”

“It’s not like they’re going to arrest you for it or anything, though, is it?” Fred reasoned with a shrug. Amelia looked distinctly unimpressed.

“Not at this moment, but if we have any hope of building a competent government once this is all over, the public need to know that we are not the kind of people who throw away our morals in times of conflict,” she pointed out, steely-eyed as she surveyed the group. “The Ministry may be in tatters, but I will still uphold its values the best I can while we work to save it. We aren’t questioning anyone else. The only decision that needs to be made tonight is what to do with those Boot named.”

The conversation turned to that, and Harry thought he saw Snape relax, ever so slightly. Beside Harry, Remus ran a hand through his hair, and pressed his shoulder a little heavier against his pseudo-godson’s.

Harry couldn’t imagine being Snape, having to weather such accusations regularly, having to actively cultivate suspicion around himself. He would be glad when it was all over, and the masks could be dropped. Even if that kind of distrust wouldn’t go away overnight.

Harry was fully prepared to defend Severus Snape to the death. The man was family, after all.

. . .

It was decided that keeping eight Death Eaters under guard in the castle was too risky; they didn’t have the manpower to keep them watched carefully, and with Hannah Abbott in such a precarious state none of the three remaining heirs wanted to divert the wards into keeping them captive. The girl had awoken three days after the accident, but she still could not move.

However, it was also decided that they couldn't kill them in cold blood. Nor did they have anywhere to imprison them. So the only other option was to snap their wands and send them away from the castle.

It was a risk, the potential of facing them on the battlefield shortly, but it was all they could do. Not everyone was happy with the decision, but they didn't have time to keep arguing it out.

Kingsley wasn't entirely thrilled with the decision either, but it was the best one they had. There was no sending people to Azkaban, not these days.

Ever since the attack, the atmosphere had changed within the castle. No longer was there a sense of tentative camaraderie, of banding together in the same rebellion. Mealtimes in the Great Hall were no longer cheerful, good-humoured gatherings with everyone trying to make the best of things and reach out to their fellows.

People kept to themselves, to their families and close friends. Meals were quiet, groups sat around in clusters with their heads bowed, occasionally sending suspicious glances across the hall at someone or another. Usually at Severus, if he was around, but plenty of others were seemingly suspect to their peers as well. Old school grudges, or workplace arguments, petty squabbles rising to the surface as accusations of treachery. From talking to Harry, Kingsley knew the castle wards were regularly freezing people to break up fights. Almost like Hogwarts was trying to make up for what happened to one of its heirs.

They didn't have group training sessions in the hall, anymore. Not like before — duels were conducted one at a time, under heavy shields and tight surveillance. It was slower, but it was safer.

The HA, Harry's little militia group, were hit hardest of all. Both as friends of Hannah Abbott, and as ex-friends of Terry Boot. He and the other one, the Entwhistle boy, had been members from the beginning, Kingsley knew. He had been one of them, trusted and cared for. And he had still turned away.

That was the true power of the Dark Lord — not his magical strength, but his ability to twist peoples' minds and desires until they turned on their own friends under the firm belief that it was the best way forward.

Kingsley did his best to keep things under control. Between strategy meetings and training supervision and all the minutiae that came with organising a rebellion, he tried to maintain structure and authority. Most of the adults listened to him, familiar with his long auror career.

Most of the students did not, but he left those brats to Harry. He was the only one they ever seemed to obey.

They were a week shy of Harry's seventeenth birthday, and something would need to change soon. Waiting would not serve them well for much longer.

When the commotion started, Kingsley was one of the first on his feet — it was lunch time, and he'd been sat with Sirius and Narcissa, reading over a letter from Andi sent by way of Ceri; the eldest Black sister was their only trustworthy connection to the outside world, these days.

Shouting echoed in from the Entrance Hall, and Kingsley mentally prepared himself to break up another fight. But there were no frozen forms when he arrived; instead just Emmeline Vance, her hair mussed and her eyes frantic. “The Dark Mark is over Hogsmeade,” she told him urgently, just loud enough for eavesdroppers to hear and start spreading word around the hall. Great.

“Just now?” Kingsley asked, wondering if this was the beginning of the end. Emmeline shook her head.

“Don’t think so. It’s fuzzy round the edges, like it’s been up a while,” she reported. “I was just taking the little kids out for some fresh air when I saw it. We got them all back inside, but I think they saw it too.”

Kingsley grimaced faintly, and he wasn’t surprised to turn around and see Harry at his back. That boy seemed to be in five places at once, these days.

“Any sign of danger?” he questioned, vivid green gaze fixed on Vance.

“Hard to tell. I think there was smoke, but not much. Surely if there was a fight they would have sent word? Rosmerta can do a Patronus messenger, I know she can.”

Kingsley wasn’t reassured. “Only if she’s well and able to cast it,” he pointed out. “We need to go down there.”

Harry nodded, though he didn’t look any happier about it. “How many are you taking?”

Kingsley thought for a moment. “Myself and five others. If we need more, I’ll send an elf.” The Hogwarts house elves were taking quite happily to being messengers for the war effort, particularly the odd one that seemed to have attached itself to Harry.

“What do you need, Boss?”

He didn’t let himself smile, even as he looked at Tonks, reporting with a serious face but twinkling violet eyes. He — for he was definitely a man today, even though he didn’t show it, even though his body was feminine — stood at attention, ready for instruction, as if they were still aurors at the Ministry. As if Kingsley was still his superior.

One day, that wouldn’t be the case anymore. But until then, Kingsley had to keep it professional.

“Auror Tonks, you’re coming with me. I want Bill Weasley, Arthur Weasley, Remus Lupin and Apolline Delacour, at the gates as soon as possible.” Four combatants he trusted and a healer, just in case.

Tonks nodded, and hurried out of the hall.

“Kingsley,” Harry called, before Kingsley could get to work. The boy’s face was solemn, an expression Kingsley was far too familiar with by this point. The face of someone expecting the worst. “Be safe.”

He nodded, and turned on his heel, striding for the doors.

He couldn’t make any promises.

The Dark Mark in the sky sent an instinctive shiver down his spine as he walked quickly across the Hogwarts grounds. He’d seen far too many of those in his time, and none of them meant anything good.

Kingsley pushed away the unease in his gut, and kept going.

Tonks was fast, Kingsley would give him that. Soon the younger auror was practically jogging towards him, Kingsley’s requested team at his heel. At the gates, the edge of the wardline, Kingsley surveyed them all. “I’ll be honest with you, I have no idea what we’re walking into. Be on your guard.”

Five determined faces nodded back again, and they set off.

There was definitely smoke coming from the village, Kingsley realised as they grew closer to Hogsmeade. Not much, not enough to have him truly fearing for his life, but definitely some.

It was either a good sign or a very, very bad one that no one from the village had come to the castle for aid.

As soon as they reached the main village itself, Kingsley saw the problem — down at the end of the road, far away from the more student-friendly side of the village, the Hog’s Head was a smouldering pile of lumber.

“Auror Shacklebolt!” It was Rosmerta, hurrying over to him with a grim expression. “We weren’t sure if you’d come. We didn’t know if it was worth the risk.”

Kingsley hated how bad things had gotten, that the people of Hogsmeade weren’t even willing to ask for help from the castle barely a hundred feet away, just in case it was a trap.

“Of course we came, Ros,” Tonks insisted, always the earnest foil to Kingsley’s stony countenance. “What happened?”

“There were four of them,” Rosmerta said, wringing her hands anxiously. “Didn’t seem like they wanted to pick a fight. They threw some flaming potion into the Head and next thing we know it’s up like a pile of matches.” A sad smile twisted her lips. “Amount of booze old Ab had in there, can’t say I’m surprised. They watched it burn for a bit, threatened anyone who came close, then shot that monstrosity in the sky and turned tail.”

“Good Merlin,” Arthur murmured. “Was anyone inside?”

Rosmerta’s face said it all. “As far as we know, only Aberforth. He doesn’t open ’til at least five most days, says there’s no good business in the hours before dinner.” She cast her eyes at the still-smoking wreckage. “We couldn’t help him. It all happened so fast... they were in and out in less than ten minutes.”

She choked on a sob, and Arthur put his arm around her soothingly. “It’s not your fault,” he soothed. “If it was that quick, there likely wasn’t much you could do anyway.”

As the Weasley patriarch comforted the pub owner, Kingsley took a few steps closer to the Hog’s Head. It was a seedy hellhole to be sure, but there had been a certain charm to it. It was a good place to get a drink without judgement.

Aberforth Dumbledore had been a good man. He didn’t deserve to go out like this.

“Why would they do this?” Kingsley didn’t realise he’d been followed, but Tonks and Remus were barely a step behind him. “What good does it do them? Unless Ab pissed off the wrong person...” Tonks shook his head, scowling. “Why go for just the Hog’s Head, of all the buildings in the village? Hell, why not burn down the whole village?”

“It’s a message,” Remus said, his nose wrinkled slightly as the acrid smell of smoke was blown their way by the wind. Had to be much worse to wolf senses. “He’s still after Albus. He’s trying to make him mad, draw him out.”

It made perfect sense, but it still made Kingsley grimace. He had almost forgotten about that loose end, about Albus out there somewhere with his own grand plans. Was he coming, for the battle? Did he have some idea of swooping in to claim glory at the last minute?

Was he even still alive?

At his side, Tonks wrapped his arms around himself. Kingsley put a hand on his shoulder, wishing he could do more, offer a better kind of comfort. “I had my first ever alcoholic drink there,” Tonks said quietly. “Fourth year, morphed myself into looking like one of the seventh years. Ab knew it was me — I had the nose all wrong, and I couldn’t get my voice to change for the life of me — but he served me anyway.” There was a flicker of a smile on his face. Kingsley squeezed his shoulder.

Back at the castle, he could hug him properly. Mourn for a man tainted by his brother’s legacy. Find some quiet corner to decompress in together, and then step out into the world and pretend they were just colleagues, sleep in separate rooms barely feet from each other like they were students all over again. Worse — even the students were sharing rooms, sharing beds!

After the war, Kingsley would change that. He couldn’t live like this anymore, couldn’t keep pretending. Life was too short.

But they had to win, first.

.-. .

Hogwarts had always been a home away from home for Sirius, but right now it felt like a prison. Another cage — bigger than the last, but no less chafing.

Sometimes it felt like Sirius' whole life had been a series of cages. His parents, Azkaban, Grimmauld, now this.

He could hardly stand to breathe, sometimes, feeling the iron bars of confinement wrap around his lungs, closing him in.

At least he wasn't alone in this cage. He glanced beside him, at Charlie lying in bed next to him, book open but not really reading it. Both of them were lost in their thoughts too often, these days.

The end was coming. Harry's birthday was only days away, and he'd seen the look in his pup's eye. That kid was working on a plan, had something up his sleeve.

This cage would be broken, one way or another. Sirius just wondered what kind of freedom he would find on the other side of it.

The ever-present knot of fear and worry tightened in his chest, the cold seeping in, the kind of feelings that always made his brain beg to be Padfoot, to not feel those feelings for just a little while. He didn't give in, not this time.

Instead, he shuffled closer to Charlie, tucking himself under the dragon tamer's muscular arm. Pillowed his head on that broad chest, let his fingers find the dog tattooed on Charlie's left pec. Just looking at it made his heart swell with affection.

"Hello, sweetheart," Charlie murmured, putting his book down and shifting to hold Sirius better. "What's the matter, then? Or are you just bored?" he added, giving a wolfish grin. It would be too easy to go with it, to start teasing his fire-haired love and replace the knot of worry with the hot flood of arousal. But it wouldn't solve the problem, and Sirius had learned over the last few years not to let things fester.

"Just thinking," he replied quietly, throwing one leg over Charlie's, plastering himself against his side like an extra layer of blankets. Like a shield.

"Terrible stuff. I try not to if I can help it," Charlie said, giving a faint smile. Sirius snorted. The redhead grew a little more serious, tangling a hand in Sirius' long hair. "Anything I can help with?"

"Only if you can promise me we'll all come out of this alive," Sirius replied bitterly. He felt Charlie tense beneath him, and briefly regretted bringing it up.

"Would if I could, my love." Charlie's arm was warm around Sirius' bare shoulders, their room a little stuffy in the late-July heat. "All I can do is promise my best."

Sirius sighed, a long, slow release of air. He buried his face in Charlie's throat, squeezing his eyes shut. "I wish it was just you I was worried about," he confessed. "I mean, I wish I wasn't worried about any of it. But when I stand in that hall, when I look at everyone I know is going to be fighting..." Remus, Narcissa, Tonks, Severus. Harry. Draco, the kids, so many people who should not have to put their lives on the line before they'd even had the chance to live them. Just like James and Lily had done, the first time round. Just like countless others had done.

“I know what you mean,” Charlie agreed. Of course he did — every member of his family, both blood and not, was going to be on that battlefield. Even Ron would be there, and he was a prick, but none of them wanted him to die for it.

“Sometimes I look at them, look at Harry, and I just think... I’d give my life for them, to make sure they’re okay. They’ve got so much more to offer this world than I have. If I die defending the people I love... it’ll be worth it.”

Suddenly, Charlie was moving — his big arms manhandled Sirius to the centre of the bed, and that bulky form was covering him, cocooning him in Charlie’s warmth and weight and the scent of leather. Sirius let out a quiet whimper, unable to help himself — he didn’t quite turn to brainless jelly beneath Charlie, not anymore, but it was still a close thing.

“You’d better not,” Charlie breathed, his lips brushing Sirius’ jaw, his forearms bracketing the animagus’ head. Sirius watched the flickering candlelight play over the bold black lines tattooed up Charlie’s shoulders, and wondered how the hell he got so lucky. “I’ve got plans for you, Sirius Black. Plans that involve spending the rest of forever with you. So don’t you go dying on me now, alright?”

Sirius let out a sound that wasn’t quite a cry but wasn’t a gasp either, bringing one hand up to stroke the Gryffindor lion tattooed on the right side of Charlie’s ribcage. It preened under his touch, shaking out its enormous mane. “I don’t want to,” he assured. “Gods, Charlie — I have plans for you, too, yeah? Plans for us.” Four years ago he never thought he’d have any plans at all past revenge on fucking Pettigrew, vengeance for Lily and James. “I don’t want to die. But if it’s me or Remus, me or Harry, me or you. Well. That’s an easy choice.”

Charlie growled lightly, the rumble vibrating through his chest straight into Sirius’. “Then I’ll just have to stay right by your side and make sure that’s not a choice you have to make,” he vowed, kissing the corner of Sirius’ mouth. He shuffled down a bit, resting his head on Sirius’ chest, reversing their earlier position. Like Sirius, his hand found the ink over a quick-beating heart. But in this case, it was an old tattoo, over a decade sat on Sirius’ skin — two canine paw prints beneath a proud nine-point rack of antlers, all set under a shining full moon.

Once upon a time, there had been a rat tail framing the whole thing, but now it was just a messy circle of scar tissue. In Azkaban, Sirius had dug the ink out with his own bare hands, hating the memory of that traitor on his skin.

“Tell me, about these plans,” Charlie urged, his body still half-pinning Sirius to the mattress, the perfect anchor. “We’ve never talked about... after.”

Neither of them had ever been brave enough.

“I want those kids,” Sirius admitted, staring up at the ceiling while his fingers traced lines between the freckles on Charlie’s upper back. “If we can. If they want us. I want to give those kids a home. I want us to have a home. And...” He trailed off, shaking his head. “It’s stupid.”

“Tell me anyway,” Charlie pleaded, smiling against Sirius’ skin.

Sirius hesitated only for a moment. Charlie had seen him at his worst, he wouldn’t mock him for his fanciful dreams. “I want to open a wizarding primary school. A place for kids to go before Hogwarts. Bring the muggleborn kids earlier, but also... I was so lonely, back then. Just me and Reggie, and occasionally other kids my parents approved of. I never had a proper friend before I came to Hogwarts. And homeschooling in families like mine... well, let’s just say the indoctrination starts young.” He sneered at the memory, at all the dark curses he knew about before he’d even held his own wand — either through being taught about them, or being punished with them. “I just... I don’t want there to be any more lonely little kids like I was. And I don’t want kids with only their families to show them what the world is like.”

Prejudice wasn’t automatic. It was taught, even subconsciously. He’d been a prime example of that, even if it wasn’t the traditional way — in rebelling against his awful family, he’d decided everything Slytherin was just as bad, everything pureblood should rot.

Magical kids grew up sheltered, and deep down Sirius thought that maybe he could fix that.

Silence followed his declaration, long enough that Sirius would have started squirming if Charlie didn’t have him pinned so firmly.

“That’s not stupid at all,” Charlie said eventually, lifting up a little, folding his arm over Sirius’ chest and propping his chin on it. He stared up at Sirius with those adoring blue eyes and Sirius’ heart about stopped. “I think it’s a brilliant idea.”

“I— really?”

“Yeah! I mean, you and I had very different childhoods — I don’t think I spent a second alone until I got to Hogwarts,” Charlie admitted ruefully. “But we still only really played with the kids in the area. Mostly it was me and Bill and Percy playing together. A different kind of sheltered, but almost as bad, I think, sometimes. Same sorts of problems to it.” He grinned, cheeks dimpling. “A school before Hogwarts would be great. Level the playing field a bit, let everyone make friends before they’re split into houses.”

“Exactly,” Sirius agreed, enthusiasm growing like a tiny spark on a pile of kindling. “Basic lessons — how to hold a quill, how to prep different potions ingredients, basic magic theory and history and stuff. Kids’ quidditch,” he added, grinning fondly just at the idea of a bunch of little kids flying around at waist height, tossing squishy quaffles at each other and chasing a tennis-ball sized snitch.

“Well, then,” Charlie murmured, moving his arm, kissing the centre of Sirius’ sternum. “My plans mostly involved dragons and the kids, so I reckon that’ll line up nicely.” He winked, flashing white teeth and a boyish smile. “We’ll go with yours, yeah?”

Sirius almost laughed — he made it sound so simple, like that. So easy. Win the war, adopt some kids, start a school. Insert dragons as applicable.

It was nice to imagine, though.

....

Harry had thought it over, and talked with Salazar, and he was fairly sure he had a plan. Or at the very least, the beginnings of one. And his plan involved one Severus Snape.

He was unsurprised when the castle directed him down to the dungeons in search of the man — Snape was brewing, and Harry hesitated at the threshold.

“What is it, Potter? Do cease your hovering.” The harsh tone made Harry hide a smile.

“May I come in, sir?”

“If you must.” The pair of them looked disgruntled at being in each others’ presence, right up until the door was locked and warded. “What’s the matter?”

“I know how to get Voldemort here when we need him,” Harry blurted. Snape froze over his cauldron. “I—I need your help, though.”

The man’s lips thinned, and he Vanished the contents of his cauldron. Harry hoped it wasn’t anything important. “Talk.”

Harry perched on the edge of the empty workbench, meeting Snape’s gaze. “Everyone knows by now that Dumbledore did something to my family magics, right?” he began. “The rumours got a bit warped, but it’s common knowledge that he fiddled around with it.”

Snape blanched briefly. “Please don’t ever use the word ‘fiddled’ when discussing the headmaster’s actions, especially towards you,” he requested evenly, and Harry made a face.

“Ew, gross. Anyway, no one really knows the specifics. And we know now that Voldemort is pissed the Hogwarts wards held him out. So I thought, if you go to him and tell him that I’m trying to postpone the war until after I’m seventeen — tell him that whatever Dumbledore did to my magic means it’s going to make my maturation difficult. Make me weaker. Tell him I’ve been keeping it secret til now but I finally let it slip, and I need everything to hold off until I can regain my strength.” Harry smirked, eyes flashing at the look of intrigue slowly crossing Snape’s features. “I’d bet my Firebolt he’ll show up at the gates bang on time, thinking I’m ripe for the killing.”

The Slytherin frowned, brows furrowed in thought. “It’s risky,” he said slowly. “He may show up early. And, for all we know, Albus’ rituals will make your maturation difficult.”

“The goblins said I’m fine,” Harry dismissed easily, waving a hand. “And if he shows up early, we hold him off until it’s time.”

“Can Miss Abbott handle that?” Snape asked.

“She says she can.” Harry had talked to Hannah before coming to Snape. She was able to sit up, now, but still couldn’t leave her hospital bed. “If an elf moves her bed to the Wardstone, she can do it. There’s nothing wrong with her magic.” Just her spine, dissolving itself over and over again as the dark magic embedded itself in her body, fighting against their attempts to remove it.

Harry ran a hand through his hair. "Face it, Severus. At this point, it's the best we've got." All his other plans had been far riskier. Far too Gryffindor, according to Salazar. "So will you do it? Will you go to him, convince him he needs to attack on my birthday?"

Slowly, Snape nodded. "I will try." His eyes darkened in something like concern. "Are you ready?"

Harry's answering smile was humourless. "I have to be."

He couldn't keep putting it off forever.

.-. .

Somehow, word spread. Even though Harry only told his closest allies of his plan with Snape, it got around that the battle was coming, and fast. Letters were sent out, the hope of last-minute allies from far reaching places. Potions were brewed, protections were reinforced, the elves and even the ghosts more alert than ever. Children were kissed, lovers were held, promises were whispered into the night. Promises that, for some, were sure to be broken.

Harry couldn't leave his room without getting stared at like a specimen in a jar. No one asked him, but everyone wanted to know he had a plan. Everyone wanted to be sure that their saviour would come through.

This whole battle would be pointless if Harry couldn't kill Voldemort, once and for all.

The evening of the 29th. Harry didn't bother going down to dinner. He asked Dobby to bring him a plate, and he and Draco ate dinner on the sofa in front of the fire in the Gryffindor common room. And slowly, people joined them.

Neville and Ginny, tucking themselves away in the armchair. Remus, ruffling first Harry's hair and then Draco's. Narcissa, not touching any of them but looking at the boys like they might disappear if she turned away. Sirius and Charlie, settling on the floor, leaning back against Harry's shins. One by one, his friends, his family, gathered in the common room — even Snape, a shadow lurking in the corner, a dark guardian angel behind Remus Lupin's chair.

No one spoke, but they didn't have to. There were no words they could say to make it any easier. Not when everything sounded like a goodbye.

So they sat together, listening to the quiet breaths around them, the crackle of the fire, basking in the love that flooded the room, heavy with the knowledge that this may well be the last time all of them sat in a room together.

Harry leaned into Draco's embrace, breathing in his scent, until the sun had fully set outside.

"I think I'm going to bed," he said eventually, breaking the silence between them all. "Long day tomorrow."

Someone snorted. It might have been Fred.

“Goodnight, pup,” Sirius murmured, reaching up to squeeze his knee. “Night, Draco.”

“Goodnight.” Harry looked around the room one last time — not memorising faces, not that he’d admit to, but just getting his fill of this moment, his family.

Then he took Draco by the hand, and led him upstairs.

Neville and Ginny followed soon after — evidently Harry’s departure had been the catalyst for everyone else’s — but they didn’t say anything to each other, and by wordless agreement the partition was raised and warded as soon as all four were in the room.

With it, Harry could forget about anyone on the other side of the makeshift wall. His world narrowed down to just him and Draco, their gasps and sighs filling the still night as they made love, holding each other with an edge of desperation that neither had the strength to hide.

And when they were sated, curled together under a thin sheet in the summer heat, they still didn’t speak. What could they say that hadn’t been said? They kissed, and they closed their eyes, and they breathed.

A long night was coming. Best to rest while they could.

Chapter End Notes

...Sorry :P Have a great and safe weekend, folks, and I hope 2022 starts well for you all <3

Chapter 104

Chapter Notes

Here we go, folks~

See the end of the chapter for more notes

In the midst of it all, in the fear and uncertainty and quiet but frantic preparation, most people forgot it was Neville Longbottom's birthday.

In their little private oasis in the Gryffindor dorm, they didn't. In the morning, Harry took down the partition — after knocking first, of course — and revealed a little cupcake with a single candle sticking out of it, a quiet grin on his face.

Neville was bleary-eyed and shirtless, his hair sticking up all over the place and the most enormous hickey on his collarbone that Harry tried not to stare at too much. "Wha?" he murmured when Harry held out the cupcake. Beside him, also shirtless, wearing a pair of Gryffindor boxers that were probably Neville's, Ginny giggled.

"Happy birthday, Nev," Harry chirped. Neville blinked owlishly.

"Oh, yeah. Thanks, guys."

"Make a wish," Ginny pestered, plastering herself over his back as he stared at the cheerfully dancing candle flame.

Neville's gaze finally sharpened, and when he blew out the candle, Harry could make a pretty good guess what he'd wished for.

"What time do you come of age?" Draco asked, stretching out his arms and cracking his neck. Ginny giggled again, louder this time.

"D'you need a Nail Clipping charm, Harry?" she asked, apropos of nothing. Harry stared at her, bewildered.

"What?"

She nodded towards Draco, and Harry watched his boyfriend dig around the dresser for his clothes, admiring his arse in those bright green boxers — and then trailing his gaze up over the red scratch-marks still visible over his shoulders. Harry blushed, glaring at the redhead girl.

"Shut up," he muttered petulantly. "Like you can talk; Nev looks like he's been mauled."

That just made Ginny look smug, running a hand over her boyfriend's chest. "He does, doesn't he?" she agreed proudly, patting Neville's cheek when he blushed.

"I need to go shower," Draco declared. "So put your tits away before I have to open the door, Weasley, in case your mother finds out how scandalous you are."

Ginny laughed, summoning a shirt from across the room. "If I must," she mock-sighed. "Although that reminds me — I was thinking about getting a nipple piercing, sometime before we go back to school. Pretty sure I can blackmail Charlie into taking me to his tattoo artist friend for it. What do you think?" She turned in Harry's direction, cupping her breasts and looking at them with a curious expression. Harry snickered, seeing Neville turn a vibrant shade of red.

"Pretty sure you're asking the wrong bloke, Gin," he said mildly. "But right before school is the best idea, less chance for your mum to find out. Also if you do go, let me know, I want a tattoo."

"Ooh, tattoo and piercing date," Ginny said delightedly, pulling her t-shirt over her head. "You're on, Potter."

It was such a normal morning. The easy movement between them, discussing their return to school like it was a sure thing, the teasing and the banter and Neville's eternal blush. Like it was any other day.

"You never answered my question, Neville," Draco reminded. "What time d'you come of age?"

Neville took a second to stop staring at Ginny's chest, even though it was covered by fabric, no doubt imagining a piercing there. "Oh, yeah. Quarter to midnight," he said, running a sheepish hand through his hair. "Barely today."

"As the seventh month dies," Harry murmured to himself, earning an odd look from the taller boy. "Nothing, nothing." Neville had never heard the Prophecy, didn't know how close he'd come to being in Harry's shoes. If Harry had his way, he never would.

A lithe form pressed against Harry's back, a hand pinching his arse. "Shower time," Draco said, eyes smouldering as he looked at Harry. "Coming?"

Harry summoned his clothes quickly, ignoring Ginny's cackling laughter as he followed Draco out.

It was going to be a difficult day; they had to take their joy where they could.

. . .

They knew what was coming when Snape disappeared.

The Potions Master had told them — the family, those who knew the truth — that the Dark Lord had asked Snape to be at his side when the battle came. Snape was one of the best duellists on the Dark side, after all. Voldemort had so few left these days,

So when, not long after dinner, Remus sidled into the Great Hall and over to Harry, jaw clenched and eyes faintly glowing, Harry knew what was coming.

The countdown had begun.

"Here we go, then," he said, releasing a deep breath. Remus nodded.

"Here we go," he echoed. He cupped the back of Harry's neck, pressing their foreheads together, scenting Harry's temple. "Look after yourself, cub."

"You too, Moony." It took everything Harry had to pull away, offering the man a tight smile.

"It's go time then, is it, chaps?" Fred asked briskly, watching the exchange. Harry nodded.

"Some time in the next few hours."

"Least we got a good meal in first," George commented. "I'd hate to go to war on an empty stomach." He winked, and Harry laughed, even as his own dinner turned to lead in his gut.

"I'm going to find the others." He looked at the twins, smirking. "Give 'em hell, boys."

The pair saluted, brown eyes bright.

The twins were Harry's seconds, as far as the HA were concerned. They were the ones to get everyone mobilised.

Harry had his own work to do.

He got to his feet, keeping his shoulders back and his head high as every head in the room swivelled in his direction, the whispers starting to spread. He would not look scared. He would not show a hint of the anxiety buzzing inside him.

At the doors, a hand slipped into his. He looked down, meeting Luna's smiling face. "Neville's coming," she assured. "The castle's letting him know."

Harry nodded, and they left, hand in hand. Sure enough, Neville met them at the stairs, dirt on the knees of his jeans from working in the greenhouses.

As they made their way upstairs, taking the long way for once, Harry noticed the signs of preparation. Underage students were being gently chivvied downstairs, ready to take refuge in the dungeons. People were walking that little bit faster, jaws set resolutely. They stepped aside for the three heirs, their eyes knowing.

They made it to the Hospital Wing, and Hannah took one look at them and grimaced. "How long have we got?" she asked simply. Harry glanced out the window, looking at the gates. There was no one there, yet.

He checked his watch. Quarter past eight. "I'd give it about two hours, maybe three. He won't want to show too early." He wanted to catch Harry at his weakest, at the moment of his birth. Seven minutes past two in the morning. Not truly as the seventh month was dying, but close enough to it.

“Oh, good.” Hannah settled down in her bed. “I can let my food settle before I have to take a pain potion.”

“Are you sure you’re up for this, Hannah?” Neville fretted. She looked up with hard eyes.

“Do I have a choice?” she retorted pointedly. “I’ll be fine, Nev. Sooner we get this out of the way, the sooner they can call in a specialist and sort me out.”

Anyone who thought that Hufflepuffs were weak or spineless had never met a true Hufflepuff, Harry thought to himself. Here Hannah was, quite literally spineless, and she was still ready to go to war however she could.

“We won’t have to hold it for as long as last time,” Luna pointed out serenely, patting Neville’s arm.

The door to Pomfrey’s office opened, and the mediwitch walked out with Draco at her side. When he saw the four of them, he stopped in his tracks. “Oh, fuck,” he declared emphatically. “So soon?”

“Not immediately,” Harry assured. “Couple of hours. Sev’s gone,” he added as explanation, ignoring Neville’s narrow-eyed look at the address. There would be time for those truths later.

“Well,” Pomfrey said, running her hands over her apron. “That changes things. I’ll send an elf to Horace, see if he can send up the last of those Blood Replenishing potions he’s been brewing. I trust the headmistress has been alerted?”

Harry hadn’t seen McGonagall in the Hall when he’d left, but he was sure someone had run to find her, so he nodded.

“Good. Mr Malfoy, would you ready Miss Abbott’s evening potions, please?” Pomfrey requested. Draco jumped to work, and the three heirs perched on the edge of the bed beside Hannah, pressed shoulder to shoulder as she downed four potions, grimacing between each one.

“Thanks, Draco,” she said when he passed her a glass of water.

It was torture, the waiting. Watching Pomfrey and Draco ready the Hospital Wing for whatever emergencies it may bring, watching the other healers and volunteer assistants file in with grim faces.

After an hour, Luna stiffened. “We should go,” she declared. Harry and Neville shared a look.

“Okay, then.”

Harry had an eye on Draco, watching as the blond sucked in a sharp breath as soon as he saw they had stood. He almost dropped the roll of bandages he was holding, but set it down on a tray instead, taking three long strides across the room to stand in front of Harry.

"Promise me, Potter," he whispered furiously, cupping Harry's cheeks with loving hands.
"Promise me you'll find me, when you join the battle. Promise me we'll do this together."

"I will," he said, glad Draco hadn't asked for anything more, for a promise he couldn't make.
"I love you."

"I love you," Draco said back to him, kissing his lips, then kissing the barely-there lightning bolt scar on his forehead.

Only then did he step back with a shaky breath, jaw clenched as he nodded to the other three.
"Good luck. Here," he added, reaching into his pocket and pulling out a vial of Pain Reliever for Hannah. "You'll need this."

She smiled gratefully, then looked to her fellow heirs. "I'll meet you up there."

After that, there was no more stalling. Harry had to walk away, leave the love of his life behind knowing that the next time they saw each other they'd be fighting for their lives.

The bustle of the Hospital Wing didn't stop for them, but everyone was watching as they left.

Harry didn't want eyes on him, not now, not anymore, and he was fairly sure Neville and Luna felt the same. They didn't complain when he dragged a secret passage into existence behind a tapestry, leading them into a blessedly quiet stairwell.

He thought about all the people he hadn't seen yet, all the ones he hadn't said goodbye to. That was perhaps for the best — if he had to look anyone else he loved in the eye and then walk away, Harry didn't think he would make it.

Hogwarts was thrumming anxiously in the back of his mind. Or perhaps that was his own anxiety, projected onto a castle that was far too sentient for its own good sometimes.

The door to the Room of Requirement opened, and the Wardstone was revealed.

Now they were in position, Hannah could join them — Dobby brought her whole hospital bed with her in it, positioning it carefully at the West point, not obstructing any of the others but close enough that Hannah could get a hand on the crystal.

Then the little elf threw himself at Harry, hugging him around the knees. "Dobby will protect Hogwarts, Harry Potter sir," he swore firmly. Harry patted the elf on the head with a fond smile.

"I know you will, Dobby."

The house elf disappeared, off to man whatever station he had decided was his for the fighting.

Harry stepped up to the Wardstone, in his usual spot. He looked to Hannah, who was positioned somewhat awkwardly, lying down on the bed with her arm outstretched. "You okay?"

"It'll do," she assured. "I'm gonna hurt regardless, this can't make it much worse."

Well, that was one way to look at it.

They were as ready as it got, now.

"After this is all over, I want a proper birthday party," Neville blurted suddenly, startling them all. "Like last year. A party for me and Harry, with everyone there, to celebrate us turning seventeen. This birthday has been shit."

Harry laughed, grinning at his friend, seeing the girls smile too. "We'll make it happen," he promised. "Proper party, for the two of us. We'll have it at my place; it's got a swimming pool." The Pottery's pool was bigger than the one at Seren Du, even.

"Perfect," Neville said with a satisfied nod. "Glad we got that sorted."

And then he put both hands on the Wardstone.

Harry did the same, sinking into the now-familiar liminal space between his magic and the castle's, bridging the gaps between them until every beat of his heart pulsed in the stones themselves. He bridged the gaps between the heirs, too, reaching for Hannah and Luna and Neville, his magic twining with theirs joyously.

There was no sudden flare of pain when the assault on the wards began. This time, they were ready. They softened the blow, drawing deep from the roots of the Forbidden Forest to press back against Voldemort's cloying darkness.

Once again, time ceased to exist. Except for one moment, at eleven forty-four PM, when the heir of Gryffindor came of age.

At that moment, Neville's full power rushed through the wards, bright as a flare, bursting through the tightly-woven net of magic and making the castle sing. The swirls of red in Harry's vision grew brighter, bolder — all the excess magic that usually poured off someone at the moment of their maturation, siphoned directly into the Hogwarts wards themselves.

He wondered if Voldemort was getting angry, yet. He wasn't trying nearly as hard to crack the wards as last time — he was waiting. Biding his time, with just enough pressure to let everyone know he was there. Practically knocking on the door.

Harry could envision it; Voldemort stood with his half-hearted attack on the wards, while all around him his followers gathered for their final fight. They would have trolls with them, most likely, and dementors. Perhaps even giants if the rumours were true.

It wouldn't matter. They could handle it.

He didn't even question that Voldemort knew exactly the moment of Harry's birth. Snape would have told him. The only reason Harry himself knew was because Remus told him.

He could feel it, when it started to draw near. Not in his body — he was so deep into his magic he was barely aware of even having a body — but in his soul, in his magic, tiny crackles like static electricity before a huge lightning storm. It built, and built, and built.

And then it let go.

Neville's burst of power, impressive though it was, was nothing compared to Harry's. Four ancient lines converging within him, on top of an already incredibly powerful innate magical core. Every last drop of that surge, directed right into the wards, carefully restrained. Harry waited a beat, then two. Voldemort's magic rose in an enormous wave of power, crashing against the wards.

Harry pulled his hands off the Wardstone, and told the wards to drop.

The others had moved at the same time, reinforcing his decision. They could feel the wards 'fail', feel the influx of dark magic as it spilled onto the grounds.

Hannah couldn't stifle her gasp of pain as she moved her arm back down. Harry's eyes darted to her in alarm, and she shook her head ever so slightly, eyes squeezing shut. "It's fine. I'm fine. Go. Good luck, all of you."

It felt wrong, leaving her there. But there was no other option — Hannah could not fight, and they needed one of them there to protect the Wardstone, just in case.

So they exited the room, stepping back out into the castle.

The sounds of battle weren't immediately obvious. The castle gave them a shortcut down, and Harry's wand slid into his hand as he hurried down the steps. He felt strong. His magic was humming through his veins, eager to be used, more powerful than he had even begun to imagine.

At the bottom of the stairs, Harry paused, halting his two friends. "Be safe," he said, meeting each of their eyes in turn. "I want to see you on the other side of this. Both of you."

They nodded, and stepped through the door.

Immediately, they were right in the midst of the action — people were hurrying through the Entrance Hall out to the grounds; they wouldn't let the fight get inside the castle, not if they could help it. Not with the students in there.

To Harry's surprise, the suits of armour that usually lined the corridors had mobilised, marching outdoors with military precision. Where the hell had McGonagall been hiding that spell?

He didn't have time to think. He reached for the wards, reached for the magic he knew better than anyone's. Draco was outside, and Harry had to find him.

Neville and Luna stuck with him as they entered the fray — Harry didn't think, shooting spells as easy as breathing, his magic jumping to obey him without a second of hesitation.

He had to rein it in, had to at least appear to be struggling, for a little bit. Voldemort thought him weakened. Any surprise was Harry's advantage.

Neville and Luna knew the plan, so they covered for him when he pretended to have his magic fail. Harry ducked a jet of bright blue light, and Luna sent her own in return — a Blasting curse, which caught the black-cloaked figure in the chest, sending them flying backwards and sprawling to the ground. They didn't get up.

This was not the time to have mercy.

The night was lit up with spells, the half-moon shining high in the clear sky. His eyes adjusted remarkably quickly — after years in the cupboard, Harry had no problem seeing in the dark. He had the fleeting thought that they should have done more night-time training, should have planned for this eventuality. Hopefully the light shining from the castle was enough.

If it wasn't, the light from the Patroni keeping the swarm of dementors away would certainly help.

All around him, Harry could see familiar faces. Students he'd grown up with and teachers he'd learned from and people who had become family to him in just a few short years. He saw Oliver and Cassius, fighting side by side; the Patil twins, bracketing Lavender Brown, who seemed to have already amassed quite an impressive pile of broken wands at her feet. Tonks, hair a bright pink beacon in the midst of it all, standing guard over a downed figure — Harry couldn't see who. His heart jolted in alarm, but in moments a house elf appeared, grabbing the prone form and vanishing it from the battlefield.

Good. That was good.

He looked around, following the pull of magic, eyes straining for a head of silver blond hair. At last, he spotted him — Draco was alone, duelling two Death Eaters at once, and the sight of it made Harry's lungs seize. He sprinted over, shielding as he ran, Neville and Luna right on his heel. Without hesitation, he fired a Cutting curse at one of the Death Eaters duelling Draco. With his maturation still buzzing through his veins, the curse came out so powerful it sliced the man clean in half at the waist.

"Whoops," Harry remarked, throwing a shield up as Draco turned around, sheer relief filling those mercury eyes, just for a moment before Draco's attention turned back to the battle.

"Happy birthday, darling," he called airily, dodging a nasty-looking hex and firing back.
"You'll have to wait for your present."

Harry laughed, shoulder pressing briefly against Draco's, slotting into the space at the blond's side as he'd trained to do for the last year.

