

Lily's Boy

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at <http://archiveofourown.org/works/30856244>.

Rating:	Explicit
Archive Warning:	Underage Sex
Categories:	F/F , F/M , M/M
Fandom:	Harry Potter - J. K. Rowling
Relationships:	Draco Malfoy/Harry Potter , Remus Lupin/Severus Snape , Neville Longbottom/Ginny Weasley , Sirius Black/Charlie Weasley
Characters:	Harry Potter , Draco Malfoy , Neville Longbottom , Remus Lupin , Severus Snape , Sirius Black , Susan Bones
Additional Tags:	AU from PoA , Powerful Harry Potter , Manipulative Albus Dumbledore , Political Harry Potter , Not Molly/Ron/Hermione friendly , Implied/Referenced Child Abuse , Tropes , More tags to follow , Canonical Character Death , Non-Canonical Character Death , Semi sentient Hogwarts , Nonbinary Character , Harry Potter Gets the Love He Deserves
Language:	English
Collections:	Zaharya's Favourites , Avidreaders HP WIP faves , Marvelous Dark Harry , hp stories , Numerous OTPS Infinite Fandoms , Yo! Read This. Seriously. , LadyFracks Drarry Favs , Top 10% , aadarshinah's list of fics to die for , Kinda interesting , The Best Fics I Have Had The Pleasure of Reading , HPs I love , Ficspotter , Lovely Fluffy Life-filled Perfection , Keep up with these gems , Favorite HP Fics , An Assortment of Damn Good Fics , Librarians Coda , hp god tier , to binge read at any time of day but obvs 2am onwards is preferable , Cherry Lemonade will have spare time eventually! , Stories I should reread , Stories worth rereading , things i read that were pretty rad if i do say so myself , Absolute Favorites , Amazing fics to reread , ★ Deliciously Forbidden ★, ★ Potterette's Neverland Treasure ★, The reason I'm sleep deprived , I love you so , HP Favorite Works , Bookshelf full of wonderful complete multi-chapter Drarry , Amazing Epic Stories , it is the truth universally acknowledged that a young woman in a possession of no money job or prosperity must be in want of printing and binding good stories , Collection with my favourite HP fanfictions , Hp binge reading and absolute masterpiece , wicked wizarding worldbuilding , best fics to ever exist , fics that made me cry , complete besties bastards beloved , STO works that I want to read , sassy supportive severus , deceitful dishonest dumbledore , International Fanworks Day 2022 - Classic Fic Recs , Merry's Bookshelf for Drarry , The Foxy List , top tier hp fanfics , great harry potter fics , the best fics I've read on ao3 , Well Loved , Completed HP fics , Top tier HP fics , Fav Recs , 500k+ of pure talent and 3 am reads , The Printing Press 📄, Ash's cute n good fics (warning may not be cute) , Avada Kedavra B!tch , HP Rheos , Works worth reading again and again , Works worth reading a million times over, Digging for Gold, Severus Snape and the trials of Not Getting Paid Enough for this BS, Theos Harry Potter Must Reads, fics to die for, Fics That Belong In Olympus, HP Fics that I love, works i want to read, The sun is rising and I'm still reading, my favs :\), Hufflepuffs are particularly good finders \(of great fanfiction\), Well-Written HP Fanfiction Collection, Voxzie Faves, I don't know what to name this collection, Stories To Make The Soul Sing, HP Best in Writing and Storytelling, Pocky's Favorite Completed Works, Harry Potter Bests, read for inspiration, Favourite Drarry, PB100 I will revisit these over and over, alREADYHPfics: Harry Potter fics that I have read, Emma's Favorites, Catherine's Favorite Fics, Best Fics Read By Berlitz, That's My Canon Now, Ashes' Library, i would die for you <3, Hp enjoyed, Ummmmm, Long stories I'd die for, Severitus fics for the soul, Suggested Good Reads, isabella9792_readinglist, Finished Works Me Have Read, Works Me Like, Good mmm Me Read, Like A Favorite Sweater, HP Fics that are dear and special to me, Random Fandom Favorites, ZombieLove's Time Eaters, Brennah_k's faves to read over and over again, HP Slytherin-esque fics, HP Reads for my sanity, Lyrane's treasure trove, fics that made me go feral, heartbreakingly excellent works, And they were fanfics \(Harry Potter\), My favorites hp, e's good shit, Most Scrumptious Fics I've Ever Read, The Literary Treasury, My recommendations/Rereads, Best of Drarry, Fics That Could Be Books, I'm coming back for baby, AHHHH i need to finish these fics, The Bard's Roost, Top Tier Would Read Again 10/10 \(ShaMarie381\), Harry Potter Fics I Do Adore, guilty pleasures, Harry Potter, Best Harry Potter Universes, Everyone deserves a healing arch, Amaris' Harry Potter Favourite Super Duper Good Fics Ever, Amazing Harry Potter AUs, Best of the Best HP Fics, my favorite fics <3,  ONLY THE BEST , Five Star Fics, masterclass, i wish i can read these for the first time again, one shots and finished and two years never updated' fanfics, The best drarry  ,  Harry Potter , RJ's Faves, bumblebee's fav hp fics! :-\), Sheer Brilliance- HP edition, Harry Potter Excellence, Giggler's favourites, Fics LunaK does not want to lose track of, Draco a Harry, Finished and amazing works I've already read, Cant put it down but at 3am, S.T.I.L.L., Made me cry like a b, best hp fics in my opinion, Phenrispup Reads the World, Brilliant Works, Fab & Fave Harry Potter, Todo lo que puedo llegar a OLVIDAR, My Favorites9, Great HP fanfictions, Lilranko Interesting Read List, Vivvy's hp must reads, Favorite Harry Potter, HPxDM, HP and marauders \(ALL TBR/CR\), goldentrio, He was rapidly becoming obsessed with Draco Malfoy, Min's Favourite Drarry Fics, I wanna eat you up \(like Betty Crocker\), Read Me Again Please, hello yes i can't stop thinking about these works, The Forest, Maria Nelson's Favourites, Fics I Must Read ASAP, hp fics for when I need my fix, The Golden Snitch Selection, slytherinxpride's library of great harry potter fics, Scythe - Later fics to read later, Favorites forever and ever, Favorite works of mandarijntje, super cool and awsome works to show people, Harry Potter, Harry Potter

fics, drarry fics I adore ❤, Stories that emotionally compromised me, Perfect Finished Works, Harry, My Finished Reading, Completed Masterpieces Across Fandoms, Saav's Favs \(boring name\), Harry and his godfather <3, fics that make my heart soar, Fanfics that I hoard, Epic Epics, work again pls, long fic to binge-read, Bluemage Reread Again and Again, <33, T.S.S \(This shit slaps\)

Stats:

Published: 2021-04-23 Completed: 2022-01-14 Words: 746,386

Chapters: 109/109

Lily's Boy

by SomewheresSword

Summary

Before his third year of Hogwarts has even begun, Harry faces three whole weeks of unsupervised time in Diagon Alley. In that time he takes a trip to Gringotts - and that changes everything.

Burdened with the knowledge that Dumbledore has been blocking his family magic, and manipulating far more than he ever thought possible, Harry doesn't know who he can trust; but he knows he can't keep going that way. There's a whole world of lore and politics and history to catch up on, and the more he learns, the more Harry realises his true place in the world, and how much is being kept hidden from him. All the while, Dumbledore's twinkling eyes are constantly watching, and Harry can't let on how much he knows.

With help from unexpected places, Harry starts on a journey to end the war, and reshape the wizarding world. With how much he looks like James Potter, people have forgotten one important thing about him - he is Lily Evans' son, and she was one hell of a witch.

Notes

UPDATE 5/1/23: Hi friends! I am not really here very much these days, and as a general rule I don't reply to comments, but I've had enough of these requests that I'm gonna put it here. IF YOU WOULD LIKE TO TRANSLATE/PODFIC THIS FIC. First off, good luck to you, this thing is a monster lmao. Second off, I'm aware I can't really stop anybody, and I'm sure plenty of people have done so without my consent.

That being said, I am totally chill with translations of any of my works, as long as they remain on AO3 so they can be linked through using the proper crediting system; the fancy little thing that lets me acknowledge related/inspired works and then link them through this fic. If you do that, and let me know about it, I will happily confirm that and let it link through. Love that. If you are translating this on other websites (Wattpad etc), as I said I can't really stop you, but I'm gonna be grumpy about it~ If anyone finds any versions of this work on any site that is not AO3, those definitely did not have my permission.

That out of the way, thank you all for the enormous and mostly positive response to this fic. I'm no longer part of this fandom, but I'm glad I could bring comfort and joy to those who are. Peace out, friends <3

- Translation into Español available: [Lily's Boy \[Traducción\]](#) by JENNIFERSIZA

- Translation into Español available: El Hijo de Lily \(Traducción\) by Madame_Van_Helsing
- Translation into 中文-普通话 國語 available: Lily's Boy【中译】 by kaxbgw
- Translation into Português brasileiro available: Lily's Boy \(portuguese version\) by hearttbrkweathr
- Translation into Русский available: Lily's Boy by dripofnoble

Chapter 1

Harry could hardly believe it, when it all sank in.

He wasn't expelled. He wasn't even getting punished. He'd inflated Aunt Marge, and the Ministry wouldn't even give him a slap on the wrist. But that wasn't the best part.

There were still three weeks until school began, and he would be spending them in Diagon Alley. Alone. Unsupervised — at least, as unsupervised as the thirteen year-old saviour of the wizarding world could get — allowed to do whatever he pleased, as long as he stayed within the confines of the alley. No teachers keeping an eye on him 'for his own safety', no Dumbledore with his annoyingly knowing gaze, no Mrs Weasley herding him around like one of her own. Not even Ron and Hermione. He could go where he liked, and not have to explain his actions to anyone.

He'd never had such freedom before. Harry couldn't wait to make the most of it.

.....

For the first few days, Harry didn't push the boundaries. He spent most of his time sat at a sunny table sat outside Fortescue's, doing his homework with a tall ice cream sundae at his side, charmed not to melt too quickly. It was a nice change from doing it under his blankets in the dead of night — and it let him see if anyone was actually keeping an eye on him. It was a perfect spot to people-watch, to keep track of anyone who might linger too long or look his way too often. He was noticed — of course he was noticed, he was Harry Potter — but no one seemed to be following him. Even when he left the ice cream parlour and went to explore, he couldn't see anyone keeping watch. He stuck to places he would be expected to go, of course. Quality Quidditch Supplies, Flourish and Blotts, Gambol and Japes'. Normal haunts for a thirteen year-old wizard.

Only after he'd finished all his homework, and made absolutely sure that he wasn't being secretly supervised, did Harry start to widen his exploration. In the past, when he'd been to Diagon Alley, whichever adult was with him had just wanted to get school supplies and get out as quickly as possible. Honestly, Harry didn't blame them, especially when he was with the whole Weasley family. But Diagon was so much bigger than he'd thought it was. There were all kinds of side-alleys with small shops and vendor stalls. Sure you could buy potion supplies, and spellbooks, and brooms — you could also buy enchanted jewellery and elaborate sweets and bespelled household objects, and a million other things in between. It made sense, Harry supposed; wizards didn't have a lot of places to shop, and you couldn't just conjure everything you needed. Diagon was like the biggest shopping centre wizards could go to. And it was all open to him, now.

Harry couldn't resist. With a bag of assorted sweets from Sugarplum's in hand, he meticulously scoured every inch of the alley from one end to the other, determined to uncover all its hidden joys. He bought a practice snitch at Quality Quidditch Supplies, and a self-inking quill from Scribbulus Writing Instruments. He spent almost an hour in the back of the Magical Menagerie, talking to the snakes and telling himself he couldn't take them all home with him. He bought a new pair of glasses at a small stall next Madam Primpernelle's — indestructible, self-adjusting prescription, with weather-repellent charms. Harry's prescription hadn't been adjusted since he'd first got his glasses aged seven, and he'd forgotten what it was like to actually see clearly.

After a while, wandering the alley made his heart ache. All these new and wondrous things were items he probably would have grown up with, had he been raised in a wizarding family. No wonder Ron didn't care about the alley; it was all old hat to him. He wondered if Hermione had ever come here without them, and done the same thing he was doing now. He doubted it — she would've talked his ear off about it if she had. But how could she not be curious? There were so many incredible things; things he would buy, if he had anywhere to put them. He imagined the look on Aunt Petunia's face if he were to start filling his room with magical posters and enchanted clocks and a statue of a dragon that really breathed fire.

If he ever went back to Aunt Petunia. Minister Fudge might've said they were alright with taking him back at the end of the school year, but Harry doubted they were happy about it. Then again, he didn't really have any other options.

As he browsed the shelves of Wiseacre's Wizarding Equipment, Harry absently daydreamed about what his bedroom might look like in a wizarding house — his parents' house. Would it look more like Ron's? He snorted to himself; hopefully far less orange than Ron's.

But would he have a favourite quidditch team, with posters on the wall? A shelf full of spellbooks, with little moving figurines on the ledges? A fancy perch for Hedwig, with a self-filling water bowl? Bedsheets that changed colour when they needed washing? (You really could get everything in Diagon Alley).

He pushed the thought away, biting his lip against the unexpected swell of emotion. Desperate for a distraction, he turned his gaze to the display in front of him.

Wand Holsters, for the canny witch or wizard — never worry about losing your wand again!

They were thin leather tubes, with straps to secure them at each end. They came in several different lengths and colours; at first Harry thought it was to adjust for the length of the wand, but upon reading the description realised they were either for the forearm or calf, depending on your preference. Apparently they would accept wands of any length, even if they were longer than the holster itself.

He glanced down at his wand, sticking out of the pocket of his jeans. His mind flashed back to all the times he'd dropped it, or had it fall out of his pocket, or not had a comfortable pocket to stick it in. Perhaps buying one of these holster things wouldn't be a bad idea.

Harry kept reading the description. Each holster had in-built invisibility charms, and an anti-summoning ward once it had bonded with its owner. It claimed to keep the wand safe and accessible at all times — apparently, they were what aurors used on the job. Harry grinned to himself. That sounded pretty cool, if he was honest.

His grin faltered when he checked the price tag, and glanced inside his rapidly diminishing coin purse. He muttered a curse under his breath. “Why did I buy that stupid quill?” he hissed quietly, scowling.

Turning away from the wand holsters with slumped shoulders, Harry froze. He was in Diagon Alley — Gringotts was right around the corner. He had heaps of gold that his parents had left him. He just had to go get it!

He left the shop with a spring in his step, making a beeline for the enormous white building at the end of the street. One of the desks was open when he arrived, and the goblin manning it glanced down his long, crooked nose at Harry. “How may I be of assistance?” he asked in a low, slightly croaky voice.

“I’d, uh, like to withdraw some money from my vault, please,” Harry requested, refusing to let his nerves get the better of him. He wondered if it was like a muggle bank account, where you could just get the money without having to go to the vault itself. He didn’t fancy going on one of those mine carts right now. Every time since, someone else had withdrawn money for him. “Oh, uh, Harry Potter. The Potter vaults,” he added belatedly. The goblin’s eyes flicked up to his forehead, as peoples’ often did when he said his name.

“Vault key?” the goblin asked. Harry’s spirits fell. He didn’t have his key! Mrs Weasley was the last person to have it, he thought, but he was pretty sure she gave it back to Dumbledore when she was done.

“Oh. I, um, don’t have my key on me. Is that… a problem?”

“We can confirm your identity in other ways,” the goblin assured him. “But it requires your consent to a scan of your magic.”

Harry hesitated for a second. A scan sounded fairly harmless. People probably did it all the time; surely they didn’t carry their vault keys with them everywhere? “Okay, that sounds fine. I consent.”

The goblin nodded, then snapped his fingers and waved his hand towards Harry. His eyes narrowed behind his glasses, and he hummed, frowning. He snapped and waved a second time, frown growing deeper. Harry’s stomach churned. “Is there something wrong?”

“May I speak to you privately, Mr Potter?” the goblin asked, leaning back in his chair and pursing his lips. “There is a matter I wish to bring to your attention.”

Immediately, Harry’s brain conjured the worst; there was something wrong with his magic, or he wasn’t actually Harry Potter, or the goblins refused to let him in anymore. He nodded, shoving his hands in his pockets to stop them from shaking as he followed the goblin across the bank and into a corridor, where he was led into a small private room. The goblin gestured to a chair, and Harry sat. “One moment, please.”

The goblin left Harry alone in the room, but only for a couple of minutes. Those minutes felt like a lifetime as he waited, scenarios chasing each other around his mind, each more dire than the last.

When the goblin returned, it was with a second goblin at his side. This one looked older, with wispy white hair and a deeply lined face. “This is Gorrak, Mr Potter. He’s one of our senior staff, and specialises in inheritance claims and family magic.”

Harry wondered if goblins shook hands. When none was offered to him, he merely nodded, twisting his fingers anxiously in the hem of his t-shirt. “It’s a pleasure to meet you, Gorrak. Can I ask... what am I doing here?”

“Do you consent to a scan of your magic?” Gorrak asked, bypassing all pleasantries. Harry blinked.

“I— yes, I consent.” If the goblins were planning to hurt him, they probably wouldn’t ask consent first.

Gorrak raised his hands, and his fingertips glowed with a faint silver light as he ran them over the air a foot in front of Harry. If Harry concentrated, he could feel a sort of... tingle, faint on his skin, making the hair on his arms stand up. Gorrak lowered his arms, scowling.

“Wizards.” He spat the word like a curse, sharing an unreadable look with his colleague. “Farlig, did Mr Potter have anyone with him when he spoke to you?”

“No, sir,” the other goblin, Farlig, replied promptly. “He was alone.”

“What’s the matter?” Harry interrupted, cheeks turning red as both goblins turned to look at him. “Something’s wrong. Am I okay? Is my magic okay?”

Gorrak eyed him speculatively. “Mr Potter, can you recall any time in which you have been the recipient of any sort of long-term enchantment, or ritual magic?”

Harry’s brow furrowed. “Ritual magic?” he repeated, bewildered. “No, not that I know of. Why?” Had someone cursed him?

“I expected as much. The block is so deeply ingrained, you were probably just a baby when it was set.” Gorrak’s muttered words were more to himself than Harry, but Harry caught them anyway, and froze.

“Block?” he repeated. His pulse thudded in his ears. “Are you— am I— I don’t understand.”

Gorrak met his gaze unflinchingly. “Mr Potter, I regret to inform you that there is a rather severe block on your magical core, entirely restricting your access to your family magics.”

The words echoed in Harry’s head.

“Family magics? What does that mean?” He’d never heard of such a thing.

Gorrak took the seat opposite him, a serious expression on his face. “Family magics, Mr Potter, are the magics passed down through wizarding families for generations. They are tied to your individual magical core, but are a separate part of it — they pass certain gifts or talents down family lines, and every wizarding parent will pass on some level of family magics to their children. Even muggleborn parents. In your case, however, the magics are of one of the oldest lines in wizarding Europe. They are an enormous part of your core, and without them you will be refused any inheritance or heirships, as well as any family gifts you may naturally possess.”

Harry blinked, not sure he understood correctly. “So they’re just... gone?” he asked, panic rising in his gut. Gorрак shook his head.

“They are still there, Mr Potter. They are merely inaccessible to you. Can I assume you were unaware of any blocks or limitations placed on your magical core?”

“I had no idea. Who— Voldemort?” He’d said the block had been placed when he was a baby. Could it have come from the attack?

“Unlikely,” Gorрак replied. “The ritual undertaken for this sort of block takes several hours to complete. From what I understand of your... history, the Dark Lord Voldemort would not have had time for such magic.”

Harry felt sick. Someone he trusted — someone his parents had trusted, enough to leave their baby with them for several hours — had placed a block on his magic. “Is it— am I in danger? Will it hurt me?”

“Currently, it is causing you no issue but a slight drain on your magical core. You have an impressively strong core for someone so young, Mr Potter, so it’s likely you haven’t noticed the difference. However, as the heir to the Potter line among others, should you come of age while still under the influence of the block, you will be unable to claim your rightful seats on the Wizengamot, or any of your inherited properties. You would also come to harm when your magical core fully matures, as the block required to restrain your family magic also does not allow your magical core to expand in any way.”

“I have seats on the Wizengamot?” Harry spluttered, eyes wide. Wasn’t that the wizarding government? How could he possibly have access to that?

“Not yet, Mr Potter, but you will once you come of age. The Noble and Most Ancient house of Potter has been part of the Wizengamot since its inception, and it is your birthright. You may also hold other seats — with the political climate in the last few decades, several ancient houses have lost their immediate heir, and the title has had to find other avenues in the family tree. I am unsure just how many families you are inheriting magic from, but with that in mind, this block could be restricting a truly astounding amount of magic within you. The backlash upon your coming of age would likely be severe, and explosive.”

For several moments, Harry sat in silence, letting the goblin’s words sink in. It all felt like some sort of nightmare.

Eventually, Gorрак cleared his throat. “Mr Potter, if you would consent, I would like to check you for any other spells or enchantments on your person. This may not be the only thing done to you.”

“There could be more?” Harry scoffed, running a hand through his hair. “Right, of course, this is me we’re talking about. There’s always more.” He shook his head with a derisive snort. “I consent. If there’s any magic on or in me that isn’t mine, I want to know about it.”

His skin crawled like he could feel unfamiliar hands touching him, gripping his magical core and twisting.

“Please empty your pockets and remove your glasses, and any other enchanted items you may possess,” Gorراك requested. Harry took a few moments to do as asked, then stood somewhat awkwardly with his hands at his sides. He’d never had so much as a medical check-up, let alone a magical one. What was he supposed to do? “Keep still, this will only take a moment.”

Gorراك murmured something in a language Harry didn’t recognise — Gobbledeegook, probably — and a strange prickling feeling washed over Harry from head to toe. He resisted the urge to flinch away. Gorراك said something again in his language, but from Farlig’s reaction in the corner it was probably an expletive of some kind. “Someone has done you a great wrong, Mr Potter,” Gorراك declared. Harry’s heart sank.

“Am I dying?” he asked flatly. It would be just his luck if after all his run-ins with Voldemort, he was due to die from some slow-acting curse or something. Gorراك barked out a laugh.

“No faster than the average wizard,” he assured. “However, the block is not the only magic acting against you. There’s some kind of spell, I’ve never seen it before but it looks more recent, perhaps two or three years old, and it’s familiar. The same magic that belongs to whoever blocked your family magics.”

Slowly, pieces started to come together in Harry’s mind, dread gathering in his belly. “And what does this spell do?”

“I can’t be entirely positive, Mr Potter. If I were to guess, I would say it is something to do with your behaviour. It appears to encourage impulsiveness — or limit rational thinking. Something along those lines. Perhaps with the side-effect of making you more suggestible, easily influenced. Whoever cursed you wanted you to trust without reason, and act without thinking, no doubt to leap head-first into all those dangerous situations I’ve heard rumour of. It’s an incredibly powerful compulsion spell, Mr Potter; I’m amazed you have any sort of self-restraint whatsoever.”

Harry could only think of one person who would have means and opportunity to perform both the magic block and the compulsion spell, and the answer made his heart clench.

Dumbledore.

His parents would have trusted the headmaster with their baby, even alone for several hours. And even if they hadn’t, there was the time after their death, before Aunt Petunia found Harry on her doorstep — he couldn’t have been there all night, he would’ve frozen to death. Dumbledore was easily powerful enough to put the compulsion spell on Harry when he started at Hogwarts, too. He always seemed to be up to something — gently nudging Harry in certain directions, playing everyone around him like puppets and alway seeming to know more than he should. Making Harry impulsive and easily influenced was one thing, but what did Dumbledore stand to gain from limiting his family magic?

He didn’t want to believe it, but it was the only thing that made sense.

"I'm afraid that's not the only thing," Gorрак continued, as if Harry wasn't suffering enough. "Though this is probably less of a surprise. There's heavy residue of dark magic, situated around your scar. Unfortunately, this is not familiar to me, though I can have a team research it if you wish, and with any luck they will figure out how to remove it. No one has survived the killing curse until you, Mr Potter — that magic is foreign to both wizards and goblins. I cannot remove it, and am reluctant to attempt such in case it harms you. As it stands, it does not seem to be doing you any damage."

Relief flooded Harry — that one was less worrying. He had always assumed there was something strange about his scar, since it never truly healed. Curse residue would make sense. If it wasn't hurting now, they might as well leave it alone.

"But what about the block, and the spell? Can they be removed?" he asked tentatively, his gut churning at the prospect of having to live with the limit on his magic forever, like some sort of ticking time bomb. Seventeen felt like ages away, but it wouldn't be far off.

"They can," Gorрак confirmed. Harry sighed in relief, shoulders slumping. "Farlig, please guard the door." The lock clicked, and Farlig stood in front of the door with his shoulders squared, his jaw set. "Mr Potter, if you wouldn't mind standing."

When Harry stood, Gorрак snapped his fingers, and the chair he'd just been sat in turned into a low bed, like the kind in a doctor's office. "Please lie down on your back." Harry did, heart racing. Letting a goblin he'd only just met perform magic on him made his survival instinct snarl, but he refused to spend any longer with a block on his magic. Besides, what was he going to do, write to Dumbledore about it? Not after everything he'd discovered today!

"This may hurt, Mr Potter." That was all the warning Gorрак gave before he began chanting. It again was in an unfamiliar language, and as soon as the chant started up Harry's body began to glow white, his skin growing warm. He gripped the edges of the bed, forcing his eyes to remain open, even when the sensation turned sharp. A cry escaped his lips — it felt almost like something was sucking at him. No, biting. Like a creature had sunk their teeth in and refused to let go, while Gorрак was pulling it out of his body. Above his heart, the glow turned darker, and Harry watched in horror as a ball of black magic began to form above him. The ball grew bigger and bigger, Gorрак's forehead glistening with sweat as he chanted and moved his hands, fighting against the foreign magic in Harry's body.

Harry couldn't have said how long he was on the table for, but eventually Gorрак's chanting grew louder, and he wrenched his hands up high, sending the ball of black magic careening away from Harry and towards a crystal Harry had just noticed on the desk. The crystal turned from white to black in an instant, and the glow around Harry faded. "You may sit up, Mr Potter," Gorрак declared, sounding breathless. Harry did so. The goblin sank into the chair opposite, leaning heavily on one elbow. "Whoever placed those curses certainly did not want to give up without a fight, but it is done. I took the liberty of retaining samples of the magic — should you reach a time where you wish to press charges against an individual, this can be used to compare magical signatures and prove guilt."

Gorрак looked him in the eye, and it was clear the goblin also had a good idea of who placed the spells. Harry grimaced. "Thank you." He didn't know if he'd ever need it, but it was good to know it was there. “I... how can I tell if the spells have been replaced? Or something new put on me?”

“Wizard magic is different to goblin magic. Most wizarding detection spells wouldn’t pick up on something like that,” Gorراك informed him. “However, I believe there are books explaining how to learn to recognise your own magic, and see any signs of alteration. In future, should you ever have concerns, any Gringotts goblin would be happy to perform a scan of your magic. Congratulations, Mr Potter; your family magics are strong and healthy, despite their tampering.”

Harry closed his eyes for a moment, taking a deep breath. He might have been imagining things, but if he concentrated he felt... lighter. Like he’d been wearing weights, and suddenly they were gone, his magic buzzing faintly under his skin. “If I were you,” Gorراك continued, “I would be very careful when doing magic for the next few months, while your body adjusts to having access to its full magic reserve. You may find new spells come easier to you, and old spells a little more... forceful, for a while.”

“Right,” Harry murmured, nodding. He’d have to test that once he got back to Hogwarts. It wouldn’t do to suddenly be exploding things all over the place, especially if Dumbledore was keeping an eye on him.

“While you are here, Mr Potter, might you be interested in taking a Line Test?” Farlig spoke up from his place at the door. “As we explained earlier, some family lines have since died out, and heirs are turning up in all sorts of unexpected places. Most purebloods take the test before they begin schooling — you’ll want to know the breadth of your inheritance long before you come of age.”

He hadn’t realised that inheritance and family lines were such a big deal in the wizarding world, but then he thought about how Malfoy and some of the other Slytherins talked about their families, and even how people spoke about the Weasleys. A family name seemed to hold a lot of information about a person, to purebloods. Perhaps there was more to it than just tradition and prejudice.

“What do I have to do?” he asked warily. Farlig strode across to the desk and rifled through a drawer, coming out with a square of pale purple parchment.

“Just three drops of blood on this, Mr Potter,” he explained. “The results are entirely confidential.”

Well, that didn’t sound so bad. Harry approached the desk, accepting the small knife from Farlig’s hand and pricking his finger, dripping blood onto the parchment. It began to glow. With a snap of his fingers, Farlig healed the small cut, offering Harry a toothy smile.

At the top of the parchment, black ink began to form words.

Harry James Potter. Parents: James Charlus Potter, Lily Juliette Evans-Potter

Harry hadn’t known either of his parents’ middle names, and his heart clenched. After all the shocks of the day, he felt a small measure of relief knowing that at least this part of his life wasn't a lie. He truly was the son of Lily and James Potter.

There was a beat, then more words appeared.

Blood Heir to the Noble and Most Ancient House of Potter

Again, not a surprise. He expected that to be the end of it, but the parchment continued.

Named Heir to the Noble and Most Ancient House of Black

His mind automatically flashed to the man in the newspaper, Sirius Black, with his gaunt face and wild hair. What a funny coincidence; it was a fairly common surname, after all.

Blood Heir to the Ancient House of Peverell

That was a name he'd never even heard before. Who were the Peverells?

Conquering Heir to the Ancient House of Slytherin

Harry choked. Heir of Slytherin? How could that possibly be? What did it mean, conquering heir?

He waited for a moment, to see if the parchment would throw anything else at him. Several long seconds went by without any more ink appearing, and Farlig cleared his throat.

"Congratulations, Mr Potter," he declared. "Four very respectable houses. I'll update our records and have the vault ownership adjusted accordingly."

"It's been a long time since someone claimed the Slytherin vaults, Mr Potter," Gorrauk murmured, looking thoughtful. "How very interesting."

"How is that possible?" Harry croaked, eyes wide.

"When an ancient family line dies out, or the last remaining heir becomes ineligible to hold the position, heirship can be transferred in multiple ways. In this case, when you defeated the Dark Lord Voldemort — believed to be the previous blood heir to the Slytherin line — you ended the line, and the magic deemed you a suitable replacement. You must share blood somewhere with Salazar Slytherin, but within pureblood families that isn't uncommon. The Slytherin family magic is unique, in that it has certain requirements for an heir — less about bloodlines, and more about magical strength and purity. The Dark Lord, when he entered this bank as a youth and took a line test, was an ineligible heir for the Slytherin line. No doubt his core was already tainted with too much dark magic for the family magics to accept him."

"But wasn't Salazar Slytherin a dark wizard?" Confusion was plain in Harry's voice, and Gorrauk chuckled roughly.

"Your wizarding history books aren't quite as accurate as your people believe, Mr Potter," he remarked. "Salazar Slytherin was no true dark wizard. His father, Septimus, was. We believe that Salazar himself changed the conditions of inheritance in the face of his father's twisted magical core. The practice of what most wizards now consider to be dark magic was, back then, fairly neutral casting. Instead, it refers to what you now see as the blackest arts. The Dark Lord must have started some truly awful things at a very young age to have rendered his core ineligible.”

Opening his mouth, Harry almost asked why they didn’t just tell the wizards the truth, if they knew the real history of Salazar Slytherin. Then he thought about the attitude most wizards had towards goblins and other creatures, and his jaw clicked shut. No one would believe them if they tried.

“So what does all this mean for me? Being heir to all these houses?”

“At present, not as much,” Gorрак explained. “You will be unable to take on your full responsibilities until you are of age. However, heirs to ancient bloodlines play an important role in wizarding culture — you are the future of your people, Mr Potter. It is your job to preserve and uphold your family magics, as well as prepare yourself to enter the Wizengamot when the appropriate time arrives. I suggest you contact other family heirs and discuss the role with them; I’m afraid goblins know little in the ways of wizard culture.” He leaned back in his chair. “The confirmation through the Line Test will also allow you access to any vaults under the names of these families, though I’m afraid due to your age you cannot access many of them without a guardian. I can have a portfolio assembled of your vaults and properties and sent to you within the week.”

“If I may, Mr Potter,” Farlig cut in. “It may also benefit you to research independently what it means to be the heir to houses as old as yours. There are no doubt many books on the subject. Of course, you can always choose to reject your Wizengamot seats and any adjacent responsibilities, but they would continue to be held by your proxy. I believe that is currently Headmaster Dumbledore.”

At the thought of Dumbledore being responsible for his family name, something inside Harry hardened. “No,” he said immediately. “I’ll take my place. I’ll learn.” He didn’t entirely know what all this entailed yet, but he knew one thing for sure — he didn’t want Dumbledore making decisions on his behalf. Not now, and not when he was seventeen.

“Excellent choice, Mr Potter,” Farlig murmured approvingly. “Should the goblins of Gringotts be able to assist, please do contact us.”

“You’ve already done more than I ever expected,” Harry replied, head still spinning with everything he’d learned. “I— how much do I owe you, for all this?” It occurred to him belatedly that the gold-driven species were unlikely to do such a kindness for free. Farlig and Gorрак shared a smirk.

“We will take the necessary expenses from your vault and owl you the bill, Mr Potter,” Gorрак informed him. “I shall send it alongside your portfolio. I will also send recommendations for an account manager, and perhaps some investments if that is your wish. The money in those vaults has languished since the fall of the Dark Lord Voldemort, if not longer — seeing it back in circulation would make goblin-kind very happy indeed.”

If there was one thing Harry had learned from being forced to live with Vernon Dursley, it was that investing money in the right things was very important. “I would appreciate that, Gorрак. Thank you.”

"It is our pleasure, Mr Potter. Now," Farlig said, clasping his hands in front of him. "I believe you originally came here to withdraw money from your vault?"

Chapter 2

Chapter Notes

Thank you all for your kind words and enthusiasm! I'm so glad that so many of you who were reading the fic the first time around have found your way back :) And welcome to the newbies, too! I'm so excited to finally share this whole thing with you all.

Harry left Gringotts with his purse weighed down with gold, and his head weighed down with thoughts. He glanced at his watch, and his eyebrows rose — he'd only been in there for a little over an hour. It felt like a lifetime, it had changed so much.

Buying the wand holster was now the last thing on his mind. Instead, Harry made straight for Flourish and Blotts. He'd already spent half a day wandering the shelves, learning the many varieties of books available inside — no longer just going straight to the shelf for Hogwarts students and never venturing further. Familiar with the shop's layout, Harry found his way to the shelves full of books on wizarding history and culture.

A smirk tugged at his lips as he thought about what Hermione might say if she saw him buying books of his own free will. That smirk faded, however, when he thought of Ron's expression at the sight of the books themselves — titles like 'The History of the Wizengamot' and 'Inheritance Magic Explained'.

His eyes scanned the shelves, looking at the other people in there purchasing books. Perhaps it wasn't the best idea for Harry Potter to be seen buying books about pureblood culture.

Harry was about to start putting the books away, when his gaze caught on the bright paper of the bag from Gambol and Japes — of course! He'd almost forgotten about his purchases there, he'd had so much on his mind since then. He rifled through the bag until he found what he was looking for; small, egg-like capsules that promised a cunning disguise for up to thirty minutes. Supposed to be used to avoid being caught setting a prank, but Harry had bought some for the days when he wanted to go outside without being Harry Potter, with all that entailed.

He hid behind a deserted shelf and split one of the capsules over his head, feeling the magic run down him as if he had indeed just cracked an egg in his hair. Glancing at himself in the window, he grinned; staring back was a pale boy with straw-blond hair and dark brown eyes, his square face nothing like Harry's own. A shift of his fringe made him grimace when he saw his scar was still there, but luckily the disguise's hair was long enough to cover it. It would be enough.

Now on a time limit, Harry raced through the bookshop, tossing titles into his basket whenever they appealed to him. He didn't want to look too suspicious by just getting a stack of books about purebloods, so he threw in a few more that looked interesting — a book of defensive charms and wards, one titled ‘A Hundred Spells Every Wizard Should Know’, a small book called ‘A Muggleborn’s Guide to the Wizarding World’, and one on goblin culture. It looked like he’d found some valuable allies, after all, and he wanted to learn more about them. Satisfied, he took his heavy basket up to the register, handing over the gold with a smile and adding the large bag of books to his other purchases.

There was a spring in his step as he left the bookshop, and he hid in a small side-alley until the disguise charm wore off. For the first time, he was desperate to get back to his room and actually read some books.

First, however, he made a quick detour to Wiseacre’s, emerging a few minutes later with a brand new black leather wand holster strapped to his wrist. He hadn’t entirely forgotten what had started the whole thing, after all.

.....

Harry spent all of that day and most of the next holed up in his room in the Leaky Cauldron, reading his new purchases. He felt like he was discovering the wizarding world all over again. He wished the Muggleborn’s Guide had been part of his first year book list; it would have answered so many questions, and saved him a lot of trouble.

It amazed him that no one taught muggleborns all this stuff when they were introduced to the wizarding world — or perhaps they did, and everyone just forgot he was muggle-raised. But then surely Hermione would have said something? He made a mental note to buy a copy for her upcoming birthday, and see what she thought of it. From some of the things she’d said and done over the years, he didn’t think she’d had any real introduction to wizarding culture either.

All the things that Ron and the others took for granted about being raised in the wizarding world. The history, the background knowledge, things like household spells and Ministry forms and inheritance magic — all of it was brand new to Harry, and he couldn’t get enough.

That aside, the books on pureblood culture were an eye-opener of an entirely different kind. After all he’d heard about the purebloods being backwards and traditional and fearful of anything muggle, reading about the history he couldn’t really blame them. Of course, he’d studied witch burnings in History of Magic — even had some summer homework on it that Florean Fortescue had been surprisingly helpful with — but those textbooks never went into the detail of how difficult it was to be magical in a time when the muggles were suspicious of everything. The origin of the Statute of Secrecy, and how the wizarding world changed after it, made Harry realise just how much history was in his family. Especially when he saw both the names Potter and Black popping up as notable figures in several of them.

He still hadn’t figured out how he was named heir to the Black family, but he wasn’t really bothered by that just now. He was too busy trying to wrap his head around what it meant to be an heir to not one but four prominent families in the wizarding community.

One of the few times Harry left his room, he bought himself a blank notebook with a password charm, so that he could take notes on everything and keep it secure. He now had pages and pages of writing on all sorts of subjects, not just inheritance.

From what he could gather, being an heir now was a little like being an heir back in the regency days of England, when inheritance actually meant something. All the families properties and money would pass down to the heir, and they would become the head of the family when the previous head stepped down. That left them in charge of the family magics and wards, any Wizengamot seats they held, and the family name itself. This was mostly used for things like marriage contracts and such — everything had to go through the head of the family before it could become legal. That meant that when Harry turned seventeen, he would become the head of four families — he'd checked Wizengamot records, and all four seats were currently held in proxy. All four by none other than Albus Dumbledore.

It made Harry's blood boil when he thought about it — the more he'd connected the dots, the more he was sure that Dumbledore was the only person who could have put the block and curse on him. But for what end? He was training Harry up for something — that much had been clear since he'd met the man — but why did it involve cutting him off from his family magics, and causing his core to implode when he turned seventeen? What plans did he have for Harry that didn't let him become a happy, healthy adult wizard?

Either way, Harry resolved to watch his step around the headmaster in future. And if Dumbledore was false, then who else might have ulterior motives... no. He couldn't go down that road, or he'd drive himself crazy wondering who he could trust.

Remembering what Farlig had said about learning to sense his magic, Harry eventually managed to find a book about magical cores when he went back to Flourish and Blotts, and he had notes on that now, too. It would take time, but apparently wizards could learn to sense their own magic, which was how wandless magic became possible. Harry liked the idea of being able to perform spells even if he didn't have his wand on him, though hopefully now he'd bought that holster that wouldn't be a problem.

Eventually, however, Harry's brain began to hurt from the influx of new knowledge. Though he certainly found it easier to sit and read than he ever had done since starting Hogwarts — it was like being back in muggle primary school, when he'd spent most of his breaktime sat in the library reading and hiding from Dudley and his friends, taking refuge in the written word and spending hours buried in books. He wondered if the recent lack of attention span was due to the curse that made him more impulsive. He hoped so; he was used to having to pretend to get lower grades so as not to make Dudley angry, but at Hogwarts he actually struggled to keep up average grades on his homework. He felt a pang in his chest when he realised he'd have to go back to pretending, or Dumbledore would definitely know something was up.

Leaving his books securely hidden in the bottom of his trunk, Harry made his way back out to Diagon Alley, blinking at the bright sunshine. Maybe he had spent too much time indoors.

Hands in his pockets, he wandered aimlessly down the alley, intending on picking up where he left off the day he went to Gringotts. Wiseacre's was hardly the end of the alley, and there was so much more he hadn't explored.

Harry bought a glass bottle of cold pumpkin juice and sipped from it as he walked, eyes roaming the shop fronts with mild interest. Being thirteen, there were a lot of places in Diagon that he had zero interest in — offices and specialty stores and places selling furniture — but every now and then he came across something interesting. The toy shop caught his attention, though he only looked through the window; he was too old for toys, even if part of him did wonder what it would have been like to grow up with the magical ones. There was a tattoo parlour as well, which he was definitely too young for, but looking at the artwork was fun. Maybe when he was older, he'd get a tattoo. The wizarding ones moved.

The further he went, the more the shops seemed to cater for a different clientele; they were more off the beaten path, not the kind of things families shopping for Hogwarts supplies would need. He stopped outside of a blue-painted shop with the words 'Silverling's Wizarding Fashion' above the door. The window held mannequins wearing both regular robes and the more muggle-style clothing that younger wizards and witches wore on a day-to-day basis.

Harry looked down at himself. His jeans were only held up by his belt, rolled up several times at the ankle so he didn't trip over them, and his t-shirt hung halfway down his thighs. All his clothes were the same; at one point in time, they had all belonged to Dudley. Harry at thirteen could fit into clothing that Dudley hadn't worn since he was seven.

He could change that, now.

When he stepped inside the shop, his palms were sweaty and his nerves racing even more than they had been in the back room of Gringotts. He pushed the anxiety away, striding resolutely towards the menswear side of the shop. He had no reason to wear Dudley's cast-offs now. He was a respectable young wizard with plenty of money, and he could buy himself clothes that fit.

It looked like the kind of place that the cool pureblood and half-blood kids at Hogwarts would shop. Perhaps Parvati and Lavender had been in there. The clothes were definitely wizarding wear, but it wasn't anything like his school uniform. Many of them had in-built charms according to the labels; dirt repelling, or self-mending, or size-adjusting. It was all a bit overwhelming for Harry, who had barely been shopping in the muggle world, let alone the wizarding one.

At that, he had a thought that almost made him wonder if the spell making him impulsive hadn't been removed after all. A slow grin spread across his face; it was about time, really.

He only bought a couple of things at Silverling's — a pair of jeans that promised to be self-mending, a pair of comfortable black dragon-hide boots, and a jacket with in-built warming and cooling charms depending on the weather. When he left the shop, he turned back in the direction of the Leaky Cauldron, already pulling together a plan in his head.

When he made it to Gringotts, he stepped inside, his stride far more confident than it has been the last time. To his delight, he saw Farlig behind the same desk as before, and approached. "Good morning, Farlig! I hope your gold is flowing rapidly," he greeted, remembering what he'd read in his book about goblins. Farlig blinked for a moment, surprised, then gave a smile that showed all his teeth.

"Good morning, Mr Potter. My gold flows well, and I guard yours faithfully," he returned the greeting. "How can I help?"

“Can I make a withdrawal? But, in muggle money, this time?” he requested. Surely Gringotts had to do some sort of currency exchange?

Farlig nodded. “Of course, Mr Potter. If you would consent to a scan?” Harry nodded, letting Farlig check his identity through his magic. “Excellent. And how much will you be withdrawing today?”

“Um. Let’s say... five hundred pounds.” He’d never even seen that much muggle money in his life, except for when Dudley opened his birthday and Christmas cards. But he knew the rough exchange rate, and he hoped it would be enough for what he had in mind. Besides, after the portfolio the goblins had sent him detailing all his assets, he wasn’t exactly worried about his future spending rate.

Farlig didn’t bat an eyelash at the amount. “As you wish, Mr Potter. One moment please.” He typed something into his old-fashioned typewriter, then pulled a lever. Crisp muggle bank notes began stacking on the desk in front of him. “Here you are, Mr Potter. Five hundred pound sterling.” He passed the substantial stack to Harry, who shoved it securely in his pocket. “If I may make a suggestion, Mr Potter?”

“Absolutely,” Harry replied. The goblin hadn’t steered him wrong yet.

“Twilfitt and Tatting makes a bottomless bag, which can carry far beyond its usual capacity, yet never weighs more than its empty state. I believe it’s popular among young people these days.” Farlig gave a shark-like grin, his words casual but his gaze knowing. Harry grinned back.

“Thank you for the recommendation, Farlig. May your vaults ever be full.”

“And yours, Mr Potter,” Farlig replied, bowing his head in acknowledgement.

Harry took a detour to Twilfitt and Tatting, purchasing a bottomless bag in the style of a black leather messenger bag, fairly unremarkable but stylish in its simplicity. Twilfitt assured him it would hold up to thirty times its natural capacity in size, and up to a hundred kilos in weight. Harry couldn’t ever imagine needing to carry a hundred kilos worth of anything, but it was good to know for the future.

His plan in place, Harry returned to the Leaky Cauldron, waving a cheerful hello to Tom behind the bar on his way up to his room. There he deposited his purchases and changed into his new clothes.

“Oh, that’s much better, dear,” the mirror in his room complimented, making him beam despite himself. The only clothes he’d ever had that fit him before were his school robes, and the few items of Dudley’s clothing that Hermione had once experimented with Shrinking charms on. He’d never had brand new jeans before in his life. He actually looked his age for once, rather than a ten year-old playing dress-up.

His smile couldn’t be dislodged as he grabbed his new bag, the wad of muggle cash, and his invisibility cloak. Briefly, he remembered the warnings about not venturing into the muggle world, and a pang of guilt surfaced. But he pushed it away.

Unlike most wizards, he was perfectly comfortable navigating the muggle world. And he was long, long overdue some time there.

.-.-.

It was almost insultingly easy to sneak out into muggle London using his invisibility cloak, ducking into a public toilet to take the cloak off and stuff it in his new bag. From there he walked to the nearest tube station, his heart thudding with adrenaline at his blatant breaking of rules, and bought a travel card for the day. He glanced at the tube map, checking his journey, and stepped confidently through the barriers to join the flow of people going about their day. No one looked twice at him. No one did a double-take at his forehead, or whispered about him from several feet away, or did any of the other things he'd gotten used to in the wizarding world. It was refreshing, to say the least.

When Harry was next above ground, it was to step right into the hustle and bustle of Oxford Street. It was all a little overwhelming, and he took a deep breath to calm himself, remembering his plan. This was likely the only chance he'd get to do this — he had to make it count.

Harry looked up at all the shops, bearing names he recognised from the Dursleys' clothing, and he smiled. He could do this.

.-.-.

Four hours later found Harry sat outside a cafe in Covent Garden, drinking a chocolate milkshake, not a trace of his earlier anxiety in his body.

It turned out, he liked shopping. Once he got the hang of it, of course.

Figuring out what sort of clothes he wanted to wear — given entirely free rein, no restrictions, no outside influence — had taken him a little time, but once he started to find things that made him happy, he was off. In London, no one questioned a thirteen year-old boy by himself with seemingly endless amounts of cash. No one questioned anything in London.

He was down to his last thirty pounds, which surprised him; he hadn't expected to get quite so carried away. But he couldn't help himself once he started. Years of living in hand-me-downs had him yearning for a full wardrobe of his own choosing, his own style. He knew he'd grow out of it all sooner rather than later — if he ever actually got around to having that growth spurt — but that's what spells were for. Besides, there was plenty more money in his vault.

If he didn't get back to the Leaky Cauldron soon, Tom would start wondering where he was, so Harry finished off his milkshake, shouldered his bag and set off back to the tube station. He made a mental note to give Farlig some kind of present or reward for the tip about the bag; he dreaded to think what it would be like trying to sneak back into the Leaky carrying his purchases the muggle way.

Thanks to his invisibility cloak, Harry easily made it back up to his room with none the wiser, and there he emptied all his purchases onto the bed, staring round-eyed at his new clothes.

His gaze shifted to his school trunk, which was already messy and overflowing from over a week of living out of it. Sighing to himself, Harry ran a hand through his hair. He'd better tidy up, then.

As tempting as it was to have a ceremonial burning of all things Dursley in the fireplace of his room, Harry knew he'd have to keep up appearances if he didn't want anyone — namely Dumbledore — getting suspicious. Still, he was unable to help himself from burning the most offensive items of clothing. Some of Dudley's old things sort-of fit, and they weren't that bad, so Harry kept them. Hopefully if he gradually mixed in his new clothes, no one would notice the difference. He hadn't bought anything enormously flashy, anyway.

With all his new clothes folded up and piled with the older ones he was keeping, Harry looked at the stack on the bed. For the first time in his life, he might actually struggle to fit all his possessions in his school trunk. The thought made him smile.

Perhaps Twilfitt and Tatting did bottomless trunks, too.

.

It turned out, Farlig didn't need a present — all he wanted was for Harry to get his family money moving once again.

While the Potter and Black accounts had ongoing investments made by previous heads of the family, the Peverell and Slytherin vaults had been stagnant for decades. Between the four houses, Harry's Gringotts portfolio was several inches thick; and Farlig was determined to make it thicker, once Harry made him account manager.

If he'd known what would follow, he might have reconsidered that. With the lure of getting to learn what artefacts and interesting objects lay within his possession, Farlig had beckoned him into his office and immediately sat the young wizard down in front of an enormous stack of parchment.

"I'm going to regret this, aren't I?" Harry declared warily. Farlig's returning grin showed all of his teeth.

"The top parchment lists all the current investments and regular transactions within your holdings," Farlig explained. "While prolific, it would do you well to invest more of your money in a wider range of businesses. I've included a list of the current businesses our investigations show will make good investments; including a few in the muggle world, if you aren't opposed."

Harry glanced down at the list, grimacing at some of the dark-sounding investments under the Black family name. Yes, it was going to be gruelling, but it would be worth it.

As the Gryffindor got to work, scrawling numbers and rifling through Farlig's list of suggested investments, the goblin watched with something akin to pride.

Young Harry Potter might be off to a late start, but if he carried on with this determination, he'd take the pureblood wizarding circles by storm and give them a much-needed shake-up.

And if he could make as much money as his accounts projected, Farlig's wife would be very happy indeed with his new position. After all, he now worked on commission.

.-.-.

About done with adventures for the summer, Harry decided to spend the rest of his time in Diagon Alley actually behaving — somewhat. He made no more jaunts into muggle London, but he did make a few more reckless purchases, taking advantage of having no one around to question his spending habits. A new trunk with more space than the old one, even more books, and a small Wizarding Wireless so he could listen to quidditch matches sometimes.

If he was being really foolish, he told himself, he would have bought a Firebolt. But he didn't, so no one could begrudge him a little shopping spree. No one had to know how much he'd really bought.

The start of the school term was drawing ever closer, and Harry was keen to make the most of his remaining freedom, wandering around Diagon in his new clothes, getting used to actually wearing things he liked. As the week went on, he spotted more people he knew from school, all there to buy their things for the upcoming school year. He stopped and spoke to some of them, but most he just observed with a small smile, keeping his head down. Until one.

Harry was wandering past Twilfitt and Tatting when he — quite literally — bumped into someone. “Watch where you’re going, you filthy— Potter!”

He looked up into the steely grey eyes of Draco Malfoy. Harry winced. “Sorry, I wasn’t looking.” He’d been too busy thinking about a passage in one of the books he’d been reading, about the history of the Wizengamot and why the fifty houses had originally been chosen. “Malfoy,” he greeted, bowing his head briefly, keeping his palms open at his sides like the etiquette book had said, to show that he wasn’t holding a wand. That seemed to throw the blond boy for a loop, and he blinked, before his eyes narrowed.

“Looks like you’re finally learning how to dress yourself, Potter,” he retorted sharply, though he too showed empty palms. “Where’s your usual entourage? They finally got sick of you?”

“They’re on holiday,” Harry told him. “I’ve been at the Leaky Cauldron for a while.”

“Alone?” Malfoy’s pale eyebrows shot up. “I find it hard to believe Dumbledore’s letting you wander around without a babysitter, all things considered.”

“What do you mean, all things considered?” Harry asked, bracing himself for some kind of insult or remark about how he was too stupid to survive by himself.

In reading his new books, Harry had discovered that he’d actually been enormously insulting in refusing Malfoy’s hand before the sorting back when they’d started Hogwarts, and it was probably that that got Malfoy’s back up around Harry all the time. That and Ron constantly antagonising him. He’d decided to try and be civil instead, and see where that got him; if he could take Malfoy off the list of things he had to worry about, it would make all the other things — like Voldemort, potential danger, and exams — a lot easier to bear.

"You mean no one told you? Merlin, it's like they want you to die," Malfoy muttered disparagingly. "Sirius Black? Ring any bells?"

"Wait— The escaped criminal? What's he got to do with anything?" Malfoy sighed impatiently.

"Do those glasses even work, Potter? The man's face is up on wanted posters all over Diagon! He broke out of Azkaban."

"Yeah, I know that," Harry replied slowly, wondering why he should be any more scared than anyone else.

"He was one of the Dark Lord's most loyal supporters. And, rumour has it," Malfoy gave a vicious smirk, "he's after you, Potter."

Harry's heart stuttered. "What?"

"He's coming for you. Talking in his sleep, the same words — 'he's at Hogwarts'. He wants revenge for his Lord, so you'd better watch out, Potty."

Malfoy sounded gleeful, but he actually looked a little disturbed that Harry had been left alone under the circumstances. Harry thought about all the times he'd been alone and unguarded — his trip to muggle London, his forays into the emptier parts of Diagon Alley. No wonder Fudge had been waiting for him when he'd arrived. He probably thought Black had got him.

But in that case, why hadn't he been given a guard?

Shaking his head and figuring it was probably all part of some scheme of Dumbledore's, Harry turned back to Malfoy. "Well, he's not likely to come into the middle of Diagon Alley, is he? I'm perfectly safe."

"Are you?" Malfoy retorted with a smirk. "I suppose at least you can defend yourself here. If you were capable of that, anyway," he added disparagingly. Harry stared blankly at him again. "Sweet Salazar, they really don't tell you anything!" He pulled his wand, and Harry automatically took a step back, but all the blond did was send out a trail of green sparks that formed a hissing snake before fading out. "Underage magic can't be traced in Diagon Alley," he informed Harry smugly. "There's too many people around for them to tell who cast what. As long as no one sees you, you can cast what you like."

"Well I wish I'd known that before I got here," Harry muttered, thinking of all the spells in A Hundred Spells Every Wizard Should Know that he'd been desperate to try out for days. Two whole weeks, wasted! "Why are you telling me all this, Malfoy? I bet you'd love to see Sirius Black get me."

"There's something different about you, Potter," Malfoy remarked, eyeing him over with his arms folded over his chest. "I feel like it's going to make the year... interesting. It'd be a shame if you died before I could see how Weasley's going to react to your new look. Silverling's isn't cheap." Harry was wearing his new jacket, but he hadn't expected Malfoy to notice that, much less where he'd bought it from. Still, it made him wince; if Ron noticed, would he start thinking Harry was trying to rub his money in his face? He was always so sensitive about that sort of thing.

"Draco!" The call could only come from his mother, Narcissa Malfoy, and Malfoy jerked his head to see her at the end of the street. "Draco, dear, we have an appointment."

"See you at school, Potter," Malfoy spat.

"Malfoy!" Harry called, and the blond turned around with a raised eyebrow. "Thanks. For the information. I'll see you at school." He smiled and Malfoy seemed baffled by it as he went to catch up to his mother. Harry turned away, feet leading him back towards the Leaky Cauldron.

He had some spells to practice. He wouldn't worry about Sirius Black, for now — like he'd said, the man was hardly going to pop up in the middle of Diagon Alley to grab Harry. If no one else seemed to be worried enough to have someone watch Harry, then he wasn't going to worry about it.

He was, however, going to worry about what Malfoy meant by the year being interesting. He was weirdly happy about having had an entire conversation with the other boy without either of them threatening to hex the other, but the blond's words about Ron settled heavy in his chest. The last thing he wanted was to make his friend feel uncomfortable, but he wouldn't do that at the expense of his own happiness.

Harry shook his head, trudging back up to his room and trying to keep his mind on the spells, and which to practice first. He'd deal with Ron when he got there. As for Malfoy — maybe he'd misjudged him.

Time would tell, he supposed.

Chapter 3

According to the books, the easiest way to become familiar with your magical core was meditation.

No wonder the spells on him had made him impulsive, restless. He never would have been able to do it, even if he'd had the urge.

With the spells gone, however, Harry found it easy to sink into his own mind, his breathing steady and his eyes closed. It was a little like the days back in his cupboard; falling into his imagination to pretend he was literally anywhere other than crammed under the Dursleys' staircase. Pretend he wasn't in pain, wasn't starving, wasn't cold.

Except the difference here was that he wasn't creating anything — his mind was empty and still. At least, he tried to be. It was hard, shoving away every little thought that crossed his mind. But after several days of dedicated practice before bed, he was starting to get the hang of it.

He relaxed his shoulders against the headboard, trying to sink deeper into his body. He could almost feel it, a warmth running through him, a spark. The book said he had to find that spark and follow it back to his core.

The book also said it was incredibly difficult, and took time.

Somewhere, Harry thought he could see a faint glow of light in the corner of his vision; a strange concept with his eyes closed. He tried to focus on it, draw it closer — and then, outside the room, there was a loud bang and a grumbled curse.

Harry's concentration was lost.

He scowled to himself, opening his eyes. When he glanced at his watch, he realised it was already nearly midnight — too late to try again. He'd just have to accept that progress for now, and keep trying tomorrow.

It wasn't going to happen overnight, he reminded himself. These things took practice.

But he couldn't help but feel like there was an hourglass somewhere, grains of sand running out far too quickly, counting down to the day when he would no longer have the freedom for practice and time.

Dumbledore — if it truly was Dumbledore, though he couldn't think of any other options — would eventually find out that Harry not only knew about the spells, but had broken them. He highly doubted he'd be able to play dumb until he was seventeen. Sometimes he doubted he'd be able to play dumb for more than a week after getting back to Hogwarts. But if there was one thing he knew, it was that he couldn't reveal his hand too early. He needed more information.

He needed to make sure no one could ever stifle his magic in the same way ever again.

Shuffling down to rest his head on the pillow, Harry closed his eyes, determination still tight in his jaw. It was too early for a plan yet — he still didn't know for sure who he was planning against — but he had time to prepare. He was only thirteen. No one would be expecting much of him yet.

That would be their mistake.

.-. .

At long last, Harry's peace was broken by the arrival of the Weasleys and Hermione on the morning of August 31st. He found them outside of Fortescue's, ice creams in front of them while Harry wandered over from having just been in Flourish and Blotts again. Ron had even more freckles than usual, and Hermione's brown skin seemed to have darkened several shades.

They beamed at him, Hermione grabbing him in a tight hug as soon as he was close enough. "We wondered where you were, mate!" Ron exclaimed, patting him on the back as Harry sat down. "We went to the Leaky Cauldron, but Tom said you'd already left."

"I was just wandering," Harry said with a shrug. "Got all my school things last week, so I haven't had much else to do lately." He wasn't ready to tell his best friends about what he'd been up to in the last three weeks. Not until he knew who he could trust. "How was Egypt? And France?"

"Never mind that," Hermione waved off. "Did you really blow up your aunt, Harry?"

"I didn't exactly do it on purpose," Harry replied, rolling his eyes. "She's fine now. The ministry got it all sorted out." Of course Fudge wasn't going to expel him when some sort of madman was after his skin.

"It's not funny, Ron!" Hermione insisted, while Ron roared with laughter. "Harry could've been expelled!"

"Yeah, but he wasn't," Ron retorted, still grinning.

"What's with all the books, Hermione?" Harry asked, quickly changing the subject. She had a huge stack of books by her side; far more than should be on her school list.

"Oh, well I'm taking more new subjects than you, aren't I?" she replied, pointing out which subject each book was for. Harry's jaw dropped.

"How is it even possible to take that many?" The form McGonagall had them fill out asked for two additional subjects, three at maximum. Hermione was taking five.

"I've got it all sorted out with Professor McGonagall, don't worry," Hermione said dismissively. "Now, Ron and I were just talking — I've still got some money left over from my parents, for an early birthday present, and I was thinking about getting an owl."

"There's a creature shop over there," Harry replied, pointing to the Magical Menagerie. He'd spent quite a bit of time in there, talking to the snakes.

"Perfect. I want to get something for Scabbers, too. He's been off since Egypt," Ron added, patting the lump in his front pocket. They all got to their feet, Harry helping Hermione with some of her many books.

"Are those new boots, Harry?" Hermione asked, making him glance down and realise he was wearing the dragonhide boots from Silverling's. He grimaced, hoping Ron didn't notice.

"Yeah. I got a bit bored around here, did some shopping. Dudley's shoes are never gonna fit me."

"They're very nice," she complimented. Luckily, Ron was already on his way to the menagerie.

"Are you two coming or not?" he called impatiently. Harry and Hermione hurried to follow, Hermione's books banging into their knees.

Perhaps Harry would buy her a bag from Twilfitt and Tatting for Christmas.

.-.-.-.

They returned to the Leaky Cauldron with Ron's rat tonic and Hermione's new cat — or maybe small tiger, Harry wasn't sure — and both Ron and Hermione in foul moods. Harry was already thinking longingly of his solitary days gone past. Of course, the rest of the Weasley family were there when they arrived, and Harry was sucked into the chaos like he'd never left. It was good to see them again, but it was all a bit much after so long by himself.

Harry was glad to head back to his room after dinner, sleepy from both the food and the social interaction. He could hear the muffled sounds of Ron and Percy finishing their packing next door, and just as he went to unbuckle his boots, his door swung open. Fred and George slipped in, quickly shutting it behind them. "Hiya, Harry, old chap. Don't mind if we hang out in here for a minute, do you?" Fred asked, sitting on the bed beside him while George took the other side.

"What've you done?" Harry asked flatly. Both twins put a hand to their heart as if struck.

"Us? Do something? Never," they said in unison.

"You're not going anywhere til I've found my badge!" Percy's indignant voice drifted through from next door. The twins shared a look, and Harry raised an eyebrow.

"...We might've stolen Percy's Head Boy badge," George admitted.

"But we've been improving it," Fred added, rummaging in his pocket. "Look!" He showed Harry the red and gold badge, which now read 'Bighead Boy'. Harry snorted.

"He's gonna kill you," he remarked, but didn't toss the twins out.

Gathering up all the miscellaneous things that had sprawled all over his room in his three week stay, Harry forgot about the book he'd been reading before bed until Fred picked it up off the bedside table. "'Wizarding Traditions and Pureblood Rites', hmm?' he read the cover, brows furrowed as he flicked it open. Harry's heart stopped. 'Not your usual bedtime reading.'

"I, uh," Harry started, frantically fumbling for some kind of excuse. George smirked, plucking the book from his twin's grasp.

"Is little Harrikins learning about his place in the world? Noble and Most Ancient Heir of Potter," he added teasingly, making Harry flinch.

"How do you know about that?"

"Not like there are any other Potters about, is there?" George replied. "We just didn't think you knew."

"The, uh—the goblins told me. When I went to Gringotts," Harry said eventually, praying the twins didn't dig any deeper than that. Surely that was a normal thing, right? The goblins informing someone about their inheritance.

Neither redhead seemed perturbed by it, nodding as if it made total sense. "They're probably keen to have the Potter vaults open again," Fred mused. "Don't worry, Harry," he added, clearly sensing the fear rolling off the younger boy. "We won't tell Ron. Our little brother's a mite sensitive about these things."

"We can write to Bill and Charlie, if you like," George suggested. "They're the ones doing all the lordship stuff in our family. Although Weasley and Prewett might be Sacred 28, but we've let a lot of the traditions die, so I don't know how helpful they'd be."

"Sacred 28?" Harry had seen references to that in his books, but never had it actually explained to him.

"The 28 wizarding families who were true purebloods back in the 30s," Fred explained with a roll of his eyes that showed exactly what he thought of that. "As decided by some ponce who wrote a book about it. There's others, of course—the Potters are as pure as it gets, but they're not on the list because the author had it out for them. Said they don't count because they're not technically English pureblood. As if they're any less English than the Shafiqs or the Shacklebolts. But it's basically a bunch of old-blood wizarding families. You can probably find a book about it if you like. A better book than the original; there's bound to be one that tells you all of the old-blood families. All the Wizengamot seats. You can owl-order it to school."

Harry, who had been trying to find a book exactly like that, looked up hopefully. "I've never owl-ordered anything before."

"Oh, it's easy," George assured. "You just get the reference number off the catalogue, owl off with the money and they'll send it back to you. Angelina's got a Flourish and Blotts catalogue, I'm sure she'd let you borrow it at school."

"And if you ever want to order something without putting your name on it," Fred said.

"In case it's not something little Harry Potter should be looking at," George supplied knowingly.

"We'll be happy to put our names down for you," Fred finished, grinning. He glanced at his twin. "People have given up questioning what we buy."

Before Harry could answer, the door swung open again. Quick as a flash, George had the book shoved behind his back. "There you are, boys," Mrs Weasley greeted, sounding harassed. "Have you seen Percy's badge?"

"Not since he was flashing it around earlier, Mum," Fred said earnestly. Mrs Weasley eyed her sons with suspicion.

"I haven't seen it, Mrs Weasley," Harry piped up. "But I can help you look, if you like?" He went for wide-eyed innocence, and Mrs Weasley softened her smile.

"Oh, that's alright, Harry dear. You finish packing and go to bed, you've got a long day tomorrow! Fred, George, you as well. The Ministry is sending cars, so we can't be late!"

"Be out in a minute, Mum," George promised, and the Weasley matriarch left them be. George smirked. "Nice one, Harry."

"Seriously though, mate, if you ever need anything, just ask," Fred insisted, squeezing Harry's shoulder. "We're good at keeping quiet. When we need to," he added, no doubt thinking of the many explosions they regularly made.

"Thanks, guys. You too. Always happy to be an alibi." Harry winked, making the twins grin widely as they stood.

"Knew we could count on you, little brother!"

The twins bid their goodnights and left Harry by himself, a warmth brewing in his chest. It was nice to know he had at least two people on his side.

.-.-.-.

Harry was surprised the next morning when Mr Weasley pulled him aside in all the chaos at the platform to tell him about Sirius Black. He pretended it was new information, appropriately wide-eyed and fearful at the confirmation that oh, by the way, the mass-murderer that broke out of the most secure prison in the wizarding world? Wants you dead. He promised not to do anything rash — only half-meaning it — and then they were on their way. Harry wondered what he would have done if he hadn't bumped into Malfoy the week before. Why did Dumbledore think it was okay to keep something like that from him for so long? From what Mr Weasley said, the headmaster didn't even want him to know to begin with!

Ginny and the twins quickly ditched them to find their own friends, and when they were secure in the compartment with the sleeping new professor, Harry told his two best friends about Sirius Black. It was only fair, after all; if they were going to be hanging around him, they were in just as much danger. He was a little insulted at Hermione's assumption that he'd go seeking Black out, but then he remembered the compulsion charm the goblins had removed, and realised that before he probably would've done exactly that.

Conversation soon turned to Hogsmeade, making Harry remember for the first time since getting to Diagon Alley that he never got his permission slip signed. He probably wouldn't be allowed to go even if he had.

As Ron and Hermione tried to cheer him up about not being able to go — well, Hermione tried, Ron mostly gushed about how great Hogsmeade was supposed to be — Harry let his thoughts wander, his gaze drifting to the man asleep opposite him. Professor R J Lupin. He looked familiar. Perhaps Harry had seen him around Diagon Alley? He couldn't place it, it was just a feeling, like he knew this man. Even as he got dragged back into conversation, he couldn't look away from him for long. Part of Harry hoped the professor would wake up, then he might be able to find out if they knew each other.

Then the dementor attacked, and Harry stopped caring about Professor Lupin at all.

He was still shaking when he finally got Madam Pomfrey to let him go back to the feast, barely sparing a thought to the sorting he'd miss, or even Hagrid's new teaching job. All he could think about was that awful, awful scream...

"Is it true, Potter? You actually fainted?" Malfoy jeered as they all headed for their dorms.

"Shove off, Malfoy," Ron said with a scowl. When Harry looked up, Malfoy's eyes met his. For the briefest moment it looked like he was actually concerned.

"I'm fine, Malfoy," he retorted acidly, turning away towards the staircase. No, he was seeing things. Just because they'd had one half-decent conversation, didn't mean Malfoy suddenly gave a damn about him.

.....

When the feast was finally over, Remus rose from his seat at the head table, thinking longingly of his bed in his new quarters. First, however, he had to make one stop. He couldn't help himself.

His feet led the way seemingly without his consent, his eyes roaming the all-too-familiar corridors. He never thought he'd be back at Hogwarts again. Certainly never thought he'd be allowed to teach. It was a dream come true.

He ignored the ache in his chest, the voices of times past — of friends past — echoing in his ears as he walked. Every corridor, every classroom, they all held memories. Even the good ones made him want to howl with pain.

He stopped outside a nondescript black door, taking a steady breath before knocking. "Enter," a voice drawled, sending another stab of pain through Remus' heart. He pushed the door open, meeting stony black eyes. "Lupin." His name was spat like a curse, but he refused to flinch. If anything, it made him smile a little. Some things never changed. “What do you want?”

Remus edged into the office just far enough to shut the door behind him. Severus was sat behind his desk, a potions journal open in front of him. He didn’t look particularly pleased to have been interrupted.

All throughout the feast Remus had forced himself not to look down the other end of the staff table. Now he couldn’t bring himself to look away.

He hadn’t seen Severus in over a decade. The other man had certainly aged far better than Remus had — going grey at the grand old age of thirty-three. Considering... everything, Severus looked good. Older, harder, his hair a little longer, but still Severus.

“Did you come here just to stare at me, or did you need something?” The words were biting, but Remus didn’t avert his gaze. Severus was scowling at him, a familiar expression but for the lines a little deeper in his face. Remus tried not to think about the last time they saw each other. He definitely wasn’t ready for that yet.

“I just wanted to thank you,” Remus replied, his voice still a little hoarse. The last moon hadn’t been a particularly pleasant one. Hopefully it’d be the last like that for a while. “For agreeing to provide the Wolfsbane potion while I’m working here. It means a lot to me.”

“Dumbledore insisted,” Severus said, lips pursed. “Don’t think I did it out of the kindness of my own heart.”

Remus actually chuckled. “Of course not, Severus,” he replied easily. “I know you don’t have one of those.” The words could’ve been harsh, but they were fond if anything, and it made the Slytherin’s scowl deepen.

“Is that it?”

“I’m going, I’m going,” Remus assured. Even after all this time, the Potions Master’s sharp tongue didn’t quite cut the way it was supposed to. Not to say it didn’t hurt, but... it was a different hurt. “I just thought I’d stop by and let you know how grateful I am.” He paused, screwing up his Gryffindor courage for the minute. “It’s good to see you again, Severus.”

“Goodnight, Lupin,” Severus replied flatly. He looked away, jaw clenched. Remus took a step back, knowing when he’d pushed too far. It had always been a delicate game, that. He could hardly believe he was playing it again; could hardly believe he wanted to. He hadn’t been sure, until he’d seen the man. But yes, he wanted to. After all these years, he couldn’t quite shake Severus Snape.

He left the office, finally retreating to his quarters, letting out a sigh of relief when he stretched out on his mattress. He closed his eyes, thoughts turning to the incident on the train. To the one student he hadn’t been truly ready to meet yet.

He was so small. Certainly bigger than the last time Remus saw him, but still. James hadn’t been that small at thirteen. Even Lily had been taller, he was pretty sure. Still, Harry Potter seemed happy enough. When he wasn't being attacked by dementors, at least.

Remus sighed, rolling over onto his side. The hollow spot in his chest ached, the faint howling in the back of his head mournful, and he squeezed his eyes shut as if that would make it go away.

"I don't know if this was a good idea after all," he murmured to himself, knowing he'd be having nightmares that night.

It was going to be a long year, full of old memories and broken pack bonds in so many ways. Remus just hoped it would be worth it.

.-.-.

The start of term was certainly eventful.

Between everything with Buckbeak and Malfoy, and adjusting to his new classes, Harry hardly found any time by himself to work on his extra curricular studies. True to their word, the twins had borrowed Angelina's Flourish and Blotts catalogue, and Harry had sent off for a book about all the old pureblood families, as well as one about the duties of a pureblood heir. It was so much easier to find what he wanted when he had a nice handy list of them in the catalogue. He should've done this ages ago!

The night after his new books arrived, Harry left Ron playing chess with Ginny and scurried up to the dorm; if he was lucky, he'd have at least an hour before everyone started wanting to go to bed. He dug his new books from the side compartment in his new trunk, wondering which to read first.

The one about the duties of an heir was shorter, so he went with that. It was dry, as most of the books about pureblood stuff seemed to be; they certainly didn't want to make it easy for people to learn about it all!

"Harry?"

He jolted at the sudden noise, shoving his book under his pillow in a move that wasn't remotely subtle. Neville backed up a step, holding his hands out soothingly. "It's okay, I'm sorry, I thought you heard me come in."

"Sorry, Neville. You startled me."

"You're taking up your family seat?" Neville asked, and Harry blinked. Neville gestured at the book.

"What? How do you know about that stuff?"

Neville's answering smile was somewhat crooked. "Neville Longbottom, Heir to the Ancient and Most Noble House of Longbottom, at your service," he declared, bowing in the way Harry had read was formal when one heir addressed another. Harry gaped.

"You... really?"

“Really,” Neville confirmed. “My gran’s got my proxy right now, but she’ll pass things to me as soon as I’m old enough. Oh, this is great, Harry! The others will be so happy to hear you’re taking up your heirship; we weren’t sure, you see, when you never said anything.”

“Wait, no!” Harry went wide-eyed in alarm. “You can’t tell anyone, Neville.” He didn’t even know who these ‘others’ were, but if Dumbledore got wind of any of it...

“Harry, whatever Ron’s told you, it’s nothing to be ashamed of,” Neville replied, sounding defensive. “The House of Potter has a great history, and being an heir is a huge honour.”

“No, it’s not that, I—“ Harry faltered, letting out a sigh. Surely he could trust Neville, right? Especially if he was also an heir. Maybe he’d be able to help Harry out. “Come here.”

He scooted up the bed to make room for Neville to sit opposite him, then closed the curtains, putting up one of the privacy charms he’d learned from A Hundred Spells Every Wizard Should Know. Neville’s eyebrows rose. “What I’m telling you, Neville, you can’t tell anyone, okay?”

Neville nodded, brow furrowing in confusion. And Harry told him — all about his trip to Gringotts, and the block on his magic, and who he thought was responsible.

“I’ve been trying to learn everything I can since I found out,” he said, gesturing to the books. “Bought a load of books. But there’s so much I don’t know, and I can’t make things too obvious or Dumbledore will know I found out about the block.”

“He blocked your family magics?” Neville’s voice came out in a horrified whisper, his face pale. “He could get sent to Azkaban for that! That’s so many different kinds of illegal!”

Harry winced. “Who’s gonna believe me over him, though?” he said plaintively. “Even if they did, he’d find some way to convince everyone it’s all for my own good, or some rot.”

“That’s awful.” Neville squeezed Harry’s shoulder supportively. “Do Ron and Hermione know?”

Harry shook his head. “I can’t be sure they won’t go to him over it. Or he might get to them somehow anyway.” He couldn’t speak quite so plainly as he wanted to, but Neville got the idea; he couldn’t trust them yet.

“I’ll write to my gran,” Neville assured. “She taught me everything I know, she can help you too. Obviously she won’t know all the stuff that’s specific to the Potter family, but there’s probably a book in your vault about that. Or for, uh, any of the other families. Merlin, Harry, Slytherin? That’s insane! And Black, too — the House of Black is one of the oldest known pureblood lines in the world! How’d you get that one?”

“No idea,” Harry said with a shrug. “I guess someone down the line named me their heir. Do you really think your gran could help?”

“She’d be honoured,” Neville replied. “She loves all that stuff — can’t wait til I’m old enough to get more involved. She can keep a secret, too.” Neville paused, having a thought.

"Harry, have you ever heard of Occlumency?"

"Can't say I have," Harry replied, running the strange word over in his head. "What is it?"

"It's a form of magic, just about every pureblood kid is taught it growing up. It protects your thoughts. See, there's this magic called Legilimency — that's reading peoples' thoughts. Getting into their minds, seeing their memories, all that. Occlumency is the prevention of that. It forms shields around your mind so that no one can get in and steal your secrets."

Harry's jaw dropped in horror. "People can read my mind?"

"Not everyone," Neville hastened to assure him. "It's a really rare skill. But Dumbledore is famous for it. There's rumours that Snape is really good at it, too. If you're going to be keeping secrets from Dumbledore, you'll want to learn Occlumency. I'll write to gran tomorrow, get you some books."

"Do you know it?"

"Oh, yeah, I learned before I came to Hogwarts," Neville said. "Every family needs to be able to protect their secrets. I'm not amazing at it — if someone was really trying, I probably wouldn't be able to keep them out. But, well, no one has needed to really try. Not yet, anyway."

"But what if Dumbledore's already read my mind?" Harry thought of all the times that could've been possible — during mealtimes, or even in lessons. How close did someone have to be to read minds?

"Legilimency needs eye contact. As long as you don't look him in the eye, you should be alright."

Harry let out a sigh of relief. Don't look him in the eye. He could do that. That also explained why the book said eye contact was a show of trust. "Thanks, Neville. God, there's still so much I don't know. It's gonna take me forever to catch up."

"You'll get there, Harry," Neville said supportively, squeezing his shoulder again. "D'you mind if I, uh, go? Only I've got homework, and..."

Harry belatedly realised his wards were still up, and waved his wand to cancel them. He pulled his curtains aside, and froze when he saw Ron sat on his own bed beside him. The redhead eyed the pair suspiciously. "What've you two been up to?"

Harry and Neville shared a look. "Studying," they both said eventually, Neville heading back towards his own bed. Ron stared at Harry for a bit longer, but let it go.

"Whatever. Harry, d'you think Scabbers has lost more weight? It's that bloody cat of Hermione's, he's got it out for him I swear." Scabbers was laid out on the bedspread in front of Ron, and Harry had to admit he'd definitely seen better days. Privately, he thought that was more due to him being old than anything Crookshanks was doing, but Ron wouldn't hear a word of it.

"Just keep up with the rat tonic," he replied. "I'm sure he'll perk up."

Ron didn't look entirely convinced, but he didn't say anything more as Harry started getting ready for bed. Harry only felt guilty for a minute for excluding him. Ron wouldn't understand.

.-.-.

Everyone was excited for their first Defence Against the Dark Arts lesson. From what they'd heard around the school, Professor Lupin actually knew his stuff; no chance of another duffer like Lockhart. Harry hadn't properly spoken to him yet, but he still couldn't shake that strange feeling like the professor was familiar. It made something in his chest tie itself in knots, and had Harry squirming when he was sat behind his desk staring at the new professor.

The feeling was pushed aside when they were led to the staff room, Lupin gently suggesting that Snape vacate the area. The Defence professor seemed incredibly amused by Neville's boggart transformation. Maybe Snape had already pissed off the new staff member. Harry wouldn't put it past him.

Wand in hand, Harry braced himself to face the boggart, only for Lupin to step in front of him. The boggart turned into a floating silver orb, shining mysteriously — until Lupin turned it into a cockroach. Was that the moon? Why was Lupin afraid of the moon?

No one seemed to notice that Harry hadn't faced the Boggart, too busy chattering about their own vanquished fears. Harry almost said something to Lupin, stayed back and demanded answers, but he decided against it. Maybe he was overthinking things. Possibly class was just about to run over, and Lupin wanted to wrap things up.

Harry kept to himself as he walked down to dinner, letting Ron and Hermione's bickering wash over him. Professor Lupin hadn't said anything about seeing Harry before, or knowing him from anywhere. Harry was probably imagining things.

Still, something didn't feel right. There was something about the man that Harry couldn't put his finger on.

Chapter 4

As Ron and Hermione continued to fight over their pets, Harry found himself spending less and less time with the pair. It was giving him a headache, and both of them expected him to take their side — it just wasn't worth the hassle. Instead, he spent time alone, or with Neville. He was surprised at how close he was becoming to the shy Gryffindor since he'd revealed his secret. He was easy to get along with; much easier, Harry thought guiltily, than Ron and Hermione.

True to his word, Neville had sent an owl to his gran explaining Harry's circumstances. She'd responded with a long letter about what she'd like to do and say to Albus Dumbledore, but also with several rolls of parchment with notes for Harry to study about proper etiquette and behaviour, and a book called Occlumency For Beginners. Thanks to her, Harry was now in the habit of trying to clear his mind and organise his thoughts before bedtime. He wasn't sure if it was helping, but Neville insisted it was the best starting point.

Harry and Neville were in the school library — where for once, Hermione was not — looking at some of the books that wouldn't be too suspicious for him to be seen studying in public. Just in case anyone came across them. Harry should've known there would be plenty of books in the Hogwarts library.

"So technically, none of us are responsible for anything until we come of age," Neville was explaining. He sounded more confident than Harry had ever heard him, except perhaps for when he was talking about Herbology. "We're just heirs — it's not until you're the head of your house that you really have any influence. For most people that wouldn't happen for ages. Usually a Lord or Lady will keep their seat until their heir is married and has kids — just in case they need to change the line of succession, y'know? If they don't like who their heir has married or whoever. But, well, we don't have any other options," he added with a bitter smile. Harry bit his lip. He knew Neville was raised by his gran, but he'd never asked what happened to his parents. He didn't really know how to bring it up.

"Then why do all the books make it sound like such a big deal from birth?"

"The family heirs are the ones responsible for securing good family ties for the future," Neville told him. "Everything relies on the heir. If the head of the household is awful, sure, that's not great. But the future lies on the heir, so if they're not great, that's another generation of bad to deal with. Say one heir offends another heir when they're like, twelve, right? That grudge will carry through the family for the next fifty or sixty years, however long it takes for the next heir to take over. And Merlin help them if the grudge has been passed down. Some families have had grudges going on for centuries."

"Like the Malfoys and the Weasleys," Harry realised. That bad blood was far too deep to have started with Lucius and Arthur. Neville nodded.

"Exactly. And family grudges can make politics really difficult, especially when there's only fifty seats on the Wizengamot at any one time. If you piss off one family, and they tell all their allied families—“

“You end up with a lot of people who vote against you just to spite you,” Harry surmised. Neville nodded.

“Exactly. So our behaviour is really, really important.”

Harry looked back down at the next paragraph in the book, and as such didn’t notice they had company until a throat was cleared. Susan Bones and Hannah Abbott stood beside their table; Susan eyed Harry warily for a second before turning to Neville. “Ernie wants to know if you’ll help him with his Herbology homework on Friday.”

“Of course, yeah. Why didn’t he ask me himself?” Neville paused, then sighed. “Don’t tell me he’s still hiding after the butterbeer incident?” Both girls giggled, and Hannah nodded. “Idiot. It’s completely fine, my gran even thought it was funny. Tell him I’ll meet him in the usual spot after dinner.”

Susan turned as if to leave, but then she glanced down at the book open in front of the two boys. Harry fought the urge to cover it up. “No,” she murmured, a slow smile creeping across her face. “Really?” The question was directed at Neville, who grinned, nodding.

“Really. But it’s all hush-hush for now. Reasons,” he added, as if that was in any way helpful. Harry had officially lost the plot of the conversation.

Susan and Hannah both looked at Harry, studying him like they hadn’t seen him before. Eventually, Hannah bowed her head with open palms. “Well met, Heir Potter.”

Susan repeated the greeting. Harry spluttered. Neville kicked him in the shin, giving him a pointed look. “I, uh, well met, Heir Bones, Heir Abbott,” he returned, bowing his head at each of them. “You two as well?”

He knew Abbott was one of the Sacred 28 lines, but he hadn’t seen anything about the Bones family. He really had to read that book on all the pureblood families.

“We were starting to think you’d never take your title,” Hannah said, keeping her voice low. “What took you so long?”

“I— It’s a long story,” Harry said, running his hand through his hair. “How many are there at Hogwarts?”

“Oh, loads,” Susan replied with a dismissive wave of her hand. “Basically all the Slytherins in our year. Ernie MacMillan. Sully Fawley, in the year below. Anthony Goldstein. Cassius Warrington, that tall bloke on the Slytherin quidditch team. Loads more, too.”

“They do it on purpose. Our parents, I mean,” Hannah explained. “They all try and have kids the same age so that we all meet at school and start early. There’s a few outliers — the Weasleys have always been off-cycle, and the Flints duffed up a bit — but for the most part, it’s all our lot. Good to have you in the ranks.” She grinned, winking briefly. “We’d love to hear that long story of yours, one day.”

They made to leave, and Harry reached out for a second. “Wait! Don’t— don’t tell Dumbledore. Don’t let him know.” They shared a glance, then looked back at him.

“Dumbledore holds too many seats that aren’t rightfully his,” Susan said darkly, a knowing glint in her eyes. “Don’t worry, Harry. Your secret’s safe with us.”

Watching the girls walk off, Harry blinked, bewildered. “When you said there were others, I didn’t realise there were that many.” Neville grinned sheepishly.

“Yeah, well. We’re the year for it. Like I was saying, it’s our job to secure the family future. They want to make sure we have the best opportunities to start networking. Have you ever noticed how most of the Slytherins leave me alone? Even Malfoy’s not as bad with me as he is with the rest of you. Though this year, he only really seems to be after Ron.”

Harry had noticed that, too; Malfoy barely said anything to Harry unless Ron started the fight. Instead he’d taken to giving Harry calculated looks across the room, like he couldn’t quite figure him out.

“If this whole heir thing keeps the Slytherins off my back, it could be worth it after all,” Harry teased, pulling the book a little closer. Neville laughed.

“I don’t think even being the Potter heir could fix that completely.”

.

When Gorvak had warned Harry to be wary of his magic in the months following the removal of the block, Harry hadn’t expected it to be quite so itchy. He constantly felt like he was vibrating out of his skin, his magic building and begging to be used. He was picking things up in class faster than he’d ever done before — faster than Hermione, even, sometimes. He’d have to get a handle on that, or he’d be found out in a second.

For some reason, walking seemed to help. Most nights Harry put on his invisibility cloak and slipped out of the common room, strolling the halls of Hogwarts in the darkness. For once, he wasn’t even up to something. It just felt like the walking was soothing him — the castle was soothing him. Deep down, he wondered if it was something to do with being the heir of Slytherin, if the castle recognised him somehow. It sounded stupid, but people always said Hogwarts felt like it was alive.

He’d taken his cloak off as he walked through the courtyard, wanting to feel the wind ruffling his hair. He knew he was being foolish. There was a murderer out looking for him, and here he was walking around by himself at night. But he just couldn’t stay still. He’d rather walk for an hour or two than spend the whole night tossing and turning. Besides, with the dementors around, Black wouldn’t be getting into Hogwarts.

There was a flash of silver, and Harry swore under his breath as he turned the corner to see familiar blond hair. “What are you doing out after curfew, Potter?”

“I could say the same to you, Malfoy,” Harry argued. Malfoy rolled his eyes.

“I don’t have a crazed serial killer after me,” was his retort.

“Careful, Malfoy, it’s starting to sound like you care.”

Malfoy flinched, then glared. “Just because I hate you, Potter, doesn’t mean I want to see you get murdered.”

That made Harry grin, though he couldn’t explain why. “I was just out for a walk. Feeling restless.”

“Feeling restless, he says,” Malfoy said with an exasperated skyward glance. “Just do bloody laps in the common room!”

“Well, what’s your excuse then?”

“None of your business,” Malfoy said immediately. The two boys stared at each other in the beat of silence that followed, at a stalemate. Suddenly, Harry got an idea. It might’ve been a stupid one.

“Well met, Heir Malfoy,” he said, bowing slowly. Malfoy stared, blinking incredulously.

“The rumours are true, then,” he murmured. Ever so slowly, inch by inch, the Malfoy heir sank into a similar bow, though he was hampered slightly by his arm in a sling. “Well met, Heir Potter.”

He straightened up. They stared at each other some more, neither sure what the next step was. Harry had gone and thrown off the rhythm of their usual interactions. “It’s Heir Black, too,” he threw out impulsively, not sure why he was telling Malfoy of all people. The blond’s eyes widened a fraction.

“How— oh, of bloody course,” he muttered, shaking his head. “Heir Potter-Black. I should’ve known.” At the look on his face, Harry was almost tempted to throw out his other two names, as well. “Well, that’ll shake things up a bit. At least it’ll take two of Dumbledore’s proxy seats away. Though I don’t know if it’s worse to let you have them.” He made a noise of disgust.

“It won’t be,” Harry assured. He met Malfoy’s eye for the briefest of seconds, remembering what Hannah had said. “We don’t need any more seats under Dumbledore’s control.”

He was sure he’d actually rendered Malfoy speechless. He wished he had a camera for proof. “You are making things interesting, aren’t you, Potter?” Malfoy’s voice had softened. Harry’s lips quirked in a half-smile. “All the same, it’ll do you no good if you’re dead. Toddle off to your little lion’s den, now, won’t you?”

“Only if you slither back to your snake pit,” Harry retorted, grinning. That actually earned a soft laugh as Malfoy turned away.

Once he was alone, Harry threw his cloak over his shoulders, heading back in the direction of Gryffindor tower with an odd spring in his step. Of all the things he’d learnt since his birthday, one was proving to be more bewildering than all the rest put together.

Maybe, just maybe, he actually quite liked Draco Malfoy. When he wasn't being a prat.

.-.-.-

Everyone in third year was practically falling over themselves with excitement at the announcement of the first Hogsmeade weekend. Except, of course, Harry Potter.

"It's fine, really. You go have fun," he insisted for the hundredth time, shooing Ron and Hermione towards the portrait hole. "Tell me all about it when you get back."

"We can always go next time, Harry, really," Hermione started, but Ron tugged on her arm.

"Look, the man said leave, so we'll leave," he said. "We'll bring you back loads of sweets, Harry."

"See you at the feast tonight!" It was Halloween. Harry's favourite day of the year just kept getting better and better.

"You sure you don't want company, Harry?" That was Neville, his scarf already wrapped around his neck. Harry smiled, though it didn't reach his eyes.

"Really, Nev, I'm alright. Probably just gonna hang out in the library." He was getting worse than Hermione on that front. Though she didn't seem to be up to her usual standards this year — probably because her schedule had her in about six places at once.

"If you're sure. Happy Samhain, Harry." Neville had been teaching Harry all about the traditional wizarding holidays; Samhain; Yule; Beltane. Through him, Harry knew that some of the students would be lighting a bonfire that evening in the stone circle. He wished he could join them without giving up his secrets to Dumbledore. Maybe next year.

The path to the library was a familiar one, and Harry headed for a little-used back corner of the enormous room. From an offhand comment Hermione had made, Harry learned that the Hogwarts library kept yearbooks of all the previous classes. From the dust layering the shelves, it clearly didn't get much foot traffic. There were rows and rows of black leather-bound books, each with a decade of dates on the spine. Harry found the one for graduating classes 1970-1980, easing it from the shelf and carrying it to the nearest table.

The section for 1978 was easily found, and Harry gasped at the first page he opened. There, near the bottom of the second page, was a picture of a redheaded teenage witch with luminous green eyes and a bright smile. There was a small amount of text beneath her picture.

Evans, Lily

Gryffindor House

Head Girl

Top of class in Charms, Arithmancy

Harry hurriedly flicked through several pages until he came to the ‘P’ names. His breath caught in his throat. He could certainly see why so many people said he looked just like his father.

Potter, James

Gryffindor House

Head Boy

Quidditch Captain (Chaser)

Top of class in Transfiguration

Gently, Harry ran his finger over his father’s face, eyes burning as he looked at that rakish grin. He was only eighteen, and yet only a few years away from death.

Absently, Harry scanned the rest of the page, remembering what Hannah Abbott had said about all the purebloods trying to have kids that went to school at the same time. He saw a Macmillan — Ernie’s dad, maybe? Or an uncle? — And a Nott, and— wait a second.

Snape, Severus

Slytherin House

Top of class in Potions

Sure enough, there was a picture of a surly-looking teenager with a hooked nose and black hair that hung into his eyes. His Potions Master, age eighteen. He knew, of course, that Snape hated his father — he hadn’t realised they’d gone to school together.

He flicked back to the beginning, curious to see if he’d recognise any other names. The very first page made his jaw drop.

Black, Sirius

Gryffindor House

Top of class in Astronomy

He could hardly believe the winsome, grinning black-haired teenager in the picture was the same hollow-eyed face staring back at him from the wanted posters. Sirius Black had gone to school with his parents? Had been in the same house, even! Had his father known, even then, that he was evil?

The man looked familiar, wanted posters aside, and it took Harry a minute to realise why. The photo Hagrid had given him years ago, from his parents’ wedding. Sirius Black was in it.

Sirius Black had been their best man.

Harry felt sick. He quickly turned the page, not wanting to look into those sparkling grey eyes anymore. He forced himself to look for other familiar names, refusing to dwell on what he'd just discovered. If he thought too hard about it, he'd just work himself up.

Greengrass, Fenella. Lupin, Remus.

Wait.

Harry did a double-take, staring down at the boy with dark blond hair and honey eyes, a bashful grin tugging at his lips, a faint scar across the bridge of his nose.

Lupin, Remus

Gryffindor House

Gryffindor Prefect

Top of class in Ancient Runes, Defence Against the Dark Arts

Professor Lupin seemed far too old to have gone to school with his parents. He was already going grey! Desperate, Harry kept going, wondering who else he'd recognise in there. Who next, Cornelius Fudge?!

When he reached the 1979 graduating class, Harry slammed the book shut, the sound echoing in the empty library. He vaguely heard Madam Pince shushing him from her desk, but ignored it, his heart still pounding.

Before he could really think about it, Harry was stuffing the book back on its shelf and running from the library, ignoring Pince's reprimand. The hallways were practically empty as he ran, only slowing down when he reached Lupin's office. The door was open, and the man looked up, surprise in his eyes. "Harry? Is everything alright?"

"Why didn't you tell me?"

Lupin stiffened. "I, uh, Harry, why don't you come in, shut the door behind you." Harry did so, staring at his professor with a look of betrayal.

"Why didn't you tell me you knew them?" The hurt was clear in Harry's tone. Lupin blinked at him.

"I beg your pardon?"

"My parents. You went to school with them, I saw it in the yearbook. You were all in Gryffindor together. You, and them — and Sirius Black."

Lupin's face drained of what little colour it had, and he put a hand against the desk for support. "Harry," he breathed, looking a little like he'd been shot. "Harry, I thought you knew."

"How could I have known? No one told me! No one ever tells me anything about them!"

"I'm sorry, I assumed someone must've—if they ever told you about your parents at school, well—I thought you just didn't want to know." Lupin truly looked apologetic, and Harry let out a long breath, his temper beginning to cool.

"I've been trying to figure it out since the train," he said softly. "Why you seem so familiar. I knew you, didn't I? Before?"

"Yes," Lupin confirmed, heartbreak clear on his face. "Your parents... your father was one of the best friends I ever had. Your mother, too. I miss them every day — today more than most. I'm sure you know what I mean."

Harry knew all too well. Every Halloween, he woke up with a swirling hole in his gut that he didn't know how to soothe. The aching, gaping chasm where his parents had been. "Tell me about them. Please," he begged, voice cracking. Lupin stared at him for a long moment.

"Sit down," he said eventually. "I'll make some tea."

Harry did as bid, sitting in the chair opposite the desk. Instead of sitting behind the desk, Lupin chose the chair next to Harry, setting the tea tray down on the small table between them. "So what do you want to know, Harry?"

"Everything," Harry said instantly. "Aunt Petunia never says a word; I didn't even know about magic 'til I got my Hogwarts letter." He scowled for a minute, adding under his breath, "she didn't even tell me my name 'til I was five."

Lupin's eyebrows rose a fraction. "Petunia? Lily's sister?"

"Yeah, she won't ever talk about Mum," Harry replied, shaking his head. "What were they like? The yearbook said they were Head Boy and Girl. And Mum was really good at Charms?"

"Beat me to the top spot every year running," Lupin confirmed with a quiet chuckle. "Lily... I've never met a kinder person than Lily Evans, in all my life. Always willing to go out of her way to help people. The only time I ever saw her truly angry was when your father was involved."

Harry looked at him, puzzled, and Lupin laughed. "Oh, it was far from love at first sight, Harry. For the first six years of school, Lily thought James was an arrogant tosspot, and honestly she wasn't entirely wrong. James, of course, thought the sun rose and set with Lily Evans and had done since the very second he set eyes on her at the sorting. But she didn't give him the time of day until seventh year."

"What changed?" Harry asked, teacup clutched tightly in his hands.

"James grew up. Stopped trying so hard to impress her. Stopped hexing Slytherins for fun." From the look on Lupin's face, Harry had a good idea of which particular Slytherin he would hex. "Drove Sirius mad at first — all his fun being spoilt because James was trying to woo a girl." Lupin didn't seem to realise what he'd said at first, but when he did the anguish that crossed his face made Harry wince.

“They were friends, then.”

“The best of friends,” Lupin said softly. “Practically brothers. The four of us were inseparable, but those two... it went beyond friendship.”

“You three, and my mum?” Harry asked, confused. Lupin shook his head.

“Myself, James, Sirius, and a boy named Peter Pettigrew.” Lupin paused for a long moment, staring off into the distance, lost in a memory. Harry cleared his throat quietly, jolting him back to reality. “That was half a lifetime ago, of course. None of us had any idea that Sirius... sometimes, I still can’t believe it myself.”

Harry tried to imagine what it would feel like if Ron or Hermione were to suddenly turn out to be Voldemort supporters. The thought made him nauseous. “What happened?” he asked hesitantly. How could it all go wrong?

“Your parents went into hiding,” Lupin said eventually, not looking Harry in the eye. “Under a very complicated secrecy charm — the Fidelius charm. The charm allows a location or person to be entirely hidden, except from the one person who knows the secret — and anyone they should tell. They chose Sirius to be their Secret Keeper. Trusted him the most out of any of us. Within the week...” He trailed off, squeezing his eyes shut. Harry could fill in the rest. “Peter was furious when he found out. Went after Sirius. But he was never as good with spells as the rest of us, not quite as brave... He was one of the people Sirius killed when he blew up the street. All that was left of him was a finger.”

Harry thought his heart had stopped beating. Silence hung thick in the room after Lupin’s declaration, both of them caught up in horror and grief. “I’m sorry, Harry,” Lupin said abruptly. His shoulders hunched as he sunk in on himself, as if he could hide from his own memories. “That’s more information than you ever needed. I should’ve at least broken it to you gently.”

“No, I’m glad you told me. I— I needed to know,” Harry insisted. Sirius Black, the reason his parents were dead. “He was my godfather, wasn’t he?”

“I— yes. How did you know?”

The words flashed through his mind. Named Heir to the Noble and Most Ancient House of Black. He had his answer, now. He opened his mouth, unsure what he would say, but the door suddenly swung open.

Snape stood in the doorway, holding a smoking goblet. “Lupin. Potter,” he greeted. Lupin jumped to his feet, almost knocking over his teacup.

“Ah, Severus. I was just showing Harry my grindylow.” He gestured to a tank in the corner of the classroom that Harry hadn’t noticed before that second. Snape’s expression remained flat.

“Fascinating,” he deadpanned. “Make sure to drink that directly, Lupin. I have an entire cauldronful in my personal lab.”

"Yes, I'll be with you to take more when I need it. Thank you, Severus." He took the goblet from the dark-haired man, who gave Lupin one last unreadable look, then swept from the classroom, shutting the door behind him. Lupin looked at the goblet, then grimaced, knocking it all back in one. "Ugh. Pity he can't make it taste any better."

"Professor, what?"

"Oh, not to worry, Harry. I have an ongoing medical issue, Severus — ah, Professor Snape — was kind enough to brew the only potion that helps. I'll be right as rain. I'm very lucky to be working with him, you know; not many Potions Masters are up to the task, it's a rather tricky brew."

Harry's mind flashed back to the yearbook. "He was top of your class."

Lupin's mouth made a funny half-smirk. "Indeed he was. Though Lily almost beat him to it. I thought he'd have a heart attack when he found out how close it had been."

"You were friends?" Harry asked, eyebrows raised. Lupin almost dropped the goblet.

"Friends? Oh, I don't know if I'd say that. We were... things are complicated, Harry, when you're Gryffindors and Slytherins. Even when you're no longer students."

Unbidden, Harry's mind flashed to blond hair and silver eyes. Heat rose in his cheeks. He understood that kind of complicated.

"I'm sorry, Harry, but perhaps we can pick this conversation up another time? I'm afraid it's taken rather a lot out of me." Lupin set down the goblet, and Harry stood. The professor placed a tentative hand on Harry's shoulder. "I am always happy to talk to you about your parents. I'm sorry I didn't sooner, but I thought someone already had. I... well, I assumed you'd chosen to have nothing to do with me." He gave a small, self-deprecating shrug. "Since that's not the case... you used to call me Uncle Remus once, Harry. I'm not asking you to do so again, but... perhaps we could be friends?"

Harry studied the man; the first person in his life who had offered to tell him about his parents, who had really known them. A man who, under different circumstances, Harry would have grown up calling Uncle Remus, loving like family. "I'd like that," he said eventually, offering a hesitant smile.

Lupin beamed.

....

Harry was back in the Gryffindor common room by the time Ron and Hermione returned from Hogsmeade, pockets bulging with all kinds of treats. "Oh, y'know, quiet," he said when Hermione asked him how his day had gone. "Been doing homework."

He could've told them about his visit to Professor Lupin, but he stayed quiet. To do that would have meant explaining the yearbook, and Sirius Black, and why he was looking at the yearbook to begin with... it was better just to not. He was keeping too many secrets from them already; what was one more?

"Anyway, enough about me. What's Hogsmeade like? Where did you go?" As Ron emptied his pockets into Harry's lap, showering him with sweets, the pair gushed about the wonders of the wizarding village. Harry kept up his fake smile the entire time, unwrapping a chocolate frog for distraction. They sounded like they'd had the time of their lives.

"Hey, I'll be right back. Forgot my jumper," he muttered when they all got up to leave for the feast, darting for the dormitory stairs. Up in his room, he leant against his bedpost and took a deep breath. They didn't mean to rub it in. It wasn't their fault he couldn't go. He should be happy they were on good terms; it was an improvement from having them yell at each other about Crookshanks.

"Harry." He jumped, but it was only Neville, a knowing look on his face. "Alright?"

"Yeah, just needed a minute." He grabbed his jumper off his bed just to have an excuse, and so missed Neville reaching into his robe pocket.

"Here, got you something." Neville held out a hand. In his palm was a silver dish, with what looked like a miniature bonfire stacked inside, waiting to be lit. "Figured, since you couldn't join us tonight..."

Harry took the little fire, glancing up at Neville with perhaps the most genuine grin he'd had all day. "Thanks, Nev. This is really great."

Neville blushed, ducking his head. "You're welcome. Now come on, I'm starving."

.-. .

Harry laid awake on the floor of the Great Hall for a long time, surrounded by snoring people in identical purple sleeping bags. He couldn't wrap his head around it.

Sirius Black had broken into the school.

The same Sirius Black who had been his father's best friend in school, and was now trying to kill Harry. Who was the reason his parents were dead.

The very same Sirius Black who Snape clearly thought Lupin was helping get into the castle. Harry didn't believe that for a second — no one could fake the grief he'd seen in Lupin's eyes earlier that day. He was still heartbroken by his friend's betrayal.

He remembered the other night, how even Malfoy had been worried about Harry wandering around after curfew. He'd been so sure Black wouldn't be able to reach him then, so confident in his safety. This... this changed things.

.-. .

Remus crossed the corridor, guilt gnawing his gut, when all of a sudden there was a hand on his shoulder and his back was slammed against the stone wall. "Swear to me," Severus hissed, his near-black eyes narrowed venomously and his wand digging into Remus' throat. "Swear to me you aren't helping him."

Remus went wide-eyed in horror. "Severus, I would never! I'd never do anything to hurt Harry. I swear it."

Severus lowered his wand and loosened his grip, but not by much. "Forgive me if I don't trust you entirely, Lupin," he said sharply. "I know what the two of you were like."

"I know what you thought we were like, and you've always been wrong," Remus corrected, remembering countless arguments and pointed remarks about the true nature of his relationship with Sirius Black. Back then, he'd found it amusing— sweet, even. Now... the words felt bitter on his tongue. "I would never help that traitor get in here and hurt my cub."

Severus met his gaze steadily, holding it so long Remus began to feel a little lightheaded. Eventually, he nodded, stepping back. Part of Remus wanted to follow. "It's late," he said eventually. "And Dumbledore has called off the search. I suggest you go to bed, Lupin."

Remus bit back the first three responses that tried to leap from his mouth. "You can trust me, Severus," he said eventually. Severus scowled.

"We've both been wrong about that before."

Severus turned on his heel, robes flaring out behind him as he stalked away, leaving Remus alone in the corridor. Remus let out a long, steady breath. "You fool," he murmured quietly, unsure who he was talking to — himself, Severus, or Sirius Black.

He should go to Dumbledore. He should walk up to the headmaster's office and tell him about Sirius' animagus form, about the secret passages he could be using to get in and out of the school. If he were a better man, he'd have told him weeks ago.

But he wasn't a better man. He was a guilty, desperate, lonely man who still couldn't believe after twelve years that one of his packmates could do something so awful against another. That Sirius — happy, playful, ridiculous Sirius — could be out for the blood of the child he'd loved so dearly. He'd doted on Harry, insisting the boy was basically his since he was never going to have kids of his own. He was the perfect godfather.

Until he'd betrayed them all to Voldemort, of course.

Remus felt like his heart was being torn to pieces, his wolf howling angrily in the back of his head, demanding justice, demanding some other explanation. That just made his rage increase — if not for the wolf, Lily and James might have trusted him to begin with, might have used him as the Secret Keeper instead of Sirius. But no, despite everything, they still doubted his ability to fight against his darker side. Thought that because of the wolf, because of Severus

No. He couldn't go down that road. Not tonight.

For now, all he needed was sleep. And perhaps some of the whiskey he kept in his cupboard. Whatever nightmares he was to face when his eyes closed, he didn't fancy facing them sober.

Chapter 5

Chapter Notes

Few hours later than usual, but it's still Friday! I have been having A Week so I hope you all enjoy this~

When Harry walked into the Defence classroom to see Snape stood at the front, he knew it was going to be a bad day.

When Snape had them open their books to the page on dementors, he realised just how bad it was going to be.

Almost everyone in the classroom turned to look at him when Snape introduced the topic. He could hear several of the Slytherins sniggering in the back, including Malfoy. Pointedly ignoring them, he looked down at his textbook, reading the introduction.

Dementors feed off positive emotion, sucking away any happy thoughts or feelings and leaving a person with only their worst memories remaining. Many are driven mad by prolonged exposure to a dementor. Some people can have particularly adverse reactions to a dementor — those with strong negative memories are more sensitive to a dementor's aura.

Harry thought about the sound of a woman screaming, his stomach churning. Strong negative memories. That definitely counted.

Much to his surprise, Snape's lesson was actually somewhat informative. When he wasn't busy insulting them, or making thinly veiled comments about Harry's fainting spell.

After dinner, Harry went up to Professor Lupin's office, hoping to catch the man for a talk if he was feeling any better. The office was empty, and Harry sighed. Another time, then.

On his way back down to the dungeon, he walked past a pair of Slytherins in his own year. Ducking his head, he planned to just head straight past them, not in the mood for a fight. His plan was ruined when one of them stepped in front of him. He eyed Blaise Zabini warily, keeping his hand ready to flick his wand from its holster.

Zabini faced him, palms open, and slowly bowed his head. "Well met, Heir Potter."

Harry couldn't believe it. The other Slytherin, Daphne Greengrass, was doing the same thing. He blinked at them in astonishment, but returned the greeting to each in turn. When Greengrass straightened up, there was a coy smile on her face. "Maybe you're not so bad, Potter. For a Gryffindor."

So much for things being secret. How many other people knew? He hoped they were all as good at Occlumency as Neville assured him they must be. “There are more important houses than just Hogwarts ones,” he said eventually.

“And more important enemies than each other,” Zabini said quietly, his dark eyes knowing. Harry’s jaw tightened. Was he talking about Voldemort, or Dumbledore?

They parted ways without another word, and Harry returned to the Gryffindor common room — just in time to hear another explosion from Ron about Crookshanks going after Scabbers.

Honestly, the sooner that rat died, the better it would be for everyone. They could finally get some peace and quiet.

.-. .

Harry should’ve known better than to expect quidditch to brighten his spirits, the way his term was going so far.

He hardly thought it was necessary to keep him in the hospital wing for the whole weekend, but he didn’t argue too hard — it kept him away from prying eyes, at least. And once Neville brought him some books, it wasn’t too bad. He appreciated the attempt at cheering him up, at least.

He hadn’t told anyone about the Grim, yet. He was pretty sure he was actually imagining things. One thing he definitely wasn’t imagining was the voices he’d heard right before he’d passed out, the voices the dementors had brought into his memories. He’d known already, deep down, but know he really knew. That was his mother he was hearing — her last words, as she begged Voldemort to spare him. Her dying screams.

Weeks ago, he would’ve given anything to hear his mother’s voice. Now, he’d give anything to make it stop. It was all he could think about, echoing in his ears every time he tried to sleep. The visitors were a nice distraction, but every time he was left alone, the voice returned.

“Potter, are you, uh, alright?” He was snapped from his thoughts by an unfamiliar voice, and looked up into the cautious face of Cedric Diggory, the Hufflepuff seeker.

“Diggory,” he greeted, confusion clear in his tone. Diggory edged closer.

“Hi. Uh, I brought you this. From dinner. Madam Pomfrey never lets me have sweets when I’m in the hospital wing, so I thought you’d like it.” The Hufflepuff awkwardly thrust out a napkin-wrapped bundle, which turned out to be a slightly misshapen slice of treacle tart. “I asked the twins, they said it’s your favourite.”

“Oh, yeah. Thanks.” He took the treat, still entirely baffled by the other seeker’s presence.

“Look, Potter, I just wanted to come say I’m sorry. I didn’t notice what was happening until it was too late — I’d never have caught the snitch if I’d known.”

"It wasn't your fault," Harry assured him, grimacing. Stupid, noble Hufflepuffs. "It's fine, you won. It's just a quidditch match."

"Don't let Wood hear you say that," Diggory retorted, making Harry snort. "Are you okay? You fell so quickly. For a minute, we all thought..." He trailed off, glancing away. Harry knew what he'd been about to say. They all thought he was dead, at first.

"I'm fine. Barely even hurt." He was tired and sore, and still a little shaky, but he'd had worse injuries from quidditch before. "Wish I could say the same about my broom." He glanced over at the pile of splintered twigs, and Cedric winced.

"I heard about that. Merlin, I'm sorry. It was a great broom, that. Hopefully you can get something good to replace it."

Harry couldn't even think about replacing his broom right now, though he knew he'd need to before the match against Ravenclaw.

"Well, anyway, I'm glad you're alright. And I'm still really sorry about the match. I tried to get a rematch, but Hooch wasn't having it. I just... I wanted to beat you fairly, y'know? Not because the dementors made you faint."

The reminder made Harry scowl. "You won fair enough. You were already on your way to the snitch when I fell."

"That doesn't count! I've seen you fly, Potter, you could've easily beaten me to it." Diggory ran a hand through his hair, a frown on his handsome face. "Whatever; I've clearly lost the argument anyway, so it doesn't matter. I just... I didn't want you to think I was happy about the way things turned out."

"I wouldn't blame you if you were," Harry replied. "But thanks. And there's always next year, right?" That made Cedric grin.

"Next year, you're on," he agreed, shaking Harry's hand. "I'll leave you to your evening. Hope you get all patched up soon, Potter. See you around."

"Yeah, see you, Diggory."

"Cedric," the older Hufflepuff corrected, a faint flush to his cheeks. "It's Cedric." It took a beat too long for the two of them to stop shaking hands.

"Then call me Harry."

Cedric grinned, and Harry could see why all the girls got so flustered over him. Something in his gut flip-flopped. "Later, Harry."

The Hufflepuff turned away, and Harry sunk back against the pillows, shaking his head as he processed the bizarre interaction. At least something good had come from the whole disaster; he'd sort-of, maybe, made a new friend?

.-.-.-

If he thought the visit from Cedric was weird, he was utterly bewildered by the person who crept into the hospital wing shortly after curfew. “Malfoy?”

“Shut up, Potter! I don’t want to get caught,” the Slytherin hissed, glaring. The moonlight bounced off his hair, making it practically glow in the darkness. He looked almost ethereal.

Harry raised an eyebrow. “If you didn’t want to get caught, why are you here?” There was a long, pregnant silence. “You were worried about me, weren’t you?”

“Shut up, Potter,” Malfoy bit out again. Harry grinned. He was! Malfoy was actually concerned about him. “Maybe I’m here for Pomfrey. My arm hurts.”

“We both know that’s not true. Your arm is fine.”

“Yes, well. After the way you fell, I’m surprised they weren’t scooping you into a cauldron to get you off the pitch. The girl Weasley is going around acting like you’ll never walk again.”

Harry grimaced, glancing at Ginny’s home-made get well card, wedged firmly shut under his fruit bowl. “I’m fine, really. It’s just the dementors...” Harry trailed off. “You heard what Snape said in class. They’re worse for people with bad memories.”

“Plenty of people have bad memories, Potter. They’re not fainting all over the place. Are you sure there’s not something else wrong with you?” Malfoy eyed Harry suspiciously, like he was about to announce that he actually was dying. Harry glared at him.

“Those people don’t hear their mum begging for mercy as she’s murdered, do they?” he snapped in retort, watching Malfoy’s already pale face drain of colour. Harry abruptly remembered who he was talking to. “Don’t you dare tell anyone I said that.”

“I hear my father torturing my mother,” Malfoy blurted suddenly, slapping a hand over his mouth and turning red as soon as he’d spoken. Harry gaped.

“Malfoy, I—“

“Don’t,” Malfoy bit out sharply, his eyes flashing. “Goodnight, Potter. Glad you’re not in as many pieces as your broom is.”

Before Harry could say anything more, the blond was gone, and Harry was alone once more, staring wide-eyed at the back of the door.

“Shit,” he breathed into the darkness.

How the hell was he supposed to deal with a revelation like that?

.

He’d never been so glad to go back to classes as he was on Monday, after a whole night of sitting awake thinking about his mother, and the Grim, and Malfoy. He was yawning all through class, and Hermione gave him a concerned look. “Are you sure you’re well enough to be up and about, Harry?”

“Yeah, fine,” he insisted. “Just didn’t sleep well. Too quiet in the hospital wing.”

“I suppose you didn’t even have Professor Lupin for company. I’m glad he’s feeling better, though.”

“Yeah,” Ron cut in. “No more lessons with Snape.”

“Except Potions,” Harry pointed out dryly, earning a wounded look.

“Don’t ruin it, Harry.”

Professor Lupin shot them a pointed look across the classroom, and Harry sheepishly turned back to his work.

After class, Harry made an excuse to his friends and lingered at his desk, waiting for the rest of the class to file out. Lupin raised an enquiring eyebrow. “Can I help you, Harry?”

“So, uh. The dementors. You, uh, saw what happens to me when they come near me.”

“It’s understandable, Harry; there are horrors in your past that others haven’t experienced,” Lupin soothed. Harry shook his head.

“I know, I know, but I still don’t want to be fainting every time I see one.”

“If it helps, Professor Dumbledore was furious with them — I don’t think he’s going to let them get close again.”

“Why did they come the first time?” Harry asked bitterly.

“They’re getting hungry,” was Lupin’s response. “They’re used to being in Azkaban, with all that emotion to keep them going. Being out here, unable to go near anyone, and then feeling all the joy and excitement from the match... they couldn’t resist.”

“When they come close, I can hear my mum dying,” Harry admitted. Lupin froze.

“Lily?” he said eventually, the lines on his facing making him look older than his thirty-three years. “Oh, Harry.” He reached out, hesitating for only a moment before squeezing Harry’s shoulder.

“I want it to stop,” Harry breathed desperately. “When S— when Professor Snape covered for you, he said something about a spell that can be used to ward off dementors. Is that the thing you did on the train?” Lupin nodded. “Can you teach me?”

“Harry, the Patronus charm is an incredibly advanced bit of magic. Many adults can’t do one, let alone a third year student.”

“Try me,” Harry retorted. His magic had been buzzing under his skin since the goblins had removed the block. Maybe some advanced magic was just what he needed.

"I don't want to make any promises..." Harry stared Lupin down, determination in his face, until the man sighed. "Fine. We can work on it over Christmas, if you're staying."

"I am," Harry confirmed. "I always do. The Dursleys don't want me there unless I have to be."

"You live with your muggle relatives in the summer, then, do you?" Lupin asked, an odd tone to his voice. Harry nodded.

"Unfortunately. I usually get to spend some of it at Ron's house, but Dumbledore — Professor Dumbledore, sorry — says I have to be at my aunt's house for most of the summer. I guess it's supposed to be safer." He grimaced, showing exactly what he thought of that. It certainly wasn't going to be safer when he got home in July, and Uncle Vernon decided to teach him a lesson for what he did to Aunt Marge. If only the Ministry had wiped their memories, too.

"I'm sorry, Harry," Lupin said, and he sounded like he truly meant it. "I only met Petunia a few times, and her husband just the once, but they were certainly... difficult people to get along with."

Harry snorted. "That's an understatement." He paused for a moment, thinking. "Professor? If you and my parents were such good friends... why couldn't you raise me, when they died?" Surely that would've been better than growing up with the Dursleys. Anything would've been better than that.

Lupin looked at him, a heartbroken expression in his eyes. "I wanted to," he confessed. "But there were... circumstances. The Ministry never would've allowed someone like me raise a child. And Dumbledore insisted you were in the safest place you could be — not that he ever told me where that was. He said you'd be protected as long as no one magical came near you. I couldn't even write." His voice cracked, just a little bit. Harry wondered what it would've been like — in the space of twenty-four hours, to lose two of your best friends, be betrayed by the other, and then have their child taken away from you forever. His heart twisted painfully.

"I'm sorry," he murmured, wishing there were more he could do. "For what it's worth... I think it would've been pretty cool, living with you. Better than Aunt Petunia."

The smallest smile managed to creep its way onto Lupin's face, though the hurt still shone in his golden eyes. "Thank you, Harry. That — that means a lot, coming from you."

Harry wondered what Lupin meant, that 'someone like him' wouldn't have been allowed to raise Harry, but he didn't dare ask. Not when Lupin looked like the wrong word would set him off crying.

"You should get going, Harry," the professor said eventually, straightening up and releasing Harry's shoulder. "You'll miss lunch, at this rate."

"Right, yeah," Harry murmured. "I'll see you later, Professor. And I'm glad you're feeling better."

Lupin smiled sadly, the light through the window highlighting the grey in his hair. “Thank you, Harry. It’s good to be back on my feet.”

.-. .

Deep down, Harry wished Ron and Hermione had gone home for Christmas. He felt awful for thinking it — they were his best friends, and he’d barely even seen them so far this term! — But so much had changed, and he was keeping so many things from them; the gap was getting harder and harder to bridge. If they were going home, he could just spend the whole break reading his books and practicing spells without any awkward questions. He was getting pretty good at that privacy charm, now.

Neville was going home, though, and he promised to talk to his gran about finding someone to test Harry’s Occlumency progress. Harry thought he was doing an alright job, but Neville was no Legilimens, and they couldn’t risk checking by letting Dumbledore root around in his brain.

He was a little more morose than he let on when they went to Hogsmeade the last weekend before Christmas break. Not because he wanted to go overly much; he just felt so cooped up in the castle. It was ridiculous — the last two years, he hadn’t even known about the option of going off the grounds. Now, he felt like he couldn’t survive without it.

Of course, it didn’t help that any time he so much as tried to leave the castle, someone was herding him right back inside. Harry couldn’t even go to quidditch practice unsupervised. He felt like he couldn’t breathe, he was so sick of being monitored. Part of him wanted Sirius Black to just attack him and get it over with.

Deciding to enjoy his time alone and work on some spells, Harry said goodbye to Ron and Hermione in the entrance hall and started the journey back up to Gryffindor Tower.

“Psst! Harry!” A freckled arm reached out, yanking him into a hidden space behind a tapestry. He stared at the twins, eyebrows raised.

“What’s the matter? Need an alibi for something?” he asked, eyeing them over as if he could tell what sort of prank they were about to pull.

“Nah, but thanks for the offer,” Fred said with a grin. “We just wanted to give you a bit of an early Christmas present.”

“Couldn’t stand to see you moping around by yourself!” George agreed. He thrust out a hand, showing Harry... a blank bit of old parchment.

“I don’t get it,” Harry said flatly. Both twins beamed.

“This, dear Harrikins, is the secret to our success,” they said in unison, clearly expecting him to be dazzled.

It still looked like a blank bit of old parchment.

Harry said as much, and George mock-swatted him on the arm. “Don’t be so insulting! It might hear you. Explain, Fred.”

The pair of them told Harry the story of the parchment’s discovery, finishing with Fred whipping his wand out and touching it to the parchment. “I solemnly swear that I am up to no good.”

All at once, the parchment exploded with life. Harry watched in awe as the lines of the map unfurled, revealing Hogwarts in its entirety.

“The Marauders’ Map,” he breathed, reading from the greeting at the top of the page. Moony, Wormtail, Padfoot and Prongs... why did that sound so familiar? “Who are they?”

“No idea,” Fred told him.

“Previous pranksters—“

“Masters of mischief long gone from these halls—“

“Absolute geniuses, mind—“

“The map shows every inch of the castle—“

“Every passage, every secret, every person—“

“Everything,” they finished in unison. “Look, there we are.” They pointed at the map, showing Harry three little dots labelled ‘Fred Weasley’, ‘George Weasley’, and ‘Harry Potter’.

“We’ve learned everything we know about the school from this map,” Fred said, voice filled with reverence.

“And now, we’re giving it to you,” George told him. “It’s time to pass on to the next generation.”

“Your need is greater than ours,” Fred agreed. “Not only can you use it to keep out of trouble on your little late night wanders—“

“It shows you all the secret passages into Hogsmeade!”

The twins gave him a run-down of all the options, and Harry grinned up at them incredulously.

“This is amazing,” he declared, watching their grins widen.

“We know,” they agreed.

“All you have to do to clear it is tap it and say Mischief Managed,” Fred instructed, doing just that. The parchment cleared quickly, becoming blank once more. George pushed it into Harry’s grasp.