"Nev, Luna, go!" he urged to the pair. "We're going to find him. Go help whoever you can."

Neville looked like he might protest, but Luna just grabbed him by the arm and tugged him away, the pair running to give assistance to Cho Chang.

Draco hit his opponent with a spell that had them falling to the ground, and they kept moving.

It was easy, looking for Voldemort — he just had to feel in the wards for the magic that felt like a complete blight on humanity. Everything about the man felt wrong, twisted, broken.

Actually getting to him, however, wasn't quite as easy. The Death Eaters had spotted Harry, and were gathering to try and slow him down, determined to make him work for the privilege of duelling their master. Harry thought it was quite bold of many of them, in all honesty — they thought themselves safe enough to risk trying to kill him, stealing Voldemort's vengeance from him? What idiots.

But Harry wasn't alone; he had Draco, yes, but there were others, appearing once they realised the group were converging around Harry. Doing their best to distract and disrupt the Death Eaters. As they drew closer to the edge of the Forbidden Forest, Harry was both amused and deeply disturbed to see acromantula scuttling out from the cover of the trees, grabbing humans between their pincers and dragging them back to the forest. Harry doubted they had been asked to do so — and indeed, they didn't seem to be discriminating between Death Eaters and not, though Hagrid managed to reclaim the student who almost met a very grizzly end. Some of the acromantula were just grabbing fresh corpses and going to town right there.

Harry shook his head; whatever. If it saved them the clean up, he hardly cared.

They were edging closer, making it through the Death Eater ranks. Harry knew he was almost at his destination when he came up against Rabastan Lestrange, his sleeve ripped and his clockwork arm gleaming with every flash of spellfire.

“You want me to take your other arm?” Draco taunted, watching Lestrange’s face screw up in fury, his mask abandoned long ago.

“I’ll kill you!” the man roared, so focused on Draco that he neglected to see the other head of blonde hair approaching.

“You will do no such thing!” Narcissa slashed her wand down in a firm arc, and all of a sudden Lestrange’s eyes began to bulge as he gasped for air, choking on nothing, drowning on dry land. He dropped to his knees, and Narcissa didn’t release the spell until he’d stopped moving entirely. Then she sniffed delicately. “I never did like him,” she declared, as if she had merely escorted the man from a tea party rather than choked him to death.

But there was no time to stand and admire her handiwork; with Lestrange down, there were plenty more willing to take his place.

And then Harry pushed forward, through a break in the line, and found himself stood face to face with Lord Voldemort himself.

Harry’s first thought was that the man had aged; his strangely smooth, pale face was weathered like peeling paint, dark circles below his luminous red eyes. He didn’t hold himself quite so elegantly as he had before.

“Hello, Tom!” Harry greeted cheerfully, taking a few more steps forward. His heart lurched at leaving Draco behind, but this was the plan.

Everyone else would take care of the crowd, and Harry would deal with their leader.

Stood at Voldemort’s side, ramrod straight and face entirely impassive, was Severus Snape. He looked almost bored by it all, his wand held in his hand but lax at his side. As if that made him any less dangerous.

And on Voldemort’s other side, curled up in the grass, was Nagini.

The final horcrux.

“Potter,” Voldemort hissed, in English but with such venom it almost sounded Parseltongue. “Facing your death like a true Gryffindor, I see.”

“Oh, but haven’t you heard?” Harry replied, still in that same cheerful tone, “I’m the heir of Slytherin now!”

Voldemort’s face twisted in fury, and a bolt of green light shot from his wand. Harry ducked, hoping those behind him were still paying attention. “You make a mockery of the name of Salazar Slytherin!” the Dark Lord crowed. “I shall destroy you, and claim my rightful place as Slytherin’s true heir.”

Harry continued to duck and dodge and shield as they talked, keeping half an eye on Snape. The man was edging ever closer to Nagini, behind Voldemort while the man was distracted.

“Yeah, see, if you had the ability to do that, you would’ve done it by now,” Harry jibed. “But the family magic doesn’t want you. You fail to meet the requirements.” He had to conjure a shield to block another Killing curse, and apparently the first thing on his mind do to so was an entire wooden door, which shattered on impact. A chunk of it came flying back at him, cutting deep into his left arm, and he winced. Not doing that again, then.

“You lie!” Voldemort roared. “It is you who is falling short, Harry Potter — I felt your wards fail, felt your magic weaken as you came of age. How did it feel, Potter, to know that the headmaster you trusted had betrayed you so? Continued to damage you, even now? How did it feel, to have your maturation stunted?” There was a mocking sneer on his thin lips, but Harry just laughed, shooting a dark curse he’d learned from Remus that would turn someone’s elbow joints backwards. It didn’t hit, but he hadn’t expected it to; he just needed to keep all the attention focused on him. Find your moment, and take it, Salazar had told him. But Harry couldn’t find his moment until Snape had taken care of the last loose end.

“Actually, Tom, I feel pretty fucking fantastic,” he drawled, ducking low and coming up with a spell already glowing on his wand. He put the full force of his magic into it, and though it hit Voldemort’s shield it was still strong enough to send the man skidding backwards. Snape was forced to quickly sidestep out of the way — right behind Nagini. Perfect.

“You didn’t actually believe that whole thing about Dumbledore’s blocks fucking up my magic, did you?” Harry asked incredulously, seeing Snape raise his wand. “Honestly, Tom, you're so easy to fool. I got those blocks removed when I was thirteen, they haven't troubled me for years." He smiled sweetly at the astonished Dark Lord. "I just wanted to get you here so we could do this."

At once, Severus' wand moved in a complicated spiral and flick pattern. "Fiendfyre!" he said clearly, and flames leapt from his wand, instantly swallowing up the enormous snake on the grass.

A horrifying scream rent the air — not from Nagini, but from the horcrux within her, dying in the cursed flames.

It was a risky move, using something as quick to anger as Fiendfyre, something that could so easily burn the entire place to cinders under the wrong hand — but this was Severus Snape, the man of an iron will and such firm Occlumency shields that he had managed to fool both Lord Voldemort and Albus Dumbledore for years. Fiendfyre would not dare break loose from his control.

The flames lasted just long enough for the scream to fade, and then they faded too, sucking back into Snape's wand like a vacuum and leaving nothing but a pile of ash.

"Severus!" Voldemort exclaimed, turning his wand on his follower. "What — you traitor! I should have known all along you were Dumbledore's man!"

"You're wrong," Snape spat, dark eyes flashing. "I am no more Dumbledore's man than yours — I did this for Lily, and for Harry. I helped destroy your horcruxes, every last one of them. I let you believe you could trust me, and now I have brought you to your end!"

Voldemort raised his wand, the tip already glowing green, and Harry moved his at the same time.

"Avada Kedavra!"

A figure dropped to the ground, dead.

And Severus Snape smirked.

"Quickly, Potter," he ordered, gesturing to the body of Lord Voldemort, crumpled and lifeless on the grass. "Clean up your mess."

The next words from Harry's mouth were Parseltongue, his wand moving in sharp jabbing motions over the corpse. "Cleanse this body, destroy this soul, banish it from this mortal plane. Let no harm come from this magic any longer."

Magic, stronger than anything Harry had felt so far, flooded through him, pouring into the body in front of him. He could feel every atom of his existence powering the ritual — the castle, boosting his magic with its own, with Hannah's, still pushing so hard to help the fight even from her hospital bed. He forced it all forward, praying the ritual would work. He was sure they had got all the horcruxes, but just in case there was anything else Voldemort might have done in the search for immortality, Salazar had assured him this would prevent anyone from resurrecting him again.

Voldemort's body glowed a searing white, as Salazar had said it would. Then, it dissolved, becoming nothing but tiny white particles, like a pile of sand next to Nagini's ashes.

Harry sucked in a deep breath, meeting Snape's gaze. It was done.

But the battle wasn't over.

Harry whirled around, wanting to see how things had gone while he'd been otherwise occupied. The sun was just starting to peek over the horizon now, the pale golden glow illuminating the scenes of destruction. His friends were still fighting — Neville and Draco were back to back, Neville with blood running down his face and one eye swollen shut, not letting it slow him down for a moment. Beyond them, Ginny and Daphne fought together, and not far off Narcissa was holding her own — beside her was a familiar head of long dark hair and a rakish grin, wand moving with almost lazy grace. Sirius. He was still alive, still fighting. Thank Merlin for that.

Harry grinned viciously, and raised his wand to his throat. "LORD VOLDEMORT IS DEAD!" he announced, amplified by a Sonorous charm. "IF YOU SURRENDER NOW, YOU WILL BE TAKEN ALIVE."

Cheers went up, echoing back as far as the castle itself, but Harry didn't have time to celebrate. At the announcement, the Death Eaters began to panic. Many of them turned back towards the property line, but the heirs weren't having that — with no need to fake Harry's weakness, they locked the wards down tight, banishing the dementors and preventing any of the Death Eaters from getting away. They were not going to let them run and pretend they had never been part of this travesty.

Some took his words to heart, dropping their wands and raising their hands in surrender — those ones were Stunned and bound. Others went down fighting, raging at losing their master, trying to take down as many people as they could with them. Harry threw himself back into the midst of it all, Snape at his side this time. He was starting to flag, he could feel it, but he kept pushing just that little bit further, not wanting to lose a single person more now they were so close to the end.

And at last, Hogwarts was quiet.

Harry stood up straight, sucking in a deep breath — the air tasted of ash and ozone and blood. Or perhaps it was his mouth that tasted of blood, he wasn't sure.

"Harry!" He turned, just in time to catch the body that slammed into him, meet the mouth that pressed urgently to his. Draco tasted of blood, too, but Harry didn't care, letting all his relief out into that kiss. "You did it," Draco gasped when they parted, clutching his shoulders. "You're alive."

"So are you." Harry grinned, hugging him tight, feeling the tears sting at his eyes. If nothing else, he had Draco.

All across the battlefield, similar reunions were happening. The quiet was broken; this time by shouts of joy and relieved sobbing, as loved ones found each other and relished in being alive.

More people converged on Harry. Sirius hugged him so tight his feet left the ground, babbling about how proud he was. Neville grinned at him despite his bloodied and beaten face, before being knocked to the ground by an enthusiastic Ginny who seemed to have lost half of her hair and possibly the tip of her ear in the battle.

Harry tried not to panic, at the faces he didn't see. The house elves had been fast in moving injured fighters off the battlefield; they could be up in the Hospital Wing, already healed. There was no need to panic.

He looked back, seeing Snape's eyes scanning the crowd, looking for the same head of greying tawny hair that Harry had noticed was missing. Harry reached out, grabbing Sirius by the shoulder. "Where's Remus?" he asked urgently. Sirius looked at him, then looked at Snape, who had whipped round at the name.

"Last I saw him, he was defending a couple of kids from a troll," the dog animagus said. "He was bleeding a bit, but still standing. Severus, I'm sure he's fine."

Snape's lips tightened, but he nodded.

Harry went light-headed all of a sudden, the spike of fear for his other godfather sending his pulse skyrocketing. He vaguely heard Draco call his name, before there was a sharp twist in his stomach, then he was bent double and expelling the contents of his stomach onto the grass. His head pounded, but strangely he felt a lot better, and he was grinning as he straightened up. "I'm fine," he insisted, seeing stars in his vision only for a moment or two. "I'm fine."

"Is this a bad time?" It was Kingsley, hurrying over — his battle robes looked a little charred in places, but he was otherwise unharmed. And behind him stood Amelia Bones.

"Oh, thank fuck you two made it," Harry blurted, "we'll finally have a competent government."

Kingsley blinked, while Amelia looked like she was fighting a smile. "That's the hope," she agreed wryly. "We came to tell you we're headed to the Ministry with a few others who are up for it — reclaiming the building, spreading the word. We have to move quickly."

Harry was impressed that they had the energy to jump straight in to such a thing. "That's good. With any luck, he'll have left it mostly empty." Harry couldn't see Voldemort leaving behind potential cannon fodder in his siege of Hogwarts.

"That's what we're hoping. But we're going armed and ready all the same. If anyone feels up to joining us, we'd gladly take some extra wands," Amelia added, looking around the mismatched group.

“I’ll go,” Sirius volunteered. Harry narrowed his eyes at him. “I’ll come back safe, I promise.” He leaned in, kissing Harry’s forehead. “Get some rest, pup. You’ve earned it.” As he squared his shoulders, he winked at Snape. “Look after our boys ’til I get back, Severus.”

Snape placed a hand on Harry’s shoulder, nodding tersely, ignoring the many people staring incredulously at him for the exchange.

Kingsley, Amelia and Sirius all hurried off, and Harry and Neville shared a sheepish look as they both realised at once that they were still holding the wards too tight; no one would be able to get out. Harry eased his grip on the presence in his mind, feeling Hogwarts relax in turn.

That connection felt stronger, too, now that he was of age. Was that normal, or a side effect of being connected to the Wardstone during his maturation?

He and Neville would find out, he supposed.

“I have so many questions right now,” Ginny said, staring at the long-fingered hand on Harry’s shoulder. “But quite frankly I’m too tired to give a shit.”

Harry snorted, swaying ever so slightly. “Tell me about it,” he agreed. His mouth still tasted of bile, and he grimaced, shooting a Cleaning charm at it. His magic surged up happily, but his whole body ached with the force of it, surprising him with the flare of pain and vertigo. Draco’s quick arm around his waist was the only thing that stopped him from falling flat on his face.

“Okay, that’s it, inside time for you,” the blond murmured. “I need to check you over — I can see you bleeding in at least four places, and I dread to think what else is wrong that you haven’t even noticed yet.”

Considering Harry could only feel two places he knew he was bleeding, that was probably a fair assessment.

The castle wasn’t far off, but to Harry’s exhausted body it felt like miles. Still, he’d had worse, so he kept on walking, leaning heavily against Draco’s side.

He could sleep for a week, after this.

. . .

The work didn’t end when the battle was won.

With many of the still-fit fighters off with Kingsley and Amelia to reclaim the Ministry and spread the word, those who remained did what they could. Those with any knowledge of healing magic tended to their own wounds and the minor wounds of those around them, all in unspoken agreement that the Hospital Wing should be saved for serious injuries. Anything not life threatening could wait a bit.

Someone must have told those seeking refuge that it was over, because Harry could see students who were definitely not of age, and adults who had not been involved in the fighting — they were headed outside, helping those who needed assistance coming in, helping repair any damage done. Helping deal with the dead.

Harry sat on a bench in the corner of the Great Hall, leaning back against the table as Draco scanned him for injuries. The blond's familiar, soothing magic washed over him, knitting together the skin pierced by the shattered door, and the other bleeding wounds he wasn't sure how he'd acquired. He felt something pop in his chest and wondered at what point he'd broken a rib. Draco's expression was more exasperated than anything else.

"Drink this," he ordered, holding out a potion vial. Harry necked it back without even looking. "And this." The second one went down as easily as the first — that was a Pepper Up, he could feel it already, the steam gushing through his ears as the false energy raced through his system.

"I'm gonna crash so hard after this," Harry said, and Draco snorted.

"You won't be the only one. Your magical core is all over the place, so for my peace of mind, please try not to do anything excessive or ridiculous for the next twenty-four hours?"

"Yes, dear." Harry pecked him on the lips. "How are you? Do you need healing?" Green eyes narrowed in concern, but Draco waved him off.

"Nothing I haven't already dealt with." His lips pursed, and he turned. "For Salazar's sake, Neville, get over here and let me heal that, it hurts just to look at you."

Harry tilted his head back, grinning somewhat dazedly, seeing Neville approach sheepishly and sit beside Harry. Draco happily got to work, and Harry took the opportunity to look around the hall.

They weren't the only ones who had come inside to lick their wounds. The house tables had been pushed aside like they often were for training, but people were sat on the benches, or on the floor, or up at the staff table. Harry was relieved to see McGonagall up there, her hair having escaped from its usual tight bun but otherwise seemingly unscathed.

In the centre of the hall, things weren't so light. Through lack of other options, they had chosen to lay their dead out there, covered by conjured white sheets but with faces left visible so they could be identified by their loved ones. There were more than a few sobbing clusters around white sheets. Even more still being brought in on stretchers.

"Charlie!" Ginny was off like a shot as her brother limped into the room, leaning very heavily against Viktor Krum. The Bulgarian seeker seemed to have a broken nose, dried blood sticking to his chin and all down the front of his robes. Between the two of them, they looked like they'd had a particularly bad quidditch accident.

Charlie's eyes filled with relief at the sight of his little sister. "Ginny, thank Merlin!" He let her hug him gently — his arm that wasn't around Viktor was hanging at an unnatural angle.

Harry caught Viktor's eye, beckoning the man over. Draco was already up on his feet, finished with Neville's face, and he laid Charlie out on the tabletop with confident movements. Looking at him, Harry couldn't help but smile faintly — he could certainly see the blond a few years from now, wearing those awful lime green robes, working that firm-but-efficient bedside manner on patients.

"Harry," Charlie sighed out, wincing when Draco reset his shoulder in place. "Have you seen Sirius?"

"He went with Kings and Amelia to go retake the Ministry. He promised he'd come back in one piece."

Charlie scowled, though that might have been the pain of having several broken fingers reset. "He'd fucking better," he muttered.

"What the hell happened to you, anyway?" Harry asked.

"Edward Parkinson. Thought he'd torture me a little before killing me," Charlie explained hollowly. "Viktor here saved my life."

Harry took that to mean Parkinson was dead. Pansy would be pleased.

Ginny burst into tears, hugging Viktor tightly around the waist. "Thank you," she rasped. Viktor pat her on the back awkwardly.

"I am glad I made it in time," he said simply, making Harry wonder just how close a call Charlie had had. His stomach squirmed just thinking about it.

His gaze shifted back to the mourners in the middle of the hall. More and more bodies had been brought in, but it seemed like the flow had stopped now. Dare he hope that was it?

Other than those in the Hospital Wing who couldn't be saved, of course.

An urge rose within him. He didn't want to, felt panic claw its way around his heart, but at the same time he had to.

He had led them into this mess. He had to lead them through the hard parts, too. He stood up, ignoring his friends' concerned calls, walking on shaky legs towards the middle of the hall.

The first few faces he saw, lax in death, were strangers. He moved slowly down the row, reluctantly dragging his eyes from one to the next, waiting to see a face that utterly floored him.

He recognised Emmeline Vance, one of the Order members. Then, further down the line, a girl he knew to be a Ravenclaw seventh year, though he wasn't sure of her name.

But beside that girl was a body that hit Harry like a punch to the gut. "No," he gasped, staring down at Colin Creevey's still, lifeless form. The boy's blue eyes, usually so bright and full of joy, stared blankly up at the ceiling.

Harry staggered — and the body that caught him was surprisingly strong, for its frailty. "You did everything you could, Potter," McGonagall whispered, holding him by the shoulders, her voice firm. “You gave him the best chance you could. Sometimes, even that isn’t enough.”

“He was sixteen,” Harry croaked, and McGonagall’s lips thinned.

“He was. But he died taking a curse for his younger brother, and I cannot imagine a nobler death.”

Harry’s eyes widened. “Dennis.” Their youngest fighter by far, a boy who never should have been on the battlefield to begin with. All of them had lost their arguments in convincing the kid to stay in the castle. Harry had hoped a house elf would grab him and put him safely in Hufflepuff, but clearly that was not the case. “Where is he?”

“Sleeping off a concussion, as far as I’m aware. A troll knocked him on the head.”

Harry winced. Straightening up, he turned back to the sheet-covered bodies, but McGonagall didn’t let him go. “Don’t torture yourself, Potter,” she urged. He shook her off.

“I need to know.” He needed to check that his family was not there, lying dead on the stone tiles.

McGonagall pursed her lips once more, but walked by his side all the same.

It seemed Colin was the first of many familiar faces. Padma Patil, Wayne Hopkins. Two seventh year Hufflepuffs. Professor Sinistra. Seamus Finnegan.

But for a battle mainly fought by students, most of the casualties seemed to be adults. Then again, Harry had been preparing his students for this far longer than any of the adults even realised.

Finally, he reached the end of the double row of bodies. Not nearly as many as he had feared. He hoped that meant they had done well for numbers, and not just that the Hospital Wing was overrun. He had to get up there, look for the rest of his family...

He looked up at McGonagall, seeing the deep furrows in her brow and around her mouth, her age made worse by her grief. She had probably taught every single one of those bodies, at some time or another. “Is there anything I can do?” he asked. McGonagall smiled sadly, her eyes softening more than Harry had ever seen from her.

“I quite think you’ve done enough, for now, don’t you?” she murmured. She squeezed his shoulders. “You should be proud of all you have done, Mr Potter. Not just today, but everything it took you to get here. Everything I missed right under my nose — like the reason Severus Snape is watching you like a mother duck with a wayward duckling,” she added, raising an eyebrow. Harry flushed. “I should very much like to hear how all this came to pass, one day. But not now. Now, you should get some rest. You’ve done your part, let us old hands do ours, hmm?”

There was a weariness in her gaze that made Harry wonder how many times she had done something like this; cleaned up the aftermath of death and destruction, looked at the dead bodies of her former or current students.

Never again. Harry would make sure of it.

“Okay,” he agreed — he was exhausted, after all. “But, if I’m needed...”

“Word will be sent,” McGonagall assured, though by the look on her face Harry doubted anything short of the castle collapsing would be enough of an emergency to warrant her calling for him.

She sent him on his way with a gentle push, and Harry went back towards Snape and the rest.

“Who?” Ginny asked simply, looking at his face. She was leaning against Neville, his hand clutched in both of hers.

“Seamus,” he said, watching pain fill both their eyes. “Padma. And... and Colin.”

Ginny sucked in a sharp breath. “No.”

“I’m sorry, Gin.” Harry knew they were friends; year mates, bonding first over a mild obsession with Harry Potter and then through other things, the HA only strengthening that bond.

“Does Dennis know?” she asked, tears filling her eyes. Harry nodded.

“McGonagall said Colin took a curse for him. That’s how... that’s how it happened.”

Ginny blinked furiously, clenching her jaw, throat bobbing as she swallowed thickly. “Then it’s how he would have wanted,” she croaked. Neville put an arm around her, kissing her half-shorn hair.

“I’m so sorry, Gin.”

“Harry.” Draco’s quiet, solemn voice made him turn. “We should go upstairs,” he said, and at first Harry thought he was suggesting sleep, but then the blond continued. “I haven’t seen Mother since... she went down from a Bone-Breaker at the very end of the battle, someone getting one last shot at Lucius Malfoy’s wife,” he snarled. “I need to know she’s okay.”

“Of course. You should have said sooner.” He looked back at their cluster at the table; Charlie looked better now, sat up and rolling out his sore shoulder. “We’re going to the Hospital Wing. Seeing who we can find.”

“Sounds good,” Neville said. “I think we’re gonna sit here for a bit.”

Ginny didn’t look in any state to move, still reeling from the news of Colin’s death.

Harry and Draco headed for the doors, and Snape moved into step beside them. He was taking Sirius’ instruction very seriously, it seemed.

The whole way up to the Hospital Wing, Harry was mentally convincing himself that even if he didn’t see people, there was no reason to panic. There was plenty of activity still going on — people cleaning up outside, or off at the Ministry, or just taking a private moment for themselves to decompress. Harry could understand that urge.

And yet, the flurry of red hair that he saw upon entering the Hospital Wing almost made him faint with relief.

They didn't even seem to be patients — Mrs Weasley was bustling from bed to bed, handing out cups of tea, while Fred and George appeared to be working on healing some people. Ron was sat beside a bed that held Hermione, a bandage creeping up her neck and shoulder. That was still a few Weasleys short. Thinking over the group, Harry was sure they had to be with the Ministry lot — Percy, and Arthur, and Bill and Fleur. They would want to be involved in that.

“Mother!” Draco half-dragged Harry over to a bed, where Narcissa Malfoy was sat up and drinking tea, her leg propped up on a pillow.

“Oh, my darling boys,” she greeted happily. “All three of you! I’m so glad to see you.”

Out of the corner of his eye, Harry saw Snape’s face turn quietly disgruntled at being referred to as one of her ‘darling boys’.

And then the man seemed to drain of colour entirely.

Harry followed his gaze to a bed in the corner, in which lay a worryingly still Remus Lupin.

“Severus!” Narcissa’s sharp voice wrenched the man from his daze. “He’s alright,” she assured, gentler this time. “He was awake earlier. He got mildly crushed by a dead troll, so I’m told, but managed to hold it up so a student was not flattened to death. It all sounds rather heroic indeed.” Her lips curled at the corners. “Strains, bruises and a broken collarbone; nothing Madame Delacour could not fix. I believe he’s only out from exhaustion — you could go and wake him, if you like.”

Snape stayed put, fists clenched at his sides, torn between going to Remus and sticking with the boys he’d sworn to protect. Harry reached out, putting a gentle hand on his arm. “Go to him,” he urged. “I promise, Draco and I are just going up to the dorm after this. Shower and sleep, nothing dangerous. We’ll be fine. He needs you more than we do, Sirius will understand.”

After a beat of indecision, Snape nodded, and strode off to go and sit beside Remus’ bed, carefully shaking his un-bandaged shoulder. Harry held his breath until he saw the werewolf’s eyes flicker open, saw him smile broadly at the sight of Snape unharmed.

They didn’t embrace, or kiss, or even hold hands. But that didn’t mean a thing compared to the love and relief on Remus’ face, or the small but genuine smile on Snape’s.

It was a good thing no one was paying attention but Harry.

“Word has been sent to St Mungo’s.” Narcissa’s voice drew him back to the conversation. “There should be more healers coming through as soon as the floo is back up and running.”

"That's good." Poor Madam Pomfrey looked rushed off her feet. "I... have you seen Hannah?" He couldn't see the Hufflepuff heir anywhere in the ward. Perhaps she was behind one of the curtained-off beds?

"Dobby moved her to a private room, once she was done at the Wardstone," Narcissa assured. "Madam Pomfrey checked on her a little while ago; she's sleeping. Which is exactly what you two should be doing," she added sternly.

"I had to see you were alright," Draco protested. Narcissa patted his hand.

"And now you have, so you can go to bed."

"If you insist, Mother." Draco leaned down, kissing her cheek. "We'll see you later."

Harry was starting to lose his already tentative hold on his awareness, dazedly saying goodbye to Narcissa and letting Draco lead him away. He was mentally cognisant enough to pull up a shortcut to Gryffindor — though how much of that was him and how much was the castle, he couldn't be sure. The Fat Lady tutted sympathetically, swinging open to let them in, and Harry stumbled through the portrait hole on clumsy legs. Draco chuckled, arm sliding around his waist.

"Come on, love. Let's go try not to drown you in the shower, yeah?"

Getting up the stairs was a battle in itself, and Harry very much wanted to just collapse in bed, but Draco cajoled him through to the bathroom, vanishing Harry's tattered robes with a spell. Harry blinked, suddenly naked, and began to shiver violently. "Oh, and there's the shock; I've been waiting for that," Draco murmured, more to himself than Harry. He turned on the shower and stripped himself with another spell, nudging Harry under the spray.

He couldn't feel the heat of the water. Could barely feel Draco gently scrubbing the blood off his skin, trailing worried fingers over his bruises and brand new scars. Knew enough to tip his head back to rinse the suds from his hair when Draco lathered it up. Latched onto the blond like an octopus while Draco washed his own hair and body efficiently.

Once the shower was off, Harry was wrapped in a fluffy red towel, and a spell dried his hair and body. "S gonna look ridiculous tomorrow," he complained, brain stuttering over putting one foot in front of the other but somehow remembering how frizzy his hair went when dried magically.

Draco snorted. "Of course that's your priority. Daft lion." He led Harry back out, still completely naked himself, long past the point of caring about modesty.

A near-feral sounding groan ripped from Harry's lungs at the sight of his bed, and Draco barely managed to jerk the duvet back with a twitch of his fingers before Harry was face-planting straight into it. The towel was removed, which made him whine, but then Draco slipped in beside him, tugging the duvet up to their shoulders. Harry burrowed into his side, clinging tightly. Over Draco's shoulder, he caught sight of the alarm clock on his night stand.

It was ten past nine in the morning.

Only seven hours since the moment they had dropped the wards. Seven hours, and so many lives lost.

The dam broke, the first sob escaping him — a raw, painful thing, shaking his shoulders and making his whole head ache, tearing through him worse than any spell he'd taken that morning. Once he started, he couldn't stop, sobbing hideously into Draco's chest, tears and snot and the whole shebang, blubbering his apologies; to Draco for making a mess, and to Colin and Padma and everyone else for not being fast enough, not being strong enough, just not being enough.

Draco stroked his hair, and hugged him tight, and didn't make a single comment about the snot. He just kept holding him, his own tears coming more quietly, a release of all the fears he'd ever had in his entire life. The fear of losing his mother, the fear of losing Harry, the fear of having to bow to Lord Voldemort and act like he meant it.

Those fears were a thing of the past.

It was this way that the two boys eventually fell asleep, tangled so close together it looked almost painful, their eyes puffy and their shredded hearts slowly beginning to piece themselves back together.

They had survived, and that was the important part.

Chapter End Notes

I thought about dragging this out over multiple chapters but, quite frankly, I hate writing battle scenes lmao. Still, we've got a little ways to go before this story is fully put to bed!

Chapter 105

Harry slept for almost an entire day. And when he woke up, he hurt.

A low groan bubbled from his lips, and he heard a soft chuckle above him, fingers running through his hair. “Sleeping Beauty awakens,” Draco teased in a fond whisper.

The blond was propped up on the pillows, Harry’s head on his chest. Harry wasn’t wearing his glasses so everything was a little fuzzy, but he thought Draco was smiling when he craned his neck up.

“Time izzit?” Harry rasped, his voice hoarse. His head was pounding, his face and throat and even ears hurt — probably all the crying, he realised belatedly.

“Half six.” Harry frowned; that wasn’t that long. “In the morning.”

Oh.

Slowly, Harry sat up, rubbing at his eyes and rolling his stiff shoulders. His body definitely felt like he had been through a battle. “I’ve been out the whole day?” he realised, tensing suddenly. “What did I miss? How is everyone? Sirius—“ Draco cut him off with a kiss, thumb stroking the back of his neck soothingly.

“Is fine,” he promised. “I woke up last night around eight, called him on the mirror, had something to eat.”

At the mention of food, Harry’s stomach rumbled viciously. Draco snickered. “Should we call for breakfast in bed?”

It was tempting. Very, very tempting. But now Harry was awake, awareness slowly returning to him, he wanted to move. He’d never slept so long in his life, and even though his limbs were sore he knew they’d feel better once he got up and walked around a bit.

And he wanted to see what had happened, in the time he’d been asleep. A whole day, when there was still so much to be done — how could everyone let him sleep so long?!

“Let’s go downstairs,” he decided, reaching for his glasses, setting them on his face just in time to catch Draco’s frown.

“Are you sure? It’s early; people might not be up.”

“The elves will.” Harry wanted to thank them, for all their help during the battle. Many more people likely would have died without their intervention.

Draco sighed, but didn’t argue when Harry rolled out of bed, searching for some clothes.

Careful not to wake Neville and Ginny, who were fast asleep and hadn’t even bothered to raise the partition before passing out, the two boys dressed and crept from the room. With a quick detour to the bathroom so Harry could wash his face in an attempt to feel more human, they went downstairs to the common room. To Harry's surprise, Fleur was up, curled in an armchair by the fire. She smiled widely at the sight of them. "Harry!" she greeted, quiet but excited. "It is good to see you well. You too, Draco."

"Same to you," Harry said vehemently, feeling a rush of relief at the sight of her. "You're okay? And—and all the family?"

"All Weasleys present and accounted for," she confirmed, grin playing at her lips. "Percy lost a few fingers, and Arthur will need to rest for a few days — Bludgeoning 'ex to the ribs,' she elaborated. "But everyone is alive. Blaise and Angelina and Sirius are alive. And my parents, though Papa is in the 'ospital Wing. He lost a lot of blood." At Harry's look of concern, she shook her head. "No, no, he is fine. I think he enjoys the chance for Maman's attention," she added teasingly.

"Well that's alright, then," Harry said with a chuckle. "That's... that's really good." An enormous weight off his chest, to hear the family made it through relatively unscathed. There were so many of them, he had worried it was too much to ask for everyone to survive... but they had trained well, and had a hell of a lot to live for. They were fighters.

They left Fleur to her quiet morning, the summer sun already mostly risen. There weren't many people in the corridors at such an hour, but the few they did pass grinned widely at Harry, nodding their heads in respect.

In the kitchens, the elves cried joyously at the sight of them, and then cried even more when Harry thanked them. Dobby wailed about how great a wizard Harry Potter sir was, and obligingly fetched them tea and toast and fruit — nothing too heavy, not on Harry's already confused system.

After that, Harry knew there was one more place he had to go.

The Great Hall was no longer a makeshift mausoleum. The bodies had been moved — where to he wasn't sure — and the house tables had been reset. A surprising number of people were up and about, and the moment Harry walked through the door, they were on their feet and applauding.

Harry froze like a deer in headlights, hand clamping down on Draco's, entirely unsure how to respond. Why were they applauding him? They had all fought too! They had worked just as hard! Just because he'd been the one to get Voldemort in the end...

Thankfully, Harry spotted Sirius and Charlie at the Gryffindor table, and hurried towards them as the applause died down. Sirius beamed at him, opening his arms to wrap Harry in a hug once he sat down.

"I'm surprised to see you two up," Draco commented, and Charlie shrugged.

"Woke up a little after five, couldn't get back to sleep. Our schedules are gonna be a bit wonky for the next few days anyway." He sipped at what smelled like very strong coffee.

“How are you feeling, pup?” Sirius asked, grey eyes concerned.

“Not too bad.” He wasn’t going to be playing quidditch any time soon, that was for sure, but he couldn’t feel any real injuries. Draco had done an excellent job patching up, and he said as much, just to make the boy blush. “My magic feels weird.” It was hard to describe; it felt simultaneously sluggish and wired, far more present than he was used to.

“Yeah, that’ll likely even out in the next few days. You overdid it right after your maturation, that always screws with the system. That’s why they tell you not to do it,” Sirius added, snorting at Harry’s rueful expression.

“Didn’t have much of a choice, did I?” he shot back. Sirius sobered, ruffling Harry’s hair.

“You did wonderfully, kiddo,” he murmured, brimming with pride. “Couldn’t have asked any more of you.”

That brought a lump to Harry’s throat, and he blinked away the tears that threatened to spill. How could Sirius say that, when so many people had died?

Draco poked him hard in the side. “Get that look off your face,” he scolded. “You’re not responsible for every person who walked on that battlefield, the same way I’m not responsible for every person who needed healing out there. Agreed?”

Well, there was little Harry could do to argue that.

As the morning stretched on, Sirius relayed everything that had happened after they had parted the day before. The Ministry had indeed been mostly empty, and it hadn’t been difficult to separate out the genuine Dark loyalists with those who had just been too scared to go against it. The Ministry had been reclaimed, and Kingsley and Tonks — who Harry hadn’t seen yet, and was relieved to hear was alive — had arranged for all the surviving Death Eaters from the battle to be contained at the Ministry holding cells, their wands snapped if they hadn’t been already. It amused Harry to hear that almost no Death Eaters had wands intact by the time the battle ended; the HA had very much taken that lesson to heart, the ruthless little blighters.

So the word had started to spread around the country, the owls of Hogwarts put to good use as people sent letters to loved ones in hiding. It would take a while, for everyone to return to their homes — if they still had homes — and to pick up the pieces of their lives, but they had time now. They had peace.

The later it got, the more people began to show up. The tables filled with an assortment of breakfast foods as if it were a normal school morning, and Harry was so ravenous from his extended sleep he ate a whole second breakfast while chatting with Cassius and Oliver. The keeper apparently had some new scars from a Flaying curse, but it was nothing permanent. He kept sending adoring looks at Cassius, detailing to anyone who would listen how the man had jumped in to save him from certain death.

Harry was startled when the post arrived — for some reason he’d forgotten entirely that such things still happened. Letters had been so rare for the last month, everyone too worried about interception.

A copy of the Daily Prophet fell to the table in front of Sirius, and Harry groaned loudly at the front page.

'Boy-Who-Lived becomes Man-Who-Defeated. You-Know-Who dead, Ministry reclaimed.'

"They couldn't come up with a better nickname?" Harry complained, glaring at the paper.
"'Man-Who-Defeated', Merlin, that's even more of a mouthful than the last."

"At least you're a man now," Charlie pointed out amusedly. "Won't have to live with being called a boy forever."

That was hardly a glowing endorsement, and Harry continued to scowl, eyeing the picture of him stood bloodied and dishevelled in the midst of all the destruction, his wand at his side. When the hell had someone even gotten that picture? Who brought a camera to a battle?

Sirius spread the paper out over the table so everyone could read it — inside, there was a long article recounting the battle from someone who had apparently been 'in the centre of the action', though Harry didn't recognise the name in the byline. To their credit, it was a fairly accurate account of things. A lot of it was information that was brand new to Harry; he'd been a bit single-minded at the time, and hadn't noticed a lot of what was going on around him. He hadn't known about the troll that made it all the way to the castle walls only to be slaughtered by the animated suits of armour, or the house elf that had bludgeoned Amycus Carrow to death with a cast-iron pan. From the description of the elf, it was very likely Dobby. Harry hadn't realised his small friend was so bloodthirsty.

For eight pages the article went on about the battle, and then it led into a much shorter description of the reclaiming of the Ministry — no one involved had wanted to share details, it seemed. At the end, a full page was taken up with a request for all those employed by the Ministry prior to the Dark Lord's insurrection to come into the office at their earliest convenience, to reclaim their jobs and begin dealing with the mess. It also stated, to Harry's delight, that Amelia Bones had been made interim Minister, and there would be a formal election as soon as such things could be arranged.

That delight quickly faded, however, when he turned to the final pages of the paper, and found the obituaries.

It was nothing detailed. A list of names, split into two sections; those who died fighting for the Light, and those who died wearing the garb of Death Eaters. The latter section was much larger, but it still made Harry's heart ache to see a whole twenty-nine names in the former section. He couldn't tear his eyes away from the neat printed letters; Colin Creevey, Hogwarts Student, 16.

Far, far too young.

Harry was startled out of his reverie by a commotion up at the staff table — a red-faced and crying man was being held back by two of his fellows as he tried to lunge at Professor Snape, who had just left the table. Rage flaring within him, Harry was up like a shot, hurrying over.

“What the hell do you think you’re doing?” he roared, raising his wand in defence of Snape, placing himself between the two.

“Even you’re defending him!” the man spat. “How the hell is he just sitting there, easy as you please — he should be in the cells with all the other Death Eater scum! We all saw him yesterday, right at his master’s side, the perfect little lap dog. We’ve all known for years about his true loyalties! Murdering piece of shit!”

The man tried to lunge again, but was held back, though there was a slowly gathering crowd behind them who looked like they may share the man’s sentiments. Harry’s stomach curdled — in all his relief, he had almost forgotten about this part.

“Severus Snape has been spying on the Dark for longer than I’ve been alive!” Harry growled. “He was with Voldemort yesterday because that was exactly where I needed him to be. Did you ever think that maybe there were plans going on that you weren’t fucking privy to?”

The man didn’t falter. “He’s got you right fooled, hasn’t he, Potter? Wrapped around his slimy little finger, believing he was on your side all along. He’s a traitorous little worm and he deserves to rot for everything he’s done!”

“Everything he’s done?” Harry repeated incredulously. “Do you mean all the Death Eater raids he informed the Order about in time for them to send help? Or the misinformation he gave to Voldemort for years? Or do you mean training me himself for the last three years so I would actually have the ability to last long enough to off the bastard?” He sneered, watching the man go from very red to very pale in a matter of moments. “I don’t need to explain myself to you,” he added hotly, “but safe to say Severus Snape is the only reason I was able to kill Voldemort— STOP FLINCHING, it’s just a name, he’s bloody dead!” he snapped, seeing how many people still shuddered every time he said it. “There’s more to this situation than you know, so don’t start thinking you have the right to judge him when you know nothing. Hell, he’s more of a hero than I am!”

The man still glared at Snape over Harry’s shoulder. “How do you know you can trust him? How can you put your faith in that greasy little turncoat? You say he wasn’t the Dark Lord’s — then he was Dumbledore’s man for a bloody long time; how do you know he isn’t going to kill you as soon as your back is turned?”

Harry opened his mouth to argue, but before he could get even a word out, there was a loud bang.

Remus Lupin had shoved the door to the hall open so hard it hit the stone, and was stood in the open doorway, absolutely fuming. His eyes glowed a vibrant gold, lips pulled back in a snarl, and even with his left arm in a sling to protect his healing collarbone he still managed to look intimidating. “Anyone,” he growled, stalking down the aisle between the tables, “who wants to get at Severus Snape, is going to have to go through me.”

The man arguing with Harry scrambled back a step in fear as Remus placed himself protectively in front of Snape. “We did not spend eighteen bloody years hiding the truth for some whiny little idiot to damn Severus for crimes he was forced to commit just to keep people alive.” He puffed up as if his hackles were raising, glaring at the man, looking exactly like the person who would lift a full grown troll corpse off a school child — and exactly like the werewolf he was, the predator everyone forgot he could be.

Then he straightened his back, gold eyes looking around the hall as if daring anyone else to try him. “I did not fight this goddamn war just to lose the man I love to your fucking prejudice.”

And then he turned on his heel, fisted his good hand in the front of Snape’s robes, and pulled him in for a fierce, passionate kiss.

Harry could do nothing but stare — Snape didn’t even argue, tilting his head for better access, arm sliding around Remus’ waist as the werewolf utterly devoured his mouth right there in front of everyone.

He’d known these men for years, known about their relationship, the truth of their lives, everything, and yet it was just hitting him now that he had never actually seen them kiss. Not more than a peck on the cheek, not in front of him, and always so careful never to get caught around the house unlike Sirius and Charlie, who didn’t give a single fuck.

Looking at them, Harry was sort of glad for that — if he’d seen them kiss, if they were always like this, back when he’d been a fourth year, well... it may have led to some very confusing dreams for him. Damn.

The hall was nothing but stunned silence. Until finally, a wolf-whistle pierced the air. “Put the man down, Moony!” Sirius called, barely holding in his laughter. “There are children about!”

Harry was sure that if his hands weren’t otherwise occupied, Remus would have flipped off his best friend there in front of everyone, but he did end the kiss, pulling back slowly and looking at Snape with so much love it made Harry’s breath catch. “I’ve waited all this time,” he said, still with a bit of the wolf in his voice, carrying clearly through the expanse of the hall. “They can’t have you. You’re mine.”

Snape’s kiss-swollen lips twisted in a smirk. “Yes, I think you’ve made that quite clear,” he agreed wryly.

Harry tore his eyes away, looking back at the man who had started the whole argument, who was utterly gobsmacked. “Walk away,” he warned, voice quiet but threat very clear. “Don’t involve yourself in situations you know nothing about.”

Finally, the man slumped, and allowed his fellows to lead him back to the table.

When Harry turned around, a smug grin took over his face, seeing Remus and Snape still in a loose embrace, Snape more dishevelled than Harry had ever seen him in public. “Well, that’s that cat out of the bag, then,” he remarked. Both men turned to look at him, Remus having the grace to look just barely embarrassed.

“It was going to happen sooner or later,” he said, shrugging, then wincing as he remembered he was still healing. “Can’t say I’m sorry about it.”

A quiet snort escaped Snape. “Of course you’re not,” he muttered, shooting his partner an exasperated look. “Damned fool Gryffindors.”

He didn’t sound mad about it. Harry laughed, hugging the pair of them, uncaring about all the eyes still on them. “I’m really glad you both made it out okay,” he said fiercely. He felt someone press a kiss to his hair.

“You and me both, cub,” Remus murmured. “You and me both.”

.-.-.

After that rather eventful morning, Hogwarts finally began to clear out a bit. Everyone was fairly fed up of being cooped up in the castle for the last month, and Harry was quietly relieved when he saw so many people packing up and heading out. He was really quite sick of being stared at.

Through lack of anything else to do, his body still weary and his brain still somewhat scrambled from everything that had happened in the last forty-eight hours, Harry remained seated at the Gryffindor table, watching the world pass him by. Occasionally someone stopped to talk — it seemed everyone wanted to thank him before they left the castle — but mostly he just sat with Draco and watched everyone else begin the day.

He was just contemplating making himself useful in the hour or so before lunch, when a throat cleared behind him. Susan Bones smiled at him, her left eye covered in patch made of yellow fabric dotted with tiny gold suns. “Susan!” he greeted, startled. “What happened?”

“Cutting curse to the face,” she relayed matter-of-factly. “Pomfrey healed the scar, but she couldn’t save my eye. It’s fine, though; doesn’t even hurt. I just keep bumping into things, my depth perception is shot to hell.” She gave a dismissive shrug. “Theo jazzed up my patch a bit, though, do you like it?”

Looking at the cheerful patch, thinking of the somewhat dour Slytherin, Harry grinned; that was unexpectedly adorable of him.

“It, uh, looks great. But that’s awful, I’m sorry.”

“It’s not that bad,” Susan insisted. “Still got the other one, after all! Anyway, I was hoping to catch you — Aunt Amelia is going to call a Wizengamot meeting tomorrow. She wants every eligible seat claimed proper, so we can start cleaning this mess up.”

“Oh,” Harry said, surprised. “That’s fast.”

Susan grinned. “You did your bit,” she replied, “it’s my turn now. We aren’t going to have a full session — there’s a whole lot of work to do before we can start fixing the laws around here — but it’ll be enough to get everyone sworn in and introduced and all that. Make the old relics who still have their seats aware that we’re coming for them.” She grinned a shark-like smile, eye gleaming eagerly.

For a brief moment, Harry felt very sorry indeed for the existing Wizengamot members.

A sudden thought struck him. “Have you asked McGonagall?” he asked, frowning. “I mean, she should be fine with it, but... half of us are still students, after all. It’s going to disrupt our studies, she should be aware of it.”

Susan frowned too. “I hadn’t thought of that,” she confessed. “You don’t think she’ll make us assign proxies, do you?”

“I doubt it. She knows enough to know we’ve been planning all sorts for a while, I think she’d be happy to let us just get on with it. Hell, I think we’ve all proven that external distractions won’t mess with our grades.”

That made the Hufflepuff girl laugh. “Fair point. Look, why don’t we gather everyone up, go find her in her office. Well,” she faltered, frowning. “Maybe not everyone. Parvati...”

Harry grimaced, that sharp grief returning. “How is she?”

“About as you’d expect. Lavender’s with her, so that’s helping a bit, but... I think she’s going to go home, as soon as the meeting’s over tomorrow. India-home, not England-home.” Susan’s lower lip wobbled.

“That— yeah. She should be with family.” He couldn’t imagine what it was like to lose a twin.

Sniffing quietly and shaking her head, Susan forced a smile back on her face. “Shall we go now, then? Do you know where McGonagall is?”

Harry rummaged through the castle’s wards. “She’s in her office. I’ll nudge everyone.” He sought out his friends, all the student heirs, pushing his magic through the wards to send them a prod and a mental image of McGonagall’s office.

Susan blinked, eyeing him weirdly. “That is bizarre, could you always do that?”

“I don’t think so? But I can now.” His connection to the castle was so much closer, now.

“Huh. I wonder if Hannah can do that.” She shrugged. “Not important. Let’s go. I— are you coming, Draco? Or is your mother going to keep holding proxy?”

When Harry stood, Draco stood with him. “She’ll keep proxy of all the other seats my father amassed — she’s still tracking down heirs for most of them — but the Malfoy seat is mine.”

“Perfect.” Susan linked arms with Harry. “She’s terrifying, your mum, so that works out well for us.”

Draco snickered. “I’m telling her you said that.”

“Please do. I meant it as a compliment.”

The three of them headed up to their headmistress’ office, and met up with the small crowd of other heirs at the door. Not all of them had come — some, like Hannah, were still in the Hospital Wing.

“Please don’t do that again, Harry,” Ernie said with a weary sigh. “I was in the shower and you frightened the life out of me.”

“Sorry,” came Harry’s sheepish reply. “Emergencies only in future, promise.”

Susan squeezed his hand, then stepped up to the door and knocked. “Come in!” McGonagall called, freezing in place when she saw how many students awaited her. She was sat at her desk, quill in hand, writing what looked like a stack of letters.

Condolence letters, Harry realised with a sick twist of his stomach, for the families of students who had fallen in battle.

“If you’re about to disrupt my day, Potter, you and your friends can come back in an hour,” she said flatly. Harry snorted.

“We’re not. At least I don’t think we are,” he promised. “We just need a quick word.”

All of them filed into the room, Susan almost tripping over the chair opposite the desk. She gave McGonagall the same information she’d given Harry, about the meeting gathering in the morning. “All of us are eligible to claim our seats, and fully intend to do so tomorrow. But Harry said we should run it by you first, since it means we’ll need to leave school sometimes and whatnot. I know Dumbledore strongly encouraged students to keep proxies until they graduated,” she made a face, “but that really isn’t going to sit well with us, Headmistress. All due respect, of course.”

McGonagall’s lips twitched. “Indeed,” she said dryly. “Well, Miss Bones, you’ll be pleased to hear that I have no intention of putting my nose in where it doesn’t belong; I am your headmistress, not your guardian. As long as your duties to your family do not begin to impede your studies, you’ll have no trouble from me or any of the staff about it.” Her eyes flashed. “It’s about time I took my own seat, after all.”

That reminded Harry of something he hadn’t even realised until that very moment. “What about the Hogwarts seats?” he blurted. “I— technically they’re ours. But they usually come with being head of the school...” Sure, they all had other seats of their own, but...

“If the founders’ magic has risen within you, it is for more reasons than just protecting this school from danger,” McGonagall said evenly. “Far be it from me to argue with that sort of magic. All four of you should claim your seats, as is your birthright. Though Miss Lovegood may need to come of age, first, despite the... interesting circumstances behind all this.”

“Luna’s making me her proxy,” Daphne volunteered. “If the hall allows it.”

Harry swallowed thickly, wondering if anyone had found Mr Ollivander yet.

“That’s settled, then,” McGonagall assented, nodding firmly. “I look forward to watching the lot of you turn the entire Ministry on its head.” The amusement returned in the barest curl of her smile. “Now, if you’ve nothing else to discuss, I have quite a lot of work to be getting on with.”

They left her to it, parting ways in the corridor as everyone returned to their plans for the day. Harry leaned against Draco, pressing his forehead to the blond's temple and breathing in deeply. "Do you need to lie down?" Draco asked worriedly, but Harry shook his head.

"No. No, I feel a lot better, actually." Susan's task had been just what he needed to kickstart his brain again, remind him that he couldn't start drifting into uselessness now. In some ways, the battle had just begun. "Let's go find Sirius. There's some things I need to get sorted."

Draco frowned, confused, but didn't argue.

.-.-.-

Perhaps Harry may have jumped the gun, just a little bit.

Between him and Sirius, they had a list of Black family properties currently being used as safehouses, and split it evenly between them — many of the people in hiding were not likely to trust a letter, or the Prophet. They would not leave until they could be absolutely sure things were safe for them.

So the pair of them left the castle together, and apparated separately to their first destinations. Technically Harry doing so was illegal, but he rather suspected the Ministry had bigger things to worry about.

One by one, he knocked on doors and greeted families, spreading the good news. He was hugged and cried on and thanked profusely, every house full of people whose eyes shone at the news they could finally rejoin the world.

His last stop was the Pottery, and by the time he got there he was somewhat light-headed from all the apparition jumps. Maybe it wasn't the best idea to expend such magical energy the day after nearly emptying his core fighting Voldemort.

But he was almost done now. Just this one, and then home.

As always, stepping through the Pottery wards felt like a warm hug, the whole place welcoming him home. A frisson of excitement ran through him at the possibility of soon making this place his actual home. Filling it with all the furniture from the Potter vaults, turning it into a space he could spend the rest of his life in. Build a family in.

There were a few kids running around the garden, making the most of the summer sunshine, and they skidded to a halt at the sight of Harry walking up the driveway.

"Can you round everyone up and come inside?" Harry called, catching Nashira's eye as she was the oldest of the group he could see. "I need to talk to everyone."

He hated the way her face hardened, clearly expecting the worst.

Harry entered the house, and immediately Essie and Tinker were in front of him. "Hi, guys. Could you get everyone in the house to the ballroom, please? Everyone in the tents, too."

The pair nodded eagerly, disappearing, and Harry headed straight for the largest room in the house.

The occupants gathered quickly, wary as they looked at Harry, hope creeping into their eyes at the smile on his face. He stood at the head of the room, waiting patiently until what looked like everyone was inside. It had to be at least seventy people — Merlin, he hadn't realised they'd crammed so many in!

"I'm guessing some of you have seen the Prophet this morning," he began, watching several sets of shoulders grow tense. "It's real. Lord Voldemort is dead; I killed him myself. The war is won."

A collective intake of breath, followed by a few murmured prayers. "All of you are free to go, if you wish. I'm going to give the Fidelius another week before I end it, just to give you all time to sort yourselves out. If you need to stay a little longer — if your home isn't in the same state you left it — that's absolutely fine. Take as long as you need to get back on your feet. There's no rush." He didn't want anyone to feel like he was kicking them out.

"It's the truth?" someone gasped, stunned. "It... it's finally over?"

Harry nodded. "We can't guarantee there isn't a Death Eater or two lying low somewhere, but we got all the ones who turned up at Hogwarts to fight. And we're working on straightening out the Ministry." Between Amelia and Kingsley, Harry was sure things would soon be put to rights, the staff thoroughly vetted — both for undercover Death Eaters, and for those just so corrupt and heartless that they aided the Dark for their own gain.

"What about us?" The small voice of Nashira, calling out clearly over the muttering. She was stood with her twin siblings and a huddle of other kids; all underage, and all with parents either missing or dead.

"Kingsley Shacklebolt is liaising with the muggle government to try and track down families of muggleborns who might have gone into hiding without using magic," Harry told the kids. "I'll be honest — we don't know how long it's going to take. But we're doing the best we can. If any of you have friends or cousins or other people you'd like to go and stay with, we can work out getting in touch with them. But all of you are welcome to stick around for the summer." Most of them would be going back to Hogwarts in September, now it was safe. Those who were too young even for that... by September, they would have figured out the guardianship situation. He hoped.

By the looks on their faces, Harry could see that at least the older children understood that there was a very high chance their parents wouldn't be found. Kingsley had said the muggles were pretty good at keeping track of deaths, especially those that had happened under suspicious circumstances in the last eighteen months — hopefully they could provide closure, if nothing else.

"We're in your debt, Mr Potter," Mr Pershore declared solemnly, squeezing through to the front of the crowd and dropping to one knee, holding his wand up in supplication. "If you need anything of the Pershore family, anything at all, it would be an honour to aid you."

At his words, several others kneeled as well, offering their wands. Harry coughed uncomfortably.

“There’s no need for any of that,” he insisted, fidgeting under the intensity of all that gratitude. “I just did what was right. If you really want to honour that, help us rebuild. Help each other rebuild. Magical Britain is a small community, in the scheme of things — we need to stick together.”

Luckily, that gained a general murmur of approval, and people got to their feet once more.

Now that Harry had confirmed the good news, the occupants of the Pottery jumped into action, the whole house buzzing with excitement as everyone made plans to return to their houses and contact their loved ones. Harry left them to it, smiling and promising to be in touch if anyone needed anything. At the edge of the wards, he gathered his tired magic for one last apparition.

The crack that heralded his return to Hogwarts was much louder than usual, but he was all in one piece, so Harry counted that as a win. At least, he did until he took a step forward and the world lurched sideways.

“Oh, dear.” A surprisingly strong arm linked through his, keeping him upright, and a delicate floral perfume tickled his nostrils.

Narcissa Malfoy smiled fondly at him, patting his cheek. “Overdone it a bit, have we?” she said knowingly. “I’ll save the lecture for my son.”

Harry groaned. “Do we have to tell him?”

Setting off towards the castle, Narcissa laughed. Harry tried not to lean on her too obviously as they walked. “You had better get used to it. My dragon is awfully protective of those he loves.”

“Understatement of the century,” Harry said, and she laughed again. “How were things at the Manor?” He knew Narcissa had gone to do much the same as him and Sirius — those staying at her house were even less likely to trust the word of the Prophet.

“They’re delighted, of course, but... many of them now have family to mourn, even if they’re really quite relieved that family is dead. It’s a difficult situation.”

Harry hummed in agreement, remembering how torn Draco had been when his father died. You could be aware that someone was a foul, bigoted prick, but that didn’t stop them being family. Didn’t stop you remembering the good times as well as the bad.

“At least they can start to move on, now,” he mused.

With the castle in sight, Harry took a moment to survey the grounds ahead. He hadn’t really given it a good look on his way out, too focused on Sirius and their plans. It was... well, it certainly looked like a war zone. All around them the grass was churned up, deep gouges of spellfire cutting through the earth, darker patches of what was definitely dried blood dotted about the place. The lake seemed murkier, too, and Harry did a double-take at seeing a tentacle breach the surface of the water holding what looked like a troll leg.

At least the squid was having fun.

"It's nothing that can't be fixed," Narcissa said gently, following his gaze across the bare expanse of earth. "I believe Professor Sprout and your friend Neville are already discussing the best ways to return the grass to its former glory. There was even discussion of a flower garden, as a memorial."

Harry swallowed thickly. He'd like that a lot.

"While I have you to myself, darling, I wanted to thank you." Harry looked oddly at the blonde woman.

"What for?"

She let out an airy chuckle. "What for, he asks! Harry, my son is alive, my family is safe, and I am not facing persecution as a Death Eater. None of that would have happened had you not been involved."

"I didn't do all of that," Harry argued. "You stood up against the Death Eaters after Lucius died. You helped keep everyone safe, too."

"But I was only able to do so with the knowledge that I had Harry Potter in my corner. Your name carries a lot of weight, you know."

He blushed, uncomfortable with the reminder. "All I did was fall in love with Draco," he muttered abashedly. "The rest sort of just happened, after that."

Narcissa giggled, squeezing his arm, resting her head on his shoulder for just a moment. "Indeed. Then may I just say I am very, very glad you did so. And not just because it led to my own safety." She looked up at Harry, grey eyes softening, creasing at the corners. "I have never seen my son happier than when he is with you. It is all I ever wanted for him in the world, and more; to be loved as fiercely as he offers his own love. We Blacks can be rather... intense, with our emotions." Harry snorted; that was putting it lightly.

"He deserves all that love, and more. He deserves everything." Everything Harry could give him, and then some.

"As do you," Narcissa said, and his chest tightened. "You are family, Harry, and I will do everything I can to aid you and my son in building the future you have worked so hard to reach. However that future may look; you have my support."

A lump rose in Harry's throat, his heart filling with an unexpected burst of warmth. "I have a ring," he blurted before he could help himself. "From the Potter vaults. I... he thinks he's going to be the one to propose, but I..."

Narcissa chuckled, mischief flashing in her eyes. "Yes, I daresay that will ruffle his feathers a bit, getting beaten to the punch." Harry held his breath, stopping in his tracks, as Narcissa took his hand and met his gaze. “You have my blessing, Harry. Not that I think you need it, but if there was any doubt in your mind — I cannot think of anyone better suited to my son than you.”

He swallowed hard. His eyes itched. “Thank you,” he rasped. “I— that’s good to know.” Narcissa was right, he would have done it regardless of her opinions, but... he would much rather have her on board.

“You silly thing,” she tutted, kissing his forehead. “As if I would turn you away. Sirius and Andi would never speak to me again, for one!”

A choked laugh erupted from Harry’s lips, and Narcissa gently urged him forward once more. “Come on, darling. If I’m not mistaken, it looks like there might be a party brewing.”

Harry blinked, looking up at the castle, the illuminated windows shining brightly in the gold-hued evening light.

A party sounded nice. But a nap sounded better.

.-. .

Luckily, Harry got his nap — Draco took one look at his ashen face and marched him right up to bed, muttering all the while about foolish Gryffindor idiots who didn’t know their own limits.

Draco napped with him, cuddling him close above the blankets, the window open to let in a cool breeze and the sound of birdsong. It was perfect.

They woke in time for a late dinner, and came down to the Great Hall to find that a party had indeed been brewing, and was now in full swing.

There were just two tables left in the hall, both laden with mouthwatering food, and Harry eagerly took a seat beside Ginny and began piling his plate high. “I like the hair,” he complimented. She beamed.

Where the night before it had been tufted and slightly charred, the left side of her hair at all sorts of ragged lengths in the wake of whatever spell had caught her, now it had been cleaned up a bit, made to look intentional — the side of her head was shaved to a soft red fuzz up to her side-parting, a juxtaposition with the fiery curtain of hair on her right side. It looked incredibly cool, and Harry wondered if she was about to start a new trend.

“Tonks did it!” Ginny enthused. “I actually really love it — I’d been thinking about changing up my hair, y’know. Wasn’t planning on something quite as drastic as this, but it looks way better than I expected. And feel how soft it is!” She grabbed his hand, lifting it up to stroke the shaved side of her head. It was indeed velvet-soft. “Fleur’s mum got my ear grown back, too!”

Harry hadn’t even noticed that; the entire top half of her ear had regrown, not quite the same shape it once was, but present all the same. “Congrats.” He tweaked the ear gently, making

Ginny scowl and duck away, laughing.

It looked like just about everyone who had come to the castle for refuge had left it now the world was safe for them — looking around the room, Harry only saw his family and friends, and those who fought alongside them. Except for a few he suspected were waiting on loved ones to be released from the Hospital Wing, it seemed the castle was back down to only hosting a few extra bodies. The core of the rebellion, still in need of a base of operations while they figured out how to move forward.

Harry had never seen them all so happy. The hall was filled with laughter and bright conversation, even those still recovering from injuries in good spirits. They hadn't forgotten what it cost them, of course — Harry saw more than one toast to fallen friends happen that evening — but alongside the mourning, they had to take the chance to celebrate their victory. To remember why it was all worth it.

The entire past Gryffindor quidditch team — Harry's original quidditch team — were clustered around the end of one table with their partners and Viktor Krum, Oliver Wood's exuberant hand gestures making Harry suspect they were talking quidditch. Charlie was with them, too, one hand tangled in Sirius' on the tabletop, both of them in entirely different conversations but still connected, always in each others' orbit. Opposite Sirius, Remus was practically sitting in Snape's lap; the werewolf was glowing with joy at finally being able to express his love openly, arm draped around Severus' back as he chatted with his best friend. Snape didn't really do 'glowing with joy', but he was smiling ever so slightly, and putting up with all the noise, so that said it all as far as Harry was concerned.

Most of the heirs were on the other table, none of them bothering to try and go home when they'd all have to go to the Wizengamot in the morning. Besides, they had earned this — they had fought in this battle that the adults insisted they were too young to handle, and they had survived it and won and they deserved to be proud of that. They were with other students, too; the HA past and present, all those who Harry had started out with just a Disarming charm and a simple Protego. How far they had come, now.

"Are you getting maudlin, Potter?" Draco asked with raised eyebrows, drawing Harry away from his perusal of the crowd around them. Harry smiled sheepishly, leaning into him.

"Not maudlin," he insisted. "Just... relieved."

Draco's gaze narrowed. Then he pressed a kiss to Harry's lips, and a glass in Harry's hand. "Have a drink and stop thinking so much," he insisted. "You've earned it."

Harry knocked back the drink, coughing slightly at the fierce burn of high quality firewhiskey. "Blimey. Where'd that come from?"

"Charlie," Draco told him, smirking and topping up Harry's glass. "He stopped by the dragon reserve to check in with work, and I guess someone over there had a big stash of the good stuff, decided to share."

That explained a lot, actually; from Charlie's stories, dragon tamers were notoriously good at handling their alcohol. Harry looked down at the cup, then turned suspicious eyes on his boyfriend.

"Are you trying to get me drunk?" he drawled, watching as Draco's smirk widened, his eyes darkening.

"A drink or two won't hurt." His tone was even, but there was no mistaking the spark of lust in that quicksilver gaze. Harry leaned in, nuzzling his temple.

"If you want me to fuck you against the wall again, you don't need to get me soused," he breathed huskily. "Or d'you just want me getting all handsy with you so everyone in this room knows I'm taken?" Like they weren't already well aware.

Under the table, Draco squeezed his thigh. "Why can't it be both?" he asked innocently. "Slytherin dorms have all been emptied. I checked with the elves."

Heat pooled in Harry's gut. "Later, then," he promised, kissing his cheek and then pulling back, taking another swallow of alcohol. There was no need to leave the party early — they could keep it in their pants for another few hours.

As the food cleared from the tables and more and more alcohol appeared from seemingly nowhere — seriously, this was a school, where was it all coming from?? — Harry let himself finally relax, joining in with the festivities.

Fred and George, being Fred and George, produced a whole bunch of their indoor fireworks, which caused McGonagall to just sigh exasperatedly and loudly declare how grateful she was that they had graduated.

They all got up from the tables, mingling freely; adults and students alike, all levelled by their experiences, all revelling in the possibilities of the new future that awaited them. Across the hall, Susan and Justin were loudly expounding on their plans for the Wizengamot to a group of slightly terrified looking HA members, while Theo stood at Susan's side with a smile that said he was very proud of his girlfriend but also would be happy to murder anyone who stood in her way. Not far from that, Luna seemed to have started a dance party with no music, joined by a handful of people drunk enough to join in enthusiastically. Mrs Weasley was stood with her husband and a few other ex-Ministry workers, sending increasingly concerned glances at her daughter, who seemed to have challenged Viktor Krum to a drinking match. Ginny had a dismayed Neville on one side and a surprisingly enthusiastic Hagrid on the other, the half-giant cheering her on as she downed cider at a rate that had Harry goggling.

On the one hand, he could see what the Weasley matriarch was worried about. On the other, he figured Ginny had earned it. And Hagrid was supervising! She'd be fine.

Laughing to himself, he turned back to the group he was with, shoulder pressing against George. Draco and Blaise had wandered off to talk to Cassius and some others about Slytherin things — or possibly wedding things, Harry wasn't sure — so their two Gryffindor boyfriends had banded together.

“Harry!” The exclamation came from Sirius, who by this point was absolutely plastered. Harry couldn’t really blame him; the war was over, their family was alive, and his godfather had an excellent future ahead.

“Harry!” Sirius grabbed him by the shoulders, shaking him slightly. “You—you’re the best, y’know? I told Prongs, I told him when you were born — this kid is gonna be brilliant. And I was right!” He beamed widely. “If him and Lily could see you now! They’d be so bloody proud of you. I’m so bloody proud of you. My godson, defeater of Voldemort!” he shouted, and a cheer went up around the hall. Harry blushed, even as he smiled. “I love you so much, pup. You’re my son! Not, not really my son — I never ever touched Jamie’s girl, not ever, I swear it! — but, but, you’re my son in here.” He thumped his chest, over his heart. Over his godfather’s shoulder, Harry saw Remus stifling his helpless laughter in Snape’s shoulder.

“I love you too, Padfoot. And—you’re my dad, in here, too,” he added, putting a hand to his own chest, refusing to admit to the tears welling in his eyes.

Sirius blinked rapidly, his own eyes getting misty — then he leaned in and pressed a big wet kiss to Harry’s forehead. “Hey, hey Harry,” he pestered again, grabbing Harry’s wrist, stepping back. “Y’know Charlie?” He pointed at the dragon tamer, who was much better at holding his alcohol, sat on the edge of the table and watching his drunk boyfriend with an indulgent expression.

“Yeah, I know him,” Harry confirmed, trying not to laugh. Sirius’ eyes sparkled, looking between the two. Then he let go of Harry’s wrist, and stood right in the middle of their little circle of people.

“I am gonna marry that man,” he declared firmly, pointing his finger vehemently at Charlie. He stumbled closer to his boyfriend, poking him in the chest. “I am. I’m gonna marry you.”

Charlie’s smile widened, bringing out the dimples in full force. “Are you, now?” he drawled, raising one red eyebrow. “Well, I have to say it — that was a shit proposal, sweetheart. You’re gonna have to do better.”

All of them laughed at Sirius’ exaggerated pout. “I will,” he promised, falling against Charlie’s chest, the redhead’s arm automatically steadyng him around the waist. “I’ll do better. I love you!”

“I love you, too, Sirius,” Charlie assured fondly, kissing the taller man’s jaw. The smile that stretched across Sirius’ face was the biggest one of them all, and Harry couldn’t help but grin widely in response.

“I need another drink!” Sirius declared, straightening up and swaying as he did so.

“I really don’t think you do,” Tonks replied with a laugh. Sirius whipped around to her, pointing an accusing finger.

“That’s what a sober person would say!” he accused. “You need another drink. Or any drink. I haven’t seen you drink! Why aren’t you drinking?”

Now that he mentioned it, Harry couldn't recall seeing anything but water in Tonks' hand all night.

The auror blushed a furious red. "I just don't feel like it, alright," she defended. "I don't have to drink at parties."

"No, but you usually do," Charlie said, eyes narrowing at his best friend. "You're usually keeping pace with me. You didn't even get hurt, you've got no excuse!" Tonks went wide-eyed, her mouth opening and closing in soundless stutters. Suddenly, Charlie gasped. "Ohhh. Fuck me!" he yelled, much louder than intended, drawing the attention of half the room.

"Yes please," came Sirius' immediate response.

"Are you serious?" Charlie continued, ignoring his partner and staring wide-eyed at Tonks. "You're not. Are you—"

"Alright!" Tonks cried out, her purple hair turning red with the force of her blush. "Yes! Fine! You got me! I'm not drinking because I'm pregnant!"

Harry choked on his own drink. And then he heard a glass shatter.

All of them whipped around to see Kingsley Shacklebolt, previously mid-conversation with Amelia and Narcissa, staring with comically huge eyes in their direction, a growing puddle of beer on the floor where he'd dropped his glass in shock. "You're..."

"I'm pregnant," Tonks confirmed, quieter this time. "I was going to say something later. Privately. But these two idiots had to go and give the game away." She turned an annoyed glare on Sirius and Charlie.

Ignoring the splinters of glass in front of him, Kingsley strode over, not looking away from Tonks for a second. "You're pregnant," he echoed, once he was stood in front of her. His gaze dropped to her stomach. "There's..."

"There's a baby in there," she said, grinning tentatively. "Or at least, there will be, once it's grown a bit. I'm only ten weeks."

"You went into battle at ten weeks pregnant!" Mrs Weasley screeched as she hurried over, summoned by the talk of babies. "What were you thinking!"

"I was thinking I needed to give it every chance I could to make this world a place worth raising a child in!" Tonks defended. "I had a shield up. It was fine! It's fine. The baby's totally fine. Pomfrey checked." The last part was said to Kingsley again, who had gone ashen at the reminder of Tonks' presence on the battlefield.

"You should have told me. Before," he said. Tonks looked at him with challenge in her eyes.

"You would have made me stay in the castle," she argued. Kingsley didn't deny it.

"I didn't even know she was seeing anyone," George muttered at Harry's side, though the sound carried in the shocked silence. Harry snorted — he still hadn't figured it out yet??

Kingsley stepped even closer, one hand pressing gently against Tonks' stomach. Much closer than a co-worker would get, or even a friend. "A baby?"

"A baby." A cautious smile tugged at Tonks' lips. "Is that... okay?"

Kingsley's only response was to hug her tightly, lifting her off her feet and spinning her around, kissing her like his life depended on it. As he pulled back and set her down, there was a beaming smile on his face, wider than Harry had ever seen from the stoic man. "It's fantastic," he declared firmly.

"So that's why you didn't want the Head Auror job," Amelia said in realisation, brows drawing together amusedly.

Arms still around Tonks, Kingsley looked over to her, sheepish. "Um. Yes. Well. About that."

Harry laughed loudly, and all of a sudden Tonks was swarmed with people, all wanting to ask about the baby and Kingsley and how long they'd been keeping that one hidden.

George looked around at the unsurprised faces of everyone he stood with; Harry, Sirius and Charlie, Remus and Snape. "You knew," he said, "you all knew!"

"Tonks is family," Harry replied, an admission in itself.

"You'll soon come to learn, Georgie boy, that the Black family are very fond of their secrets," Charlie told his brother, squeezing Sirius around the waist with a conspiratorial grin. "I don't think I've had even a fraction of them! Hell, I probably never will. But there's a lot these little buggers have been keeping under all our noses for the last few years."

George looked almost put out by the knowledge that there was plotting and secrets going on without him. Harry patted him on the shoulder. "I'll tell you what I can some other time," he promised consolingly. He wasn't even looking at George — his gaze had been caught by movement across the room, a toss of shining blond hair and a careless push of shirtsleeves up to elbows. The heat in his belly returned. "Look, George, I'll see you later. In the morning. Yeah?"

He didn't wait for the bewildered reply, stalking across the hall and draping himself across a lithe back, kissing a pale cheek. "Hi," he greeted, wrapping his arms around Draco from behind. He canted his hips subtly, making Draco aware of the half-hard erection growing in his trousers. "Having fun?"

"I was," Draco confirmed, craning his neck to meet Harry's eye. "Did you need me for something?"

Harry grinned wolfishly. "That's a very loaded question," he replied. Several of the Slytherins around them snickered.

Draco didn't look remotely embarrassed by this clear — and fairly sloppy — attempt at seduction. Harry had never been more in love with him in his life. "At least let me pretend we have some sort of decorum, love,” he sighed, making Harry grin wider and wiggle his eyebrows.

“Why bother? I’m fairly sure they would figure it out regardless.”

“We did assume,” Daphne said with a long-suffering sigh. Draco’s ears turned a little pink, but he was smiling.

“Go on, Malfoy,” Cassius urged playfully, “go take our saviour here off to celebrate somewhere private before he starts really trying to convince you to leave.”

“Oh, I don’t need convincing,” Draco assured airily. “I had just planned for a slightly more graceful exit. But, Gryffindors.” He and Cassius and Blaise shared an exasperated look, and Harry thought he should probably be offended by it.

“Are we going now, then?” he asked keenly, peeling himself off Draco’s back but only enough to tuck the blond against his side.

“We are,” Draco said, gaze flicking to his friends. “Goodnight, all.”

“Be safe, you two,” Daphne replied with a blatant leer.

Harry tugged Draco away, ignoring the cat-calls from the Slytherin crowd — and then the much louder cat-calls that came when everyone else noticed the pair leaving.

“Good ni-ight!” he called to the hall at large, hand already sneaking up under the hem of Draco’s shirt. “Don’t stay up too late!”

“We could say the same to you!” Bill retorted to another round of laughter and wolf-whistling.

Harry smirked unrepentantly. “You’re all a bunch of fucking hypocrites!” he told them, laughing, the pleasant buzz of alcohol coursing through his veins. “And I think I’ve fucking earned this!” With that, he took Draco by the hand, tugged on the castle’s magic, and walked head first into the wall next to the door.

His next stride put him right in the Slytherin common room, stepping out of the wall next to the fireplace. Draco followed close behind him, staring around in awe. “What the fuck, Potter,” he said, stunned. “Since when could you do that?”

“I’ve been pulling passageways for ages,” Harry said, frowning in confusion. Draco goggled.

“Passageways! Not transporting through walls!”

Oh, that. Harry hadn’t really been expecting that either, but Hogwarts was full of surprises. “Came of age with both hands on the Wardstone,” he explained, shrugging. “The castle likes me.”

The blond blinked, gaping incredulously, then shook his head. “This is what it’s going to be like, isn’t it? Being with you. You’re never going to be done with the ridiculousness.”

“I hope not!” Harry said cheerfully.

Draco frowned briefly. “Should we have told Neville and Ginny about coming down here? So they don’t worry they’ll walk in on us in Gryffindor.”

It was awfully sweet, hearing Draco worried about such things, but Harry waved a careless hand. “Nev’s an heir, he’ll check the wards, figure it out.” They would probably appreciate the dorm room to themselves.

Apparently satisfied with that answer, Draco tugged on his hand, heading towards the dorms, but Harry didn’t move. “Don’t tell me you were just teasing, Harry,” the Slytherin drawled, eyes darkening. He let go of Harry, adjusting his rolled-up sleeves, forearms flexing like he knew exactly what that did to Harry’s insides, the smug bastard.

“Oh, I’m not teasing,” Harry assured, reaching out to undo the top button of Draco’s shirt. “But you missed something, love.” He undid another button, fingers just barely brushing Draco’s chest.

“What did I miss?” Draco asked breathlessly, sliding hands down to grab Harry’s backside. Harry’s answering smirk was pure and utter Slytherin seduction.

“They cleared out the dorms. All the dorms.” Draco still didn’t seem to get it. “We, my love, are currently the only two people present in the entire Slytherin dungeon.” The light dawned in Draco’s eyes. “And, as the heir of Slytherin, I can keep it that way.” It was the work of barely a thought to lock the common room entrance, make it so that not even Snape could gain access.

He finished unbuttoning Draco’s shirt, pushing it back off the blond’s narrow shoulders. “Why go to the dorms,” he drawled, trailing kisses up Draco’s right shoulder, “when we can fuck right here in the common room instead.”

Draco moaned softly, hips grinding against Harry’s thigh, erection straining at his trousers. “I like the way you think, Potter,” he gasped, tilting his head back to give Harry better access to bite gently at his neck, sucking vivid purple marks into the porcelain flesh.

Harry walked him backwards, pushing him down onto the black leather sofa, straddling his lap and tightening a hand in that silky blond hair. Draco’s hands were straight on his chest, practically ripping the buttons apart in order to get to bare skin, mouth latching on to one of Harry’s peaked nipples, drawing a cry from the Gryffindor. He shed his shirt, pulling back, undoing the zip of his jeans before the pressure within got to the point of painful. Shimmying them down his hips and kicking off his shoes, he stood in just his boxers and socks in front of his boyfriend, heart hammering in his chest. “This is your show,” he offered. “Your common room. What first?” He wasn’t going to pretend that this was the only time they’d be able to do this, or the only round they’d go that night. Harry had spent almost an entire day sleeping before, and now he was wired, filled with an almost manic energy and wanting nothing more than to stay up all night wringing as many orgasms as he could out of Draco's gorgeous body.

"I believe," Draco drawled, getting to his feet, gripping Harry through his boxers and making the Gryffindor's whole body jerk at the surge of pleasure, "that I was promised a fucking against a wall." Harry moaned, Draco's fingers trailing up his stomach. "That sounds like a good warm-up. Then we're going to go right to that table and I'm going to bend you over it and fuck you 'til you see stars."

He gestured to an ornate table off to the side of the room, likely a space where Slytherin students sat to do homework in their common room. Harry smirked at the idea, imagining Draco all throughout the next school year, trying to sit and study at the table and getting distracted by memories of pounding Harry into it.

"Sounds good," he breathed. "But that sounds like you think you can last through me fucking you," he added, raising one eyebrow daringly. "And that sounds like a challenge to me."

Draco smirked, pulling him close. "And a Gryffindor doesn't back down from a challenge, does he?" he drawled teasingly. "So get to it." He dipped his head, pecking Harry on the lips. "Impress me, Potter."

As always, those words sent a roar of heat through Harry — he looked up, seeking out a decent spot of wall, and quickly decided to use the very same section they'd entered through. He backed Draco up against it, expertly undoing the many buttons of his fly, kicking aside the trousers and underwear once he yanked them down.