"Use it well, little brother," he said mock-solemnly, winking. "We'll see you in Honeydukes."

"Thanks, guys." They both offered him extravagant bows, doffing imaginary top hats.

"Our pleasure, Heir Potter," they said cheekily, disappearing from the passageway before he could say anything. Harry looked down at the map, blank in his hands. He grinned.

Time to see what Hogsmeade was all about.

.-. .

He didn't look for Ron and Hermione when he slipped out of the Honeydukes cellar, covered by his invisibility cloak. He wasn't sure if he wanted to tell them about the map, yet. Ron would probably get jealous that the twins gave it to Harry and not him. Instead he just wandered, alone and invisible, thinking fondly of his time back in Diagon Alley. He could sort-of see what the fuss was about, but there wasn't anything truly remarkable there. He supposed just the freedom to go there without adults was enough.

He took a brief look in the Three Broomsticks, but it was far too crowded for him to sneak around invisible without getting bumped into. Besides, he couldn't exactly order a butterbeer. He saw Ron and Hermione in there, hands wrapped around their mugs, and smiled softly to himself. They seemed to be having fun.

He looked around the shops for a while, imagining what he might buy if he weren't hiding under his invisibility cloak. Perhaps he'd come back another time. Some of the things in Honeydukes did look delicious.

He was back in the castle before dinner, writing his Charms essay in the common room when Ron and Hermione returned, none the wiser to his little adventure. They practically ran towards him. Hermione's eyes were red, like she'd been crying. "We need to talk to you," Ron said gravely, dragging him over to a secluded corner of the common room. Harry looked at them, bewildered.

Quietly, Hermione explained to him the conversation they'd overheard in the Three Broomsticks, where Fudge and the teachers told Madam Rosmerta about Sirius Black and Peter Pettigrew. Harry scowled before he could help himself — what right did they have to be bandying private information about like that in the middle of the pub? — Then he remembered this was supposed to be brand new information to him, and made himself look horrified. It wasn't hard; he still was, every time he thought about Black too much.

"I'm sorry, Harry," Hermione murmured. "We had no idea."

"Yeah, well, neither did I," he muttered angrily. "I'm going upstairs."

He figured it was something the old, impulsive Harry Potter would do, stomping up the dormitory stairs and throwing himself down on his bed. He reached for his trunk, for the photo album Hagrid had given him, flipping it open to the photo of his parents' wedding. Sirius Black was there, happiness shining in his grey eyes, looking barely older than he had in his yearbook photo. Was he lost to Voldemort already, then? Did he know what he was planning to do?

Harry tore his eyes away, scanning the rest of the photo. In the background, hiding half out of sight, was Remus Lupin. His dress robes were a little worn at the elbows, but he was young and beaming, his dark blond hair neat and his face clean-shaven, a shallow cut healing across his cheekbone. He certainly had no idea what was coming.

He wondered if any of the other people in the picture were Peter Pettigrew. He vaguely remembered the boy's picture in the yearbook; chubby, mousy-haired, looking a little like he would jump at his own shadow. Harry remembered being surprised he was a Gryffindor, with that kind of fear in his eyes. That cowardly boy had stood up to Sirius, and paid the worst price for it.

The album fell shut with a loud noise, and Harry tugged his curtains closed with a flick of his wand, setting his privacy charm. He wasn't angry at Ron and Hermione. He wasn't sad about his parents, or angry at Sirius Black; they were all emotions he'd processed the first time he'd heard about it.

The main feeling twisting him up inside was the overwhelming sensation of guilt. That was one less secret to keep from his friends, but they still didn't know the truth of how he'd heard about it. They didn't know about the map.

The secrets were just piling up on top of each other, and Harry was dreading the day they all came crashing down.

. . . .

Remus knocked on the door, nudging it open and smiling a little at the scowl that greeted him. "I just got rid of the students, Lupin, and I was hoping to get at least a little peace and quiet. What do you want?"

Easing the door shut behind him, Remus strode towards Severus' desk, perching on the end of it and ignoring the glare it earned him. That had stopped working on him years ago. "What do you know about Harry's home life, Severus?"

Severus raised an eyebrow, unimpressed. "Potter? What does it matter. Albus sent him somewhere safe. Probably some squib family that turned him into a pampered little prince, filled his head with stories of the Boy-Who-Lived, making him think he's something special."

Honey-brown eyes stared incredulously. "You don't know Harry at all, do you?" Remus remarked, shaking his head. Pampered little prince... that didn't sound anything like the Harry he knew. "He's not James, Severus. Believe me. Yes, he has his moments, but...there's so much of Lily in that boy. It actually hurts me to see it sometimes." The way Harry had reached out to him almost immediately, desperate for some kind of connection to his parents, trying to cheer Remus up even when he'd just given the boy some of the worst news of his life. His determination not to let the dementors get the better of him.

Severus leaned back in his chair. It was clear from the look on his face that he had no idea what Remus was talking about. “Watch him,” Remus suggested. “Don’t think about James. Look for Lily, and you’ll see it. You’ll see it in spades. Merlin.” Having those green eyes fixed on him sometimes felt like he’d gone back in time. It was almost too much to bear.

“If you insist,” Severus droned. “What does it matter where he lives, anyway? Going to steal him away in the night?”

“Albus sent him to Petunia.” That got Severus’ attention. The Slytherin stiffened, his shoulders hunching the barest fraction just at the woman’s name.

“What?”

“Harry told me he lives with his Aunt Petunia and her family.” Harry had inadvertently admitted quite a bit more than that. Remus’ protective instincts roared when he thought too much about it.

“What in Merlin’s name was Albus thinking?” Severus said, eyes sharp. “Petunia? That woman hated everything to do with magic!”

“He didn’t know anything about his parents. Didn’t know about magic before his Hogwarts letter.” Remus swallowed harshly. “Severus, he said he didn’t even know his name until he was five years old. I don’t think he realised I heard him, but—imagine the sorts of things they must have called him instead. You knew Petunia better than I did, and her husband.”

“The worst example of muggles I can think of,” Severus agreed. He looked up, his face unguarded for once, his displeasure clear. “You’re sure? Albus took him to her?” Remus nodded.

On the other side of the desk, an inkwell shattered. “Lily must have been spinning in her grave for the last twelve years,” Severus growled, cleaning up the mess with a jab of his wand. “If she were here, she’d kill us both for never checking on him.”

“Albus never let me,” Remus supplied. He didn’t doubt that Severus had never tried. His hatred for James Potter was a strong, strong thing. “He said it was safer if no one magical went near him.”

“Of course he did,” Severus sneered. He met Remus’ gaze knowingly. “Keeping his precious golden boy nice and hidden away and downtrodden, starving for information—probably starving for food, too, by the look of him.”

“Ready for the day that Albus Dumbledore swoops in and takes him away from that awful place, showing him a world of magic and becoming his true saviour,” Remus finished grimly. “Severus, you don’t really think—“

“That Albus would manipulate a boy so young? If it benefited the greater good, I have no doubt he would.”

"But why??" Remus asked plaintively. "What does he have to gain from making Harry rely on him?"

Severus grimaced, glanced at his office door, then pulled up the left sleeve of his robe. Remus flinched. Last time he'd seen it, the Dark Mark had been vivid and black, an ugly mar on the pale skin. Now it was so faint it was barely even there unless you knew what to look for. The barest whisper of skull and snake. "If he were dead, it would be gone completely," he declared bluntly. "As you can see, that is not the case."

Remus felt the blood drain from his face as he met Severus' dark eyes. Deep down, behind that icy facade, he could see fear. "No..."

"The Dark Lord will one day return," Severus told him. "And I believe the Headmaster has plans for Potter when he does. Remind me to tell you what happened at the end of Potter's first year, sometime." He shoved his sleeve back down, shaking his head. "Petunia Evans. Salazar, it's a bloody miracle the boy made it to school alive. No wonder he has so little regard for his own safety."

Stomach turning to lead, Remus reached out and gripped Severus' hand with his own, surprised the Slytherin didn't automatically pull away. "We can't let that happen. Whatever Albus wants, whatever he's planning... we can't let him have Harry." Severus met his gaze, and Remus waited, wondering if he would have an ally in this. He'd had questions about some of Dumbledore's decisions in the past, but this... this was too far.

"I promised to protect the boy, for Lily's sake," Severus said eventually. "The afterlife would not be worth reaching if I failed that task."

Remus relaxed, leaning towards Severus for just a moment before he remembered he wasn't allowed to do that anymore. He let go of the man's hand. "Good," he murmured, gripping the edge of the desk to try and ground himself. "That's— good."

"Lupin... Remus," Severus said, sounding like the name caused him physical pain. "Are you well?"

"I'm fine," he insisted, not wanting to get into the specifics of how his heart was shredding itself inside his chest for so many reasons he could barely count them. "I think—I should go. It's late." He slid from the desk, taking an awkward step away from the seated man. "Thank you, Severus. I know we've had our differences, but... Harry needs all the help he can get. Thank you."

"Be careful, Remus," Severus called when Remus had one hand on doorknob. "Changing loyalties is a dangerous game, no matter which side you're on."

Remus grit his teeth. "I can handle it. Goodnight, Severus."

He'd have to handle it. For Harry.

.-. .

Wrapped up in the threads of so many lies and secrets, Harry had entirely forgotten about Buckbeak until he went with Ron and Hermione to visit Hagrid, only to find the man crying into his enormous teacup. The guilt piled higher in Harry's gut. He was being a terrible friend. Hell, the only reason they'd gone to Hagrid in the first place was that Ron and Hermione seemed to think he wanted to go hunting down Sirius Black. The old Harry probably would have, under that Compulsion curse. The new Harry had bigger things on his mind.

Still, he put in a good attempt at helping do the research to start putting a case together for Buckbeak. Ron lasted all of four hours in the library before he made an excuse and bailed out, while Harry stuck around for six. It wasn't the research that was the problem, or even the time spent with his nose in books — Hermione's preferred style of studying was a little... overwhelming for those around her. She was much better suited to independent research. Eventually, Harry got tired of her yanking the book out of his hands every time he said he might have something interesting, and just left her to it.

He didn't see much of his two best friends in the run-up to Christmas. Sure, they were around, and they hung out in the evenings in the common room. But honestly Harry couldn't remember the last time the three of them had had a proper conversation, especially not one that wasn't related to some disaster or another. Sometimes it felt like they only came together to solve problems. Whenever there was quiet time between the three of them, it would promptly get ruined by Crookshanks existing in Ron's presence and Ron going off on one about how the evil cat was out for blood. It was better for Harry to just... not.

Luckily, Professor Lupin had agreed to start Harry's Patronus lessons. Harry was practically vibrating with excitement the first time he approached Lupin's office, and his eyebrows rose at the enormous packing case sitting on the man's desk. It was rattling. "What's that?"

"Another boggart. It's the closest we'll get to a dementor without actually inviting one into the castle, and, well," Lupin said with a wry smile, "this is far easier to deal with."

Harry thought about having to face a real dementor, and his stomach turned over. Yes, the boggart was a much better idea.

He listened attentively as Lupin explained the Patronus charm to him, going over the incantation in his head. "Expecto Patronum," he murmured, wrapping his tongue around the sounds. "It just needs a happy memory?"

"The happiest one you can think of," Lupin confirmed. "When you think you've got one, give it a try."

Harry stood, lips pursed in thought. As tragic as it sounded, he didn't have an abundance of happy memories. He rolled a few through his mind — the moment Hagrid told him he was a wizard, maybe? No, that was mostly just confusion. His first Christmas at Hogwarts? That didn't feel right either.

Eventually, he settled on the first time he ever rode a broom. Simple, uncomplicated, breathless joy. He held the memory in his head, grasping his wand tight. "Expecto Patronum!"

Nothing happened.

He focused harder on the memory. “Expecto Patronum!”

A burst of silvery wisps shot out of the end of his wand, and Harry almost dropped it in shock. “Look! I did it! Sort of.” It wasn’t much, but it was a start.

“Well done, Harry!” Lupin enthused, his grin making him look so much like the young man in the back of the Potters’ wedding photo that Harry’s breath caught for a moment. “Are you ready to try it on a dementor?”

“Yeah,” Harry said, squaring his shoulders and facing the desk. “Let’s do it.” His blood roared in his ears, the happy memory at the forefront of his mind. Only... it wasn’t entirely there, the little voice in the back of his head reminding him that he was about to hear her again. His mother. The only time he ever heard her voice.

Lupin opened the packing case, and before Harry could truly brace himself the room went cold, a dark figure looming up above him. Harry’s hand shook as he tried to gather his happy thoughts. “Expecto Patronum!” The dementor grew closer, the world starting to go fuzzy around the edges for Harry, the scream building in the back of his mind. “Expecto Patronum!”

Lily, take Harry and go! It’s him!

It was a new voice. A male voice. White fog filled Harry’s vision. I’ll hold him off!

There was a crash, like a door bursting off its hinges.

“Harry! Harry, wake up!” The room was slowly warming. Harry became aware of two things; he was sprawled on the floor of the office, and Lupin was tapping him hard on the face.

“Harry! Merlin, are you alright? I’m so sorry, I should’ve eased you into it more, I—“

“It’s fine. I’m fine,” he croaked, sitting up and running a hand through his hair. He still felt shaky. Lupin thrust a chocolate frog towards him.

“I didn’t expect you to get it the first time. I would’ve been astounded if you had,” Lupin told him, still looking concerned.

“It’s getting worse,” Harry mumbled, thinking about what he’d just heard. That had to be... his father. James Potter’s voice. He’d never heard that before, either.

“If you want to stop, I completely understand—“

“No,” Harry insisted, biting the head off the chocolate frog. “I can do this. Let’s go again.”

Lupin made him wait until his hands no longer trembled, then helped him to his feet and moved towards the packing case. “You might want to try a happier memory,” he suggested. “It’s possible the one you were using wasn’t quite strong enough.”

Harry rolled through his limited stash of happy memories, finally choosing the memory of winning the house cup the year before. He nodded. “Do it.”

The lights dimmed and the room went cold, the now-familiar rattling breath echoing through the office. Harry clenched his jaw, forcing the memory to the forefront of his mind. “Expecto Patronum! EXPECTO PATRONUM!” This time, an enormous silver shadow burst from his wand, sending the dementor reeling back several steps. Harry stood wide-eyed, and Lupin jumped in with a sharp Riddikulus, sending the boggart back into the case in the shape of a silvery orb again. Harry’s patronus vanished. The lamps re-lit, and Harry sank into the chair behind him, panting.

“I did it!” He felt like he’d run a mile, but he was beaming, and Lupin returned the expression.

“Excellent, Harry! Fantastic first start.”

“Let’s go again,” Harry urged, and the professor sighed. “Please, sir. Just one more.”

Once again, Harry managed a silver shadow big enough to cut the dementor off before the screaming started. It probably wouldn’t help against a real dementor, but it was a start. Lupin insisted that was enough for the day.

“It’s a large amount of magic, I don’t want you overdoing it,” he warned. On the contrary, Harry’s magic felt better than it had in weeks, finally able to start levelling out the extra burst from his newly-freed core. But he couldn’t say that, so he allowed himself to be herded into the chair and given a large mug of hot chocolate. “I have to say, I’m impressed. You’re picking it up far quicker than I expected.”

Harry grinned, pride growing in his chest. “Thanks.” He sipped at his hot chocolate, relaxing as the warmth slowly flooded through his body. He glanced up at the man opposite him. “I heard my dad.” Lupin frowned at him, puzzled. “When the dementor... usually I just hear Mum, screaming for Voldemort to leave me alone. This time, before I passed out... Dad was there. He said he’d hold Voldemort off so Mum could take me and run away. I’d never heard his voice before.”

Lupin’s shoulders had tensed. “James would have done anything for you and Lily,” he said eventually. “Since we were kids, he always said he’d never love another soul as much as he loved Lily Evans. Then they had you.” He met Harry’s gaze, tears shining in his eyes. “You were his whole world, you know? You and your mother. He was never so happy as he was when he was with you.”

A lump rose in Harry’s throat, and he drank more hot chocolate. “What— what was it like? When they had me?” The only experience he had of a wizarding household was the Burrow, and that was an entirely unique brand of chaos.

Lupin seemed to understand what he was asking. “At first, James was terrified. He was an only child, see, and he hadn’t had much experience with babies. It took Lily ages to convince him to hold you without her supervising — he kept insisting he’d drop you.” He chuckled softly. “After about two weeks of him putting your nappies on backwards, he started getting the hang of it. Always said he was no good — told me the cat was actually watching you, he was just helping. But he doted on you, Harry. Every second since you were born. Even when times got dark, and things were difficult, there was so much love in that house.”

Harry’s heart ached when he tried to imagine it. “We had a cat?” he said eventually, not wanting to dwell too much on the thought of being loved. Of being happy.

“Sergeant Pepper,” Lupin told him, lips curling in a smile. “Lily’s cat, from when we were in school. He didn’t like James at first. Warmed up to him eventually. We knew Lily had finally given in to her feelings when Pep started leaving dead mice on James’ pillow. Well, once we realised it wasn’t Sirius doing it as a joke,” he added with a snort. A flash of pain crossed his features when he realised what he’d said. “No one found Pep when... after Voldemort. The house was in quite a state, we never knew if he’d run for it or...”

Harry hoped the cat had run. Hoped he’d found a new home, with a new family who loved him. That would make one of them, at least.

“So Dad wasn’t great with babies?” That made Lupin laugh.

“Not exactly, but he muddled through. Lily, on the other hand, was a natural from day one. Took to motherhood like a duck to water. She, uh, she said she wanted at least one more. Said that being an only child sounded lonely, and even an awful sibling was better than none at all.” Lupin set his mug down. “Sirius said the same, and he hated his brother. The rest of us were only children. Severus didn’t understand it, not after— well. Never mind.” His cheeks flushed, and he ducked his head.

“Why did Snape never tell me he knew my parents?” Harry blurted. That was the second time now that Lupin had talked about Snape and his parents like they knew each other better than just being classmates.

“Professor Snape, Harry,” Lupin corrected automatically. “He... James and Severus never got along. I think it’s safe to say they hated each other, actually,” he said wryly. “I’ll admit, James didn’t help the matter. He was always jealous that Lily and Severus were friends, so he... well, most of the pranks he and Sirius played were on Slytherins, and Severus in particular. I tried to stay out of it, but... things happen. They were my friends.”

Lupin sighed, rubbing at a scar on the bridge of his nose. “It’s a very long story, Harry, that isn’t entirely mine to share. Perhaps one day... Suffice to say, Professor Snape has a difficult relationship with his memory of your parents, and I don’t think you make it any easier. Not that it’s your fault,” he added hastily. “He’s just working under some... mistaken assumptions.”

Harry slowly finished off his hot chocolate, pondering the man’s words. He supposed he could understand it. If Snape and his dad hated each other when they were kids, and then Harry showed up looking exactly like James Potter; no wonder Snape didn’t like him. It was hardly fair, being judged against a man he didn’t even remember, but he could get it.

“You loved him, didn’t you,” he murmured, watching Lupin with a knowing gaze. The man choked on his hot chocolate, going wide-eyed. “My dad, I mean. And Mum. And... Sirius

Black, and Pettigrew.”

“I... yes. I loved them very, very much.” Lupin’s voice was hoarse. “They were my family.”

In that moment, a burning hatred flickered deep inside Harry — hatred for Voldemort, and everything he’d taken away from Harry. Everything he’d taken away from all the people he’d hurt. For Sirius Black, and all those like him, who ruined so many lives; shattered so many families.

He wouldn’t wish the dementors on his worst enemy, but Black deserved everything he got.

Chapter 6

Christmas morning started out much like it always did now that Harry was at Hogwarts — with Ron throwing a pillow at him to wake him up, shouting about presents. They were the only two left in their dorm, so there was no worry about keeping quiet.

It still left Harry a little gobsmacked to see a pile of presents that was just for him. This year's pile seemed even bigger than the last. Most of them were wrapped in the same festive paper as half the pile on Ron's bed, so Harry assumed they were from Mrs Weasley. He looked to the others, picking up a small square parcel wrapped in plain brown paper.

Harry-

I've had this for a while, I thought you might like it. Merry Christmas.

- Professor Lupin

Tearing into the paper, Harry sucked in a sharp breath at the framed picture in his hands. It was of his parents, sat in front of a huge fireplace, Christmas decorations in the background and a huge log — a Yule log — burning in the hearth. Lily had green tinsel braided in her hair and a baby in her arms; Harry, dressed in a onesie that made him look like a tiny reindeer, complete with antlers attached to the little hood. He was beaming up at his mother, a little tuft of black hair peeking out under the hood, his arms stretching out towards his father. James sat beside Lily, a sleek ginger cat cradled in his arms like a baby, a Santa hat perched jauntily on his head. They waved out at Harry, and every few seconds James would swoop in and press a firm kiss to Lily's cheek, making her blush.

The bottom of the gold frame was engraved with the words 'Harry's First Yule'.

It took a minute for Harry to remember how to breathe.

"You alright there, mate?" Ron asked, his mouth half-full of homemade nut brittle, shreds of wrapping paper scattered all around him. Harry shoved the picture under his pillow, offering a false grin.

"Yeah." He reached for the next present on auto-pilot, not wanting Ron to investigate further.

He was surprised to find a book, titled 'The Wizengamot And You: The Wizarding Legal System Explained'. There was a note attached to the front of it.

Hi Harry,

This is from both me and Gran. She said it's the best book out there for learning about all this sort of stuff. I hope it helps. Merry Christmas!

- Neville

And below that;

Dear Mr Potter,

I'm glad to hear from my grandson that you're finally learning about your place in our world. I have to say, it doesn't surprise me that it was kept from you until now.

I hope this book is of assistance; please don't hesitate to contact me if you have any further questions. Well met, and happy Yule.

Lady Augusta Longbottom

P.S. If you get the chance this summer, I would recommend going to Gringotts and checking your family vault for a book on traditions and magics specific to House Potter. Every family should have one. If you are in need of an adult to escort you, I would be happy to do so.

Again, Harry quickly hid the book and the note from Ron's curious gaze, but a smile tugged at his lips. He was glad now for the Herbology book he'd sent Neville, unsure if they were at the level of friendship to be exchanging Christmas gifts.

Those seemed to be the only unexpected gifts in the pile — at least, until he reached the long, narrow package at the very bottom. His heart clenched at the telltale shape. “Mate!” Ron breathed, barging over and reaching to tear the wrapping paper.

A Firebolt.

This Christmas was just full of surprises.

.-.-.-.

With his spirits high from his pile of gifts, Harry was caught almost entirely off-guard as his name was called. He was having a rare moment alone — with Hermione in the library and Ron kidnapped by the twins — and enjoying taking his time wandering down to Christmas lunch, turning his thoughts over in his mind. At least, until he was stopped, and his heart sank.

“Harry, my boy!” Dumbledore’s fond call rang through the stone corridor. Harry froze, turning on his heel. The headmaster was dressed in festive robes and smiling widely, oblivious to the nausea rolling in his student’s stomach.

Don't look him in the eye, Harry thought to himself desperately, plastering a smile on his face and fixing his gaze somewhere over Dumbledore's left shoulder. “Hello, sir!” he greeted cheerfully, trying to think how he might have acted before the compulsion was removed. Trusting, impulsive, thoughtless. He could do that. Maybe.

“Not spending the day with your friends?” Dumbledore asked, brows furrowing. Harry shrugged.

“Hermione’s finishing an essay. Ron’s with his siblings, I didn’t want to interrupt.”

The reminder of Harry's lack of family turned the headmaster's face sad and pitying in a way that made Harry itch with anger. Perhaps the old man was aiming for empathy, but he missed by a mile. "Ah, of course. Well, you should still be careful, my boy — these days are not the best to be spending time alone. It is hard to protect you if we don't know where you are." His voice was gently scolding, and Harry resisted the urge to roll his eyes. Did he really think Sirius Black would try anything in the middle of the day?

"I'm sorry, sir," he said instead, plastering a contrite frown on his face. "I suppose I didn't think about that. I was just on my way to the great hall for lunch."

"Not to worry, not to worry; I found you, after all," Dumbledore replied with a chuckle. He began to walk, gesturing for Harry to accompany him. "I hear you've been keeping yourself busy over the holidays, my boy. The Patronus charm is a rather tricky bit of magic — I'm quite impressed to see you attempting it. I must admit, I didn't expect for Professor Lupin to offer; with his health the way he is, he tends to value the time he has to rest."

The old wizard's face was friendly, and Harry knew he would've fallen for it easily six months ago. His stomach churned again — did Dumbledore disapprove of Harry learning the charm? Why? Surely any defence he had against dementors was a good thing!

"I — I told him what I hear when a dementor comes close," Harry admitted, carefully choosing his words. He didn't want Dumbledore to think he was hiding anything. "It's... I told him I couldn't listen to my mum dying over and over. Begged him to teach me." He tried not to meet twinkling blue eyes as they surveyed him, trying to clear his mind. "He — he said he was feeling alright, but if he's not well — if I should stop — I... I suppose I can handle it, sir." Poor, brave, orphan Harry Potter. Exactly what far too many people expected to see, but easy enough to give it to them when it suited him.

"Of course not, dear boy. If Professor Lupin believes he is well enough to teach you, then by all means, learn what you can. I can only imagine how difficult it must be to suffer through such a thing." Dumbledore paused, as if in thought. "I suppose mentioning your mother's death would make him keen to see you avoid such heartbreak."

Harry knew what the man was fishing for, and stifled a scowl behind brows furrowed in confusion. "Sir, I don't understand?"

"Did the professor not tell you that he and your parents went to school together?" Dumbledore sounded genuinely surprised. Internally, Harry smirked. Let him think that Harry was still in the dark, oblivious to the family he'd been kept from all this years. Let him think Harry didn't know the truth about Sirius Black.

"He said he knew them," Harry replied. "He never said... were they friends?"

"Indeed they were, my boy," Dumbledore told him. For the briefest moment, Harry thought he saw a pleased look flash across the headmaster's features. "They were all in Gryffindor together. But if Professor Lupin has not mentioned it, perhaps it's best not to bring it up. Grief can do awful things to a man, Harry. You won't want to disturb it once it's settled." He sounded sad, shaking his head with a small sigh.

Beside him, Harry nodded along obediently, while inside he seethed. Imagine if he had never broken the compulsion; he would have allowed Dumbledore to lead him by the nose away from Remus Lupin and all that he entailed — all the memories he could share with Harry, all the support he could offer, everything.

Dumbledore wanted Harry alone. He wanted him with no one to rely on — save those Dumbledore had picked himself. The thought made him uneasy; who in his life could he trust, and who was only there to be another player in the headmaster's game?

More importantly, why? What was so special about Harry, that the man had started playing the game so early in his life?

.-.-.-.

Scowling to himself, Severus started the journey back to his quarters, shaking his head at Sybil Trelawney's ridiculous declaration. Why Albus insisted he attend the small Christmas lunch, Severus didn't know; he would have much preferred dining in his own rooms, alone. The only person in the Great Hall he even remotely enjoyed the company of was Minerva. Especially with Lupin—

He shut that thought down before it could finish itself. He refused to think about Remus bloody Lupin at Christmas. It was bad enough remembering the sad, regretful look in those honey-brown eyes when he'd realised the full moon was Christmas Eve night, and he'd be missing out on all the festivities.

Severus' scowl deepened.

Muttering the password to his private quarters, he slunk inside and shed his cloak, tossing it to hang itself on the hook in the wall. All he wanted for Christmas was a glass of brandy, a good book, and at least twelve hours without having to see any students, or Albus Dumbledore. The old headmaster was even further from Severus' good graces than he had been at the start of the year.

The embrace of his preferred armchair was a welcome one, and Severus closed his eyes for a moment, letting out a long breath. When he opened them, he paused. There, on his coffee table, was a brown paper wrapped package. It definitely hadn't been there when he'd left for lunch.

He reached for it with trepidation, knowing without needing to look where it had come from. That sodding wolf.

Sure enough, the handwriting across the top was familiar.

Severus,

I know you weren't expecting anything. I highly doubt you've got me anything. Don't worry — I just couldn't resist.

Perhaps we could have a drink when I'm feeling better. I'm going to need help working through the bottle of Glenfiddich Minerva will undoubtedly gift me.

I'm not asking for things to be how they were. I'm just asking for us to move forward.

Merry Christmas,

Remus

Severus almost tossed the whole thing in the fire without opening it, but he couldn't bring himself to do so. Carefully undoing the Spellotape holding it together, he peeled off the paper, expecting some potions book or perhaps something Dark Arts related. It was nothing of the sort.

It was a wooden puzzle box. Muggle in origin, by the looks of it. Interlocking pieces of dark stained wood, intricately carved and fit together in a way that Severus could tell the solution would take time.

He thought about a shelf, in a bedroom in a muggle house he hadn't visited in years, where a small collection of similar puzzle boxes resided, no doubt covered in dust by now. A collection that had begun when a nine year-old redheaded girl eagerly gifted him one for his birthday, gushing about the trip to Turkey she'd taken with her family, and how she'd seen the box and just had to get it for him.

Long fingers brushed carefully over the wood, his brain already beginning to look for next possible moves, keen to see if there was anything inside the box. From Lupin, it could be anything. Severus didn't know what he was hoping for.

Perhaps the box would be better off empty.

Cursing under his breath, Severus screwed the paper up into a ball, throwing it into the fire, note and all. The puzzle box remained in his lap, taunting him.

Move forward. He scoffed. That was easier said than done. They'd barely been able to figure things out the first time around, when they were young and naive and so bloody hopeful — at least, Remus was hopeful. Thinking about the werewolf back then made a sharp ache pierce Severus' ribcage.

Remus was right. They certainly couldn't go back to how things were. Everything had changed far, far too much for that.

He shook his head, tearing his gaze away from the puzzle box and staring into the flames as they turned the wrapping paper to ash. He'd been well on his way to fucking things up for good, before Merlin only knew why the idiot wolf was still trying.

Moving forward. Severus wondered what that would look like.

He cursed the corner of his shrivelled up heart that was desperate to find out.

.-.-.-

Ron was itching for a fight.

That much was obvious to Harry. Between his worry for Scabbers and his anger at Hermione turning the Firebolt in to McGonagall, Ron was a tightly wound ball of rage that would explode at any moment. Harry himself wasn't even mad about the Firebolt; he, too, was suspicious of its origin. He just hoped he could have it back before the match against Ravenclaw.

"Parkinson's looking at you funny," Ron muttered as the two of them walked to the greenhouses for Herbology. Harry glanced over his shoulder — Pansy Parkinson was indeed looking at him, but it was more calculating than anything, arm in arm with an oblivious Tracy Davis. Harry thought back to his odd meeting with Zabini and Greengrass, before Christmas. Perhaps word was spreading further. Or maybe Malfoy had said something, after one of their mostly-accidental late-night meetings.

"She's not doing anything, Ron," Harry assured, grabbing Ron's elbow and tugging him forward, away from the Slytherins. "It's fine." If Ron was going to pick a fight, he didn't want to be part of it.

"I swear, Malfoy hasn't given us a good reason to hex him in ages," Ron groused. "It's like you don't even exist to him anymore."

"Maybe he feels guilty about Buckbeak." Malfoy wasn't completely ignoring Harry in public these days, but he wasn't quite as eager to mock him as he used to be. Harry was honestly surprised this was the first time Ron was bringing it up.

"Doubt it. Git's probably just waiting til after the trial so he can rub it in our faces some more. Oh, look, there's Zabini!"

"Leave him alone, Ron," Harry said with a scowl, blocking him from going after the tall Slytherin.

"What's with you, lately?" Ron asked, a dark look on his freckled face. "You getting chummy with the Slytherins or something? You never get back at them anymore."

"Maybe I've just got bigger things to worry about than the Slytherins." The Slytherins weren't really bothering him anymore, he had no reason to be angry with them. Besides, the whole house rivalry thing had sort of lost its shine. Sirius Black was a Gryffindor, after all. Houses clearly didn't mean much.

"That doesn't mean you can just let them go around acting like they own the school!"

"Oh, grow up, Ron," Harry snapped before he could help himself. The redhead recoiled, shocked, before a venomous look crept in. "I didn't mean it like that," Harry hastened to soothe his friend. "I just... it all feels a bit petty, doesn't it? To be going after someone just because they're in a different house. It's stupid."

"Petty and stupid, am I?" Ron asked biting. "You've changed, Harry. I figured it was just about Black, but you're weird this year. Always off by yourself, doing Merlin knows what."

Making friends with Slytherins. I'm not sure I like it.”

Before Harry could say anything more, Ron ripped his arm out of the green-eyed boy's grasp and stalked off to the greenhouses, leaving Harry alone in the courtyard. Suddenly, Hermione appeared at his side. “What was all that about?” She seemed a little breathless, which was odd, because they'd just come from Transfiguration and it wasn't that far a walk.

“Nothing. Ron being a git,” Harry muttered, shoving his hands in his pockets and carrying on his way. He knew the redhead didn't really mean it — he just wanted to take his anger out on someone — but it still made the ever-present guilt rise like a snake, twisting in his belly. He really had been neglecting his friend this year. He just... the older he got, the more he found Ron's personality hard to deal with. Especially after getting used to spending more time around people like Neville, and even Malfoy.

Ron was his first friend at Hogwarts, and he'd always be grateful for that. But did that make him the best choice?

.-. .

After that argument, Ron avoided Harry just as much as he was already avoiding Hermione.

“I'm sure he doesn't mean it,” Neville said one day, after Ron had grabbed him to partner up in Potions to avoid having to work with either Harry or Hermione. The result was a melted cauldron, and a scorch mark on the dungeon ceiling. Snape had not been impressed. “He's just got a quick temper.”

“Yeah, well maybe I'm sick of it,” Harry replied. “I keep feeling awful about having all these secrets, but how am I supposed to trust him when the wrong word sets him off? And the way he talks about the Slytherins, like they're not even people...”

“They have been pretty awful to you in the past, Harry,” Neville pointed out cautiously. “Malfoy especially. Most of them are alright, yeah, but there are some.”

“Oh, there are definitely some Slytherins that would happily see me dead,” Harry agreed. “But I don't think Malfoy's one of them. Not anymore. Things have been different, this year.” Neville knew that Malfoy knew about Harry being the Potter heir. He didn't know that Malfoy had started being actually civil to him, if not outright friendly, when it was just the two of them around. It wasn't often they crossed paths in the middle of the night, but it was frequent enough to possibly be considered a habit. One that Harry wasn't entirely sure he wanted to break.

Harry told him. Neville's eyebrows shot up to his hairline. “Malfoy? Really?”

“He's actually alright, when he doesn't have Crabbe and Goyle breathing down his neck,” Harry confided. The other Gryffindor boy frowned.

“But he's still being a prat in classes. And the whole Buckbeak thing.” Everyone in the school knew that Lucius Malfoy was trying to get Buckbeak killed.

"That's more his dad than him. I think he actually sort-of feels bad about it. And yeah, he's a prat, but he's not as bad as he was before. People would start asking questions if he was suddenly nice to me." Snape might have a heart attack. Ron, too, for that matter. And Merlin only knew what would happen if word got back to Lucius Malfoy that his son was being friendly to the Boy-Who-Lived.

"I s'pose," Neville said with a shrug.

Harry gave the password to the Fat Lady, and the two of them stepped into the common room. Harry came up short when he saw Hermione and McGonagall there, the older woman holding—"My Firebolt!" He looked up hopefully. "Does this mean I can have it back?"

"You've got a very good friend, somewhere," McGonagall declared. "We've done everything we can think of, and there doesn't seem to be anything wrong with it." She held it out, and Harry took it with reverent hands. "I daresay you'll need to get the feel of it before Saturday's match. Just don't go out flying after dark without a professor. And, Potter—" She smirked, meeting his eyes. "Make sure you win, won't you? It's been far too long since I've had the Quidditch Cup sitting in my office."

Harry beamed at her. "I'll try my best. Thanks, Professor." He turned to the dark-skinned girl at the woman's side. "Thanks for looking out for me, Hermione," he added. His friend had been beating herself up over the broom since Ron had exploded on her about it, but Harry didn't blame her one bit.

"It's what I'm here for." She grinned back at him. "I'm glad it turned out alright."

As soon as McGonagall left, a crowd started gathering around Harry, his housemates clamouring to get a closer look at the international-standard broom. Harry let them, keeping a careful eye out to make sure no one damaged it. It would be just his luck to get it back only for some careless Gryffindor to break it.

"You got it back!" Ron shoved his way through the crowd, squeezing in at Harry's side like he'd forgotten he was mad at the bespectacled boy. "See, told you there was nothing wrong with it!" This was said smugly to Hermione, who huffed.

"There could've been. Aren't you glad that we know now?"

Ron rolled his eyes. "Can I ride it, Harry? Just for a bit? I'll be really careful."

"Maybe tomorrow. It's too dark now. I should go put it away." Ron's hands clamped around the broom.

"I'll take it. I've got to give Scabbers his rat tonic, anyway. I'll be right back." Before Harry could argue, he was off up the stairs, broom in hand.

"Well," Hermione muttered, glancing first at Harry, then Neville. "Now you've got your expensive broomstick back, we're his best friends again, I suppose." There was a bitterness to her voice that made Harry wince. "Hopefully we can put all this behind us, now. Honestly, he's giving me whiplash this year; I can never keep track of whether he likes me or not."

Neville snorted. He opened his mouth to say something, but was cut off by a strangled yell from up in the boys' dormitory tower. The whole common room went silent. Harry flicked his wand free of its holster, tensing.

There were hurried footsteps, then Ron burst into view, dragging a bedsheets in his wake. "LOOK!" he roared, stalking straight for Hermione, pointing at her with the fist that held the bedsheets. "LOOK!"

"Ron, what—?"

"SCABBERS!" Ron yelled, shaking the sheet in her face. "THERE'S BLOOD ON THE SHEETS, AND HE'S GONE!" Harry looked closer, his heart sinking at the small, rust-red stain on the fabric. "YOU KNOW WHAT ELSE WAS THERE? THIS!" Ron thrust out his other hand, opening it to show a handful of long, ginger cat hairs. "YOUR BLOODY CAT KILLED HIM!"

"Ron, I'm sure he's just missing, he's probably hiding under one of the beds," Hermione started. Ron took an angry step forward.

"Yeah, bleeding to death!" he spat. The rest of the Gryffindors, realising that it wasn't another Sirius Black attack but actually just Ron being dramatic, promptly went back to their previous business. Harry shared an uneasy look with Neville.

"I'm sorry, Ron!" Hermione actually had tears in her eyes, but Ron was red-faced with fury and didn't seem to care. "Cats chase rats, I can't keep him locked in my room all the time! You don't even know he was in there, those hairs could've been there from Christmas!"

"You never should've bought that bloody menace in the first place! Tell her, Harry!"

"I'm staying out of this," Harry insisted, shaking his head. "I've got homework to do." He turned away, beckoning Neville to follow with a jerk of his head, ignoring Ron yelling after him. He wasn't going to start taking sides, even if Scabbers was really dead. He was an old rat, it would've happened eventually.

"So much for all being friends again," he muttered with a glance to Neville, who grimaced apologetically.

At least he had a broom now. That was one problem sorted.

.-. .

Even a ride on Harry's Firebolt after quidditch practice couldn't cheer Ron up. He was taking the loss of Scabbers hard, and outright refusing to talk to Hermione unless it was to argue with her. It was a toss up on any given day whether he'd speak to Harry, either, but the Firebolt seemed to be the deciding factor. Up until they saw Crookshanks in the grass, the cat almost giving Harry a heart attack. He could've sworn it was the Grim again. He wished he'd never taken bloody Divination.

Still, Ron's bad mood couldn't dampen Harry's spirits after the win against Ravenclaw. He felt like he was walking on air — he had one of the best brooms in the world, he'd caught the snitch, and he'd produced a decent Patronus. Even if the dementors hadn't been real.

His heart did a funny sort of squeezing feeling when he thought about what Malfoy had done. He'd thought things were getting better between them. Was he just so desperate to win the Quidditch Cup that he'd sabotage Harry?

The party in the Gryffindor common room raged for hours, especially once the twins brought back their Honeydukes haul, winking at Harry when they entered the common room with arms full of sweets and butterbeer. Harry let them drag him into the celebration, their arms flung around his shoulders and beaming grins on their faces. Even Ron was having a good time — though he was pointedly not looking at the corner of the common room, where Hermione had her nose buried in her Muggle Studies book, her hair getting increasingly more wild as she tugged on it anxiously. Harry had already tried to get her to join the party, but she wasn't having any of it. Apparently, the only reason she wasn't up in her dorm was that Fay Dunbar and Sophie Roper were having some sort of boy-related crisis up there. Considering that pair of her dorm mates had even less patience for Hermione than Parvati and Lavender, Harry didn't blame her.

Eventually, it all got a bit much for Harry. While the others were distracted by the twins letting off some Filibuster's Fireworks, Harry slipped out of the portrait hole, heading off down the corridor. He didn't have a destination in mind, but his feet seemed to be taking him somewhere regardless. He wasn't entirely surprised when he rounded a corner to see a familiar blond head.

"Shouldn't you be celebrating?" Malfoy asked as Harry approached. He reached out, dusting a bit of red and gold confetti off of Harry's shoulder. "Surely the party isn't over already."

"Needed some air. It's loud in there," Harry replied. He went over to the window ledge, sitting on it and staring out at the darkening grounds. "Why'd you do it? Pretend to be dementors?"

"It was Pansy's idea," Malfoy replied with a faint grimace. "She thought it would be funny. I thought it would be good practice of that spell Lupin's teaching you." He edged closer, but didn't sit on the ledge beside Harry, leaning against the wall instead. "People are starting to ask questions. Questions that might get back to my father. The excuse of my arm hurting only worked for so long," he added dryly.

Harry thought back to his conversation with Neville the other day. Of course; he was being stupid. Malfoy had to keep up appearances. "Your father wants you to pick fights with me?"

"My father wants me to act like a proper Slytherin," Malfoy corrected. "Including showing I'm better than Gryffindors. Especially Golden Boy Gryffindors." The nickname was almost fond, and Harry's lips twitched.

"I suppose I can toss a few spells your way between classes," he replied magnanimously. "Ron keeps telling me I'm being too nice to Slytherins these days."

"Appearances must be upheld," Malfoy agreed. Harry's mind flashed back to the terrified look on the blond's face all those months ago in the hospital wing, when he'd admitted what the dementors made him see. He was starting to think maybe Malfoy had more on the line than Harry himself did.

Slowly, Harry reached out a hand, looking into silver-grey eyes. "No one needs to know about this, though. Not in private." He tilted his head, lips curving in a smile, remembering two boys; smaller, younger, entirely oblivious to the truth of the other.

Malfoy hesitantly extended his own hand, but his grip was firm when his fingers curled around Harry's. "Draco Malfoy," he said, as if introducing himself for the first time. "It's a pleasure to meet you."

"Harry Potter," he returned, grinning. "I think we're going to be great friends, Draco Malfoy." Letting go of the other boy's hand, Harry glanced at his watch. "Speaking of appearances, I should get back to the party before someone notices I'm gone." He got to his feet, stifling a sigh. If only he could stay in the quiet with Malfoy a little longer. "Hey, can we start doing this on purpose?"

Malfoy stared at him blankly. "Are you saying you just befriended me by accident?"

"No," Harry snorted, rolling his eyes. "I meant meeting up. Instead of just randomly bumping into each other. We'd have to be careful, obviously, but... I feel like a Slytherin perspective to all this heir stuff is exactly what I need. No one ever taught me how to be a pureblood." And if he wanted the excuse to spend more time with his new friend, well, Malfoy didn't have to know that.

"I suppose. Someone has to make sure you don't embarrass yourself once you start representing your houses," Malfoy replied drily. Harry read between the lines, and grinned.

"Great. I'll, uh, see you around. Draco."

The blond blinked at him, taken-aback. A small, reluctant smile flittered across his face. "See you, Harry. Good luck with all your adoring lions."

Harry went back to Gryffindor tower with a spring in his step and a smile on his face, that couldn't be dragged down even when Ron started making snide remarks about Hermione.

.....

Remus watched the flames in his fireplace fade from green back to orange, as Professor McGonagall bid him a harried goodnight. The entire castle had been searched, and there was no sign of him. Whatever had happened in the Gryffindor common room, Sirius was gone.

His hands shook. His cup of tea had long gone cold, and he heated it back up with a wave of his wand, hoping it might calm his nerves. His eyes strayed to the door, wondering if Severus was going to come bursting in, accusing him of helping Sirius break into the castle. Remus honestly wouldn't blame him if he did.

Sometimes it felt like he was as good as helping, just by not saying anything. There was no doubt in his mind that Sirius was hiding out in his animagus form. If Remus told someone about it, they'd probably catch him within the week.

But he couldn't bring himself to do it.

Deep down, in his heart, his pack instinct was screaming that Sirius would never, could never, hurt Harry. Even after tonight —standing over Ron Weasley with a knife, what the hell was Sirius thinking?? — he had to believe there was some other explanation.

Reaching for the photo album on the coffee table, Remus flicked it open to the page he'd spent more than a few nights looking at since the week before Christmas, when he'd unearthed all his old photos to find the one for Harry. This photo was from the same day.

Arms wrapped around each other and beaming smiles on their faces, the four Marauders looked up at him, all wearing festive jumpers and laughing. Merlin, they'd been so young. He watched as photo-Sirius ruffled photo-Remus' hair, while photo-James blew a kiss to Lily, who was the one behind the camera, and photo-Peter jumped as the cat brushed between his legs. In the corner of the photo, you could see the moses basket where baby Harry slept peacefully, little reindeer antlers peeking over the edge. James had been so proud of himself for finding that onesie.

Remus could remember that day like it was yesterday. Lily and James' first Yule in the new house, the first — and only — with the baby. They'd thought it was the best thing ever, starting their own family traditions — the second generation of Marauders. It had driven Lily nuts to hear her son referred to as such, but she'd had a smile on her face nonetheless. James had good-naturedly pestered the rest of them about settling down and making some playmates for little Harry, insisting he couldn't carry their legacy entirely on his own back. Sirius had laughed and promised he was in no rush to have kids, but he'd treat Prongs' like his own. Peter had blushed and stuttered and made some mention of a date he was going on in the new year. Remus had pretended not to hear Lily dropping hints about a certain Slytherin; they'd had a fight a while before that Christmas. It had been months before they'd spoken again. Again, Lily's doing. No wonder he was a mess without her.

His gaze kept drawing back to those familiar grey eyes, shining with so much life and love and joy. He still didn't understand how everything could go so wrong. Maybe he never would.

"Why, Padfoot?" he murmured to the photo, a question he'd asked thousands of times in the last twelve years. "You could've had everything. We could've had everything." Even with Voldemort's growing power, they still had so much hope in that little family of theirs. Now, it was all gone. Except Harry. The only hope he had left, the shining light in the darkness. He couldn't believe Sirius capable of snuffing that light out.

Maybe he was fooling himself. Time would tell.

.-.-.-

When the letter from Hagrid arrived at breakfast, a few days after Black broke into the tower, Harry knew something was up. The way it was addressed to just the two of them, not Hermione...

With a sinking realisation, Harry checked the calendar. Buckbeak's trial was at the end of the week. He had completely forgotten about his promise to help with the research; and from the look on Ron's face when Harry mentioned it to him on the way down to meet Hagrid at the entrance hall, so had he.

"We're really sorry, Hagrid," Harry said once they were inside the cabin. Buckbeak was curled up in the corner, snuffling at what looked like half a dead stoat. "We should've been helping more with Buckbeak's case. We've just been so busy lately—"

"I'm not angry abou' that," Hagrid assured, pouring them tea and offering a plate of Bath buns, which neither boy touched. "Yeh've had a lot on yer plate, practisin' quidditch all hours o' the day an' night. I wanted to talk t' yeh both about Hermione."

"What about her?" Ron asked, a scowl coming to his face at the name. He still wasn't over Scabbers' assumed death.

"She's bin down 'ere a lot since Christmas, helpin' with Buckbeak an' all. Cried a fair few times — she's goin' through a bit of a rough time at the minute. Bit off more than she can chew, I think, with all those classes o' hers. But more'n that, I think she's lonely. I've barely seen the three o' you together these days."

Harry winced, glancing at Ron.

"If she'd just get rid of that bloody cat, I'd speak to her again!" he insisted. "But she won't hear a word against it!"

"Ah, well, people can be a bit stupid abou' their pets," Hagrid said, looking over at Buckbeak with sad eyes. "I jus' thought yer friendship was worth more than rats, or broomsticks," he added with a glance to Harry.

"I had no problem with her handing the Firebolt to McGonagall!" he said defensively. "I'd happily spend more time with Hermione, but I can never bloody find her. It's like you said, she's taking a million classes at once. And I'm at quidditch every free hour I've got." He knew he was making excuses, but he didn't want Hagrid to think he was purposefully ignoring Hermione, or taking Ron's side. He wasn't spending much time with Ron lately, either. "We'll talk to her, Hagrid, I promise." He elbowed Ron in the side until the redhead nodded, though he didn't look happy about it.

They spent the rest of their visit discussing Gryffindor's chances at the Quidditch Cup, and when they made their way back up to the castle, they found a cluster of students around the notice board in the Gryffindor common room. "Hogsmeade, next weekend. Brilliant! Oh, sorry Harry," he added belatedly. Harry bit his lip. He still hadn't told Ron and Hermione about the map yet. Maybe it was time to start mending some bridges.

Harry nudged Ron over towards Hermione. "Can I talk to you two for a minute? Privately?"

Ron scowled at Hermione, but let Harry move them to a secluded corner. He put up his privacy ward. “Don’t get mad at me,” he started, reaching into his bag and pulling out the map. “A little bit ago, the twins gave me this.”

He explained the map, not letting on exactly how long he’d had it. Ron beamed at him when he realised what it meant. “You can come to Hogsmeade with us! Brilliant! Mate, you’re gonna love Zonko’s—“

“This is really dangerous, Harry! If you get caught in Hogsmeade — if Sirius Black catches you—“

“Lighten up, Hermione!” Ron cut in with a roll of his eyes. “Black’s hardly gonna come after him in the middle of a crowd of students, is he?”

“How can you say that, after what he almost did to you?” Hermione hissed. “You should stay in the castle, Harry.”

“Why, it’s not like it’s any safer,” Harry pointed out. “Black’s already broken in here twice.”

That took a little of the wind out of Hermione’s sails, but she still didn’t look happy. “If you had any sense, you’d give that map to McGonagall.”

“Are you mental? This thing is genius! I can’t believe Fred and George never told me about it.” A dark look briefly crossed Ron’s face, but it faded in favour of telling Harry all about Zonko’s and how great it was. Hermione huffed, gathering her books and stomping back to her previous table, where her half-finished essay awaited. “So you’ll come, then?” Ron asked eagerly.

“Yeah. But I’m taking my invisibility cloak.”

No need to go borrowing trouble.

Chapter 7

That Saturday morning, Hermione kept shooting Harry suspicious looks across the table at breakfast. “I know what you’re planning,” she muttered. Harry grinned at her.

“It’ll be fine, Hermione. Trust me.” Maybe a little rule-breaking as a trio was just what Harry needed to stop feeling out-of-sorts. In the last few months, things had changed so much. Mostly for the better, but it was overwhelming at times. Some good old-fashioned mischief was just what the doctor ordered.

Harry pretended to see Ron and Hermione off at the Entrance Hall, then made his way towards the third floor, Marauder’s Map in his pocket. As he reached the statue of the one-eyed witch, he checked the map quickly, cursing under his breath at the small dot labelled ‘Neville Longbottom’ rapidly approaching.

“Hiya Harry!” Neville greeted cheerfully. “I forgot you weren’t going to Hogsmeade. Fancy a game of Exploding Snap?”

“Sorry, Neville,” Harry said, keeping his voice casual. “I’ve, uh, got some work to do.” He gave the other boy a pointed look, and Neville’s mouth made an ‘o’ of understanding.

“Did you want any help with it?” Neville asked quietly. Harry made to reply, but they were interrupted by sharp footsteps approaching. Neville gasped, shuffling behind Harry.

“Potter. Longbottom,” Snape greeted, staring Harry down with suspicion. “What are you two doing here? An odd place to meet.”

Harry refused to let his eyes drift to the one-eyed witch statue, even when Snape’s did.
“We’re not meeting here. We just— met here.”

“Then I suggest the two of you return to Gryffindor tower, where you belong,” Snape drawled, running his hand over the statue. Harry held his breath.

“Right. We’ll, uh, do that, sir.” The two of them left, and Harry told Neville he was going to the library, only to double back as soon as he saw the dot labelled ‘Severus Snape’ securely in his office.

“Dissendium,” he whispered, tapping the witch’s hump and climbing in as soon as it opened. He was running late.

..

Hermione wasn’t with Ron when Harry found him. It was clearly too much to ask for the two of them to make up, even after Hagrid spoke to them. Harry was starting to regret going — all he was doing was following Ron around, letting the redhead show him all the things he’d seen when he’d visited by himself before Christmas, when Ron didn’t know about the map.

Exploding Snap with Neville would've been more fun. At least Harry got Ron to buy him some stuff at Honeydukes, slipping him money from beneath the cloak.

Ron led the way up towards the Shrieking Shack, telling Harry all about the rumours of it being haunted, when he heard a voice from the other side of the hill. As the voice drew closer, Harry's stomach sank. "Father had to go to the hearing, of course, to tell them about my arm." It was Draco, flanked by Crabbe and Goyle, laughing over Hagrid and Buckbeak. It sent a sharp pain through Harry's ribs, but he shook it off. Draco had made it pretty clear that those two were as much his babysitters as his bodyguards, keeping an eye on Draco and reporting back to their fathers, who would turn to Draco's father if he didn't like what he heard. They weren't as dumb as they looked.

"What are you doing, Weasley?" Draco's voice cut through Harry's thoughts, and he saw Ron's hands clench into fists at his sides. Draco looked up at the shack. "Bet you'd love to live here, wouldn't you? Practically a palace compared to that hovel you live in now." Crabbe and Goyle both laughed, and Harry had to grab the back of Ron's robes to stop him from charging at Draco.

"Leave him to me," he hissed under his breath. Ron would never forgive him if he didn't take the opportunity. Besides, Draco was being a bit of a prick. Even if it was an act.

Sneaking off to the side, he flicked his wand from his holster, levitating a particularly gross patch of mud up. SPLAT!

It slammed into the back of Draco's robes, covering all three Slytherins in foul-smelling muck. Draco yelped. "What was that?"

SPLAT!

Harry sent another ball of mud flying from the other side, hitting Goyle clean in the face. "Who's there?" Crabbe called, whipping around with his wand in his hand. He started lumbering forward, half-blinded by mud, and Harry stuck a foot out to trip him as he passed. The enormous Slytherin went crashing to the ground — and on the way down, his foot caught on the corner of Harry's cloak.

Suddenly, his head was exposed, and all three Slytherins and Ron were staring at him with varying degrees of fury and horror. Harry stumbled back, quickly pulling the hood back up, and without saying anything to Ron he sprinted back towards Honeydukes.

If it had just been Draco, Harry wouldn't have worried, but Crabbe and Goyle saw him too. There was no way they wouldn't tell a teacher. Shit, he was in so much trouble.

When he reached the passage in Honeydukes' cellar, he did a quick cleaning charm to get the mud off his boots and scrambled back up to clamber out of the one-eyed witch, hoping he didn't look as out of breath as he felt. If anyone asked, he could just say he'd been out flying. He left the cloak and his bag in the passageway and shut the witch's hump behind him, hoping to slide right back into the trickle of students going about their day. He could come back and get them later. Quick footsteps echoed down the corridor. The blood drained from Harry's face.

“Potter!” It was Snape, his features set in a harsh glare, though there was a gleam of triumph in his eyes. Harry was well aware of his sweaty face and messy hair. “Come with me.”

“Where are we going, sir?” Harry asked, playing innocent as he fell into stride beside the long-legged Slytherin, having to practically jog to keep up. Naturally, they ended up in Snape’s office.

“Sit.” Harry did so, trying not to stare too closely at the gross things in jars lining the shelves. “Mr Malfoy and his friends came to me with a rather interesting story.”

“Sir?”

“Apparently, Potter, they came across Weasley in Hogsmeade. And he wasn’t alone.”

“Was Hermione with him, sir? I’m glad they’re talking again.” Snape’s glare could’ve melted a cauldron.

“Mr Malfoy states that someone invisible was throwing mud at him and his two friends, while they were stood talking to Mr Weasley. And then, Mr Crabbe saw a very curious apparition. Do you know what that might be?”

“Can’t say I do, sir.”

“Your head, Potter. Floating in the middle of Hogsmeade.”

“Perhaps he should go to Madam Pomfrey, sir, if he’s seeing things,” Harry replied neutrally. He thought Snape might explode with rage.

“Your head does not have permission to go to Hogsmeade. No part of your body has permission to go to Hogsmeade.”

“I know, sir. I’ve been in Gryffindor tower all day, like you told me.”

“Can anyone confirm that, Potter?” For a moment, Harry almost threw Neville’s name out there. But as good as the boy claimed to be at Occlumency, he couldn’t lie for shit, especially to Snape. Instead, he stayed quiet. Snape smirked. “I thought so. How very like your father you are. Believing yourself to be above the rules. Everyone from the Minister for Magic downwards is trying to keep you safe from Sirius Black, and you’re just gallivanting off about Hogsmeade, because of course, Famous Harry Potter goes where he wants, with no thought to the consequences. Do you have anything to say for yourself, boy?”

Harry flinched. “Don’t call me that, sir,” he begged, his shoulders curling in to protect his ribs on instinct.

“I’ll call you what I like, you arrogant little brat. Really, the resemblance is uncanny — James Potter also strutted about the castle with his friends, his head so swollen—“ “Shut up!” Harry yelled before he could stop himself. “Shut up about my father!” Lupin had told him Snape and his father didn’t get along, and that James had been a bit of a prick in school, but to hear Snape talk about him like that...

“What did you say, boy?” Snape’s voice was a venomous his. Harry took a step back.

“I asked you not to call me that, sir,” he said weakly. His knees were starting to shake, his eyes darting about, expecting fists to fly at any moment.

“I hate to think of the stories Lupin’s been filling your head with. Acting like James Potter was the best thing to ever happen to this school, telling you tales of glorious heroism. Did he tell you about the time your father and his saintly friends played a prank on me that almost cost me my life? Your father got cold feet at the last minute, but if he hadn’t, they all would’ve been expelled.” Snape smirked. “No, I don’t suppose he did share that tale.”

Snape straightened up abruptly. “Turn out your pockets, Potter!”

Harry startled, but didn’t move.

“I said, turn out your pockets!”

Mentally cursing, Harry did as bid, setting a handful of Fudge Flies and the Marauder’s Map on the table in front of him. “Ron gave those to me,” he said hurriedly. “After the last Hogsmeade weekend. I was just— saving them.”

“How touching. And this?” Snape held up the Marauder’s Map. Harry swallowed, refusing to make eye contact with the man.

“Just a spare bit of parchment. I was doing my Charms essay earlier.”

Snape turned the map over in his hands, studying it closely. “Rather old piece of parchment, isn’t it? I should perhaps just throw it away.” He made as if to throw it in the fire, and Harry lurched forwards. “Aha! What is it really, Potter? Another present from Mr Weasley? Instructions on how to get into Hogsmeade? Or— something else.” He pulled his wand, placing the tip to the paper. “Reveal your secrets.”

Harry watched in growing horror as the map’s creators took turns insulting Snape, the man’s face growing more enraged by the word. “I should’ve known,” Snape murmured. He strode across the office, tossing a handful of floo powder into his fire. “Lupin!” he called into the green flames. “I want a word!”

Within moments, Professor Lupin was in Snape’s office, looking pleasantly baffled as he stared between Harry and Snape. “Severus,” he greeted. “Harry. What can I do for you?”

“This,” Snape said, shoving the map in Lupin’s direction. “I found it in Potter’s pockets.”

For a moment, Harry could’ve sworn Lupin looked surprised. He read the words still on the map’s surface. His lips twitched. “I’m not sure what you want me to do about it, Severus.”

“Oh, you know exactly what I want, you—“ Snape cut himself off, glancing back at Harry. “It’s clearly some sort of dark magic. This is supposed to be your area of expertise, Lupin. Where do you suppose Potter got such a thing?” He had his eyebrows raised pointedly. Lupin’s lips twitched again.

Harry got the distinct feeling there were two different conversations happening at once.

"It seems like some sort of joke parchment, Severus. Designed to insult whoever tries to read it. Probably a Zonko's product."

"Really," Snape replied flatly. "There's nothing... familiar about it, to you?"

"Should there be?" Lupin asked, seeming utterly unfazed by Snape's anger.

Was Snape trying to imply that Lupin gave him the map?

"I will have answers, Lupin," Snape growled. Calm as you please, Lupin plucked the map from Snape's hands, offering the man a genial smile.

"Oh, I'd be delighted to give them to you, Severus, once I've studied it further. But I'm sure it's just a harmless prank parchment. Now, if we're quite finished here, I'm sure Harry has other places to be, don't you Harry?"

He wanted to ask for the map back, but he couldn't do that with Snape in the room.

"Right. Yeah. I'll just be going then..." He didn't dare look at Snape as he left the office, his heart pounding as he made for the third floor to go get his bag. Somehow, he'd escaped. He just had to ask Lupin for the map back, and then he'd be good.

"Harry!" His head snapped up, and he saw Ron sprinting down the corridor towards him, red-faced. "I tried... to get here... fast as I could... couldn't find you... you alright?" He was panting, having clearly just run the entire way from Hogsmeade.