Last time it had been a little clumsy, figuring out how it all worked, how to hold Draco up and still get the right angle and not risk dropping him when his knees buckled. But this time, Harry knew what he was doing — he grabbed Draco by the arse and lifted him up, gasping as their cocks pressed together, the blond's legs wrapping around his hips.

They stood like that, kissing languidly, arousal coursing through both of them as thin hands gripped muscular shoulders, Harry bracing himself against the wall and keeping one hand under Draco for support. If he had to use a little magic, that was just fine by him, not wanting to risk dropping his partner. He bucked his hips against Draco's, both of them crying out. Harry was on far too short a trigger for a long build-up, and he adjusted their position, hitching Draco a little higher so he could line things up properly.

"Lube?" Draco reminded, and Harry rolled his eyes, reaching out with his magic — flying through the open door to Draco's dormitory was a vial of lube, left behind when the boy packed up to move to the Tower. He uncorked it with his teeth, letting his magic do most of the work in holding Draco up as he coated fingers in the slick substance, finding Draco's hole. Even with the slightly unfamiliar angle, Harry was an expert in Draco's body by now, easily finding that sweet spot and crooking his fingers to press against it. Draco's hands tightened on his shoulders, a moan escaping him as his cock left a damp smear on his belly.

"So sure about that challenge?" Harry teased, breath hot on Draco's neck, grazing his teeth lightly across the blond's sensitive skin.

“Fucking get on with it,” Draco demanded, heels digging into Harry’s thighs, trying to pull him ever closer.

Happy to comply, Harry slicked himself up, taking a steady breath as he slid into his lover, stars sparkling behind closed eyelids at the tight heat enveloping him. Draco’s breathy moan echoed in his ear, fingernails digging in to his shoulders almost painfully. Harry snuck his slick hand between them, but Draco slapped him away. “No touching,” he scolded. “S cheating.”

Harry grinned — Draco was that close already, was he?

The blond didn’t stand a chance.

One hand against the stone, Harry set a fast pace, fucking deep into Draco while the blond gasped with every thrust. He opened his eyes, watching the ecstasy on Draco’s face, suddenly hit with the knowledge that they were free, the war was over, he could have this forever. He jerked his hips harder, biting at Draco’s shoulder, chasing Draco’s orgasm and his own. The angle was perfect, pressing right against the Slytherin’s prostate, and Harry could see the strain in his neck as he built ever closer to release. His skin flushed rosy pink, his head tipped back against the wall, his cries echoing through the Slytherin common room — such an open area, so exposed, but private and just for them for now, for the rest of the summer if they wanted it.

“Draco,” he hissed, in what might have been English but could well have been Parseltongue. “Draco, come on. Come for me, love.” He was so close, he could feel it, the blond’s heart beating so fast, sweat dripping down the curve of his neck. Harry was so focused on Draco’s pleasure he hardly noticed the swift rising of his own — his ears began to ring and the tight coil in his belly tightened further, right on the crest of bliss. One more thrust and suddenly the heat around his cock got tighter, Draco’s whole body spasming, and it was too much; Harry went tense, orgasm punching through him with a visceral wave of utter perfection.

He rode out the mind-shattering pleasure, trying not to crush or drop Draco as his brain short-circuited for the moment, until eventually the rush faded and he could hear himself breathing once more, hear Draco’s heavy breathing as the blond finally loosened his grip on Harry’s back.

His thighs began to quiver, his knees a little weak, but Harry stayed standing and grinned smugly at his lover. He leaned in to kiss him, gasping at the sensation on his still sensitive cock. “I win,” he declared, feeling the sticky mess on his abs. Draco scoffed.

“Because losing was such a hardship for me,” he replied, easing up the pressure of his legs locked around Harry, just a bit.

Harry had to pull out before the aftershocks overwhelmed him, leaning heavier against Draco, the blond’s feet lowering to the ground. The buzz of alcohol still tickled his nerves, but it was just a lingering tipsiness, a languid melting of his limbs.

“It’s a good thing there’s no portraits in here,” he mused, nose pressed to Draco’s neck, inhaling the scent of sex and sweat. He felt Draco laugh.

"Harry, there are definitely portraits in here," he informed the Gryffindor. "They just all ran for it when you started taking my shirt off."

Harry pulled off him with no small amount of effort, looking over his shoulder at the common room at large. Now that he actually paid attention, he could see at least four frames with various empty backdrops and landscapes. "Oh. Oops."

He looked back to Draco, leaning nude against the wall with come all over his belly and thighs, hair a mess and lips swollen and so stunning Harry could hardly breathe. "Well I don't think they'll be coming back any time soon," he commented, "so we can take a breather before round two." And maybe round three. Possibly even four, if he was really being ambitious.

"Just give me a minute," Draco murmured. "Can't feel my legs."

With a bark of laughter, Harry stepped in close, picking up Draco's legs to wrap around him once more. Then he carried the blond back to the sofa, both of them collapsing into the surprisingly comfortable cushions. Draco's elbow was in his side, and they were sticky, and leather was not the greatest thing for sweaty bare skin, but all Harry could feel was a tingling, electric happiness through his entire body.

It was damn good, being alive.

Chapter 106

Chapter Notes

Little late this morning. Having a bit of A Day. Enjoy~

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It was a very disgruntled crowd of people that dragged themselves to breakfast the next morning at half past seven. Even Amelia herself looked like she was regretting calling such an early meeting.

“Was I just really drunk last night,” Sirius began, nursing a cup of coffee and very clearly hungover, “or did you two walk through a wall?” He eyed Harry and Draco warily, and Harry laughed.

“You were really drunk, but also yes.”

“Yeah, I was wondering about that,” Anthony Goldstein piped up, raising skeptical eyebrows.

“Apparently that’s a thing he can do now,” Draco said, reaching for a plate of bacon. “The castle likes him, so he told me.”

“It does,” Harry confirmed with a shrug. “Neville, you should try it sometime. It’s gonna make getting between classes a breeze.” He was already thinking longingly of the extra time in bed it would give him in the mornings, not having to bother with all those stairs.

“Is it too late to resign as headmistress?” McGonagall said with a heavenward glance. “I don’t know if I can handle one more year of your shenanigans, Mr Potter.”

“It’ll be fine,” Harry assured her breezily. He stole half a bacon sandwich from Draco’s plate — now he had a cup of tea in him, he was feeling slightly more human and willing to try eating food.

Sharp footsteps on stone made all of them look up, several of the students making surprised noises at the sight of Snape heading towards them. The man was dressed in his usual black teaching robes, ever-present scowl on his face. However, he reached into his pocket and pulled out a handful of vials. The first two went to Harry and Draco, and Harry, as had become habit, uncorked it and drank the contents without even looking at it.

“Harry, you don’t even know what that is!” Parvati gasped, then looked fearfully at Snape like he might put her in detention for suggesting he would poison his student.

“Hangover potion,” he relayed with a blissful smile, the tension in his head easing and the rolling of his stomach subsiding. “Severus, you’re my new favourite.”

“Oi!” Sirius protested, only to be tossed a vial of his own. “Okay, yeah, new favourite, sorry Moony.”

Remus was not there to argue, but Snape’s lips twitched.

“I only do that for Severus and Draco,” Harry assured, seeing several concerned looks around the table. “I don’t just blindly drink any old thing I’m handed, promise.” He could trust those two — both to not give him poison, but also to know exactly which potions he could take safely at any given time.

Despite his scowl, Snape had brought enough potions for everyone who needed one, stoically ignoring any and all gratefulness in response.

“Did you just come to sober us all up so we don’t make tits of ourselves at the Ministry, or did you need something?” Charlie asked, one of the few people at the table who was far too used to Snape to take offense at the man’s general countenance.

“I am coming with you,” Snape replied. “Grimmets has confirmed that I am indeed still eligible for the Prince seat, and I am long overdue in claiming my birthright.” Harry was sure only he and perhaps Sirius and Narcissa could see the tension in Snape’s shoulders, the slight hesitation at his admission. He was nervous, confessing these secrets of his past to a group of mostly students.

Susan gasped, eye lighting up excitedly. “I wondered where Dumbledore’s last seat came from! It’s been you all along!”

“Indeed.” Snape inclined his head. “I went straight from Hogwarts to my Apprenticeship and then to teaching, so I was never given the opportunity to come forward. Dumbledore,” he sneered, “has been my proxy since my mother passed. It is high time that changed.”

“Doesn’t that mean Dumbledore’s got no seats left?” Ernie pointed out. “Unless he’s been willed any proxies in the last year.”

“I think we’re mostly present and accounted for,” Narcissa confirmed. “As far as I’m aware, the only sitting Wizengamot members who died in battle were ones who almost certainly willed their seats to my late husband. Unless they updated their wills recently, I should be gaining quite a few more.” She looked less than pleased by that outcome.

“I think some seats will have died off, now,” Draco mused, a dark edge to his voice. “Crabbe and Goyle were the last of their families. And I think the Lestranges have gone extant, too.”

“We shall see,” said Narcissa primly. “And on that note, we had best get going.”

“Do you have room for one more?” Professor Slughorn slipped through the open door, hands on the lapels of his velvet jacket. “I’m running rather late, my apologies. But I ate in my quarters, so if you are all on your way then might I accompany you?”

In all the chaos, Harry had completely forgotten that Slughorn was also on the Wizengamot.

“Of course, Horace,” McGonagall agreed with a half-smile. “I would be glad of the escort.” Since the battle, Harry noticed, the cane she’d used after being hit with all those Stunners last year had started to return every now and then. Seeing it made his stomach twist uncomfortably; a reminder that his battle-axe of a housemistress was not as indestructible and immortal as she had always appeared to be.

Slughorn brightened up, offering his arm to the headmistress, and together the lot of them set off out of the hall.

Harry walked with Draco’s hand in his, looking around the group in quiet amazement. Twenty-nine seats between them — possibly more to come depending how things went when all the Death Eaters were processed and all the wills enacted. Almost the entire Wizengamot, finally in capable hands. Harry was under no impression that they would all agree on everything, but he knew he could trust all of these people to make decisions with the whole country’s best interests at heart.

“I’m still very impressed the whole lot of you managed to convince your previous house heads to give up their seats to teenagers,” Amelia remarked as they strode across the grounds, carefully sidestepping around the battle scars. “Those of you with only proxy guardians is one thing, but the rest! Mr Macmillan, I am quite frankly astounded that your father is stepping down in your favour.”

Ernie shrugged, looking a little bashful. “We had a chat about it yesterday, when I went to get them out of hiding. I think going through this war a second time has made him reconsider what he wants in life. He was surprisingly agreeable to the whole thing, said that half our problems was the old traditionalists hanging on to their seats too long, and the Ministry could do with a few young revolutionaries.” He grinned at his friends, and they all grinned back.

The Ministry was about to get plenty of those.

Not every heir in the school had won over their guardians like Ernie had, though. Hannah’s mother, understandably, was retaining her seat at least until Hannah was out of her hospital bed, and very likely until after she was graduated too. But Blaise’s mother wasn’t retiring from the politics game any time soon, and Lord Patil wouldn’t hear a single word of it, so fresh from losing his daughter.

But it was a solid start. They had years, decades even, to get the rest on board.

“Harry, my lad,” Slughorn said quietly, prompting Harry to hang back a bit and fall into step beside the two professors. “That matter we discussed, before term ended — it has all been dealt with appropriately, I trust?” His eyes held a decades-old wariness. It took Harry a moment to figure out what he was referring to. Of course, he was concerned about the horcruxes.

“Yes, sir,” he assured. “All sorted. Every last bit.”

Slughorn just about shook with relief. “Good. Good lad. I had hope, when I heard about Severus and the snake, but... this old man’s heart can rest easy, now.”

Harry patted the man's arm, saying nothing more and ignoring McGonagall's perplexed frown.

The old professor might have made a terrible mistake in giving the information to Tom Riddle, but Harry could see how much the regret had been weighing on him ever since. It was a burden he was more than happy to relieve.

Past the gates, they gathered to apparate to the Ministry; the floo network was still being brought back online, and Hogwarts had not yet been reconnected.

"Harry," Amelia said evenly, once they were in the Ministry atrium. "After the meeting, you will come with me and complete the paperwork for your apparition license, yes?"

It was only then that Harry realised he hadn't even attempted to pretend he needed a side-along. Oops. "Yes, ma'am."

Susan snickered quietly at his meek response.

Looking around, Harry realised that this was his first time visiting the Ministry while there was actually work going on. The last — and only — time he'd been there, it had been deserted and he'd ended up destroying half of the Department of Mysteries.

He hoped the Unspeakables weren't still mad about all that.

Now, it was a hive of activity; still likely not as busy as it was supposed to be, given the number of people who had yet to return to their jobs and the countless empty positions throughout the building, but enough that their whole group apparating into the designated zone took a few minutes to be noticed.

"Good morning, Minister Bones!" one woman called cheerfully as she walked past.

"Morning, Minister!" another greeted, then dropped the briefcase she held in shock. "My word, is that Harry Potter?"

"Oh, Merlin, here we go," Harry groaned under his breath. The group closed ranks around him, but the damage had been done — all through the atrium, people were stopping in their tracks, trying to get a look at the seventeen year-old saviour.

"You'd best get used to it, pup," Sirius said apologetically, ruffling his hair.

Luckily, with Amelia heading the pack they could avoid going through the whole rigamarole of wand screenings, heading straight for the lifts. There were so many they had to split between the two, and even that was a tight squeeze.

Harry wondered if Susan, Neville and Daphne were remembering that fateful trip to the Ministry in as much vivid detail as he was right now.

"Y'know," Sirius said as the lift shuddered and screeched to life, "last time we were crammed so tight in one of these, Char, we snogged in front of your dad. You remember that?"

Harry was jammed into the opposite corner, plastered against Draco's front, but he didn't need to look to know Sirius was grinning smugly. He groaned, head falling forward on Draco's shoulder. "More information than we needed, Padfoot."

"Just trying to ease the tension!" Sirius defended. "Honestly, you'd think we were all headed into another battle! This is the easy part."

They were saved having to try and find a response to that by the lift slamming uncomfortably to a halt, practically spitting them all out when the doors opened. Sirius was still grinning, winking at Harry when he caught his godson's eye. Harry had to admit, it was a good distraction from the way they turned past the door to the Department of Mysteries and towards the Wizengamot meeting room.

"This is where we leave you, then," Amelia declared softly, pausing at the door. "You all know what to do."

She pressed a kiss to Susan's brow, then she and the others who had already claimed their seats entered the hall. The Wizengamot would need to be in session before any further claims could be acknowledged.

The wait was excruciating. Harry tried not to fidget, but Draco had to grab his hands to stop him picking at his fingernails. He kissed Harry's palms, one at a time, then threaded their fingers together.

Even Snape looked nervous, if you knew what to look for. Harry sidled over to the man, leaning ever so slightly against him. "Think of how furious all those Death Eaters going to Azkaban will be when they learn that they've lost everything and you're now a sitting Lord," he murmured under his breath. Dark eyes slanted in his direction, and thin lips curled in a smirk.

Then at last, it was time.

The door handle glowed a bright green, indicating it was acceptable for them to enter. Somehow, Harry ended up pushed to the front, urged to open the door. Honestly, all his friends were so dramatic.

He squared his shoulders, and stepped over the threshold.

The magic of the Wizengamot meeting room felt... ancient. As ancient as Hogwarts, but different, more austere. This was not a magic that had grown off the blossoming power of children, but off the restrained power of adults trying their best to keep it to themselves. This magic had fed off the souls of criminals, and judged countless people worthy of their family names.

This was not a magic you wanted to mess with.

None of them spoke. When Harry looked up at the gathered Wizengamot, he ignored all the startled faces and looked straight at Sirius' smiling eyes, wrinkled at the corners.

“As the last of my family line,” Harry began in a firm, steady voice, “I, Harry James Potter, have come to claim the Potter, Peverell and Slytherin seats of my birthright, and relieve Lord Black of his proxy duties for those houses.”

The names he listed made several people gasp, and Harry wondered how the fact of him being Slytherin’s heir wasn’t common knowledge by now.

Then he felt the magic reaching into him, searching his core and his blood, checking he had the right to make the claims he had. Harry kept his breathing steady, holding back the instinct to fight the intrusion.

Three seats glowed with a bright white light beneath them. His robes shifted, becoming the plum garb of a Wizengamot member, and the magic converged electric-cold on his hand to form his lordship ring — able to shift between the three crests at his will.

Harry knew his choice was important’ whichever seat he took was the title he would be addressed by, though he had the right to all three. He walked forward, and offered Augusta Longbottom a smile as he sat down beside her.

“Welcome, Lord Potter,” Amelia greeted, inclining her head towards him.

Lord Potter. He was a lord, now. With all the powers and responsibilities that came with it.

If he had surprised the Wizengamot, then the next claim had some of them almost falling off their chairs.

“With the permission of my grandmother; I, Neville Francis Longbottom, have come to claim the Longbottom and Gryffindor seats of my birthright. I also claim the proxy guardianship of the Hufflepuff seat, with full permission of the current Heir Hufflepuff.” Harry filled with pride at the way Neville’s voice didn’t waver once, his head held high and not a hint of fear or shyness in his frame.

Beside Harry, Mrs Longbottom stood. “I gladly pass this mantle to my grandson, and relinquish all claim on the Longbottom seat.”

As she shuffled down the steps, her robes became a set of neat navy dress robes, while Neville’s transformed appropriately. The tall Gryffindor kissed his grandmother on the cheek, then headed up to take the seat at Harry’s side, giving him a shaky grin. Harry offered a discreet thumbs up.

One by one, seats were claimed. Some were expected — Theo; Anthony; Draco. The blond claimed his seat like he had waited his whole life for such a moment, and Harry saw Narcissa dab her eyes with a handkerchief. Daphne shocked many by claiming proxy of the Ravenclaw and Ollivander seats, waving cheekily at her uncle sat across the room in the Greengrass seat. Through it all, Percy Weasley diligently took notes on the proceedings, in his new official position as Senior Undersecretary to the Minister.

Then Severus Snape stepped forward, becoming Lord Prince, to the most prominent silence of all.

McGonagall was quiet but dignified in claiming the Ross seat, and at last Susan was the final person to step into the centre of the room. Many of the older Wizengamot members were eyeing her with confusion, unsure why she would be there when her aunt was clearly planning to stay in power.

“With the permission of my aunt, I, Susan Constance Bones, have come to claim the Bones seat of my birthright.”

“I gladly pass this mantle to my niece, and relinquish all claim on the Bones seat,” Amelia replied formally. She had no need to move seats, as she was occupying the Minister’s seat in the room. Beside her, Arasi Shafiq gasped.

“Minister Bones, this is highly irregular,” he burst out as Susan claimed her seat. “You do realise that should you fail to win the election, you will no longer have any place within the Wizengamot?”

“I am aware, Lord Shafiq,” Amelia replied mildly. Harry had to admire her confidence, in making that irreversible move. “I also—“ She cut off mid sentence, as the door opened once more.

Draco’s sharp intake of breath was the only sound within the hall as two girls walked hesitantly into the room. “I— are we too late?” Pansy Parkinson asked, wringing her hands anxiously. “There were issues with the floo.” At her side, Millicent Bulstrode stood blank-faced and tense. Both Slytherins had been missing since term ended, feigning loyalty to Voldemort to keep from being disinherited and left with nothing. They’d hoped the pair had fled to Germany, to Millie’s betrothed. Feared much worse fates for them.

When Harry glanced over at Draco, his boyfriend’s knuckles were white around the arms of his chair.

“You are just in time, ladies,” Amelia assured with a smile.

One after another, the Parkinson and Bulstrode seats were claimed.

“As I was saying,” Amelia continued, “I also recently discovered that prior to her incarceration, Dolores Umbridge, Lady Selwyn, willed her seat specifically to ‘the Minister for Magic’.” Her lips quirked. “Therefore, with the permission of its bloodline, I, Amelia Grace Bones, do hereby claim proxy guardianship of the Selwyn seat, for as long as I serve as Minister.”

Harry wasn’t the only one who couldn’t hold back a snicker.

“As we can see, the magical family lines of Crabbe, Goyle, Lestrange, Travers and Crouch have ended, as judged by the Wizengamot Chamber,” Amelia announced, turning solemn. “Griphook’s bank have been notified, and will deal with the house assets appropriately. Lady Malfoy, your proxy guardianship of the four lines you have held is now ended — we thank you for your diligent care.”

Narcissa only nodded in acknowledgement. Harry was surprised by the last name — surely Crouch would have died out when Barty Jr died? Evidently there had been another magical heir to the family in the Death Eater ranks. They were all so intermingled, it made sense.

It was a horrifying display of how much damage Voldemort had done, that five families had gone completely extinct under his reign, and several more only held heirs through as-yet undiscovered bastard children and squib descendants. That several more families held only one possible representative of their line, right in this chamber.

It would take time to rebuild, and some things were lost forever. Such was the way of war.

“I call this Wizengamot session to order, as all appropriate inheritance announcements have thus been acknowledged,” Amelia said, her voice ringing out through the stone chamber. The expression that followed was one Harry knew all too well — he’d seen it on Susan dozens of times, that glint of mischief and that barely restrained smile. It usually came right before some bold move or unexpected bombshell. He braced himself, wondering what was to come next.

“With that said, I pass the floor to the new Lady Bones,” she continued. “She has brought a number of concerns to my attention, and I believe they are best explained by her.”

Then Amelia sat down, and Susan stood behind her desk. Her eyepatch today was a pale lavender, and depicted the Bones family crest. Theo was getting really quite good at the details, now.

“Thank you, Minister Bones,” Susan said with a nod of acknowledgement. Then she reached into her pocket, and pulled out a small cube — which quickly resized itself into an enormous stack of parchment. A stack that, as soon as she set it on the table, quickly replicated itself for every member of the Wizengamot to read for themselves. Harry reached for his, grinning at the familiar handwriting.

“These are just our immediate concerns,” Susan informed the chamber at large, keeping an impressively straight face even as her fellow student Wizengamot members failed to hide their glee. “The further concerns can wait until the new Minister is elected and things are less dire. But as you can see, there is a lot to be done here.”

The adults in the room stared agog at this seventeen year-old girl, only two days fresh off a battlefield and already telling the Ministry what for.

Amelia Bones sat back in her chair, and beamed with pride.

.-.-.-.

They were several days past the battle now, and the celebrations had gone nation-wide. As wixen emerged from hiding and returned from overseas, magical Britain filled once more with people, all keen to celebrate the true death of the Dark Lord. Diagon Alley was thriving once more — the twins and Lee had been working non-stop on the fireworks orders coming in, while Blaise and the three ex-Gryffindor chasers manned the shop itself. Mr Ollivander had been found in a dungeon in Hampshire, and had returned to his shop like nothing had ever happened. Even Fortescue's had reopened. The Ministry, such as it was, was rushed off their feet with the need to contain the festivities and stop the muggles from noticing. It was certainly keeping everyone busy.

It was good, Harry thought, for them to have things to do. Without all that, he dreaded to think of how he'd just be... drifting. Thinking about the deaths of his friends, wondering how they could have been prevented. Parvati had left for India, promising to keep in touch in the last few weeks of summer. Harry hadn't seen Dennis Creevey since the battle, but he knew the boy had gone home with his muggle parents, who had been in one of the Black family safehouses.

Perhaps that was for the best.

But he had found himself with a rare afternoon free; Sirius and Charlie were with Narcissa, taking all the currently displaced muggleborns for Inheritance Testing at Gringotts. Harry had thought about going with them, but he hadn't wanted to overwhelm Nashira and the twins if what they suspected was true. There would be time to meet them properly later.

He and Draco were the only students left permanently in the castle, now. Though due to the entire extended Black family still living there, it wasn't unusual to find visitors in search of one or another of them. Amelia was around regularly, discussing the handover of the DMLE with Kingsley, who still didn't seem to have quite registered that he was going to be a father soon.

Harry was glad for the quiet. He had never been great in crowds, and while at first it was fun having all his loved ones surrounding him and so joyous with relief, it had soon become suffocating. The Chamber of Secrets had once again become a necessary refuge, though he did have to put up with Salazar now pestering him to start sorting out journals to 'accidentally' discover and release into the world.

This time he didn't need that kind of solitude, though. He wasn't hiding, per say, he was just... enjoying the view from the Astronomy Tower. Neville and Professor Sprout had worked hard to re-grow the grass, and other than a few dips that hadn't been there before, you could hardly tell what had happened. Plans for a flower garden were underway, with rumours of some sort of memorial statue.

Harry wanted absolutely no part in that, but he had warned both McGonagall and Amelia that if the statue was in any way shape or form designed to look like him or his lightning bolt scar, he would turn the castle to rubble.

But it was a nice evening, warm and breezy, the sun reflecting off the mirror-still surface of the lake. He'd not seen the squid since the day after the battle — perhaps it was sleeping off its large meal of troll parts.

"So this is where you wandered off to."

He turned, smiling at Draco as the blond's head popped up through the trap door. "Hey, you." Harry happily shifted over on his stone ledge, making room for Draco to tuck in beside him. The Slytherin straddled the ledge, one leg hanging over the edge, so Harry could lean back against him. Harry wasn't worried about them falling — Draco could turn into an owl, and he was pretty sure his own connection to Hogwarts would make him bounce or something equally ridiculous.

So they cuddled together on the lip of the tower, the grounds spread out below them. "Have you been looking for me long?" Apology seeped into Harry's tone. Draco rubbed Harry's shoulder.

"Not really. Checked the obvious places, then went and asked Hannah. Thought you might be down in the Chamber."

Harry forgot that Hannah was still in her private room in the Hospital Wing. All other patients with long-term injuries from the battle had been moved to St Mungo's, but between the delicate state of her back and the unknown quantity of her connection to Hogwarts, it was decided she would recover best in the castle. A specialist in dark curses had come to see her, removing the last of the magic from her body; now it was just a matter of time while the potions regrew her bones and nerves and muscles. As much as they could manage, at least.

Terry Boot was in a holding cell, soon to be in Azkaban, having surrendered at the end of the battle. Harry hoped he rotted there.

"Want to tell me what's got you so worried?" Draco asked knowingly, tangling Harry's hand with his own. Harry sighed, slumping heavy against his warm boyfriend.

"Dumbledore," he admitted. "No one's heard even a whisper of him since January. I would've thought he'd have popped his head up by now, if only to try and say Voldemort's still not dead and I've got to be murdered to save the world." His lips twisted in a grimace, and he felt Draco tense.

"He's probably just gone and died somewhere from that curse on his arm," Draco said diplomatically, thumb running soothingly over the back of Harry's hand. "Uncle Sev did say he wouldn't have much more than a year left."

Harry wanted to believe that, he really did, but he couldn't shake the worry that something deeper was in the works. Dumbledore still had the Hallows, after all. Could he even die, with a power like that?

It made him sick to his stomach just to contemplate.

Lips pressed against the back of his neck. "Stop worrying about things that will likely never happen," Draco insisted, the soft nuzzle of his nose against the base of Harry's skull slowly turning him to goo inside. "If he's not dead, he probably will be soon. And if he does show up — you're the most powerful wizard in the country, and he's an old man on his last legs. I doubt he'll be much of a challenge for you."

The unquestioning confidence in Draco's voice made Harry smile. He made a fair point.

Surely if Dumbledore had some sort of mystical Death powers, he would have come for Harry by now? He would have revealed himself, tried to encourage the wizarding world to treat him like some sort of divine figure.

The gentle nuzzle became a firmer press of lips, and Harry became suddenly aware of an insistent press against his lower back, too. “Is that a wand in your pocket, or are you just happy to see me?” he drawled lightly, feeling Draco’s quiet snicker.

“Such a cliché, why am I so in love with you,” he mock-despaired, biting at Harry’s earlobe. “I just figured, while we’re up here and everyone else is busy... you always hear such scandalous tales of the Astronomy Tower. We could see what the fuss is all about.”

Harry swung around, facing Draco with an arched brow. “Now who’s the cliché,” he retorted. Draco just swooped in, capturing his lips in a kiss.

“Come on, you know you want to,” he cajoled, stroking Harry’s thigh, fingers tracing the inseam of his jeans.

“Pretty sure all the scandalous tales happen at night-time. Y’know, when the stars are out?”

Draco was unperturbed. “We can come back later, too. Pretend we’re breaking curfew, sneaking about like it’s fourth year all over again. I can’t believe we never came up here back then, honestly.”

“Too high a risk of getting caught.” That wasn’t a problem now, not with Harry’s ability to sink into the very stones of Hogwarts and pop out wherever he liked. “I suppose we can tick this place off the list,” he agreed, moving off the ledge, pulling Draco further into the room, where they were less likely to have an unexpected drop ruin the mood. He tugged on Draco’s belt. “Would be better if we were in uniform, though. More authentic.”

“I’ll show you authentic,” Draco muttered, rubbing Harry through his jeans. Perhaps they truly were going to take a nostalgia trip to fourth year, frotting against each other fully clothed and snogging until their lips were numb. Harry could absolutely get on board with that.

Then Draco paused, meeting Harry’s eyes. “Hang on, did you say you have a list?”

“No!” Grey eyes narrowed, and Harry faltered. “I mean, not on paper or anything. Just. Y’know. We’ve got a year left in this castle. I can travel through walls and control the wards. That leaves lots of places for me to get you off.” He moved his hands to Draco’s backside, gripping two firm handfuls and grinding their cocks together. “It’s not really a list.”

Draco leaned back against the wall, the line of his pale neck into his undone shirt collar drawing a needy whine from the back of Harry’s throat. “You make a fair point,” he said, rolling the words slowly over his tongue, considering the matter even as he snuck a hand under Harry’s t-shirt. He tangled a hand in Harry’s hair and yanked, kissing down his jaw. “But if there’s going to be a list, we start over on September first. Doesn’t count if school’s not in session.”

That was fair. A shiver of anticipation raced down Harry’s spine, imagining all the places they could try and have sex without getting caught. God, McGonagall was going to hate them.

“Deal,” he agreed, pushing his leg between Draco’s thigh. “Let’s just call this a practice run.”

.-.-.

The next school year was going to be terrible.

Severus could feel it in his bones already. Having to deal with all the damn students who had seen Remus kiss him in the middle of the Great Hall. Listening to the whispers of his star-crossed love and his tortured soul as a spy for the Light. Somehow, between Harry and Remus, the public had gotten it into their heads that Severus’ entire personality was also part of the ruse to keep Voldemort oblivious of his true loyalties.

They were trying to be nice to him. Expecting him to be nice in return! The world had truly gone mad.

He stalked into his quarters, pausing at the sight of Remus sprawled out on his sofa, dozing. Guilt wormed through him when the werewolf startled awake. “Oh, Severus. You’re back. What time is it?”

“Not long past four.”

“Why do you look like someone cracked your favourite cauldron?”

Severus scowled, but didn’t hesitate to sit beside the man when Remus lifted his legs up pointedly. He settled them back in the Slytherin’s lap, one knee bent over Severus’. “I just had to deal with a staff meeting in which no less than six of my colleagues tried to thank me for my contribution to the war, apologising for thinking I was truly so cruel all these years.” A slow smile crept onto Remus’ face, and Severus glared at him. “Pomona tried to hug me, Remus!”

Remus outright burst into laughter at that, which was not helping Severus’ ire any. “I’m sorry,” he said, though his eyes were still dancing. “Really, I am!”

“You don’t look it, you damned wolf,” Severus groused, propping his own feet up on the coffee table. Remus smiled wider, reaching for Severus’ hand. He played with the fingers, massaging the digits, often so tense from hours holding a knife or a stirring rod.

“I just— it absolutely baffles me that these people seem to think it was a lie. Pomona taught you! She knows you’ve been your own personal storm cloud since the day you left the damned womb!”

“Yes, well, she seems to think that the love of a good man has softened me, but I’ve been hiding it all this time to allay suspicion,” Severus explained, rolling his eyes, and Remus scoffed.

“I’m not nearly a good enough man for that,” he remarked ruefully. “If it makes you feel better, Sev, I’m sure they’ll soon stop thinking you’ve in any way changed since the war ended. Once they see you terrify all the students into submission once more.”

"If I can even look those students in the eye knowing they watched you molest me." Remus barked out a laugh, grinning like the cat that caught the canary.

"Okay, I'm not sorry about that one. I couldn't help myself. That has been a fantasy of mine since I was fourteen years old."

Severus would never admit that he, too, had sometimes dreamed of staking such a public claim on Remus Lupin.

"I just don't know what to do with all these people suddenly expecting me to smile or joke or hug," he spat the word like a curse. "People I hardly know, even! Going to the Ministry has become impossible." He'd gone a few times; first to sort out various family affairs, then to testify against some Death Eaters, and lastly to help the Department of Education with their plans to re-integrate the Hogwarts students who had spent the last year in hiding. Minerva had made him her deputy for some god-forsaken reason, and he was starting to think she'd done it just to make him suffer. "I blame your brat godson more than I blame you."

Harry bloody Potter, the beacon of light and good and Gryffindor; if the public were wrong about Severus, they were even more wrong about Harry, but they would one day learn that he was a sneaky little Slytherin shit. Right now, they believed that the hidden mentorship bond between the pair of them meant that Severus was secretly some sort of warm, jovial father figure. Merlin forbid the Man-Who-Defeated be trained by someone who was exactly the miserly, severe, dark-aligned bastard that Severus absolutely was.

"Our brat godson," Remus corrected. "I keep telling you, we share him now."

"And I keep telling you, you can keep him," Severus argued by rote.

He looked at Remus, studying the lines on his face — scars, yes, but the creases at the corners of his mouth and eyes, the furrow of his brow; those were all laugh lines, smile lines. Even though for twelve years Remus had had very little to laugh or smile about, he still remained positive, caring, compassionate.

Not for the first time, Severus wondered what the hell a man like that was doing with a man like him.

"Would you prefer it, if I were nicer?" he asked suddenly, cringing at the way it came out. "In public, that is. I understand that now our association is known, there will be... unavoidable social events. I have no desire to tarnish your reputation by being my usual self."

All of a sudden, Remus used his grip on Severus' hand to pull himself into a sitting position, his legs still flung over the Potions Master's lap. "Severus," he began, and Severus braced himself for the worst. "Severus, you have been an irascible bastard since the very second I met you, and that's exactly the man I fell in love with." The Slytherin blinked, and Remus' honey eyes softened. "I don't care what people think of me, if they judge me for being with you. Quite frankly it's none of their business. I don't care if they think you're some soulless old bat — I know you, inside out, back to front and all over. I've seen you at your worst, and at your best. And I've seen what you're like with people you actually care about; you are entirely capable of warmth and love. I see it every day when you look at me! As long as you don't hide that part of yourself away from me, or our friends, or the boys, or—" he paused, biting his lip, "or our kids. The general public don't matter."

Severus' breath hitched. "I... I doubt myself, sometimes. My... capabilities." His ability to express positive emotion. He still had a habit of resorting to cutting words when he got upset, even with people he loved. Especially with people he loved.

"Then it's a good thing you've got me here to have confidence in you," Remus pointed out, cupping Severus' jaw. "I'm sure it's awful having all these people crossing your boundaries and assuming things about your personality. But it'll pass. You just keep being your usual grouchy self, and they'll soon realise that you're exactly the same as you always were, except you're a bit less biased towards Slytherins and a lot less biased against Harry Potter." He grinned teasingly. "And all that changes with us is that I can finally laugh openly at your snarky little remarks instead of keeping a straight face. Honestly, anyone who thinks you don't have a sense of humour is just too thick to realise it."

Severus raised an eyebrow, hand resting on Remus' thigh. "I didn't realise you found me so... amusing."

Remus looked back at him with the same mischief Severus remembered from when they were teenagers. "Distractingly so, sometimes," he confessed. "All these Order meetings, and the staff meetings back when I worked here. Pretty sure Filius thought I had bronchitis, I was constantly coughing to hide my laughter." That gaze changed, sparking with heat that curled right around Severus' insides. "That, and the fact that I am unendingly and overwhelmingly turned on by the sight of you absolutely ripping someone to shreds with that razor-sharp tongue of yours," he drawled, a hint of a growl creeping in. "It's quite a problem, really."

Severus' eyes widened. But really, he shouldn't have been so surprised. Remus Lupin appeared to have been crafted by the universe specifically for Severus in every other way, why not also have him be aroused by what usually made Severus so hated?

Merlin, to think — he actually got to spend the rest of his life beside this man.

.-. .

Harry should have suspected, really, that Susan had tricked him. With her 'you do the hard part, Harry, and I'll take care of the rest', placating him and encouraging him to just take care of her little Dark Lord problem, promising he could rest when that was done, and then dragging him into this.

There was so much to do, now they were part of the Wizengamot. The actual rebuilding of the Ministry was not their problem — certainly wasn't Harry's problem, anyway, though he knew Susan was helping her aunt out. And sometimes Kingsley came to Harry for a quick chat about his opinion on things. But that wasn't really working on it! The man asked the same things of Sirius and Narcissa and Remus, even Snape!

But outside of that, there were just so many laws. He'd known this, logically. He'd spent more time than he cared to count over the last three and a half years reading through books full of those laws, finding all the ridiculous ones that were still somehow in place. Susan had made it sound so easy — like they would just make a big list of all the shit laws, throw out the entirely barbaric ones and re-write the less barbaric ones to be actually decent.

She had said nothing about the arguing.

In the Wizengamot chamber, every single law had to be discussed. It didn't matter that all of Susan's reasoning had been written out in very clear statements for the other Wizengamot members to peruse at their leisure, and it didn't matter that there was enough of a majority within their alliance that the laws were absolutely going to pass anyway — every one of them had to be brought to the table, and everyone was allowed to say their piece before a vote could even be taken. And everyone had opinions.

It had really quite disrupted the older members of the Wizengamot, the first time there had been any true resistance against one of Susan's suggestions — the suggestion to abolish the awful creature laws that stopped 'dark' creatures from keeping jobs, and get rid of the werewolf registration committee. Arasi Shafiq had aggressively pressed questions and scenarios against Susan in an attempt to make her back down, and had definitely not expected Daphne Greengrass to stand up and tackle his criticisms. Nor had he expected Harry to be right behind her.

The students quickly learned that the old guard, as they called them, had thought Susan the only politically-minded one of the lot of them, the rest of them led around like sheep, just agreeing with whatever their friend said. They didn't realise that all of them had spent the last several years helping Susan research these laws and consider corrections that wouldn't utterly terrify the wizarding world with their radical changes. That all of them knew these proposals inside and out, and had put more thought into every one than Harry suspected the previous Wizengamot had put in to an entire year's worth of meetings.

Susan might be their spokesperson, the one running the show, but that didn't make the rest of them idiots. They were young, but they were all capable. They knew enough of the world to know what problems they most needed to fix.

Personally, Harry couldn't wait for the Wizengamot and the Ministry to meet Justin Finch-Fletchley. They thought Susan was bad on her own...

They would learn.

Regardless, Harry was feeling quite duped by Susan Bones and her promises that restructuring the wizarding world would be less work for him than destroying Voldemort.

At last, the pair of them finished the reading they were doing in a small conference room off of Amelia's office; it was a counter-proposal to their changes to the laws regarding rituals for celebration, from Tiberius Ogden, and he had some decent points but Merlin it was a dry read.

"I think we can call it a day," Susan declared, rubbing at her face. She wasn't supposed to spend too much time reading, her eye not used to taking the full strain by itself. It gave her headaches, and then Theo gave murder-eyes to whoever let his girlfriend work herself up into said headaches.