"Fine. Had a run in with Snape, but... it's fine. I'll tell you later," he added, not wanting to linger too long in the corridor. He walked with his friend back towards Gryffindor Tower, his thoughts still back in Snape's office.

The Slytherin clearly expected Lupin to recognise the map. But why?

.-.-.-.

As soon as the door shut behind Harry, Severus rounded on Remus. "We both know what that is," he said bluntly. "I am astounded that you gave it to Potter, under the circumstances."

"I didn't give it to him!" Remus insisted, taking the map back out of his pocket and staring at it. "I had no idea Harry had it. I didn't even know it still existed! Peter got it confiscated by Filch a month before we graduated."

The words were still floating across the page, the familiar sets of handwriting making his heart ache softly. "I'm, uh, sorry about the nose comment," he added cheekily. "It was fifth year. After— y'know." The fight he'd thought would break them — until a year later, when Sirius almost ruined everything.

Severus' face shuddered for a moment. "Then it seems rather tame, considering," he remarked dryly. "You swear you didn't give it to Potter?"

"On my life, Severus," Remus vowed. "I have no clue how he managed to get a hold of it. Foolish boy. If he'd left this lying around..." He swallowed thickly. If the map got back in Sirius' hands, it was all over.

"Potter has never been particularly good at using his brain," Severus retorted acidly. Remus gave him a reproachful look.

"He's thirteen, Severus. How much did you use your brain back then?" He shook his head, running a hand through his hair. "I suppose he was in Hogsmeade, then?"

"Somehow. Malfoy said it was just his floating head. I seem to recall several similar instances from our school years." Severus' gaze was pointed, and Remus chuckled.

"James' cloak. I didn't know he had that, either." He thought it over for a second. "That one must have been Dumbledore. James let him borrow it for an Order thing before he..."

Severus scoffed. "Of course. The headmaster does love to encourage Potter to get himself into trouble." With a sigh, Severus reached up for the hidden bottle of whisky on his top shelf. Remus' stomach warmed when the man summoned two glasses. "I take it Potter has no idea about the origin of the map?"

"If he does, he hasn't asked me about it." Remus accepted the whisky with a grateful look. "I'm going to have to tell him, if he asks. He'll need a good reason why I'm not giving it back." He perched in his usual spot on the edge of the desk, setting his glass down and stroking a fond hand over the map. "Why didn't you open it in front of him? I can't see you passing up a chance to terrorise the poor boy."

Severus' pale cheeks flushed faintly. "Despite many attempts, I never learned the password."

Remus barked out a laugh. "Really? I always assumed you must've heard us, one of those times. You always talked about it like you knew exactly how it worked." He pulled his wand from his pocket, setting the tip against the parchment. His gaze met Severus'. "I solemnly swear that I am up to no good."

Watching the ink flow out over the map was like a physical punch to the gut, and he had to close his eyes for several moments at the fresh wave of grief. Cool fingers touched the back of his hand for a brief moment. Enough to ground him in the present. "Our pride and joy," he breathed, opening his eyes again and looking over the map. Several floors above them, the dot labelled 'Harry Potter' walked alongside the dot labelled 'Ron Weasley', walking away from the statue of the one-eyed witch. Remus stifled a smile. Legacy of the Marauders, indeed. "Merlin, James would be thrilled. His little boy, using the map and cloak to sneak to Hogsmeade. That's all his dreams come true."

"Yes, I'm sure he'd be delighted to hear his son put himself in danger with a mass-murdering lunatic skulking about the place," Severus retorted sharply. Remus' smile faltered. "The map could be useful. If Black decides to return."

He wasn't sure what he'd do if he ever saw the little dot labelled 'Sirius Black' reappear on the paper. But he owed it to Harry to keep an eye out, just in case. "I'll keep it with me.

Check it when I can.”

“Not going to take it to Dumbledore?” Severus’ voice was taunting, and Remus shot him a look.

“We both know that would be a terrible idea.”

Silence grew between them, and Remus sipped his whisky, his eyes returning to the map. Merlin, that felt like a lifetime ago, enchanting that thing. He hadn’t thought he’d ever see it again.

“He asked me not to call him ‘boy’.” Severus’ quiet words made Remus jump, caught up in his memories.

“Pardon?”

“Potter,” Severus explained at Remus’ wrinkled brow. “I called him ‘boy’. He had... quite the adverse reaction. I’ve never seen him like that before.”

“When you say ‘adverse’...”

“He acted like I was going to hit him.” The words were resigned, and the bottom fell out of Remus’ stomach. In the back of his mind, Moony growled.

“Petunia,” he spat, grip tightening around his glass. “If she or that brute husband of hers have laid a hand on my cub.”

“Calm yourself, Remus,” Severus urged, his fingers brushing Remus’ hand once more. He looked displeased as well, his lips curled in a sneer. “There will come a time when we will talk to Petunia. See how she’s been respecting Lily’s memory.”

That didn’t satisfy his inner wolf, but Remus knew he couldn’t just run off to wherever Petunia lived and give her a piece of his mind. “I’ve failed him in so many ways, Severus,” he breathed in anguish. “Ways he doesn’t even realise.”

“Dumbledore is the only one who has failed him,” Severus corrected, “and we will do our best to rectify that.”

Remus stared at the map, watching the dozens of dots flood the Entrance Hall as they returned from Hogsmeade.

He wasn’t sure his best would be enough.

.-. .

That evening after dinner found Harry knocking on the door of Professor Lupin’s office, biting his lip anxiously. The professor had a knowing look in his eyes when he answered the door. “Professor Lupin, about that, uh, parchment that Professor Snape took from me. I was hoping I could have it back?”

"No, Harry, you cannot have the map back. Yes, I know it's a map," Lupin added when Harry's jaw dropped. "I'm incredibly disappointed in you, Harry; not only did you sneak into Hogsmeade unsupervised, where anything could've happened to you, but you've had this map for Merlin knows how long with Sirius Black on the loose and you never turned it in."

The way Lupin looked at him made him feel about three inches tall. "I'm sorry, sir. I didn't think it was that important."

"Not that important? Harry, you've already seen what Black can do with things left lying about!" Neville was only just allowed to be told the password to the common room, even now.

"But he wouldn't know how to use it! It'd just insult him, like it did to Snape!"

"Are you so sure about that?" Lupin pulled the map out of his pocket, laying it flat on his desk. "I solemnly swear that I am up to no good."

Harry gaped at him as the map jumped to life. "But... how..."

"When I told you months ago that you used to call me Uncle Remus, I suppose I was lying to you a little," Lupin told him, making Harry blink at the change of subject. "Remus is a little hard for a one year-old to say, after all. You much preferred to call me Uncle Moony. Well," he added, smiling wryly, "it came out more like 'Uncle Mooey', you struggled with your N's, you see."

Dragging his eyes down to the greeting at the top of the map, Harry stared back up at his professor in dawning shock.

"Remus Lupin, Peter Pettigrew, Sirius Black and James Potter. Also known as Moony, Wormtail, Padfoot and Prongs. The Marauders," Lupin announced, offering a little bow. "At your service. Well, what's left of us, at least."

"What?" Harry could hardly believe it. "The map was my dad's?"

"Not solely his. It took all four of us to figure the spells out. Three, really; Peter was never that great with a wand. We finished it early in our fifth year, to help aid in our mischief-making ways. It got confiscated in our seventh year. I hadn't expected Filch to keep it." Lupin looked at him curiously. "I have to ask, Harry — how did you come to own the map?"

"A friend gave it to me," he said evasively, not wanting to get anyone in trouble. Lupin stared him down for a long moment, then smiled.

"The Weasley twins, I presume? That would explain an awful lot about them. Well, I suppose I can't ask for a much better successor. Some of their work is really quite fantastic. I thought Severus would never get his hair back the right colour after that little prank they pulled before Christmas."

"They worship you," Harry blurted. "The Marauders, I mean. Think you're the best thing ever." He wondered what the twins would do if he told them they were being taught by a real live Marauder.

That made Lupin chuckle. “I’m glad our good work is being continued. But that doesn’t mean you can tell them, Harry,” he added. “I’m telling you because it’s James, and because I need you to understand why it’s so dangerous to have this map. Sirius Black helped create it. If it ended up in his hands, he could find you anywhere in the castle. I can’t let you have it back, I’m sorry.”

Harry winced; if he’d known, he never would have kept the map. Suddenly, a thought occurred to him. “Don’t take it to Dumbledore.”

“Beg your pardon, Harry?”

“Don’t take the map to Professor Dumbledore. Please.” If Dumbledore found the map, if he had another way of monitoring Harry... he was screwed. Lupin’s brow furrowed.

“I wasn’t planning on doing so. But why don’t you want it going to the Headmaster?”

Harry glanced down at the map, then back up at Lupin, deciding to throw caution to the wind. Lupin had been good about being honest with him so far. “Professor Dumbledore put a curse on my magical core to block me from my family magics.”

Lupin’s eyes went wide in alarm. Harry blurted out the whole story of his trip to Gringotts, including the Compulsion charm, explaining why he thought Dumbledore was the one who did it. “And I shouldn’t have told you that, because he can read minds, and if he finds out then he’ll know I know, and I’m done for!” he finished, somewhat panicked. Lupin’s hands came down on his shoulders, squeezing gently.

“You’re fine, Harry. Your secrets are safe with me. I have... let’s call them natural mental defences. Dumbledore has never been able to read my mind.” Harry let out a sigh of relief, and Lupin let him go, turning to pace the length of the desk. “Of all the things... I knew he was bad, but I never thought... Merlin, to block your family magics!” He turned to Harry abruptly. “You’re sure the block is gone?”

“The goblins said it was, yeah.”

Lupin sighed in relief. “Good. Good. When James turned seventeen, the boost in magic from his family line just about cracked all the windows in the dorm. That combined with the Black family — and Slytherin! Good grief, to have that sort of power surge trapped inside you with a magic blocker could level the school when you come of age!” His head snapped up, colour draining from his face. Harry’s heart skipped a beat, his blood turning to ice.

Was that what Dumbledore wanted?

“Who else have you told?”

“Neville knows about almost all of it. The twins know I’m taking up my family seat, but they don’t know about the block. And a few other kids — apparently word got around amongst the heirs that the House of Potter is back on the playing field.”

"You have to be incredibly careful, Harry. If the wrong person should find out what you know... I don't have to tell you how badly that could end up for you." Lupin's words made Harry's stomach churn. No, he was well aware of the line he was treading.

"I don't know what to do," he admitted in a meek voice. "I've been reading up as much as I can about the old bloodlines, and what it means to be an heir, and family magic, but... I don't know what I'm doing, and I don't know why Dumbledore wants to keep it from me, and I don't know who I can trust and if I tell the wrong person I could die!"

All of a sudden, Lupin's arms were wrapped around his shoulders, pulling him in close. Harry couldn't help the way he buried his face in the man's robes, eyes squeezed shut against the tears threatening to spill forth. "Easy, cub, easy. It's alright," Lupin soothed, one broad hand rubbing across his shoulders. It was a hug unlike any Harry had experienced before. Lupin looked like a strong wind would blow him over, but there was wiry muscle in his arms, and it made Harry feel safe. Secure. Like... like a parent would. Not even like Mrs Weasley hugging him, where she tried to crush the life out of him. Just... warm.

"Albus Dumbledore is not going to hurt you anymore, I promise you that," Lupin vowed fiercely, his lips pressed against Harry's hair. "You've done so well, cub. You've been so brave. But you don't have to do this alone anymore."

"I'm always alone," Harry muttered bitterly. Lupin pulled back enough to look Harry in the eye, and he could've sworn the man's eyes flashed gold for a second. It was probably just the light.

"Not anymore," he growled firmly. "Never again. I've let you down for far too long." He seemed as reluctant to break the hug as Harry was, but they parted nonetheless, Lupin unsuccessfully smoothing Harry's hair down. "That's a lost cause," he said ruefully, making Harry snort. "Just like James'."

Stepping back, Harry took a breath. "I'm sorry I didn't tell anyone about the map."

"I'll forgive you, but know in future you can come to me about anything, okay?" Lupin told him, brown eyes serious. "Absolutely anything. You can trust me, Harry." He glanced down at the map. "You should go. Your friend Miss Granger is on her way up here, no doubt looking for you."

"Right, yeah." Harry had told Hermione what happened. She seemed to think it served him right to get the map confiscated. Ron was less pleased by it. "I'll, uh, see you later, then. Thanks."

"Have a good evening, Harry."

Harry left the office with his hands in his pockets, his emotions so jumbled in his head he could barely make sense of them all. At least one person — one adult — knew the truth, now. One person was on his side.

He bumped into Hermione in the corridor, expecting her to scold him again about the map. Instead, she had tears in her eyes, her hands trembling. "Hermione? What's wrong?" Had Ron said something awful to her?

She wordlessly handed over a crumpled piece of parchment, and Harry's heart sank. Buckbeak lost his trial.

"They can't do this," he murmured, taking her arm to lead her back to Gryffindor Tower. "Buckbeak isn't dangerous."

"Malfoy's dad thinks he is, and he's got the whole committee in his pocket," she retorted, wiping at her eyes.

Ron was in the common room when they entered, and he scowled at first, before he realised Hermione was crying. "Don't tell me she told on you, mate," he hissed, glaring at the curly-haired girl. Hermione's lip quivered, and she bit back a sob.

"I did no such thing," she bit out. "I just thought you might like to know, Hagrid lost the case. They're going to execute Buckbeak."

Ron's freckles stood out stark against his pale face as it drained of colour. "What?" Harry passed him the letter. "But that's not fair! Buckbeak did nothing wrong, it was all Malfoy!"

"We know that, but the committee doesn't care! There'll be an appeal, there always is, but... I can't see how it will help. Nothing will have changed."

"Yeah it will," Ron said fiercely. "You won't have to do all the work alone this time. I'll help."

"Oh, Ron!" Hermione flung herself into Ron's arms, sobbing on his shoulder, and Ron sent Harry an alarmed look as he patted her awkwardly on the top of the head. Through her sobs, she managed to stutter out an apology for Scabbers, and Ron shook his head, entirely out of his comfort zone.

"He was old, y'know—and a bit useless. It's alright." He kept patting Hermione's head until she finally drew away. She met Ron's eyes, offering him a tentative smile, which he returned. Another small sob escaped Hermione's lips.

Harry could only hope they were finally done fighting. They had more important things on their mind, now.

. . . .

As a cold and dreary February rolled into a slightly less cold and dreary March, Harry was beginning to feel like he was almost as busy as Hermione. His curly-haired friend was drowning under her workload, always doing some sort of work and looking increasingly hysterical while she was at it. But Harry had his classes, plus a truly absurd amount of quidditch practices — they were so close to the cup they could taste it, and Wood wanted them at their best. Add in his patronus lessons, his private study and his secret late-night meetings with Draco, he barely had time to sleep. And after knowing Sirius Black could get all the way up to his dorm... well, even when he did have time to sleep, it was hard.

True to their word, he and Draco had resumed antagonising each other in public. It was actually sort of fun, now that Harry knew it was just a game. It certainly made Ron happier, having ‘the old Harry’ back. That made the guilt rise up again, but Harry shook it off.

They managed to meet about once a week, never in the same place twice, arranging meetings by dropping little notes in each other’s pockets or school bags whenever they had one of their ‘fights’. It was harder now Harry didn’t have the map, but he was managing. Tonight, they were in one of the old Charms classrooms on the fourth floor, chairs pulled up to the desk as Draco taught Harry a wizarding card game called Warlock’s Bluff. The rules were somewhat complicated, but Harry was starting to get the hang of it. He’d actually won the last round, much to Draco’s surprise.

“It’s better with four players,” Draco told him, using a spell to shuffle the deck for the next round.

“By better you mean harder.”

Draco smirked at him, eyes flashing in challenge. “Struggling to keep up, Harry?”

He dealt again, and Harry picked up his cards, keeping his face blank. Not a bad hand. He could win this one. “So what does being a good pureblood have to do with playing cards?”

“You can get a good measure a person by playing Bluff with them,” Draco replied, making his move. “Often business meetings will include a game or two, to keep conversation flowing. It shows logic, strategy, how many risks a person is willing to take. A little like chess, but quicker.”

Of course, even games had an ulterior motive with purebloods. Harry said as much, and Draco scoffed. “Not every game has an ulterior motive. Sometimes we play for fun. Just don’t ever play against Daphne, especially not for money. She’ll rob you blind with a smile on her face, the girl is a menace.”

“When would I ever play cards with Daphne Greengrass?” Harry asked, bewildered.

“You never know.” Draco shrugged. “The future holds many opportunities. There may come a time where we don’t have to put on quite so many masks.”

That was one thing Harry was learning, spending more time with Draco. Just about everyone in Slytherin — and many in other houses — was playing a part, to some degree. Draco wouldn’t say why it was so important, but he’d made it pretty clear that nobody could be taken at face value. It sounded exhausting to Harry.

Outside in the hallway, they heard a door slam shut. Both boys froze.

“It’s getting late,” Draco said eventually, flicking his wand and sending all the cards neatly back into their box. “We should go.”

They tried not to stay out too long past curfew, both because they needed to sleep, and because they were both painfully aware that Sirius Black could be roaming the castle at any time. Harry knew he was being foolish, but he couldn't bring himself to care. He liked spending time with Draco. The blond boy was funny when he wasn't being scathing; and sometimes even when he was. Spending time with him made Harry wonder if he'd made the wrong choice when he'd begged the sorting hat not to put him in Slytherin.

"I'll see you later." Harry watched Draco leave — Draco always left first. He waited several minutes, then made to swing his invisibility cloak over his shoulders, only to freeze when the door swung open. He stared guiltily into the honey eyes of Professor Lupin.

"Harry," the professor greeted neutrally, taking in the scene in front of him. "Did I just see Draco Malfoy leave this room a few moments ago?"

"...Maybe?"

"You don't look like you've been fighting," Lupin started, and Harry shook his head.

"We weren't fighting! We were, ah, playing Warlock's Bluff."

"A card game," Lupin said flatly. "With Draco Malfoy."

"We're maybe, kinda, friends now?" Harry replied, voice rising an octave as he shrugged helplessly, waiting for the outburst about not trusting Slytherins and being more carefully running about after dark.

"Merlin," Lupin muttered under his breath, glancing skyward in exasperation. "History repeats itself indeed." He cleared his throat, looking back at Harry. "Fifteen points from Gryffindor for being out after curfew."

"What! Aren't you going to take from Slytherin? Draco was out too!"

"Draco had the good sense not to get caught," Lupin retorted. "Also, he doesn't have a murderer looking for him. You're playing a dangerous game, here, Harry." His eyes flicked down to the fabric bunched in Harry's hands, and he smirked. "Ah, of course. How long have you had James' cloak?"

Harry looked down at the invisibility cloak, then back up at his professor. "You know what this is?" Lupin laughed.

"Know what it is? Harry, I spent half my school career hiding under that thing," he replied ruefully. "That cloak got the four of us out of many a sticky situation. It's reassuring to know you have it, but that doesn't mean it's okay for you to be out after dark. Let me walk you back to your common room. Put the cloak on."

With a sigh, Harry didn't bother arguing. He swung the cloak over his shoulders, noticing how amused Lupin looked as he disappeared. "You're not entirely Lily's boy, then," the professor remarked, leading the way out of the classroom. "Plenty of James in you yet. Not sure if that's a good thing."

It was the first time someone had told Harry he was more like his mother than his father, and it made a warm, fluttery feeling appear in his chest. He smiled, obediently following Lupin all the way back up to the Fat Lady, bidding the man goodnight before he murmured the password. One person in his life knew about his friendship with Draco, and hadn't condemned him for it.

Harry slept better than he had in weeks.

Chapter 8

“...And Jones whacks a banger of a bludger right at Mayweather, nearly takes his head off! Mayweather drops the quaffle—and Greengrass has it, Harpies are back in possession...”

Harry’s lips curled in a faint smile, his attention half on the quiet commentating of the quidditch match drifting from his Wizarding Wireless. He was up in the dorm, the curtains around his bed drawn and warded, his password-protected notebook in his lap while Never Unarmed: The Theory of Wandless Magic lay open on his left.

Hermione was off in the library, as always; Ron was either with her, helping with Buckbeak’s case, or had given up and sought out Dean and Seamus. Harry had been with them for a while, but when their bickering became too much he made the excuse of needing to talk to Lupin about his Patronus lessons. The pair may have banded together in the face of the Ministry’s stupid creature laws, but that didn’t quite make them friends again.

Either way, it meant that he had at least an hour of free time, and it was perfect timing for the Holyhead Harpies match against the Ballycastle Bats. It was also perfect timing for Harry to go over some of the notes he’d been making the last few months.

It was a good thing his notebook was charmed to add pages as it became necessary; it was full to bursting with scrawled notes and diagrams and half-hearted attempts at family trees as Harry tried to figure out the complicated world of British pureblood families. If he were more like Hermione, he’d have some sort of organisation system to separate his spell-related research from his history-related notes — but he wasn’t, and chaos seemed to suit him perfectly fine, so he continued to write on whichever page he pleased.

Currently, he was comparing notes he’d made from reading Reaching Your Core: A Guide to Understanding Your Magic to the text within Never Unarmed, quill tapping thoughtfully against his lower lip. Since he’d entered the wizarding world, wandless magic had been spoken of as the absolute pinnacle of magical power and talent — only extraordinary people could manage it, like Albus Dumbledore.

But why then did children have so many bursts of wandless magic?

Many of the books he read talked about how the immature core was more volatile, and training it with the focus of a wand helped to direct it, with the downside of making it harder to access without a focus. They explained that for all but the most powerful, the trade-off for control over your own magic was the need for a wand to use it. Sure, in times of great stress or need, a person could perform wandless magic, but it was rarely intentional.

That made little sense to Harry, when all the books on inheritance magic suggested that many talents inherent to certain families were innate and wandless; metamorphmagi powers and soothsaying, an affinity to mind magics or animagi magics. Some were bloodline-only, but many were available to any wixen willing to work for it, and family magics just made it easier.

A wand wasn't needed for Occlumency. A wand wasn't needed for an animagus to transform, once they'd mastered the initial transformation process. They channelled magic directly from a person's core.

That had to be the connection. Never Unarmed talked about being in tune with your magic, about using your fingers instead of your wand, learning to push the magic through your body rather than your focus. Even to Harry, whose magic had been buzzing under his skin since the moment the goblins had released the blocks, that felt exhausting. He'd tried all the exercises the book offered, holding his wand in his off-hand and trying to cast through the fingers of his dominant hand, but it just felt like trying to push concrete through a sieve.

The book was wrong, he was sure of it. Reaching Your Core had taught him a lot of things, as had the books on core blocks and family magics. Wandless magic wasn't about turning your fingers into your focus — it was about bypassing your focus entirely and just letting your core breathe.

"...And the Harpies score! Owens had better hurry up, or even the snitch won't save the Bats today! Quaffle is back with Fawley, and to Kinnock..."

Harry tuned out the quidditch match, shutting his eyes and taking a steady breath. Between all the various meditation exercises he'd been learning, it was easy to sink deep into the corner of his consciousness that housed his core, the magic humming softly. He wondered absently if it was like that for everyone, or if he was an exception. He was only thirteen, surely he couldn't be that powerful?

None of his teachers had ever said anything about focusing inward on your magic, or any sort of humming or buzzing sensations. Perhaps it was just an uncommon practice, and if everyone tried it they would feel the same. Maybe he'd talk to Neville about it sometime, see what the other boy thought.

He delved deeper, surrounding himself in the humming, the warmth of his magic like rays of sunlight against his skin. Even now, months after the blocks had been removed, it felt... unsettled. Like it was housed in a space too small, crammed into his body like he had been crammed into the cupboard under the stairs at the Dursleys'. Harry hoped he'd grow a few inches, maybe put on some muscle; that might make his magic feel better. Dumbledore was pretty tall — was that because he needed to contain more magic?

Drawing his focus back to the task at hand, Harry kept breathing, raising his right hand slowly. He opened his eyes. His fingertips were glowing.

"Wingardium Leviosa," he whispered, gaze turned on the hefty book at his side. The humming grew more urgent. His veins itched.

Then, slowly, the book began to rise off the bed.

A slow grin tugged at Harry's lips — suddenly, a door slammed, and the book fell back on the mattress. The connection was gone, the humming almost silent.

"Harry, are you back yet? Hermione's a nightmare, honestly." It was Ron. Harry scowled to himself; he'd been making progress there!

Hurriedly stuffing his book and notebook under his pillow, Harry dropped the wards around his bed and pulled the drapes back, offering the redhead a smile he hoped was sincere. "Couldn't make it to curfew?" he asked wryly, watching Ron's disgruntled frown deepen. The other boy opened his mouth to respond, when his eyes flicked to the Wireless.

"Owens is diving, but Griffiths is hot on his tail; who will reach the snitch first? They're neck and neck — if they keep going, they'll hit dirt! Griffiths is pulling level, and— Merlin's beard, what a catch! In a remarkable show of speed, Griffiths has caught the snitch! The Harpies remain undefeated for another day!"

"Since when do you have a Wireless?" Ron asked, an unreadable look on his face. Harry turned the volume down, shrugging.

"Bought it over the summer, when I was stuck in Diagon. I had no idea before that there was so much wizarding radio." The Weasleys had a Wireless, but they only seemed to turn it on when Mrs Weasley wanted to listen to Celestina Warbeck.

"They're expensive, those portable ones. Charlie bought one in his sixth year, but he took it with him to Romania."

The expression on Ron's face suddenly made sense; discomfort at Harry's wealth. Before, Harry might have let it bother him; might have offered to give his to Ron, and buy himself a new one later. Back when he'd been under Dumbledore's spells, and desperate to have friends by any means necessary. But things had changed. He could sympathise with Ron, of course — for most of his life, Harry hadn't had two pennies to rub together — but he wasn't going to let the other boy make him feel guilty for inheriting money when Harry's parents had died in order for that to happen.

He reached out, turning the Wireless off and offering Ron a half-smile. "Well, the Cannons match is next week, if you want to listen to it with me."

Ron grinned, only a hint of a shadow in his eyes. Harry ignored it; he could hardly keep up with Ron's mood swings this year, and it wasn't worth trying.

Letting the redhead grumble all about the work Hermione had forced him to do in the library, Harry couldn't stop his attention returning to the faint tingle still running through his veins.

He had done wandless magic. Intentional, focused wandless magic.

How much more could he do, with a little practice?

.-.-.-.

With the security in the castle amped up after Black's second break-in, the trio couldn't visit Hagrid in the evenings anymore. The only chance of getting to talk to him was during their Care of Magical Creatures class. Days later, and Hagrid still seemed to be in shock.

"There's always the appeal," Ron said, when it looked like Hagrid might burst into tears, walking the class back up to the castle. "Don't give up hope yet, Hagrid. We'll figure something out."

They bid goodbye to Hagrid at the castle doors, and the large man blew his nose loudly, thanking them again for offering to help. It was clear he was expecting the worst.

"You'd think he could pull it together!" The voice made Harry's heart sink. Just inside the doors, Draco stood with Crabbe and Goyle, watching Hagrid leave. The two huge boys were sniggering. "It's not like it's his bloody dog or anything. It's just a beast." Behind the false sneer, Harry could see the regret in Draco's eyes. As if he could've done anything to stop Lucius Malfoy on a crusade.

"How dare you!" Hermione roared, stalking across the entrance hall towards Draco. His grey eyes widened in alarm at her ferocity, and Harry hurried after her. "You foul, evil little—"

SMACK!

Harry wasn't fast enough. Before he could do anything, Hermione had reeled back a fist and punched Draco square in the jaw. He fell back into Goyle, blinking dazedly. "Don't talk about Hagrid like that." With that, she turned on her heel and left. "Come on, boys. We'll be late for Charms."

Harry sent an apologetic glance back at Draco, who seemed utterly stunned, and hurried after Hermione, Ron hot on his tail. "Hermione!" Ron exclaimed. "You just punched Malfoy!"

"He deserved it," she declared firmly. "Harry, make sure you beat them at quidditch, won't you? I couldn't stand to see him win."

"Uh, yeah, Hermione," Harry said after a beat. He shared a look with Ron, both of them thinking did that really just happen?? "I'll try my best."

She huffed, continuing on the way to class. Harry eased the door open to the classroom, praying they weren't late, and Professor Flitwick smiled up at them. "There you are, boys! Settle down, now, take your seats."

Harry looked over his shoulder — Hermione was nowhere to be seen. Where had she gone?

"She was just behind us," Ron muttered, just as confused as Harry. "Maybe she dropped something?"

But Hermione didn't reappear. She was absent for the entire class. Harry frowned; what was going on with her?

. . . .

Clearly Hermione was on a roll, Harry thought as he watched her storm out of the Divination classroom. When the class finished, he turned to Ron.

"She's having a bit of a day, isn't he?" the redhead remarked. "Blimey."

Hermione wasn't at dinner, but the hall was abuzz with the story of her talking back to Professor Trelawney. Luckily, Draco didn't seem to have told anyone about her punching him, though there was a fairly impressive bruise rising on his pale cheekbone. Harry winced; would Draco be mad at him for it? They weren't supposed to meet for another few days. Harry would have to wait to ask if he was alright.

"I'm gonna take some food up to Hermione," Ron said once he'd eaten his fill, which as always was an impressive amount. He wrapped some roast beef and potatoes in a napkin, grabbing another one to fill with parsnips. "You coming?"

"Can't. Patronus lesson with Lupin," Harry replied apologetically. He had the spell down pretty well, now — it hadn't taken shape yet, but he could get a fairly solid shield up against his boggart-dementor.

"Oh, right, yeah. Well, have fun." Ron grabbed as much food as he could in his large hands, and the two parted ways, Harry headed up the familiar route to Lupin's office. He dragged his feet a little, feeling a little awkward about seeing the man again after basically breaking down on him. Lupin didn't seem to hold it against him, though.

"I hear Miss Granger had quite the eventful afternoon," Lupin remarked once they'd put the boggart away for the evening, sat in their usual chairs with tea in their hands. Harry winced.

"You heard about Divination, then?" Lupin nodded. "I mean, I don't blame her, really. She's doing about fifty subjects at once, and Divination's a bit..." Harry trailed off sheepishly, not wanting to insult one professor in front of another. "I wish I could drop it, too. Is there any way to switch your elective subjects if you realise you don't like them?" Truthfully he'd love to drop Care of Magical Creatures, too, but he couldn't bear to do that to Hagrid.

"I'm afraid not. Not this late in the year, anyway. You'll have to stick it out until your OWLs, I'm afraid." Lupin sounded truly apologetic. Harry sighed.

"I figured as much."

"You could always independent study for a different elective? Arithmancy, or Ancient Runes, or even both. You don't have to be enrolled in the class to take the OWL, if you contact the ministry about it. Your mother took an OWL in Muggle Studies without ever going to a single class. She said it was an easy O," Lupin informed him, a smile tugging at his lips.

Harry hadn't realised that was possible. "It'd be harder to teach myself Runes and Arithmancy, though. Muggle Studies is easy, especially if you grew up with them." A memory popped into his head. "You were top of your class in Runes, weren't you?" The yearbook had said so.

"Indeed I was. And third in Arithmancy — only your mother and Sirius beat me there. I'd be happy to help however I can if you chose to go down that route. No disrespect to any of my colleagues, but Divination and Care of Magical Creatures aren't the most... useful subjects in the world."

A thoughtful hum escaped Harry, and he leaned back in his chair. “Maybe after quidditch.” The match against Slytherin was drawing ever closer, and he had little free time as it was.

“Naturally. You just focus on beating Slytherin, for now,” Lupin agreed with a chuckle. “I know we’re not supposed to play favourites, but I bet Severus five galleons you’d win. He seems to think Mr Malfoy can pull it out of the bag, even after his time off for injury.”

Harry tried to imagine Professor Snape placing a bet on the quidditch, even if it was in Slytherin’s favour. “Y’know, Professor; I think the Snape you know and the Snape I know are two very, very different people.”

That made Lupin laugh, the sound clear and somewhat raspy, unexpectedly loud in the quiet office. “I should certainly hope so, Harry,” he agreed, a strange sort of look in his eyes. “Severus really isn’t as bad as he makes out to be, though. He just has a reputation to uphold.”

Harry made a face to show exactly what he thought of that. “If you say so, Professor.”

“Speaking of reputations to uphold,” Lupin drawled, sitting forward in his chair a little. “Draco Malfoy. Care to share?”

Harry’s cheeks grew hot, and he almost spilled his tea. “What? I don’t know what you mean. We’re just friends.”

.-. .

Remus stared at the teenage boy in front of him, red-faced and staring at his hands, squirming evasively. Oh, no. “I’d say that ‘just friends’ is baffling enough in itself.” Harry blushed even brighter. “You can tell me anything, Harry. There’s no judgement here.” Even if you’re dating a Malfoy, he added in his head, trying to imagine what Lily would do in this situation. Just act the same way she did when she found out about Severus.

“There’s not much to tell, really. I bumped into him in Diagon before school started, and he was... civil. I think, really, we just got off on the wrong foot as first years. Ron’s always been worse at antagonising him than I have. And now there’s no compulsion on me, I just... don’t want to fight him? Then he found out about the whole heir thing — okay, he found out because I told him — and he’s actually been really helpful with all that. Obviously, he was raised about as pureblood as it gets, he knows all about the old traditions, even more than Neville does. So we were civil, and then we kept bumping into each other, and we kinda just... became friends? Now we meet up when we can, which isn’t that often because there’s no way we could do it during the day when someone might walk in, but I promise I’m really careful when I’m out after curfew. I’m always wearing the cloak.”

Remus’ eyes grew wider as Harry rambled, hardly taking a breath, and the whole situation became inordinately clear. Oh, cub, you have no idea, do you?

Forget what Lily would do in the situation. Prongs would laugh himself sick at his oblivious little boy.

"I'm glad to hear you're not letting all those prejudices about Slytherins get in your way," he said eventually. "More students could stand to do that. But Harry, you must be careful. He is still a Malfoy after all."

"That doesn't make him evil," Harry retorted angrily. Remus held up a placating hand.

"I didn't mean that. All I meant was, he's still Lucius Malfoy's son. You need to be careful for his sake as much as yours."

Harry's face fell, his green eyes darkening. "His father... his father is an awful man. I don't know much about his mum, but his dad..." Harry trailed off, shaking his head, and Remus wondered what sort of horrors Lucius Malfoy had inflicted on his poor son.

"Narcissa was never as cruel as Lucius. She was a Slytherin, and certainly no Light witch, but she was never needlessly cruel. And she always thought very highly of family." All the Blacks did, whatever the rest of their faults. Blood was important in the Noble and Most Ancient House of Black, in a number of ways.

"Draco really loves his mum," Harry agreed. "But... I think he's scared of his dad. I think she is, too."

Harry was much too young to have those sorts of shadows in his eyes, Remus thought sadly. But so were many children at the school. A generation that only knew the aftermath of war — for the state they lived in couldn't truly be called peace, not yet.

"I think your friendship with him is a good thing," he encouraged gently. It was certainly too late for him to do anything about it; Harry seemed to be in far, far deeper than even he realised. "I'm not saying you shouldn't be friends with him. Just have caution. There are any number of people out there who would be happy to hurt Mr Malfoy as a means to an end." The headmaster was one of them, no doubt.

"I won't let that happen," Harry declared stubbornly. The set of his jaw was every inch Lily Evans. Remus smiled at him.

"Tell me about him," he urged. "The Draco Malfoy that you know. Not the one that everyone else sees."

If he was reading things right, Remus was going to be getting to know Draco Malfoy quite well in future.

. . .

Later, when Harry was no doubt tucked up in Gryffindor Tower — hopefully not having late-night liaisons with Draco Malfoy — Remus flooed down to Severus' quarters, pleased when the Potions Master gave him permission to enter. The man had shed his teaching robe, leaving him in just a white button-up and black trousers, his feet bare. Remus' throat went a little dry. "Evening, Severus."

“To what do I owe the pleasure?” Severus retorted, aiming for exasperated and falling just a touch short. Remus stifled a smile, sinking into the comfortable black leather sofa. Severus was in the armchair, a glass of white wine at his elbow. He summoned the bottle and a second glass, directing it over to Remus before the man could even ask.

“Draco Malfoy is your godson, correct?” Remus asked once the wine was safely in his grasp. Severus raised a thin eyebrow.

“Yes. Why, what has the little whelp done now?” Again, he wasn’t quite reaching exasperated; the fondness was creeping through.

“Befriended Harry Potter, apparently.” Remus laughed when Severus almost spilled wine over himself at the proclamation.

“He what? ”

Remus relayed what he’d heard from Harry — some, not all of it. He didn’t want to go spilling his cub’s secrets. “It seems they’re quite close now. I daresay Harry even has a bit of a crush.” Oh, it was definitely more than ‘a bit of a crush’, but he didn’t want to give Severus a heart attack.

The dark-haired man stared at him for several long seconds, before his eyes fell shut, his hand coming up to pinch the bridge of his nose. “Merlin help me,” he muttered. “The children of today have no sense, do they? Meeting in secret in Albus Dumbledore’s castle, sweet Salazar.”

“I don’t recall us having much more sense when we were thirteen, Severus,” Remus pointed out dryly, biting back a laugh when Severus’ ears reddened at the tips. “I told Harry to be careful. He understands Lucius is not to be reckoned with.” That brought Remus to the point he’d been considering ever since Harry had left his office. “You know them far better than I do, Severus. Do you think Narcissa could be turned?”

There was a pregnant silence. Remus waited patiently. “Narcissa will do whatever will keep her son the safest,” Severus said eventually. “She’d lay down her life for him in a heartbeat.” He pushed his long hair back from his eyes, propping his feet up on the coffee table. Butterflies erupted in Remus’ stomach, that the man was so comfortable around him, but he pushed them down with years of practice. “I have often wondered if there was a safe way to remove Narcissa and Draco from Lucius’ care, should the worst come to pass. She follows him out of fear, not love. Time and time again I have tried to convince her to have a contingency plan in place, but she won’t hear of it, just in case Lucius finds out and decides to punish her for it.”

“And if her son chose to fight at Harry Potter’s side?” Remus asked. Would Draco ever be so brave as to openly do so? People had done stupider things for love.

“Then she would be wherever she needed to be to protect him from the fallout,” Severus replied. “With any luck, the scenario is a long time coming, but... that Potter foolhardiness might be exactly what’s needed to push Narcissa’s hand. She will follow wherever Draco goes, and if that means turning to Potter... she'll never come to Dumbledore, though. The only flaw in our plan."

"Harry won't come to Dumbledore either," Remus revealed. He still felt sick when he thought about what the headmaster had done to his cub. If the goblins hadn't scanned him... Severus raised an enquiring brow, but Remus shook his head. "His secrets aren't mine to share. But safe to say, Harry trusts the headmaster about as much as we do, these days. Perhaps even less."

"Interesting." The word was barely a murmur, Severus' low voice making Remus' spine tingle in a way he couldn't turn off, even after all these years. "There's no point in planning too far ahead now. The things we fear may never come to pass, or at least not for a while."

"We should be so lucky," Remus returned, draining his wine glass. He was tempted to top it up, but that would be a foolish move. Between the warmth of the fire and the buzz of the wine, he was too comfortable already. It wouldn't do to push too hard and lose all his precious gained ground.

"These brats will be the death of me, Remus," Severus declared quietly, his words hanging ominously in the fire-lit room.

"On the contrary, Severus," Remus replied, thinking of the sparkle in Harry's green eyes when he spoke of his budding friendship with Draco Malfoy. "I believe they might be the saving grace for all of us. If we play our cards right."

Harry was young and foolish and naive in so many ways, but not as many as he should be at his age. And despite all that, everything he'd been through; he had so much hope in that young heart of his.

That sort of hope might be just enough to get them through.

.-.-.-.

Things were tense in Gryffindor tower the night before the match against Slytherin. Even Hermione claimed to be too nervous to study. Half an hour before curfew, Harry got to his feet. "I'm going for a walk," he said quietly. Hermione shot him a worried look.

"Harry, it's late."

"I'll wear the cloak," he promised. "I just... I can't stay here. I need some air if I'm gonna get to sleep."

She didn't look pleased, but she kept any further protests to herself. "Just be careful," she murmured, watching him sneak up the stairs just enough to put on the invisibility cloak in privacy. He only had to wait a few minutes for the portrait hole to open as a couple of seventh years came through, and then he was slipping out into the corridor.

He'd told Hermione he just needed air, but really he had somewhere to be. His heart was pounding so loud he was sure anyone could hear him as he walked, but none of the few people he passed noticed. They were all too focused on getting to their rooms before curfew.

Eventually, Harry turned into an empty Transfiguration classroom, and took the cloak off, stuffing it in his bag. He waited.

The door creaked open just wide enough for a blond head to duck through, shutting just as quick as it opened. “I can’t believe we’re doing this,” Draco muttered. “Going to curse me before the match?”

Harry laughed quietly, his heart light — Draco had come. Harry wasn’t sure he was going to. “I don’t need to curse you to win,” he teased, sinking into a chair. Draco chose the chair opposite, digging the deck of cards from his pocket.

“Just because you’ve got that fancy Firebolt doesn’t mean you’ll win,” Draco retorted, shuffling the deck and dealing hands.

“I could beat you on a Cleansweep, Malfoy.” Harry stuck his tongue out playfully, and Draco shot him a look of mock-disgust.

“Are all Gryffindors this childish?”

Harry just laughed, playing his first card.

For all Draco had promised to give Harry pureblood lessons, they usually never got around to that. They would just sit, and play cards, and talk; about quidditch, about school, about the future. Harry had told Draco things he hadn’t even told Ron and Hermione. Draco didn’t judge when Harry said something selfish, or a little bit cruel. It was... nice, not having to guard his language like that. “So what do healers do, anyway?” he asked, remembering what Draco had said last time they’d met. Everyone expected him to become a Potions Master, but he wanted to be a healer when he grew up.

“They heal people, Potter,” Draco replied with a roll of his eyes. Harry shot him a chastising look.

“I figured that. I just meant — muggles have loads of different types of doctors that specialise in different things. So, like, one doctor would just be for kids. Or just a brain doctor, or a stomach doctor, or whatever. They have GPs — all-round doctors, who help diagnose when people need to see a specialist doctor — but then mostly it’s all split up. Surely a healer can’t heal everything? ”

“For the most part, yes. They have their strengths; St Mungo’s is split into different wards — spell damage, illness, physical injury, all that stuff. But a good healer should be able to deal with just about anything they come across.”

“What kind of healer would you want to be?” Harry was curious. Draco swore as he saw the card Harry played, glancing down at his own hand. He bit his lip as he thought about his next move, and Harry couldn’t tear his eyes away from the reddening flesh. Draco played his card, snapping Harry out of his daze.

“As long as I’m good at it, I don’t really care,” was Draco’s dismissive reply. “I’d probably specialise in spell damage. Counter-curses are always fascinating to me, and I bet there’d be lots of challenging cases. I wouldn’t like to end up delivering babies all day or something.”

Harry made a face; he couldn’t see Draco delivering babies, either. Not that he was completely sure how that all worked, but he couldn’t see Draco doing it.

“Well, at least you’ll get plenty of practice, when we’re older,” he declared. “I’m in the Hospital Wing all the time. I think Madam Pomfrey is considering giving me my own personal bed.”

With a snort, Draco played the card that won him the round, triumph shining in his silver eyes. “It’ll be a while yet before I know the spells to put your sorry arse back together again. Do try not to get yourself killed before then.”

“Alright, I’ll wait,” Harry agreed. He glanced down at his watch; it was getting late, and tomorrow would be a big day. “We should go to bed. I want to be at the top of my game on the pitch tomorrow.”

“Damn right you do, if you’ve got any chance of beating me,” Draco agreed, sending the cards into their box with a wave of his wand. Before he left, he paused, looking back at Harry. A stray lock of blond hair fell into his eyes, and Harry was struck with the strangest urge to push it aside. “Just... be careful tomorrow, Harry. The Slytherins really want to win this.”

Harry, who had been fending off low-level attacks from Slytherins for the last two weeks, gave Draco a deadpan look. “Y’know, I’d figured that out.” Hurt flashed in Draco’s eyes, and Harry softened. “I know. I’ll be careful. I’m used to having snakes out for my blood,” he added dryly. “No hard feelings, whatever happens, yeah?”

He held out a hand, and Draco shook it. “No hard feelings when my team crushes yours to dust,” he agreed, yelping when Harry made to jab him in the side. “You’re a barbarian, Potter.”

“That’s what I’ve got you for; keep me civilised,” Harry retorted teasingly. Draco huffed, scowling one last time, then disappeared from the classroom. Throwing his cloak over his shoulders, Harry followed after a few minutes, making the short trek back to Gryffindor Tower.

The light from the half-moon streamed through the large windows, guiding his way back. Out of the corner of his eye, Harry caught a flash of movement, and froze.

Down in the grass, skirting the edge of the Forbidden Forest, was an animal. Harry’s heart leapt into his throat — not the Grim, not now, not tonight — but it was much too small a form for that. He stepped closer to the window, squinting to get a better look. The moonlight passed over dark ginger fur. Crookshanks. Relief flooding through his form, Harry made to turn away, only... Crookshanks wasn’t alone. A huge, shaggy black dog trotted across the lawn, approaching Crookshanks. It pressed its nose briefly against his, then turned back towards the forest, Crookshanks following close behind. Harry watched until the pair were no longer visible.

What on Earth did that mean? Could it really be an omen of death, if Crookshanks could see it too? Maybe it was just a regular dog after all. Or maybe Crookshanks could see death omens too, and this quidditch match was about to be Harry's last.

He forced himself away from the window, wiping his clammy hands on his trousers. It was probably nothing. Cats couldn't see Grims, even cats as smart as Crookshanks seemed to be. There were all sorts of creatures living in the forest, why couldn't there be a dog, too?

Chapter 9

They'd done it. Gryffindor had won the Quidditch Cup.

Harry didn't think he'd ever stop grinning, the joy bubbling in his chest and threatening to burst out at any moment. He felt a little bad for the smallest moment when he'd seen how heartbroken Draco looked when the Slytherin team landed, but the blond had caught his eye for a second, just long enough to flash half a smile in congratulations. No hard feelings.

Lying in bed now, the celebration party finally dispersed, Harry could feel the bruises on his ribs and shoulders from the Slytherins' more underhanded tactics. Draco had played a fairly clean game, but the rest of his team hadn't been quite so courteous. Harry didn't care. Bruises would fade. They were champions. Even the knowledge that he'd be getting his exam timetable in the morning couldn't dampen his spirits. They'd won the cup, and he would get through his exams, and the school year would be over — maybe if Sirius Black was still loose, he'd be able to stay in Diagon Alley again, if being at the Dursleys' was dangerous. They couldn't exactly station dementors in Little Whinging.

A dreamy smile crossed his face at the thought. Maybe, if he was lucky, he'd get his wish.

.-. .

Trying to get out of his quidditch-induced euphoria and focus on his upcoming exams was a bit of a stretch, but Harry managed it. He was a little concerned about Hermione, though; every time he saw her she was buried in parchment and books, the dark circles under her eyes getting bigger every day, muttering runes and charms and potions under her breath. He was starting to wonder if she'd crack before exams could even happen. Not to mention her timetable — how could she take two exams at the same time? Even Hermione wasn't that good! She snapped at him every time he asked, though, so Harry left her to it and focused on his own books. Ron made a solid attempt at studying, but his attention span was that of a flobberworm. Harry definitely didn't miss the days where his was the same. For the first time since starting Hogwarts, he felt like himself when he was studying. He felt confident in his knowledge. He could focus.

At least, he could until the note about Buckbeak's appeal came through. "I can't believe they're bringing an executioner," Ron muttered, scowling at his Potions textbook. "It's like they've already made up their minds!"

"With Malfoy's dad paying them, I'm sure they have," Harry muttered derisively. He might be friends with Draco, but he still hated Lucius Malfoy with a passion. "I'll be back in a minute, I need to go to the library." He'd somehow lost his notes on Cheering charms, and the section in the standard textbook wasn't nearly helpful enough for Harry's liking. To his surprise, Neville fell into stride with him on the way out of the common room.

"Did you say you're going to the library, Harry?" he asked casually. Harry shot him an odd look.

“Yes... why?”

“Would you mind coming with me for a minute? It’s important.” Neville wouldn’t meet his eye, a curiously determined look on his face. Harry was intrigued.

“Yeah, sure.” Wondering what he was about to get himself into, he let Neville lead him past the library and behind a tapestry, into a room Harry had never seen before. To his surprise, they weren’t alone.

Susan Bones was there, and Hannah Abbott; but so were Ernie Macmillan and both the Patil twins; Anthony Goldstein; Sullivan Fawley in the year below; and even, to his utter shock, a trio of Slytherins in the corner. Cassius Warrington, looking somewhat uncomfortable. Daphne Greengrass and Blaise Zabini. All of them had their palms open, and all of them bowed their heads when Harry and Neville entered. Murmurs of ‘well met’ echoed through the room, and Neville ducked his head formally.

“Well met,” he greeted. When he straightened up, it was with square shoulders and a confident stance that was entirely at odds with the shy, fumbling Neville Longbottom that Harry knew.

“Well met,” Harry followed, keeping his palms out as he was supposed to. “What am I doing here?”

“We thought we’d all introduce ourselves properly,” Ernie Macmillan drawled. “Before the school year’s over and we all leave for the summer. There’s been all this talk about the Potter heir finally stepping into society, we thought it’d be nice to welcome you in.”

Harry froze in alarm. “What talk?” he asked sharply. “You can’t be talking. Dumbledore can’t know I know about my inheritance.” He winced as soon as he said it — giving away way too many of his cards at once there — but no one in the group looked all that surprised.

“Relax, Potter,” Greengrass called across the room. “We keep our talk safe within the right circles. Dumbledore doesn’t know a thing.” She folded her arms across her chest, eyeing him coolly. “Am I to assume that he wouldn’t take well to the news?”

“That’s... an understatement,” Harry sighed.

“Professor Dumbledore has taken some pretty strong measures to keep Harry away from us. From this,” Neville said, studying the gathered teens.

“I can’t say I’m surprised,” Goldstein muttered.

“Regardless, welcome,” Hannah Abbott said with a smile, gesturing to a couple of empty chairs. Harry and Neville both sat down. “Harry, this is all the heirs currently at Hogwarts — well, most of us. There’s a few more — Slytherins we don’t trust, and the Carrow twins are due to start next year, but for now, this is us.”

“Isn’t Malfoy an heir?” Harry asked, glancing at the other Slytherins. How could they be trusted, but not Draco?

"He is. So are Crabbe and Goyle, and Theo, Pansy, and Millicent," Zabini confirmed. His voice was deep; he'd hit puberty at the end of first year, and even the fifth and sixth year girls were paying attention to him by now. Harry didn't know much about him, except that he kept to himself, stayed out of fights, and was incredibly good-looking. "Draco's situation is complicated."

Harry snorted; he'd bet he knew about as much about Draco's situation as Zabini did, by now. "So what's the point of this little meeting, other than introductions? Is there some sort of induction ritual, or a test I need to pass? How do you know you can trust me?"

"You're Harry Potter," Susan said flatly, rolling her eyes. "Also, Neville vouched for you. That's good enough for us."

"No ritual, no test. Just a bit of conversation," Padma Patil piped up, smiling prettily.

Harry looked between the sisters, brow furrowing in confusion. "How can you both be heirs? If you don't mind me asking. I mean, surely one of you is older."

"I am," Padma confirmed. "But our family magic will decide which one of us is fit to be heir once we come of age, so for now we both train for the position. Lots of families work that way with twins — it hardly seems fair to decide just because of a few minutes of extra life."

"Different family magics have different conditions for inheritance," Greengrass explained, her tone surprisingly free of condescension. "Some go for boys over girls, some have magical strength take precedence, some have bizarre and obscure inheritance laws. Not every family makes their public."

"So how do I know I meet those conditions?" Harry asked, wondering if it had all been some big mistake.

"If the Gringotts Line Test says you're an heir, you're an heir," Warrington told him. "Otherwise it would just say you're a potential heir. I have an older brother, but the family magic passed him over due to an... incident when we were kids." His lips twisted in a sour expression, and Harry didn't dare ask for details.

He looked around the room, studying faces carefully. "So this is what the Wizengamot is going to look like in ten years, hmm?"

"Maybe not ten," Hannah said, shrugging. "Some of us still have parents or guardians happy to keep their seats for another fifteen years or so, if all goes well. But eventually, yes."

"This isn't even half of the Wizengamot seats, though. What about the rest?"

"Just because most purebloods try and have children at the same time, doesn't mean it worked out for everybody. Accidents happen," Susan said with a cheeky wink. "The rest are either too young for Hogwarts or already graduated."

"There's twenty-one of us at the moment that we know of," Warrington cut in. "But there could be more; not everyone makes their heir's identity public knowledge."

"And of course, there's all the vacant and proxy seats. And some people hold two seats. Like Nott," Susan continued.

"Theo holds the Nott seat, and the Avery seat on his mother's side," Zabini explained.

"Is it unusual for someone to hold two seats?" Harry asked nervously, thinking of the four he had waiting for him when he came of age. Zabini shrugged.

"It's rare, but not unheard of. Family lines inter-mix fairly well, but most pureblood lines try not to merge too many heirs into one family, or if they do they'll spread the seats out amongst siblings, like the Weasleys. The mix of family magics can be a little... volatile."

Great. Even in the pureblood world, he was a freak.

"I read that some of the seats have been vacant for decades," Harry said. Like the Slytherin seat, and the Peverell seat. Harry didn't understand why his father hadn't been Lord Peverell, only the proxy to it — surely it didn't come through his mother's line?

"Sometimes lines die out," Neville informed him. "If the family magics can't find a suitable heir, they'll sit in proxy until one steps into the Wizengamot hall. There are probably a few heirs to the older lines who don't even realise it, but without a Line Test they'll never know, and that's not exactly common these days. If a line has truly died, once confirmed by Gringott's, then the seat stays empty. Some lines are just waiting for a valid heir to come of age, and those seats are held in proxy to whichever family was allied the closest to them when the last heir was in session. Except the Founders' seats; those always belong to whoever's head of Hogwarts."

"The Founders' lines are different, though," Goldstein said. Harry eyed him questioningly. "There's been plenty of legal heirs to the Hogwarts founders in the last few centuries, but their family magics are fussy. If you don't fit the bill, you can't claim the seat. And they don't necessarily make that decision when you come of age. Usually it happens when there's great conflict in the wizarding world, and the heirs are needed to bring guidance. Also, they're interlinked — you either get all four, or none at all. So of course, it's really rare circumstances for the Founders' seats to be occupied by actual heirs. Hasn't happened since 1783. Most of the time, even if you're a legal heir, the family magic just kind-of... sits there."

Harry's shoulders relaxed a fraction. That was one less thing to worry about.

"So between us in this room, we hold almost a third of the seats of the Wizengamot. Or we will, once we all take our seats. That's why it's important to play nice in these early stages, so we can make fair and just decisions for the good of wizard-kind." Hannah's words were accompanied by a sweet smile and a pointed look in the direction of some of the Slytherins.

"Don't expect us to be nice to you, Potter," Greengrass said plainly. "We all have roles to play. But good heirs don't hold grudges. The Dark Lord almost won because his followers had too many Wizengamot seats, and we're worse off for it, regardless of what our elders say. I refuse to let that happen again." She held her head up proudly, daring someone to comment, but everyone was nodding in agreement. Harry wondered how many of them had parents who had followed Voldemort, who had given him their Wizengamot seat.

He was starting to think he'd judged the Slytherins too harshly all these years, then remembered that Dumbledore's compulsion spell was supposed to make him do exactly that. He scowled internally; how many of these people could have been his friends if he'd been allowed to be his natural self? His first two years at Hogwarts, he'd been so caught up with Ron and Hermione, refusing to let anyone else get close. He hadn't even truly befriended Neville until this year. Was that part of Dumbledore's plan? Keep him isolated from the rest of his peers, so he never found out what he was missing?

"Can we wrap this up? I've got an Arithmancy OWL in twelve hours and I am not nearly as prepared as I'd like to be," Warrington said, a furrow forming on his forehead. That seemed to be the cue for everyone to break apart, claiming other places to be, and Harry figured he should probably get back to the common room as well. Ron and Hermione would be wondering where he was. If Hermione hadn't passed out from exhaustion yet.

Neville walked with him to the library to get the Charms book he'd originally left for, and the two of them made their way back up to Gryffindor Tower. "Thanks, Neville," he murmured softly, before they reached the portrait. "It's nice to know I have allies."

"The Ancient and Most Noble House of Longbottom will always be your ally, Harry," Neville assured him. The words were heavy with magic, like an oath, and Harry's eyes widened. Neville spoke the password before Harry could vow anything in return.

"There you are!" Ron called, looking up with desperate eyes. "I was starting to think you'd never come back. Help me, Harry, she's gone mental!"

Harry looked at Hermione, who seemed to have abandoned her own work in favour of taking a vicious correcting quill to one of Ron's Transfiguration essays. He laughed, shaking his head. "You're on your own with that one, mate."

.-.-.-.

Harry kept his head down as he ticked off his exams one by one, determined to do better than last year — not his best, or Dumbledore would get suspicious, but better. It was a relief to get to his Defence Against the Dark Arts exam; the one subject he was truly allowed to try his hardest in.

"Excellent, Harry!" Lupin enthused when Harry climbed out of the trunk after vanquishing his boggart. "Full marks!" He leaned in close, grinning conspiratorially. "Well done, cub!"

His good mood continued all the way to the steps of the castle, where the sight of a familiar bowler hat had him deflating like a balloon. He tried not to outwardly scowl as the Minister acted like he felt bad about Buckbeak in any way, like he hadn't already decided to kill an innocent creature. It was all he could do to help Hermione drag Ron away before he could do something foolish.

He was desperate for the day to be over by the time he walked into his Divination exam, the incense in Trelawney's classroom already making him sleepy. He almost thought he'd dozed off and imagined it when she went rigid in her chair, speaking to him in a raspy voice.

Had he just witnessed a real prophecy?

He climbed down the ladder, unsure whether to tell Ron and Hermione — Hermione would laugh for sure, and Ron probably wouldn't believe him either. He wasn't even sure if he believed it. But all thoughts of prophecies, real or not, flew from his head when Ron showed him the note from Hagrid.

"We have to go," Harry said immediately. "We can't let Hagrid face that by himself."

"But Harry, the teachers will never let us out at sunset! Especially not you," Hermione pointed out.

"I've got the cloak. We'll go after dinner." He'd taken to keeping the cloak in his Twilfitt bag at all times, just in case he might need it. He wanted to always be prepared.

"Okay," Hermione agreed, not even putting up a token protest about Sirius Black and school rules. Hagrid was far too important for that.

Trelawney's words rolled around Harry's mind as they joined the crowd of students heading down for dinner, worry gnawing at his stomach. What sort of chaos was he about to get into now?

. . .

He could hardly remember the last time he'd spent actual social time with both Ron and Hermione — not that this really felt like socialising, hurrying down to Hagrid's hut under the invisibility cloak. The half-giant didn't let them stay long, worried they might get caught, but it was enough for Hagrid to get some small comfort from their support.

And, unfortunately, enough for Ron and Hermione to start bickering again.

"I'm just saying, I can sympathise," Ron hissed as they walked away from the hut, careful to avoid the sight of the Minister and Dumbledore heading down to Hagrid's. Why on Earth was the Minister himself involved in a matter as simple as a dangerous creature execution? It baffled Harry, but he shook the matter from his head; what Fudge got up to was none of his business, not right now.

"After all, I know what it's like to have your pet killed," Ron finished, and Hermione let out an offended noise. Harry sighed to himself, wondering if he could cover himself with the cloak and just slip away, if they would even notice once they truly got arguing.

"What happened to Scabbers was an accident, Ronald!" Hermione retorted indignantly. "How dare you suggest I can't feel bad for Hagrid just because my cat did what cats do!!"

Harry was about to turn away and leave them to it — and then, in the fading light of the sunset, he saw a blur of orange running towards them.

Crookshanks. Of course. But what was he after?

He heard twin gasps as his two companions noticed the incoming, and then Hermione's hand flew to her mouth as she spotted the same thing Harry did. "Scabbers!"

Sure enough, Crookshanks was chasing a small brown blur across the grass — a blur that, when it stopped to turn sharply, had the distinct patchy fur of Ron's pet rat.

"He's alive!" Hermione exclaimed, lurching forward to try and grab the rat. Scabbers kept on straight past her, the bandy-legged cat hot on his tail.

"Not for much longer by the looks of it," Ron growled, already sprinting off in hot pursuit. Hermione hared after them, and Harry sighed, hurrying to catch up. He couldn't leave them out there, not if they were going to make such a racket while Dumbledore and the Minister were still lurking about.

They drew closer to the tree-line of the Forbidden Forest, Hermione faster than Ron as they followed the frantically zig-zagging rat. Harry sucked in a sharp breath as the bushy-haired girl dove, letting out a cry of triumph as her hands closed around Scabbers' wriggling form. "Got him!" she declared, then let out a quiet yelp.

Harry and Ron skidded to a halt, unable to do anything but watch as an enormous black dog leapt from the shadows, clamped its jaw around Hermione's wrist, and began to drag her away.

Right towards the Whomping Willow.

.-.-.

Everything had unraveled so quickly.

The boys had chased after Hermione and the dog, but the Whomping Willow stopped them from getting too close — at least until Crookshanks somehow did something at the base of the tree, freezing it in place. By that point, Hermione had already disappeared through a hole at its roots. Harry and Ron had no choice but to follow.

From there, things had only gone downhill.

Now, Harry found himself inside what seemed to be the Shrieking Shack, staring at Hermione on a broken old four-poster bed with Scabbers still wriggling in one hand while her other arm was cradled gingerly in her lap. And stood in front of her, brandishing Hermione's wand, was none other than Sirius Black.