“Please, God, yes,” Harry blurted, making the redhead giggle. “We’ve got some easier laws next, right? Nothing likely to get their backs up like this?” He hadn’t thought something as simple as bringing the traditional Yule and Samhain and Beltane rituals back into legality would be so divisive; half the purebloods had been secretly practicing them for years anyway. It wasn’t like they were trying to bring back blood rituals!

“Yeah, don’t worry — the next few are just abolishing all those stupid ancient laws about flying carpet regulations.”

Harry sighed in relief, packing up the papers around him into his new dragonhide briefcase. It was a belated birthday present from Charlie — ethically sourced, from a dragon who had died of natural causes. It was bigger on the inside, locked to everyone but him, and with the naturally spell-resistant hide could be used as a shield in a pinch.

Harry wasn’t sure what it said about him that, even with the Dark Lord gone, his family still expected him to get into the types of situations that would require an unexpected shield.

Packed up and ready to go, Susan slipped a note under Amelia’s office door to tell her they were headed back to Hogwarts for the afternoon, then the pair of them headed for the lift.

Even now, a week after the battle and with Harry in and out of the Ministry most days, he still got gawped at like the second coming of Merlin.

They stepped into the atrium, and immediately noticed something was off; there was a commotion further down the busy hall. Both of them had wands in their hands in a split second, creeping towards the source of the noise. Harry’s heart stopped.

It was Dumbledore.

The old man looked every one of his hundred and fifteen years, his body thin beneath his lurid star-spangled red robe, his gaunt face mostly hidden by his ragged beard. His cursed hand was still shrivelled — Harry’s gaze narrowed in on the ring on his finger. The resurrection stone. When had he had that re-set? Severus had told him the original ring housing it was destroyed.

“Really, I must get in to see Minister Bones immediately,” he was saying, facing a security guard who looked deeply unimpressed.

“Minister Bones is busy,” the guard said flatly, “and quite frankly, Mr Dumbledore, the things I’ve heard about you, you should be glad you’re not under arrest.”

“But that’s just it!” Dumbledore exclaimed. “I must speak with Minister Bones and get all this straightened out. It’s just a big misunderstanding, really; a silly thing that got quite out of hand!”

“You kidnapped Harry Potter!” the guard exclaimed, raising his eyebrows.

“It was a ruse!” Dumbledore said, “an attempt to distract Voldemort while Harry and I took the necessary steps to rid him of his immortality. There was never any true division between Harry and I!" he chuckled, giving that grandfatherly smile. "But as often happens with these things, the story took on a bit of a life of its own, and, well — Harry had to continue playing his part, or else the whole thing would fail."

Harry was done listening, fury rising in his belly. He turned to Susan, whose jaw was clenched tightly. "Get your aunt," he murmured. "And send a message to Mrs Frobisher." The stack of evidence of Dumbledore's crimes she'd been sitting on for the last few months was about to see the light of day.

Susan sped off, and Harry strode forward, the crowd parting once they realised who it was.

"All a ruse, was it?" he called, drawing Dumbledore's attention. "That's the first I've heard of it."

The old man's blue eyes flashed angrily, just for a moment, before they were back to their twinkling warmth. "Harry, my boy. It's so good to see you alive and well!"

"Really, because last time we met you had me tied to a bed with my magic bound, telling me how you needed to kill me to excise the evil within me from the world."

"You don't understand, Harry!" Dumbledore insisted. "I was misguided — I believed the piece of Voldemort within you could only be removed by your death."

"And all that stuff about how he was taking over my mind and turning me into his little minion, and how you bound my magic as a baby to try and snuff it out?"

"Everything I did, Harry, I did for your own good," Dumbledore said earnestly. Harry scoffed.

"That's the biggest load of bullshit I've ever heard. You did it for your own selfish gains — you got a taste of power after you killed Grindelwald, and decided you liked it. You manipulated the children of Hogwarts without them even realising it, turning them against each other — against anything Dark, anything traditional, anything different. You made them turn to you, praising you as some saviour of the light, when really you were destroying the magical world from the inside out! You saw the rise of Voldemort as your chance to cement yourself as the saviour once more, to have everyone worship you as the most powerful wizard of the age."

Harry smirked, watching Dumbledore stutter soundlessly. "And then there was a Prophecy, declaring a child was destined to be the one to defeat the Dark Lord. Not you. So you plotted, and you planned. And you took your chance when my parents were killed. Binding my magic, placing me with abusive muggles, leaving me entirely oblivious to my true place in the world. Then introducing me to magic through the most prejudiced good people possible, letting me hear all about how terrible and evil Slytherin house is, enough to have me argue the Sorting Hat out of putting me there!"

He couldn't stop himself now; all the things he'd kept bottled up inside came spilling out of him in one furious tirade. "And if that wasn't bad enough, you manipulated people I thought were my friends into spying on me, making sure I was making the right choices. You drowned me in compulsions until I'd throw myself into the danger that you orchestrated with a fucking smile on my face, and ignore every bit of the world except the bits you deemed acceptable for me! Was it fun for you, making your little plans to test how far I would go without getting myself killed? Making me hate myself, making me believe I had nothing — making me believe my life was only worthwhile as a sacrifice so others could live? You decided from the second you saw that scar on my head that I had to die, so you turned me into a living bomb, chaining my magic so tight that I'd level all of fucking Hogwarts when I came of age unless you chose to release it. All so I could fulfil my destiny and you could sweep in and take care of the rest, claim my death was a tragic accident and go on acting like your every word is fucking gospel."

Harry trembled with rage as he stared at Dumbledore, his words spent — what else was there to say? None of it would change anything. None of it would make Dumbledore feel one single speck of remorse for what he'd put Harry through, what he'd put all of them through.

"Harry..." Dumbledore's mouth drew in a frown, his eyes going serious. "I see now that you are not as free of his influence as I thought. All of these lies fed to you, this poison against me — can't you see how he lurks within you still? His soul, bound to yours?" He shook his head sadly. "As long as he is present, there is a chance for his return, a chance to ruin the peace we have all worked so hard for." The old man drew his wand, and Harry tensed. "I am truly sorry it has come to this, my boy, but sometimes difficult decisions must be made. It is for the greater good."

The first spell came hurtling towards him, and sent the crowd of onlookers scattering. Harry ducked it, firing back one of his own immediately. He could hardly believe this was happening, hardly believe Dumbledore was trying to kill him in the middle of the Ministry. What did he hope to achieve, even if he succeeded?

All people would see was him murdering their saviour. He was truly mad if he thought he could repair his reputation enough to save that.

But Dumbledore was giving it all he had; this was not like his duel with Voldemort, in this very space just over a year ago. That duel had been a show of power, a brag, a mockery. Not to harm but to make the other feel inferior.

This time, Dumbledore was aiming to kill.

But he was not the man he had been a year ago. And Harry was not the same boy he had been, either.

Draco was right; the power difference between them was almost laughable. Dumbledore was clearly trying his hardest, and Harry wasn't even struggling with it. Considering the other man had the Deathstick, the Elder Wand, it was truly a show of how far he had fallen.

Or perhaps the wand recognised Harry as a Peverell, and refused to try too hard against one touched by Death.

Either way, Harry knew he had to end it before someone else got hurt. There were at least forty other people still in the atrium, and Dumbledore did not seem to care about who he hit in the process as long as Harry was dead.

“Expelliarmus!” Harry yelled, hoping to Disarm the man so the aurors could deal with him. The spell hit Dumbledore with enough force to knock him to the ground, while the wand jumped straight into Harry’s left hand. The moment it touched his skin, it felt like a livewire pressing against him, power coursing through his body.

“Albus Dumbledore, you are under arrest!” Tonks’ voice called out over the chatter of the crowd. She strode over with a pair of aurors at her back, and Dumbledore gasped where he was crumpled on the floor.

“No! You can’t— you don’t understand! The boy must die!” He was clutching at his chest, craning up to look at Harry, shock filling his face when he saw the Elder Wand in the Gryffindor’s hand. “No! My... my wand.” The last word came out as a breathy croak, and Harry saw the exact moment life left Albus Dumbledore’s body. The Elder Wand seemed to shiver in his hand, warm against his palm. In the middle of the atrium, Albus Dumbledore slumped down, utterly still.

Not waiting for Tonks to move, Harry strode up to him. He had to know, had to see if there was any truth to this Master of Death business. Surely, as a Peverell — as Lord Peverell — he would feel something of that connection if it existed.

Harry dropped to his knees at Dumbledore’s side, looking right into the man’s blank eyes. As if in a trance, he reached out, placing a hand on his thin chest. He wasn’t breathing. There was no magic to him, not even a tiny fading spark. Just... nothing.

“He’s dead,” he announced dully, looking up at Tonks. “I suppose the shock was too much for him. That curse in his hand...” He trailed off; let the public make of that what they will.

They couldn’t say Harry killed him. Everyone had seen it was a simple Disarming charm he had thrown.

How much damage Harry had done with such a simple spell, over the years.

No one moved. No one seemed to know what to do now — Dumbledore had been raving madness to his very last breath, but before all that he’d been a beacon of hope to them all. How was one supposed to react to that?

Looking back down at the body, Harry’s gaze caught on a glint of something shiny.

Where Dumbledore’s withered hand was still at his chest, there shone the resurrection stone on its plain silver ring. Once a horcrux, now both so much less and so much more.

It was as if another entity was moving Harry’s body. Discreetly, as if just adjusting Dumbledore’s robe, Harry reached forward and slipped the ring off the blackened, shrivelled finger. He tried not to shudder as he touched the cursed flesh; that dark magic was long inert, now.

He pulled back, dropping the ring in his pocket as he got to his feet.

"I'm going back to the school," he said, looking at Tonks as he spoke, barely even noticing the rest of the room. Tonks reached out as if to hug him, to say something, but let her hand fall awkwardly in the space between them.

"Okay. I... we'll sort things out here."

That was all Harry wanted. No one stopped him as he strode towards the floo, picking up the briefcase he had dropped in the fight. No one said a word as he grabbed a handful of green powder and tossed it into the flames, calling for the school and disappearing in a whirl of ash and flames.

The floo spat him out into the Great Hall. Harry took one look at the people gathered there — Sirius and Narcissa and Draco and Charlie, staring at him with confusion at his blank-faced gaze, at the familiar second wand in his hand — and turned on his heel, walking straight into the wall beside the fireplace.

He needed to be alone.

.-. .

Alone, it turned out, was not quite how he ended up; in his emotional state the castle had interpreted his request for privacy in the usual way, taking him down to the Chamber of Secrets. The one place no other living person could reach, not even Neville — like Harry, he could now walk through walls in Hogwarts, but even the castle would not take him to Slytherin's chamber without permission.

No other living person was down there. But the portrait of Salazar Slytherin had plenty to say about Harry's abrupt arrival.

In a way, the castle did the right thing — Harry needed to talk to someone, but he needed someone who would understand, who wouldn't judge him. Someone who had seen far too much of the world to be concerned by Harry's fucked up and complicated feelings about the death of his old headmaster, technically at his hand.

"What if that's what the Prophecy meant all along?" Harry pondered, lying on his back on the sofa in Salazar's office, staring up at the ceiling. "What if defeating a Dark Lord meant both of them? I know Dumbledore wasn't exactly a Dark Lord but he was certainly cruel and manipulative enough to count for something."

"Does it change anything, if it did?" Salazar pointed out. "They're both dead now. You still live. That is all that matters."

"But... he was everything, to so many people. For a while he was everything to me." Dumbledore had been the most incredible person in the world, to eleven year-old Harry. The man who had saved him from the Dursleys and brought him to this wondrous world of magic and warmth and home.

And then Harry had discovered the truth of it all, and everything had been ruined.

"Often our idols will shatter the pedestals we put them on, in the end," Salazar said wisely. "Your Albus Dumbledore, while I'm sure a very powerful and capable wizard in his time, was just a man. And men are far too easily corruptible." He frowned down at his young heir. "You have hated this man for longer than you have loved him. You have spent months preparing to destroy his reputation so that he can rot in Azkaban. Now he is dead and gone and no longer has any sort of hold over your life. You should be happy."

Harry snorted bitterly. He wasn't sure what he felt right now, but happy certainly wasn't it.

"Are you upset because he did not suffer?" Salazar asked, no judgement in his tone. "Because he will not live to see you destroy the world's view of him? Because from the sounds of things, you had begun to do so long before today. He spent the last few months of his life in hiding because of you — he got to see the consequences of his actions, if only in part. And he got to see you succeed without him, see you loved and happy despite everything he tried to ruin. He suffered the loss of his dignity, the loss of his magic, the loss of his influence; all in a very public forum. Does that make you feel better?"

Part of Harry hated it, because damn it all, it did.

"I don't know what I want," he admitted. "I don't know what I feel. I just... I didn't expect it to go this way." This didn't feel like closure, or relief. He just felt... hollow.

"That's normal," Salazar told him, surprisingly gentle. "I daresay you have the right to be confused about it all. But I also think that the best thing for it is time, and comfort. From actual, living humans." Harry gave him a look, and Salazar stared back, unrelenting. "Go back up to the castle, Harry. Find your family, and that young man of yours. Allow them to help you through this — you may find they have a similar mindset."

Harry made to argue, then paused; Dumbledore had ruined more lives than just his. He'd cursed Remus with the spell to make his werewolf half hate him, to use him as an example of the kind of beasts that needed taming even if they meant well. He'd let Sirius languish in Azkaban for twelve years because he couldn't bear to have someone around who cared more about Harry than the war. He'd forced Snape to do terrible, terrible things in the name of spying, and allowed the teenage Marauders to harass and almost murder him in the name of friendly house rivalry.

Maybe they would understand a little of what he was feeling.

"Fine, you win," he muttered, glaring at the smug portrait. "I'm going."

"Your life will be much easier once you learn to accept that I am always right," Salazar replied. It was such a Slytherin thing to say it made Harry snort as he stepped through the wall, reappearing in the Great Hall exactly where he'd left it.

Immediately, Sirius jumped to his feet, bundling him in a hug. "Oh, thank fuck, there you are!" He pulled him close, kissing his crown. "Susan came and told us what happened. Harry... I'm so sorry you had to go through that, love, I truly am."

Harry gripped the front of his godfather's blouse, throat aching and eyes itching like he was going to cry but the tears didn't come. He couldn't steady his tumultuous emotions long enough for his body to decide to cry.

Sirius just held him, murmuring words of comfort, carding a hand through his hair. "Everything is gonna be alright, kiddo," he promised. "It's all over now. Everything's done. You can rest."

Choking on a ragged breath, Harry did just that, burying his face in Sirius' chest and just falling into the embrace. Sirius kept him upright, leading him over to the nearest bench so he could sit and just hold Harry like he was a small child, cradling him. Harry didn't even notice when the animagus lifted his wand and send off a Patronus.

He did notice when several more sets of footsteps entered the hall. He raised his head, seeing the whole family — Charlie, the two Malfoys, Remus and Snape — come hurrying over, stopping just short of the embracing pair.

"Harry," Draco started, worry plain on his face. "I... are you alright?"

"We looked everywhere," Remus said, "where did you even go?"

Draco and Snape both had knowing expressions, and Harry just shook his head. Now wasn't the time to drop that bombshell. "Doesn't matter," he murmured. "I just... I needed some space."

"Of course, yeah," Draco agreed instantly. "Are you okay?"

Harry couldn't help but laugh. What a ridiculous question.

"Tell you what, pup," Sirius murmured, chin still propped on Harry's head. "I think it's time we all went home. We've been living in this bloody castle long enough — you need some distance from this place before you're back in it for the next four months."

"It would do my old heart some good if we didn't live in a place where you could walk through the walls whenever you please," Remus agreed, making Harry smile despite himself.

Home sounded good.

"I— I need to go pack, then," he started, trying to wrestle his way out of Sirius' embrace, but the dark-haired man held fast.

"The elves can handle it," he insisted. "Your friend Dobby."

"I'll send word to Minerva," Snape volunteered.

It seemed they wanted to get Harry home before he changed his mind, wandered off through another wall to a place where they couldn't follow. Guilt gnawed at him for that — it wasn't fair on them, he shouldn't have done that, he just kept worrying people — but he pushed it away, letting Sirius pull him to his feet and start directing him towards the door.

One of these days, Harry would have to figure out if his manipulation of the wards extended to apparating through them. Having to walk all the way to the gates was such a pain.

But not now. He was not in the emotional state to be experimenting with that.

The sight of Seren Du towering ahead of him made Harry's knees weaken with relief. This was a place that the war hadn't touched, this was safety and comfort and home.

Ceri greeted them at the door, beaming. "Ceri is glad to have Masters and Mistress home!" she chirped.

"We're glad too, Ceri. Would you do a round of hot chocolates up to the family living room, please?" Sirius requested. "And then when you've got time, head to Hogwarts and help Dobby pack up all our things? We left a bit abruptly."

The elf nodded, disappearing, and Harry dragged his feet up the stairs, still tucked under Sirius' arm. In the living room, the pair collapsed on the sofa together, Sirius easily shifting to cuddle Harry, stretched out across the cushions. A quick spell from Draco had both of their shoes removed, the blond offering a gentle smile.

Harry hoped he wasn't upset, didn't take it personally that Harry was so attached to Sirius. He just... needed a parent, right now.

Ceri arrived with hot chocolate, and Harry sat up carefully so he didn't spill. Holding the warm mug in both hands, he sipped the sweet liquid, feeling it run all the way down to his stomach. His shoulders eased, his brain finally able to think of something other than Dumbledore's eyes losing their twinkle for good, locked with his.

He looked up. Across from him, Remus smiled. "Chocolate cures everything," he said knowledgeably. Harry snorted.

"I just... I can't believe he's gone," he breathed, shaking his head. "I didn't—I didn't mean to."

"No one blames you, pup," Sirius said immediately. "Everyone there saw you use a Disarming charm. He was just old, and suffering under that curse."

"It's a miracle he lasted as long as he did," Severus confirmed.

Harry wondered how it would have been, if Dumbledore had died in whatever hole he was hiding in. How long before any of them would have known?

Would it have felt better than this?

"End of an era," Charlie murmured, "and a new one begins." He smiled encouragingly at Harry. "Good thing we've got so many of us making sure it's a bloody good one, eh?"

His words eased something deep within Harry's chest — the worry that he might be becoming like Dumbledore, or worse, like Voldemort. Too powerful, too unquestioned, too unfettered.

Too loved.

It was a different kind of love, he decided. He had the kind of love that was not blind devotion, but the kind that would smack him over the head and tell him he was being a prick when he needed it. The kind that would hold him accountable.

This was not one person building a new empire. This was a whole team of them, building a community.

He sipped at his hot chocolate, and leaned against his godfather, waiting for one of them to ask him to put a name to his feelings, to let it out, so to speak.

But they didn't. They all just remained silent, drinking and sitting with each other and offering merely their presence to ease Harry's heart. If he had wanted to speak, they would have listened. But they wouldn't push.

When Ceri came to collect their empty mugs, Sirius quietly declared it bedtime, making Harry realise just how long he had spent down in Salazar's office. No wonder they were all worried.

Every single one of them hugged him goodnight, even Snape. The tall Slytherin paused, his hands on Harry's shoulders. "You have released me from two masters, now," he murmured, eyes meeting Harry's, voice fraught with emotion, "I don't know if you understand how impossible I believed that to be. You are a marvel, Harry Potter. But you are not an island."

Then he kissed Harry's forehead and turned him around, straight into Draco's arms. "Don't let that old fool's nonsense get in your head," he said, louder. "He is but a footnote in history, now."

Harry nodded solemnly, and let his boyfriend lead him to bed.

It felt like a lifetime since he'd last been in his room in Seren Du. So much had happened since then. He was a different person, practically.

But some things were the same. Like Draco fussing over him as he put his pyjamas on, rolling into the centre of the bed to pull Harry close, their legs tangling together. "I love you," Draco whispered, lips pressed to his hair. "Whatever you need, I'm here. No matter what."

For some reason, that did it. That loosened off the vice grip inside his chest, shook out all the emotions jumbled up inside him.

Finally the tears came.

Chapter End Notes

Sometimes, the moral of the story is the things that are terrifying and insurmountable are actually things you are prepared and capable of defeating. And sometimes powerful men are not actually that powerful.

Chapter 107

Harry's first thought in the morning was to wonder where the hell he was. The second was that he really had to stop falling asleep crying in Draco's arms — it was starting to become a habit.

Draco was still asleep when he woke, and he laid in bed for a while, glad to be back in his own room. He hadn't realised how suffocating the castle had begun to feel, his brain still in war-mode long after the battle had ended. Here he could relax. He could start returning to normality.

He snorted quietly. What the hell even was that, for Harry James Potter??

He watched Draco, the blond's face relaxed in slumber. Watched the steady rise and fall of his chest, the way his arm stretched out towards Harry even while unconscious. He was so fucking pretty, face all high cheekbones and strong jaw, what had been pointy as an eleven year-old now evened out into features photographers would weep over. Narrow, sculpted shoulders and the smooth slope of his back, hitting a quidditch player's arse and thighs, toned and pale. Certainly the prettiest person Harry had ever seen.

But he drooled in his sleep, and despite all his excessive skincare rituals — or perhaps because Harry kept making him forget about his excessive skincare rituals — there was a smattering of acne flaring on the right side of his chin. His nose was a little crooked, where it had broken by his father's hand as a child. He was eighty percent limbs, all of which seemed to find a way to jab into Harry while they slept. He kicked the covers to the bottom of the bed every damn night, except when it was cold and then he stole them all for himself. There were marks on his skin now, war wounds he hadn't had the time to heal properly, silvery scars only noticeable if you got up close.

He wasn't flawless. He wasn't perfect. But Harry loved every last bit of him.

Normality was this, perhaps. Watching Draco sleep beside him, relishing in the quiet calm. Getting up and going downstairs where Ceri would have breakfast ready. Going for a fly, perhaps. God, he hadn't been on his broom in what felt like forever.

He had tryouts for the England national team in a few weeks. Was that normality? Either way he should probably get some practice in. Oliver would kill him if he didn't show his best.

All of those things — quidditch and friends and family — those were all normality. Going back to school would be normality.

Now, going to Wizengamot meetings was normality.

He had a life. And with Dumbledore gone, he could finally stop worrying about the ghosts from his past and actually live it.

Grinning, he skimmed a hand over Draco's back, gently shaking the Slytherin's shoulder. A rush of fondness flooded him as that perfect pink mouth screwed up in a frown, eyes blinking open in disgruntlement that immediately softened at the sight of Harry. "You're smiling," he murmured, reaching a hand up to run his thumbs over Harry's lips. "That's... not what I expected."

Harry chuckled, kissing him quickly. "I feel okay, I think," he said. "I think— it's going to be a good day."

Draco rolled onto his back, arching up in a stretch that made his spine click horrendously but also made his t-shirt ride up and expose the V of his hipbone. "Well, if the saviour has decreed it, it shall be so," he declared magnanimously. "What are we doing, on this good day of ours?"

"Breakfast, first," Harry told him, "then quidditch. Then... we'll see how it goes." He leered, and Draco smirked up at him rakishly.

"I like the sound of all of those things. Guess we'd better get up."

Downstairs, Harry's good mood was almost dented by the Prophet headline declaring Dumbledore's death, promising a full account of the story within. But the second, smaller headline perked him up.

The Ministerial vote would be happening on the 30th of August.

He leaned in a bit to get a better look, and Snape eyed him over the top of the paper. "Amelia will win," he said confidently. "The only person running against her is that idiot Hawthorne from the Order."

Harry vaguely remembered the man; he was one of Dumbledore's lackeys, one who had gone with Alastor Moody after the attack on Hogsmeade.

He didn't stand a chance against Amelia Bones.

Bolstered by that knowledge, he sat down, immediately presented with a stack of pancakes and a cup of tea. "Master Harry is not getting pancakes on his birthday," Ceri said. "But it is better late than never!"

Her huge eyes were hopeful, waiting for Harry's response. He beamed at her. "Brilliant, thanks Ceri. I've missed your cooking."

It seemed that was the perfect thing to say, as the elf quietly wriggled with delight before hurrying back to the stove.

They chatted over breakfast, about inconsequential things. Harry was inordinately grateful that they weren't looking at him like he was about to crack.

He had devoted enough pain and grief to Albus Dumbledore in his life. The man didn't deserve any more now he was dead.

“What’s everyone up to today, then?” he asked, peering around the table.

“Actually, pup, I wanted to ask you about that,” Sirius began. His voice wavered with nerves, and he reached across to take Charlie’s hand. Both of them looked worryingly serious, and Harry straightened up. “We, ah, got confirmation yesterday that Mr and Mrs Forrester were killed in what was probably a raid — muggles had it down as a gas leak.”

That was usually the cover-up. Sirius exchanged a weighted look with Charlie, then turned back to his godson. “We... Charlie and I...”

“We’re going to put in the paperwork to adopt the kids,” Charlie finished for him. “They’re confirmed Prewetts by Gringotts, so that’ll smooth things along.” Harry already knew that; the tests had been days ago, sixteen kids in all, and every one of them traced back to a wizarding family somewhere down the line. It turned out Charlie’s Great Aunt Muriel had a squib sister no one had spoken about, put up for quiet adoption as a child.

“They aren’t ready to leave the Pottery yet,” Sirius added quickly. “I don’t think Nash wants to until Frankie has somewhere to go. Which, honestly, might take a while.” The boy was a Yaxley, they had discovered, and there wasn’t a single scrap of that family left elsewhere. As a mouthy little Slytherin with a chip on his shoulder, he didn’t exactly have any friends with families willing to take him in. “But Charlie and I thought we’d go over this afternoon and ask the three of them if they’d like to be family. And then we thought we might go to Grimmauld, for a family dinner. Not the extended, just us lot. The house is empty now, and it’s somewhere familiar to them. A good place for you all to get to know each other better.”

He looked so tentative, the hope on his face so fragile, like Harry might throw a screaming fit and refuse. As if Harry hadn’t been rooting for this since the day Sirius had called him on the mirror and told him about the three kids with curly red hair and familiar blue eyes.

“That sounds like a brilliant idea,” he enthused, watching Sirius light up. “Why don’t you invite Frankie along, too? They won’t want to leave him behind, and we’ve got enough snakes in the family he won’t be overrun. Maybe he’ll warm up to Draco,” he suggested, grinning.

The pair looked surprised. “We hadn’t thought of that. But yeah, why not; the more the merrier, eh? Pretty sure Nashira and Frankie are attached at the hip anyway, by this point. We’ll have to acclimatise him to the family eventually,” Charlie said, snorting.

“Definitely a good idea to start with the Black side of the family,” Remus piped up. “The Weasley side will send them all running for sure.”

Charlie mock-glared. “They happen to think the twins are brilliant, thank you very much.”

“They would,” Severus said with a roll of his eyes. “I dread to think what kind of hellions you two will turn those twins into, even without Fred and George to assist. Perhaps I should plan to retire from teaching by then.”

“Come on, Uncle Sev,” Draco cajoled. “You survived teaching us, how much worse can it get?”

The Potions Master levelled the most dry, deadpan stare he could muster at his godson. “You have not graduated yet.”

At the other end of the table, Narcissa hid a giggle behind her napkin. “Well, I think that all sounds like a marvellous idea,” she agreed. “Just let me know what time to be home — I’m having tea with Miss Ashford this morning, to discuss her further education.”

“That’s the new Rosier heir, right?” Draco checked.

“Indeed. Poor dear has no idea what to expect from such things, raised as a muggleborn. Hogwarts teaches nothing about pureblood culture, it’s disgraceful.”

“Yeah, we’re working on that,” Harry assured. “It’s on Susan’s list.”

Narcissa’s lips quirked in amusement. “Lady Bones has quite the list indeed.”

That was an understatement if Harry had ever heard one.

“Well, Mother, I’m sure you’ll enjoy having a young lady to teach about etiquette and comportment and all the family gossip and what not,” Draco sighed, eyes flashing in jest. “You always did wish for a daughter.”

“I wished for a child that might sit still long enough to listen,” Narcissa chided playfully. “Instead I got a boy who spent all his lessons staring at the fireplace waiting for Uncle Severus to come teach him Potions.”

Both Draco and Snape went pink across the cheeks, though a pleased smile flickered across the Potions Master’s face.

“That’s adorable,” Harry declared, grinning at the pair of them. “Draco and I are going to play quidditch this morning, if that’s alright?”

“We’ll be around,” Remus confirmed. “Though with the way Draco’s healing magic is coming along, perhaps you don’t need us in case of emergency.”

“We will if the emergency is Draco crashing into the ground,” Harry reasoned wryly.

“Such faith in my flying skills.”

“I have faith in your flying. I have less faith in your ability to recognise that you’re not going to outlast me in a dive.”

Draco jabbed him in the side, then stole his last bite of pancake. “You’re going to regret that comment, Potter.”

“Oh, Merlin,” Sirius muttered, “out come the last names. Quit flirting and bugger off outside, I’ve had enough of watching the pair of you make eyes at each other.”

Harry laughed, refraining from pointing out what a hypocrite his godfather was, as he and Charlie were the biggest flirts of them all.

“Masters’ quidditch things is being in the shed,” Ceri piped up. “Dobby is putting them there last night.”

“Perfect, thanks.” Harry thought for a moment. “My practice snitch is still in my trunk, I think. I’m gonna run up and grab it; I’ll meet you outside?”

Draco nodded, brushing a kiss across Harry’s cheek before the Gryffindor could sprint up to his room. So focused on finding the snitch so he could get out in the sunshine and up in the air, Harry almost didn’t notice the things on the bed. Then he skidded to a halt, eyes going wide.

The bed was made — a habit after years of having to make Dudley’s — and there, in the centre, was a folded up cloak. His invisibility cloak.

He took a step closer, realising the cloak was not alone. On top of it lay the Elder Wand and the resurrection stone in its new ring, both items that had been in his pocket the night before that he’d completely forgotten about in his grief.

But how the hell did they get there?

With a hesitant hand, Harry reached out, brushing his fingers over the silky fabric. He had truly thought he would never see it again, thought it was lost to Dumbledore forever.

This Hallow can only be freely given. Never stolen .

He jumped at the voice that echoed through his head. His eyes went wide. Was that...

The truth that all the legends forgot, is that the Hallows combined mean nothing in the hands of one who fears Death. A true master does not fear their subject, after all.

Yup; Death itself was speaking to him, in his head. Or he’d gone mad.

Not madness, little Master.

I don’t want to be your Master; Harry thought at the entity. I never asked for any of this.

Exactly. I knew, when I created these Hallows, that they would drive mortals mad. That they would send souls to my domain, in their greed and lust for power. And I knew, when I offered these Hallows to three young men, that their family would be the perfect vessel for the magic I offered. It takes more than just ownership of the Hallows, little Master. It takes Peverell blood, and a soul that has seen Death up close yet does not shy away, does not seek to delay it. A soul I have been waiting for for a very long time.

Harry stared at the bedspread, at the cloak and stone and wand lying innocently on top. You knew it would be me, when you made them? How... how is that possible?

Time means little in Death, little Master. The voice sounded almost amused. Now, you have the Hallows. The strength of the Deathstick, the power of the Resurrection Stone, the protection of the Invisibility Cloak. I am at your command. What will you do?

Harry had no idea what that even entailed, but he knew the very idea of some other mystical destiny, some important power that was only his to control, just sounded too fucking exhausting to even contemplate.

“I’m going to go play quidditch with my boyfriend,” he said aloud, gathering up the wand and the cloak and the stone and chucking them all in the bottom of his wardrobe. “And I’m going to deal with all that later.”

As he hunted for his snitch, he heard Death chuckle in the back of his mind. A wise choice, little Master.

He grabbed his snitch, and didn’t look back at the wardrobe once on his way out.

Harry didn’t need time to think about it, truly. He knew exactly what he was going to do with those three items, the power they entailed.

He was going to keep it a secret, eventually pass the cloak on to his eldest child as tradition dictated, and die peacefully of old age without anyone knowing a single thing about the whole affair. That was not a kind of power he wanted to reintroduce to the world; Death had had its fun, letting the Hallows circulate. It was time to end that, now.

He sprinted across the grounds, seeing Draco waiting by the broom shed, both their brooms in hand. “You took your time! Forgotten what it’s like to use stairs like us common folk?” he teased. Harry kissed him with enough force to make him take a steady step backwards, pulling back to a look of surprise. “What was that for?”

“I just love you,” Harry replied, smiling widely. “Now let’s fly.”

He grabbed his broom, kicking off into the air with a whoop of joy.

Normality.

.-. .

As a child, Harry had often wondered what it would be like to have siblings.

When he was vey young indeed he had thought Dudley would be like a sibling, though that hope had quickly died. Then when he met the Weasleys, spent time in their house and listened to all Ron’s stories about his older brothers, the jealousy had settled in him once more.

Of course, these days he had more honorary siblings than he could shake a stick at, but it wasn’t quite the same.

Not like playing with Nashira and the twins.

Amita — Amy for short — and Tahan, both eight years old and coming out of their shells after the hellish year they had been through, were absolutely destroying Harry at the board game they’d picked out. And he was loving every second of it.

“I’m starting to regret having you on my team,” Nashira told him plainly, and he ran a hand through his hair.

“Look, I don’t play many board games, alright?” he defended. “Been a bit busy with other things.” Nashira raised an eyebrow at him, as if to say ‘that’s not an excuse’.

“Harry, they’re eight. And they’re winning.”

“Maybe we’ll do better in the next round.”

Over on the sofa, Sirius let out a bark of laughter. He was curled up against Charlie’s side, watching the four play their game with shining eyes, like he’d never seen anything better in his life. The family dinner had gone as easy as breathing, the four kids slotting into the whole affair like they’d been part of it from day one. The adoption papers hadn’t been signed yet, but Harry expected it wouldn’t be long.

“We would do better if you would stop being so nice to them!” Nashira complained, moving her game piece along. “You’ve had so many opportunities to knock them back and you never do!”

“I don’t want to make them cry!” As if on cue, the twins looked at him with identical wobbling lower lips and wide, sad eyes. Nashira scoffed.

“God, you’re useless,” she huffed, then grinned. “You’re gonna have to learn to stand up to them if you really want to do this whole sibling thing. They’ll walk all over you otherwise.”

“She’s not wrong, kid,” Charlie agreed, smirking at the Potter lord. “The little ones are always cute and adorable and then they turn out to be terrifying once they realise you’re weak to them. Look at me and Ginny.”

Harry snorted — it was true, Charlie couldn’t ever say no to Ginny, and the youngest Weasley knew it.

“Draco, help!” he begged pathetically, turning hopeful eyes on his boyfriend.

“Sorry, love; only child, quite like it that way,” came the blond’s even response.

Nashira put a hand on Harry’s arm, a tentative smile on her face. “How about next round we do me and Tahan against you and Amy. It’s always easier if we split them up.” The smile turned a little guilty. “I might’ve been throwing you in at the deep end with this round.”

Harry shook his head, looking to the twins, who had innocence in their smiles but mischief in their eyes. “I’m not sure I want siblings anymore,” he declared archly. “Not if you’re going to gang up on me all the time.”

Amy giggled, throwing herself into his lap and hugging him around the neck. “We’re sorry,” she said, not sounding remotely apologetic. “Nash said you were a Slytherin even though you’re a Gryffindor so we thought you’d be all mean like Frankie is.”

“Oi!” Frankie exclaimed, looking over with offence written across his face. He was sat with Remus, Severus and Draco — and had been practically shadowing his housemaster all evening. “Wanting to win isn’t being mean, you little brat. I won’t go easy just because you’re eight.”

Nashira gave Harry a pointed look, a clear ‘that is how it should be’, and Harry sighed, looping his arm around Amy’s waist.

“Okay, then. I can be mean. But if anyone cries, I’m blaming Nash,” he warned, then grinned down at his new teammate. “Let’s kick their arses, yeah?”

It might be a steep learning curve, but Harry was more than willing to figure it out.

.-. .

Diagon Alley was a place Harry hadn’t been in over a year, and he knew he had to face up to it. The idea of going to a place with so many people — people who would likely not be as polite regarding his boundaries as those at the Ministry — made his skin crawl, but he’d have to go there eventually. And he didn’t want to wait until booklists arrived, or the alley would be even more swarmed than usual.

So he made his plans, roped Sirius in so he couldn’t chicken out of it, kissed Draco goodbye, and apparated to London.

The sheer volume of the wizarding shopping area made his pulse pick up. Sirius squeezed his shoulder, eyes darkened with concern. “You alright, kiddo?”

“Yeah. Fine. Just,” he grimaced, looking ahead at the throng of people, “if you spend half this visit carrying a fox in your arms, I apologise in advance.”

Sirius laughed, ruffling his hair. “No judgement from me, after the amount of times I became Padfoot to avoid people.” Then he put his arm round Harry’s shoulders, and led him into the crowd.

Bringing Sirius had another advantage — the man actually had some shopping to do, so Harry wouldn’t just be wandering aimlessly and getting steadily more panicked. Sirius wanted to buy some presents for the kids to help them feel a bit more welcome when they eventually moved out of the Pottery, and it was Harry’s job to stop him going overboard.

“Do you know if Nash likes flying at all, pup?” Sirius asked, eyes landing on Quality Quidditch Supplies. “Because I thought about getting the twins some kid brooms and I’d like to get her one too, but I don’t know if she’d even like it.”

His fretting was adorable, and Harry grinned. “She hasn’t flown much since first year lessons, but I think she’d like to do more. Just — not a Firebolt, yeah?” They didn’t need to be buying a fourteen year-old with very little flying experience the fastest broom on the market.

“Right, yeah, of course,” Sirius agreed, nodding absently, his mind already on the prospect of buying quidditch supplies for the kids.

“And you should get something for Frankie, too.” Harry smirked. “Or maybe Moony and Sev can get him something.”

Sirius finally looked away from the shop, turning to Harry with a knowing sparkle in his eyes. “You noticed that too, then?”

The entire family dinner, Frankie had been utterly enraptured by the Slytherin half of the family, but more specifically Snape — and Remus along with him. And far from being as stand-offish as he usually was with students, Snape had quite happily talked Potions with the boy most of the night, meeting all of Frankie’s snide remarks with equally cutting quips of his own.

Harry had a sneaking suspicion it would not be as difficult to find a foster family for the boy as they had feared. Nor would Nashira have to worry about losing her best friend.

“Remus had that look on his face, and you know Severus is a total pushover for him,” he added, amused. No one would ever believe such a thing, but it was true, no matter how much the Potions Master denied it. Remus Lupin was his sun, moon and stars, and he would do whatever it took to make him happy. Even adopt a cynical, fourteen year-old Slytherin orphan.

Harry suspected, having seen the pair interact, that Snape wouldn’t need all that much convincing.

They were starting to get noticed for sure, now; whispers of both their names trickling through the crowd. Sirius was almost as famous as Harry these days — the Pureblood Lord, the last bastion of the oldest family in magical Britain, abandoned by the justice system for so long and finally reintroduced to the world. Sirius had been free for a year now, but it hadn’t exactly been a year for shopping sprees and social outings.

The pair of them together were quite the sight. Maybe Harry should’ve brought Charlie, instead.

But Sirius was remarkably good at letting all the mutters and exclamations slide right off his back, chatting to Harry about the pros and cons of the Cleansweep 9 as a good starter broom for Nashira, trying to persuade him that they absolutely needed tiny adorable matching quidditch uniforms for the twins.

“No house colours until they’re Sorted,” Harry insisted firmly, shaking his head at the child-sized Gryffindor uniforms. “You don’t want to pressure them.” Then he smirked. “Besides, you know Ollie will have Puddlemere kit for the lot of them sent over the moment Charlie tells him the good news. That man is just waiting for a load of kids to spoil rotten. He’s already sent a bunch of quidditch-themed onesies to Tonks.” Oliver Wood, despite his intimidating stature and professional quidditch career, was the textbook definition of broody these days, and Harry wondered how long Cassius would hold him off before seeking out a surrogate.