"Harry, Ron, run!" Hermione urged, but they both shook their heads — there was no way they were leaving her with the man who had betrayed Harry's parents.

Black disarmed them both, awe in his eyes as he stared at Harry, whispering his name reverently. Harry stepped back, wishing he had something else to defend himself with. Wishing he was capable of some kind of useful wandless magic.

Valiantly, Ron stood between Black and Harry, declaring the Azkaban escapee would need to go through him to get to his godson. But far from striking him down in an instant like one might expect, Black shook his head wildly, insisting that only one life need end that night.

“Why d’you suddenly care about casualties?” Harry retorted quietly. “Didn’t bother you when you blew up Pettigrew and all those muggles, did it? He was your friend! My father was your friend!”

“You don’t understand, Harry,” Black insisted. “If you only knew the full story... it’s my fault, I won’t deny that... but you’ve got to listen to me... you don’t understand.”

“I understand more than you know,” Harry spat. “They trusted you, and you betrayed them. You were their friend! You were their secret keeper!”

Black howled in anguish, reeling back. “No, no, you’ve got it all wrong,” he moaned. “The truth, you need to hear the truth!” Black squeezed his eyes shut as if pained, and Harry took his chance, diving for his wand. Crookshanks dove as well, his claws digging into Harry’s forearm. Hermione screamed. The cat seemed determined to keep Harry from his wand, and Harry growled, shoving the ball of ginger fur aside and reaching — his wand rolled towards him, just enough for him to grasp it. Crookshanks’ claws sliced him through from wrist to elbow as he rolled to his feet, but Harry barely registered the pain, pointing his wand squarely at Black’s chest.

“Going to kill me?” Black asked with hollow eyes. Crookshanks hopped up onto the man’s chest, planting himself firmly and staring Harry dead in the eye.

What the hell was wrong with Hermione’s cat??

Suddenly, they could hear muffled footsteps from somewhere else in the shack. Harry’s heart leapt into his throat, and Ron called out. Black jumped up, but it was too late; the footsteps were thundering towards them, and the door burst open to reveal Professor Lupin, wide-eyed and wand raised.

“Expelliarmus!” The wand Black held flew out of his grasp — but so did the wand in Harry’s hand. Lupin caught both of them, staring across the room at Black. “Where is he?”

Harry narrowed his eyes in confusion. Who? Black pointed across the room at Hermione, who stared back incredulously, still on the bed. “Me? What?”

“But then, why... unless—“ Lupin’s eyes were darting from Hermione to Black like he was watching a tennis match. “Unless you switched without telling me? To him?”

“I’m sorry, Moony,” Black wailed. “We should’ve trusted you. We should’ve told you! Peter convinced us you were the traitor!”

“Professor Lupin,” Harry asked hesitantly. “Remus. What’s going on?”

“Harry,” Lupin’s voice was calm. “Cub. I think we’ve made a very big mistake.”

And then he lowered his wand and crossed the room, and embraced Black like a long-lost brother.

Harry felt his pulse echo in his ears. Professor Lupin, the man he'd trusted more than anything, was holding the man who wanted to murder him like he never wanted to let go. "Padfoot, old friend," he breathed, choking on a sob.

Hermione let out a wordless screech at the sight, her face ashen with pain and shock. "WE TRUSTED YOU!" she spat, glaring at the tawny-haired professor. "I wanted to give you the benefit of the doubt — I thought, if Dumbledore knows, you must be on our side — but you were working with him all along!"

"Not all this time, let me explain—"

"He's a werewolf!" Hermione declared, turning to look Harry in the eye. "That's why he's always sick. Don't trust him, Harry!"

Harry thought back over the school year; the regular absences, the silvery orb his boggart became, the strange potion Snape made for him regularly. Even the nickname, Moony. Calling Harry 'Cub'. "Oh," he said faintly. "That makes sense."

Lupin snorted. "I haven't been helping him, Harry, but I won't deny I'm a werewolf." He looked Harry in the eye, his expression earnest. "Please, cub. Will you trust me? Just for a few minutes?"

Harry folded his arms over his chest. Professor Lupin had been good to him this year. He hadn't seemed like he was plotting to kill Harry — he'd certainly had plenty of opportunities to try. "Talk," he said eventually.

"Harry, what are you doing? He's a werewolf!" Ron exclaimed, grabbing Harry by the shoulder. Harry ignored him, shaking off the hand and stepping closer to Lupin and Black. He needed answers.

"I was watching the map tonight," Lupin started, "I thought you three might go down to support Hagrid, and I wanted to keep an eye out. I watched you head across the grounds to Hagrid's hut. And twenty minutes later, I saw you leave. And get joined by a fourth name, moving very quickly."

"Yeah, his," Harry said with a dark look at Black. "He was following us."

"Not Sirius," Lupin corrected. "Peter Pettigrew."

"What?" Harry gaped. Pettigrew? Their other friend, the one who Sirius had killed?

Lupin turned back to Harry with imploring eyes. "Think, Harry. Wormtail."

Harry sucked in a sharp breath, looking at the rat currently playing dead in Hermione's lap. At Black, who had taken the shape of a dog. Padfoot. "Animagi," he realised. "You're all animagi. Which means... Scabbers."

Black barked out a laugh. “That’s the name he’s been going by, is it? How cute.” He lunged towards Hermione on the bed, but Lupin held him back.

“Sirius, no! They won’t understand, you need to explain.”

“We’re running out of time, Moony!” Black argued. “I can explain after he’s dead, now give me that rat!”

“Harry deserves an explanation,” Lupin insisted firmly. “After everything, he deserves that.”

“What the bloody hell are you saying about my rat?” Ron cut in loudly, glaring at the pair. Through lack of a wand, his fists were raised defensively. He edged closer to Hermione, and Black snarled.

“Don’t touch him!” His eyes were wild, Lupin’s hand on his shoulder holding him back.
“You can’t take him, not now I finally have him in reach!

“Pettigrew’s dead,” Harry said, confused. “You killed him. Everyone knows that.”

“Everyone thinks they know,” Black breathed, grinning madly. He lunged forward again, and Ron yelped — then the redhead grabbed Scabbers and held him close to his chest, turning to the door.

“This is ridiculous,” he declared. “You’re all nutters. I’m getting Dumbledore, or the aurors, or—“

“No!” The cry came unbidden from Harry’s lips, but he wasn’t the only one — Black and Lupin both shouted too, Lupin raising his wand to send ropes at Ron’s ankles to stop him from leaving. But at the same time, Harry flung an arm out, a burst of magic slipping instinctively from his fingers. He wasn’t even sure what he’d been trying to do, but whatever it was interfered poorly with Lupin’s spell — Ron stumbled as the magic hit him, then there was a truly disturbing popping noise, and all of a sudden the redhead blanched, falling unconscious, his right leg splaying out at a horrifying angle. Harry’s stomach lurched.

“Oh, shit,” he murmured, eyes wide.

“The rat!” Black cried, as Scabbers tried to make a run for it. With a wave of Lupin’s wand, a metal cage appeared around the creature, which squeaked and thrashed violently in the new confines. “Just kill him, Remus!” Black wailed, but Lupin shook his head.

“Harry needs proof, Sirius,” he replied calmly. He turned to Harry, his amber eyes imploring. “Everyone thought Sirius killed him. Even I believed it until tonight. But the map doesn’t lie. I would know.”

“He’s just a rat!” Hermione sobbed. “He’s been in Ron’s family for ages!”

“Yes, quite a few years, I’d imagine,” Black agreed grimly. “Far longer than a regular rat could be expected to live.” Harry sucked in a sharp breath.

“I—I don’t know if Ron ever said how long. He was Percy’s before Ron got him.”

"Harry, you can't be serious!" Hermione protested. "Don't tell me you believe this?"

It sounded mad, Harry knew. But the desperation in Lupin's eyes... that couldn't be faked.

There was a loud creak as the door swung open on its hinges, knocking against Ron's shoulder, and for a second nobody moved. But nothing happened.

"No one ever knew there were three unregistered animagi running around Hogwarts in our school days," Lupin said, gaze flicking between Harry and Hermione. "They always said they'd register after the war, but— well."

"Hurry up Remus," Black muttered impatiently. "I've waited twelve years for this, I don't want to wait any longer!"

"They need the truth, Sirius. We need to do this properly." Lupin squeezed his friend's shoulder. He turned back to Harry. "They learned to keep me company, you see. The potion Severus makes for me is a fairly recent invention. When I was in school, it didn't exist, and my transformations were... awful. Having them around in their animal forms, I didn't want to hurt them like I did humans. They could stop me from hurting myself." He shook his head, hair falling into his eyes. "All year, I've been debating whether to tell someone about Sirius' form. When he got into the castle, I knew he had to be transforming to stay hidden. But I couldn't do it. I couldn't betray James' memory like that. So I stayed quiet, because he was pack, and even after twelve years I couldn't believe he would truly hurt Harry."

"You swore to me." The new voice startled all of them, when Snape whipped off Harry's invisibility cloak and revealed himself in the corner of the room, wand held aloft at Lupin's face. "You swore on Lily's memory that you weren't helping him." He glared at Black, who looked from Snape to Lupin and then let out a loud groan.

"Really, Moony? Snivellus? Again?"

"Shut up, Sirius!" Lupin bit out. "Severus, please, allow us to explain."

"I think I've heard enough," Snape said icily. "You left the map open on your desk, Lupin. I came to bring you your potion, and to my surprise, whose name did I see running across the lawn? I should've known you were helping him all along. After all you said..."

"Severus," Lupin took a step towards the man, ignoring the wand in his face, voice raw with pain. "You don't understand. I never helped him, but we got it all wrong. Please, just listen, for me."

"Please, Professor Snape," Harry added. He'd never been so polite to Snape in his life, but if it made him hold off for just five more minutes. "Trust him. There's something going on here."

"Oh, there's something going on alright," Snape muttered, his eyes lingering on Lupin's hand curled around Black's shoulder. He stared at Lupin for a long time, then... he lowered his wand. "If you betray me again, I will kill you, wolf," he said to Lupin, who sobbed in relief.

“You say the sweetest things,” he murmured in reply. Black snorted.

Hermione stared at Professor Snape in astonishment, still cradling her clearly broken arm. “Professor,” she breathed in horror. “No, please — you have to get the headmaster! Ron is—” She broke off with a whimper as Snape glared at her, nudging the unconscious Weasley with his foot.

“He is alive,” he dismissed, and turned back to Lupin. “Talk.”

“I thought Peter was dead,” the werewolf said hoarsely. “I thought — I didn’t know what Sirius wanted with Harry, but I thought Peter was long gone. Until I saw him on the map tonight, and then saw Sirius’ name.” He turned to Black, brow furrowing. “How? How did you find him, Sirius?”

“He was in the paper,” Black said, reaching into his robe and pulling out a battered piece of paper. It was the Daily Prophet, from the issue talking about the lottery Mr Weasley won. The picture of all the Weasleys in Egypt, Scabbers perched on Ron’s shoulder. “I saw it, when the Minister came to inspect. On the front page. I knew him at once... how many times have I seen him transform? I knew I had to leave as soon as I read the boy was a Hogwarts student. I couldn’t let him— Harry,” Black broke off in another moan, wrapping one arm around his stomach as his shoulders shuddered. Lupin squeezed him reassuringly.

“He’s alright, Padfoot. Harry’s fine.” He looked from the photo, to Scabbers, and back again. “Good Merlin,” he said slowly. “His front paw.”

“What about it?” Harry asked quickly, craning his neck to look at the picture.

“All that was left of Pettigrew was a finger,” Snape murmured, comprehension dawning in his dark eyes.

Harry whipped around to look at Scabbers, who had frozen in fear in his cage. His front paw was, as it had always been, missing a toe.

“I didn’t think he had the brains for it,” Snape said, meeting Black’s gaze for the first time. “What did he do, cut it off and run?”

Black nodded. “Screamed all about how I betrayed Lily and James, then blew the street up with his wand behind his back, lopped off his finger and transformed.”

“So simple,” Lupin whispered. “Yet brilliant.”

“A first for old Pete,” Black agreed with a dark chuckle.

“So what, he faked his death and hid from you because he knew you betrayed my parents?” Harry retorted angrily, wondering where the whole story was going.

“I’d never betray Lily and James,” Black declared fiercely, snarling like his animal counterpart. “But it was my fault. I convinced them I was the obvious choice, I told them to make Pete the Secret Keeper instead. We didn’t trust Moony ‘cause of his boyfriend — sorry, Moons, but you can't blame us — and when I went to check on Peter's hiding place, it was empty, no sign of a struggle. It didn't feel right, so I went to the house, and... it was too late."

"Enough," Lupin growled. "There's one way to prove it all." With a jerk of his wand, the cage vanished, and Scabbers was suspended in mid air, squealing and struggling. "Severus, you know the spell?"

Snape nodded curtly, and in an instant there was a blinding flash of light — then suddenly the rat began to grow and stretch, squeaks turning into human howls of fear.

In seconds, there was a full grown man stood in the middle of the room. Harry recognised his face, though it had changed quite dramatically from the round-faced boy in the yearbook picture.

Peter Pettigrew, alive and well.

Chapter 10

There was a long, tense silence as everyone stared at the man who had been a rat only moments ago.

“Sirius, R-Remus,” Pettigrew stuttered. “My old friends.”

Harry watched in disgust as Pettigrew tried to beg Lupin for help, insisting Black was trying to kill him. Which, well, he wasn’t wrong — there was a reason Lupin had yet to give Black a wand.

When that didn’t work, he turned to Harry, throwing himself at the boy’s feet and begging for mercy.

“Enough of this,” Snape snapped, raising his wand. “Your blithering was bad enough when we were schoolboys.” He waved his wand, and Harry winced, fearing the worst. But instead ropes shot out, binding themselves around Pettigrew tightly.

“Let me kill him, Snivellus,” Black whinged, like a toddler unwilling to share his toys. “Or Remus, he can do it! The rat needs to die!”

“Remus has always taken pride in never killing a defenceless human,” Snape said calmly. “It’d be a shame to tarnish that now.”

“If you kill him, you’ll never be free,” Harry spoke up, his thoughts moving quickly. “If we take him to the Minister, he’ll confess, and you’ll get a proper trial. You could clear your name.” He could be Harry’s godfather again.

“Harry’s right,” Lupin agreed. “Azkaban can have him.”

“Fine,” Black pouted. “But if you transform, Peter, we will kill you. I might even let Snivelly here do it. I’ve heard he can be quite creative.”

“Must you, Sirius?” Lupin groaned, head in his hands for the briefest moment. “I thought you’d agreed to stop using that name when Lily hexed you for it.”

“Whoops,” Black replied, entirely unrepentant. “Must’ve forgotten. Azkaban, y’know. Really frazzles the brain.”

“We should go,” Harry said. If they were lucky, maybe the Minister would still be at the school. “What about Ron?”

A wave of Snape’s wand, and Ron’s grotesquely angled knee was bound and splinted. “Mobilicorpus,” he murmured, levitating the redhead’s unconscious body.

“I’ll keep an eye on this one,” Lupin said with a grimace, keeping his wand pointed firmly at Pettigrew, while he passed Harry and Hermione back their own. Hermione took hers in trembling fingers — it seemed she didn't quite know what to make of the whole situation.

And so together, they started the journey back to Hogwarts.

It was the most bizarre procession of people Harry had ever been part of, and he stared at Sirius' back as he walked through the tunnel. His godfather. The man he'd heard so much about — even when Lupin tried not to talk about him, he couldn't help it. All the stories of James Potter seemed to include Sirius Black.

Black kept glancing over his shoulder at Harry, wary and uncertain. Neither of them spoke — not until they were clear of the tunnel, and the vicious tree it lived under.

"I— Moony probably told you, Harry," Black started hesitantly, "but I'm— I'm your godfather."

"Yeah. I know." Harry bit his lip, unsure what else to say.

"Well, I mean, if I get free — that makes me your guardian. If... if you would want that." Black clearly misread the look of shock on Harry's face, as he hunched in on himself. "It's fine if you don't, I'm sure whoever you've got is great, I just—"

"Now's not the time, Sirius," Lupin cut in, covering Harry's snort of derision. Those amber eyes were sympathetic as they looked between the pair. "You can talk this over later."

They kept walking, but Harry jogged forward a half step, bumping his shoulder against his godfather's. "I'd love to live with you," he murmured, grinning slightly. "Just say the word."

Sirius looked like all his Christmases had come at once. For the first time, Harry could see in him the man from his parents' wedding photo, the charming boy from the yearbook.

"Really?"

"Definitely."

Both of them turned abruptly when Lupin choked out a quiet cry, shoulders tensing, the grey in his hair highlighted by the silvery light of the moon.

The full moon.

Snape and Sirius froze in horror, staring at each other. Ron's body hit the ground with a thud as Snape's spell ended abruptly.

"Oh no," Hermione whimpered, gaze fixed firmly on Lupin as his back began to arch.

"Your potion," Snape hissed. "Remus!"

But it was too late — the man was glassy-eyed, his mind clearly elsewhere already.

"Run," Sirius urged. "Snape, take the kids and run, now."

There was no time; Lupin gasped harshly, hunching until he was almost on all fours. His head lengthened, his clothes ripped, his skin began to sprout fur. Harry backed away several steps in horror, and within seconds there was an enormous wolf stood in front of them. A huge black dog tackled it, Sirius throwing himself at the mercy of the wolf, but it batted him aside with a growl.

Harry stared, transfixed. Snape moved to stand in front of him, wand raised. In all the chaos, no one noticed Pettigrew lunge for freedom until all of a sudden he was shrinking, leaving a tangle of ropes in his wake as he scurried off into the night. Snape cursed, shooting off a spell, but whether he was aiming for Pettigrew or for the werewolf, he missed. The werewolf growled again, striking out with one huge paw. Snape went flying, hitting the grass with a dull thud.

He didn't get up.

Hermione let out a quiet moan of horror. Sirius whined, then let out a loud howl that made the werewolf turn away from Harry and the others. It howled in return, setting off at a sprint towards the forest, after Sirius. After a minute, they heard a dog yelp in pain. Harry glanced down at the unconscious — hopefully just unconscious — Snape, at Ron equally limp beside him. Then he turned on his heel and ran after the dog and the wolf.

Sirius needed help. There was no way he could tackle a werewolf alone.

Hermione called after him, no doubt staying with Ron, but Harry didn't falter — he had to get to Sirius.

He could hear yelping coming from by the lake — until it stopped abruptly. Harry picked up his pace, fear pounding through his veins, wand clutched in his hand.

When the lake was in sight, Harry knew why the yelping had stopped. The werewolf was gone, but Sirius was on the bank of the lake, a man once more, moaning with his hands over his ears. And swooping ever closer were a whole hoard of dementors.

Harry felt the cold hands reaching into his chest, sucking out all his happy memories. He tried to hold onto them, raising his wand like Lupin had taught him. “Expecto Patronum!” Sirius wants me to live with him. I'm going to be free. “Expecto Patronum!” I have my godfather back. No more Dursleys. “Expecto Patronum!”

There.

Suddenly, a huge blinding light emerged from his wand, sending the dementors reeling back screaming. Harry's hand shook around his wand, the screaming still in his ears, his vision going fuzzy. He could make out some sort of four-legged animal — something with antlers? — galloping across the lake, driving the shadowy creatures away, but his knees gave way all the same, the magic burning through his exhausted body.

And then, everything went black.

.

Consciousness returned to Harry in two stages; the first stage of groggily blinking open his eyes, and the second stage of almost falling out of bed in his haste to get on his feet. “Mr Potter!” Madam Pomfrey exclaimed, rushing to his bedside as he struggled to stand. “Kindly desist, you’re going to hurt yourself!”

“Sirius!” Harry cried out. The nurse’s eyes went soft.

“No need to worry, my dear. Black is locked away upstairs, the dementors will be with him any minute. He can’t hurt you now.”

“What!” Her words had the opposite affect she intended as Harry tried to sit up once more. “No, they can’t, he’s innocent!” Surely Snape had explained?

He reached for his glasses, looking around the hospital wing as everything came into focus. Ron was passed out in the bed opposite, his bandaged knee propped up on a pillow. Hermione occupied the bed beside his, awake and looking just as horrified, her arm in a splint. And several beds down lay Professor Snape, still completely unconscious. Shit! He was their one hope of getting the headmaster and the Minister to see reason!

Harry’s shout must have been heard from the corridor, as the next minute, Minister Fudge himself was on the ward, accompanied by Professor Dumbledore.

“Minister, you’ve got the wrong man, Black’s innocent!” he insisted, and Fudge’s eyebrows rose in alarm.

“I say, dear boy; he must have hit you with quite the Confundus charm!”

“Harry’s right!” Hermione agreed, jumping out of bed herself. “Wake up Professor Snape, he’ll tell you!”

“Children, please, calm yourselves!” Madam Pomfrey cut in. “You’ve had quite the ordeal, it’s natural to be confused. Just lie down, and—“

“Professor Snape can confirm it,” Harry echoed Hermione. “Just wake him up.”

“Professor Snape has a very severe concussion; to wake him from that prematurely could cause serious brain injury,” Pomfrey scolded. It was on the tip of Harry’s tongue to tell her to just do it anyway, but he resisted. Brain damaged Snape wouldn’t help anything.

“Black must have filled their heads with his ridiculous tale,” Fudge said with a shake of his head. “Something about a rat, and Peter Pettigrew.”

“It’s the truth! Pettigrew’s an animagus, he was Ron’s rat, it was his fault my parents died!” Harry argued.

“Minister, if I might have a word with my students. Alone, if you don’t mind, Poppy?” Dumbledore requested. Neither the Minister nor Pomfrey looked impressed at being thrown out of the ward, but they did as the headmaster bid, Fudge declaring he was going to go wait for the dementors.

As soon as they were gone, Harry and Hermione about tripped over themselves trying to tell the whole story all at once.

“It is your turn to listen,” Dumbledore spoke over them, raising a hand. “There’s no time to interrupt. There is not a shred of proof that Sirius Black is an innocent man, as you say he is. The only two adults involved are currently unavailable, and by the time they can tell their story it will be too late. Cornelius will not wait around on the word of two thirteen year-olds. It’s too late, do you hear me?”

Harry glared at the old man— how could he just let Sirius die? Was he that desperate to keep control of Harry?

“But you believe us?” Hermione pressed.

“What I believe is neither here nor there,” Dumbledore told her. “I was not present, therefore I have no power. I cannot overrule the Minister for Magic.” It took all of Harry’s effort to hold back a derisive snort; as if Dumbledore didn’t overrule the Minister all the time. “What we need is more time.” He placed a strange emphasis on the words, and Hermione gasped. “Now listen closely. Sirius Black is being held in Professor Flitwick’s office. Seventh floor, thirteenth window from the right of the West Tower. If all goes well, you should be able to save two innocent lives tonight.”

Harry had officially lost the plot of the conversation, but Hermione was nodding as if the headmaster made total sense. “I am going to lock you in,” Dumbledore announced, straightening up. It is—“ he checked his watch “— five minutes to midnight. Three turns should do it. Good luck.”

“Good luck?” Harry mumbled, utterly perplexed as the door closed. “What the... Hermione, what was he talking about?” She seemed to know exactly what Dumbledore was getting at.

“Harry, come here,” Hermione urged, reaching into her robes and pulling out some sort of pendant on a very long, fine gold chain. Harry crossed the gap between their beds. The pendant was a tiny, sparkling hourglass. “Closer.” Hermione threw the chain around his neck, too, her movements a little awkward thanks to her tightly-splinted wrist.

“What is that, Hermione?” Harry asked with trepidation. The bushy-haired girl smiled breathlessly.

“Just trust me. Ready?”

Harry nodded. Hermione turned the hourglass over three times, and suddenly the ward around them dissolved. The world was nothing but a blur of colour and shapes around him, his blood rushing in his ears — and then it stopped, and he was on solid ground again. In the middle of the deserted Entrance Hall... in daylight?

Before he could speak, Hermione had him by the arm and was dragging him into a nearby broom cupboard. She removed the chain from his neck, stuffing the hourglass back in her robes. “What the hell just happened?” Harry asked in a furious whisper.

Hermione's explanation of the Time-Turner left him gobsmacked. "They trusted a fourteen year-old. With a time machine?? No offence," he added, realising how that sounded. Hermione snorted.

"It is a bit ridiculous, isn't it? All so I could take some extra classes. But Professor Dumbledore insisted I shouldn't have to 'curb my thirst for knowledge,'" she quoted. Harry's brow furrowed. What was Dumbledore planning? For that matter, why was he letting them save Sirius?

Unless he needed Harry's godfather for part of his grand plan? On the run, unable to spend much real time with Harry, but always just out of reach as a taunt of what might've been. Harry's stomach churned uncomfortably. He had the awful feeling they were playing right into Dumbledore's hand, but there was nothing he could do about it. Not if he wanted to save Sirius.

"So what's the plan?" he asked. "You said we're just outside, walking down to Hagrid's. How do we save Sirius? Go into the woods and look for him?"

"No, we can't disrupt the original flow of time. If we warn Sirius now, tonight will never happen," Hermione whispered.

"So... if we save him, it has to happen after he's already captured?" Harry thought carefully about Dumbledore's words, his specific instructions about Flitwick's office window. Two innocent lives. "Buckbeak."

"What?" Hermione was puzzled.

"Buckbeak. The other innocent life we save. We go and grab Buckbeak, wait until Sirius gets captured, then fly up to the window and go get him. He can escape on Buckbeak—they'll both be free."

"Harry, Buckbeak was killed," Hermione pointed out cautiously. Harry gave her a shrewd look.

"Was he?" he returned. "We heard the axe swing, we didn't see it. There's a chance."

It was a small chance, but it was all they had left.

Carefully, the two of them stuck to the edges of the lawn, sneaking behind the greenhouses and into the edge of the forest until they could see Hagrid's house. It was utterly bizarre, Harry thought, hearing his own voice as Hagrid let them in under the invisibility cloak.

"You've been doing this all year?" he murmured to Hermione. "Does it get any less weird?"

"Not in the slightest," she replied quietly, and the two shared a slightly manic smile. "We have to wait for the Committee to see Buckbeak, or Fudge will think Hagrid's hiding him."

The wait was excruciating. But finally, Hagrid opened the back door, and Harry could see himself, Ron and Hermione walk out of it. They threw the cloak over themselves, entirely unaware of their audience.

Harry was lucky that Buckbeak was familiar with him; once it was safe to move, the hippogriff was reluctant to leave Hagrid's pumpkin patch, and as Harry's furiously beating heart reminded him that it would just take one glance out the window for the people in Hagrid's hut to see him and ruin everything, he quietly begged the huge beast to move.

At last, Buckbeak was at the treeline, trotting at Harry's side. He forged on into the woods, skidding to a halt when Hagrid's back door slammed open. Harry couldn't stifle his smirk when Macnair and the Committee member exclaimed over Buckbeak's disappearance, even if Dumbledore did sound far too amused for his liking. Had this been the man's plan all along? Had he known about Pettigrew the whole time?

"And now we wait?" Hermione asked him, hugging herself around the waist with her good arm. Harry glance up through the trees; the sun was barely setting. It would be hours yet before Sirius would be captured.

"And now we wait," he agreed. "We should move, we won't be able to see the Whomping Willow from here." They stuck to the edge of the forest, hiding in the growing shadows as they moved closer to the Willow. They watched as Hermione appeared, sprinting after Scabbers. It was strange, watching things that had already happened from an entirely different perspective. Watching himself do things he'd already done.

At last they were all down in the tunnel, and it was silent once more. "How the hell have you been keeping track of yourself all year?" Harry breathed, shaking his head in astonishment. "I'd go mad." No wonder Hermione had spent the whole school year looking like she was on the verge of a breakdown. She was living about five extra hours to every day. Having to remember where she'd been at what time and who had seen her, so she didn't accidentally cross her own timeline. All for the sake of a few extra classes?

"It's been tough," Hermione agreed. "A few times I'd turn it back a couple of hours just to take a nap in an empty classroom. I don't think I'll do it again. It's too much."

"Dumbledore and McGonagall never should've let you do it in the first place," Harry muttered. "They should've just told you to self-study. You're smart enough not to need the lessons."

Hermione blushed, ducking her head bashfully. "It doesn't matter now. I've already dropped Divination, and I think I'll drop Muggle Studies as well."

That still left her with Arithmancy, Ancient Runes and Care of Magical Creatures, but Harry didn't say a word as they both caught sight of Professor Lupin sprinting across the grass towards the Willow. He levitated a branch to press the knot, sliding into the passageway like he'd done it a million times before. He probably had.

Shortly after, Snape appeared. He used the same branch as Lupin, grabbing Harry's invisibility cloak on the way down. A possessive urge reared in Harry, telling him to grab the cloak out of Snape's hands, but he ignored it. To his astonishment, Snape had been on their side. He'd been willing to listen.

He couldn't remember how long they'd been in the Shack for, once Snape had shown up. Surely it wasn't this long? It felt like they'd waited an age already. Buckbeak scratched impatiently at the ground.

At last, they heard footsteps. The strange group began to emerge from beneath the Willow; Snape levitating Ron, Lupin dragging Pettigrew, Harry and Sirius beaming at each other with Hermione bringing up the rear. Harry's chest tightened as the moon became clear, and everything all went horribly, horribly wrong.

"What if we went after him?" he whispered, watching Pettigrew transform.

"And try and look for a rat in the dark, with a werewolf running about?" Hermione retorted. Harry conceded the point. Then, he froze.

"Hermione, we need to move," he urged. She huffed.

"Harry, we can't interfere!"

"No, we need to move, before Lupin runs into the forest," he reminded pointedly, already up on his feet and yanking on Buckbeak's rope. Horror filled Hermione's eyes, and she whipped around. "Hagrid's cabin," Harry said, already running, Buckbeak at his side. "It'll be empty by now."

Fang barked at them when they threw themselves through the door, but Hermione soothed the huge dog. Buckbeak seemed delighted to be home, making himself comfortable in the bed Hagrid still had made up for him. "Don't go to sleep," Harry lightly scolded the animal, rolling his eyes.

They listened to Lupin howl and Sirius yelp, unable to see anything through Hagrid's window. "Why didn't you follow me?" Harry asked, knowing that outside at that moment a version of him was running towards the lake.

"I couldn't leave Ron," Hermione retorted. "I thought about getting help, but—I couldn't leave him. And then Dumbledore showed up anyway."

Harry scowled to himself—Dumbledore, as always, swooping in at the last minute. How convenient.

When they couldn't stand waiting any longer, the two students and the hippogriff snuck out of the cabin. Sure enough, there was Dumbledore, striding down towards the lake. Harry watched with his jaw clenched as the headmaster conjured stretchers for his and Sirius' unconscious forms, hurrying back to do the same for Snape and Ron while Hermione jogged at his side the whole way back to the castle.

From there, the clock was ticking — as soon as Macnair appeared to summon the dementors, Harry tugged on Buckbeak's rope to wake up the dozing hippogriff, then hoisted himself up onto the beast's back. Getting Hermione up there wasn't quite so smooth, with one of her arms out of commission, but with a bit of fumbling she was seated behind him, her face buried in Harry's shoulder, whimpering quietly.

Her arms were a vice grip around Harry's waist, but he ignored it, focusing on guiding Buckbeak up to the correct window. "He's there!" Harry reached over, knocking on the glass firmly. Sirius, slumped inside the office, sat up in shock. He scrambled to his feet, hurrying over to the window. Hermione raised her wand, unlocking it with a spell, and Sirius wrenched it open.

"Harry!" he gasped, stunned. "How?"

"Get on, there's not much time," Harry urged, shifting Buckbeak forward slightly so Sirius could climb on behind Hermione. "The dementors are coming."

Still gaping, Sirius hauled himself through the window and onto Buckbeak's back. Hermione locked the window once more, leaving it as if it had never been touched.

With everyone secure, Harry dug his heels in and guided Buckbeak all the way to the top of the West Tower. They landed with a clatter on the battlements, and Harry and Hermione slid off. "Sirius, you'd better leave, now. They'll notice you're gone any minute now."

"What about the others? Is everyone alright?" Sirius asked urgently. Harry shook his head; he needed to move!

"Everyone's fine, now go!"

"I'll write you," Sirius promised. "I'll figure something out. This isn't goodbye, Harry." He leaned down from the hippogriff, pressing his forehead to Harry's for the briefest moment. "Thank you."

For a moment, Harry thought about jumping back on Buckbeak and flying off with Sirius to who-knew-where. Away from Hogwarts, away from Dumbledore. Freedom.

But he couldn't. His friends needed him.

Instead, he stepped back to watch Sirius nudge the huge beast forward, Buckbeak's wings stretching wide as he launched himself off the battlements and into the sky. Hermione tugged on his arm. "We have to get moving, quickly!"

Harry wrenched his gaze away, allowing Hermione to drag him down the steps and back into the castle. Sirius would be fine, he told himself. He had to be.

Luckily, the West Tower wasn't too far from the hospital wing, and after a near-miss with Fudge in the hallway, they made it back to the doors just as Dumbledore was excusing himself from the ward. He smiled benevolently at them. Harry refused to meet his gaze. "All done, then?" Harry and Hermione both nodded. Dumbledore's smile widened. "Excellent. And I think—" He cocked his head, listening through the door, "—yes, I think you've gone too. Quickly, now." He ushered them back into the hospital wing, and the lock clicked behind them.

They'd done it.

Harry let out a breathless laugh, meeting Hermione's equally incredulous gaze. They crept back to their beds, just in time for Madam Pomfrey to emerge from her office. "Did I hear the headmaster leave? Am I allowed to look after my own patients, now?" She had a sour expression on her face as she shoved enormous blocks of chocolate at both Harry and Hermione. Harry settled down in his bed, taking a bite out of the sweet confection. He could relax now. Sirius was safe.

.

Severus ran gentle fingers over the lump on the back of his head, hissing as the flesh stung. It was too much to hope that the evening's events had been some bizarre, concussion-induced dream.

He'd woken up to the Minister raging in the middle of the hospital wing — Black had somehow escaped, right under his nose. Weasley was still unconscious, but when Severus dared look at Potter and Granger, they seemed entirely too innocent for their own good. Feigning sleep still, Severus managed to piece together what had happened after he'd been knocked out.

He never thought he'd see the day where he was actually pleased Sirius Black got off scot-free. He snorted to himself quietly; how things had changed. To learn that Pettigrew was the traitor after all... a few things certainly made sense, in hindsight. He wondered how Lupin was taking the whole affair, then glanced towards the window. The sun was only just rising over the tops of the trees. Lupin would have no clue about anything that had happened after his transformation.

Pulling himself into a standing position made Severus wince, but he was no stranger to pain. He bent down to buckle his boots, then straightened up, looking around the hospital wing. The three Gryffindors were fast asleep, and Poppy was nowhere to be found.

His wand was on the side table, and he grabbed it, tucking it back into his pocket as he walked somewhat gingerly from the ward. After a brief detour to get clothes for the man, he was striding across the lawn in the early dawn light, and stopped at the edge of the Forbidden Forest. "Point me Remus Lupin." His clear, curt tones had his wand spinning in his hand, and he walked on once it settled on a direction.

As he searched the dark woods, he couldn't stop his thoughts returning to what had happened the night before. The werewolf in front of him, rearing up with a howl, definitely bigger than it had been when he was sixteen. He could hardly believe he'd been so foolish as to stand in front of it, even if it had been to protect students. To protect Lily's boy. He'd stared a werewolf in the face, for the second time in his life, and lived to tell the tale. Hopefully, it would be the last time. But with some of his recent life choices, he found he couldn't promise himself that.

"Daft wolf," he muttered when he finally came across the man, wishing he didn't sound so fond. The greying man was sprawled awkwardly across the forest floor, entirely naked and covered in scratches. He groaned softly when Severus knelt down and placed a hand on his shoulder. "Come on, up you get. You need to get inside."

“Mmm, Severus?” he mumbled, blinking open hazy eyes. Severus watched as the events of the night rushed into clarity in the man’s eyes. “Harry!” he exclaimed, voice hoarse. “Oh, Merlin, is he alright? Did I hurt him? Where’s Sirius?— and— Peter!”

“Remus, breathe,” Severus cut through the man’s panicked ramblings, squeezing his shoulder. “Potter is fine. You didn’t hurt anyone. Pettigrew escaped, but so did Black.” He set the bundle he was carrying down on the ground, revealing a pair of soft black trousers and a thick brown cardigan. “Let’s get you back to the castle. I’ll explain everything on the way.”

It was slow going, getting Remus dressed and moving, and by the time they reached the castle doors Severus had given up letting the prideful idiot walk and just hauled him up into his arms. Remus looked up at him, grinning faintly. “I think I’m swooning,” he declared playfully, laughing when Severus scowled.

“Quiet, or I’ll leave you to crawl back to your quarters.” They both knew the threat was an empty one. Nonetheless, Remus settled down, a soft sigh escaping his lips as he rested his head against Severus’ shoulder. The Slytherin’s heart stuttered.

Finally, they were in Remus’ bedroom, and Severus deposited the man as gently as he could on the mattress. Remus closed his eyes for a long moment, then swore quietly. “Twelve years,” he murmured. “I thought my best friend was a murderer for twelve years. Peter, this whole time... how could I have been so wrong, Severus?”

“The evidence against Black was damning,” Severus pointed out. He perched on the edge of the mattress, his own muscles aching. His night hadn’t exactly been sunshine and roses either.

“I should’ve trusted him.”

“Why? He didn’t trust you.” Severus could still remember how it’d been back then, Remus full of anguish when he realised his friends were suspicious of him after all they’d been through, that they thought for even a second that he’d turn away from the Light. Severus had tried to convince him that their association wasn’t helping, but Remus refused to give him up. Foolish, idiot Gryffindor.

“If I’d pushed for a trial, this never would’ve happened. Harry never would have been raised by her.”

“The Ministry never would have listened to a werewolf,” Severus pointed out. “It’s all moot. What matters now is that we know the truth. Potter knows the truth.”

“But Sirius is still a criminal in the eyes of the world, and Peter’s free to take his slimy little traitorous arse back to his precious master, wherever he is,” Remus said with a scowl, wincing as it tugged on a cut on his face. Honey eyes met Severus’ dark ones, far too old to be sitting in such a young face. “Everything’s about to change, isn’t it, Severus?”

Severus glanced down to his fabric-covered left forearm, where the barely-there Dark Mark ached like it had been for the last year. Not enough to cause a problem, but enough to be noticeable. "I'm afraid you're right." They were on borrowed time. "This is only the beginning."

Remus' face twisted in resignation. He reached up to cup Severus' jaw, hand sliding around to the back of his head. Severus couldn't help but flinch as fingers pressed against the lump on his skull. "You're hurt," Remus realised. "What— was it me?"

Severus stayed silent, which was confirmation enough, and horror flooded Remus' face. "Oh, Severus, no. Tell me I didn't bite you. You said everyone was fine!"

"Hush, Remus," Severus soothed. "You didn't bite anyone. You merely knocked me aside when I stood between you and the children. I'll heal."

"You... you stood between me and the kids? After I'd transformed?" Severus nodded. In the blink of an eye, Remus was yanking him down, and suddenly there were lips pressed to his. Severus tensed, but muscle memory took over, his lips moving against Remus' and his hand tightening on the man's shoulder, pulling him closer. Twelve years, yet it felt like no time at all. His heart ached as Remus' tongue snuck between his lips, a low groan dragging from deep in the man's throat.

When Severus finally had the sense to pull away, he found himself with one leg flung over Remus' thigh, practically straddling the man. Remus stroked his cheek gently, his eyes alive in a way Severus hadn't seen all year. "I am so sick," the Gryffindor breathed, "of trying to pretend I'm not absolutely mad about you, Severus Snape." His kiss-swollen lips curved in a faint smile, his head tilting up to bare his neck slightly, the cardigan hanging off his narrow shoulders. With his mussed hair and trusting gaze, he looked like every dream Severus had never let himself have. "Stay. Please."

All year, Severus had been reminding himself of all the reasons he couldn't have Remus Lupin. Telling himself time and time again that his teenage desires were going to get one of them killed, and they were adults now, and childish love wasn't enough.

All those reasons seemed to have fled his brain as he stared down at the man who had seen him through everything, the man he kept coming back to no matter how many times they pushed each other away.

He righted himself, sitting on the edge of the mattress once more. A whimper escaped Remus' lips, the light in his eyes dimming.

Severus leaned down and unbuckled his boots.

He was done denying himself things. If the Dark Lord was to return, he deserved every scrap of good he could hold onto before it was too late.

He shrugged his teaching robe off his shoulders, letting it pool on the floor. He heard a sharp intake of breath. "Severus." The only person to ever say his name so reverently. He ached, all the way down to his bones, and not just from being flung across the grass by a full-grown werewolf. He was so tired. Tired of being alone. Tired of so many things.

Lying down on the mattress beside Remus felt like coming home for the first time in years. Their bodies were different, older — Severus wasn't as bony, and Remus was bonier than ever — but they curled into each other like two halves of a magnet, Remus tucking his face into Severus' neck, sprawled heavy over the Slytherin like he was scared Severus might leave as soon as he fell asleep. The weight was comforting, and Severus' hand settled low on Remus' back, beneath the cardigan, cool fingers pressing against warm skin. "Sleep," he urged in the barest whisper, burying his nose in the man's greying hair. He smelled like the forest, like wilderness. Severus' tame wild thing. Always Severus'. Even when neither of them wanted it that way.

"I missed you." Remus' words were muffled by Severus' collarbone, but he felt them all the same, shaking him down to his core. This felt like the first thing he'd done right since he'd turned spy against the Dark Lord.

They would have a lot to talk about in the morning. They would have plans to make, and headmasters to avoid, and lies to weave. It would be difficult, and dangerous. But they would do it. Together.

For now, Severus closed his eyes, breathing in the scent of his wolf, the comforting weight across his chest.

For now, they could sleep, like the world didn't exist. In that room, with the two of them finally reunited properly, after twelve years apart, it was enough. It had to be.

For now.

Chapter 11

Pomfrey released all three of them from the hospital wing after lunch the next day, and Harry had nearly forgotten that the world kept going on without them. The castle was almost entirely deserted, everyone taking advantage of the glorious weather and the lack of exams and the last Hogsmeade visit before the end of the school year. No one had any idea what had happened in the night, how close an innocent man had come to losing his life.

That was the thing about Hogwarts. It never failed to remind you that the universe didn't revolve around you.

Everyone knew, of course, that Sirius Black had been caught and escaped again. The Hogwarts rumour mill was a creature unto itself. But no one knew the truth.

None of the trio felt like going to Hogsmeade after everything that had happened. Ron's leg, despite being fixed up by Madam Pomfrey, was still sore and stiff, and privately Harry thought the redhead was shell-shocked from learning his pet rat had been a grown man the entire time. Hermione, on the other hand, seemed to finally be feeling the effects of her overloaded schedule; she'd gone up to bed, telling the boys not to wake her even if she slept through dinner.

That left Harry alone, wandering through the grounds in the bright sunlight, finding himself at the edge of the lake. He could hardly wrap his head around it all — he'd performed a proper Patronus charm, right there, and saved Sirius' life and his own. Hermione had been time-travelling for the entire bloody school year. It was madness.

“Alright, Harry?” It was Neville, his shirtsleeves rolled up to his elbows and dirt smudged across his forehead. “You and Ron weren’t in the dorms last night. I… what happened? Are you okay?”

“Yeah, it’s… a long story,” Harry dismissed with a shake of his head. “What are you up to?”

“I’ve been helping Professor Sprout get the greenhouses ready for the summer,” Neville explained. “With all the students gone, she’ll be looking after them all by herself, and some of the plants need to be moved first. I just came to get a bit of fresh air.” Neville sat down on the sand beside Harry, briefly bumping the smaller boy’s shoulder with his own. “You ready to leave?”

“I never am,” Harry replied wryly. Neville knew he didn’t like his muggle relatives, and he gave Harry a sympathetic grimace.

“Maybe you could come visit me and gran for a bit,” he suggested. “Dumbledore can’t keep you locked up with the muggles forever, right?”

Harry wanted to point out that the headmaster could and definitely would if he thought it would help his plans, but he stayed quiet. “Yeah, maybe.” That would be nice, going to Neville's house. His gran could help Harry learn about the Wizengamot, and what to do about Dumbledore.

"I wonder what our Defence teacher will be like next year," Neville mused, digging his fingers into the sand. "It's a shame about Professor Lupin. I mean, if he made it this far without eating anyone, clearly he can't be that bad."

"What?" Harry stared at him in alarm. Neville cocked his head.

"You haven't heard? Professor Lupin is a werewolf, Harry. Apparently Snape told all the Slytherins this morning. Everyone in the school knows by now. He's resigned, I heard. Packing up his stuff today."

Harry froze. No, Snape wouldn't... he couldn't. Lupin was leaving?

He scrambled to his feet. "I have to go." Neville called out after him, but Harry was already sprinting back towards the castle. He couldn't let Lupin leave, not yet.

Lupin's office door was open when Harry ran towards it, and he flung himself into the room, gasping. Most of the man's things were already gone, and a steady stream of books were floating off the shelf and packing themselves neatly in a trunk, guided by Lupin's wand. The man looked up when Harry entered, his eyes sad. "Hello, cub," he greeted. "Heard the news?"

"You can't leave," Harry blurted.

"I'm afraid I have to, Harry. This time tomorrow, the owls will start pouring in. Attitudes are better, but there are plenty of parents who won't want a dangerous, bloodthirsty beast living in the castle with their children." His tone was wry, resigned. Harry glared at him.

"You're not dangerous," he insisted. "You're the best Defence teacher we've ever had."

That made Lupin smile. "Thank you, Harry. But I'm afraid not everyone is as open-minded as you."

"I can't believe Snape," Harry growled. "I was just starting to think he might be alright. How dare he tell everyone!"

"Severus didn't say a word," Lupin told him firmly. "I can assure you of that. No, my secret was spilled by... another source. Severus was part of the conversation, but he didn't realise one of his Slytherins was eavesdropping until after Dumbledore left."

Harry looked at his professor, comprehension dawning, and his face grew dark when Lupin nodded. Dumbledore. Of course. "He did it on purpose." He had no proof, but he didn't need it. Remus nodded in agreement.

"Most likely. I got too close to you, Harry. He doesn't like that." Lupin reached into his desk drawer and pulled out a familiar piece of old parchment. "However, now I'm no longer your teacher, I feel no remorse about giving you this back. This, too; Severus retrieved it from the Shack this morning.” He brought Harry’s invisibility cloak out from behind his chair, neatly folded. “From one Marauder to another. The legacy you should’ve had since the very start.”

Harry’s breath caught in his throat as he took both items from Lupin. It was ridiculous, he’d had both of them in his possession before, but being given them now felt... bigger. His father’s legacy. “Keep them safe, Harry.”

“I don’t want you to go,” Harry said quietly, sounding far younger than his thirteen years. Lupin smiled, reaching out to squeeze his shoulder.

“It’s for the best, cub. I’m about to have some other priorities, once I catch up with an old friend,” he said with a pointed glance. “And you could do with more allies outside the castle.”

“But I just got you back.” Harry hated how desperate it came out. Lupin softened, pulling him into a brief, tight hug.

“You still have me, cub, I promise,” he vowed, lips pressed to Harry’s hair. He let go, smiling. “I’m not about to let you slip out of my life a second time, regardless of what happens. You’re family.”

“Family,” Harry echoed, a slow smile creeping across his face. He’d never had one of those he actually liked before.

“I’m proud of you, you know,” Lupin said, turning back to his packing. Harry stowed his map and cloak away in his bag, raising an eyebrow. “Rumour has it, you performed quite the Patronus charm last night.”

“It was a stag,” Harry boasted, and Lupin beamed. “That was Prongs, right?”

“Indeed it was. Your father’s animagus form was really quite something. James would be over the moon to see your Patronus take after him.”

Harry beamed at the thought, his heart clenching. At least this way it was like he had his dad with him still, after a fashion. “Are you alright?” he asked, brows furrowing in concern. Lupin seemed to be moving a little stiffly. “After last night and everything.”

“Oh, don’t worry about me, cub. I’m more than used to the whole process by now,” Lupin assured with a shake of his head. “I’m just glad none of you got hurt. I’ve not been that irresponsible about a moon since... well. Never mind. I suppose, under the circumstances, priorities were a little off last night. But Severus got me back to the castle safely this morning, and I’ll be right as rain in a day or two.”

Harry bit his lip; it was awful to think that his friendly, quiet professor had to go through such a painful-looking ordeal every month, that he was so accustomed to it he didn’t even flinch at the memory. Lupin was far stronger than he looked; stronger than Harry had given him credit for.

The latter half of the man's words made Harry pause, his thoughts returning to the night before. "Look. Um. About Sn— Professor Snape." The professor paused in his packing, face turning apprehensive. "I know you said that you know him differently — I mean, clearly; you went to school together and all. And he was decent last night. But all the rest of the time... he hates me. He's constantly singling me out and giving me detention even though my Potions' work is no worse than Ron's, and it's way better than Neville's! He's awful to me all the time and I know he hated my dad but I'm not him, and surely— can you talk to him, or something?"

He winced at the slight crack in his voice; the last thing he wanted was to sound like a whiny little child. He just didn't understand. Snape seemed to have two totally different personalities these days, and Harry brought out the worst in him.

Lupin sighed, leaning against his desk. "Professor Snape doesn't hate you, Harry, I can promise you that," he declared. Harry raised a skeptical eyebrow. "I'm serious. Yes, the history between him and James — and him and Sirius — is... complicated, to say the least. And I don't doubt that Severus uses James' name against you far more often than he should. But you have to understand, cub; when we were younger, it was even harder to be a Slytherin than it is now. Severus' contemporaries were the likes of Avery and Lestrange and Malfoy. Being a Slytherin of particular talents, he was — and still is — expected to run in certain circles."

It started to dawn on Harry with a sickening sort of clarity. "Circles that wouldn't like hearing he'd been nice to Harry Potter in class," he finished dully. Lupin grimaced, but nodded.

"He walks a dangerous line. With Dumbledore on one side, and... others waiting in the shadows. He must act as he is expected to act, regardless of his personal feelings on the matter. But I promise you can trust him, Harry. Now more so than ever, if I won't be in the castle. He's a good ally to have." His lips quirked wryly. "I trust him with my life, and he has earned that trust a dozen times over. Regardless of any... issues we may have had as schoolboys." Lupin clapped Harry on the shoulder, squeezing gently. "Does that help to hear?"

"It does, actually. Thank you." Harry had been learning all year about the roles people had to play in public — including the roles he himself was destined to hide behind. Clearly it was all far more complicated than Lupin made it seem; but Harry hadn't expected him to air Snape's personal business to a student, even his cub. Something settled in his chest at the confirmation, though — Snape was just keeping up appearances, the same as the rest of them.

Harry could work with that.

He was about to ask another question when they were interrupted by a knock on the open door — Professor Dumbledore, looking apologetic. "I'm afraid it's time. Your carriage is at the gates, Remus. I thought I might escort you down." He didn't look entirely thrilled to see Harry in there talking to Lupin, and Harry tried not to glare at the old man.

"I'll come with you," Harry said, daring the headmaster to tell him otherwise.

Lupin sent the last of his things into his trunk with a wave of his wand, then levitated it out of the room, following behind Dumbledore with Harry at his side.

“Why so glum, Harry?” Dumbledore asked, turning back to him as they walked. “You should be very proud of what you accomplished last night. You saved an innocent man from a terrible fate.”

A memory flashed behind Harry’s eyes. Trelawney rigid in her chair. Greater and more terrible than ever before. How could he have forgotten? “Professor,” he asked, looking up at the headmaster. “Has Professor Trelawney ever made a genuine prediction?”

Dumbledore froze, his eyes going wide and panicked for the briefest of seconds. Harry almost missed it. A blink later, and he was back to his genial self. “Professor Trelawney? Why, I believe she must have made some correct ones, in her time. Why do you ask?”

“I think she made one after my Divination exam yesterday. She said Voldemort’s servant would set out to return to him before midnight, and he’d help him rise to power.” Harry didn’t want to tell Dumbledore the exact wording of the prophecy, just in case he knew more than Harry did. All the same, the man looked a little too happy to get news like that. Again, he hid it quickly, but Harry was watching closely enough to see the satisfied smirk whip across the headmaster’s face. Beside Harry, Lupin looked grim.

“One thing you’ll learn about prophecies, Harry, is that they are inevitable. Nothing you could have done last night would have changed the outcome — if that is what is to come to pass, then that is what will be. You cannot blame yourself for the whims of fate.”

“But we have to be ready, if Voldemort is really coming back!” Harry wanted to know if Dumbledore was truly going to keep him docile, tugging him along like a lamb to slaughter. Would he let Harry prepare himself?

“I think that’s best left to the adults, don’t you, Harry?” Dumbledore replied lightly. “You merely need to worry yourself about enjoying your summer freedom.”

When the headmaster wasn’t looking, Harry shared a look with Remus. Just what was the old man planning, and why did it involve keeping Harry in the dark with his powers bound in the face of something so dangerous?

At Dumbledore’s prompting, Harry said goodbye to Lupin at the Entrance Hall, making no move to suggest their relationship was anything more than student and favoured professor. He watched the pair walk down the drive, the cogs turning in his brain. There were so many secrets, so many things he didn’t know. Harry didn’t like it.

He wanted to know what Dumbledore was up to, before the man’s plans got him killed.

.-. .

A few days before the end of term, Harry got a letter from Sirius, carried by an owl that looked like a fluffy grey tennis ball.

Dear Harry,

I hope this reaches you before you leave Hogwarts. I have a few doubts about the owl's reliability, but he's the best I could find.

I'm safe. We both are. I won't tell you anything more, just in case, but I'm safe. The dementors are still searching, but they haven't a hope of finding me here. I'm going to let some muggles get a glimpse of me soon, far from Hogwarts. Hopefully they'll lift the security on the castle for next year.

Also, I have a confession to make. I sent you the Firebolt, with a little help from Crookshanks. Think of it as twelve birthdays' worth of presents from your godfather.

I won't say much more, in case this letter gets into the wrong hands. But know I'm thinking of you, and there's a little Maraudering afoot. You'll know more when the time comes. For now, keep your head down, and your ears sharp.

I am enclosing something else for you, which I think will make your next year at Hogwarts more enjoyable.

If you ever need me, send word. I love you, pup. I'll write again soon.

Sirius.

PS - I thought your friend Ron might like to keep this owl, as it's my fault he no longer has a rat.

Harry hesitated to show the letter to Ron and Hermione, but they were both with him when the letter was delivered, so he couldn't really say no. To his surprise, Ron held the owl up to Crookshanks for inspection before claiming the little creature, wanting to check it wasn't hiding anything.

Harry was overjoyed by the small piece of parchment included in the envelope; signed permission from Sirius for Harry to visit Hogsmeade. That would be good enough for Dumbledore, he hoped.

"What does he mean, there's Maraudering afoot?" Hermione asked, reading the letter carefully. Harry, who hadn't shared the entire history of his father's legacy with his friends, merely shrugged.

"Who knows," he said evasively. He hoped it meant that Lupin had found Sirius, wherever he was.

"Brilliant," Ron declared, staring at his new owl. "Way better than some stupid rat."

Harry laughed, shaking his head. Ron still hadn't completely forgiven Harry and Hermione for going back in time without him. Hopefully the owl would go some way towards soothing his ruffled feathers.

.-. .

Harry's last night in the castle found him wandering the halls past curfew, safe under his invisibility cloak, enjoying it much more now he didn't have to worry about a mass-murderer coming after him. He glanced down at the crumpled paper in his hand, checking he was in the right place, then snuck into the classroom to his left.

For once, Draco was already in there. He jumped when the door opened, and Harry shrugged the cloak off, revealing himself. The blond's eyes went wide. "You have an invisibility cloak," he realised. "Suddenly a lot of things are making sense."

"It definitely comes in handy," Harry replied, grinning.

Draco shook his head, gesturing for Harry to pull up a chair. "No wonder you're always getting into trouble. I bet you had something to do with Black's little adventure, too — I heard you were in the hospital wing that night."

Biting his lip, Harry met suspicious grey eyes. "Maybe," he admitted eventually. "Sirius Black is innocent, Draco. It's a long story, but he never worked for Voldemort. Peter Pettigrew did. He framed Sirius and faked his own death."

Draco stared at him incredulously. Eventually, he scoffed. "One day, you'll tell me that long story."

"You believe me?" Harry hadn't expected it to be that easy.

"You have no reason to lie to me about something like that," Draco pointed out. "I'll expect an explanation in future. But for now, your word is enough."

It amazed Harry how far they'd come from the year before, where they could barely stand to look at each other without wanting to hex each other. He much preferred this.

"So what are your plans for the summer?" he asked curiously, bringing the conversation round to lighter topics. Draco shrugged.

"I might go with Blaise and his mother to Italy for a while. And Mother wants to spend some time at the family home in France. Father never comes with us, there. He's got too much work to do to take a holiday." Harry imagined spending a week or two without Lucius Malfoy was the highlight of Draco's summer. "Do you... do you think we'll be able to write? Or will Dumbledore find out?"

Brow furrowed, Harry hummed thoughtfully. "I don't know. If I'm back at the Dursleys, I might not be able to write to anyone, let alone you." He'd be lucky if they let him have Hedwig out. Hell, after the way he left, he'd be lucky if they didn't lock him back in his cupboard all summer. "I wonder if I can get away with another bout of 'accidental' magic. Give me an excuse to run to Diagon for the summer again. That was nice." He doubted he'd be allowed to get away with it twice, but it was a nice thought.

"Whatever you do, just be careful," Draco replied. "I know it's hard for you, Potter, but do try and stay out of any life-or-death situations for at least two months." His tone was mocking, but the concern was real, and it warmed Harry's heart.

How far they'd come indeed, for Draco Malfoy to genuinely be worried about the safety and wellbeing of Harry Potter.

.-. .

The train ride home was a quiet one, especially when he compared it to the one that had brought them to school at the beginning of the year. Harry was surprised at how many people managed to catch him while he was walking to the bathroom at the end of the train, imploring him to keep in touch over the summer. Susan Bones; Parvati Patil; even Daphne Greengrass told him to send her an owl sometime. It felt like he'd stepped into some bizarre alternate universe.

He returned to his carriage with Ron and Hermione, where they were also joined by Neville, Ginny, and a girl with pale blonde hair that Harry didn't recognise. "This is Luna," Ginny said by way of introduction. "She's in my year, in Ravenclaw."

The blonde girl stared at him with a somewhat dazed smile. "Hello, Harry Potter. I'm glad to see you don't have wrackspurts on you this year. They looked awfully uncomfortable last year."

Harry blinked. "Uh. What?" Ginny giggled.

"Luna's a bit... interesting, but she means well," she assured. Harry, who still had absolutely no idea what was going on, merely shook his head and sat down between Ron and Neville. Whatever; if Ginny's weird friend wanted to sit with them, that was fine by him.

"Cheer up, Harry," Hermione said as she watched him stare forlornly at the castle disappearing behind the mountains. "I'm sure we'll be able to see you this summer."

"Yeah, I've been thinking about that," Ron said. "You've got to come stay with us, Harry. It's the Quidditch World Cup this summer, Dad says he can get tickets from work. You can't miss it!"

Harry, who had never been to a live quidditch match but had listened to lots of them on the Wizarding Wireless he'd bought last summer, brightened up considerably at that. "That'd be brilliant. I bet the Dursleys would love to get rid of me." It all boiled down to whether Dumbledore would let him go. Surely he couldn't find an excuse not to? He didn't seem to mind Harry spending time with the Weasleys.

Conversation livened up as Ron and Ginny started debating over which team would win the World Cup, and Harry leaned back in his seat, a small, sad smile on his face.

There had been a whole half hour, a glorious half hour, where he'd thought he would be going to live with Sirius when he left Hogwarts this year.

If only that were the case.

.-. .

As it turned out, having an escaped convict for a godfather was surprisingly good for Harry's continued existence at the Dursleys. By which he meant Uncle Vernon had only smacked him around a little bit for what he'd done to Aunt Marge, rather than beating Harry within an inch of his life like he'd expected.

Of course, he didn't expect things to last, once Vernon clocked on to the fact that, being an escaped convict, Sirius would have a difficult time coming to Harry's rescue should anything terrible happen. But until that fact dawned, Harry was happy to live with his relatives in a state of uneasy truce. With any luck, he could get permission to go to the Weasleys' before things got truly awful.

Two days into Harry's summer break, at approximately five-fifteen in the evening, the doorbell rang.

Harry — who was up in his room, staring at the ceiling and debating maybe getting a headstart on his Transfiguration homework — didn't think much of the interruption, though he heard Uncle Vernon muttering about how rude it was to call at such an hour, shouting for his wife to get the door. Harry rolled over on his bed, wincing when it jarred one of the bruises on his back.

Then Aunt Petunia screamed.

On his feet like a shot, Harry hurried down the stairs, wand flicking out of the invisible holster on his wrist. Had Voldemort found him already?

To his utter astonishment, the person in the doorway was not Voldemort. It was Professor Snape, dressed like a muggle in black trousers and a black button-up shirt, his dark eyes fixed on Harry's aunt and a smirk tugging at his lips. "Hello, Petunia," he drawled.

"You," Aunt Petunia gasped, one hand clutching at her chest in shock. "How— you're— that awful Snape boy." The vitriol was clear in her tone. Harry gaped.

"You two know each other?"

Snape's eyes flicked away from Petunia to look at Harry, his smirk widening a fraction. "Your aunt and I are old friends, Potter."