“Fair point,” Sirius relented, before darting across the shop to look at junior quidditch ball sets.

Harry didn’t argue that one. He quite liked the idea of helping teach the kids to play. They’d certainly have lots of instructors in the family, for any position they chose.

After Quality Quidditch Supplies, they went to Flourish and Blotts, though Harry wasn’t sure why when they had both an owl-order catalogue and also a bigger library than Hogwarts itself. With Harry’s own personal book collection, which he was happy to share, the kids weren’t likely to want for reading material.

Then, because it was truly inevitable with a Marauder and the son of a Marauder, they ended up at Weasley’s Wizarding Wheezes.

Harry hadn’t seen the twins or their usual entourage lately, as they’d all been so busy with the shop. Sure enough, the place was packed to the rafters, adults and kids alike all oohing and ahing over the twins’ creations.

“There he is!” Fred exclaimed, popping up on Harry’s left.

“Our favouritest little brother!” George appeared on Sirius’ right.

“And our newest favouritest big brother!” Fred teased with a wink at the dog animagus. “We heard you were about. Worried for a minute you might not come visit.”

“As if I’d do that.” Harry rolled his eyes. “Have you got time to chat?”

“Lee and Lissy are on it, and Blaise is around here somewhere,” George assured dismissively. “All the time in the world for you, Harrikins.”

“And we’ve got some presents for you to take home with you,” Fred added. “For the new recruits.”

Harry snorted at the description — indeed, sometimes it did feel a bit like the family was something you got recruited into, rather than the traditional method of acquiring new members. A bunch of waifs and strays, picking up more of the same.

They browsed the shop as they walked, and for the first time Harry hardly even got noticed — the shoppers were far too engrossed in the products to notice Harry Potter among them. They chatted with the twins, promising to sort out a big family dinner once things were quieter, catching up on the extended Weasley family gossip. Bill and Fleur had bought a cottage off the coast of Norfolk, and apparently Mr Weasley was looking at a promotion to the head of the whole Misuse of Muggle Artefacts department.

“That’s brilliant!” Harry enthused, beaming. Arthur Weasley more than deserved it.

“It’s not confirmed yet, they’re still shifting things about over at the Ministry — as I’m sure you know, Lord Potter,” George teased, ruffling Harry’s hair. “But Percy says it’s a sure bet, and he would know.”

Percy was, according to Amelia Bones, the most valuable asset the entire Ministry had. Something that made him turn beet red every time she said it within his earshot. In the days since Dumbledore's death, the pair of them had been working with Mrs Frobisher and a reporter at the Prophet to systematically point out all of the Ministry's corruption, as well as Dumbledore's crimes, and the involvement of those connected to him. Cornelius Fudge was getting a reputation as the worst Minister they'd ever had, making Harry wonder if the man would ever dare show his face in public again.

He couldn't say he minded if he didn't.

But Percy was absolutely thriving in his position as Amelia's Senior Undersecretary, handling all her organisational needs with relish and not once faltering at the sight of an enormous and extremely boring pile of parchment to read through in detail. And he had all his siblings back, too, which Harry knew he must appreciate.

They stopped to chat to Lee and Alicia too, though the pair were at the till and didn't have much time to talk. And Blaise popped up only briefly, kissing George, declaring he was going out for a bit, and telling Harry that he and Draco had made plans to gather the Slytherin cohort before school went back and Harry was very much expected to be there.

But at last, they had to let everyone get back to work, and after hugs and promises to catch up somewhere quieter soon, Harry and Sirius left the shop.

And bumped right into three people they did not want to see.

Ron, Hermione and Mrs Weasley were stood looking through the window of the twins' shop with conflicted expressions, and the blood drained from their faces at the pair that exited.

"Harry," Hermione gasped, brown eyes widening.

"Hermione," he returned evenly, inclining his head. "Good to see you're fully healed."

"I— yeah. Thanks."

An awkward silence fell between the group, and Harry was just about to start walking when Mrs Weasley reached out. "Harry, dear, we wanted to apologise," she started, eyes welling with tears. "I feel so awful about everything — Albus convinced me it was all for the best, and like the fool I was, I believed him!"

"We're really sorry, Harry," Hermione added sadly.

"Yeah, mate. We shouldn't have treated you like that," Ron said gruffly, looking distinctly uncomfortable at the show of emotion.

Harry folded his arms over his chest, trying to ignore the way his heart was racing. "I accept your apologies," he said, watching them all deflate with relief, "but I can't forgive you."

The trio tensed. Hermione bit her lip. "Harry, I—"

“I was just a kid,” he cut her off. “A scared, lonely kid who had never had friends before, never had proper family, and had no idea what any of that was supposed to look like. And yeah, maybe you two were kids as well, but you still should have known better than to fake friendship with someone just because an old man tells you it’s for the good of the wizarding world.”

“We weren’t faking! Not really!” Hermione protested. Harry just arched an eyebrow.

“I’m supposed to believe that, am I? Along with all the other lies you’ve fed me over the years? You called me a blood purist, Hermione.” She flinched, squeezing Ron’s hand. Even now, Harry couldn’t quiet the voice in the back of his mind that insisted they were only trying to befriend him now because he’d won, because he was famous — because Hermione had realised she’d burned bridges with just about every future influential member of the Wizengamot, and if she didn’t get back in his good graces she could kiss goodbye to her dream of taking the Ministry by storm.

He looked up at the Weasley matriarch, his heart clenching with an entirely different betrayal.

“And you, Mrs Weasley — you were an adult. You were a mother, and you looked at me, half-starved and terrified to do something wrong in your house because I didn’t know what the punishment would be, and you pretended to welcome me into your family. I’m lucky your husband and the rest of your kids were genuine — if all of it had been a lie, I don’t think I would have survived.”

He swallowed thickly, feeling the gentle press of Sirius at his shoulder, quietly supportive. “You let me go back to the Dursleys every summer when you knew I wasn’t happy there, because Dumbledore told you. And you tried to control me, to keep me oblivious just like he wanted, to guilt me into thinking the whole world was my responsibility. Then you believed an old man that told you I was evil because of something in my scar, that I had to die for Voldemort to be destroyed. Without even thinking to talk to me about it. And that’s not even mentioning how awful you were to Sirius — in his own house, even!”

Mrs Weasley’s gaze flickered to the dog animagus, filling with guilt.

“I’m aware that our families are connected, in more ways than one,” Harry continued. “I won’t be able to avoid the three of you. I’m not going to make anyone choose between me and you. Which is more grace than you gave me,” he added sharply. “I can be civil. Friendly, even, at family gatherings. But you’re delusional if you think I’ll ever trust the three of you ever again. And if I were you, Mrs Weasley, I’d take a closer look at your relationship with the rest of your children, before you lose them forever.”

Trying not to let his breath shake, he exhaled slowly, glancing back at Sirius. “Let’s go home, yeah?” He was so very done with being out in public.

“Sure thing, pup,” Sirius assured quietly. He nodded politely to the trio, then steered Harry away towards the apparition point.

Harry’s heart didn’t stop racing until long after they’d walked away.

“Was I too harsh, Pads?” he asked, once they were strolling across the lawn of Seren Du in blissful quiet. Sirius scoffed.

“If anything, you were far more polite than they deserved,” he muttered, scowling. “Clearly there’s not quite enough Black in you to hold a proper grudge,” he teased with a wink.

“I don’t want to cause problems with the family,” Harry insisted. He knew it was going to be awkward, that it would take a long time before any of the Weasley kids were truly comfortable around their mum and youngest brother. But Harry wasn’t going to be the one to force them to cut out their own family, not for his sake.

He could be polite, and put up with them at family gatherings. He’d prefer if he never had to waste a single thought on them again, but... that was family, he supposed. There were always a few you wished you didn’t have to deal with.

“It’s not gonna be easy,” Sirius agreed, loosening his ponytail and shaking out his hair. “Charlie... he doesn’t know how to feel about his mum, really. She still doesn’t like me. Doesn’t like us together. Not sure she ever will,” he said, shrugging. “But that’s her problem, not ours. She’s the one who needs to decide if her hurt feelings are worth losing her son over.”

Sirius pulled him into a rough half-hug, kissing his temple. “We’ll figure it out, in time. Maybe they’ll get their heads out of their arses, maybe they won’t. Either way, there’s plenty of other people around who love you, kiddo. You don’t need them.”

He was right. Harry had so much family; real, honest family. And it was growing bigger and bigger even still. He didn’t need to latch on to the first people to show him any sort of attention or affection, anymore.

“Hey, Sirius,” he said, slowing to a halt. Sirius cocked his head, looking much like his canine counterpart. “I don’t know if I ever said it, but... thank you, so much. For bringing me here after third year, for giving me somewhere safe, somewhere I could figure out who I really was. Giving me a home. Giving me everything.” If he hadn’t had Seren Du, he very likely would not have lasted this long.

Sirius’ face softened, his hands resting on Harry’s shoulders. “Oh, kiddo. You never need to thank me, not for that.” He wrapped his arms around Harry, embracing him tightly. “That’s what godfathers are for, you silly fox.”

There were tears welling up in Harry’s eyes. Merlin, he’d been crying so much lately. He hoped that stopped soon. “I love you, Padfoot. Dad.” He felt the hitch in the taller man’s breath. “You’re gonna be an amazing parent to those kids. Any kids.” Harry knew he and Charlie would have at least one baby, eventually.

Sirius sniffled, looking Harry in the eye. “And they couldn’t ask for a better big brother,” he replied, pressing their foreheads together. “Now come on, how about you and I put all this away and go for a fly, yeah? If I’m gonna be teaching my kids to play quidditch, I’ll have to dust off my skills a bit!”

Harry grinned at him. “Sounds good.”

He couldn’t wait to see the twins react to their new brooms.

.-. .

With all his friendships out in the open, all his family freely able to show they cared for each other, Harry’s social calendar had never been more full.

They’d finally organised that party he and Neville talked about, right before the battle. It wasn’t at the Pottery — there were still far too many kids living there, waiting for foster families — but at Longbottom Manor, with presents and cake and fireworks and everything the two boys could have dreamed of. But even aside from that, Harry was constantly out of the house; working on Ministry and Wizengamot stuff with the usual crowd and Justin Finch-Fletchley; meeting up for lunch or dinner or drinks with HA members, past and present alike; family dinners and Weasley gatherings and pick-up quidditch matches and sibling outings. It would have been exhausting had it not been the best weeks of his entire life.

So it wasn’t unusual when an owl flew through the window of Seren Du, bearing mail. What was unusual was the number of envelopes — one for each of them, in heavy, high-quality parchment. The owl dropped the stack and flew away, no need for replies.

Harry frowned, reaching for the one with his name on. “This isn’t a Hogwarts thing, is it?” he asked, looking up at Snape.

“Not as far as I’m aware.”

Wondering if it was perhaps a Ministry thing — some Order of Merlin or other such rot — Harry was wary as he thumbed open the envelope, pulling out the thick, pale gold cardstock inside.

Lord Cassius Warrington and Oliver Wood

Cordially invite you to join them in celebrating their nuptials,

On the afternoon of Tuesday, the 29th of August,

Ceremony to begin at 1pm.

“Oh,” Harry breathed, a slow smile creeping across his face. There was a second piece of cardstock behind the first, giving the details of the venue’s apparition and floo access, as well as requesting an RSVP at their earliest convenience — although on Harry’s the ‘not attending’ option had been scribbled out, a note in Oliver’s cramped handwriting declaring that ‘you’re coming whether you like it or not, Potter’.

“How wonderful,” Narcissa exclaimed, face lighting up. “I had wondered if they would have time before you all go back to school.”

“Ollie will want to have his honeymoon before the season starts up,” Harry pointed out, grinning. “This is brilliant. Has anyone got a quill?”

Sirius summoned one from the next room over, and as each of them in turn ticked the ‘attending’ boxes on their RSVP slips, the papers glowed and the green ink turned a bright gold colour, confirming it.

“We’ll have to look for a wedding present,” Draco said, catching Harry’s hand. “And get some new dress robes.”

Harry groaned quietly. “I suppose I can’t just stick with the ones I’ve got?”

“Absolutely not. You wore those to Bill and Fleur’s wedding.”

“There were like thirty people and Bill and Fleur’s wedding!” Harry protested, but Draco didn’t budge.

“Yes, and every single one of them will be at this one, too. Not to mention, there were pictures. I refuse to be seen with you in the same dress robes at two weddings in the same social circle.” There was that haughty aristocratic snobbery that Harry would never truly understand, but nor would Draco ever shed entirely.

“I think all of us could do with some new dress robes,” Narcissa cut in, smiling with steel-grey eyes that just dared any of them to argue with her. “We’ll make a family outing of it. I’ll make an appointment with our tailor.”

Harry looked across the table at Remus, the only person likely to give him any sympathy on the matter. But Remus was too busy looking down at Snape’s confirmed attendance on the RSVP, no doubt lost in fantasies of attending such a public event together. Gross.

Harry looked down at his own invite contemplatively, smiling at the tiny golden quidditch hoops in the bottom corners. That reminded him — he had a plan to put into motion.

.-.-.-.

With a little help from Ginny and Neville, a recommendation from Narcissa and an autographed copy of the Prophet article of his defeat of Voldemort, Harry managed to organise a somewhat last-minute date.

“What are you up to, Potter?” Draco asked suspiciously, the morning when Harry told him they were going out for dinner, so to be wearing nice robes and ready to leave by quarter past six. Harry just grinned impishly, kissing his boyfriend and patting him on the backside, before heading to apparate over to the Ministry.

Harry made sure he was home in plenty of time to shower and change and wrestle his hair into submission, and it was clearly worth it — Draco inhaled sharply when he opened his bedroom door at Harry’s knock, his eyes darkening with arousal as he studied his Gryffindor boyfriend. Harry wore forest green robes open over a crisp white shirt, green tie knotted neatly at his throat. “What do you think?” he asked, holding his arms wide for inspection, grinning. “Can you stand to be seen with me in public?”

Draco pursed his lips, as if considering it. “I suppose,” he sighed, stepping close to press a kiss to Harry’s cheek. “Will you tell me where you’re taking me, now?”

“You’ll find out when we get there,” Harry insisted, offering his arm with a gallant bow. “You look stunning, by the way. I’m going to be the envy of everyone in the room.” Draco’s ice blue robes were tailored to perfection, his darker blue shirt in contrast to a pale grey tie that made his eyes stand out even more. Truly the Ice Prince of Slytherin.

They walked downstairs arm in arm, and Harry groaned at the duo that awaited them. Sirius and Narcissa, stood by the door ready to send them off as if it was their very first date.

Which, technically, Harry supposed it was. They’d gone about everything a little backwards, really.

“Don’t stay out too late,” Sirius mock-warned, wagging his finger. “And you look after my son, Malfoy, or I’ll have your head.”

“Have him back by midnight, Harry, darling,” Narcissa told him, smirk tugging at her lips. “My boy is a gentleman and I shan’t have you ruining his reputation.”

Harry snorted. “We all know that ship has sailed,” he joked, ignoring Draco’s indignant expression. “You two are the worst, and we love you, and we’ll be going now.” He tugged on Draco’s arm, heading for the door and ignoring the two waving dramatically at them on their way down the drive.

“Sometimes I think it was a bad idea bringing those two cousins back together,” Draco said drily. Harry hummed in agreement.

“At least they didn’t bring Andi into it.” The three Blacks together were a force to be reckoned with.

Holding Draco close under the guise of needing to side-along him to their destination, Harry apparated, smiling as Draco peered around curiously. “We’re in Diagon,” he realised, and Harry nodded.

“Yup. Come on.”

In those wonderful three weeks before his third year, in around having his entire life flipped on his head, Harry had gotten quite familiar with a lot of the offshoot alleys of Diagon. Before then, he’d thought the main high street was all there was to it.

This little section of the alley was full of restaurants and cafes and even a dance club — something Harry definitely wanted to investigate when the furore around him had died down some. He and Draco were still too young for muggle clubs; the fake IDs he’d conjured to get them into the sex shop beside Infinite earlier in the week probably wouldn’t slide with a club bouncer. Mostly because Harry only had vague ideas of what a muggle ID was supposed to look like.

Maybe Farlig would be able to help him out. Gringotts did muggle documents, too.

It was a narrow street, the buildings looming tall on either side, with only a few people out and about, all enjoying their evenings — other couples on dates, some families, some groups of friends. Many of them nodded in greeting to the pair, some giggled and eyed them appreciatively, but none of them bothered them, for which Harry was extremely grateful.

Draco actually gaped when Harry turned them towards the door of their destination for the night. “The Golden Harp,” he exclaimed quietly. “How the hell did you get us a table at the Golden Harp, this place is booked out months in advance!”

“Harry Potter,” Harry pointed out, shrugging. He wasn’t afraid to use his fame sometimes — namely, in the efforts of spoiling his boyfriend rotten.

The host straightened up at the sight of them, offering a sharp bow. “Lord Potter, Lord Malfoy,” he greeted demurely. “Right this way, please.”

One of the reasons Harry had chosen this place, other than Narcissa raving about the menu, was that they had low-level privacy wards on every table. Not enough for people not to recognise who was sat there — what was the point in going to a fancy restaurant if you weren’t seen at the fancy restaurant — but enough to discourage any sort of approach, or eavesdropping.

Harry and Draco could have a nice dinner to themselves, without worrying about the press or fans or anything.

“You really have pulled out all the stops, haven’t you?” Draco remarked, pale brows rising at the sight of a bottle of his favourite white wine chilling at the table already. “Are you trying to romance, me, Potter?” A wicked grin tugged at his lips.

“Well, I figured after nearly three years, it’s about time I put some effort in,” Harry joked in reply, smiling briefly at the waitress who came and poured their wine and water. “Consider this an apology for all those dates we haven’t been able to have in public.”

Draco’s face softened, a rosy blush rising in his cheeks. “You don’t need to apologise for that,” he insisted. “It was as much my doing as yours.”

“Then consider it the start of me showering you with love and devotion and expensive things as you so deserve,” Harry replied with a wink. “I always did say I’d spoil you rotten once I got the chance.”

The blond had a tiny, pleased smile he couldn’t quite hide behind his humour. “Dangerous thing to say to a Malfoy,” he warned. “We have expensive tastes.”

“Fairly sure I can handle the cost.” Harry had more money than either of them could spend in a hundred lifetimes, even if Draco demanded meals like this every single night.

As he perused the menu, Harry tried not to let on how nervous he was. Not because of the date, or even his plans for later in the evening — he had never actually been to a wizarding restaurant before, not really. Certainly not one as posh as this. And he’d only been to a handful of muggle restaurants, in that summer before his fourth year when Sirius and Remus tried to introduce him to all the things he'd missed out on.

It was a big step up from the Three Broomsticks, that was for sure.

But whether or not Draco suspected his unease, the blond's calm demeanour went a long way to helping Harry relax. Draco ordered first, so Harry could just do what he did; tapping his desired order with his wand and having it appear on the plate in front of him. After that it was perfectly natural to slip into conversation — so much so that Harry almost forgot where they were until their waitress stopped by to ask if everything was to their liking.

The sweet wine slowly trickled warmth through his system, twining with the happy flutter in his belly that came with being out with Draco like this. "We should do this more often," he said as they were choosing their desserts. "Maybe not, like, this," he gestured to the very fancy restaurant around them, "but going out together. Sometimes it feels like the only time I get to be truly alone with you is when we're in bed." He blushed at saying something like that in public, glancing around, but no one could hear them through the spells.

Draco reached across the table, taking his hand with a fond smile. "I know what you mean. I love our family, but they're rather... a lot." He gave a lopsided grimace, chuckling. "I grew up an only child with mostly Crabbe and Goyle for company, or the house elves. I'm still not used to having so many people around."

"Think how I feel; I grew up in a bloody cupboard," Harry returned wryly.

It was wonderful, having a family as large and welcoming as theirs, having friends they could finally hang out with without masks or pretence or some sort of emergency to figure out.

But part of Harry missed the days of sneaking into classrooms to meet with Draco, playing Bluff and pretending they were the only two people in the world.

"It'll be harder at Hogwarts," Draco mused, running his thumb over Harry's knuckles. "But there's always the Chamber for privacy. And the wards certainly work in our favour," he added, eyes alight with amusement. "A lack of privacy is to be expected at school, though." His smile turned boyish, almost tentative. "I like the idea of doing more things just for us, when we can."

Harry grinned back, heart hammering in his chest. "That's settled, then."

They stared at each other, love in their eyes and dopey smiles on their faces, for longer than either would be willing to admit. Then a loud laugh from elsewhere in the restaurant broke their trance, and the two boys blushed, turning back to the dessert menus.

The sun was setting by the time they left, Harry not even blinking at the exorbitant price on the bill on his way out — it was worth every single knut, to see Draco smile like that.

"Our parents are going to be unbearable when we get in," Draco sighed, unable to hide the fondness in his voice. "I don't want this evening to end just yet."

"I've got an idea," Harry told him, grinning as if it was a spontaneous thing — as if he hadn't spent the last few days agonising over every little detail. "Come here." He slid his arms around Draco's waist, catching his lips in a soft kiss, then apparated them away.

They appeared in the middle of the Hogwarts quidditch pitch, the stands bathed in a vibrant orange-gold light over the horizon. Draco gaped at him. "Walking through walls, apparating into Hogwarts — anything else you can do?" he asked mildly, and Harry laughed.

"Possibly. Haven't figured it out yet." He squeezed Draco once, then stepped away. "Dobby," the house elf appeared in an instant, "would you go get mine and Draco's brooms, please?"

The elf nodded energetically, disappearing and reappearing in only a few moments.

"Harry, we're not dressed for quidditch," Draco complained as he was handed his Nimbus 2001. Harry undid his tie and the top button of his shirt, stuffing the silk into his robe pocket.

"We're not playing a full match, love," he teased, nimble fingers making quick work of Draco's own tie. Unable to help himself, he leaned in to suck a kiss against the pale column of Draco's throat once his shirt collar was loosened, the blond's resulting gasp quickening his blood. "Come on. Fly with me."

Draco let out a shaky breath. "If you insist." He had a competitive glint in his eyes when he pulled away. "Catch me, then." Then he swung a leg over his broom and kicked off.

Harry laughed loudly as he shot into the sky moments behind his boyfriend, the exhilaration of the wind in his hair mixing with the wine in his stomach and the anticipation in his blood as he did a quick lap, easily matching Draco's pace. "Want to make this interesting?" he called, pulling a snitch from his pocket, holding it up tauntingly.

"Where did you get that?" Draco shook his head in bewilderment. "Never mind. You're on, Potter. Usual wager?" He licked his lips pointedly.

Having an erection while on a broomstick was not the most comfortable thing in the world, but it was something Harry was an expert in dealing with by now, after years of flying with Draco Malfoy. He shifted to ease the pressure, grin widening. "Usual wager." Winner got to decide on bedroom activities that night.

He released the snitch, counted to fifteen with his eyes locked on Draco's, and then both of them sped off.

It was a little harder, looking for a snitch in the light of the setting sun — especially a sunset as beautiful as this one, a glorious riot of colour in the sky so incredible Harry couldn't have planned it if he'd tried. But both of them were excellent seekers.

And the snitch was maybe a little bit enchanted.

Harry turned sharply as Draco went into a dive, haring after his boyfriend. He drew closer, the pair of them neck and neck — but he didn't put on that little extra burst of speed that would have had him beating Draco to the fluttering gold ball, instead watching pale fingers clamp around it, pulling up from the dive.

Draco grinned to himself, then turned to look suspiciously at Harry, both of them coming down to land. “You let me win that one,” he accused. “Come on, Harry. It’s no fun if you let me win.”

“Yeah, well,” Harry said, just a little shaky, his stomach full of butterflies and his heart in his throat. “I sort-of needed you to catch that snitch.”

Confused, Draco looked down at the snitch in his palm. There was a quiet click, and it split in the middle, opening to reveal something nestled inside.

A ring sat in a little velvet indent; silver band made of three interwoven strands, swirling up around a flawless emerald with a smaller, perfect white diamond on each side. Masculine, but beautiful. Like Draco.

When Draco looked back up, Harry was in front of him, on one knee, eyes shining with hope.

Harry watched the rapid cycle of emotions play over his love’s face — confusion, shock, joy, his jaw dropping ever so slightly, his hands beginning to tremble as he held the snitch steady.

Harry swallowed his nerves, and cleared his throat. “You are the best thing that’s ever happened to me, Draco Malfoy,” he declared earnestly, voice wavering with emotion. “Magic, Hogwarts, all the rest of it — none of it compares to the moment I looked at you across an empty classroom at one in the morning and realised I couldn’t live without you in my life. I know we had a bit of a rocky start, to say the least,” he chuckled weakly, and Draco’s lips twitched, “but we’ve come a long way since we were eleven. We’ve seen far more than anyone our age should ever see, done things we never should have had to do. Through it all — all the drama and the danger and the ridiculous shit that seems to follow me around — you were right there, by my side, calling me an idiot Gryffindor and telling me you loved me in the same breath, making all my problems seem so easy to manage, as long as I had you. And I know, without a doubt, that I want you right there for the rest of our lives. I fought a war so I could have a future, Draco, and I want you to be that future. So... will you marry me?”

Draco stared at him. Harry couldn’t breathe. His pulse thudded in his ears, fears suddenly gripping him; it was too soon, they were too young, Draco wanted to wait—

That thought was cut off abruptly as he was tackled to the ground, pressed against the grass by Draco’s weight, the blond beaming down at him with tears shining in his gorgeous silver eyes. “You foolish Gryffindor,” he rasped, and Harry’s heart jolted. “Yes. Of course I’ll marry you.”

“Oh,” Harry breathed, the words echoing in his head. Yes. Draco said yes. “That’s good, then.”

Draco laughed through more tears, leaning down, pressing their foreheads together. “Disaster of a wizard,” he murmured affectionately, the same words he’d said years ago, right before he’d kissed Harry for the first time. “You couldn’t possibly think I’d say no, did you?”

Harry shrugged sheepishly. “I mean — you might have?” He hadn’t wanted to assume.

Snorting, Draco pulled back, kneeling on the grass next to Harry’s reclined form. There were grass stains on both their robes, but neither of them cared.

“You’ve had me ruined for anyone but you since I was fourteen years old, you prat,” Draco whispered, gaze turning back down to the ring, still safely inside the snitch. “It’s absolutely beautiful, Harry. Is it an heirloom?”

Harry nodded, too dazed to speak. Draco ran a gentle finger over the ring. Then he looked at Harry imperiously. “Are you going to put this on me, or what?”

Harry scrambled to sit up, taking the ring out with shaking hands and fumbling with it until it slid onto Draco’s left ring finger, resizing perfectly.

And there it was. His engagement ring, on Draco Malfoy’s finger. His claim for the whole world to see — this perfect, amazing man was going to be his forever.

Harry hooked a hand round the back of his neck and pulled him into a hard kiss, pouring all of his love and relief into the embrace, hoping Draco knew just how happy he was at that moment.

Suddenly, there was a loud whistling noise, and a firework exploded over their heads in a shower of golden sparks, forming a heart in the sky. Cheers and whistles filled the air, and the two boys startled apart, whipping around to see a crowd of people up in the lowest stands. Their parents and godparents, but also Ginny and Neville, and all the older Weasley boys with their partners, and the Gryffindor quidditch team. Susan and Theo and Luna and Daphne and Pansy and Millie, all their other Hogwarts friends. The Tonks family and Kingsley, his hand on the barely-there swell of Tonks’ stomach while she whooped and cheered, her hair cycling through the whole rainbow in her joy. Even McGonagall was there, applauding with a smile on her face and if Harry wasn’t mistaken, tears in her eyes.

“Did you—“ Draco started, but Harry shook his head.

“I didn’t plan that!” he insisted, blushing bright red. “I thought it was just us!” Having an audience was not part of his grand idea!

Harry and Draco scrambled to their feet, trying to make themselves a little more presentable. “How long have you lot been there?” Harry called up, wondering how the hell he hadn’t noticed. He held the damn school wards!

But then, so did Neville, and Luna, and McGonagall. And Harry would bet anything Hannah was up in the castle, watching through the magic, doing her bit to keep the family hidden from him.

“Long enough!” Sirius shouted back cheerfully. “Nice speech, kiddo!”

Harry’s face burned. “How did you even know about this?” He’d hardly told anyone! He hadn’t even mentioned it to Narcissa, just telling her he wanted to take Draco on a date.

Charlie’s laugh was loudest of all, and Harry saw him reach out and ruffle the long side of Ginny’s hair. “Our little sister can’t keep a secret for shit, Potter! You should know that by now!”

Ginny waved, unrepentant, and Harry groaned. At his side, Draco laughed, letting the Gryffindor bury his face in his neck. “Think of it this way,” he consoled, running a hand through Harry’s hair, his huge smile pressing into Harry’s temple, “at least now we don’t have to send a notice out.”

Harry snorted, inhaling the scent of wood polish and spice and the faint hint of sweat — the scent of his Amortentia. The smell of the person he loved most in the world.

He couldn’t be mad at the unexpected audience, not really.

He was too damn happy that Draco had said yes.

Chapter 108

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

From that point onwards, Harry was on cloud nine for the entire rest of the summer. Every morning he woke up and caught sight of that glint of silver and green on Draco's hand, and his heart did gymnastics inside his chest. Draco had started teasing him for it, mocking the ridiculous smile that greeted him every morning, but he was just as bad.

The teasing when Harry went down to breakfast every morning was far worse, anyway.

At least Harry wasn't the only one being a big old sap all over the place; Sirius and Charlie had officially begun proceedings to adopt the three Forrester children. Harry suspected their own engagement would come soon — hopefully a better proposal than Sirius' drunken declaration after the war ended.

Everyone was certainly kept busy over the next week or so, as school drew nearer and everything had to be put in place for that. The Department of Education managed to arrange for examiners to come to the school for a week, to oversee any OWLs or NEWTs the students wished to take — most of the just-graduated seventh years preferred to come to Hogwarts in their summer holidays than to drag out their education any further. A few would be repeating at least part of seventh year, Harry knew, but for the most part they all just wanted out of the castle and into the world. He didn't blame them; he himself was desperate to be done with education, as much as he loved Hogwarts.

Cho Chang was one of the students who wanted to get her NEWTs out of the way, and Harry just happened to be in the castle on the day she took her DADA exam. When she saw him in the corridor on her way out of the practical exam, she took one look at him and burst into tears.

"Did it go that bad?" he asked, and she whacked him on the arm, laughing even as she cried. Then her arms wrapped around his waist, squeezing him firmly.

"I probably got an O, and I never would have done it without you," she told him. Her dark eyes were shiny when she looked up at him. "I wish he was here to see it. To see everything we've done."

Harry swallowed tightly, feeling that phantom ache around the raw edges of the hole in his chest that had begun with the death of Cedric Diggory. It would never go away, not truly. "He'd be so proud of you," he told her, chin on her head, letting her sniffle into his shirt. From what he'd heard of the battle, Cho had been a true force of nature, taking on three Death Eaters by herself and Disarming the lot of them. "What's next for you, then?" he asked, releasing her. She wiped at her eyes, smiling.

"A Charms Mastery, if I get my O," she told him. "There's a Charms Mistress in Seoul that I really want to study under; the magic on that side of the world is totally different to the kind we use here. I want to see how well the two combine.” She shrugged, bashful. “Until then... just life, y’know? I’ve moved in with Cedric’s boys — Mum hates it, but I’m an adult now so she can’t say no.” Her grin turned cheeky. “Unmarried young woman living with three single men, it’s her worst nightmare.”

Harry laughed. “And that didn’t affect your decision at all, I’m sure,” he said wryly, snickering at her innocent look.

“What are you doing here, anyway?” Cho asked, looking at him.

“Visiting Hannah. Also, McGonagall asked to see me, though I’m not sure what for. When I heard exams were happening, I thought I’d swing by. Oh, hi, Katie!” he greeted brightly as his ex-teammate slipped out of the exam room. “How’d it go?”

To her credit, Katie didn’t blink at Cho’s puffy red eyes. “Aced it,” she said proudly, beaming. “Thanks, Harry. See you at the wedding?” He nodded. “Fab. Bye, Cho!”

Cho waved, and the pair of them watched Katie walk away. “I’d best get moving, then,” Cho mused, letting out a long breath. “You’ll keep in touch, won’t you?”

“Of course,” he assured. “Though I don’t know if Hedwig would appreciate me sending her to Seoul.” They’d have to figure out the international postal service. “Give the boys my love. I’ll see you around.”

One last smile, and then they parted ways, Harry putting his hands in his pockets as he wandered in the direction of what had once been Dumbledore’s office. McGonagall had finally braved the gargoyle and what lay behind it, taking Snape with her in case of traps. Harry hadn’t seen the office yet, and was excited to get up there.

He’d promised not to walk through her walls unless it was an emergency. Besides, it was nice taking the long way sometimes.

But McGonagall was still meeting with Snape and Remus — Harry had a very strong suspicion regarding the whole matter — so he took a detour towards the Hospital Wing. To his surprise, he didn’t need to go back to the private room to find Hannah. She was in the main ward, sat up in a wheelchair. “Hannah!” he exclaimed, surprised. “You’re out of bed, that’s brilliant!”

Her grin was vibrant, even if there was the shadow of pain in her eyes. “Just today,” she confirmed. “Not for too long — I have to re-train my muscles and everything, so sitting up is a bit exhausting. But... baby steps. I’m hoping to be able to do at least some of my classes when school starts up.”

“I’m so happy for you,” Harry told her, squeezing her hand. “I bet Ernie’s happy, too.”

Something in Hannah’s smile changed. “I’m sure he will be, but— Harry... Ernie and I broke up.”

The bottom dropped out of his stomach. “What?” An awful thought hit him. “It wasn’t because of...?” He gestured vaguely to her wheelchair, wondering if he had vastly misjudged Ernie Macmillan’s character.

Hannah shook her head insistently. “No, no, not at all!” she assured. “We, ah, actually technically broke up before this even happened. Sort of.” He eyed her in bewilderment. “We got talking one night, about the future — what we wanted to do if we both lived through the battle. And we realised, well... both of us had very different ideas of what we wanted our lives to look like.” She fiddled with the end of her honey-blonde braid at her shoulder. “Ernie wants to travel; he’s looking at a career with Gringotts, like Bill Weasley, only not staying at one single branch. And I— even before the whole Heir of Hufflepuff thing, I knew I wouldn’t go far from Hogwarts.” She shrugged. “I’ve always been a homebody. I don’t need to see the world — which is good, because that would be a little bit harder these days,” she added ruefully. “I’ve been learning a lot from Madam Pomfrey, living in here. I don’t know if I want to be a healer necessarily, and it’s going to be a long time before I’m up to any sort of serious training. But I like the idea of being her... assistant of sorts. Helping with the standard school shenanigans, making sure the students are alright. Helping Hogwarts feel like their home away from home.”

Harry could absolutely see it; Hannah working in the Hospital Wing, her sunny smiles brightening up the day of any poor student with a bludger-related injury or a hex gone wrong. Always available with a kind word and a listening ear for the homesick and the bullied and the troubled.

And he could understand not wanting to leave the castle, either.

“Feels like a part of you, doesn’t it?” he mused knowingly. She nodded.

“Does that go away? When you’re not here?”

Harry shrugged, contemplating his answer. “Not really. It’s quieter, for sure — I can’t feel everyone like I can when I’m inside the wards.” If he was back at Seren Du, he couldn’t pinpoint McGonagall or Pomfrey or anyone at the school. “But it’s always there. Waiting for me to come back.” If there was ever an emergency at the school, he would know about it, no matter how far he travelled. He was linked to Hogwarts on a soul-deep level, now.

“Makes sense.”

The silence that stretched between them was comfortable, an acknowledgment of this bond they shared that only two others could begin to comprehend.

“It’ll be good, to have at least one of us in the castle full-time,” he said.

“Yeah. Though I’ll eat my wand if Nev doesn’t take over when Sprout retires.”

“Oh, that’s a given,” Harry agreed easily.

Hannah shifted slightly, grimacing in pain, and Harry realised how long they’d been talking. “I’ll let you get on,” he said, patting her hand, “but it’s really great to see you up and about.

And I'm sorry about you and Ernie.”

“It's fine, really. We're still friends. Maybe we'll get back together one day, once he's done travelling. But maybe we won't.” She shot him a teasing grin. “We can't all find our soulmates as fourth years, y'know.”

He laughed, smile coming unbidden to his lips as he thought of his boyfriend — fiancé. “I suppose. Now go take a pain potion and lie down, for Merlin's sake.” His playful fussing made her laugh, but she obediently wheeled herself back to her room, the magical chair responding to her thoughts.

Harry checked the wards, confirming that Snape and Remus had left McGonagall's office — they were headed down to the Potions classroom. Interesting.

He grinned to himself on his way up, wondering whether the pair would try and keep secrets. When he reached the gargoyle, his stomach twisted instinctively; he'd had so much pain, in this office.

Things would be better now.

“Perseverance,” he declared, and the gargoyle hopped aside, revealing the revolving staircase.

The first thing he noticed was the distinct colour change — no longer did stepping into the office give you a headache. The carpet was a deep charcoal grey, and what little wallspace wasn't covered in bookshelves had a cheerful red and green tartan wallpaper. Most of the office, however, was books. Books on all sorts of magic, not just Transfiguration, the shelves interspersed with little trinkets and interesting statues, no doubt each one with a story behind it.

And then he noticed the perch in the corner, occupied once more. “Fawkes!”

The phoenix trilled happily, fluttering his wings.

“It seems Fawkes has decided to remain with the school,” McGonagall explained, smiling slightly from behind her desk. It was the same one from her old office — nothing of Dumbledore's had stayed, it seemed. A fresh start entirely. “I don't know where he was this past year, but he came back shortly after I reclaimed the office. In quite a state, too. I dread to think what Albus might have done to the poor creature.”

Now Harry looked closer, he could see Fawkes looked a little worse for wear, like he was overdue a burning day.

“I'm sure he'll perk up.” Harry turned to the headmistress, seeing a cup of tea and that tartan biscuit tin waiting for him on the side table next to the chair. “What did you want to see me about, Professor?”

McGonagall let him get situated, studying him over the rim of her glasses. “Firstly, booklists will be sent out tomorrow morning, and I thought I'd save an owl the journey,” she said, passing over a roll of parchment. Harry smirked.

“You’ve figured out staffing, then?” he asked, trying and failing to sound innocent. He already knew she’d found a Transfiguration professor to take over now she was full-time Headmistress, but that wasn’t the only open position.

“Professor Slughorn has returned to retirement,” she told him, “and Professor Snape has agreed to return to his position as Potions professor.” Harry raised an eyebrow, a slow grin forming. “And Remus Lupin has agreed to return as Defence Against the Dark Arts professor. Also, the new Head of Gryffindor House.”

“Knew it,” Harry hissed in triumph, beaming. “That’s brilliant.” Remus had been an amazing teacher, and he knew many students would be glad to see him return. “No issues with his furry little problem?”

“Thanks to the quick work of you and your friends, and the determination of the young Lady Bones, any complaints do not have a leg to stand on,” McGonagall informed him, looking deeply satisfied by that. “He has an excellent track record, and will be on Wolfsbane for the duration. Any classes on days he needs to take off will either become self-study, be covered by another member of staff, or have a guest instructor brought in.”

Already, Harry couldn’t wait for the inevitable chaos of Guest Professor Sirius Black.

“And... Astronomy?” he dared ask, vividly remembering Professer Sinistra laid out on the Great Hall floor. McGonagall pursed her lips.

“I have contacted an ex-pupil of the school who has a Mastery in the subject, and she has agreed to at least the first year of teaching.”