Petunia let out a strange sort of squawking sound. "Friends! As if I ever would have been friends with a freak like you. Telling Lily all about that horrible school until she couldn't wait to go with you, coming home every summer and flaunting your abnormality all over the place."

Harry had known Snape and his mother were friends in school — Lupin had told him that ages ago — but he hadn't realised they'd known each other before Hogwarts.

"May I come in?" Snape requested, already stepping inside and shutting the door behind him, nudging past a still-horrified Petunia. By now, both Vernon and Dudley were in the living room doorway, Dudley's beady little eyes screwed up in confusion.

"Petunia? Who is this man?" Vernon boomed, stepping up towards the stranger in his home as if he had any hope of intimidating Severus Snape. Snape's eyes trailed over him in disgust.

"He's one of them, Vernon. He went to school with the boy's parents!" Petunia took a step towards her husband, whose face began to turn red, and he puffed himself up even further.

"Now look here, you," Vernon started, pointing one fat finger at Snape's face. "You have no right to come into my home and—and frighten my wife! We took the boy back like the old man told us, the rest of it is our business!"

"Are you quite finished?" Snape asked, boredom in his tone. Vernon spluttered, face growing even redder, a vein throbbing above his temple. Harry wondered in vague amusement if this would finally be the moment the man had a stroke. "Potter, pack your things."

"I can't, sir," Harry replied evenly. "They're locked under the stairs." He'd picked the lock and smuggled some of his books and such up his first night back, like he had done last year, but the rest was still locked in his cupboard.

Snape waved a hand, and the padlock on the cupboard fell off, broken. All three Dursleys flinched. Harry laughed when he saw Dudley with his back to the wall, trying to make himself look as small as possible — an incredible feat, at his size — with his hands over his fat bottom. His pig tail had obviously left some fond memories.

With the cupboard open, Harry dragged his trunk and Hedwig's empty cage out. His cheeks turned pink in shame when he felt Snape peering over his shoulder, taking in the small space; the ragged cot that had never left, the broken toys piled lovingly on one side, the clear signs that someone had once lived in there. Harry shut the door quickly. "Do I need all of my things, sir?"

"I refuse," Vernon cut in, "to let this man undermine me in my own home! You're not going anywhere, boy."

Harry flinched at the snarled word despite himself. To his utter shock, Snape placed a hand on his shoulder, staring Vernon down in a way that had made even seventh years wet themselves in fear. Vernon let out a tiny 'meep', his moustache trembling.

"You're even more of an idiot than I thought you were if you believe you can order me around, muggle," Snape said sharply. "Potter is coming with me. For the rest of the summer. We may need to... drop in, from time to time. It wouldn't do for certain people to realise he's no longer living here. But you will allow him to come and go as he pleases. Or I might just have to share a few childhood stories with some of your lovely neighbours, Petunia. There are some rather... interesting tales, don't you recall?"

Petunia looked like she was about to faint in horror. "Fine, take the boy," she said, waving a hand. "Just get out! I don't want you anywhere near my family!"

"Believe me, Petunia, I have no desire to be near your... family." Snape's eyes turned to Dudley, making it abundantly clear what he thought of the boy. Dudley whimpered. "Get a move on, Potter. Your godfather is waiting."

Harry's face split into a grin. Snape was taking him to Sirius! He went to drag his trunk up the stairs, but with a wave of Snape's wand it began to levitate up behind him. "Sir," he said quietly, once they were up the stairs and out of earshot of his relatives. "Won't the Ministry be able to track that?" Between breaking the padlock and levitating Harry's trunk, wouldn't he get Harry in trouble?

"I have ways of keeping my magic undetected," Snape assured him. He waited in the doorway to Harry's room, his gaze studying it. Harry's stomach turned when he realised Snape would piece it all together. No normal boy had eight locks on the outside of his bedroom door, or a cat-flap, or the need to hide his homework beneath a loose floorboard. No normal boy had zero signs whatsoever that the room he lived in even belonged to him. He grit his teeth, keeping his head held high. He refused to let Snape mock him for this.

"Hedwig is out hunting," he said, shoving the rest of his possessions into his trunk. He didn't have much — he hadn't dared take out any of his new clothes, in case the Dursleys asked where he got them, and the only magical items he had out were his wand and his homework supplies. "Will she be okay?"

"She'll find you," Snape assured. "Is that everything?"

Harry gave his room one last scan, then nodded. "Yes, sir."

Snape shrunk Harry's trunk down to the size of a matchbox, then led the way back down the stairs, grabbing Hedwig's cage and shrinking that down too. "Ready?"

"Yes, sir." Harry looked to his relatives, quietly amazed that none of them had fainted in fear. If only he'd known sooner that his grouchy Potions' professor could inspire such reactions in his aunt!

"As I said, Petunia. Potter will come and go as he pleases, and if I find out you've told anyone where he is or who he's with, I promise you will regret it," Snape said coldly, staring Petunia right in the eye. She glared at him, arms folded over her chest.

"Your father should've tried harder to beat it out of you," she spat. "You have my word, Snape. We won't say anything."

Harry gaped at his professor, Petunia's words making a sickening realisation come together in his mind. Beat it out of you.

Maybe he and Snape were more alike than he thought.

To his credit, Snape didn't so much as flinch, offering one last sneer before turning to Harry. "Hold my arm, Potter. Tightly, now."

Harry did as bid, gripping tight to Snape's forearm, and all of a sudden the world span on its axis.

It was just for a split second, but Harry felt like he was being shoved through a small tube. His knees buckled slightly when he landed, but Snape kept him upright, walking him forward several steps. “Side-Along Apparition. Not entirely pleasant the first few times,” the professor explained. Harry let go of his arm, staring in shock.

They had arrived in the middle of a long gravel driveway, with wide stretches of lawn either side that faded into woodland. At the end of the driveway was an enormous manor house. All dark wood and grey stone, it was an imposing silhouette against the forest behind it, four stories tall and bigger than anything Harry had seen before.

“Where are we?” he breathed in amazement, looking for any sort of clue as to where Snape had taken him. Were they even still in England?

Then, the front door of the manor slammed open, and bounding down the steps came an enormous black shaggy dog.

Chapter 12

As soon as he saw Padfoot, Harry's heart skipped a beat. He laughed, dropping to his knees with his arms wide open, but by the time the dog took his last huge leap towards Harry he was transformed back into a man, wrapping the boy in a crushing hug. "Hello, pup," he greeted huskily.

"Sirius." Harry clung to the man like he might disappear, burying his face in the man's robe.

"I may vomit," Snape drawled, and Harry heard a familiar chuckle.

"Behave, Severus."

Harry's head snapped up, his grin getting, if possible, even wider. "Professor Lupin!"

The werewolf smiled back at him, standing shoulder to shoulder with Snape. "I'm not your professor anymore, remember?" he pointed out lightly. "I think it's about time you called me Remus."

Harry tore himself away from his godfather, getting to his feet in order to hug his ex-professor too. "Remus," he echoed. Remus' cheek pressed against his hair for a brief moment.

"It's good to see you, cub."

Sirius stood up, slinging one arm each around Harry and Remus. He'd showered and shaved since Harry had last seen him, and already he looked like a much younger man. He looked happy.

"What is this place?" Harry asked again, looking back to the manor in front of him.

"This is Seren Du House," Sirius announced, a strange accent on the words; Welsh, maybe, or Gaelic. "It's been in the Black family for centuries."

"But this one wasn't in the portfolio the goblins sent me," Harry said with a frown. Sirius' grin widened.

"This is one of two Black properties the goblins don't know about. Our family does love its secrets, after all." Harry's heart fluttered at the easy way he said 'our family', including Harry without batting an eyelash. "It's completely Unplottable; that means no one can find it on a map, or with any tracking spells. You have to know where to look. And, as that's in the middle of nowhere in North Wales, and there's only about six people alive who have ever been here before, I'd say you're pretty safe."

"Wow." Harry wished he could think of something more eloquent to say, but words had failed him.

“Are you quite done gaping?” Snape cut in, though his words weren’t quite as harsh as they might have been a year ago. Sirius rolled his eyes.

“Let him stare, Snape. He’s had a shock.” He glanced down to Harry, his expression growing softer, more tentative. “You said, before I had to run again, that you’d like to live with me. If you could. Well... here you are. A new home, if you’d like it.”

“It’s brilliant,” Harry assured, beaming.

Sirius rocked up on his toes, releasing him and Remus and bounding back towards the house. “Come on, I’ll show you inside!”

“It’s like having another child,” Snape muttered. Harry’s eyes widened when Remus elbowed the man gently in the side.

“Leave him be, he’s just excited. He hasn’t had much to be happy about in the last twelve years,” he chided.

Harry followed his godfather up to the manor doors, and into a grand entrance hall. There was a huge dark wood staircase in front of him, the walls painted dark blue and the floors a gleaming white marble. The only portraits hanging were landscapes; no people whatsoever. “We’ll give you the grand tour tomorrow,” Sirius promised. “But Ceri almost has dinner ready.”

With Sirius’ guiding hand on his shoulder, Harry was led into a large kitchen and dining area, with a long wooden table set for four places. At the stove, perched on a stool, was a house elf. The elf wore a little black pinafore dress with a crest on the front that Harry recognised as the Black family crest. She — presumably a girl, going by the dress — turned when they entered, and her face lit up. “Master Harry, sir!” she greeted, bowing so low her nose touched the stool. “Master Sirius be saying he was bringing his godson soon! I is Ceri, young master; the elf of Seren Du. It is being an honour to have you here!”

“It’s, uh, nice to meet you too, Ceri,” Harry replied. His only previous experience of house elves was Dobby, and that had been... a little volatile.

“Such manners, young master!” Ceri muttered approvingly. “Please be sittings for dinner, sirs.”

The four of them sat at the table, and Ceri soon had enormous plates of roast dinner in front of them; beef with all the trimmings, even Yorkshire puddings. Harry, who had barely eaten more than a few slices of bread and some cheese since he’d left Hogwarts, felt his mouth start to water. “This looks amazing, Ceri.”

“Thank you, young master! If yous be needing anything else, just call for Ceri.” With that she disappeared, leaving the four of them to their meal.

“Pass the gravy, would you, Snape?” Sirius asked politely, reaching out for the porcelain gravy boat. Snape did as asked, and Harry goggled. Last he’d known, Sirius and Snape hated each other. Snape had reluctantly agreed to hear him out the night of Pettigrew's escape, but there was definitely no love lost between the pair. What had changed?

Harry's eyes turned to Remus, who was sat beside Snape, happily stealing the man's parsnips in exchange for his own carrots. He'd bet his Firebolt the werewolf had something to do with it.

"So you've been here since you escaped, have you?" Harry asked, once he'd sated his immediate hunger. He had to eat slowly, or he'd make himself sick. "Where's Buckbeak?"

"In the stables, out back. Loves it out here, he does; free run of the woods, as long as he's home by nightfall," Sirius said, looking pleased. Harry was glad; Buckbeak deserved some freedom, after being cooped up in Hagrid's hut for so long. "I stopped off long enough to find that owl and get a letter to you, then took a quick jaunt down to Norfolk to let some muggles see me, before heading this way. I hadn't been here since I was about thirteen, but I found it in the end."

"This place is incredible," Harry muttered, looking around. It was old-fashioned, but very clean, and surprisingly well decorated for a house that apparently hadn't seen people in two decades.

"Ceri kept it in good nick, waiting for the day the family would come use it again," Sirius agreed. "Just wait 'til you see the rest of it. I loved it as a kid — it's for family only, not visitors, so it's not nearly as stuffy and pretentious as the rest of the Black properties. Closest thing to home I had, except Hogwarts." He smiled, as if thinking of fond memories.

"Anyway, as soon as Remus left the school he wrote me to see where I was, and I went and picked him up outside of Aberystwyth. He brought Snape with him a week or so later when the term ended."

"Wait, you live here too?" Harry blurted, turning to Snape. The dark-haired man nodded.

"Not permanently. I have a role to play back at Hogwarts, and the headmaster expects certain things of me. But I plan to spend much of my summer here." For some reason, that made Remus grin into his roast potatoes, and Sirius roll his eyes.

"Lucky me," he muttered under his breath, then cursed. Harry got the feeling Remus had just kicked him under the table. "Anyway," he continued, turning back to Harry, "when Remus told me you'd been living with Lily's harpy of a sister, we knew we couldn't let that slide. So I had Ceri clear a room for you, and Snape was kind enough to play chaperone. Was it everything you dreamed of?" That was directed at the Potions Master, who smirked, eyes flashing.

"Seeing Petunia again was quite satisfying, thank you."

"She looked like she'd seen a ghost," Harry said, laughing. "How do you know her, Professor?" If Sirius was making an effort to be nice to Snape, then he supposed he could as well. The man had just rescued him, after all.

"I grew up in the same town as your mother's family; Cokeworth, not far from Wolverhampton. Lily and I met when we were seven, and Petunia was... not pleased with our association. Especially not once Lily got her Hogwarts letter and I was allowed to tell her the truth about magic," Snape explained.

"You knew my mum when she was little? What was she like?"

"That is a story for another time, Potter," Snape said, his tone surprisingly gentle. "One that I would be willing to share with you. Not tonight, however."

"You're safe from Dumbledore here, cub. He'll never even know you're gone," Remus promised.

"And you wanna know the best part?" Sirius was practically bouncing in his seat as he spoke. "The place is Unplottable, and the woods are full of old, wild magic — you can do as much magic as you like here and the Ministry won't know a thing."

Harry's eyes were round and gleaming at the prospect of being able to do as much magic as he wanted all summer. "Brilliant."

When their plates started growing empty, there was a small pop, and the centre of the table suddenly held a delicious-looking tower of profiteroles. "Your house elf is going to give me diabetes, Black," Snape muttered, though he served himself a decent-sized bowl of the dessert. Sirius barked out a laugh.

"She'll calm down eventually, she's just happy to have people to cook for again. Besides, according to her we could all do with a bit more meat on our bones. I can't say she's wrong, to be honest."

Harry looked around the table; all four of them were indeed painfully skinny, Sirius and Harry more than the other two. "It's like being at Hogwarts, but better," Harry remarked, swallowing a mouthful of profiterole.

There wasn't much talking while the four ate their dessert, and when the table was clear Remus cleared his throat. "I thought we might head to the living room and talk for a while. There's still so much Sirius and I don't know about your life, Harry, and I thought it might be good for Sirius and Severus to learn about what happened to you last summer." The two men in question gave him a concerned look, and Harry grimaced. Yes, he had a lot of explaining to do.

The living room turned out to be upstairs, and Ceri already had a fire going to ward off the evening chill. It held two comfortable-looking sofas and a pair of squashy armchairs, and Harry chose one of the sofas, surprised when Sirius sat next to him. Remus and Snape took the other sofa.

Ceri popped into the room. "Can Ceri be getting sirs anything to drink?"

"Just tea if you wouldn't mind, Ceri," Remus requested. The house elf nodded, her large ears flopping, and she returned moments later with a tea tray set for four, a small pile of biscuits in the centre.

“How does Master Harry like his tea?” She was already making up three other cups, and Harry blinked.

“Uh, bit of milk, one sugar, thanks.” Ceri floated a teacup in his direction, then bowed and disappeared.

“What happened last summer, pup?” Sirius asked, dark brows knitted together in worry. Harry took a deep breath.

“Well, I suppose I should give you a bit of backstory, first. You know I live — lived — with the Dursleys. Well, Uncle Vernon has this sister...” Harry gave them a brief run-down of the joys of Aunt Marge, and a summary of what she’d said about his parents; something that had Sirius growling like his canine counterpart, and even Remus baring his teeth.

“So I ended up living in Diagon Alley for the last couple weeks of summer. And at one point, I went to Gringotts to get money from my vault, only I didn’t have my key, so the goblins scanned my magic. And...” Here he swallowed thickly. Sirius’ hand rested on his knee, squeezing in support. Slowly, Harry revealed what the goblins had discovered — all of it. He told them all four houses he was inheriting, and their suspicions about who cast the magic, and the consequences Gorra had heavily implied would come of him turning seventeen with the block still active.

By the end of his tale, Sirius was pacing the length of the living room in white-knuckled fury. “That manipulative, lying, no-good, scheming,” he muttered under his breath. Some of the knickknacks on the shelves began to rattle.

“Sirius, control yourself,” Remus called in a firm voice. “I’m as angry as you are, but blowing up the crockery won’t help anything.” Sirius seemed to realise his magic was getting away from him, and his shoulders slumped, a long breath escaping him.

“I knew Dumbledore was ruthless in the face of the Greater Good, but I didn’t realise he would go to such lengths on a child,” Snape murmured. “Mr Potter, might you permit me to do a scan of my own? I have no doubt the goblins were entirely thorough, but there are certain spells their particular brand of magic will not catch.”

Harry went wide-eyed in horror at the thought of having more of Dumbledore’s magic on him. “Please,” he agreed, nodding frantically. Snape stood, waving his wand and murmuring something under his breath. Harry’s chest glowed blue for a second, then red, then black. “What does that mean?”

“A Tracking spell. A passive one — he can only find you if he checks the spell, rather than knowing exactly where you are at all times. Also a minor Suggestibility charm, and a Truth-Telling charm. The combination would encourage you to spill secrets to the headmaster you might have preferred to keep to yourself. Not in a way you’d notice, but rather to make you feel like you can trust him. Though they’re weak enough that I’d imagine you’ve been able to ignore them since you learned the truth.” Snape looked disgusted all the same, and Harry mirrored his expression.

“Can you remove them?” He especially didn’t like the idea of Dumbledore being able to check his location at any time.

“Of course.” Snape did some complicated-looking wandwork, and when he scanned Harry again, his chest glowed white. “You’re clear. I do wonder, though...” He turned his wand on Remus, raising an eyebrow. After a nod of consent, he performed the same spell he had on Harry. Remus glowed black, then purple. Snape swore loudly. “The same Tracking spell, and an incredibly rare spell designed to target dual-natured creatures. I haven’t seen it in years; The Dark Lord used to use it on the werewolves who had displeased them, to cut them off from their wolf halves; it would drive them insane, eventually.”

“Moony,” Remus breathed, looking heartbroken. “Severus, do— do you know how long that spell has been present?”

“By the looks of it, since you were a child. Perhaps since Hogwarts, maybe even before then.”

Remus’ expression was devastated. “I always wondered why it felt like my wolf and my human mind were always fighting each other,” he said softly. “I thought that was just how it was to be a werewolf. That it was normal to be scratching myself to pieces every moon.”

“That one will take work to remove,” Snape said. “But I can do it, if you give me time.” He met Remus’ gaze, and Harry looked away suddenly, his cheeks heating. It felt like he was watching something he shouldn’t.

Eventually, Remus cleared his throat. “Well,” he said, a little flustered. “That was... unexpected.”

“Dumbledore must be stopped,” Sirius growled, dropping back onto the sofa next to Harry. A quick wave of Snape’s wand showed the dog animagus glowing black; also a victim of the passive Tracking spell.

“We’re all in agreement there,” Snape said, scowling at the results. “But until we know exactly what his plan is, we must stay quiet and play his game.”

“I won’t let his game stop me from raising my godson as my heir,” Sirius retorted. “Harry needs to know his place in the world.”

“Neville’s been helping me,” Harry piped up tentatively. “And— others.” He wasn’t quite ready to tell the truth about Draco Malfoy just yet. “Most of the heirs at school don’t like Dumbledore either. Neville got me learning Occlumency, so I can keep my secrets better.”

“Longbottom, really?” Snape was skeptical. “I’ll test your shields tomorrow, see how far you’ve come. It is vital that you’re able to keep all this hidden once you return to school, amongst anyone who might be in Dumbledore’s pocket — yes, that includes your precious Weasleys, and the Granger girl. Trust no one until proven otherwise. Until we know what we’re dealing with, you must be Dumbledore’s Golden Boy.”

His stomach squirmed uncomfortably. He didn't know how many of the Weasleys would take his side, or how many were loyal to Dumbledore. He already had a strong feeling that if he pushed Ron much further, it would make him snap.

"This summer should be enough to get you prepared," Remus told him. "Between the three of us, we should be able to give you a fairly good crash course in everything you'll need to know. Secrecy, defence, wizarding society; I know studying during the summer isn't the most fun, but Harry—"

"I want to learn," Harry cut him off with a wave of his hand. "Please, I want to learn everything I can." He'd be bored stiff if he couldn't do anything, and learning magic was great when it wasn't accompanied by three-foot-long essays.

"We'll discuss that more in the morning," Sirius suggested. "Figure out what you need to know, where you're at with everything. It's getting late."

The clock on the mantle said it was past eleven, and Harry suddenly realised how tired he was. It had been a hell of a day. He couldn't stifle the jaw-cracking yawn that escaped him. "Definitely bedtime," Sirius said with a grin, ruffling Harry's hair. "Come on, I'll show you your room. Where's your things?"

Snape held out Harry's shrunken trunk and owl cage, and Sirius resized them with a wave of his wand. They bobbed along behind the four as Sirius showed him up to the third floor of the house. "This is your room," he said, tapping on a door to his left. "I'm in that one at the end of the hall, and Moony's three doors down and to your right. Grab either of us, or Ceri, if you need anything."

"Where does Professor Snape sleep?" Harry asked curiously.

Sirius about doubled over laughing, and Remus' face turned a shocking shade of pink. Snape's pale cheeks went faintly red, and he coughed.

"Severus, ah— Severus is in with me, Harry," Remus volunteered, looking like he'd quite happily sink through the floor.

For a minute, Harry furrowed his brow — in a house that big, surely there were plenty of bedrooms? Then it dawned on him. A dim memory flickered through his brain, from back in the Shrieking Shack; We didn't trust Moony 'cause of his boyfriend. Sorry, Moons.

"Oh. Oh!" Harry felt his own cheeks heat up. "That— that's okay, in the wizarding world, then?" He'd heard more than a few rants from Uncle Vernon about those people, and heard all sorts of things about it on the telly. Then again, Vernon thought he was a freak too, yet he was perfectly normal in the wizarding world.

"People don't care about gender, much," Remus confirmed. Harry noticed now how close he was standing to Snape, their shoulders brushing ever so slightly. "Blood purity is more their issue. Society will care more that I'm a werewolf than that we're both men." He paused, glancing at the floor. "Is it... okay with you?"

"Well," Harry said, after a beat of silence. "I figured anything that Uncle Vernon says is bad has to be alright, yeah? As long as you're happy." He was more stuck on the fact of it being Snape than the two of them being men, but he didn't think that would go down well.

Remus perked up like a weight had been lifted off his shoulders, and Sirius let out an impatient whine. "Yes, we're here, we're queer, hallelujah — can I show Harry his room now, please?"

A laugh bubbled from Remus' lips. "Alright, Padfoot. I think we're going to go back to the living room. Goodnight, Harry."

"Goodnight, Remus. Professor," he added, and Snape nodded at him in reply. When the pair left, they didn't hold hands or anything, but their strides matched and their elbows touched. It seemed obvious, now Harry knew.

"Now, if you don't like it, we can change just about anything," Sirius told him, sounding nervous as he pushed the door open. Harry's breath caught in his throat.

His room was three times the size of his old one back at the Dursleys', with honey-coloured wood flooring and a fluffy looking grey rug in the centre. The walls were painted a soft grey-blue, with one wall taken up entirely by bookshelves waiting to be filled. He had his own fireplace, and a desk with a black leather chair. The wardrobe and dresser matched the enormous four-poster bed, all beautiful dark wood, detailed with some kind of intricate bird carving. Directly opposite the door was a huge window, overlooking the back garden and the woods beyond. "It's perfect."

"You like it?" Sirius brightened. "Really?"

"Sirius, I love it." Harry walked over to the bed, running a hand over the soft grey duvet cover. He'd been half expecting some Gryffindor explosion of red and gold; this was much more his style.

"Good." Sirius stood in the doorway, clearly unsure what to do with himself now. "I'll, uh, leave you to it, then. Nearest bathroom is directly opposite, by the way. You'll be the only one using it." He crossed the distance between them in three long strides, wrapping wiry arms around Harry. "It's really good to have you here, pup."

"It's good to be here," Sirius," Harry returned with a smile. He was so happy he could cast an army of Patroni, he was sure.

It was going to be the best summer ever.

.-.-.-.

Remus looked up when Sirius slipped back into the living room, sinking down onto the sofa. "Harry likes his room?"

"Yeah," Sirius replied, grinning. "Thanks for helping me with it, Moons."

"My pleasure."

The three of them went silent, until Sirius let out a sigh. “How could I have spent so long sitting in Azkaban while Harry was out here left to Dumbledore’s manipulative little claws? I should’ve been there to protect him.”

“You can’t beat yourself up over it, Sirius, you had no idea. Believe me, I’ve been doing plenty of that since I found out.”

“At least the truth has been discovered before it’s too late,” Severus added. “Potter has plenty of time for his magical core to balance out before he inherits the rest of his family magics.”

“True. We’ll get him ready for the future, whatever it holds.” Sirius’ grey eyes gleamed with determination.

Remus thought back to what Harry had said before he’d left the castle, about Trelawney’s prophecy. He’d shared that with his two companions, of course, but he could hardly believe it; Peter was going to be the one to help Voldemort back to power. It would happen, no doubt sooner than any of them would like. “Will we have enough time?” he asked plaintively, knowing the two men were thinking along the same lines.

Beside him, Severus tensed. “Now that we have the boy safely, and I have been... enlightened about Dumbledore’s true regard for him, I fear there’s something I need to tell you both.” He looked up, meeting Remus’ gaze. “Remus, do you remember when I told you I had turned to the side of the Light?”

Remus could remember it all too well. They’d had a hugely explosive fight about six months after graduation, when Severus had taken the Dark Mark. Remus had begged him to reconsider, to go to Dumbledore for help, but Severus had stood firm in his decision. It was the first time Remus thought he’d truly lost the man for good. They didn’t speak again for almost a year, until one day Remus came home to find Severus on his doorstep, looking heartbroken and promising that he’d changed, that he’d agreed to turn spy for Dumbledore and rejoin the light. It had taken time for them to trust each other again — indeed, they’d been just starting to properly figure it out when Lily and James had been killed, and Remus had practically dropped off the face of the earth in mourning.

“I never told you why,” Severus continued, his long fingers curling around Remus’ own. “What event caused me to realise the truth of the decision I had made.” He glanced over at Sirius, who was listening intently. “This is going to be... difficult for you to hear. I only ask that you allow me to say my piece before you hex me into oblivion.” His lips quirked in a wry smile. Remus’ heart clenched.

“One evening, I was spying on Dumbledore at the Dark Lord’s orders; he was interviewing a new teaching candidate. For the Divination post. She seemed as batty as every other seer I’d met, so I didn’t think much of it— until she began to make a genuine prophecy.”

Remus listened in dawning horror as Severus recited the words. “I was discovered before I could hear the end, but I took what I knew to the Dark Lord. It took several weeks for him to parse the meaning, but eventually he decided he knew enough.”

Born as the seventh month dies.

“Harry.” Sirius’ voice was a low growl, his hands clenched into fists on his lap. His wand was beside him, untouched.

“Potter,” Severus confirmed. “Or the Longbottom boy. The Dark Lord decided there was a good chance it could be either, so he set his followers to find both families.” The firelight flickered off of Severus’ sharp cheekbones, making him look haggard, his eyes full of grief. “As soon as I realised the Dark Lord planned to kill a child — Lily’s child — I went to Dumbledore and begged him for mercy, pleaded with him to protect Lily and her son. I offered my services as a spy for the light, to repent for what I had done. I hoped it would be enough. I was wrong.” He gave a twisted sort of grimace, drawing his hands away from Remus’ lap. “I am the reason Lily and James are dead. And that knowledge will haunt me for the rest of my days.”

The silence that followed was painfully thick. Remus didn’t know what to say, Severus’ words echoing in his mind, the pieces falling together. Harry was prophesised to defeat Voldemort. Voldemort knew that, which was why he went after Lily and James. Severus was the one who had given him that information.

“I was the one who convinced Lily and James to use Peter as the Secret Keeper,” Sirius said eventually. “I thought I’d be too obvious a choice. No one would suspect Peter. Not even us. Because of me, Voldemort got to them. He could’ve known about the prophecy for years and never been any the wiser if it had been me.” He looked up at Severus with hollow eyes, eyes that spoke of twelve years of Azkaban. “You’re as much to blame as I am, Snape.”

“Both of you carry around far more guilt than one man should bear,” Remus declared, staring into his teacup. “The past is the past, and we have all suffered from our mistakes. Some more than others. But what matters now is keeping Harry safe — from Voldemort and Dumbledore.” If Harry was the one destined to destroy Voldemort, and Dumbledore knew the full prophecy, Harry would be in grave danger on both sides when Voldemort returned to power.

“We have to train him. Not just with his family magic, or Occlumency,” Sirius realised. “He needs to know how to survive a war.”

“We can’t tell him why,” Remus insisted. “He’s not even fourteen yet. That’s far too large a burden to place on his shoulders, on top of everything else.”

“I think Potter has a good idea that he’s going to have to face something,” Severus pointed out. “We don’t need to tell him about the prophecy for him to know he needs to be prepared.”

From how eager Harry had been to learn from them throughout the summer, Remus had to agree.

“Fuck,” Sirius said abruptly, tugging at his hair. “Why did it have to be him? Hasn’t he been through enough?”

There was no response to that. All three of them sat silently, lost in their thoughts, their minds on the boy sleeping peacefully one floor above them. Remus reached out to grip Severus’ hand once more, needing the contact, the comfort.

It was a while before any of them went to bed that night.

Chapter 13

Chapter Notes

Hey pals! So I have finally finished editing this absolute monstrosity all the way to the end, which naturally means that I am now impatient for y'all to get to the good bits. Because of this, I'm changing my update schedule; as of next week I'll be posting chapters every Monday, Wednesday and Friday. It's time for this fic to pick up some steam!

When Harry awoke the next morning, there was a large part of his brain that was certain the whole thing had been a dream. But he'd never been in a bed that comfortable; not at the Dursleys', and not at Hogwarts. He cracked one eye open, lips spreading in a grin. Even without his glasses he could see he wasn't at Privet Drive.

His new room really was incredible. He'd been too tired to take much of it in the night before, but he sat up and put his glasses on now, hardly daring to believe the room was all his.

The alarm clock on the bedside table said it was only six fifteen, and Harry doubted anyone else in the house would rise at that hour. He briefly contemplated going back to sleep, but it was no use. Now he was up, he was restless. He looked at his trunk, sitting at the foot of his new bed. His wand, still in its holster on the bedside table. He grinned to himself.

Sirius had said he could do as much magic as he wanted.

The Unpacking spell was one from A Hundred Spells Every Wizard Should Know, and Harry hadn't had much chance to practice it, but he'd been okay at it the last time he'd tried. He opened his trunk and his wardrobe, as well as the top drawers. Wand in hand, he murmured the spell. It was all about visualisation; he had to think clearly about how he wanted his things organised, otherwise they'd just shove themselves willy-nilly in his wardrobe.

His neatly folded clothes began to float out of the trunk, carefully arranging themselves the way they did in Harry's mind. They put themselves on hangers, or folded themselves into the drawers, and Harry laughed triumphantly when all his clothes were successfully where he wanted them to be. Next was books.

A flick of his wand, and his books were arranging themselves alphabetically on his empty shelves. There was still so much empty space, and Harry was eager to fill it.

The rest of his things, he placed by hand. Hedwig's cage went on top of the dresser, his Firebolt was propped up next to the window. The few photos he had to display went on his shelves, along with the Sneakoscope from Ron. His quills and parchment sat carefully on his desk waiting for him to complete his homework. His little Wizarding Wireless went on his bedside table next to the alarm clock.

When he opened the drawer of his bedside table to put away his photo album, he froze. Lined up inside were several potion vials, all labelled in Snape's neat, spidery handwriting.

Bruise Balm - For topical application only

Skele-Gro - Only use if necessary

Nutritional Supplement - Six doses (marked), take before sleep

Standard Healing Potion, Grade 3 - Drink on empty stomach

Harry's pulse thudded in his throat, his palms growing clammy. Snape couldn't have snuck those in while Harry was sleeping, could he? He must have left them there before Harry had arrived — before he'd seen the way Harry lived at the Dursleys.

He swallowed thickly. How much did the adults think they knew? How many of Snape's suspicions had been confirmed by his little jaunt to retrieve Harry? The prospect squirmed in his stomach, anxiety clawing its way up his chest.

Your father should have tried harder to beat it out of you.

Maybe their similarities would be enough for Snape to keep silent. Surely if he wanted to confront Harry, he wouldn't have left the potions? He was a Slytherin, he respected subtlety. He may let Harry deal with his own demons.

But if Snape knew, what did Remus and Sirius know?

There was a knock on the door, and Harry slammed the drawer shut. He nudged the door open with a flick of his wand, revealing Remus in the doorway. He was wearing a dark brown dressing gown over blue striped pyjamas, and his hair stuck up haphazardly. "Morning, cub. Thought I heard you up and about." He looked around the room, then at the wand in Harry's hand, and smiled. "Making yourself at home? That's quite the book collection you're building there. I hadn't realised you were such a voracious reader."

"I had a lot of things to research last summer. And a lot of access to Flourish and Blotts," he added sheepishly, making Remus chuckle.

"I'm glad you're settling in. Are you hungry? Ceri should have breakfast done soon."

Harry's stomach rumbled loud enough for both of them to hear it. "I could eat," he said after a beat. Remus snorted. "Are the others up? Sirius, and, uh, Professor Snape?" Harry felt himself blush.

"Sirius is still in bed, but Severus is already downstairs." Remus paused, looking conflicted. "Harry, are you sure you're alright with our— our relationship? If it's too much for you—" "

“No, really!” Harry insisted, desperately not wanting Remus to think he had a problem with two men together. “It’s not that. It’s just, he’s my Potions professor, and he hated me for as long as I’ve known him, and to see him being nice is just... weird.”

Something in Remus’ posture seemed to ease, and he ran a hand through his messy hair. “Severus is a man of many masks, with many roles to play,” he conceded. “I told you before, he doesn’t hate you. By the end of the summer you two might even be friends.”

Harry gave him a look that said he was pushing his luck. Remus winked. “You never know, Harry. He keeps his emotions close to his chest, but he’s really not as awful as he likes to pretend. The two of you are actually more alike than you know, in some ways.”

His Aunt Petunia’s words drifted through his mind again. Harry swallowed. He wasn’t sure if that was something he wanted to have in common with Snape.

“I expect it to take time for you two to warm up to each other,” Remus continued, oblivious to Harry’s internal conflict. “But he cares for you, deep down.”

“Do you love him?” Harry bit his tongue as soon as the question escaped, cheeks flaming. Remus looked a little abashed, but a soft smile crossed his face.

“I have loved Severus since before I really knew what love even was,” he replied unashamedly. “And difficult as it might be for you to comprehend, he loves me as well. He’s just not the most... expressive man on the planet.” He shook his head, snapping himself out of his daze. “Anyway, enough of my lovesick rambling. Breakfast!”

Harry followed him down to the kitchen, where Professor Snape was already sat at the table, reading the Daily Prophet with a cup of tea at his elbow. Ceri was at the stove once again, frying eggs.

“Can Ceri be getting sirs anything to drink?” she asked brightly. “We be having tea, coffee, pumpkin juice, orange juice, milk—“

“Orange juice would be great, please,” Harry requested. With a snap of her fingers, a glass of orange juice began pouring itself from a jug on the counter, and floated its way over to Harry. At Remus’ request, she made more tea.

“Master Sirius be snoozing in late,” Ceri said in fond reprimand, and Remus chuckled.

“He isn’t used to being allowed a lie-in. He’ll be down as soon as he smells that bacon cooking.”

Harry watched as Remus leaned over Snape’s shoulder with one hand on the man’s back, reading the Prophet article with a frown on his face. Snape didn’t seem bothered by the contact, merely tilting his head so Remus could get a better look. Then Remus just sat down at the table, in the same spot he had last night.

It was strange. Harry hadn’t seen many couples interacting before. Just his aunt and uncle — never a role model for anything, let alone healthy relationships — and Mr and Mrs Weasley.

He didn't think all the madly snogging teenage couples at Hogwarts counted. He couldn't imagine Snape and Remus acting like the Weasleys, with their frequent pecks on the cheek and terms of endearment. He thought Snape might explode if Remus ever called him 'sweetheart', or 'darling'. Yet he didn't doubt Remus for a second when he said Snape loved him. He just didn't think he would ever hear the professor say the words.

As Remus predicted, Sirius shuffled down the stairs in his pyjamas once the smell of bacon started filling the house, still half-asleep by the looks of it. He ran a fond hand over Harry's hair as he passed. "Morning, pup." He slumped into his seat. "Ceri, everything smells amazing."

"Yous is being late, Master Sirius," Ceri said in reply, floating the breakfast plates over to the table. Sirius shot her a dazzling grin.

"But you waited for me anyway, because you're wonderful." The house elf blushed, turning back to the stove.

Ceri was very different to Dobby, in so many ways. Harry wondered which was a more accurate example of house elves.

"So," Sirius said once everyone had started eating. "Rules of the house." Harry eyed him in trepidation, and Sirius laughed. "Don't look so scared, pup. It's just a few things. Number one; no flying without telling one of us first, and certainly not after dark." That was reasonable; Harry could get hurt flying at night. "Number two; don't go into the woods unsupervised. There's all sorts of things that'll gobble you up in there." Again, reasonable. "Number three; there's a potions lab in the basement, it's now Snape's domain. Don't go down there unless he specifically asks you to. Some of the things he brews are sensitive." Harry had no desire to go in Snape's potions lab, so he nodded quickly. "Number four; expect retaliation for any pranks played."

At this, Remus buried his head in his hands with a long-suffering sigh. "No prank wars, Padfoot."

"But Moony!" Sirius whined, sounding younger than Harry. "We just want a little fun!"

Remus looked from Sirius, to Harry, to Snape, who raised an eyebrow. "If they prank me, you can be sure I will retaliate," he said unrepentantly. Remus sighed.

"You're just as bad as he is. Fine, rule five — no permanent or potentially harmful pranks," he warned sternly, using his Professor Voice.

"Ugh, fine. Spoilsport," Sirius muttered. "Carrying on. Rule six; no going outside on the full moon. Remus has his potion, but we're not taking any chances. And finally, rule seven; ask if you need help. With anything. Whether it's help with a spell, or your homework, or if you just need someone to talk to; all three of us are happy to help however we can. You don't need to handle everything by yourself anymore Got it?"

"I— I'll try." It would be a hard habit to break, and Harry could make no promises. Sirius nodded; that was enough for him.

“Great. Now all that boring stuff’s out of the way, any questions?”

“Am I allowed to write to my friends? Will their owls be able to find this place?” If the house was Unplottable, did that mean owls couldn’t get there?

“Owl magic is different; they’ll be able to find you anywhere. You’re perfectly welcome to write to your friends, as long as you don’t tell them where you are or who you’re with, of course.” Harry shot his godfather a ‘duh’ look. “There’s a little Owlery upstairs, I’ll show you it later.”

“There’s an owl up there that I use when I need something more… anonymous than my usual owl,” Snape piped up. “Her name is Artemis, she’s the tawny owl. You’re welcome to use her should you have need to write to anyone that would raise questions should Hedwig be seen visiting. Snowy owls are quite distinctive.”

Harry’s mind immediately flashed to Draco. And some of the other heirs, too. “Oh. Thank you, Professor. I appreciate that.” How long would it take him to get used to Snape being nice to him?

After breakfast, Snape was the first one to get to his feet. “I have potions to brew,” he declared. Remus glanced up from the paper.

“Don’t blow the house up,” he said with a fond smile. Snape made a faintly offended noise, and left the room. “What do you fancy doing today, Harry? After the grand tour, of course.”

“I don’t know.” Harry had never been allowed to do whatever he liked before. “I might go flying.”

“How about I show you around, and then you can decide,” Sirius said, looking eager to give Harry the tour. Harry looked down at himself.

“Give me ten minutes to take a shower and get dressed, and I’ll meet you in the entrance hall,” he agreed. Sirius beamed.

Harry’s bathroom was much nicer than anything he was used to; with both a shower and a huge claw-foot bathtub, everything decorated in black and white marble tiles with silver accents. There was also a full-length mirror, and Harry took the opportunity to see how bad the bruises on his back were. Not as awful as he expected. He’d certainly had worse. Nonetheless, he grabbed Snape’s Bruise Balm to apply after his shower. No need to look a gift horse in the mouth.

Sirius was dressed too when Harry met him, in loose jeans with a hole in the knee and a worn-looking muggle band t-shirt that might have actually come from the 1970s. “Perfect! Come on!” Sirius grabbed him by the hand, tugging him over to a room he hadn’t yet been in, and the tour began.

There was the parlour, the smoking room, the downstairs bedroom suite, the pantry — of course the kitchen, where Ceri waved while cracking several eggs into a bowl — the formal dining room, and the duelling room.

And that was just on the ground floor.

Harry was whizzed through another sitting room, a playroom, at least eight bedrooms, a nursery, four bathrooms, a library — where they found Remus absorbed in a book — the big study and the small study, the music room, another playroom, the Owlery, a bathroom with a bath the size of a small swimming pool, a dressing room, a drawing room, and then all the way down to the basement to see the wine cellar, the wardstone and ritual room, the safe room and the door to the potions lab.

“I won’t knock, Snape’ll bite our heads off,” Sirius said at that one, gently steering Harry past it. Harry was out of breath, and didn’t understand how Sirius was still talking a mile a minute as they returned to the entrance hall.

“This place is enormous!” Harry remarked, and Sirius laughed.

“One day I’ll take you to the Black family manor, down in Cornwall. It makes this place look like a dollhouse.” Harry stared at him incredulously. “Come on, I’ll show you around the grounds.”

It was a glorious sunny day outside, and Sirius tipped his head back with a grin, basking in the sun for a minute. “Still not used to that,” he murmured to himself. Harry’s heart twisted; there wasn’t any sun in Azkaban. Sirius shook it off though, cheerfully marching onwards. “The treeline is the property line, so don’t ever go past it unless one of us is with you.” The woods circled the whole house; even the driveway just led into the trees. “All the fun stuff is around the back, come on.”

Their first stop was the stables; five stalls, only one of which was occupied. “Buckbeak!” Harry greeted cheerfully, offering the hippogriff a bow. Buckbeak bowed in return, then butted his head into Harry’s chest, demanding to be petted. When they left, Buckbeak followed them, occasionally nudging Sirius’ shoulder fondly with his beak.

“There’s a greenhouse over there, it’s a bit wild at the minute. Ceri wasn’t sure what to do with it all these years. I think Snape plans to grow some potions ingredients in it, but I don’t know how much of a green thumb he has. If you want to get stuck in, take one of us with you; we’re not entirely sure what’s growing in there right now. Something might bite your head off.” Harry laughed, but a glance at Sirius’ face made him realise the man was completely serious. He thought of some of the plants in the restricted greenhouses at school, for seventh year study only, and grimaced.

“Is that a swimming pool?” Harry gaped, seeing the stone-edged pool sunk into the ground.

“Yup,” Sirius replied proudly. “Got it up and running on Saturday. Feel free to take a dip whenever. If you’re drowning, yell for Ceri.” That was a joke, and Sirius winked. “Also, look over there.”

Harry looked in the direction Sirius was pointing, only for the man to tilt his chin until Harry was looking up. He gasped. “A quidditch pitch!”

“Half-pitch,” Sirius corrected. “Not quite enough room for a full one. I know you’re not a chaser, so the goals aren’t as important to you, but they’re there if you ever fancy your hand with a quaffle. There’s a full set of equipment in the broom shed — the snitch hasn’t been used in a while, so it might be a bit wonky, but we can always have Remus or Snape pick up another one.”

“Sirius, this place is incredible.” Not only was he away from the Dursleys, but he was away from them at a house that had a swimming pool and a quidditch pitch. Unbelievable.

“It’s pretty great, isn’t it?” Sirius agreed wistfully. “It brings back old memories. I stopped going after my parents kicked me out; spent every summer at James’ instead. Mr and Mrs Potter were brilliant, don’t get me wrong, and The Pottery is a dream house, but... I’ve missed this place.”

“Your parents kicked you out?” Harry asked, surprised.

“Oh, yeah. First I sullied the family name by being sorted into Gryffindor, then I made friends with halfbloods and muggleborns and light wizards, and there was no going back. Blasted my name off the family tree, but never officially disinherited me. There’s a ritual, it’s a bit complicated, I s’pose Mum never got around to it. Or she hoped I’d see sense... either way, I’m the head of the family, now. At least, I would be if I weren’t a convict.”

“So who’s head at the moment?”

“No one, technically,” Sirius said with a shrug. “The family magic went a bit dormant in me while I was in Azkaban, but it’s still there; since I never had a trial, it was never officially stripped from me. I just can’t fully access it until I can step into the Wizengamot and claim my seat again, which obviously I can’t do until I’m a free man. Until then, Dumbledore’s my proxy.” His sour expression showed exactly what he thought of that. “Once you come of age, you can take it back, though.”

“Unless we can get your name cleared before then,” Harry pointed out. “Don’t give up hope, Sirius.”

Sirius shrugged again. “Doesn’t really bother me either way. I’ve got you, and Moony, and I’m out of that blasted prison cell. S’all I need for the minute.” Both of them looked up when they heard a bell ring out across the grounds. Sirius grinned. “Lunch is ready.”

Remus and Snape were already at the table when Sirius and Harry joined them, talking quietly to each other. “I still think it’s too early, Severus,” Remus was saying, before he looked up at their arrival. “Hello, boys. Been keeping out of trouble?”

“For the most part,” Sirius replied easily, sprawling lazily in his chair and reaching for a plate. Ceri had made a quiche that was packed with vegetables and ham. Harry’s stomach growled. “Eat up, pup. You’re a growing boy. With plenty more growing to do, by the looks of you; even Lily wasn’t that short at your age.”

Harry ducked his head. He’d resigned himself to his short stature; kids who grew up in cupboards and barely got fed didn’t end up six feet tall.

“Having fun, Harry?” Remus asked kindly. Harry beamed.

“Oh, yeah! Did you know this place has a quidditch pitch? I can’t wait to fly. And the library is huge! I bet there’s books that aren’t even in the Hogwarts library.”

“Definitely. Some of those books are older than Hogwarts itself. So no food or drink in the library, alright?” Remus warned, and Harry nodded. As he ate, he gathered his courage for a question.

“Were you serious last night, when you said you’d train me?” he asked tentatively. “If you don’t want to that’s fine, I’m sure you’re all busy, but—“

“Harry, we’d be happy to,” Remus assured. “All three of us. That’s actually what Severus and I were just talking about before you came in; if it’s alright with you, I put together a sort-of schedule for the summer. It’s got everything that the three of us thought you needed to learn, and we can always add in more things if you pick those up quickly. Or if there’s something you’d like to learn that we can squeeze in.”

He handed Harry a piece of parchment, and Harry unrolled it curiously.

Monday AM - Schoolwork

Monday PM - Misc. Spellwork

Tuesday AM - Duelling and defence

Tuesday PM - Free time

Wednesday AM - Potions

Wednesday PM - Occlumency

Thursday AM - Free time

Thursday PM - Wizarding culture

Friday AM - Warding

Friday PM - Schoolwork

“You can have the weekend free, and of course the evenings. And any time you feel it’s too much, just say so,” Remus said hurriedly. “I just thought... it’s a start.”

“It looks great!” His tone fell just short of sincere. Remus levelled him with a knowing look.

“What’s wrong? Is it too much?”

“No, no! It’s just... Potions?” He made a helpless face.

“I refuse to associate with anyone who cannot brew a simple Pepper-Up Potion,” Snape drawled. “I do not expect you to become a master, but by Salazar, you will be at least somewhat proficient in brewing by the end of the summer. Potions are an important part of wizarding life, and you need to be capable of at least basic healing potions. There may come a time when there is no one you trust available to brew them for you.”

Harry sighed — he hated to admit it, but the man had a point. Maybe he would be better at Potions without Slytherins throwing things in his cauldron, or Snape taking points every five minutes. Unless... “You can’t take house points during the summer, right?” he checked suspiciously. Snape’s lips twitched.

“That is correct, Mr Potter.”

“Okay then. I’ll study Potions.” He didn’t miss the way Remus lifted his glass of pumpkin juice to hide a smile. “So we start tomorrow, then? With schoolwork?”

“If you’d like. I figured you could get your homework out of the way, and then after that we can use that slot to go over anything from previous years that has given you trouble, or get a head start on next year’s work,” Remus suggested.

“Works for me.” Harry leaned back in his chair, wondering what to do with his afternoon. He really wanted to try out that quidditch pitch. “I think I’m going to go flying, if that’s alright?” He raised an enquiring eyebrow at Remus — who seemed to be the most responsible one of the trio — who nodded. “But first, I’m going to write some letters. Am I alright to borrow your owl, Professor?”

“I have no need of her for now,” Snape acquiesced. Harry smiled in thanks, then excused himself from the table, hurrying up to his room.

The first letter he wrote was to Draco.

Draco,

First off, this is Artemis. She belongs to a friend. I thought Hedwig might give the game away a bit.

How are you? Are you in Italy yet, or France? I hope your summer is off to a good start. Mine got unexpectedly better than I ever thought. I can’t tell you why. Let’s just say I have some unanticipated company.

Are you going to the Quidditch World Cup this summer? Ron’s going to see if his dad can get tickets. I think it’d be brilliant to go, but even if I can’t, I think I’m in for a great summer.

Hope you’re well,

Harry

That was alright, wasn’t it? Not too much information, and not too overly forward? His friendship with Draco was still so new and unsteady, he never knew how to act around the blond. Next he wrote to Neville.

Hi Neville,

Hope you and your gran are doing well. Any fun summer plans so far? My summer is looking to be pretty good, for once.

I'm going to write to a few mutual friends this summer, if I can. If you know of anyone who would like to write to me, tell them I'm all clear to receive owls.

Talk to you soon,

Harry

After that, he wrote a couple of short letters to Hannah Abbott and Susan Bones, explaining that he was okay to have mail through the summer and he'd be happy to keep in touch if they wanted to. Once Artemis had taken those, he'd try a few more maybe.

There were others he wanted to write to — he wanted to write to the twins, and he should probably write to Ron and Hermione soon to stop them getting suspicious — but he didn't want to overload the owls with too many letters at once.

He'd already been to the Owlery once that day, and when he went back up he was glad to see Hedwig perched on one of the overhead beams, looking content. There were three other owls beside her; Remus' owl, a barn owl named Horatio; Snape's owl, a dark screech owl called Asphodel; and Artemis. She was a fairly unremarkable tawny owl, and she cooed softly at Harry when he called her down. "You too, Hedwig," he requested. He secured the letter to Neville on her first; no one would blink twice at Hedwig visiting the Longbottom household.

Once she had set off, Harry gently secured his three notes to Artemis' leg. "Take that one last, and wait for a response, okay?" he said, pointing at the letter for Draco. Artemis hooted, bobbed her head, and took off through the open window. Harry watched the two owls fly away for a minute, then grinned. It was time for him to do some flying of his own.

.-. .

Once Harry had thoroughly exhausted himself on his Firebolt, he took another quick shower and went to find some sort of company. He came across Sirius in the main living room, sprawled out on the thick rug in front of the fire. At first Harry thought he was asleep, until he picked his head up and blinked at Harry. "Hey, pup. Have a good fly?"

"It was great!" Harry enthused, taking a seat in the nearest armchair. He didn't often get time to just be on his broom, enjoy the wind rushing through his hair and the blood pumping in his veins as he dove and flipped through the air. "I never said thank you for the Firebolt, by the way, but I really love it. It's amazing."

Sirius rolled onto his back, a contented grin tugging at his lips. "Glad it makes you happy, pup. You'll have to let me take it for a spin sometime; I haven't been flying in years."

"Did you play quidditch?"

"I was a beater in my fifth and sixth years, but I wasn't as in love with it as the rest of the team, and by seventh I decided to let my place go to a talented little third year. I always liked flying, though. James and I used to spend half our summers on brooms. We could never convince Moony to join us.”

“You should get your own broom,” Harry suggested. “Then we could go flying together.”

“I might have to. It’s been a while since I tossed a quaffle around, but I’m sure I’ll pick it back up eventually.” He turned his face towards the fire. It wasn’t exactly cold outside, but Sirius didn’t seem to care, basking in the heat from the flames. “We’re going to have a great summer, pup. To make up for all the rubbish ones. All the ones I missed.”

“It wasn’t your fault, Sirius,” Harry insisted. Sirius grimaced.

“We’ll agree to disagree there, Harry.” He sat up, running a hand through his chin-length hair. “Are you sure you want to spend your summer having lessons? I know there’s things you wanted to learn, but if Remus is coming on a bit strong with the schedule and all, you can say so.”

“No, I honestly want to,” Harry promised. “It’s way better than spending my summers weeding the garden and cooking for the Dursleys.” He saw Sirius frown, and ploughed on quickly. “Besides, school is great and all, but there’s so much magic they don’t teach you. Magic they don’t think is important because people in wizarding households grow up with it. I want to learn everything I missed out on by being raised by muggles.” There were so many basic household charms that they never bothered to teach in school, which would be fine if all the students had parents to teach them, but not everyone did.

“You really are Lily’s boy, aren’t you?” Sirius remarked. “Moony told me, but I didn’t quite believe it. After seeing you run after your friend into the Shack, I thought you had to be James through and through.” He chuckled to himself. “Probably for the best, to be honest. James always needed Lily’s logic to balance him out. He was a bit thick by himself, bless his soul.”

“Everyone always says I’m like my dad. I think because I look like him,” Harry said, looking down at the dark skin of his hands, which was already starting to go even more brown from being out in the sun all afternoon.

“I think people forget that Lily had a Gryffindor streak a mile wide, too,” Sirius said, swinging up to sit cross-legged facing Harry. “And Merlin, she could prank with the best of them. She didn’t do it often, but every now and then someone would really piss her off, and you could always tell a Lily Evans masterpiece. They were beautiful. Once in fifth year this Ravenclaw bloke cheated on one of Lily’s best friends, so she hexed him to make every piece of cutlery melt as soon as he touched it. Told him to eat face-first like the pig he was. It was brilliant. She was just so studious and sweet all the rest of the time that no one ever thought she could be trouble.”

“She sounds amazing,” Harry sighed.

“She was. Far too good for our Jamie. He knew he was doing well for himself with her. But she loved him to bits, once he deflated his head a bit. Stopped bullying Snape. I think half the reason it pissed Lily off so much was because James couldn’t see how mad Remus was for the bloke. He didn't even realise they were shagging til after we graduated, and only then because he walked in on it," Sirius said with a roguish wink, making Harry blush.

"How long have they been together?" Surely he hadn't been oblivious to it all last year? Someone would've said if two of the professors were... involved, especially if one of them was Snape. The Hogwarts rumour mill wouldn't keep that one quiet.

"It's complicated with those two," Sirius told him. "It was inevitable since second year, but true love never does run smooth. As much as it pains me to admit that old Snivelly's really Moony's true love. Could be worse, I suppose."

"Remus seems to like him," Harry approached tentatively. There had to be something good about Snape if Remus loved him.

"Oh, he's not as bad as he used to be. He's actually been fairly decent to live with, so far," Sirius relented. "He'll probably be the one teaching you Occlumency, by the way. I thought about it, but Snape's a far better Legilimens than I am. He's been helping me sort out my own mind, y'know. Twelve years in Azkaban really did a number on my organisation skills up there," he said with a tap to his forehead. "Hasn't pried, hasn't asked questions, hasn't mocked me for anything he saw up there. Maybe he really has changed." Sirius sighed. "Or maybe I was always just too much of a pillock to see what Remus and Lily saw in him."

Harry didn't really know what to say to that. Luckily, he was saved having to find an answer by Remus calling them for dinner. Sirius jumped to his feet, his melancholy mood slipping away in the blink of an eye. "Come on, pup. Maybe after dinner we can get the two lovebirds to play cards with us or something. Have you ever played Warlock's Bluff?"

Chapter 14

Harry's standards were fairly low, but even so, he'd never been happier in his life.

Living at Seren Du was like everything he'd dreamed of all at once. Spending his weekdays learning new spells and wizarding politics and his family history; flying whenever he wanted; swimming whenever he wanted; spending evenings curled up in the living room with some combination of his three housemates, reading or talking or playing card games. On weekends Remus always tried to take him somewhere, saying it wasn't good for him to be cooped up with just the three of them for company. Sometimes they took Sirius with them — usually as Padfoot, sometimes under a glamour in muggle areas. Every now and then, Remus bullied Snape into coming too. They went to the beach, to the cinema, to the muggle shopping centre in Cardiff. On one memorable occasion, the four of them even went to a Holyhead Harpies quidditch match. No one batted an eyelash at the big shaggy dog Remus claimed was his familiar, and thanks to Snape's disguise charms no one recognised them either. Seeing live professional quidditch was breathtaking, and it made Harry even more desperate to go to the Quidditch World Cup.

Even his Potions lessons were enjoyable, once he and Snape both realised Harry wasn't terrible at brewing if he was in the right environment.

Harry wasn't even missing his friends that much. He wasn't sure if it made him an awful person, but he quite liked his private little bubble of happiness. Sure, it got a little lonely sometimes — the three adults were often busy, and couldn't always be expected to entertain Harry's whims — but he was used to being lonely in the summer. It was nice not having to share with anyone, or make allowances for anyone, or fight for attention. At the Burrow, everything was chaos all the time, and Hogwarts was much the same. Here it was just him and his three sort-of guardians, and he was mostly left to his own devices unless he sought out company.

His birthday was slowly approaching, and for once Harry was actually looking forward to celebrating it. Sirius was up to something, the dog animagus just giving Harry a mischievous grin every time he asked about birthday plans, and Harry was dying with curiosity.

Staring up at the brand new Holyhead Harpies poster stuck to his bedroom wall, Harry glanced over at his alarm clock. It was eight in the morning on a Saturday; Ceri wouldn't have breakfast ready for another hour. Sirius always liked to sleep in on weekends, unless they were going somewhere. If he could, he'd sleep in every day, but Remus kept insisting he couldn't laze about all morning.

Harry got up with a leisurely stretch, surprised to see Artemis perched outside his window. He grinned, bounding over to let her in. There was a letter tied to her leg, and once Harry had divested her of it she hooted softly and flew away, no doubt heading to the owlery. Harry opened the envelope with eager fingers.

Harry,

France is disgustingly hot. My poor fair skin is not made for these sorts of temperatures! Even with sun blocking charms, I'm having to spend most of my time indoors. Mother seems to think that's a perfect excuse to take me touring around old museums and such rot.

I refuse to believe you made a successful Wronski Feint. You'll have to show me when we get back to school, because I'm fairly sure you're lying to me. And if you're not lying, how dare you. Gryffindor can't win the cup two years in a row. That's just rude.

Have you been writing to Blaise Zabini? I was over at his house in Italy the other week and I could've sworn I saw this owl. If I'm not the only snake in your life, I'll be heartbroken, Potter. I thought we had something special.

Father visited yesterday. It was awful. There's something bothering him, and I don't know what it is, but it must spell trouble. I don't want to go back to England, not if it means putting up with his foul temper for the rest of the summer. Do you think I might burn to a crisp if I just stayed in France until September 1st?

I learnt a new card game from some French witches, too. They're daughters of my mother's friends. They go to Beauxbatons — that's another magic school out here on the continent, if you didn't know. The game is called Coup Le Chat, which is a ridiculous name that translates to 'blow the cat'. When I asked why, they just laughed. It's a fun game, I'll have to teach it to you. Though it's better with three players. Maybe we can invite Blaise to play with us, since you seem to have such fun talking to him.

Write to you soon, if I don't melt.

Draco

Harry was smiling by the end of the letter, even if there was an odd, twisting sensation in the pit of his stomach when Draco mentioned spending time with French witches. Dudley always said that European girls were prettier than any English girls. Was that the same for witches?

Not that it mattered, if Draco was hanging out with pretty girls. Harry didn't care.

He set the letter aside on his desk to reply to later, shrugging on his new green dressing gown and heading down to breakfast. "Good morning, Potter," Snape greeted cordially, in his usual spot at the table with tea and a potions journal. No one else was up yet; except for Ceri, of course. She had Harry's orange juice headed towards his place before he could even ask for it, and he gave her a grin in thanks.

"Good morning, Professor. Remus not up yet?" The full moon was two nights ago, and he was still suffering a little from it.

"Not yet, but I don't think it will be long. He's feeling much better than he was yesterday."

"That's good. Is there a plan for the day?" With the moon, Harry wasn't sure if they were going to go anywhere like they did last Saturday. Sirius couldn't take him by himself, and he didn't want Remus to push himself.

"Indeed, but not until this evening. Plenty of time for Remus to gather his strength." As Severus spoke, they heard muffled footsteps down the stairs, and soon a drowsy Remus Lupin shuffled into the kitchen, mid-yawn. He ran a hand over the back of Harry's neck as he passed, then, to Harry's surprise, draped himself over Snape's back and buried his nose in the man's neck, pressing a kiss to the skin there. Snape didn't seem bothered, tilting his neck to bare it to the werewolf, who hummed in satisfaction.

"Smell good," he murmured. Snape's lips curled in the corners in what might have been a fond smile.

"Do sit down, you're embarrassing Potter."

Remus huffed softly, dragging his nose up Snape's jaw and pressing a kiss to his cheekbone. "Don't care." But he did take his seat at the table, even if it involved him shuffling his chair closer to Snape's and resting his head on the man's shoulder, letting his eyes fall half-shut.