“That’s good.” Harry sipped at his tea, tucking the booklist into his pocket. “So what else is there? I know you didn’t call me here just for a piece of parchment.”

McGonagall’s cheek twitched as she tried to restrain her smile. “Quite right. There is one more thing I didn’t feel right sending by post.”

And then she leaned forward, and placed the Head Boy badge on the desk.

Harry stared. “I... what?” Green eyes widened incredulously. “But I—I’m me! I spent most of the last six years in detention, and sneaking about after curfew, and getting into all sorts of trouble!” Was she mad??

The smile broke through, just a little. “You also spent those years saving lives, foiling Albus Dumbledore’s plans, preparing your fellow students for a war everyone denied was coming, and keeping up straight Os throughout. Not to mention success on the quidditch pitch, and the incredible respect both your peers and your professors have for you.” Her dark green eyes danced as he gaped like a fish. “You certainly earned some of your detentions,” she said, giving him a pointed look, “but we are both aware that many of those were given under ulterior motives.”

Instinctually, Harry rubbed at the back of his hand, where the Blood Quill scars still glared up at him.

“At first I thought you might not want the badge,” she admitted. “That giving you such responsibility after you have just managed to shed such a large burden off your shoulders may hinder your enjoyment of your final year. And then,” she said, gaze narrowing knowingly, “I thought about how much trouble you might get into if I did not give you some kind of responsibility to keep you entertained.”

Harry put on his best offended expression. “Professor! I’m hurt that you think I would ever cause trouble out of boredom!”

McGonagall just stared at him, the flat stare of someone who had survived both the Marauders and the Weasley twins. “That look did not work for your father or your mother, and it certainly will not work for you.”

Harry laughed, letting the pout drop. He reached for a biscuit, and when he looked back up McGonagall was surprisingly earnest. “You have talent, Harry,” she said softly. “You have more magical power than any of us know what to do with, and now that you’re willing to use it, a brain that will have no problems with the NEWT curriculum. There is little Hogwarts can offer you to stretch that talent aside from your own self-study projects, and I get the feeling that will not be enough to keep you out of mischief. But you have a love for this school and ideas for how we can make it better — ideas that I would very much like to hear. I’m making Miss Bones Head Girl, and between the three of us I like to think we can begin to make Hogwarts the shining institution of magical education it deserves to be once more.”

To hear his head of house speak so plainly of him — so highly of him — made a knot form in Harry’s chest. He had always assumed he was somewhat of a difficult student, always off on his shenanigans and ending up in the Hospital Wing. That McGonagall, famously stern and unmoved, had such positive opinions... it meant a lot.

“If you would rather not,” she continued, “if you would rather enjoy your final year with little more than quidditch and exams to trouble your mind, I would understand completely. If anyone has earned respite, it is you. That is why I asked to speak to you today; you have a choice, Harry. You always have a choice, in this school. I’m sorry that has not been the case in the past.”

The knot tightened, knocking the breath from him. His hands shook around his teacup. “I... you really think I’ll make a good Head Boy?” he asked, voice small. McGonagall smiled at him.

“I think you would make a fine Head Boy indeed. You have a good head on your shoulders, and the younger students look up to you.”

“But— that’s just because of the whole Boy-Who-Lived thing,” he dismissed, feeling the heat rise in his cheeks. One of McGonagall’s eyebrows rose skeptically.

“Indeed? So it’s not because of the way you have always believed in the students of this school, when no one else has. Or the way you have not let house rivalries and stereotypes colour your views. Or the way you have become known for always helping your fellow students, no matter who they are.” With each word Harry got redder and redder, and McGonagall grew more smug. “No, I’m sure it’s got nothing to do with any of that.”

“Alright, alright, you’ve made your point,” he muttered, ducking his head. He almost reached out to take the badge, then paused, a thought coming to him. “Professor. I… on the subject of responsibilities. There’s something you should know— something that might change your decision.”

“If you’re worried about your Wizengamot duties, I remind you that many of your fellow students share the same burden. That won’t be a problem.”

“No, it’s not that, I—“ Harry hadn’t told anyone, not yet. But he could tell McGonagall. This was the woman who had bought him his very first broomstick, even if she had never admitted to it. “I… it might not even happen yet. And only like three people in the world even know about this, so don’t go spreading it around.” The curiosity was plain on her face, her brow furrowed. “I, ah, have a tryout, in a few days. For seeker.” He swallowed. “For the English national team.”

Harry was then treated to a sight that very few had seen — the sight of Minerva McGonagall, genuinely and utterly surprised.

“Viktor organised it, when he was over for the wedding and— and stuff.” An incredulous snort from the woman at his summation of the entire final battle. “They’re probably just giving me a chance because I’m the saviour and all and Viktor said I’m good, I doubt I’ll make it, but— but if I do, I’ll need to leave school sometimes for training and things. I don’t know what the schedule will be like. But if that’s going to be a problem, not having me around all the time, then you should give the Head Boy badge to someone else.”

Lips pursed, shock still in her eyes, McGonagall reached for a biscuit. “I would not count yourself out yet, Potter,” she remarked. “Indeed, I would consider Mr Krum an authority on such matters — if he says you have a chance, then you certainly have a chance. I cannot see that being a problem with your Head Boy duties; there are prefects and the Head Girl, after all, should you be unavailable.” With a twitch of her fingers, she nudged the badge closer to him. “It’s yours if you want it, Harry.”

He took a deep breath, and picked up the badge, staring at it for a moment before tucking it safely away in his pocket. “I won’t let you down, Professor,” he promised, nodding defiantly. Her eyes crinkled at the corners, her smile hidden by her teacup.

“I know you won’t, Mr Potter.” Then she coughed delicately. “And I know that as Headmistress, it is unseemly of me to profess any bias for one Hogwarts house over another. But English national team or no, I fully expect that trophy to reside in Remus Lupin’s office come the end of the year.” She looked at him expectantly, and Harry laughed.

“I’ll try my best.”

“See that you do.”

Assuming that was the end of the meeting, Harry made as if to stand, but McGonagall cleared her throat. “One more thing, Potter.” She rummaged through her desk, pulling out a small stack of paperwork. “I expect to see this properly dealt with before the beginning of the school year. From both of you.”

She handed it over; across the top of the parchment were the words Animagus Registration Forms. Sure enough, there were two sets. Harry laughed, tucking them into his pocket.

“We will,” he vowed. There was no need to keep it secret now, after all.

“Good lad.” This time she didn’t stop him when he stood, Vanishing biscuit crumbs from his jeans. “I know better than to expect a complete absence of mischief from you, Mr Potter,” McGonagall said with a hint of exasperation. “But please, do try not to make me want to retire after my first year in office.”

Harry grinned, offering an elaborate salute. “Aye-aye, Headmistress.”

Then, just to be a brat, he walked straight through the wall and out of her office.

.-.-.-.

With booklists came book shopping, and Harry and Draco knew they couldn’t avoid it. It was almost a rite of passage, at this point, to go to Diagon Alley the day the lists arrived and wrestle through the crowds to get their supplies for another school year. Truly, they didn’t need much — once again Snape had seen to their Potions supplies, and all of the books Remus had set were ones they owned anyway. But Harry needed a copy of Snape’s approved NEWT level Potions text — the man still eyed Advanced Potion Making with contempt — and they both had a few extra books to pick up for their final year of Ancient Runes.

But, they insisted, they were old enough to go by themselves. Sirius, Remus and Charlie were taking Nashira and Frankie later in the afternoon, and Harry didn’t want to intrude on that. The pair apparated to London, planning to get in and out of the alley in good time, so Harry could take Draco clothes shopping in the muggle world. The blond was quite excited by the prospect, and Harry couldn’t argue with the need to update his own wardrobe.

It was as busy as expected, and Harry tangled his fingers with Draco’s so they didn’t get lost in the crowd. There were several familiar faces about, and Harry waved cheerfully to the friends he would soon see back at school.

He wondered if they found it as strange as he did, to be readying their school robes and their house ties as if they hadn’t fought a war less than a month ago in the very castle they were to return to.

They would get used to it, in time.

With books acquired, Draco begged to go into Slug and Jigger’s for non-class-related supplies, and while Harry was happy to let him he also very much did not want to join him there. “I’ll go sit at Fortescue’s, wait for you there. We can have an ice cream before we leave.” Harry still had a soft spot for Florian Fortescue, after the weeks spent doing his History of Magic homework with the ice cream maker's help. And he did have excellent ice cream.

So they parted ways, and Harry headed over to the ice cream shop, running over the possible flavour ideas in his head. "Harry!" He turned, groaning quietly, ready to tell whichever eager reporter had spotted him that he would very much like to be left alone.

But it wasn't a reporter. It was Dennis Creevey.

Harry froze at the sight of the soon-to-be fourth year — Dennis had grown a little bit, in the last few weeks. He was skinnier, though, and still looked a little hollow in the eyes.

He looked so much like his brother, it made Harry's throat go dry. "Harry," Dennis said, a little breathlessly. "I was hoping I'd see you today!"

"Hi, Dennis. How— how are you?"

The boy's face crumpled, just for a moment, before he pulled it back together. "I'm... getting by. It's hard. But, y'know," he gave a self-deprecating shrug, "we all have to keep going."

"Dennis, I'm so sorry, I—"

"Don't, Harry," Dennis insisted. "We both knew what we were doing. Colin... he wanted to fight because of you, yes, but also because of me, and because of our parents, and all the other muggles and muggleborns that were being killed. It wasn't your fault." His lips quirked bitterly. "Sometimes I think that if I'd just stayed in the castle like everyone told me, if I hadn't been there for Colin to want to protect... but you can't go down that road. Colin made his choices, and we've got to accept them. Even if... even if it's hard." He swallowed, lip wobbling slightly. Harry reached out to squeeze the boy's shoulder.

"That's..."

"More mature than you'd expect?" Dennis half-joked. "Dad's had me seeing a therapist. A squib woman, so I don't have to lie. It... it helps."

"I'm glad, Dennis. Really." He was so very young, and Harry hated how much he had already seen. It would do him good to talk it out.

God, Harry realised; he was the same age as Nashira. Just a kid. But never a kid again, not really, after all he'd been through.

"Thanks. Listen, Harry, I have something for you. These last few weeks... Colin had all these pictures he'd taken, and he never got the chance to develop them. The ones from Bill Weasley's wedding, but also just a whole bunch from around the castle before... before everything. I've got a load for everyone at school, but... would you make sure these get to the right people?" Out of his satchel, he pulled a translucent blue plastic folder like the kind Harry used to use in muggle school, full to bursting with photographs. "Colin would want everyone to have them. He... seeing people liked his photos always made him so happy."

Harry had honestly forgotten about Bill and Fleur's wedding photos. In the aftermath, it seemed like such a silly thing to care about.

But the couple would be very glad to have them. He said as much to Dennis, who grinned. "I hope they like them. I— Colin was always better at developing magical photos than me, but I hope I did alright."

"I'm sure they're brilliant, Dennis." The crowd cleared a little, and over the boy's shoulder, Harry could see two people who could only be Mr and Mrs Creevey, watching them with sad, knowing faces.

Would they blame Harry, for the loss of their son?

He couldn't bring himself to ask.

"I've got to go," Dennis said, glancing back at his parents. "I'm glad I saw you, though. See you at school?"

Clapping the boy on the shoulder, Harry nodded. "Yeah, sure. See you then."

Dennis vanished into the crowd, and Harry looked down at the folder. Through the blue tint of the plastic, he could see the first photo on the stack — it was a picture of Bill and Fleur, a candid of them enjoying their reception, smiling at each other and sharing a look like the rest of the world didn't exist. Every few seconds, Bill would peck Fleur on the cheek, and she would giggle.

Harry tucked the folder away, swallowing hard. There would be even more ghosts to face, come September. He hoped he was ready.

.

By August 23rd, Harry still hadn't told anyone but McGonagall about his tryout. He'd hidden the letter from Viktor with the full details, and when the day arrived Harry just told his family he had 'things to do', kissing his pouting boyfriend and leaving the house, his quidditch gear and Firebolt shrunken in his pocket.

He followed the apparition co-ordinates, ending up in a plain white room with a photograph of the last England team to win the cup hung proudly on the wall — from 1922.

It had certainly been a while.

The door opened, and Harry was relieved to see Oliver Wood peek his head through, beaming widely. "You didn't bring your boy with you?" Oliver queried.

"I can do things without Draco! ... Sometimes!" Harry insisted feebly, making Oliver laugh. "What are you doing here?" They hugged, Harry up on his toes a little, and Oliver ruffled his hair.

"Got to come scout out the competition, haven't I?" he teased, making Harry's eyes widen.

“You signed, then?”

“You, Mr Potter, are looking at the brand new starting keeper for the Scottish national team,” Oliver confirmed proudly. Harry had to hug him again for that.

“Ollie, that’s amazing!” Oliver blushed a little, but slung an arm around Harry’s shoulder, leading him down a carpeted corridor.

“The rest of the team might give me some lip for supporting the enemy, but I thought a friendly face might ease the way a bit,” he said. Harry felt a rush of affection for his ex-captain; he was still incredibly nervous, but having Oliver there definitely helped.

When they emerged through a wide tunnel out onto the pitch, Harry was in awe — the stands were set up to look like castle battlements, flags flying from every turret. Even the tunnel on the other side of the pitch had a portcullis.

“Mr Potter!” He whipped around, seeing a tall man who looked to be in his mid-fifties or so, salt and pepper hair and a beard to match. He was broad-shouldered — a beater, most likely, by the looks of him. “I’m Andrew Morris, call me Andy. I’m the team manager. Over there is Claudia Harper, she’s our coach, and up in the stands are a few of our investors. Don’t worry about them.”

Harry swallowed, desperately wishing Andy had not pointed them out — now all Harry would do was worry about them.

“We’ve kept this pretty hushed up, for obvious reasons,” Andy continued, “so I haven’t mentioned anything to the rest of the team yet. As a seeker, there’s less of a need to test your cohesion with the team as a whole — if today goes well, we can introduce you, see how you all fly together.” He smiled, relaxed and friendly. “But, of course, no seeker can properly show off their stuff without having another seeker to face off against, so someone will be coming by soon to give you a bit of a challenge. Until then we’re just going to send you up with Claudia, run some drills, see how you fly. Sound good?”

Harry nodded — that sounded much easier than he’d anticipated. Before now, he’d been fearing that these tryouts would be like school tryouts; dozens of other hopefuls, all having to fly in front of each other.

Claudia shook his hand, grinning cheerfully. She reminded him of Tonks, a bit, with bright dyed-red hair in a pixie cut and several piercings in her ears. “Hiya, Harry. Really great to meet you, we’ve heard loads about you. Oliver hasn’t shut up about you since I told him this had been set up,” she said, shooting a look at the Scotsman who just gave Harry a thumbs up. “And since he’s turned traitor and gone to the Scots even though legally he’s half and half and could’ve gone either way,” this was said with a pointed glare, “hopefully having you join us will make up for it. You ready to fly?”

Harry resized his broom, put on his goggles and guards, and then they were off.

He knew, of course, that professional quidditch was much faster than school quidditch. He’d seen the world cup final; the quaffle had been little more than a blur. But he hadn’t realised how incredible it would feel to fly at that level.

They started out easy — laps, with Claudia calling out instructions; names of moves, changes in direction, seeing how quickly he reacted to things. Things got progressively harder, but Harry kept up the pace, grinning to himself as sweat began to stick his t-shirt to his back. To his relief, ignoring the few people in the stands was easy once he was in the air, just like ignoring the crowds at school matches.

Once Claudia was satisfied with that, she brought out a beater's bat and a single bludger, and despite her fairly petite form she could certainly give it a whack. But Harry had dealt with multiple occasions of cursed bludgers trying to kill him in his time, so that didn't bother him either.

They tossed the quaffle around for a bit, as a cool-down according to Claudia, then the pair of them landed and Harry got a good look at the hook-nosed figure chatting to Andy and Ollie at the edge of the pitch. "Viktor!"

The Bulgarian turned, grinning. "Hello, Harry. You are off to a good start, it seems." He clasped Harry's arm, patting him solidly in the back.

"What are you doing in the country?"

"I had some other business here, and I could not miss this chance," Viktor explained. "I'm glad; you are all warmed up for me." His dark eyes glittered in challenge, and Harry gaped.

"You're who I'm going to fly against?" He had expected perhaps an ex-team seeker, or another member of training staff.

"I have waited a long time for a chance to reclaim my pride," Viktor joked. "When Andy offered, I could not say no."

Their seekers' match in fourth year felt so long ago, now. Harry grinned. "Just don't cry if I beat you a second time."

Viktor let out a short, loud laugh.

"You two ready, then?" Andy asked, rocking on the balls of his feet like an excited child. Harry wondered how much he'd been told about the last face-off between the pair of them.

Viktor pulled out his own Firebolt — four years, and it was still the fastest broom on the market. "Give me a minute to warm up," he requested, kicking off into the sky. Harry watched him, folding his arms over his chest.

"I see how it is," he mock-complained, "I get put through my paces until I feel like I've already played a full match, and he comes in all fresh-faced and ready to go."

At his side, Claudia laughed. "We have to know you've got the stamina for it," she teased. "You're no good to us if you can't last long enough to catch the snitch when it shows up."

She raised a good point, but it still didn't seem fair. Harry wasn't going to argue, though.

After a few minutes, Viktor finished his warm-up, and Harry shouldered his broom.

It was much the same as the last time, just without the enormous crowd of students around them. One snitch, two seekers, a fifteen second wait and then a start. Harry hadn't asked how many rounds they were flying — he wasn't sure he wanted to know.

When Claudia's whistle went, he sped into the air, immediately on the hunt for the little golden ball. Viktor followed him, drawing level, and Harry grinned. He wasn't sure when he'd next get the chance to fly with his friend; they could still have a little fun with it.

He spiralled around Viktor, drawing him into a game of follow the leader, which the Bulgarian took to quite happily. They jostled for leader position, forcing the other into more adventurous dives and twists, all the while both keeping an eye out for their prize.

Harry saw it first. He veered around, bolting across the sky towards it — Viktor realised immediately what he had seen, haring after him, leaning flat on his broom to catch up. The snitch dove, and the two seekers dove with it, heading towards the ground at phenomenal speed. Harry hadn't flown against someone else with a Firebolt, not since the last time he faced Viktor, and it was exhilarating having to actually push his broom to the limit just to stay level.

He didn't flinch as the ground grew closer, didn't pull away even when most others would. The snitch was determined to get them as low as possible — barely five feet off the ground, it stopped descending and took a sharp left. Harry immediately did the same, but so did Viktor, and he had the advantage of being on the left side already. Still reeling from the G-force of pulling out of the sharp dive, Harry could only stretch forward on his broom and reach his arm out, but it wasn't quite enough. Viktor grabbed the snitch from the air, mere centimetres from Harry's fingertips.

The pair of them slowed, doing a wide loop to steady their brooms, and Harry tried not to let his shoulders slump too obviously. He'd blown his chance, for sure!

Viktor, however, had other ideas. "I thought we were going to die," he declared, shoving his goggles around his neck to reveal shocked brown eyes. "You did not leave the dive, and for a moment, I thought we were both going to die."

Their eyes met, and both of them laughed breathlessly.

"Good game, Viktor," Harry said, swallowing back the disappointed lump in his throat. "I guess you finally got your pride back."

"Perhaps, but you sure as hell made me work for it!"

Andy, Claudia and Oliver were stood at the side of the pitch when they landed — Oliver was beaming like a proud parent, while the other two looked utterly stunned.

"Kid," Andy began, and Harry braced himself for the polite let-down. "If you can fly like that in a real match, you're hired."

He blinked.

“What?”

“That was incredible! The speed of those turns, and that dive! Ollie said you were fearless but I didn’t realise he meant like that! To think, you fly with that kind of skill with only a school-level playing experience... a year of training with the team under your belt, and we might actually stand a chance at the cup.” Claudia was at his side, nodding along with every word, seemingly speechless.

“But... but Viktor caught the snitch,” Harry protested. Viktor clapped his shoulder.

“Only barely. Had it flown the other way, I am sure you would have made it.” Then he grimaced, stretching his back a little. “Flying with you reminds me I am no longer eighteen. Blessed Morgana.” This was followed by a string of mumbled Bulgarian.

Bewildered, Harry looked up at Oliver. “I think my new team may burn my contract for encouraging this to happen,” he commented, rubbing at his stubbled cheek. “I knew you were good, but bloody hell, Potter!”

Slowly, tentatively, Harry allowed himself to smile. “You... you really want me on the team?” he asked, looking back at Andy and Claudia.

“Absolutely,” Claudia enthused. “We’ll have to run it by the rest of the team, and all the management lot, but after a play like that I can’t imagine them having any problems with it!”

Excitement swelled in Harry’s chest, but he held it back, suddenly doubtful. “And you’re not just saying this because of the whole Harry Potter thing?”

Andy snorted. “I don’t give a fuck how many Dark Lords you’ve killed, as long as you keep flying like that.” His lips twisted slightly. “Of course, we’ll have to make your contract pretty iron-clad — I don’t want the investors deciding you’re our new poster boy and harassing you into a bunch of media parades and sponsorship stuff that’s barely got anything to do with quidditch, you’ll never get a moment’s peace.” Harry made a face — yes, he definitely didn’t want that. “But you’ve clearly got the talent. So, if you’re up for it, we’d love to have you.”

He held out a hand, and after a moment’s pause, Harry shook it.

Oliver couldn’t hold in his excitement any longer, whooping with joy and picking Harry up off the ground with the force of his hug. “I knew you’d do it!” he exclaimed. “They’d be mad not to have you, kid.” He set Harry down, beaming at him, ruffling his hair. “I knew from the first time I saw you on a broom that you’d be something special.” He winked. “Once you’ve graduated, you’ll give Puddlemere a call, aye? I’d hate to have to play against you in the National league as well.”

“You are a dear, dear friend, Harry Potter, but please do not join the European league when you graduate,” Viktor told him, “I would like to reach retirement with my reputation in tact.”

Harry didn't know what to do with all the praise, blushing like a tomato with Oliver's arm still heavy over his shoulders. "Let me just finish school, first, yeah?" he said eventually. "One thing at a time."

Oliver chuckled, ruffled his hair once more, then let him go. "Right, I'm going to leave you lot to talk contracts and things, and go start thinking up ways to apologise to the Scottish team," he joked. "And I've got one last kilt fitting to get to." He practically vibrated with joy at the thought of his upcoming wedding. "As soon as you're allowed to start telling people, Potter, you owl me, because we are celebrating, alright?" He smacked a kiss to Harry's cheek. "I'll see you in a few days. Andy, Claud, always a pleasure," he shook both their hands, then turned to Viktor. "And you, let us know if you can stick around for a few days more, we'd love to have you at the wedding."

Viktor looked surprised, but nodded, shaking Oliver's hand. "I will rearrange my schedule. I will be there," he promised.

"Perfect, we'll owl you the details." Waving to them all, Oliver headed back into the tunnel, whistling cheerfully to himself.

"As much as I would love to get you to sign a contract before you leave, Harry, I'm not the only one involved in the decision. But quite frankly if the board don't agree, I'm resigning," Andy joked. At least, Harry thought he was joking. "I'll have the legal team draw something up and get it over to you once everything's sorted. And I look forward to working with you."

"I— you know I still have school and everything, right?" Harry checked. "I really want this position but I'm not going to mess up my NEWTs for it."

Andy chuckled. "Not to worry; we can work around it, see how schedules line up. And the Cup won't start until after you graduate, so we don't have to worry about that." He leaned in with a conspiratorial grin. "I'll have you know, Harry, that I'm too smart a man to anger Minerva McGonagall by damaging her student's chance at good grades." He gave a theatrical shudder. "Swear I still have nightmares of her yelling for catching me out after curfew."

Harry snorted — yes, McGonagall had that affect on people.

With the tryout seemingly over, Harry looked to Viktor. "What are you up to for the rest of the day? Did you want to go get lunch or something?" He was too full of adrenaline to eat, but once that wore off he knew he'd be starving.

"Thank you, but I have a meeting soon," Viktor demurred. "I will owl you, though, since it seems I am in the country until the wedding. We should get dinner." He shook Harry's hand. "Well done today. I look forward to playing against you in the Cup." With the snitch still in his other hand, he winked. "Next time I may not be so lucky."

Harry said his goodbyes, shrank and pocketed his flying gear, and strode through the tunnel to head to the apparition room. Once he was there, he had to bite his lip to stop himself from screaming in joy.

He was going to play quidditch for England!

Thinking of home, Harry turned on his heel, landing right outside Seren Du. He desperately hoped people were home — he had to tell someone his good news.

“We’re out back!” Sirius called, and Harry ran around the side of the house to find the whole household in the garden, enjoying the beautiful afternoon. Even Buckbeak was out there, sprawled in a patch of sunlight, fast asleep.

“You look happy. And sweaty,” Draco added, eyeing him over. “Should I be concerned?”

Harry had to snort at the ridiculousness of the implication. “As if.”

“Do we finally get to hear about whatever it is you’ve been keeping under your hat all week?” Remus asked, raising his eyebrows at the teen. “Don’t try and fool me, you’ve been bleeding anxiety since last Tuesday.” He tapped his nose in emphasis. Harry bit his lip; he should have known he wouldn’t be able to keep it entirely secret.

“Well,” he began slowly, unsure how to best word it. “I had… a meeting, of sorts, today. And things aren’t officially official. But… I just made seeker for the England team.” He had to blurt it all out, unable to hold it in a second longer.

Draco jumped to his feet in shock. “What?”

“Viktor arranged a tryout, back before the battle and all. He’s friends with the team manager, I guess. And apparently Oliver spent ages talking me up, so I went and I flew and Viktor caught the snitch but I guess they thought I was good enough anyway. So they offered me the spot. And I said yes.” He grinned at the blond. “So it looks like we’re going to Greece next summer after all.”

The next thing he knew he was having the life kissed out of him by an armful of exuberant blond. “You’re fucking amazing,” Draco declared. Then, in a more boastful tone, “I’m going to marry an international quidditch star.”

Harry laughed. “You can’t tell anyone yet,” he said, looking around to include the others. “Not until it’s all signed and everything. But… yeah. I did that. Sorry I didn’t say sooner.” He hadn’t wanted to deal with their disappointment if he stuffed it up.

“There’s only one thing we can do about this,” Sirius declared, rising gracefully to his feet. Harry eyed him warily, wondering if his godfather was going to give him an earful about choosing quidditch over his studies.

Sirius’ face split in a wide grin. “Ceri!” he called, “we’re gonna need a cake! A big one!”

.-.-.-

The wedding of Oliver Wood and Lord Cassius Warrington was perhaps the biggest social event of the year.

Considering the Ministry was refusing to put on any sort of celebratory ball or dinner until the country was running smoothly and they had a proper Minister elected once more, there hadn't been much of a social calendar before now. But even so, Harry was sure anything in future would be hard pressed to top this.

He hadn't realised it was possible for something to be tastefully quidditch themed, but somehow Cassius and Oliver had managed it. Puddlemere's stadium was decked out to the nines, the pitch laid out for the whole wedding, sun shining down on them all.

There had to be at least two hundred people in attendance — friends from Hogwarts, Oliver's quidditch friends, some of Cassius' work colleagues. All the people whose social standing led them to expect an invitation to Lord Warrington's wedding. And of course, those friends made in the month spent turning Hogwarts into a stronghold.

But despite the huge crowd, and the multiple photographers, it still felt like an intimate, family affair. Harry and Draco were seated near the front, with the rest of their friends, so they had the perfect view of Oliver and Cassius meeting at the altar with awe in their eyes, joining hands and preparing to pledge their lives to one another.

Throughout the ceremony — which was definitely longer than Bill and Fleur's — Harry kept looking down at Draco's hand in his, his engagement ring sat on his finger. Every time Draco caught him, he would roll his eyes and smile and kiss Harry's cheek, directing his attention back towards the happy couple.

The pair were unfairly handsome in their wedding attire, Oliver in the full formal tartan of his family clan, Cassius in shimmering gold dress robes that fit him like a glove; Harry didn't doubt all the gossip magazines — and some of the quidditch magazines — would have them on the front page of their next issue.

When the magical binding around their hands turned into identical wedding rings, the cheer that went up around the stadium felt louder than any quidditch match.

Harry caught Oliver's eye as the newly wedded couple made their return journey down the aisle together — his ex-captain had never looked so happy, not even when Gryffindor had won the quidditch cup. Which, for Oliver Wood, was saying a lot.

With no war to get to and no reason not to celebrate fully, there was a sit-down dinner, complete with speeches. Harry and Draco were on a table with the rest of the original Gryffindor team and their plus-ones, Draco very glad for Blaise's presence in the crowd of lions.

Oliver's dad gave a hilarious speech, embarrassing the hell out of both his son and his new son-in-law, teasing Oliver about how he thought his son would never love anything more than he loved quidditch, and then he'd been introduced to Cassius. It was sweet, and heartfelt, and everything Harry had imagined weddings to be.

He wanted his own to be like that. Even if the idea of Sirius Black giving a Father-of-the-Groom speech did give him palpitations.

Hopefully Neville's Best Man speech would make up for it. If his friend agreed to the position, of course.

But after an excellent dinner full of laughter and happy conversation — and not a single Weasley twins prank, on threat of Blaise and Angelina running off to Italy without them for a week — the space was transformed into a dance floor, with the six-tiered quidditch-themed cake in pride of place at the table nearby.

Draco's arm wound around Harry's waist as they watched Oliver and Cassius dance, both men with their foreheads pressed together. "One more year," the blond whispered in his ear, his smile audible. Harry stroked over his engagement ring, leaning back against him — one more year, and they could begin planning their own.

Or, rather, they could give Sirius, Narcissa and Andromeda permission to start planning it. There was no holding those three back.

When the floor opened to the rest of the guests, Harry and Draco were some of the first out there, swaying together as the band played a slow song. Harry was pleased and surprised to see Remus and Snape, in a shadowed corner of the dance floor but dancing together nonetheless, in public and everything.

It didn't stay that serene, of course. Once the cake had been cut and all the ceremonial stuff was over, the journalists got politely escorted out and the real party began. Alcohol flowed freely, and as it was the first time the whole crowd had gotten together since the battle, they were all more than ready to celebrate both Oliver and Cassius' marriage, and also the absolute joy of the freedom they had fought so hard to win.

Oliver was one of the fastest to get drunk, despite his insistence that a proper Scotsman could handle his alcohol. He danced with reckless abandon, grabbing his quidditch teammates both past and present up to join him, even at one point cajoling McGonagall into a dance. Harry had to stop him from spilling the beans about Harry's position on the England team on multiple occasions, though he was sure at least a few people had to be suspicious from the way Oliver 'just happened' to introduce him to certain quidditch players, all of whom happened to be on the England team, and all of whom greeted Harry with incredible enthusiasm and secretive smiles.

There were fireworks, as there always were at an event containing Fred and George Weasley. There were multiple Ceilidh dances, one of which Oliver dragged Harry into despite being three sheets to the wind and barely able to stand up, while Harry was equally as uncoordinated but not nearly as drunk. Oliver had stripped half of his formalwear off by that point — jacket and shoulder plaid abandoned in the heat, sporran lost because it disrupted his dancing, and sgian-dubh confiscated by an exasperated Cassius before someone could get hurt.

Not that Cassius was much better than his husband. He kept sneaking up behind Oliver, trying to slip a hand under his kilt, grinning wolfishly every time he was caught.

To Harry, it felt like the first time they had all had the chance to just be themselves; young, carefree, in love. Normal young adults celebrating the first of their group to get married — surely the first in a slew of many, once the bulk of them graduated.

Oliver and the twins were busy doing some kind of jig-slash-war-dance situation in the middle of the dance floor, while Cassius, Blaise and Angelina looked on in a mix of despair and amusement. Harry just hoped that someone, somewhere in the room had a camera, because moments like these deserved to be captured.

He rocked up on his toes, hands on Draco's shoulders for balance, looking around to see if any of his friends had a camera out. He was sure he'd seen Sullivan with one earlier... Harry peered around the pitch, rolling his eyes at the number of couples out snogging in the shadows, trying to spot his Ravenclaw friend.

Then he did a double-take, zeroing in on one of the snogging couples. One of the pair was definitely Sully — the other, if Harry wasn't mistaken, was Justin Finch-Fletchley.

Very interesting.

Hoping he remembered seeing the pair come morning, Harry gave up his camera search and decided to just enjoy the moment, allowing Pansy and Millie to drag him and Draco out onto the dance floor now they weren't in danger of being hit by a flailing Weasley. Millie's fiancé, Otto — who had bravely decided this wedding should be his first proper introduction to Millie's entire friend group — was sat at a table with Theo and Susan, looking quite overwhelmed, but happy about it nonetheless.

They were all going to be horrendously hungover in the morning, and Harry doubted Snape would be quite so generous with the Hangover potion this time.

But it was more than worth it, to be this happy.

Chapter End Notes

Just one more left to wrap things up, friends~ see you Friday!

Chapter 109

Chapter Notes

Here we are. The final chapter. Before we go in, I want to say a HUGE thanks to everyone who's left comments, kudos, and been so patient on this LONG journey we have taken. Y'all are awesome <3 Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Election Day had arrived in Magical Britain, and the whole country was buzzing with anticipation.

Harry and his family went to the Ministry early to cast their votes, sending sympathetic glances to the team of harassed-looking Ministry clerks who were dealing with all the votes coming in by owl and floo.

It was as simple as pressing his wand to Amelia's name on the ballot card, and watching it vanish in a flash of gold light.

They stuck around for a bit afterwards, helping Susan with her last-minute campaigning for her aunt — not that the Hufflepuff needed their help, as terrifyingly competent as she was — and then afterwards went over to Longbottom Manor in anticipation of the victory party. Sirius and Charlie swung by the Pottery to pick up the Forrester kids — just one last check away from being their kids. The couple had been frantically getting Grimmauld Place ready for the last week, planning on moving over there with Amy and Tahan after they'd seen all the other kids off to school.

They brought Frankie with them too, of course, and Harry was not remotely surprised when the Slytherin boy made a beeline for Remus and Snape.

If that boy wasn't officially their ward by the end of the school year, Harry would streak through the whole of Hogwarts.

Neville was in fine hosting form, much to his grandmother's pride. More and more people were coming through the floo as the day passed — all the usual crowd, the ones who had worked so hard to make this day happen.

Harry left his boyfriend chatting with Tonks, wandering through to squeeze in beside Ginny on an oversized armchair in the much quieter conservatory. "Hey, you," he greeted, slinging an arm around her shoulders. "How's it feeling, today?"

The day before, they had snuck out — or rather, Ginny had snuck out, and Harry had left the house with enthusiastic encouragement from his godfather — to meet Charlie's tattoo artist friend for their promised date. Ginny had gained a gold ring through the brand new cartilage of her magically regrown ear, which had earned her mother's ire but was a great decoy to draw away from the bar through her left nipple, which Mrs Weasley definitely did not know about.

"Not too bad; healing spells are a marvel." Ginny grinned at him, wiggling her eyebrows.
"How about you?"

"Hardly even feel it." His new tattoo, a golden snitch fluttering just at the base of the right side of his ribs, was fully healed and moving already.

"And how does Draco like it?" Ginny leered, wiggling her eyebrows.

"Wouldn't you like to know," he joked in the same tone. Draco was definitely a big fan of the tattoo, even if he did roll his eyes at the seeker puns Harry made. "How does Nev like yours? Has he seen it yet?" He still remembered the shade of red Neville had turned when they discussed it.

"Not yet. I mean, he knows it's there, obviously," Ginny said, running a finger gently over her new earring. "But he hasn't seen it." Then she smirked wolfishly. "But I'm staying the night here, so..."

Harry laughed, rubbing the fuzz on the side of her head. She wasn't growing it out, even though there were potions that would do it in an instant. Harry was glad; he liked this new look on her. She looked older, and with another Weasley growth spurt and her muscles from playing quidditch, she looked like a girl you didn't want to mess with.

"Y'know, I'm gonna kind of miss our little dorm arrangement from the summer," he confessed. "Though I won't miss hearing you and Neville when you forget your Silencing charms."

Ginny cackled, unrepentant. "I know what you mean," she agreed, curling into him slightly. "It was nice. Our little escape from the world. Miles better than my usual dorm mates." She made a disgruntled face; due to her solid friendships with most of the year above, Ginny wasn't very close to the other Gryffindor girls in her year. They were jealous of her friendship with Harry, for one.

"Tell me about it." Dean and Seamus hadn't been too bad, but Ron had been a nightmare to live with before he'd figured out Silencing charms, his snores vibrating the whole room.

Harry wouldn't have to deal with that anymore, though. "Between you and me," he said, dropping his voice, "I'm not gonna have that problem this year."

Ginny raised a suspicious brow. "You're not moving down to the Chamber, are you?"

Harry snorted. "Not quite. Though I might have, if not for this." Since he could walk through the castle walls, it wouldn't even be an inconvenience. "Think about it." He'd kept it secret since McGonagall had given him the badge, but so close to returning to school he didn't mind if Ginny let it slip.

He watched her think for several seconds, before the penny dropped. “No way!” she breathed, wide-eyed. “You...?” She tapped her chest, about where a badge would sit on a Hogwarts robe, and he nodded. Immediately, he was tackled in a tight hug, Ginny squealing into his ear. “Harry, that’s amazing!” Then she pulled back, and scoffed. “You fucking nerd. Mr Eight Os.”

He just rolled his eyes — they were back to this again. He probably wouldn’t be rid of that nickname until after he got his NEWT results.

“I didn’t think she’d give it to me,” he confessed. “Thought I was too much trouble, to be honest.”

Ginny grinned at him. “You’re the good kind of trouble, though,” she told him, winking.

“Oi, you two!” The call startled both of them, turning to see Draco in the doorway. “The count’s almost over, they should be announcing it soon.”

Harry and Ginny scrambled to their feet, following Draco into the main parlour. The whole room was clustered around a Wizarding Wireless with the volume turned up, tension thick enough to cut with a knife. Susan sat closest to the Wireless, on Theo’s lap with a white-knuckle grip on his hands. Today’s eyepatch was bright orange with the words ‘Vote Minister Bones’ printed in black.

Harry squeezed into a seat next to Tonks, trying not to elbow her in the stomach as he situated himself. In the metamorphmagus’ tight t-shirt, the bump of the four-month pregnancy was unmistakeable, and Tonks couldn’t stop grinning about it.

Draco perched on the arm of the sofa beside him, hand coming to Harry’s shoulder, and Harry reached up to squeeze it anxiously.

“You know she’s going to win, right?” Tonks murmured, watching him in amusement. “Hawthorne is a clotpole. No one’s going to vote for him.”

“You never know,” Harry pointed out warily, “they voted for Fudge, after all.”

Then Draco hushed him, as Susan turned the volume up even louder.

“It seems we have the final count coming in!” the announcer declared. “And... with a staggering ninety-six percent of the votes, Interim Minister Amelia Bones is now our confirmed new Minister for Magic! Congratulations, Minister Bones, and commiserations to Mr Hawthorne.”

Harry was on his feet with excitement, Tonks right beside him as the whole room erupted in cheers. Susan burst out sobbing in Theo’s arms, and Mrs Longbottom didn’t even get mad when the twins let off some indoor fireworks. But they were quickly extinguished, as Amelia’s victory speech began on the broadcast.

“Thank you all for putting your faith in me — I know it isn’t easy, after such a difficult few years. But the dark times have passed, and I will do everything in my power to help this country step into the light and be the best magical community it can be. For all our magical brethren, all over Britain. This summer has been a summer of change, and while as Interim Minister I have, with the help of my excellent staff and the dedicated Wizengamot, started to implement some long-overdue changes; I truly hope that now I have been elected, I will be able to continue that change for the better. All of you, all of us; we flourished in the face of adversity, and now it is time to reap our rewards and enjoy our peace. Thank you again, and I look forward to heralding in a better, brighter Magical Britain.”