Ever since Snape had finally removed Dumbledore's curse from Remus, allowing him to reconnect with his wolf side, he'd had the occasional day like this. Especially around the days of the full moon. Days when he let his wolf instincts out a little more keenly, when he was more aware of the scent and feel of pack. Harry had never seen him be this affectionate to Snape, though. It was sort of sweet. And the way Snape wasn't even batting an eyelash, Harry wondered if the couple were more tactile in private. Remus had told him that Harry's parents and Sirius were the only ones to ever know the truth of their relationship, before; clearly keeping their distance in front of others was not a new thing for them.

As Remus slowly woke up, he started to come back to himself a little more, though he didn't seem particularly embarrassed by his behaviour. He pressed another kiss to Snape's jaw, then scooted his chair back to its usual spot.

Ceri set breakfast out, and none of them bothered waiting for Sirius to appear, tucking in with aplomb. He showed up about ten minutes later, dressed and ready for the day. "Morning, you lot. Moony, did you even sleep last night, or did Snape keep you up? Oops, sorry Harry," he added when the teen blushed brightly. "I'm just saying, you look like you could do with a few more hours."

"I'm awake," Remus promised. "It's just taking a bit for my human brain to kick in."

"Pfft, human brains," Sirius dismissed. "Who needs 'em?"

"Is it hard to become an animagus?" Harry asked suddenly, the thought crossing his mind. Sirius blinked.

"I mean, it's not easy. There's a reason most people don't do it. But most witches and wizards are capable."

"How old were you and Dad when you did it?"

"Sixteen or so," Sirius said, brow furrowed in thought. "Got the idea halfway through fifth year, managed the transformations by Christmas in sixth. So yeah, sixteen, seventeen-ish. So wait until you're a little older," he added with a grin. Harry pouted.

"Can't I at least find out what animal I'd be?" he wheedled. Sirius barked out a laugh.

"That's a slippery slope, little pup. Once you know, it's hard to wait. Unless you're something awful, like a slug." He stuffed a huge piece of toast in his mouth. When he'd swallowed, he eyed Harry in consideration. "Tell you what, you keep up your grades through fourth year, maybe I'll start teaching you in your fifth. Could come in handy."

Harry brightened up considerably; that was easy! "It's a deal."

"That includes your Arithmancy and Runes grades, alright? There will be tests. Won't there, Remus?"

"Absolutely. Gruelling ones," Remus agreed, perking up now he'd had his second cup of tea. "Harder than your OWLs." Once Harry had finished all his homework, he'd requested his schoolwork sessions be turned into Arithmancy and Runes lessons. He had so many regrets about his choices of elective, but it was too late now.

"I'll pass them," Harry declared confidently. He finished off his orange juice, and Ceri took his empty plate off the table to be washed. "What are we doing today?"

"We don't need to leave until six, so until then, whatever you want," Sirius replied. Harry's interest was piqued.

"Where are we going at six?"

Sirius grinned wolfishly. "It's a surprise."

Harry huffed; Sirius never spoiled surprises. "Can we go swimming for a bit?" His prior experience of swimming pools was the obligatory lessons in muggle primary school to make sure kids knew how to not drown. Considering Dudley's favourite past-time in those lessons was actively trying to drown Harry, he hadn't really enjoyed them. Now, he found he quite liked being in the water.

"Sounds good to me. What are you two up to?" He turned the question to Remus and Snape, who shared a glance.

"I had no prior plans," Snape replied. "Though I won't be here tomorrow. The headmaster has need of me for something." All four of them shared a dark look at the mention of Dumbledore.

Harry ambled back upstairs to change into his swimming trunks, and he didn't wait for Sirius before heading to the pool, running the last couple of steps to jump in with a splash. He heard a loud bark behind him, and turned just in time to be hit with a wave of water as a huge dog cannon-balled into the pool. Laughing, Harry swam over to the edge, watching Sirius' doggy paddle turn into an effortless front crawl as he changed from dog to man. "Got you there, pup," he teased, ruffling Harry's wet hair. Harry ducked out of the way, diving under the water once more, grateful for the charms Snape had added to his glasses so he could see underwater with them.

He sat in the shallow end for a bit, watching Sirius swim lazy lengths. Even after just a few weeks of freedom, he was looking years better from his time in Azkaban and on the run. You couldn't see all of his ribs anymore, and he actually had some muscle definition to his arms and shoulders, his olive-toned skin taking on a bit of colour from the sun. Nothing, he kept insisting, like he'd looked in 'the good old days', but he looked healthier.

Harry, too, was looking a lot better for his Dursley-free summer. Ceri's cooking combined with hours in the pool or on his broom — or duelling with Remus and Sirius, which was a workout in itself — was helping him pack on quite a bit of muscle. He hadn't grown much taller, only a couple of inches, but he was starting to look less like a starving runaway.

Joining his godfather in his swimming, trying halfheartedly to race the man, Harry didn't realise they had company until a body splashed into the pool. There was a beat, and then Remus' head popped up out of the water, his hair flat against his forehead and a grin on his face. Harry beamed at him. Remus hardly ever came swimming with them!

To his utter astonishment, Remus wasn't alone. Snape was walking towards the pool wearing a pair of black swimming shorts and a plain grey t-shirt, a book tucked under his arm, his Dark Mark a grey smudge on his left forearm. He cast a disparaging look at the trio frolicking in the pool, then stretched himself out on one of the deck chairs nearby. Harry couldn't look away from his pale, hairy calves. Snape, in shorts. Ron would never believe him.

Ron would never believe a lot about Harry's summer.

Harry swam towards Remus, who ducked underwater and tackled Harry around the waist, throwing him up and towards Sirius. He hit the water with a splash that almost reached Snape, who glared from behind his book. "Do you mind?"

"Not really," Sirius replied nonchalantly, splashing a little more water in his direction. Harry snickered before he could help himself.

"Where's that beach ball got to?" Remus asked, looking around for the brightly coloured inflatable they'd brought back from their trip to the seaside. Harry looked around, saw it wedged under a deck chair, and grinned to himself. He focused his magic, reaching a hand out towards the ball.

"Accio beach ball," he whispered. There was a brief tug, and the ball zoomed towards him.

"Look at you!" Sirius cheered, diving over to sprawl on Harry's shoulders, beaming delightedly. "A wandless Summoning charm, you little show-off!" Harry's cheeks glowed with pride. He'd been working on it for a while, using the book he'd bought to help him stay more aware of his magical core. After the extra spells Snape had found on him, he didn't ever want to be at the mercy of someone else's magic again.

The three of them tossed the beach ball between them, Sirius getting slowly more aggressive and daring as the game went on. At one point, he launched himself off Remus' shoulders to reach up and spike the ball down towards the water, laughing when it made Harry squawk. Needing a minute to catch his breath, Harry swam over to the edge of the pool, leaning his elbows on the stone tiles.

“Good book, Professor?” he called cheerfully to Snape, who glanced up at him.

“Indeed.”

“You should come swim for a bit, y’know,” Harry offered. “Maybe you could try and drown Sirius.”

“Oi!” came the cry from across the pool. Snape’s eyes glittered in amusement.

“Tempting,” he mused. Then, to Harry’s utter astonishment, Snape put his book down and sat up. Seconds later, Harry was looking at his professor’s bare chest as he shed his t-shirt and walked towards the pool. There was a loud wolf-whistle, and when Harry whipped around, the exasperated look on Remus’ face confirmed that he had definitely not made that noise. Sirius on the other hand was smirking, beach ball in one hand.

Snape was pale as snow, thin and wiry, with several faint scars across his torso and biceps. Harry tried not to gawk at him. Snape hadn’t even taken his shirt off when they went to the beach!

The man stepped up to the edge of the pool, diving smoothly into the deep end and reappearing a few feet from Remus’ side. His dark hair stuck down flat, and he glanced askance at Remus. “Am I allowed to drown the mutt?” he asked. Remus sighed, struggling to hold in his amusement.

“I’d rather you didn’t,” he replied conversationally. “But whatever makes you happy.”

“Oi!” Sirius said again, mock-angry. “No drowning the Padfoot! This is a no-drowning pool.”

“What a pity,” Snape drawled, before launching off into the water again. He ignored the three of them entirely, swimming steady lengths along the edge of the pool, dodging the beach ball when necessary. After about twenty minutes, he hoisted himself out of the water, heading back towards his deck chair. As he walked away, Harry caught sight of a nasty, twisted scar running diagonally across his mid-back. It looked almost like he’d been whipped.

“Don’t ask,” Remus murmured softly, his honey eyes on his partner as the man cast a Drying charm on himself, then tugged his t-shirt back on. “He’s trusting you enormously to even let you see them.”

Harry nodded, turning back to the pool. Much to his surprise, he was actually starting to like Snape quite a lot. The man’s quick wit and dry humour were unexpectedly hilarious, and he was a great teacher now he didn’t hate Harry. Harry wasn’t looking forward to going back to school in September, when they’d have to pretend to be enemies again.

They stayed in the pool for a while longer, then eventually dried off and dragged themselves back to the house, Sirius playfully wrestling Harry on the way. Snape and Remus disappeared into their room after lunch, Remus claiming to need a nap before their evening plans, so Harry pestered Sirius into helping him practice fourth year Transfiguration spells. Even if he couldn't show it in his classwork without making Dumbledore suspicious, he wanted to prepare himself as much as he could. Even Hermione would be impressed at how much of a bookworm he was becoming; the manor library was one of his favourite places, and the bookshelves in his room were rapidly filling up. He had an entire section for fiction novels now, both wizarding and muggle — Remus insisted there was more to books than just learning, and wanted to make sure Harry started out with the classics. Reading muggle versions of magic in books was wildly entertaining.

Ceri called them down for an early dinner, and Harry was practically vibrating with excitement through the meal, wondering what his godfather had in store for him. He wolfed down his food, looking up at the clock. They still had another twenty minutes. "Do I need to go change?" he asked, looking down at the plain jeans and t-shirt he was wearing, then looking at the adults. "Where are we going, magic or muggle?"

"Muggle. Grab your jacket, we'll be outside," was all Sirius would tell him. Harry nodded, racing up to his bedroom and throwing his wardrobe open, looking at his choices. Sirius had been in jeans and a t-shirt, but he made everything he wore look cool. Snape was wearing black jeans and a dark green button-up, while Remus had on grey trousers, a button-up and a cardigan. Not helpful.

Eventually, Harry decided on a nice pair of dark jeans, a blue long-sleeve shirt with a geometric design on it, and his Silverling's jacket and boots. He made an attempt at taming his wild hair, but gave up within a couple minutes, shrugging helplessly at his reflection.

Making sure his wand was in its invisible holster, Harry grabbed his muggle wallet off his desk and hurried back downstairs, where the three adults were waiting in the entrance hall. "You ready, pup?" Sirius asked, excitement lighting up his grey eyes. Harry grinned, nodding, and followed them out into the driveway.

You couldn't apparate or disapparate from inside the house, so they always had to walk about twenty feet away to get past the wards. Before they left, Snape turned to Sirius, casting a few spells to mask his true identity; his hair became short and mid-brown, his jaw narrower, his skin several shades darker. It wasn't entirely necessary — after several weeks of good meals, a shave and a haircut, Sirius was a far cry from the man on the wanted posters, and his face hadn't been on the muggle news in months. But, better safe than sorry.

Harry took Sirius' arm, waiting for the now-familiar feeling of being squeezed through a tube. They appeared in an empty alley somewhere, Remus and Snape right behind them. Harry fell into step beside his godfather, bouncing on his toes as they left the alley and emerged on a street right next to what looked like a huge park. It was full of people, blocked in by barriers, and rising over the crowd Harry could see some sort of stage structure. There was loud music coming from the crowd; a kind of gentle, folksy rock music.

Sirius put an arm around his shoulder, keeping him close as they joined a line of people at some sort of entrance gate. "Have you ever been to a concert before, cub?" Remus asked from behind him, his eyes bright. Harry shook his head. "Well, this is a good one for your first time. Just stay close to us, okay?"

Sirius handed over four tickets at the gate, and each of them was given a wristband, Harry's red to show he was underage. The crowd thinned out once they got through the barriers, and Harry saw a line of smaller stalls selling food and merchandise and such. "Open air concerts are always better than something in a venue," Sirius declared, his arm still across Harry's shoulders. "There's more space, it's not as smoky, and the music sounds better too."

The song ended, and a wave of applause rose up. The lead singer said something Harry couldn't quite make out, then the next song started up. Sirius steered him around a corner, and he could finally see the stage. The concert seemed to be pretty family-orientated; there was a huge cluster of people at the very front, but further back people were more spread out, many people with blankets and picnics spread about them. Sirius found a good spot that wasn't too close to the crush up front, and offered Harry a grin. "Can you see alright, pup?"

"Yeah," he assured, having to speak loudly over the music. "Sirius, this is amazing!" He'd never seen any kind of live music before. He could feel the bass guitar rumbling in his chest, the drum pounding in his ears like a heartbeat. Sirius beamed.

"You're gonna love it, kiddo!"

Harry glanced back at Remus and Snape, who were stood close to each other but not touching; it was the muggle world, after all, and you could never be too careful. They still curved into each other, just a little bit, like they couldn't help themselves. They probably didn't even notice they were doing it. Snape didn't always come with them on their weekend trips, but Harry liked it when he did. Remus was happier when he did. The werewolf was smiling faintly, his head bobbing along to the music.

Sirius spun Harry around, grabbing the boy's hands in his much larger ones and lifting them over his head, waving them in time with the music along with the rest of the crowd. Harry laughed, leaning back against his godfather's chest, hearing the man sing along with his slightly husky baritone.

Best summer ever.

.-.-.-

Sprawled out on the living room sofa in front of a crackling fire, Padfoot wedged between him and the back of the sofa and demanding head-scratches every few seconds, Remus could hardly believe how much his life had turned around in the last two months. He had his best friend, his pack cub, and the love of his life all under one roof, with nothing to disturb them until school began. And he was connecting with his inner wolf in ways he never had before. Transformations were easier than ever, and he felt ten years younger. If not for Harry's age and the lack of Lily and James, it would almost be like none of the last thirteen years had happened.

Padfoot let out a loud doggy snore, and Remus snickered, adjusting to make himself more comfortable. Sirius was getting much better, but he still often spent time in his animal form; after practically living as a dog for twelve years, it was hard for him to adjust to being human sometimes.

Harry and Severus were downstairs somewhere practicing Harry's Occlumency, so Remus officially had nothing to do until dinner. He could get used to being a man of leisure; after having to scrape whatever job he could find just to survive, he still couldn't quite get used to doing nothing. He missed teaching — more than he expected to, honestly — but tutoring Harry gave him so much joy, and it was nice to take a break as well.

He cocked his head when he heard familiar footsteps heading his way; was that the time already?

Severus appeared in the doorway, his fairly neutral expression turning into a scowl when he saw the way Padfoot was stretched out over Remus. Remus bit back a sigh. "I can see I'm interrupting," Severus said sharply. "I'll come back later."

"Severus," Remus called, but the man turned away. Remus sighed, dragging himself out from under the dog and off the sofa. "Go back to sleep, Padfoot," he muttered, rubbing the dog's head as he looked up in drowsy confusion.

He caught up to Severus halfway down the corridor, grabbing him gently by the elbow. "Severus, what did you need?"

"I was going to ask if you wanted company reading before dinner, but I see you already found it," the Slytherin retorted. He was unable to hide the hurt in his tone from Remus' practiced ear, and the werewolf frowned.

"I always want your company," he murmured, leaning in close to the man. "Sirius snores."

That was apparently the wrong thing to say, as Severus wrenched his arm from Remus' grip, stalking off towards the stairs. Remus hurried after him. "Severus, please," he urged. "Tell me what I'm doing wrong."

"If you can't figure it out yourself, that should be proof enough," Severus snapped.

Remus felt like they were sixteen again, navigating the minefield of Slytherin versus Gryffindor, werewolf versus future Death Eater, two teenage boys desperate for connection but so scared of getting hurt.

He'd hated being sixteen.

"Severus," he said again, sliding a hand to the back of the man's neck. Moony whined in the back of his head, asking why their mate was sad. Remus wished he had an answer. He looked deep into the near-black eyes he loved, trying to figure it out.

"Go back to your mutt, Lupin," Severus urged. "I have other places to be."

Slowly the matter dawned on Remus, and he almost groaned. Again? He thought he'd put this to rest over a decade ago. "Severus," he murmured, gently pushing the man up against the wall. Not hard enough that he couldn't fight it; never hard enough to hurt. Severus' back hit the dark blue wallpaper. "There is nothing between Sirius and I. There never has been and never will be anything but a very deep, utterly platonic love between Sirius and I. You know that. You know we kissed once when we were drunk fifth years and it was the worst kiss of my entire life.”

“He might’ve gotten better since then,” Severus muttered. Remus snorted.

“If you want to go find out, by all means, go ahead,” he retorted dryly. “But I have zero interest in doing so.”

“Does he know that?”

“Of course he does! Severus, my God, a blind man could see the way I look at you like you hung the whole Merlin-damned Milky Way!” He sucked in a sharp breath, his heart breaking that even after all these years, Severus still just didn’t get it. “Sirius has been through hell. Over a decade surrounded by dementors, then hiding in the Forbidden Forest living off rats. He hadn’t had a comforting touch since before Lily and James died, til he came here. He still has nightmares about being back in that place! Sometimes he needs someone to be there just to remind him he’s not alone. If I can be that person for my best friend, my brother, then you bet your arse I will. And I... I lost everything that night. I lost my pack, I lost my place in the wizarding world, I lost you. I’ve got most of it back, and I’m so grateful for every day I get to keep it. I lost Sirius for thirteen years. I need him, Severus. Not the same way I need you, but I need him all the same. Please don’t begrudge me that. Know that I only ever want you. You’re my heart, Severus, you have been since we were bloody thirteen!”

He had tears in his eyes now, his grip on Severus’ shoulders turning desperate. He couldn’t bear it if Severus ever tried to make him choose between him and Sirius. “You need that affection,” Severus said knowingly. “The affection I can never give you.”

“I don’t care!” Remus burst out in frustration. “I’m not ashamed of loving you. I didn’t hide it from Harry, I won’t hide it from Sirius — I’d announce it in the bloody Prophet if it wouldn’t risk both our lives. You’re more reserved, I understand that completely, and I love that about you. But don’t tell me you can’t give me affection when you show it to me all the time. It’s not the typical public affection, but I’ve never expected that, Severus. I’ve never doubted your love for me, please don’t insult me by doubting mine for you. Cuddling with Sirius — especially when he’s a dog, Merlin! — It’s nothing more than platonic comfort. I won’t give that up. But I need you to trust me.”

Severus breathed deep into the silence that stretched between them, until his anguished eyes opened to meet Remus’ once more. “You’re not the only one who lost everything that night, Remus,” he said eventually, every word dripping with pain. “I had to live through the aftermath. I had to carry on. Forgive me if I find it hard to believe we’re done hurting each other.”

Remus gripped the front of the man’s robes, pulling him into a furious kiss, trying to shove every ounce of what he was feeling into the embrace. It was messy, with teeth clashing and a desperate little groan ripping from Severus’ throat, and they were both breathing hard when he pulled away. “Believe it, Severus Snape,” Remus declared firmly. He was never more sure of anything in his life. “We are done. Darkness is coming, but whatever may happen, we will face it side by side, on the same team, and if anything wants to get to you it’s going to have to go through me, because we are done hurting each other and you are mine.” The last word was a growl, and he knew his eyes were glowing gold. “We’ve wasted so much time, Severus. So much time fighting the inevitable, pushing each other away to try and stop future pain. We’re too bloody old for that now.”

“I can’t lose you again.” Severus’ voice was a heartbroken whisper. Remus pressed closer to him, like he was trying to crawl inside the man’s chest and call it home.

“You won’t,” he promised, though it was a vow he could never keep. Anything could happen. But he knew only death would tear him away from the man he called his own. “You won’t lose me. I’m yours. I’ve always been yours. My heart beats the rhythm of your name, my soul has your magic threaded through it, there is no part of me that isn’t entirely devoted to you. Severus, please.”

Severus let out a low growl, and all of a sudden Remus was being pushed back, through a door that quickly slammed behind him. He looked up — they were in a bedroom. It wasn’t theirs, but it wasn’t Sirius’ or Harry’s either, so that was good enough for him. With a sound that was more wolf than man, he tossed his Slytherin lover onto the bed, crawling after him with hooded eyes. One of them threw a hand out, he wasn’t sure who, but he heard the lock click firmly, and then he stopped caring about anything that wasn’t Severus’ skin, Severus’ voice, Severus’ scent. Moony howled in the back of his head. Severus met him at every move, ripping at clothing and tugging hair. Remus was lost. But it was fine, it was perfect.

Severus would find him again. He always did.

Chapter 15

Two days before Harry's birthday, Snape came home from a meeting at the school, eyes filled with fury and magic making the windows rattle. "That foolish, idiotic, reckless, careless—"“

"Calm yourself," Remus called, walking over and resting soothing hands on the man's shoulders, tipping his forehead against Snape's for the briefest moment. "What has Albus done now?"

"Not just Albus," the Slytherin snarled. "The whole sodding Ministry." Harry shared a glance with Sirius, alarmed.

"What's going on at the Ministry?" he asked. Snape took a deep breath, straightening up.

"The Department of International Magical Cooperation has decided to revive the Triwizard Tournament."

Both Sirius and Remus swore loudly. Remus' empty teacup exploded. Harry stared at them in blank confusion.

"What's the Triwizard Tournament?"

Seeing that Remus was a little preoccupied as Snape continued ranting about dunderheaded buffoons, Sirius turned to his godson. "It's a competition between three magical schools — Hogwarts, Durmstrang and Beauxbatons — that pits a champion from each school against each other in three tasks designed to test their magic, their courage, and their quick thinking."

"That doesn't sound so bad," Harry mused; it actually sounded quite fun. Sirius' face was grave.

"The tournament was discontinued in 1792 due to the exceedingly high death toll of both champions and spectators," he said flatly. Harry's stomach sank.

"Oh."

"Not only are they reviving the tournament, but of course Hogwarts is hosting," Snape continued. "As if we didn't have enough to deal with! The school is going to be swarming with foreigners, including bloody Karkaroff—"

"Karkaroff?" Sirius barked, head whipping around. "What the hell is he doing there?"

"He's headmaster of Durmstrang now," Snape replied, looking like he'd swallowed a lemon. "They do so enjoy their Dark Arts."

Harry didn't dare ask who Karkaroff was. He didn't think he'd like the answer.

"The students aren't supposed to know, but I'll bet anyone with a parent in the ministry is aware by the time school starts back up," Snape said. "They're limiting entry to only those who are of age, but from what little Albus told me about the plans for the tasks, it's going to be chaos regardless.”

“Have they hired a new Defence teacher yet?” Remus asked, still with his hands on Snape’s shoulders, like he’d forgotten they were there, thumbs absently working at tense muscles. Snape shook his head.

“If they have, I haven’t been informed. Let’s just hope it’s someone good, with all this happening at the school.”

“Well, if you can only enter if you’re seventeen, I’ll just stay out of it, then, won’t I?” Harry pointed out diplomatically. “Yeah there’ll be a load of new people around the castle, but most of them will be students. I’ll just watch this Triwizard thing, keep my head down, and stay out of Dumbledore’s way.”

“You’ll still have to be careful,” Remus warned. “With so many people coming and going, it’ll be easier for someone to slip in where they’re not supposed to be.”

“I mean, being entirely honest, it doesn’t sound much more dangerous than my previous school years. Teacher possessed by literal Voldemort, giant basilisk roaming the halls looking for blood, mass murderer out to kill me — no offence, Sirius,” he added. “All on top of a headmaster who has some secret plan to maybe use me as an actual magical bomb. Just a pretty standard year, to be fair.”

The three adults stared at him for a minute.

“Why the hell are we letting him go back to that school?” Sirius muttered.

“Why the hell do I work at that school?” Snape agreed, shaking his head. Harry snorted.

“It’ll be alright,” he said, nonplussed. School-sanctioned danger made a nice change from the regular danger.

“Remember, students aren’t supposed to know until it’s officially announced,” Snape reminded him, and Harry rolled his eyes.

“I’ll just add it to the list of all my other secrets, don’t worry,” he replied. Snape shot him a dark look.

“Cheeky little brat.”

“Sorry, Professor, but your glare stopped working on me about the time Sirius turned you into a hamster the other week,” Harry admitted apologetically. “All I can think of is those chubby little cheeks.”

Snape growled again, while Sirius sniggered. Harry smirked.

The windows had stopped rattling, at least.

.-.-.

The morning of Harry's fourteenth birthday dawned clear and sunny, and Harry was awoken by several owls tapping against his window. The most violent of which was the tiny ball of fluff Sirius had given Ron — who, according to the letter, was named Pig, which, what??

He'd stayed up until midnight, as he always did, wishing himself a happy birthday when the clock turned over. But for the first time ever, he fell asleep quickly after, eager to celebrate his birthday properly. For the first time ever, he had people to celebrate it with.

He had presents from all the usual people — The Weasleys, Ron, Hermione, Hagrid — but to his surprise he also had presents from the twins, Neville, Susan and Hannah, and cards from Daphne, Blaise, Ernie, Anthony, Sullivan, the Patil twins, and even Cassius Warrington. He'd never felt so popular in his life.

There was nothing in the pile from Draco, and Harry tried to ignore the stab of hurt that rose in his chest. Perhaps the owl was just delayed. Draco was still in France, after all.

His bedroom door burst open, and Padfoot bounced onto the bed, sending Harry's presents flying. "Padfoot!" he exclaimed laughingly, shoving gently at the huge dog. "You've made a mess."

"That's what magic's for!" Sirius replied, human once more and sitting on Harry's bed, beaming. "Happy birthday, Harry!" He opened his arms, and Harry wriggled over for a hug.

"Happy birthday, cub," Remus called from the door, watching the scene with fond eyes. "Sirius, let him up, will you? Breakfast is ready. Ceri made pancakes."

At that announcement, Harry abandoned his godfather and practically sprinted to the kitchen, skidding into the table and taking his seat. "Happy birthday, Master Harry!" Ceri chirped. "Ceri be making your favourite!" She placed a plate in front of him, stacked high with pancakes, loaded with homemade whipped cream and fresh berries.

"Thanks, Ceri!" he enthused, reaching for his knife and fork.

"Couldn't wait for the rest of us?" Sirius mock-complained, when he entered the kitchen to find Harry with his cheeks bulging full of food.

"It's pancakes, Pads," he implored once he'd swallowed.

For once, Snape was the last one to the table, and he nodded at Harry in greeting. "Happy birthday, Potter."

Harry grinned at him, making sure his mouth wasn't full of pancake. Snape still looked mildly disgusted.

"So what are we doing today?"

"Well, you've got your Potions lesson this morning, and—" Sirius broke off in a laugh at the offended look on Harry's face. "Kidding, kidding. You've got presents in the living room, and then a little surprise at about ten."

If it was the surprise Sirius had been hinting about for weeks, Harry couldn't wait.

Breakfast was a lively affair, and once all the pancakes were gone the four of them moved up to the living room, where there were several wrapped presents on the coffee table. "Go on," Remus urged, nudging Harry forward gently. Harry didn't know where to start. He'd never opened birthday presents in front of people before. At least at Christmas, everyone else had presents, too.

He reached for the first one on the pile, a heavy box wrapped in brown paper; from Remus.

Tearing open the paper carefully, he gasped when it revealed a boxset of four beautiful hardback books. The Earthsea Quartet, the box read in shiny foil letters. "She's a muggle author," Remus explained. "I think you'll really like them. I started them when I was your age — the last one only came out a few years ago."

"Thanks, Remus!" Harry murmured, setting the books aside carefully to reach for his next present. The paper on this one was also plain brown, but the handwriting on top betrayed it to be from Snape. He was surprised it wasn't book-shaped.

The paper parted to reveal a small leather roll-up bag, about the width of his calf all around. When he undid the buckle keeping it secure, it revealed a dozen potion vials kept in neat little pouches, each one labelled with the same spidery handwriting. Pepper-Up Potion, Pain Relieving Potion, Dreamless Sleep, the list went on. "Should you ever need to medicate yourself without the supervision of Madam Pomfrey," Snape drawled. "Though please do try never to need them. You're just starting to not be entirely useless, it'd be a waste if you got yourself killed."

Harry grinned widely, and with a burst of impulsiveness, took two steps across the room to wrap his arms around Snape's waist. "Thanks, Professor."

Snape froze, and eventually lowered a hand to pat Harry's shoulder. Harry didn't push his luck, letting go and retreating back to the table. There were three gifts left, all wrapped in the same sparkly silver paper.

"That one's from me, that one's from me and Moony, and that one doesn't really count because it should've been yours to begin with," Sirius explained, pointing to each in turn. Harry went first for the one from just Sirius, tearing into the paper with some hesitation, just in case it exploded glitter everywhere. He was safe, for now.

Ripping the paper all the way off, his eyes lit up at the sight of the Zonko's box; of course Sirius had got him prank materials. "Figured you could take them to school, keep the old man on his toes," the animagus reasoned, mischief dancing in his eyes. Harry smirked.

The present from both Remus and Sirius combined was large and squishy, and Harry unwrapped it to find a beautifully soft dark grey cloak, with a gold clasp in the shape of a pawprint. "It's got size adjusting charms, for when you grow," Sirius told him as Harry stroked a gentle hand over the wool. "Warming charms and the like. And, well, I thought when the time comes, we could have your family crests embroidered on. Every young wizard needs a good cloak."

Harry swung the cloak over his shoulders, feeling the warmth wrap around him like a hug. He grinned. The only wizarding clothes he had were his school robes. This cloak looked like something Draco might wear. He looked down at himself, imagining how it might look with the Potter and Black crests on the front — and Slytherin and Peverell too, he supposed. “It’s brilliant,” he declared. Sirius beamed.

The final present was a huge, brightly coloured tapestry — it was clearly old, and Indian in origin, depicting some sort of abstract scene of the creation of the world, according to Hindu mythology. Harry had to set it on the floor to unroll it fully, his eyes round as he studied the intricate weaving. “This was brought over with the first ever Potters to emigrate to Britain, made by their ancestors,” Sirius explained, his voice thick with emotion. “It’s hung in the home of every first-born Potter since. We can hang it up here somewhere; then, when you’re old enough to have your own place, you can take it with you. James used to know all about it, and I only remember bits and pieces, but I’m pretty sure there’s a book about it in the vault.”

Harry was embarrassed to find himself tearing up a little bit — he had never had anything like that. Growing up with the Dursleys, they were determined to act as if Harry’s skin was just particularly tan, and once he got to the wizarding world people all just told him about the great magic in his blood. No one ever acknowledged the history of the Potter family, or told him anything about his heritage. “When we can, I’ll take you down to the Potter vault, and we can go through everything, teach you about the family. I learnt a fair bit living with James for so long — I don’t know everything, but I reckon I know enough to get you started,” Sirius said hesitantly. “I’m not James. I’m not trying to replace him. But... he would’ve wanted you to learn about where you come from. He would’ve taught you all that, if he could. I figured I can do my best to—“

He was cut off by Harry barrelling into his chest in a rib-crushing hug, and Sirius quickly returned it, kissing Harry’s messy hair. “You’ve been denied so much, pup. You deserve better.”

Harry kept his face buried in Sirius’ chest until he could be sure he was no longer going to cry, and then he pulled away, still with a bit of a lump in his throat. “Right,” he murmured. “I’m just gonna... take this all upstairs.”

“Don’t forget your surprise at ten,” Remus reminded. “You’ll want to be dressed for that.”

Harry had almost forgotten about that. He carefully rolled up the tapestry and gathered his presents, heading to his room and letting out a deep breath, still shaking a little. In that moment he hated Voldemort, and Dumbledore, for tearing him away from everything he should’ve had growing up. Love. A family. A heritage. Voldemort might have set it in motion by killing his parents, but Dumbledore was the one who kept him isolated from that point onwards. Dumbledore was the one who tried to deny him his family magics.

He turned to his wardrobe, shaking the dark thoughts from his head. It was his birthday, there was no need to get morose.

As ten o'clock drew closer, Sirius turned into Padfoot to stop himself spoiling the surprise, and Harry retaliated by sending various mostly-harmless jinxes at the dog, who jumped all over the entrance hall to avoid them, barking happily. "Just tell me!" the teen pleaded. Padfoot growled playfully, shaking his head.

The clock struck ten.

Sirius was back on two feet in an instant, and grabbed Harry around the shoulders. "Come on!" He led him towards the front doors, practically skipping. Was his surprise a place? Were they going somewhere? Stepping out into the driveway, Harry gaped.

Walking towards the house were two figures, one taller than the other, both with the sun shining off their white-blonde hair. "Draco!" Harry's eyes were wide in astonishment, and he whipped around to look at his godfather. "But he's— how did you—I don't understand!"

"Remus mentioned the two of you had become close," Sirius said, still grinning smugly. "I thought it'd be nice for you to have company your own age for the day."

Draco and his mother made it up to the house, and Narcissa Malfoy leaned in to press a brief kiss to Sirius' cheek. "You're looking well, cousin," she greeted. "Freedom clearly agrees with you."

"It definitely does. You should try it sometime," Sirius replied wryly.

"Cousin?" Harry echoed. Sirius rested a hand on Harry's shoulder.

"Narcissa Black-Malfoy," Sirius introduced. "Daughter of my father's sister. Cissa, dear, I don't believe you've been formally introduced; Harry Potter, my heir."

Narcissa offered a hand, and Harry knew he was supposed to kiss the back of it. "Well met, Heir Black."

"Well met, Lady Malfoy," Harry replied. He glanced between the two adults. "Wait, if you two are cousins, and I'm your heir, does that make Draco my cousin too?" For some reason, that made him feel weird.

Sirius and Narcissa shared an amused glance. "Not to worry, pup," Sirius assured, chuckling. "You're my heir in name, not blood."

"Sirius, allow me to introduce my son, Draco," Narcissa said primly, nudging Draco forward. He bowed.

"Well met, Lord Black."

"Well met, Heir Malfoy," Sirius returned. "Salazar, Cissa, he's certainly got the Black cheekbones. Not much of Lucius in him, is there?"

"Less and less every day, I believe," she said, running an affectionate hand over her son's hair. Draco preened.

With the formal greetings out of the way, Harry was finally facing Draco, who smirked at him. “Unanticipated company, Potter?” he remarked, reminding Harry of the first letter he’d sent at the beginning of summer. “Bit of an understatement.” He didn’t seem fazed by the enormous manor and its grounds; he probably lived in something twice the size of it. “No wonder you’ve been able to practice your Wronski Feint. Which I still don’t believe you can pull off, by the way,” he added.

“I’ll prove it to you,” Harry challenged. He glanced up at Sirius, who smiled fondly.

“Yes, you two can go flying. Narcissa and I can catch up in the parlour. Maybe even lure Snape up from his lab for a spot of tea.”

“Uncle Severus is here?” Draco asked, surprised.

“I’m sure he’d be delighted to see you, sweetheart, but you go ahead and play with Harry — it’s his birthday, after all. We’ll call you in for lunch,” Narcissa said. She reached into her handbag, and Harry beamed when she pulled Draco’s broom out, the bag much bigger on the inside than it appeared. “Have fun, boys. Do be safe. And happy birthday, Mr Potter.”

“Thanks, Mrs Malfoy!” Harry grabbed Draco by the wrist, tugging him in the direction of the quidditch pitch at the back of the manor. When they were alone, he rounded on his friend. “You’re supposed to be in France!”

“You’re supposed to be in Surrey,” Draco returned in the same tone. “Explain, Potter.” He mounted his broom, kicking off in a lazy spiral, and Harry summoned his Firebolt from the broom shed to join him. The two drifted in easy laps around the half-pitch as Harry told Draco all about Snape rescuing him from the Dursleys at the beginning of summer, and everything that had happened since.

“Mother was surprised when she got the letter from Uncle Severus, asking if we could get away for the day on the 31st,” Draco said once it was his turn to explain things. “I suppose your godfather included a letter too, explaining his circumstances. She took it fairly well, all things considered.”

“I didn’t realise she knew we were even friends,” Harry commented. Draco shrugged, doing an effortless barrel roll.

“I tell my mother everything,” he said evenly. “She won’t tell Father.” He smirked, swooping over to Harry’s side. “Now, enough about our guardians — surely you’ve got a snitch around here somewhere?” His eyes flashed in challenge, and Harry returned the look.

“You’re on, Malfoy.”

. . .

Harry hadn’t realised how much he missed having company his own age until he had Draco around. Or maybe it was just Draco in particular. Being able to spend time with the blond boy without having to hide in abandoned classrooms in the middle of the night; flying against him for the snitch in companionship rather than rivalry — Harry couldn't stop smiling, even when Draco asked him why he was grinning like a loon.

They flew until lunchtime, first trying to beat each other to the snitch and then getting the quaffle out, passing back and forth as they talked about their summers. Harry told Draco about the concert he'd gone to the week before, while Draco bragged about all the interesting places he'd been in Europe. "I brought my cards with me," the Slytherin said, tossing the quaffle in Harry's direction. The dark-haired boy had to stretch to catch it, letting the movement carry him into a sloth roll. "I can teach you that French game. It's ever so simple. Mirielle said it's quite popular at Beauxbatons."

"Mirielle? She's one of the girls you saw in France?" Harry asked, wondering why the name seemed to stick funny in his throat. Draco nodded.

"She and her cousin, Adalene. Their home isn't far from our summer house, we spent most of the week together."

"Oh." Harry's next throw was so hard it almost knocked Draco off his broom. The blond shot him a glare.

"So, been having fun with Granger and Weasley all summer?" he returned. "Since you're not with the muggles and all."

"They don't actually know I'm here," Harry admitted. "We didn't think it was safe. I've barely even heard from them — Hermione's written more than Ron, but... anyway, you're the first visitor I've had all summer."

"Oh."

Draco was saved having to think up another response by Sirius calling for them from the back patio. "Lunch is ready, boys!"

They landed swiftly, carrying their brooms with them and hurrying towards the house. Halfway there, Draco skidded to a halt, eyes wide. "Is that— the hippogriff! Buckbeak!"

Harry looked over towards the tree line, where Buckbeak was trotting out of the woods, tossing his head back and swallowing a dead rabbit. "Oh, yeah, did I not tell you that bit? Sirius escaped on his back. He lives here now."

Draco looked at him incredulously, then back to the hippogriff. "You're definitely telling me the full story after lunch," he declared, then grabbed Harry's arm and pulled him towards the house. Harry flushed; for a second there, he'd thought Draco was going to take him by the hand.

Ceri had made an excellent spread, and in the middle of the table was an enormous chocolate cake with the words 'Happy Birthday Harry' in swirling silver icing, delicately iced snitches all around the edges. A pang of fondness rose in Harry's chest as he remembered the cake Hagrid had brought him, three years ago. His first birthday cake.

“Uncle Severus!” Draco greeted, then glanced at the man beside him. “Professor Lupin.”

Remus smiled. “Hello, Mr Malfoy. I’m glad you could make it.”

“Draco.” Snape reached out to touch his godson’s shoulder briefly. “It’s good to see you well.”

As they sat down to eat, Harry looked around the table, getting a strong urge to laugh. If someone had told him a year ago he’d be spending his birthday with Draco Malfoy and Professor Snape, and actually be happy about that, he would’ve sent them to St Mungo’s.

But he was. Happy, that was. It was the best birthday ever, and it was barely even halfway over.

“My son tells me you’re getting better acquainted with the other heirs at Hogwarts, Mr Potter,” Narcissa said, reaching for a plate of sandwiches. “It’s good to hear the Black family name will be properly represented in the Wizengamot once more.”

“I’m still new to it all, but I’m learning,” Harry replied. “Draco’s helping a lot. He knows far more about it than I do.”

“If I can be of assistance, don’t hesitate to ask. We are family, of a sort, after all,” Narcissa pointed out. “There was a time when we thought that Draco might be the Black heir. I didn’t realise Sirius had taken precautions. Lucius was... quite disappointed.” Her face hardened for a moment, and Sirius growled quietly under his breath.

“You understand why I had to, Cissa,” he said. “I knew you’d raise the boy well, but I couldn’t be sure how much influence Malfoy would have over him. The Black family name has been through enough without adding that to it.”

“Oh, I completely agree.”

Draco nudged Harry under the table. “Do you know what’s happening at Hogwarts this year?” he asked conspiratorially. Harry raised an eyebrow.

“Do you know what’s happening?” he returned quietly. How could Draco know?

“Father told me everything,” Draco bragged.

“I’m sure he also told you to keep quiet about it,” Snape cut in with a pointed look. Draco’s pale cheeks flushed.

“Yeah, but you told me,” Harry pointed out. Snape’s glare turned on him, but he just grinned.

“For your own safety.”

“And we all appreciate the forewarning,” Remus said, resting his hand on Severus’ forearm for the briefest moment.

“It’s a shame underage wizards can’t enter,” Draco drawled. “I’m sure I’d win if I could.”

"Yes, I'm sure you know far more spells than the seventh years," Harry agreed sarcastically, earning a glare. "You'll have to sit back and let someone else have the glory, I know it'll be very difficult for you."

Draco gave a haughty sniff, turning to his pumpkin juice. "With any luck, the Hogwarts champion will be a Slytherin. Or a Ravenclaw." He sent a glance to Harry. "As long as it's not a Gryffindor."

"I bet a Gryffindor champion could win," Harry argued. He didn't know the Gryffindor seventh years very well, but they all seemed competent enough.

"I'm sure if Dumbledore has his way, it'll be a lion," Draco muttered with a grimace. "More glory to the house of red and gold." All three Slytherins in the room rolled their eyes in unison. Harry couldn't even debate the point; he didn't doubt Dumbledore would put a Gryffindor in the spotlight if he could.

"Well, we'll find out soon enough," Sirius declared. "Now, who's for cake? Go on, birthday boy."

Harry was glad there was no singing and candle-blowing; at Dudley's birthday parties it always looked excruciatingly awful. Instead Harry was handed an enormous knife, and carefully cut a slice for each person at the table. The cake was moist and fluffy, with a thick layer of cream and ganache in the middle. It was heaven.

"Oh, that reminds me," Draco said suddenly. He reached down into his mother's handbag, pulling out a gift wrapped in Slytherin green paper. "Happy birthday."

Harry blinked, surprised. He'd thought Draco's visit was the present. He said as much, and the blond gave him an exasperated look. "Of course I got you something, you daft lion. Go on, open it."

Harry tore into the paper, a beaming smile crossing his face at what lay inside. A brand new pair of quidditch goggles, brown leather with gold edging and buckles. According to the accompanying scroll of parchment, they were charmed unbreakable, anti-glare, waterproof and fog-proof, as well as prescription-adjusting; he wouldn't need to wear his glasses underneath them.

"You mentioned your current pair pinch your new glasses by your ears," Draco muttered, his pale cheeks turning rosy. "I don't want you to have any excuses when I kick your arse next year."

Harry laughed, Draco ducking his head when his mother scolded him for his language.

"You've got high hopes," the Gryffindor teased. His pulse was racing, his stomach squirming far more than it should over a birthday present. He couldn't even remember making that complaint; for Draco to not only have been listening, but remembered enough to think about it when picking out Harry's present... it made his face heat, though he wasn't sure why. "They're brilliant, Draco. Thank you so much!"

The two boys sat, grinning and blushing at each other — completely unaware of the looks the adults were exchanging over their heads.

“Have you shown Draco your room yet, Harry?” Remus asked, and Harry shook his head.

“Not yet. We’ve been too busy flying.” He glanced over at his blond friend. “I can show you after lunch, if you’d like?” He’d never had a bedroom he was proud to show a friend before. “Oh, I should show you the library, too. It’s huge!”

“You’re getting worse than Granger,” Draco muttered, barely any malice in his tone. Harry stuck his tongue out. “And here I thought you were starting to be civilised.”

“You can only get so far with Gryffindors, Draco,” Snape told him. Remus snorted.

“May we be excused?” Harry asked, once he and Draco had both finished their cake. Draco could only stay until five, and Harry wanted to make the most of his time. They probably wouldn’t see each other again until school started, and then they’d have to pretend to be enemies again.

“Go ahead, pup.” Sirius ruffled Harry’s hair, and the two boys left the kitchen, Harry leading the way, carrying his present from Draco securely.

“Come on, it’s up here.” He turned off the stairs towards his room, slowing down so Draco could look around curiously.

“There’s no portraits,” he remarked. Harry shrugged.

“Sirius said it’s better that way. No chance of being spied on. I guess the Black family liked their secrecy.”

“Malfoy Manor has dozens of portraits. I can’t get away with anything,” Draco groused. “There’s a couple that like me, but most of them just go straight to Father if I’m doing something I shouldn’t be.”

“Why doesn’t your mother just... leave? Get a divorce, or something?” Harry asked. Meeting Narcissa, hearing the way she spoke of her husband, it was clear she didn’t want to be married to him.

“It’s not that simple in the wizarding world. Divorce needs a good reason, and it needs to be approved by the head of the slighted party’s house. Unfortunately, the Black family doesn’t have one of those at the minute, legally. Besides, we’ve got nowhere to go. You don’t just say no to a man like Lucius Malfoy.” The twist of Draco’s lips was bitter, and Harry squeezed his arm sympathetically.

“We’ll find Pettigrew, and get Sirius’ name cleared. Then he can approve the divorce. I bet he’d even let you move in here, if you needed somewhere safe to live.” Harry couldn’t see Sirius letting Narcissa stay with such an awful husband if he could help it. He was always telling Harry how important family was to the Blacks.

Draco sighed. “It’s a nice thought, but we couldn’t hide forever. Father always gets his way.” He swept some blond hair out of his eyes. “I thought you were showing me your bedroom, anyway? Hurry up!”

Harry blushed, his brain flashing to some other context Draco might want to see his bedroom. He told his brain to sod off and stop being ridiculous. As if he and Draco would be — like that!

Still, as he nudged open the door, the thought stayed lodged in the corner of his mind. It wouldn’t be so bad, maybe. If they were.

—.-.—

Sirius looked across the living room at the two teenage boys sprawled in front of the fire, playing some sort of card game the Malfoy boy had apparently learned in France. His mind still boggled at the sight of a Potter and a Malfoy being so friendly. The blond wasn’t that bad, considering his upbringing. Narcissa had done alright with him there.

And Narcissa, well — Sirius hadn’t expected it to be so easy to see his cousin again. In the years before the fall of Voldemort, he’d thought her truly lost to her awful husband. She’d been haughty and cruel and gotten sucked in to all the talk of blood purity and war against muggles. He wasn’t sure what had changed, but he was glad. She was more and more like the little girl he’d grown up alongside, who would do anything for her family and just wanted those she loved to be safe and happy. She still clearly had a lot of firm opinions about blood status, but they were much more similar to Sirius’ opinions; muggleborns were quite welcome, as long as the wizarding traditions weren’t lost in amongst their muggle customs.

“They really don’t have any idea?” Narcissa asked quietly, her eyes cast over at her son and Sirius’ godson. Remus smirked.

“Not a clue. Not that Harry’s told me, at least. Astonishing, isn’t it?”

“It’s disgusting,” Snape drawled. Sirius laughed quietly.

“I think it’s sweet.” He watched as Harry stole a card from Draco’s hand, making some sort of remark that had Draco’s cheeks turning pink. “They’re so innocent.”

“Hopefully we can keep them that way for a while longer,” Remus sighed. “Merlin, they’re worse than Severus and I ever were. At least we knew we were flirting.”

Across the room, Harry laughed, rolling away as Draco tried to snatch one of his cards. Sirius sighed to himself; did Harry have to choose a Malfoy?

That was unfair, he supposed. Draco was a nice enough kid, for a Slytherin. He’d heard something from Harry over the weeks about the role the boy had to play in public, and it sounded like it would wear on anyone.

“I’m betting they’ll figure it out by Christmas,” Sirius declared under his breath. “Harry’s a bit thick sometimes, but he’s not that dense. He’ll have a quick little sexuality crisis, then they'll be sorted."

"I'm surprised Draco's so oblivious," Narcissa commented. "He's always known he likes boys. Truthfully, I've been wondering if something like this might happen ever since I got a letter his first week of Hogwarts with three whole paragraphs about Harry Bloody Potter and how frustrating he was." She smiled fondly. "I certainly never expected it to go like this."

"Harry is full of surprises," Remus remarked.

That was an understatement if Sirius had ever heard one. "I think we've only hit the tip of the iceberg, there." He thought about everything that had come to light ever since he'd met Harry. It was just the beginning.

He caught Snape and Narcissa sharing a loaded glance, and Remus frowned and placed a hand on Snape's left arm. Sirius's brows furrowed. "What?" he asked, wondering what he was missing.

Snape looked to Narcissa. "Is it getting darker for you, too?"

The blonde woman nodded. Snape cursed softly.

"What?" Sirius hissed again. Then it dawned on him, his gaze dropping to Remus' hand curled around Snape's forearm. He hadn't seen Snape in short sleeves since that day in the pool. "Oh. He's getting stronger, isn't he?" Peter must have found his master, as Trelawney had predicted. Sirius' stomach rolled.

"It's just a matter of time," Narcissa confirmed. "Lucius has been meeting with several old friends this summer. I believe there are plans being hatched."

Squeezing his eyes shut for a minute, Sirius shook his head, looking back over at the two teenagers. So carefree, so happy. He wanted Harry to stay that way forever.

"I've been invited to several of those meetings," Snape revealed. "I managed to find excuses for all but one. He's definitely reconnecting with the old crowd. I'm keeping my ear to the ground, but it's all just murmurs so far. Everyone is hesitant to trust what they know to be true, just in case."

The Triwizard Tournament likely wasn't the only thing they'd have to worry about this school year. Sirius cursed Peter Pettigrew for the thousandth time — because of him, he wouldn't be able to protect Harry like he ought to. He just had to send him off into Dumbledore's clutches and hope against hope nothing happened that he couldn't fix.

He looked to his cousin, who had fear etched in her pretty features. "Cissa, if you ever need somewhere to go," he started cautiously, unsure how she might take his offer. "The House of Black will always welcome you with open arms." He couldn't do anything about Lucius legally, but he could offer her a safehouse until the war ended if it ever got bad.

"I had hoped to play my part well enough to keep Draco out of the worst of things," Narcissa said, pursing her lips as she cast her gaze over to her son. "I'm starting to think that might not be possible anymore. I hadn't accounted for this."

Sirius snorted under his breath; none of them had accounted for the way those two boys looked at each other with stars in their eyes.

"It's too early to tell, yet," Narcissa continued. "But I'll make sure there are arrangements in place for any future... inevitabilities. And I'll keep your offer in mind. Thank you, cousin."

"Whatever comes to pass, I think it's clear we're all in it together, now," Sirius replied.

Between those two teenagers sat oblivious in front of the fire, all four of the adults in the room would give their lives in a heartbeat for one or the other. And, while Sirius knew it was too soon to tell — teenage crushes came and went like clothing trends — if Harry was anything like his parents, he had a sneaking suspicion he and Narcissa were going to end up even closer family than they were now. Eventually.

If Harry could ever get his head out of his arse and realise what was in front of him.

Ah, young love.

.-.-.-

When Pig arrived with a letter from Ron in the second week in August, reality came crashing back down on Harry uncomfortably quickly. He stared at it for a long moment, a tightness in his chest that it took him a minute to realise was anxiety.

Why did he feel so anxious about seeing his best friends again?

Since Draco had visited on his birthday, it had gone back to just being himself and the three adults. He'd mentioned briefly to Sirius that he had other friends who were somewhat in the know, like Neville, who could maybe visit, but Sirius had gently put his foot down.

"I told you when you got here this house has always been for family, not visitors," he had said with an apologetic half-smile. "I understand wanting to have your friends over, but the fewer people who know about this place, the better. Narcissa and Draco are family, as astonished as I am to be saying that and actually meaning it. They're Blacks, they deserve to be here. But no one else, pup. Not here."

Harry understood, and truthfully he liked it better that way. Seren Du was a little bubble of paradise — the rest of the world didn't exist unless they sought it out. All of them seemed to be benefiting from the break; even Snape, though he'd been acting a little weird lately, was like a completely different man. Harry didn't know if the professor was always like that in private, or if it was Remus' influence, but he was pretty sure the house had something to do with it.

All the same, he should've been excited to go to the Burrow. And to the Quidditch World Cup! And yet... if Ron hadn't made it clear in his letter that he wasn't taking no for an answer, Harry might have turned him down.

He kept the letter in hand as he shuffled down to breakfast, where all three adults were already up. "Morning, cub," Remus greeted, then frowned. "Why the long face?"

Harry held up the letter. "Ron's dad got tickets to the Quidditch Cup. They're going to come pick me up from the Dursleys on Sunday evening."

"That's brilliant! International quidditch, I'm so jealous!" Sirius' enthusiasm was damped by a confused expression. "Why do you look like you need a Cheering charm?"

"No, it's great!" Harry insisted. "I just... I like it here. I thought I'd have all summer with you." Ron had talked about the Cup, but Harry hadn't truly expected Mr Weasley to actually be able to get enough tickets for all of them.

"Pup, go to Ron's house. Have fun with your friends. Go see the Cup," Sirius urged softly. "I love having you, but you can't stay cooped up in here forever. You deserve to spend time with your friends, not us three old farts."

"Oi, speak for yourself there, Grandpa," Remus said in mock-annoyance.

"Only one of us is going grey, Moony dearest, and it sure as hell isn't me," Sirius replied sweetly. "Anyway, pup. What I'm saying is, this place is your home now, it will be as long as you want it. But you're young, you should be out having fun with kids your own age. Besides," he added, screwing his nose up. "How will it look to the rest of them if you suddenly decide you love being at your relatives' place so much you don't want to leave them to go see quidditch? They'll think you've been possessed."

Harry grimaced. That would certainly give the game away. "I suppose." He glanced down at the letter. If the Weasleys were coming on Sunday, that only gave him two more days at Seren Du.

"We'll figure out a way to keep in touch while you're in school. It'll be fine." Sirius reached over to squeeze Harry's shoulder. "Chin up, kiddo. We knew this was coming sooner or later."

"Yeah, but I thought it'd be later," Harry muttered, frowning into his porridge.

"It'll be good for you to see your friends again, Harry," Remus said, offering him a smile. "We'll have to take you back to the Dursleys' Sunday lunchtime, let you get picked up from there. It's a good thing we already got your school supplies." Instead of going to Diagon Alley, Harry and Remus had gone to Margin Alley in Cardiff, where it was quieter. Sirius wanted to come, but apparently there were anti-animagus wards in the area.

"I'm sure my relatives will be thrilled to see me again," he replied dryly. At least he wouldn't have to spend long with them.

Chapter 16

With the clock suddenly ticking down very rapidly to his departure, Harry was determined to make the most of Seren Du before he left. He had a bit of a panic at the start — so many things he wanted to do, and so little time left! — but he figured it out pretty quickly. He could fly at the Burrow, even if it wouldn't be on a proper half-pitch. The pool, the library, and the company were the things he would miss the most.

He also sent Artemis off with a round of letters for all the friends he couldn't send Hedwig to, explaining he was being moved to somewhere his mail would be monitored and he'd see them back at school. Luckily, that was only a couple of weeks away. He'd hate to be out of contact with Draco for much longer than that. Ever since the visit, Artemis had been run ragged flying back and forth between them.

The three adults had decided to wrap up Harry's lessons for the summer, since he'd be leaving soon anyway. Harry was actually a little sad about it. Currently, he was sat in Snape's potions lab, helping finish off a batch of Skele-Gro that would be going to the Hogwarts hospital wing ready for the new school term. "With that bloody tournament, we'll probably need plenty of it," Snape had muttered derisively.

Setting the potion aside to cool, Harry looked up at his professor cautiously. "That's all done, then?" Snape nodded.

"Once it's cooled, I'll bottle it and send it to the school." He checked some notes on a piece of parchment tacked to his desk; Pomfrey's order list, from what Harry could gather. "Now that I've seen you're a perfectly competent brewer, I'll expect your grades to improve in my class, Mr Potter."

Harry sent him a light glare. "I'm sure they would if my professor didn't hate me, and the Slytherins didn't sabotage me."

"From the looks of things, you've got half the Slytherins wrapped around your little finger," Snape retorted, making Harry blush. "And you are aware that I will have to keep up appearances. I shall endeavour not to harm your potions, and I will mark you as fairly as I can, but there are people on both sides watching me, Potter, and I must maintain a certain level of... spite in your direction."

"I expected as much," Harry said with a shrug. It really wouldn't be much different to previous years. He could handle it. "But, sir, before we reach that point... I just wanted to say thank you, for everything you've done for me over the summer. You didn't have to spend time teaching me. I'm well aware that you're here because Moony is, not for me or Sirius. I just— you didn't have to be nice to me, but you were. So, thanks," he finished awkwardly. Snape was silent for a minute.

"I daresay Remus would have been quite unimpressed with me had I treated you here as I treat you at school," he said eventually. "Nonetheless, I find that without certain... external influences, you are not a terrible student, Mr Potter. Still unfailingly Gryffindor, but that appears to be the life I have chosen for myself.” This came with a long-suffering sigh that made Harry laugh.

“You know the Sorting Hat almost put me in Slytherin?” he said, watching Snape’s dark eyebrows rise.

“What a disaster that would have been. Dumbledore might have had a stroke on the spot.” Snape turned to Harry, looking him over appraisingly. “I have hope that between myself and Draco, we’ll be able to make enough of a Slytherin out of you for you to survive in this world. Rest assured, Mr Potter; while we may have started off on the wrong foot, we are on the same side now.” He strode towards the door, beckoning Harry to follow. “As we still have some time before dinner, I would like you to follow me to the parlour. I wish to check your Occlumency shields one last time before you face the headmaster.”

Harry nodded, and the pair of them went upstairs to the empty parlour. Harry took a seat, knowing he would need it if Snape was about to be as ruthless as he feared.

The Slytherin didn’t give Harry time to prepare; as soon as they made eye contact, he was working away at Harry’s shields. Harry kept his breathing steady and his mental defences tight, unsure how long he sat there for. Snape tried everything; brute force, sneaking through cracks, even trying to convince Harry that he’d disappeared, only to try and creep in when he let his guard down. Through it all, Harry refused to let him in. Eventually, the attack ceased, for real this time.

“Very good, Potter,” Snape said with an approving nod. “You should be able to withstand any discreet attempts at entering your mind. Should the headmaster wish to put in any more force than that, it’ll be obvious to you and also any bystanders, and I believe if it ever gets to that point you will have bigger things to worry about.” He looked at Harry with a serious expression. “Make sure you have your shields up at all times, especially if you’re in large crowds or around the headmaster. Eventually it will become second nature, but at first it may get exhausting.”

“I’ll do my best,” Harry promised. “Thank you for helping me with this, Professor.” He’d made more progress in the last month and a half than he had in the entire nine months he’d been working on it by himself.

“You’re welcome, Potter. You’re free to go.”

Nodding in thanks, Harry got to his feet, leaving the parlour with his hands in his pockets. Now, how to spend the rest of his day... perhaps he’d set a few parting pranks for his beloved godfather.

.-.-.-.

All too soon, it was Saturday night. Harry’s school trunk was packed and ready, after a long, drawn-out selection process of his bookshelves, which culminated in Remus promising to send him any books he left behind if he decided he wanted them. It was a refreshing concept for Harry, having a bedroom he could leave stuff in during the school year without worrying about any of it being broken or stolen or thrown out. Having enough things that he couldn't fit them all in his school trunk.

Harry was about as ready as he could be, and was lying in bed listening to some quiet music on his Wireless when there was a knock on the door. He turned off the Wireless, calling for whoever it was to enter. Sirius slipped into the room, shutting the door behind him, and turned to Harry with a sad sort-of smile on his face. "Mind if I join you?"

Harry patted the mattress beside him, and Sirius clambered up onto the bed, leaning against the headboard with his shoulder bumping Harry's. "All set, then?" he asked, his gaze landing on Harry's trunk.

"I think so. Moony said he could send anything I'd forgotten over with Snape." He bit his lip. "Are you ready? For me to leave?" It was weighing on his mind, the prospect of school starting up; he would be gone, Snape would soon be gone, and Remus wouldn't want to spend all his time away from his partner.

It meant that there were times Sirius would be alone in the house. After being in Azkaban, Sirius didn't do well being alone. "Don't worry about me, Harry," he insisted. "I'll be fine. I've got Buckbeak, and Ceri. And Moony's promised me he won't be gone more than two evenings a week." He shrugged. "Gotta get used to being by myself eventually, right? Can't expect you lot to babysit me forever."

"We're not babysitting you, Sirius," Harry scolded lightly. "This has been the best summer ever."

"It has been pretty great, hasn't it?" Sirius agreed. "I'm glad I was able to give you that. I wish I could give you the world, Pup, but this is a good start." The man sighed, running a hand through his dark hair and turning to Harry. "I've been reliably informed that I can't keep you hidden away here forever, so for your old godfather's sake, please look after yourself in the big scary outside world?" His words were playful but his eyes were serious, and Harry chuckled.

"You're not old, Sirius, you're thirty-four."

"Thirty-five in November!" Sirius yelped. It was clear he thought that was akin to turning a hundred.

"Exactly, you're barely a quarter of the way into your life, for a wizard."

"You're missing my point," Sirius retorted, aware he'd lost that particular argument. "Be careful, okay? Voldemort isn't the only enemy you have anymore. Dumbledore wants you for his weapon — exactly how, we can only guess, but it's clear he doesn't care about you past how you factor into his grand plan. If he knows you're starting to mess with that plan, you're in deep trouble. There's going to be a lot going on at the school this year, and I need you to be safe."

"I won't go looking for trouble, Sirius," Harry said. His godfather's expression was doubtful. "I mean it! I can't promise trouble won't find me, but I'll try my best to stay away from it."

And Dumbledore.”