“Oh, she is good,” Narcissa mused quietly. “Making it seem like a community effort to put this country to rights, rather than the swarm of teenagers who secretly took over our government.” She was clearly teasing, her grey eyes amused, and Susan laughed.

“Look, if the adults are gonna leave a mess, sometimes the kids have to clean it up,” she joked.

Hetty the house elf appeared with several bottles of champagne, and soon everyone had a glass — except Tonks and the kids, who drank sparkling grape juice. “To Minister Bones,” Kingsley declared, raising his glass. “And her secret teenage militia.”

“Minister Bones!” everyone chorused happily.

“You’re moving up in the world, Theo,” Draco drawled playfully. “Dating the Minister’s niece.”

Theo smirked, green eyes cast fondly at Susan, who had stopped crying by this point. “Don’t you see, Draco? That was my plan all along.”

Susan laughed the loudest at that, raising an eyebrow. “And here I thought your plan was to date the future Chief Warlock of the Wizengamot.”

“There’s multiple stages to my plan, darling,” Theo assured her. “I’m playing the long game.”

Susan snorted, tugging him by the shirt collar into a kiss that had all of them whistling.

“I just can’t believe we have to go back to school on Thursday,” the Hufflepuff girl complained, once she had detached from her boyfriend. “Pretending to be normal students, ugh.”

“Oh, shut up, like you aren’t going to love every second of being Head Girl,” Hannah teased her best friend. She was healing in leaps and bounds now she had her chair, and seemed to be quite excited to tackle seventh year.

“That will be nice,” Susan agreed, “and it’ll look great on my resume. I just wish I knew who McGonagall picked as Head Boy. I hope it’s not someone awful. Merlin, what if it’s Ron?”

None of the Weasleys in the room were offended by the slight to their brother, and Harry sat there quietly smirking. Susan had been so quick to assume that since none of them had immediately owned up to it, it was someone outside their social circle.

He looked across the room at Ginny, whose eyes were already bright with glee. “It’s the worst person, I’m really sorry, Susan,” she said sympathetically. “It’s going to be such a chore dealing with him.”

Susan’s eye landed on her in shock. “You know who it is?” Her face filled with dismay. “Oh, does that mean it is Ron?”

Ginny’s solemn expression cracked at the corners. “Worse than Ron,” she said with a sad shake of her head. “You’re going to have to put up with Harry.”

All eyes were on the Gryffindor boy, who grinned sheepishly. “Uh. Surprise?”

“HARRY!” Susan practically threw herself at him, Tonks only barely managing to dive out of the way in time. “Why didn’t you tell me, you git! Oh, this is going to be brilliant! I was so worried it would be someone shit, but it’s you, that’s great!”

He laughed, steadying her before she could fall off his lap. She was still working on the depth perception thing.

“If it makes you feel better, Sooz, I didn’t tell anyone. Until Ginny, like, ten minutes ago.”

“He didn’t even tell me,” Draco cut in, glaring lightly at his fiancé. Harry winced, and both sets of twins ‘ooh’ed in the background.

“Honestly I sort of forgot,” he admitted, giving the blond a pointed look. In the face of his other news, his Head Boy badge had rather slipped his mind.

Draco softened slightly, but still didn’t look impressed.

“You’re going to have to make it up to me, Potter,” he muttered, once Susan had left Harry’s lap and decided a dance party was in order while they waited for Amelia and Percy to get home and celebrate with them.

Harry looked up, eyes smouldering. “Head Boy gets a private room,” he pointed out in a sultry murmur, tugging Draco half over the back of the sofa. “I’m sure that can be arranged.”

Draco’s eyes darkened, and as Harry yanked him the rest of the way into his lap, no one really cared that the two of them were snogging like there was no tomorrow, left alone on the sofa in the corner.

They were all used to it by now, after all.

.-.-.-.

Packing up for school was decidedly weird, this time around.

Not only was Harry viscerally aware that this was the last time he would ever pack his trunk for a year at Hogwarts, but he was also having to pack up the majority of his bedroom at Seren Du, as well.

With no need for an Unplottable house to keep Harry safe, the family would be moving out and returning the manor to its summer home status. Grimmauld was ready, the paperwork on the Forrester kids had been signed, and it was time for them all to go home.

“Remind me why I’m the only one packing?” Harry asked, glancing over his shoulder at Draco, who was sprawled on the bed eating apple slices and watching Harry magically pack books into an expanded trunk.

“Because it’s your room?” Draco retorted.

“Yeah, which you’ve been basically living in for the last two summers,” Harry said without missing a beat. “Half this stuff is yours, I swear.” The bedroom that was actually Draco’s room had taken all of ten minutes to pack, and five of those were spent double checking that they hadn’t left any vials of lube or sex toys or anything weird hidden somewhere, which then might be found at a later date and used to embarrass the hell out of them.

“But it’ll all go to your room at Grimmauld, which is where I’m likely to spend most of my time when not at school anyway.”

“Won’t you go with your mum?” Harry asked, finishing up with the books and deciding to take a break, flopping down next to Draco on the bed. The Slytherin shrugged.

“Potentially. But I’ll still come over to see you most days.” He smiled helplessly. “As many of our friends have pointed out to us, we’re really quite co-dependent, darling.” He didn’t sound upset about it; he almost sounded proud.

Harry snorted, leaning in to kiss him. “We’re not that co-dependent,” he insisted. “We’re just making up for all that time we had to pretend we hated each other.”

“Whatever helps you sleep at night, love.”

“You help me sleep at night.” Harry’s hand slid down Draco’s stomach, and the blond smirked.

“Exactly. Co-dependent.” He raised up on his elbows, kissing Harry softly, parting his lips and easing him into a deeper kiss.

“For fuck’s sake, can you two stop for five minutes?”

Charlie stood in the doorway, a box tucked under one arm.

“Actually, we just got started, so if you could shut the door...”

Charlie laughed, tossing a light Tickling charm at Draco in retort. “Cissa needs to borrow you for a bit,” he said. “Malfoy ward stuff.” In his defence, he looked slightly apologetic.

Draco gave a dramatic groan, tearing himself reluctantly away from Harry and rolling off the bed onto his feet. It was unfair how he managed to look graceful doing so — Harry would just look like a drunk giraffe.

“Maybe you’ll actually get some packing done while I’m gone,” Draco joked.

“Sorry, Harry’s needed too. Grunt work in the potions lab,” Charlie informed him. It was Harry’s turn to sigh dramatically.

“Wonderful.” Remus was moving into Snape’s quarters at Hogwarts, but Snape didn’t want to leave potions ingredients at Seren Du for an unspecified amount of time, so everything had to be moved from his lab here to the school. And unfortunately, due to the sensitive nature of the ingredients, that all had to be done by hand.

They worked in companionable silence, Snape occasionally giving Harry instructions on things, but for the most part the almost-seventh year knew what to do with each ingredient. Harry was still getting used to seeing Snape in short sleeves; something the man did often, now that there was no brand on his arm.

“Now that you are no longer in need of training,” Snape began, startling Harry, “that means you are also no longer in need of repeated detentions under my care.” He levelled a stern look at Harry; the kind of look that had students crying into their cauldrons, but only left Harry mildly amused. “If you do get a detention, it will be because you have earned it, and the punishment will reflect that.”

“No more mouthing off in class, then,” Harry surmised, smirking as he put a box of shrivelfigs in the trunk. “Yes, sir.”

Snape snorted, muttering something that sounded an awful lot like ‘I’ll believe that when I see it’.

“I also expect you to put the appropriate amount of effort into my class. Horace did nothing but sing your praises last year, and I expect you to put in that same level of dedication.”

Harry realised what the man was getting at, and looked up at him knowingly. “No more masks,” he promised. “For either of us. You’re the same cranky bastard, and I’m the same insufferable Gryffindor, but... none of the rest.” No pretending he was worse at subjects than he was. No acting like he couldn’t stand to be in Snape’s presence. No lying to his friends about his time spent with the man. And no more of Snape pretending he hated everything about Harry James Potter.

“None of the rest,” Snape agreed quietly. He strode over to Harry, under the pretence of checking on the powdered erumpent horn, but put a hand on the Gryffindor’s shoulder. “I am proud of you, you know,” he murmured, so soft Harry almost didn’t hear it. His breath caught, heart stuttering at the words. He’d heard them a hundred times since the battle, from all kinds of people, but... never from Snape.

“I... d’you think Mum would be?” he asked, biting his lip, watching the man’s expression. Snape’s gaze cast over Harry in that way that made him feel so very exposed.

“Lily would be bragging about her son from here to the moon, were she alive,” he said, smiling ever so slightly. “Not because of your achievements, though she’d be proud of those too. But because of the man you have become.”

Harry's eyes stung at the corners, and he resolutely ignored it. "I... thanks, Severus." He paused, thinking on the words he didn't think he'd ever said, not to the Potions Master's face. "I wouldn't be alive if not for you." Not just the training. His help within the castle, the one adult Harry could count on even when everything was going to shit. Constant and solemn-eyed and always pushing Harry to be better, to stand taller, to learn his worth and demand others do the same.

"You probably wouldn't," Severus agreed wryly. "But my life would not be worth living had I let you die."

Unable to stand it any longer, Harry turned, hugging the lanky Slytherin hard around the waist, letting a few tears escape into the man's black t-shirt. Slowly, Snape's arms closed around him, his head tilting down to rest against Harry's.

It was a while before they got back to categorising ingredients.

.-. .

They ate dinner together in the kitchen, one last time as a family.

Of course, it wasn't actually one last time — they would be back for visits, definitely. At least two weeks every summer, Sirius had promised. No matter how far-flung the family got, how many kids they ended up with, whatever was going on in their lives; two weeks, every summer, for the entire Black family.

"All settled at the Manor, then, Cissa?" Sirius asked, passing his cousin the bottle of wine to pour.

"Just about," she confirmed. "I daresay it's going to be rather quiet, rattling around that old manor by myself." A touch of sadness tinged her voice. "I'll have to find a hobby."

"I thought you already had a hobby?" Snape remarked, "meddling in everyone else's business." The tone was snide, but it just made Narcissa laugh.

"If you did not want me to meddle, Severus Snape, you would not have asked me to come with you."

"Come with you where?" Remus asked, frowning in confusion. "Is this about that errand you ran the other day?"

To Harry's astonishment, Snape blushed.

Under the table, Draco gripped Harry's knee tightly, and when Harry glanced at him the blond looked like he'd come to some incredible realisation. Harry was just about to ask him to share, but then Snape spoke again.

"I was going to do this on Palace Pier," Snape bit out archly, glaring at Narcissa. "But then someone reminded me that such things may cause a fuss amongst the small-minded muggles. And is now insisting that it would be best done before we return to Hogwarts. In case I lose my nerve."

Draco's grip grew tighter, almost painful, but Harry was still very confused about what was going on. Snape pushed his chair back a little, facing Remus properly. The werewolf looked just as bewildered as Harry felt.

"I am not a man prone to dramatic gestures," Snape said, his voice full of emotion in a way that Harry had never heard before. Remus went tense, dropping his fork, scooting his chair back as well. "Nor am I one for excessive words — unless those words are in the destruction of someone's character." He smirked, and so did Remus, sharing some kind of in-joke. "But I am lucky, because despite my flaws you have never hesitated to accept me as I am, every part of me. You have seen me at my worst, and I sincerely hope my best is yet to come."

Things were rapidly piecing together in Harry's brain now, and he didn't seem to be the only one, as Sirius murmured a quiet 'oh, fuck me' before Charlie could shush him.

Snape got out of his chair, dropping to one knee in front of Remus. Remus made a soft choking noise in response, eyes bugging out of his head. "Since we were foolish teenagers with no idea what the world had in store, I have promised you a life together, Remus Lupin. It has taken a while to get here, but... I would very much like it if you would begin that life, with me. As my husband."

Then, from the pocket of his jeans, came a ring. A simple gold band, set all the way around with small amber gemstones. He held it up to Remus, his face appearing impassive at first glance — but Harry could see the naked hope in those ink-dark eyes.

"Severus," Remus breathed shakily. "I have waited twenty years to hear those words, and my answer still hasn't changed. Yes, I'll marry you."

For the second time in his life, Harry saw Remus Lupin and Severus Snape kiss each other, Remus' hands cupping Snape's cheeks.

No one spoke as Snape slid the ring onto Remus' finger, kissing it once it was there and then rising to reclaim his chair. Then Remus turned, looking ten years younger as he beamed at them all.

"So," he said, shifting his chair back up to the table. "Who's for dessert?"

.-.-.-.

The morning of September first was a warm one, the summer lingering unseasonably late, as if it was aware the students of Hogwarts had not truly been able to enjoy the start of it. Harry's bedroom window was open, but even so the duvet had been kicked down to the bottom of the bed, Draco's feet tangled up in the edge of it. His bare chest was pressed to Harry's back, spooning up behind him, and Harry would have happily stayed there forever.

"Don't wanna get up," he murmured petulantly, Draco's warm breath tickling the back of his neck.

"It's early yet," Draco told him, hand sliding languidly up his side. "We don't have to."

They lay there for a while, Draco pressing fluttering kisses to Harry's shoulder, still skimming that hand up and down his side, just light enough to make the skin prickle pleasantly. Harry stretched out a little further, which had the side effect of pressing his arse back against Draco's quickly-hardening cock. The Slytherin hummed happily, fingers skirting up and over Harry's nipple, though he still didn't move otherwise. He scraped his teeth gently across the sensitive skin of Harry's neck, drawing a sigh from the Gryffindor.

This continued for a while longer; tiny movements, teasing touches, a slow and lazy journey into wakefulness. But there was intent to it, a heat building in that aching slowness, and Harry wasn't surprised when eventually that hand stroking his chest went down, down, right beneath the waistband of his boxers. He gasped, arching back against Draco, the blond's fingers curling firmly around his length.

Draco continued to press against him, hips bucking in bigger movements now, his leg sliding between Harry's and his other arm creeping around the Gryffindor's shoulders, bowing his back so their lips could meet in a messy kiss. A breathless whine escaped Harry as fingers tightened in his hair, kisses dotting along the shadowed line of his unshaven jaw until a tongue started to drag across his throat. Draco bucked his hips harder, hand around Harry dry but just the right side of sweet friction, thumb flicking over his leaking head and making Harry whimper slightly. Teeth nipped at his Adam's apple, the tingling pressure of his arousal building gradually within him.

Harry reached back blindly, scrabbling a hand down Draco's side, his back, grabbing a handful of his silk-clad backside, urging him to move harder, faster, more. The rhythm between the hand on his own erection and the hard length jutting into the swell of his arse was almost perfect, Draco's quiet moans singing in his ear like a prayer, a plea. Harry closed his eyes, straining to reach his release, hoping that each pump of Draco's hand around his cock would be the perfect angle, the sizzle in his veins almost painful as he remained on the brink but not quite, thighs tensing, toes curling, so close—

BANG! BANG! BANG!

"Boys, come on, we've got to pick up the kids at the Pottery and I don't want to be late!" Sirius, on the other side of the door, cheerful and probably entirely too aware of what he'd just interrupted, the heat he'd as good as tossed a freezing bucket of water over.

Harry groaned, feeling his arousal die even with Draco's hand still around him, his partner rolling onto his back with an irritated huff.

"Every fucking time," Harry groused, trying to fight through his addled brain, trying to comprehend such delicious torture with such an abrupt, unsatisfying end. "It's like he waits, right until the worst moment."

"That requires your godfather having more knowledge of our sex life than I ever want to contemplate," Draco told him, shuddering. "Sodding Salazar, I'm going to murder him one day."

"I'll help you hide the body," Harry promised. He cast a wandless tempus, his clock having been moved to his room at Grimmauld Place. "Are you kidding me, it's not even nine yet!"

Don't want to be late, I swear to fucking Merlin I am going to leave behind a prank that will make Charlie not want to touch him for weeks." He was already thinking about it, running through his mental list of spells, wondering what would be appropriate — what didn't have an immediate counter to it.

"You could do that," Draco drawled, sitting up and giving him a pointed look. "Or you could come and join me in the shower and we'll finish what we started."

On second thought, that was a much better idea than Harry's.

.-. .

Sirius was a ball of energy at breakfast, talking a mile a minute, asking the boys if they had everything and reminding Harry to send Hedwig off with his signed England contract before he left, babbling as he worried a napkin between his fingers. Harry couldn't even be mad at him about the interruption; his godfather was a little bit of a wreck, and it tugged at Harry's heart.

He was a bit of a wreck, too, inside. They were leaving this house, his home, his sanctuary, and they were going to board the Hogwarts Express for the very last time.

He kept telling himself he was being ridiculous — he could go back and visit Hogwarts whenever he liked, they literally couldn't keep him out even if they wanted to. And for the first time ever there was nothing to fear from the castle; no manipulative headmasters or murderous Dark Lords or tricks and traps lurking round dark corners for Harry to fall into.

Just classes, and friends, and quidditch.

McGonagall was right — without the Head Boy position, he would go spare with boredom.

Assuring Sirius for the hundredth time that yes, he had everything, and even if he didn't he could ask Ceri to get it or just apparate home and get it himself, Harry finished off his breakfast and stood. And paused.

He'd left this place for a whole school year before. Multiple times. So why did it feel so much worse, now?

Sirius slung an arm over his shoulders, snapping him out of his reverie. "Time to rejoin the big wide world, now, kiddo," he murmured. "No more hiding out here and pretending the rest of it all doesn't exist."

Oh. That was why.

Harry resolutely swallowed against the tears that threatened to come, nodding sharply. "I'm gonna go send Hedwig off." He had signed the contract with the England team, after having Mrs Frobisher read through the whole thing and check that he wasn't going to be stuck with some unreasonable publicity bullshit. It was great, and once Andy received it Harry would officially be seeker for England.

Big wide world, indeed.

Sirius nudged him into movement, so Harry did as he said, scratching Hedwig on the head before sending her off with the tightly rolled parchment. Then he gave one last look around his room, and wiped surreptitiously at his eyes.

“You soppy little lion.”

He wasn’t sure when Draco had come in, but there he was, his face so terribly fond Harry’s heart cracked a little further. “I promise one of these days I’ll stop crying,” Harry joked, and Draco crossed the distance between them, holding him close.

“You cry as much as you like, my love,” he whispered, swaying them slightly as Harry buried his face in the blond’s shoulder.

“We’ll be back,” Draco continued softly. “Your room will always be your room. No one’s going to take it away from you.”

What was it with his loved ones and reading the inner depths of his soul like it was written plain on his face?? He wasn’t that transparent, surely?

“I know,” he murmured, though it felt better to say it out loud. “And I have my room at Grimmauld, too. I know it’s better this way — we need to have a home we can invite people over to. The kids need that. But...”

“But this place is home, too,” Draco finished for him. A kiss pressed to Harry’s hair, a soft inhale of his shampoo. “You can have more than one home, Harry. It’s fine.”

For a boy who once had no home at all, it seemed an entirely foreign concept.

Eventually, he straightened up, clearing his throat and wiping his eyes. He didn’t want to get the train to Hogwarts looking like he’d been bawling his eyes out like a homesick first year. He was Head Boy; he was supposed to be setting an example.

“You go wash your face,” Draco suggested. “I’ll get our trunks downstairs. Oh, and I’ve been meaning to ask — when did you get your cloak back?”

Harry blinked, his mild emotional spiral derailed by the strange question. “My what?”

“Your invisibility cloak. I saw you put it in your trunk last night and I was going to ask but then I got distracted.”

He froze, thinking of the folded piece of fabric within his trunk — always handy to have, just in case — but also thinking of the stone set in a ring and the wand brimming with power, both now tucked away inside little box in a hidden drawer in his desk at Grimmauld Place.

Thinking of a voice, in the back of his mind, that never truly went away.

“Oh, that.” He forced a smile on his face. “It just showed up, after Dumbledore died. Guess it was the family magic bringing it back.” Not technically a lie.

Draco's brow furrowed. "How odd," he mused, then shrugged. "Well, I'm glad you have it back. I know how much it means to you." He leaned in, pecking Harry's cheek. "Go on, go take a minute to clean up. Sirius will have an aneurism if we don't leave soon." They were trusting Essie and Tinker to make sure that all four of the children were packed and ready to go in time. Once they left, the Pottery would be empty again.

For now.

Sure enough, Sirius was bouncing up and down when Harry made it downstairs. Snape looked only mildly murderous — but then he'd been in a good mood since the night before, understandably.

The students were going to shit themselves if Snape dared smile at the Welcoming Feast.

"Let's go, let's go!" Sirius hassled, making Harry roll his eyes and jump the last three stairs.

"I'm coming! Keep your hair on!"

Ceri hurried in from the kitchen, holding a stack of metal sandwich boxes. "Ceri has made lunches for young masters and mistress' train journey!" She handed one each to Harry and Draco, and the last two to Charlie.

Harry grinned. "Brilliant, thanks Ceri. We'll see you at Christmas." Ceri would, of course, be moving to Grimmauld with the family. At this point Harry wasn't sure any of them could find their own arses with two hands and a map without the little house elf.

Ceri bobbed her head in thanks, then fixed the two boys with a stern look. "Young masters is staying out of trouble this year," she declared — a statement, not a question. Sirius let out a cough that sounded an awful lot like a laugh.

"We'll try our best, Ceri," Harry promised sincerely. She eyed him a little longer, then nodded, satisfied.

"Ceri is going to the other house to wait for masters and little master and mistress." She was overjoyed at the idea of having a couple of younger kids to take care of.

"Perfect, we'll see you there," Charlie said. "Let's get moving."

All together, the seven of them left the house, Harry taking one last look at the first place he had ever experienced true freedom, and they headed for the edge of the wards.

"What's happening with Buckbeak?" Harry asked suddenly, glancing back at the hippogriff sunning himself in the grass. Surely they weren't leaving him there all alone, for the whole year?

"Oh, I'm gonna take him back to Hagrid once I get the chance," Sirius assured. "Think it's been enough time that he's no longer a fugitive."

Harry snorted. "Even if he is, I have an in with the Minister," he joked.

They apparated to the Pottery, and the gates opened automatically at Harry's presence.

"So this is your house, is it?" Draco asked as they strode up the driveway, his brows raised.

"Oh, yeah, I forgot you haven't been here before." There had never been any need. "Yup, this is it. The Potter family home." Our home, he didn't say, though it was clear in the look he gave Draco.

The Slytherin looked up at the house, then nodded, a faint smile on his face. "It'll do," he said, and Harry's heart stuttered.

Thankfully, the house elves had indeed managed to wrangle the four children into readiness. Amy and Tahan were crying already, heartbroken at the prospect of not seeing their big sister until Christmas. Even the excitement of finally moving in with Sirius and Charlie couldn't cheer them up.

"Come on, loves," Charlie soothed, letting them both hug his legs. "We'll send everyone to school and then we'll go home and you can decorate your new rooms, and then we'll play a bit of quidditch, how's that sound?"

Thanks to some very creative spellwork and a little nudging of the Wardstone, Sirius had turned the roof of Grimmauld Place into a garden, big enough at least for junior quidditch. Which had quickly become a favourite pastime of the two children, so that finally stopped the sniffles.

"Everyone ready?" Sirius checked, doing a final headcount. While he was running through Nashira's check list, Harry sidled over to his two house elves.

"Thank you, both, for everything. You've gone above and beyond, this last year." Caring for so many people without a single peep of complaint. The world truly did not deserve house elves. "If there's anything I can do to thank you..."

The two elves shared a look, unused to being thanked by their masters. "We is doing what we is asked to do, Master Harry," Tinker said simply.

"It is nice having the house in use again," Essie agreed, even if she looked quite like she would happily curl up to sleep for the next three weeks. "Is... will Master Harry be back?" Her eyes widened cautiously. Harry's heart ached for them — they had been alone for so long, before he showed up.

"I'm spending Christmas with the Black family," he said, watching the pair deflate slightly, "but after graduation Draco and I plan to move in here. Quidditch depending." They had thought about getting a flat, like they had once dreamed of, but honestly with the number of houses between them and the amount of time they were likely to be out of the house, there seemed little point.

Both elves beamed at the news, bowing to Harry and then disappearing when he bid them goodbye.

They would probably enjoy the ten months of respite, after the year they'd had.

As the group began to walk out to apparate away, Harry jogged a little to catch up, just behind Frankie and Remus. He didn't mean to eavesdrop, but when he heard them talking...

"Severus and I are getting married," Remus said, looking incredibly pleased by the concept. Frankie blinked, and his jaw set in that impassive Slytherin way of bottling up your emotions.

"Oh," he replied. "...Are you going to have a baby soon, then?"

A cough spluttered out of Remus, his eyes widening. "I— well, we, ah— that's a bit more of a complicated process with two men, you know. We— it's something we're certainly considering."

"Oh," Frankie said again.

"But," Remus continued tentatively, "any theoretical future babies we do have... they could do with a big brother."

Frankie's jaw tightened further. "Harry's doing well so far."

Harry's heart jolted happily.

"He is," the werewolf agreed. "But we were also thinking that you seem rather good at it, yourself."

Frankie's only reaction was a sharp intake of breath, the slightest widening of his eyes, a half-step of hesitation.

"You've got the whole school year to decide," Remus told him evenly. "And you can come talk to us whenever you like. You can spend Yule at the castle, or come spend it with Nash and the rest. And by summer, if you'd like, Severus and I can foster you."

"Foster?" Frankie asked warily, eyes guarded. "Not adopt?"

Now Remus was the one looking a touch surprised.

"We didn't know if you'd want adoption," he admitted. "But we'd certainly like to." An old hand at gently teasing emotions out of recalcitrant Slytherins, Remus patted him on the shoulder. "You don't need to decide now. Think about it."

As they reached the gates, Frankie was pensive and quiet.

"Hold on tight, kids," Sirius warned, making sure each child was securely latched to an adult. He had Amy, and she scrunched her face up tight in preparation for the uncomfortable feeling of apparition.

Harry grinned, snagging Draco around the waist and reeling him in close. "Hold on tight," he breathed into the blond's ear, and then apparated them away.

They reappeared in the designated spot on Platform 9 & 3/4, and Draco glared lightly at him. Harry just kissed him on the nose — just in time for Charlie and Tahan to appear, and the little boy to groan loudly at the gesture. “You two are gross,” Tahan told them matter-of-factly.

With a laugh, Harry stepped out of the way of oncoming apparition, keeping his arms wrapped tight around Draco’s waist, kissing him sloppily on the cheek. “Yup,” he agreed proudly. “So gross.”

“Don’t you two ever stop?”

That was Ginny, her hair freshly shaved and a new earring in that had a little gold chain connecting the top piercing with the lobe piercing. She led the way for the rest of the Weasley/Granger contingency — the whole clan had come out to see their youngest off to Hogwarts, Hermione’s parents bringing up the rear.

“You lived with us for a month, you know we don’t,” Harry joked, mostly just to watch the scandalised blush cross Mrs Weasley’s face.

The platform was a riot of noise and colour and energy — a far cry from how it had been this time last year. Harry was buoyed just by being there, his melancholy finally making way for excitement.

All down the platform he saw his friends, saying goodbye to their families and saying hello to each other, as if they hadn’t all been drinking and dancing together not two nights ago to celebrate Amelia’s win. The Minister herself was there, hugging Susan like she didn’t ever want to let her go. When she did, it was to grab a surprised Theo in an equally tight hug, holding it until the Slytherin relaxed enough to put a tentative arm around her back.

Harry grinned to himself, turning back to his own farewell party. His own family.

They were all here, every single one of them. Well, except the Tonks contingency, but someone had to hold down the fort at the Ministry so that Amelia and Percy could be part of the Hogwarts run.

Normally Remus and Snape would have gone ahead to the castle, but both men wanted to be there to see Harry and Draco off for the last time. Plus, Snape wanted to fool the students into thinking that because he was at the platform, the curse of the Defence position had struck again and he would no longer be teaching them.

“Come on,” Sirius announced. “Let’s start the hugs now, or you’ll never make the train on time.” He held his arms open to Nashira, who jumped into them eagerly.

Harry started with Charlie, mock-grimacing when the redhead ruffled his hair affectionately. “Enjoy yourself, kid,” he said. “And slow down for once, yeah? Swear to Merlin you’re always going a thousand miles a minute, all the plates you’re spinning. Just... slow it down. Make the most of it. Trust me, you’ll regret it if you don’t.” He looked at the train a little wistfully, and Harry wondered if he had regrets about his time at Hogwarts. “Also, keep an eye on Nash for us.” Charlie’s dimples returned with his smile. “You’re a big brother now, don’t forget.”

As if Harry could, when his heart danced every time he thought of his new little siblings.

Snape didn’t do hugs, not in public, so from him Harry got a curt nod. Narcissa on the other hand absolutely did do hugs, and kissed him on both cheeks for good measure. “Look after each other,” was the only advice she gave him, smiling softly.

Remus hugged him too, even though they’d be seeing each other again in a few hours. “We’re so proud of you, cub,” he whispered, nuzzling Harry’s temple. “I’m glad I’ll be there in person to see you shine, your last year.”

That made Harry’s throat go tight, and he quickly distracted himself by heading over to the Weasley contingency to get mauled by Fred and Angelina all at once. George was too busy holding Blaise like he’d never see him again. “Make sure you leave a good team behind,” Angelina told him, eyes shining. “We have to keep this Gryffindor run going even after you’re out of there.”

Harry, who was fully planning on training an entire reserve team this year and then handing his captain’s badge to Ginny, promised her he’d make it happen.

Hugs from Bill and Fleur were brief but heartfelt, and finally George peeled himself off his boyfriend long enough to say goodbye to Harry. “Give ‘em hell, kid,” he said, grinning mischievously, slipping Merlin only knew what into Harry’s jacket pocket. “If you and Neville don’t use those powers of yours for mischief, we’re disowning both of you.”

“Good to know,” Harry said with a snort. He was sure the two of them and their shared ability to walk through walls would manage to come up with something or other, to pass the time. Keep McGonagall on her toes.

Percy preferred to send him off with a firm handshake and a reminder about the reading for the next Wizengamot meeting, which from Percy was practically a declaration of eternal kinship. Smoothly avoiding Mrs Weasley while she was busy fussing over Hermione, Harry stood before Mr Weasley, unsure.

“Oh, come here,” the man murmured, embracing Harry without hesitation. “I’ve told you before, you’ll always be one of my boys,” he promised. “Now be good, and study hard.” His eyes were twinkling when they parted.

“Yes, sir,” Harry chirped obediently, smiling.

Finally, he faced Sirius. There were no words between them, just a fierce, almost desperate hug. Harry refused to cry again that morning, so he held it in admirably, throat aching with the force of it. “You’ve come so far, kiddo,” Sirius whispered. “Just a little bit more to go.” His lips pressed to Harry’s cheek, and his eyes were suspiciously shiny when he loosened his grip. “If I don’t get a letter from McGonagall telling me you’re in trouble at least once per term, I’ll be very disappointed in you,” he mock-scolded, and Harry laughed, hugging him one last time.

“Up to no good, as always,” he assured. “Marauder’s honour.”

“That’s my boy!” Sirius squeezed his shoulders.

“I’ll see you at Yule, Dad.”

The animagus blinked rapidly, smile stretching across his face. “See you at Yule, son.” Then he paused. “But you’ve got the mirror if you need me. Or if you just want a chat. Save Hedwig for the rest of the family.”

“I’ll call once a week, at least, promise.”

Harry had to repeat that promise several times to the twins as they hugged his legs, and then it was onto the train with the warning whistle, steam already billowing from the chimney. Others were doing the same, calling their last goodbyes and hurrying onto the red steam engine, eager to find good compartments with their friends. Nashira and Frankie disappeared quickly, eager to find friends they hadn’t seen in over a year now.

Waving to his family one last time before the train rounded the corner, Harry squeezed Draco’s hand and turned away from the window.

“Here’s the real challenge,” Ginny declared, “trying to figure out how to fit all of us in the same bloody compartment.”

Harry looked around, snorting. Their group had certainly grown a bit. “We’ll figure something out,” he said confidently.

‘Figuring something out’ ended up being two compartments next to each other, crammed full to bursting with the occupants regularly hopping between the two. For the first time, Harry wasn’t spared the tedium of the Prefects’ meeting — he walked in beside Susan, their badges proudly pinned to their chest. Susan’s eye patch was yellow with the words ‘Head Girl’ in bold black letters, just in case someone didn’t get the memo.

Watching Hermione swallow her tongue at the sight of them was worth every second of the boring meeting.

With the new fifth year prefects assigned to train patrols, the seventh years and their one sixth year companion were free to return to their compartments. Harry made sure he was walking behind Sullivan, tapping the Ravenclaw on the shoulder.

“Hi, Harry!” they greeted cheerfully. “Ready for your last year?”

“Just about,” Harry replied, easily pushing down the reflexive wave of emotion. “Now I’ve got a question for you Sullivan Fawley,” he drawled softly, watching Sully’s eyebrow raise warily. Harry’s face became pure mischief. “Is Justin Finch-Fletchley as good a kisser as the rumour mill says?”

Sullivan paled dramatically, then went beet red. “What— no one was around, we checked!”

“What do you mean? You were right in the middle of everything!” The Ravenclaw’s gaze turned to panic.

“Wait. Which time are you talking about?” they asked, and Harry’s eyebrows shot up to his hairline.

“I meant at the wedding. How many times have there been?” he asked interestedly. Sully cursed under their breath.

“Enough,” they bit out succinctly.

“Enough to confirm the rumours?” Harry pressed salaciously. Sullivan let out a tiny ‘meep’, then anxiously tugged at their short ponytail.

“Maybe. Okay. Yes. There’s been many times. And—and hopefully will be many more times.” A beat, then they smirked, ever so slightly. “And if anything, the rumours were understating.”

Harry wolf-whistled quietly under his breath, clapping the Ravenclaw’s shoulder. “Get in, Sully,” he teased, earning a quiet groan.

“Don’t tell anyone?” they pleaded. “I—we’re still figuring things out.”

It sounded like they had plenty figured out, but Harry wasn’t going to butt his nose in, not that much.

“Secret’s safe with me,” he promised. Sully’s eyes flashed in relief.

By the time they reached the compartments, there was no sign of the conversation on either of their faces.

Harry hadn’t realised how many people in the lower years he was friends with, or his other friends were friends with, until they all started swinging by to say hello. Sure, it helped that they had Ginny and Luna and Sullivan with them, but plenty were there for other people.

A lot were HA members, who almost seemed disappointed that the end of the war meant no more need to train.

“We can still do a study group,” Harry assured everyone who asked. “But I know this year’s Defence professor, and honestly, you’re not going to need my help.”

When pressed further, he remained tight-lipped on the subject, even to his closest friends. He wasn’t going to spoil Remus’ fun.

Changing into their robes got a little awkward with so many of them shoved into a small space, but they managed it with magic. The seventh years all turned quiet after that, and their three sixth years did the same in sympathy.

“Cheer up,” Ginny said eventually, perched comfortably on Neville’s lap and looking around at all their solemn faces. “At least this time you can have a totally normal year at Hogwarts.”

They all looked at each other, and burst out laughing as one.

“What the fuck does that even look like?” Pansy exclaimed, shaking her head.

“I think you’re pushing your luck, there,” Hannah agreed. “We’ve still got the trouble-magnet over there, after all.”

“Hey!” Harry protested indignantly. “Not all of it has been my fault!”

“Just most of it,” Parvati piped up, quiet but managing a shaky smile. She and Lavender had disappeared for a while, taking some quiet time to mourn Padma on this final train journey, but now they were back and trying their best to keep their spirits up.

It would be hard, in so many different ways. But they’d manage.

When the train pulled into Hogsmeade station, none of them moved at first. Finally, Harry shifted from his position half-squishing Draco against the window, rising to his feet. “Let’s get going,” he declared, forcing a rakish grin. “McGonagall will kill us all if we’re late to the feast.”

That sparked them into motion, resizing their trunks for the elves to move and squeezing their way out of the train. As always, Hagrid towered over all of them with his lantern in hand, and he waved happily at Harry between his calls for first years. Susan and Harry hung back a while, making sure that all the students got off the train and into the carriages, that no poor firsties got left behind when Hagrid set off to the boats.

Stood patiently waiting for them by the last two carriages were Draco and Theo, along with Daphne, Ginny, Neville, Luna and Hannah.

Harry was torn, but he knew what he needed to do.

“Go with the others,” he told Draco, kissing him softly. “I need to do this with them.”

Draco, because he was the most wonderful person in the world, understood completely. “Come find me after the feast,” he requested, and Harry grinned.

“I can slip through the walls, my love,” he pointed out, “I can steal you away in the night.”

Draco’s eyes sparkled, and he couldn’t resist one more kiss. “I like the sound of that,” he agreed.

They parted ways; Draco heading with Theo and the three girls for one carriage, while Harry turned to his fellow heirs in the very last one. “Shall we?”

Hannah got situated first, levitating her wheelchair up and adjusting the carriage bench to suit. Then the other three piled in beside her. As the carriage began to roll, they joined hands, all four of them, waiting for the moment they crossed the wards.

They saw it before they felt it. Looming on the horizon, twinkling with the light from a hundred different windows, Hogwarts castle stood tall and proud and utterly unchanged by the world around it. Harry had worried it would hurt, looking at it after some time away, remembering all the death and destruction that had happened there. And it did, a little bit.

But it felt good, too. Wonderful things had happened to him at Hogwarts. Wonderful things had happened to everyone at Hogwarts, and would continue happening long after Harry was gone. Hogwarts would outlast them all, a refuge for young people, somewhere they could be at peace with the magic coursing through their blood.

All four of them shuddered at the same exact moment; passing through the wards felt like sinking into a warm bath, like greeting a long-time friend, like home.

They kept holding hands, all the way up to the castle.

“A normal year,” Neville murmured, seeming baffled by the very concept. “What does that look like?”

“I’ve got no clue,” Harry replied, meeting his best friend’s hazel eyes, feeling Luna press warm against his side, catching Hannah’s forever sunny smile. “But I’m sure as hell keen to find out.

As Draco had said; he could have more than one home.

And Hogwarts would always be one of them.

Chapter End Notes

I know a lot of you were hoping to see more out of this fic, but to me, this felt like the right place to end it. It’s already long enough ;)

Seriously though, this fic has been a journey for me. It’s the longest piece of continuous fiction I’ve ever written. It has been the one thing I could write when writing anything else was too hard, the thing I could focus on when I was too unwell and the world was too stressful. It’s also been a catharsis, of sorts. I, like I’m sure many of you can relate to, have struggled with my relationship with Harry Potter a lot over the last couple years. As JKR has gotten more hateful and dangerous in her crusade against trans people, I have found it difficult to want to associate any part of myself with her creations. This fic in a lot of ways was me trying to fix the things that always bothered me about canon — as I’m sure you guessed especially from the earlier sections — but also to work things through with myself, write down some ideas and headcanons that I just wanted to get out, and... move on. I’m not here to question how anyone else deals with JKR’s actions and their consumption of her media, but I’m ready to fill that space in my life with other things. This is very likely my last Potter fic. I didn’t know that for sure when I started, but now, 750k down the line, I think I’ve said my goodbyes to this fandom. It got me through a lot in my life, and I will always appreciate it for that, but I personally cannot keep engaging with the works and words of someone who doesn’t believe I or my loved ones deserve human rights.

So thank you all, for walking this path with me. It's been amazing to have your support and your enjoyment of this fic that ended up far longer than I ever intended. I'm sorry if you're expecting more, but if I went down that road, I'd never be done with it.

I appreciate all of you for putting in the time to read this absolute behemoth. Seriously. You're the best <3

Works inspired by this one

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!