“I suppose that’s all I can ask.” Sirius reached into the pocket of his robe, pulling out a small round mirror in a black frame. “I want you to have this. It’s a two-way mirror; your dad and I used to use them all the time. I’ve got the other one — just say my name into the mirror, and mine will vibrate, and then we can talk to each other.”

“Or you can call me if you’re lonely and need someone to talk to when Remus is with Snape,” Harry realised. He took the mirror, running his fingers over the surface. It was only the size of his hand, but he’d easily be able to keep it with him in his school robes. “This is brilliant!”

“If you ever need to talk, about anything — the headmaster, your classes, romantic advice,” he wiggled his eyebrows and Harry made a face, “I’m always here for you. Okay?”

“I’ll call. At least once a week,” Harry promised. It would be much easier than sending an owl.

“And if you need someone in person, go to Snape. He’s still a greasy git, but I guess he’s family now.” Sirius grumbled, but Harry knew better; his godfather was delighted Remus was happy and in love. Even if it was Snape.

Sirius shifted around until he was sitting cross-legged facing Harry. “Remember where your allies are, Pup. From the sounds of things, you’ve got a fair few. Keep making friends with all the other heirs, and the kids in other houses. I know I’m hardly one to talk, but all these inter-house rivalries have been going on far too long; it’s fine when it’s friendly, but the divide has gotten far too deep. If anyone can help reconcile that, it’s your generation. Even if you have to do so in secret, keep them close. Especially Cissa’s boy — he’s a Black at heart, and once you’ve got a Black’s loyalty you’ve got it for life.”

“It feels like this is all so much bigger than us, Sirius,” Harry murmured. “We’re all just kids. None of us are even old enough to take our Wizengamot seats yet; how are we supposed to change the minds of half the wizarding world?” There were so many broken parts of wizarding society; things that had been allowed to fester since Voldemort’s first rise to power, if not longer. The more Harry learnt, the more he realised how screwed up things had become. But half of the people in charge didn’t seem to care; not when the system benefited them. They didn’t want to fix it, they’d just figured out how to exploit it.

“One thing at a time, kiddo,” Sirius said. “You’re a determined little bugger, and I have every faith you’ll succeed. We’ll be right behind you every step of the way.” He offered a grin, patting Harry’s knee. “Remember, you don’t have to change everything all at once. Just focus on getting through the school year in one piece for now, yeah? You’ll have plenty of time for politics when you’re older. Try and enjoy being a normal teenager for a bit longer.”

He knew what Sirius was implying. He wasn’t stupid; the adults had been shifty all summer, and the tattoo on Snape’s arm — his Dark Mark — was more visible now than it had been before. Voldemort was gaining strength, and war would soon be upon them once more. Still, it was an absurd concept to Harry, with his previous Hogwarts track record. “When have I ever been a normal teenager?” he pointed out wryly. Sirius barked an unexpected laugh.

"You've got me there, kid. Well, normal teenagers should be in bed by this time. Actually, that's a lie, normal teenagers stay up all night getting into mischief," he added with a half-grimace, "but you've got a big day tomorrow, so you should get some sleep." He shuffled off the mattress, but leaned in to kiss Harry's hair. "I'll see you in the morning. I love you, Harry."

Harry would never get tired of hearing that. "I love you too, Sirius."

His godfather slipped quietly from the room, and Harry looked down at the mirror in his hands, sighing. That was one of his problems solved.

If only he had a hope of figuring out how to address the others.

.-.-.-.-

Harry awoke with a gasp, hand flying up to his burning scar. What the hell was that all about?

It could have been a nightmare. But a nightmare had never made his scar burn like that. A nightmare had never felt so... real.

A shiver went down his spine. He couldn't even remember what really happened; he concentrated harder, trying to recall. It had been so vivid... there were two people he knew, and one he didn't... in a room he didn't recognise... a cold, high voice — Voldemort.

Flashes of the dream flew through his memory. Wormtail was there, they were talking about — about him. They had killed someone already, and they wanted him dead too.

Harry had no idea who the old man was, but his gut told him he was now dead. Except not, because it was a dream. Wasn't it?

He crawled out of bed, wondering if anyone else would be up that early. Snape was usually an early riser. To his surprise, Remus was the only one in the kitchen, his eyes still half-closed. "You're up early," he commented, then frowned when he got a better look at Harry. "Cub, are you alright?"

"I had a dream," Harry started shakily. "I... when I woke up, my scar was hurting. It's probably fine, right?"

The look on Remus' face suggested that it was not, in fact, fine.

"Tell me everything." Remus held out an arm, and Harry only hesitated for a moment before accepting the comfort offered, leaning into the man's embrace.

"I don't remember much, just that it was so vivid." He told Remus about the old muggle man, and Wormtail, and Voldemort. The more Harry spoke, the more Remus looked grave. "And then I woke up, and it was like someone had pressed a hot poker to my scar."

Remus put the back of his hand to Harry's forehead as if checking for fever, then ducked down to press a gentle kiss to the still aching scar. Harry tried not to flinch. No one else had really touched it before, certainly not with such tenderness. “This has never happened before? Dreams like this? Your scar hurting?” Harry shook his head, and Remus’ frown deepened.

“What does it mean?”

“I’ll be honest, Harry; I have no idea.” Remus didn’t look happy about it. “I’ll do some research. You should write to Gorak, at Gringotts — you said he noticed some dark magic around your scar when he scanned you? Perhaps the goblins will know more. For now... make sure to clear your mind and check your shields before you go to sleep at night. And if it happens again, tell us immediately, alright?”

“If what happens again?” It was Snape, striding into the kitchen, his hair still damp from the shower. Remus kept an arm around Harry as he informed the Slytherin what had happened, and Snape’s lips pursed.

“I’ve never heard of this happening before. Then again, no one has survived the killing curse before. I’ll look into it, Potter, and let you know if I find anything.”

“Thank you,” Harry said, reluctantly pulling away from Remus and heading to his usual seat. “Can we just let it go for now? There’s nothing we can do about it, and I feel okay now. I just... I don’t want to dwell on it when I have to leave this afternoon.”

“Alright,” Remus agreed. “But I’m telling Sirius tonight.” Harry nodded; that was fine. He’d want Sirius to know anyway.

Snape would be taking him back to the Dursleys at half past three, ready for the Weasleys to arrive at five. Harry didn’t want anything negative hanging over his last few hours with his family.

.-.-.

Returning to the Dursleys after spending so long at Seren Du was like waking up from an excellent dream to find yourself in a nightmare. Aunt Petunia’s face went the colour of spoiled milk when she opened the door to them, and she glared. “I suppose this is about that letter?” she hissed, beckoning them into the house. Harry was confused for a minute, before he remembered what Ron had said in his letter; the Weasleys had sent something through the muggle post. He felt dread gathering in his gut, and couldn’t stop the laugh that burst out at the sight of the envelope covered in stamps. The letter inside was a fairly polite request for Harry’s company, but the way Petunia stared at it you’d have thought it was full of nothing but insults and curse words.

“They’ll be coming to pick me up at five o’clock,” Harry confirmed. “So I won’t be here long.”

“Perhaps you may want to persuade your husband to take you and your son out for dinner tonight, Petunia,” Snape drawled pointedly. Petunia puffed up instinctually at being told what to do by a wizard, then seemed to realise the sense in his suggestion.

"It'll be hard trying to find a table anywhere decent at such short notice," she sniffed, then turned to Harry. "You'll be gone when we get back?" He nodded.

"Should be, yeah." He couldn't see the Weasleys wanting to stick around long.

"Fine. Just... stay up in your room until then." She seemed to realise she'd given Harry an order, and glanced fearfully at Snape for a second, but held her ground. Harry merely rolled his eyes.

"Don't worry, I have no desire to join you in the living room," he assured dryly. "I'll just leave my stuff here so it's ready when I go, shall I?" Severus resized Harry's trunk and Hedwig's cage, and Harry leant them against the wall in the middle of the hallway. Petunia looked like she was about to have a fit.

Harry looked at Snape. To his utter bewilderment, he actually felt a pang of sadness at having to say goodbye to the abrasive man. He was going to miss him. "Thanks, Professor," he said somewhat awkwardly. "I'll see you at school."

"Do try and make it there in one piece," Snape replied dryly. Harry laughed.

"I'll try my best. Enjoy the rest of your summer." He wondered what it would be like at Seren Du without him. Quieter, probably. Snape would be glad for it.

Snape gave Petunia one last glare, then apparated away. Harry shared a long, tense look with his aunt. "I'll be upstairs. I'll, uh, see you later. Remember, they're coming at five."

As she went to go no doubt complain to her husband about that awful man bringing their equally awful nephew back, Harry trudged up the stairs and turned back to his room. He was a little surprised they hadn't turned it back into Dudley's second bedroom in his absence. He stood in the doorway, surveying the tiny space sadly. Now he knew what it was like to have a real bedroom, where he was allowed to actually decorate and own things and the furniture wasn't all broken hand-me-downs, he could hardly believe the Dursleys had put him in this and he'd been happy with it.

Anything was a step up from the cupboard, he supposed.

He'd brought a book with him to read while he waited, and he smiled slightly when, an hour later, Uncle Vernon yelled up the stairs. "Boy! We're leaving. You'd better not be here when we get home. Don't eat anything out of the fridge." And then they were gone.

Harry moved downstairs, laughing to himself at the absurdity of reading a book about healing charms on the sofa in the living room of his relatives' house. If anyone had been home to see it, he would've been beaten for sure.

As five o'clock drew closer, Harry realised he didn't know how the Weasleys were getting there. They didn't have the car anymore; he and Ron had seen to that in second year. Perhaps Mr Weasley would just apparate in and pick him up, like Snape had done?

Five came and went. Harry glanced up at the clock every few pages, biting his lip worriedly. The Dursleys would probably stay out most of the evening, just in case, but if they didn't... He had written back to Ron, but what if it hadn't made it in time? What if they weren't coming after all?

He thought of the two-way mirror sitting inside his trunk, at the very top. He could call Sirius if no one came. Snape would come get him. Things would be fine.

At half past, he was just starting to get truly anxious, when there was a loud whooshing noise and then several bangs in quick succession. The little electric fireplace rattled. Harry's eyes went wide in a sort of horrified amusement as he realised what must have happened.

"Ouch — Fred, no, go back, there's been a mistake. Tell George not to — ow, George, no, go tell Ron, I—"

"Mr Weasley?" Harry called hesitantly, trying not to laugh.

"Harry? Harry, is that you? What happened? We seem to be stuck!" Mr Weasley shouted back, remarkably cheerful considering his predicament. Harry could hear fists hammering on the boards of the wall.

"The fireplace has been blocked up, you won't be able to get through there!" Harry said, raising his voice to be heard over the racket.

"What on earth would they block up the fireplace for?" Mr Weasley sounded baffled.

"They've got an electric fire!" Harry explained, and heard the man make a noise of excitement.

"Oh, with a plug! How fascinating. Hold on a minute, Harry, I'm trying to... yes, I think I'll have to. Stand back, Harry!"

Harry crossed to stand behind the sofa, and all of a sudden the wall exploded outwards in a barrage of rubble and plaster dust, the electric fireplace slamming into the opposite wall. Harry winced; he really hoped that was fixable. Out of the dust cloud stumbled Mr Weasley, the twins, and Ron.

"Hiya, Harry!" the twins greeted in cheerful unison, then glanced around the room. "Where are the muggles at?"

"They went out for dinner," Harry explained. Mr Weasley made a quietly disappointed sound. The twins, too, looked disappointed, but Harry suspected for an entirely different reason.

"Shame, shame, I would've liked to meet them. Then again," Mr Weasley added, looking around at the destroyed living room, "perhaps it's, ah, for the best they weren't here."

Harry imagined what his uncle might have done in the face of such chaos and blatant magic, and was almost sad Snape had told them to leave.

"So this is a muggle house, is it? Goodness, look at all those ecklectric things! How marvellous!" Mr Weasley seemed to realise he wasn't alone, and smiled abashedly at Harry. "Ready to go, Harry? Where's your trunk?"

"It's in the hall," he said, turning to retrieve his things. When he returned, there was a fire in the grate.

"You boys go first, now. I'll stay back and, ah, clear up the mess," Mr Weasley said with a glance at the gaping hole in the wall. He pulled out a small pouch of floo powder. "Here you are, boys."

Harry let Ron and the twins go first, then stepped into the fire and spoke his destination, squeezing his eyes shut against the whirl of ash that followed. He stumbled out into the kitchen at the Burrow, stomach churning uncomfortably. Before he could properly catch his breath, he was wrapped up in a tight hug. "Harry, dear!" Mrs Weasley fussed. "Welcome back. You're looking a little peaky, have you eaten yet?"

Harry wasn't sure how she could say he was 'peaky' when his skin was the darkest it had been in years, but he didn't question it. "Good to see you too, Mrs Weasley. I've already had lunch, thanks."

"Let him put his things away before you start feeding him, Mum," came a deep, amused voice. Harry glanced over at the kitchen table, where Ron and George were sat with two older redheads Harry had only ever seen pictures of. The two eldest Weasley brothers, Bill and Charlie. "How's it going, Harry?" the one who had just spoken greeted, holding out a burn-scared hand for Harry to shake. Charlie, the dragon tamer, was shorter than Harry expected, with incredibly muscular arms covered in tattoos and a face that was more freckles than lightly tanned skin.

The eldest brother, Bill, rounded the table to shake Harry's hand properly. Harry's throat went a little dry. Bill Weasley was tall and broad-shouldered, with long hair tied back in a ponytail and a fang earring dangling from one ear. He looked so cool. Certainly not what Harry expected from someone who worked for Gringotts. He grinned, blue eyes sparkling. "Nice to finally meet you, Harry. We've heard so much about you, after all." He winked. Harry's stomach filled with butterflies.

"Yeah, uh, hi," he croaked, then coughed. "Nice to meet you, too. I didn't realise you'd both be home."

"It's the Quidditch Cup Final!" Charlie pointed out. "No way we were gonna miss it."

Mr Weasley apparated into the kitchen with a pop, brushing plaster dust off his robes. "All sorted," he assured Harry. "Not a spot out of place."

As if summoned by all the noise, Hermione and Ginny wandered into the kitchen, stopping when they saw the new arrival. "Harry!" Hermione hugged him tightly, looking him over. "Wow! You look great!" Then she blushed. "You know what I mean. You look like you've been eating."

Harry was well aware of how he usually looked in the summers, and chuckled. “Thanks, Hermione.”

“Ron, why don’t you help Harry take his things up to your room,” Mrs Weasley suggested. Fred reached out to grab Harry’s trunk.

“We’ll get it, Mum!” As he turned, something brightly wrapped fell out of his pocket; it looked like a sweet. He went wide-eyed and scrambled for it, but Mrs Weasley summoned it quickly.

“What’s this?” she asked with eyebrows raised pointedly, a knowing look on her face.

“Oh, it’s nothing,” Fred said quickly.

“Just a sweet,” George backed him up quickly, plucking it from his mother’s fingers. “Come on, Harry, let’s go.” He grabbed Harry and practically dragged him from the kitchen, Hedwig’s cage in hand. When they were halfway up the stairs, Harry gave them a curious look.

“What was that all about?”

The twins shook their heads, staying silent until they were in Ron’s room with the door shut. Only then did George hold up the sweet with a smirk. “Shame your muggle cousin wasn’t home, Harry. I’m sure he would’ve loved this,” he said conspiratorially.

“Ton-Tongue Toffee,” Fred explained. “We invented them. Makes your tongue keep growing; we tested one on Ron the other day, his got about four foot long before Mum came in and shrank it.”

Harry snorted, imagining Dudley with an enormous tongue flopping out of his mouth. Oh, he would’ve loved to see that. “That’s genius,” he enthused, and both twins beamed.

“We’ve been inventing loads of stuff over the summer,” George told him.

“We wanted to sell them at Hogwarts, but Mum found the order forms. She’s been fuming ever since.” Fred grimaced, then brightened. “Anyway, how’ve you been, young Harrikins? Everything alright with the muggles?” He looked Harry over in concern. Harry wished he could tell the boys the truth; maybe he’d ask Sirius about it. They could keep secrets with the best of them, and they’d already proven they could be trusted.

“I had a pretty good summer, actually. Been talking to some of my new friends,” he added with a pointed glance. The twins caught on quickly.

“Excellent! Always great having more friends,” Fred said with a wink. “Glad to hear you’re doing alright. Now, we’d better get downstairs and help Mum with dinner, before I go blind from all this orange.” He looked around the room disparagingly, and Harry laughed; Ron’s room was a bit bright, with all its Chudley Cannons regalia. Harry much preferred the Harpies’ colours of green and gold.

When they returned to the kitchen, Mrs Weasley was directing the kids around with the air of a military general. “Oh, good,” she said when she spotted the three of them. “Harry, would you mind helping Ron with the cutlery? Fred, George, the salad is ready to go—oh NOT AGAIN!” She had reached for her wand on the table, only it had turned into a giant rubber mouse with a loud squeak. “BOYS!”

Fred and George shared an alarmed look, grabbed the salad bowl, and sprinted out into the garden. Mrs Weasley huffed, grabbing her real wand and flicking it towards the potatoes, which peeled themselves so violently they bounced off the ceiling. “Honestly, don’t know where we went wrong with those two,” she muttered to herself. “They’ll be brought up in front of the Misuse of Magic Office before they’re twenty.”

Harry grabbed a handful of forks and slowly backed out of the kitchen, not wanting to get involved in that. Clearly the twins had been... busy this summer.

Outside, the two tables they were supposed to be setting were doing battle in mid air thanks to Bill and Charlie, crashing into each other violently overhead. Harry saw Crookshanks dart across the grass, in hot pursuit of a chubby little gnome. Ginny, Ron and the twins were cheering on the table battle, while Hermione looked torn between amusement and anxiety.

“Watch out, Harry!” Bill exclaimed as his table caught Charlie’s with a huge bang and sent one of the legs flying. Harry ducked, coming up laughing. It was almost like being back with Sirius.

There was a clatter overhead, and suddenly Percy’s head was sticking out of an upstairs window, looking quite cross. “Will you keep it down?” he called. “Some of us have work to be doing!”

“Sorry, Perce!” Charlie said, grinning. “Didn’t mean to disrupt the cauldron bottoms!”

Percy scowled at him, slamming the window shut again. The two eldest Weasleys chuckled, but obligingly brought the tables down to settle where they were supposed to, reattaching the leg with a quick spell. Bill waved his wand, conjuring clean white tablecloths. Harry started setting cutlery out, and soon enough the table was set for eleven, and Mrs Weasley was directing several steaming dishes out with her wand.

Harry ended up seated between Hermione and Charlie, who quickly got Harry involved in a lively conversation about quidditch. “You should’ve seen the letter Ollie sent me when you joined the team,” the redhead said, smirking. “I thought he was going to cry with joy. That year between me leaving and you starting was... not a good time for them.” He popped a potato in his mouth. “I think you’re the only reason he started speaking to me again at all, actually. When I graduated without leaving a good replacement behind, he swore I was dead to him.”

Harry could absolutely see Oliver Wood doing such a thing.

“Y’know he’s playing reserve for Puddlemere now?” Charlie continued, and Harry raised an eyebrow.

"He told me he was trying out, I didn't realise he got the spot. That's brilliant!" He made a mental note to send a letter to congratulate him. "Might have to start supporting Puddlemere, now."

Charlie snickered. "I dunno, at least let him make the main team first. Can't have it going to his head too quickly," he said with a wink.

They tuned into the conversation opposite them, where Mrs Weasley seemed to be fixated on Bill's earring. "And your hair's getting silly again," she continued, fussing over the ponytail with a frown. "If you'd just let me give it a trim."

"I like it," Harry blurted. Immediately, he went bright red. "I mean, I think it looks cool."

"Yeah, it's nice. You're so old-fashioned, Mum," Ginny piped up from Bill's other side. Bill looked across at Harry and winked. Harry almost dropped his fork in his lap.

Down at the other end of the table, Ron and the twins were discussing the upcoming quidditch match. Ron started to regale Harry with a blow-by-blow of the previous cup matches, but Harry assured him he'd been listening on his Wireless to keep up with the scores. Ron looked a little put-out, but carried on arguing Bulgaria's chances with George, even when Charlie chimed in to point out how talented Ireland's chasers were. Hermione leaned in towards Harry, ducking her head.

"Have you heard from, y'know?" she asked pointedly. It took him a minute to realise she was talking about Sirius. He stifled a smirk; if only she knew.

"Yeah. He's good, he's found somewhere safe to hide out." Somewhere amazing, somewhere Harry already missed desperately.

Not that it wasn't nice, being back at the Burrow, surrounded by his friends again and excited for the quidditch match. The chaos was very different to mealtimes at Seren Du, where it was mostly quiet conversation unless Sirius was in a particularly mischievous mood and then all of them were having to watch out for any number of bizarre spells on their food or cutlery.

Dinner faded into dessert, which faded into sitting in the garden having companionable conversation until the sun began to set, at which time Mrs Weasley stood up and began to stack dishes. "Oh, look at the time! You had all best go to bed, you've got an early start tomorrow! Harry, dear, I'm headed to Diagon Alley tomorrow to get everyone's school things, if you want to leave your list out tonight. There might not be time after the cup; the match went on for five days last time!"

Harry faltered, rushing to think of a quick excuse. "Oh, I already got my school things, Mrs Weasley," he said. "The Dursleys had a meeting in London a couple of weeks ago and they dropped me off. I didn't know you'd be coming to get me, and I didn't want to run out of time." That sounded reasonable enough. She didn't know the Dursleys well enough to know that they never, in a million years, would have willingly given Harry a ride to London to buy magic supplies. Ron and Hermione shot him odd looks, but luckily didn't say anything.

“Oh,” Mrs Weasley deflated for a second, then continued clearing the table. “Not to worry, then. That’s one less thing to worry about. I’ll have to send your vault key back to Professor Dumbledore.” That was muttered to herself as an afterthought, but Harry stiffened, his hands clenching under the table. Dumbledore still had his vault key? And was just sending it out however he pleased? Harry should have known.

He made a mental note to include a word about that in the letter he planned to write to Gorak and Farlig about his scar, wondering if there was any way to stop people accessing his vaults without permission. Merlin only knew what the headmaster was doing with free access to Harry’s family vaults.

Between the eleven of them they made short work of taking all the dishes back into the kitchen, and Harry was soon curled up on the cot bed in Ron’s room, closing his eyes and trying not to feel strange about no longer being in his own bedroom. It was funny how quickly he’d gotten used to it. For once, he had somewhere that felt more like home than Hogwarts.

Chapter 17

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

What felt like barely fifteen minutes after he'd gone to bed, Harry was awoken by the chime of Ron's alarm clock, and a knock on the door. Mrs Weasley crept inside, smiling when she saw Harry was blinking himself awake. "Time to get up, dear," she whispered, moving to shake Ron, who was sleeping soundly through the alarm. At the foot of Harry's bed, two indistinct shapes were shuffling around. Harry reached for his glasses, seeing the twins sit up with identical groggy stretches, silhouetted in the dark. Even the sun wasn't up yet.

They dressed silently, too sleepy to attempt conversation, and shuffled down the stairs to the kitchen. "Where're the others?" Ron asked through a yawn. Mr Weasley looked up.

"The girls will be down in a minute. The other boys are old enough to apparate, so they get a bit of a lie in." He stood up, holding his arms out with a grin. "What do you think? Do I look like a muggle? We're supposed to go incognito."

He was wearing a golf jumper and a pair of baggy jeans that looked older than Harry was.
"Very good," Harry approved, grinning.

Hermione and Ginny stumbled in, slumping into chairs as Mrs Weasley began to ladle out porridge for everyone. Mr Weasley say back down and shuffled through some pieces of parchment, counting them; their tickets, Harry assumed.

"Eat up, we've got a bit of a walk," Mr Weasley told them, pocketing the tickets. Ginny looked up at him blearily.

"Walk?" she repeated, unimpressed.

"To the portkey," Mr Weasley explained. "With so many people going to the same place, they could only put out a certain number of portkeys. It's why we're up so early, I'm afraid," he added to Harry and Hermione. "Scheduled departure time and all."

"I've done worse for airport runs," Hermione assured him, rubbing at her eyes. His eyes lit up.

"I've always wondered what that was like, flying on an air-plane," he started.

"George!" Mrs Weasley said sharply, making them all jump. It was far too early for sudden loud noises. "What is that in your pockets?"

"Nothing!" The answer came too quickly. Mrs Weasley scowled, and with a quick summoning charm several brightly coloured objects were zooming into her outstretched hand. Harry braced himself for the tirade, seeing Ron do the same across the table. Several more charms had the sweets flying from all sorts of unexpected places, including the turn-ups of Fred's jeans, Mrs Weasley yelling at them all the while.

If Harry had known they were trying to smuggle them out of the house, he would've offered his services!

After a somewhat frosty goodbye from the Weasley matriarch, they were setting off across the grass by the light of the moon. Harry sped up to walk beside Mr Weasley. "So where's this portkey leaving from, then?" He'd never used a portkey before, but Remus had taught him about them over the summer.

"Stoatshead Hill," Mr Weasley replied, pointing to the land mass rising up in front of them. "There's about two hundred portkeys all over Britain for this, and this is our nearest."

Climbing Stoatshead Hill at the best of times was probably quite the ordeal, but in the dark it was a minefield of rabbit holes and unexpected rocks. All of them were breathless and a little sweaty by the time they reached the top, and Harry saw two silhouettes across the hilltop. "Over here, Arthur!"

"Amos!" Mr Weasley greeted brightly, striding towards the pair and shaking the taller one's hand warmly. As they grew closer, Harry made out the other figure as Cedric Diggory, his brown hair windswept and his cheeks flushed. "Kids, this is Amos Diggory, and I believe you know his son."

"Hi Cedric!" Harry said cheerfully, once it became clear the twins were not going to do so. The rest of the Gryffindor quidditch team still held a grudge against the Hufflepuff seeker for the match last year, even though Harry had told them to let it go.

"Hiya, Harry. Hi, everyone," Cedric added with a quick wave. Hermione and Ginny both giggled quietly. It was a common reaction around Cedric Diggory, Harry had noticed. He didn't really blame them; the Hufflepuff was very handsome.

"Long walk, Arthur?" Amos asked companionably. "We had to get up at two! I'll be glad when he's got his apparition license, I swear. I can't side-along to save my life; I'd splinch us both."

"Only a month away, Dad," Cedric offered supportively. Amos chuckled.

"It's alright, lad. It's worth it for this! Blimey, Arthur," he added, looking around at the gathered crowd. "Don't tell me all these are yours?"

"Oh, no, only the redheads," Mr Weasley assured. "Harry and Hermione are Ron's friends. But I've got three more old enough to apparate themselves."

Amos' eyes moved to Harry, and Harry mentally counted down as soon as he saw the man's eyes flick to his forehead. "Merlin's beard! Harry Potter!" His eyes went wide. "Ced's told me all about you, of course! I said to him, I said, Ced, that'll be something to tell your grandchildren! You beat Harry Potter at quidditch!"

Cedric winced, giving Harry an apologetic glance. “I told you, Dad, there were dementors, it wasn’t a fair match.”

“Oh, you Hufflepuffs!” Amos dismissed, clapping his son on the shoulder. “It doesn’t take a genius to see who’s the better flier when one man falls off his broom and the other stays on! Eh, Harry?”

“I mean, if you’d like to try playing quidditch while listening to your mother’s screams as she’s murdered in front of you,” Harry retorted evenly, “by all means, be my guest.”

That took the wind out of Amos’ sails, and there were several long, awkward seconds of silence before Mr Weasley coughed. “Do you know if we’re waiting for any more, Amos? Must be nearly time.”

“No, no, it’s just us,” Amos replied, somewhat stilted.

“We’d best get ready, then. Gather round, everyone.”

The portkey turned out to be an old boot, and it took them a minute to get situated so that all nine of them were stood in a tight circle, each with a hand on the boot. They waited as the sun slowly began to rise, Mr Weasley offering a countdown until—

Harry felt like a hook was jerking him from the navel, and suddenly his feet left the ground, Ron and Hermione slamming into his shoulders on either side as they sped upwards in a swirl of colour and wind. It all ended abruptly, his feet slamming into the earth, and he almost kept his balance until Ron staggered into him, knocking him to the ground.

Cedric offered him a hand up, grinning sheepishly. “Easy there, Harry.” He brushed some dirt off Harry’s arm. “Look, I’m sorry about my dad,” he said under his breath. “I’ve tried talking to him, but he’s just—“

“It’s fine,” Harry insisted. “Really. He’s proud of you, it’s nice.” Cedric gave a half-grimace.

“We still on for that rematch?” he checked. Harry nodded keenly.

“Absolutely. See you later, yeah?” he added once he realised they were parting ways. “Enjoy the match.”

He waved Cedric off, and as soon as they turned away he found himself accosted on either side by a Weasley twin. “You’re getting awfully cosy with Diggory there, Harry,” Fred muttered. It took Harry a second to realise what he was implying, and he blushed bright red.

“We’re friends! He’s a nice guy. He feels really bad about the match still, you should let up on him.”

George eyed him doubtfully. “Hmm. Still. Bill’s better looking.”

Harry spluttered. They had noticed that! He covered his face with his hands, mortified. “Don’t worry about it, Harry!” Fred said, nudging him in the ribs with a grin. “Our big brother's very fanciable." He wiggled his eyebrows salaciously. "Bit old for you, mind, but whatever makes you happy."

"I don't fancy your brother!" he hissed in an aggressive whisper, sure he'd never been redder in his life. He glanced around to check the others weren't listening. "I don't," he repeated insistently. The twins shared a skeptical look.

"Sure," they said in sarcastic unison. Harry glared at them. He didn't even like boys like that!

Okay. That was a bit of a lie.

And Bill was really attractive.

But that didn't mean Harry fancied him! He could think people were hot without fancying them. Besides, he much preferred blondes...

His cheeks burned when he realised what he'd thought. Where had that come from??

Either way, he wasn't interested in Bill Weasley. He was basically family!

"What are you three whispering about back there?" Ron asked suspiciously as Mr Weasley finished paying the muggle campsite manager, heading off into the field.

"None of your business!" the twins retorted cheerfully. Ron scowled at them.

Harry could hardly believe some of the tents they walked past, each more elaborate than the next. Wizards were ridiculous! The tents Mr Weasley had borrowed were much more ordinary-looking, and Harry shared a glance with Hermione when they walked in, wide-eyed at the space inside.

"I love magic," he muttered, and she giggled, nodding in agreement.

He, Ron and Hermione were sent off to find water in short order. Harry wasn't sure why they couldn't just conjure some, but Mr Weasley seemed determined to have as much of the muggle camping experience as possible. It was still pretty early, so there weren't many people up and about, but the more they walked the more the campground began to come to life. Harry could see several familiar faces; it looked like half of Hogwarts had managed to get tickets!

While Ron and Hermione were talking to Seamus and Dean, Harry caught sight of Ernie Macmillan, and waved cheerfully, jogging over to the stocky Hufflepuff. "Hi, Ernie! Good summer?" he asked, as if he hadn't been owling the other boy semi-regularly.

"Oh, y'know, not bad," Ernie replied. "Yourself?"

"It's been great," Harry replied. "Got to learn a bit about my family. Get to know some new friends a little better," he said vaguely. Ernie's smile widened.

"Excellent, excellent. Glad to hear it. I've got to get going, but we'll catch up properly at school, yeah?" Harry nodded, letting the Hufflepuff get on with his morning. He hurried back to Ron and Hermione, who were just finishing up their conversation.

“Who were you talking to, Harry?” Ron asked as they walked, and Harry shrugged.

“Just some people from school. Oh, look, there’s the tap.”

On the way back, Harry was almost bowled over by Oliver Wood, who jumped on his back in greeting and ruffled his hair, dragging him towards his tent to introduce Harry to his parents. “Charlie told me the news, by the way. That’s amazing, Oliver, congratulations!”

Oliver glowed with pride. “Thanks, Harry. You’ll have to come to a match once the season starts back up!”

Just then, a familiar head ducked out of the tent beside Oliver’s family. “Oliver, I swear, are you going on about Puddlemere again?” He looked up and blinked at the sight of Harry. “Potter!”

It was Cassius Warrington, one of Harry’s tentative new allies. “Warrington,” he greeted neutrally, unsure exactly how to interact with the older boy in public, though they’d been writing all summer. He glanced between the two. “Are you two friends or something?” He hadn’t thought they knew each other outside of quidditch rivalry. The pair shared a look, glancing away quickly.

“Nah, just coincidence,” Oliver dismissed. “Randomly assigned campsites, y’know? Anyway, I don’t want to keep you too long. Write to me when you’re back at school, yeah? I want to know what the new keeper ends up like.”

Harry bid the two farewell, still eyeing them bemusedly.

Eventually, they made it back to their campsite, which seemed to have gained a few more members. The eldest three Weasley boys had arrived, and Bill and Charlie seemed to have amassed a crowd of their own.

“You guys took ages!” Fred complained, taking the water from Ron.

“Met a few people,” Ron replied with a wave of his hand. “Dad still not got the fire going?”

“He’s having fun with matches,” George said. They turned to see the man, sat surrounded by spent matches, and Hermione let out a fond sigh.

“I’ll help.” She sat down beside him, gently taking the matchbox.

Harry left her to it, wandering over to Bill and Charlie’s group curiously. He didn’t recognise any of them; presumably they were friends the older Weasleys had at Hogwarts.

“Alright, Harry?” Charlie greeted companionably, beckoning him closer. “We’re having a bit of a reunion. Harry, this is everyone. Everyone, this is Harry Potter.”

“I thought you were taking the piss when you said you knew Harry Potter!” a blond man blurted, slapping a hand over his mouth immediately. Charlie laughed.

"Nah, he's mates with all the younger ones," he replied, gesturing to his scattered siblings.

"Mum's basically adopted him," Bill agreed, clapping Harry on the shoulder. "Don't mind André, Harry. He gets a bit star-struck."

"Wotcher, Harry!" A woman with bright green pixie-cut hair waved at him. "I'm Tonks." That prompted a round of introductions, and Harry only remembered about three names, but they quickly moved on to talking about people and events that Harry didn't know, reminiscing their old Hogwarts days, and Harry discreetly excused himself from the conversation, heading over to where Mr Weasley now had the fire going.

Bill and Charlie's friends didn't stick around much longer, all having other places to be, and the two eldest Weasley boys rejoined the family in time for lunch, while Mr Weasley kept up a running commentary of people he knew walking by. Percy emerged from the tent at the smell of food, muttering about how much work he still had to do.

They were joined by Ludo Bagman, and later Barty Crouch, and Harry hadn't realised just how many people at the Ministry Mr Weasley was friends with. Harry tried to stay out of the conversations the best he could, listening in interest but trying not to draw attention to himself; after spending the summer thus far with only three people, all of whom couldn't give two shits about his scar or celebrity status, it was exhausting having to go through the Famous Harry Potter fuss with every other person who stopped by.

Several hints were dropped about what was happening at Hogwarts this year — mostly by Percy Weasley, who seemed all too smug to know something his younger siblings didn't. Harry merely hid his smile, pretending to be just as oblivious as his friends. They'd find out soon enough.

At last, it was time to head to the match. Harry was surprised to hear they were up in the top box, making him wonder exactly what kind of favours Mr Weasley had called in — and how many times he might've dropped that he was planning on bringing Harry Potter with him. It made something uneasy settle in his stomach; sure, he was glad to be going to the cup, and glad that all the Weasleys got to go too, but the idea that someone he trusted was using his name to curry favours without his consent made him feel a little bit sick.

Harry put the thought out of his mind, determined not to let anything put a damper on his enjoyment of the day. Even Ron's whining about not having enough money to afford souvenirs. He was at the final of the Quidditch World Cup, and nothing would bring him down. He wouldn't let it.

.-.-.-

The match was incredible.

Things got off to a bit of a rocky start in the top box, when Minister Fudge arrived and immediately started showing Harry off to the Bulgarian Minister like some sort of national landmark. Harry's name had definitely been involved in getting ten top box tickets. Then the Malfoys arrived, and Ron immediately started making disparaging remarks about Draco. Harry, who had brightened up slightly at the sight of the blond, merely had to settle for making pointed eye contact with both him and Narcissa, and glaring at Lucius Malfoy when he mocked Mr Weasley quietly.

However, Bagman arrived and quickly kicked things off, and from there it was fantastic. Harry didn't get all starry-eyed over the veela unlike most of the other boys — he noted Draco didn't either, staying in his seat with a look of mild entertainment. Ron would've dived off the edge of the box if Hermione hadn't yanked him back to his seat by his collar.

The entire stadium could've been filled with veela and Harry wouldn't have noticed once the match began. He kept the Omnioculars pressed to his face for most of the match, watching eagerly as the players zoomed around the pitch and passed at frightening speeds. The Irish chasers really were a force to be reckoned with, but it was Viktor Krum Harry couldn't keep his eyes off. The man's flying was incredible.

Both seekers looked a right mess when they made it up to the top box for the award ceremony. Harry watched the players in awe, wondering exactly how one went about becoming a professional quidditch player.

That would be a pretty cool career...

The entire campground was a riot of celebrations when they headed back to their tents; even the tents decorated in Bulgarian red and black seemed to have decided to join in the fun and celebrate a snitch well caught. The Weasley family celebration was a little more subdued, but Charlie still pulled a crate of butterbeer from somewhere — and a bottle of firewhiskey for the adults. The twins tried to sneak some, but Bill was used to his brothers' tricks, and hexed them so all their fingers were stuck together at the tips.

It was only when Ginny fell asleep at the table and knocked over her hot chocolate that Mr Weasley declared it bedtime, sending the girls off to their tent. Harry wondered how all his other schoolmates were celebrating; was there a big group of Hogwarts students out there somewhere, cheering and singing under the firework-strewn sky? He was surprised the older Weasley boys weren't off celebrating with their friends, but he supposed they didn't see their younger siblings all that often. Harry was glad for the extra company; Bill and Charlie were a lot like the twins, and it was great fun having them around.

Harry crawled into his bed with a yawn— only to bolt upright seconds later when an earsplitting scream echoed from outside the tent. That was not a scream of joy.

He and Ron rushed into the living room, where all the other boys were stood looking alarmed. "What was that?" Percy asked cautiously. Several more screams rang out, and it sounded like huge groups of people were running. Mr Weasley hurried back into the tent, face pale in the dim light.

"Death Eaters," he declared grimly, and the eldest three Weasleys cursed. Harry felt sick.

"Are you sure?" Bill asked urgently, already grabbing his wand. Charlie and Percy were doing the same.

"Positive. Kids, hurry — grab your jackets and get outside, now. I'm going to get the girls." Mr Weasley left again, and Harry ran to grab a jacket and his boots, double checking his wand was safe in its holster. He, Ron and the twins ran outside the tent, skidding to a halt when they saw the chaos outside. People were fleeing from a group of people in robes and masks, spells flashing and drunken jeering echoing behind the screams. Above the masked group was... oh God. The muggle who ran the campground, and his family. The masked wizards were levitating them high in the air, flipping the woman over and laughing when her nightdress rode up.

Hermione and Ginny emerged from their tents, horror immediately setting in on their faces. A second later, the three eldest Weasley boys stepped out, fully dressed and wands out, their sleeves rolled up. "We're going to help the Ministry," Mr Weasley shouted over the noise. "You lot get into the woods, and stick together! I'll come fetch you when it's safe. Fred, George, look after your sister," he added, getting two grave nods before he was off following his eldest sons towards the chaos.

Fred grabbed Ginny by the hand, tugging her towards the woods. Together they all sprinted for safety, falling in with the crowds of fleeing people.

The rest of the night was a blur.

They lost track of Ginny and the twins within minutes, but Harry knew the twins would keep the youngest Weasley safe. He and Hermione went to light the way, at which point Ron realised he'd lost his wand. "I have to go back and look for it!" he insisted. "Mum and Dad'll kill me if they have to get me another one." He started walking against the flow of traffic, and Hermione looked at Harry with a mix of fear and exasperation.

"Ronald!" she called, hurrying after him. Harry made to follow, but a flash of blond caught his eye.

"Malfoy," he called, aware he was in public. Draco, who was leaning against a tree and watching things through a gap in the woods, turned with raised eyebrows.

"Potter. Don't tell me you're out alone in this?" There was a hint of concern in his voice. Harry edged closer, keeping an eye out for his friends.

"Ron and Hermione are back there. Ron lost his wand."

"Idiot," Draco muttered, shaking his head.

"Are you alright?" Harry met his gaze, looking past his unaffected facade to the worry deep in his grey eyes. "Where's your mother?"

Draco's lip quivered. "Father insisted she stay by his side." His words were stiff, and comprehension dawned on Harry. He stared at him in horror.

"She's not— they're not—" Draco nodded. His parents were out there in masks, hurting the muggles and causing chaos. Hailing Voldemort.

"He wouldn't take no for an answer. The only reason he let me go is that I'm underage."

Uncaring that anyone could walk by them, Harry reached out and grabbed Draco's hand, squeezing tight. "She'll be okay," he said, wishing he could promise that. Draco looked down at their interlocked fingers, then back up at Harry. "She's been through this before. She knows how to blend in with a group like that. She'll be fine."

Slowly, Draco nodded.

There was the crack of a twig snapping, and a muffled cry that could only be Ron. Harry let go of Draco's hand quickly, stepping back. "You alright there, Ron?" he called out.

"There you are, Harry! Yeah, fine, just tripped on a root. No sign of my wand."

"With feet that big, I'm not surprised," Draco drawled, his Ice Prince mask firmly back in place. It made something in Harry's chest twist painfully.

"Malfoy," Ron growled. "What are you doing here?"

Harry tried to stop the exchange descending into a brawl, taking Draco's veiled warning and ushering Hermione deeper into the woods, urging Ron to leave Draco alone. "You don't even have your wand, you can't hex him," he pointed out.

"Yeah, but you could," Ron retorted. "Merlin, Mum's gonna be furious if I can't find it."

"I'm sure it's back in the tent," Hermione said, though she sounded doubtful.

They kept walking, keeping an eye out for the twins and Ginny, and almost lost Ron to three veela in the woods. When they reached a small clearing, Harry suggested they stop and wait.

That was where everything went wrong.

Soon, he found himself staring up in horror at the enormous skull and snake hovering in the sky; the Dark Mark, in all its glory. They barely managed to make it a few steps away before they were surrounded by Ministry wizards, ducking a barrage of stunning spells. Harry instinctively had his wand in his hand when he got to his feet, though there was no need; Mr Weasley was running through the crowd, yelling for the wizards to leave them alone.

What followed was the most disastrous attempt at an investigation Harry had had the misfortune to witness; in the back of his mind was a voice that sounded awfully like Snape, calling everyone dunderheads and imbeciles as the wizards proceeded to accuse three teenagers — one of whom was Harry Potter — of conjuring Voldemort's sigil, followed by Mr Crouch's house elf. Harry's heart broke for the poor elf he'd seen in the top box earlier, watching her sob as her master dismissed her. Sirius had taught him about house elves when he'd asked about Ceri; they needed to be bonded to houses, or their magic would start to go wonky and make them sick. They'd die if they stayed free for too long. Harry wished he'd known that when he'd freed Dobby. Then again, he doubted whatever happened to a free elf could be any worse than working for Lucius Malfoy.

Ron's wand being used to cast the Mark didn't do them any favours, but they eventually got it all sorted out and made it back to their tents, where luckily the rest of the Weasley family were waiting mostly unharmed. Bill had a cut across his cheek and Percy's right sleeve was a little charred, but other than that they were fine. Ginny was chalk-white, tucked into Charlie's side.

They gathered in the bigger tent, no one willing to tell the girls to go back to bed after that ordeal. The trio ended up sharing what had happened to them, and Ron asked about the Dark Mark, not understanding why it was such a big deal. Harry stayed silent through Mr Weasley's explanation, but forgot to pretend to be unaware of such things — all the things Snape and Remus had taught him over the summer, about the first rise of Voldemort and why it was such a bad sign that Snape's Dark Mark was hurting again. Mr Weasley shot Harry an odd look when he didn't react to Bill's remark that the crowd was obviously Death Eaters who had lied to keep themselves out of Azkaban. Harry covered it with a yawn, hoping the man would just believe he was zoning out due to exhaustion. It had been one hell of a day.

They were all sent to bed shortly after, though Harry lay awake for a long while, listening to Charlie's soft snores. He wished there were a little more privacy in the tent; he had the two way mirror in his bag, and he was desperate to talk to Sirius and tell him what happened. He'd no doubt find out from the Prophet in the morning. If Snape didn't know already. Had he been part of the group? To keep his cover?

Harry's nerves tied knots in his guts as he squeezed his eyes shut, imagining Remus staying up late worried about his partner, Sirius pacing the living room and demanding to go check Harry was okay. He'd call them in the morning, as soon as he could get some time to himself.

.-.-.-.

They'd only had a few hours sleep when Mr Weasley woke them all up, and soon they were packed and trudging back to the crowded portkey departure point.

Mrs Weasley was waiting anxiously when they returned, rushing forward to meet them at the garden gate. She threw herself into her husband's arms, before hugging each of her children in turn, then Harry and Hermione. "Oh, thank goodness! I was so worried! The paper said there were bodies, oh, you're alive!" She doubled back to hug the twins, sobbing about having yelled at them before they left.

Breakfast was a somber affair, Mr Weasley and Percy barely staying long enough to wolf down some toast before they headed into the Ministry to start dealing with the aftermath. Harry didn't know who Rita Skeeter was, but he already didn't like her; that article was causing more fear and worry than the Death Eaters themselves!

He got his chance to slip away when the other Weasleys decided to start up a game of quidditch in the garden. Promising to be out in a minute, he hurried up to Ron's room and dug through his backpack for the two-way mirror. "Sirius Black," he said quickly — it was barely a second before Sirius' worried face filled the glass. He'd obviously been waiting for the call.

"Harry! Are you alright? Remus, it's Harry!" There was a beat, and Remus' face squeezed in beside Sirius', Sirius having to hold the mirror a little further out so they could both see.

"I'm fine, everything's fine," Harry assured hurriedly.

"What happened? The Prophet article was full of so much bullshit it's hard to tell what the truth is," Sirius said, ignoring the scolding look Remus gave him for swearing.

Harry gave the pair a quick summary of the night's events, including the events with Crouch's elf and the Dark Mark.

"Barty Crouch has always been a heartless bastard," Sirius growled, his eyes dark. "You're sure you're alright?"

"Completely, I promise," Harry insisted. He wished he could reach through the mirror and hug his godfather; he'd gotten far too used to the easy affection over the summer. "Sirius, you have to send a letter to Mrs Malfoy. I— Lucius was part of the group, and Draco said he made her be part of it too."

Sirius and Remus shared a grim look.

"I'll ask Severus to check in on her," Remus promised. "He's away at the moment, doing some damage control."

"He wasn't there last night, was he?" Harry asked, relieved when Remus shook his head.

"No, he was home. Had no idea about it all until it was too late. Obviously they were only involving people who were already at the cup."

"Who could have cast the Dark Mark?"

Both adults shrugged, and Sirius ran a hand through his hair. "It could've been any number of people. We'll look into things, but don't dwell on it too much, alright pup? Enjoy the rest of your summer, leave this to the adults." He let out a long sigh. "Merlin, I'm so glad you're safe."

"I miss you," Harry confessed in a whisper. "All of you." Even Snape, to his surprise.

"We miss you too, cub," Remus replied. "It's been far too quiet without you around. Except for the fireworks Sirius let off in the entrance hall," he added with a reprimanding look. Sirius grinned, giving an over-exaggerated innocent face.

Harry knew they were just trying to cheer him up, but he couldn't help but laugh all the same. "I should go, the others will be wondering what's taking me so long." He'd told them he was going to the bathroom. They probably thought he'd fallen in.

"Let us know if anything else happens. Keep in touch, and have a good week. We love you, pup." Sirius kissed his fingers, pressing them to the mirror's surface. Harry's heart clenched.

He reluctantly ended the call, taking a minute to compose himself before tucking the mirror back in his bag and heading out to the garden with his broom in hand, plastering a smile on his face when he saw the Weasley siblings already airborne, Hermione reading a book on the grass below. “There you are, mate! We’ve been waiting for you!” Ron called, waving him over. Harry kicked off into the sky, trying to leave his worries on the ground. There was nothing he could do about it all now.

.-.-.-

Severus returned home just in time for dinner, and the first thing Remus said was that they’d heard from Potter. “He’s fine, they’re all fine,” he assured. Severus felt the dread inside him build with every word as Remus relayed what had happened in the woods.

“Narcissa is well,” he informed his partner and Black when Remus mentioned Harry’s worries. He’d been to see her and Draco earlier, while Lucius was at the Ministry. “Shaken, but well. She was indeed part of the group involved in the muggle-baiting. She believes the whole thing was Lucius’ idea — or at least, he was involved in the planning. She said he didn’t tell her a thing beforehand, but he knew exactly where to go when it started.” It was exactly the sort of thing Lucius Malfoy would do, wanting to cause chaos and horror at such a public event. If he and the other loyal Death Eaters were getting the same signs he was, they would of course get braver and bolder in their hateful acts. If they believed the Dark Lord was on his way to returning, they would want to drum up as much fear as possible before that day arrived. “This is only the beginning, you realise.”

The two Gryffindors looked grim, hardly touching their dinner. “Snape,” Black said eventually. “I know we have a difficult history.” Severus snorted; that was the biggest understatement he’d heard in a while. “And I know we still have our differences, despite the things that bring us together.” Here he glanced at Remus, who bumped his knee against Severus’ under the table. “But please, for Remus if not for me, please look after Harry when he’s back at school. He can’t defend himself properly, not with Dumbledore lurking over his shoulder. If anything were to happen to him...” He didn’t need to finish; it would devastate both men if something were to befall Potter. “Just, please. He needs all the allies he can get. I can’t be there for him, but you can.”

Severus pursed his lips. Were they really going to make him say it? “I’ll admit, I have come to... tolerate the boy,” he said, as if the very confession pained him. Out of the corner of his eye he saw Remus try to hide a fond smile. Damnable wolf. “This summer has made me realise he’s not as arrogant as I initially believed. When he’s not being antagonised, he’s... not terrible.” There, that was as good as they were getting. Truthfully, Severus actually quite liked the Potter boy now; he was unexpectedly witty, and his Slytherin tendencies showed through in interesting — and sometimes amusing — ways. He now saw what Remus said when he said Potter — Harry — was so much like Lily. Sometimes his words, those green eyes staring back at him... it was like having her back.

“I’ll watch over him, as faithfully as you would,” he vowed to the pair of Gryffindors. Not only because he knew his life would not be worth living should Remus hear he’d let something happen to the boy on his watch. He didn’t want any harm to come to Harry either.

"I will still need to keep up appearances, but his safety is my priority." He'd risked his life for the boy before, back when he hated him. He could certainly do it now Harry was tolerable.

"Thank you," Black breathed, his eyes grateful. "Snape... Severus. Thank you."

It was strange, hearing his given name come from the Gryffindor's lips without a hint of mockery or derision. At the beginning of the summer they'd agreed to be cordial, for Remus' sake, but the more time they spent together the more Severus was realising that Black wasn't the bullheaded little brat he had been when they were teenagers. Harry wasn't the only one who had become tolerable.

"We are on the same side, Sirius," he said, the name feeling odd on his tongue. "If war is to come, then there is no place for childhood grudges here."

Sirius nodded to him across the table, the understand passing between them. Beside him, Remus beamed with pride.

"I knew you two would warm up to each other eventually," he said fondly. Severus scoffed.

They weren't friends, by any stretch of the imagination. But maybe between Remus and Harry and the oncoming darkness, they could be something like it.

Chapter End Notes

Also, for those of you asking if the chapter count is accurate - yes, there are indeed 109 chapters in this bad boy. Buckle up, friends.

Chapter 18

Despite the hectic start, the rest of Harry's time at the Burrow was much the same as it always was. Mr Weasley and Percy were barely present for the week that followed the World Cup, drowning in work and howlers and more scathing articles from Rita Skeeter. Harry felt bad for them; even Percy didn't deserve that.

Having the two eldest Weasley boys around was a nice change in the dynamic, too. They weren't always home, taking the opportunity to visit British friends they hadn't seen in a while, but when they were around they were usually fairly game for whatever shenanigans the teenagers had planned. Harry made sure to spend plenty of time talking to them, remembering what Hannah had said the year before about the two likely being the next heirs to the Weasley and Prewett seats. He never quite managed to bring up the subject with them, but he got to know them well enough to tell they were probably trustworthy.

The one thing Harry couldn't quite get used to was not using his wand. He'd gotten so used to being able to cast spells without hesitation at Seren Du, he kept finding himself with his wand in his hand before he could catch the habit. It earned him some odd looks from Ron and Hermione, but Harry suspected they just thought he was jumpy after the Cup.

Whatever time Ron and Hermione had spent together before Harry had arrived at the Burrow, they'd clearly used it to talk through the last of the issues they'd had from the previous year, when Ron had accused Hermione's cat of eating Scabbers and been awful to her for half the school year. Then again, finding out that rat was actually a Death Eater in disguise had probably gone a long way to easing that argument. Things were almost back to normal between the trio — except Harry was still keeping secrets, and Ron and Hermione didn't seem to realise that he'd grown up some in the last year while they'd been busy arguing. Ron didn't like it when Harry shot down all his disparaging remarks about Slytherins, and Hermione had nearly exploded when Harry had refused her offer to help him finish his summer homework.

"I got it all done at the Dursleys'," he insisted. "Thanks, but you guys go ahead." The offer had only come when Ron had realised he still had a stack of essays to complete, and Hermione had pestered him into getting them done before they were on the train to school.

"I can go over them for you, then," Hermione replied dismissively. Harry bristled at the insinuation that his work wasn't good enough.

"I don't need you to go over them for me, Hermione, but thank you." He tried to stay polite. Even if she didn't know he'd already had Remus go over his summer homework, who was she to just assume his work would need checking and correcting?

"Don't be silly, Harry, I really don't mind. You'll be better off for it."

"I'm happy with my work how it is," Harry replied between clenched teeth. "I'm going to go find the twins." He slipped out of the room before she could argue with him further, rolling his eyes when Ron complained about having to study when Harry wasn't.

Last year, Hermione had been too busy with her overloaded timetable and Buckbeak's appeal to care much about Harry's grades. If she was going to spend the whole next year insisting he needed her help, ignoring the fact that he was clearly capable by himself, they were going to have issues.

.-. .

One afternoon, a couple of days before they were due to go back to school, they were all out in the garden, enjoying the last dregs of the summer sunshine. Hermione and Ginny were stretched out on a blanket by the pond, talking quietly and giggling every now and then; the two girls were thick as thieves this summer, and Harry sort-of wondered what they talked about all the time. From some of the looks they sent him before bursting into giggles, he probably didn't want to know.

Harry and the other boys were, as they often were, high in the air on their brooms. Bill had brought an old quaffle home with him, and they were tossing it between them, thinking up increasingly ridiculous forfeits for anyone who dropped it. Harry was currently having to sit sidesaddle on his broom, which made it even harder to catch future passes. He was doing alright, though; Charlie was working with one hand spelled behind his back, and it was not doing him any favours.

"This is ridiculous," the dragon tamer complained when the quaffle dropped to the ground below him. "I was never a chaser for a reason!" He swooped down to grab it, zooming back to the same level as the rest of them. "They're putting us seekers through our paces, eh?" he added to Harry with a grin. "If we had a snitch, we could show them."

Harry remembered the little wooden box tucked away in his trunk. "I've got a practice snitch," he volunteered. Charlie stared at him.

"And you're just mentioning this now? Poor show, Potter!" He shook his head exasperatedly. Then he grinned, eyes flashing in challenge. "Fancy a seeker's match?"

Harry, who — other than the one glorious day when Draco visited — had been chasing the snitch all summer without any real competition for it, smirked. "You're on." He landed and raced up to Ron's bedroom, squeezing through the extra beds and piles of clothing to get to his trunk, digging through until he found the box containing his practice snitch. When he got back out into the garden, all the boys had landed, and even Ginny and Hermione had abandoned their blanket, interested in the proceedings.

Bill held a hand out, and Harry passed him the box. "Alright, seekers," he announced, taking the whole thing incredibly seriously, though there was a curve to his lips he couldn't quite hide. "Here's the rules. Snitch gets a ten second head start, with your eyes closed. If it goes over the property line, we'll have to summon it back; don't want the muggles seeing anything they shouldn't. And I want a good, clean match, alright?" He was channelling Madam Hooch, and it made both seekers snicker.

Harry and Charlie shook hands, then mounted their brooms but kept their feet on the ground. Bill flicked the lid of the box open, and Harry's eyes were on the little golden ball as it unfurled its wings and shot off into the air. Bill cleared his throat, and Harry squeezed his eyes shut. The other Weasley siblings started up a loud countdown, and even Hermione got involved halfway through. “Three... two... one... GO!”

Both seekers were off like a rocket, Harry much faster than Charlie. The older seeker was on one of the newer model Cleansweeps; an excellent broom, but no match for the Firebolt. He did a wide loop around the back yard, keeping his eyes peeled for a flash of gold.

Unable to help himself, Harry threw in a few of the tricks and rolls he’d been working on over the summer, earning whoops and cheers from their small audience. Charlie laughed as he tailed Harry through a particularly sharp Wollongong Shimmy. “You’ll have to try better than that to lose me, Potter!”

Grinning at the challenge, Harry shot up high, and Charlie followed. All of a sudden, Harry caught a glimpse of the snitch down below, and his smirk widened. Time to really show off a bit. Turning the nose of his broom to the ground, he dived full speed downwards, Charlie following him with a shouted curse. Harry kept going, picking up speed, growing closer and closer to the grass. The rest of the world faded away, his focus narrowed entirely to his broom and the snitch hovering above the ground. He was vaguely aware when Charlie pulled out of the dive, not willing to risk his neck, but Harry waited until the last second, veering off course and reaching out as his toes skimmed the grass, grabbing the snitch on his way past.

Slowing to a halt, he held the gold ball up to a gobsmacked Charlie, winking. “Found it,” he said. The redhead gaped.

“You certainly did, didn’t you,” he agreed faintly, drifting closer. “Blimey, Harry. I think Oliver might’ve actually been underplaying you a bit in his letters. That was some serious flying!” He ruffled Harry’s hair, and Harry grinned at him. They returned to the ground, where the audience was cheering, and he even saw money exchange hands between Fred and Ron, the latter looking put-out.

“You bet against me?” Harry asked in mock-offence, watching Ron’s ears redden.

“Well, no offence mate, but Charlie was really good, and—“ He stuttered out some half-hearted excuses, and Harry laughed.

“You could’ve just said you were showing family solidarity.” He was still a little breathless, exhilarated from the tense flying. He turned back to the dragon tamer. “Want to go again? Swap brooms this time?” He wanted to make sure he wasn’t relying too much on his fancy broom to get ahead. Charlie’s eyes lit up.

“You’ll let me ride your Firebolt?” he gasped. Harry nodded. “You’re on! Best three out of five?”

“What do I get for winning?” Harry asked cheekily, making Charlie bark out a laugh.

“Cocky little sod. If you win, I’ll owe you a favour. To be called in at any time you like, no questions asked, even if it’s to hex one of my siblings. Also I’ll let you take the rest of that bottle of firewhisky to school,” he added as an afterthought. “If I win, you’ll owe me a favour, no questions asked. And I get to use your Firebolt as much as I like before you go back to school.”

Harry would’ve let Charlie borrow his Firebolt anyway, so he agreed to the terms. Though he did wonder what kind of favour the dragon tamer might ask of him. He didn’t plan on losing, so it was a moot point.

“So we’re at one to Harry. Firebolt trades hands every round, and if it looks like whoever’s riding it is winning because of that, Harry can take my broom,” Bill declared, still in referee-mode. “Ready?”

They traded brooms, and the match began anew. Charlie was having a whale of a time on the Firebolt, zooming around and whooping in joy. Harry kept up with him fairly well on the Cleansweep, getting used to its speed and turning radius. Within the first few minutes, he had eyes on the snitch, and was off. Charlie was hot on his tail, overtaking him quickly, but Harry pulled out a tricky little manoeuvre that had him pulling in front again, hand closing around the snitch. They slowed to a halt, and Charlie stared at him. “Aw, fuck,” he muttered. Harry snorted.

But it wasn’t over that easily. Charlie won the third round, the snitch drifting by him while he and Harry were at opposite ends of the garden. The fourth round was extremely close, but Harry managed to just edge out in front.

“And that’s 3-1 to Mr Harry Potter!” Bill announced over the cheering of their spectators. Charlie cursed, but he was smiling as he landed.

“Bloody hell, Harry. That’s seriously impressive.” They shook hands.

“You made it hard for me, though!” Harry insisted. “Considering you’ve not played a proper match since you graduated, wow.”

Charlie chuckled. “You flatter me, but thank you. I suppose I’ll just wait for you to call in your favour then, hmm?”

Harry had no idea what he might need the Weasley brother for, but it was always good to have options to call on. He put the snitch carefully back in its box, taking his Firebolt back from Charlie.

They were called in for dinner shortly after, and Harry left his broom in the hallway with the others, heading for the delicious scent of food coming from the kitchen.

“Oh, I hope they’re home soon,” Mrs Weasley fretted, looking from the two empty spots at the table to the clock in the corner that declared them to be at work. “Arthur hasn’t had to work this much since the war.”

All the kids shared uneasy glances. “I’m sure they’ll be home in a bit, Mum,” Bill soothed. “Probably just got held up chatting, you know what Dad’s like.”

Luckily at that minute, the hands moved from ‘work’ to ‘travelling’, and a pair of quiet pops heralded the arrival of the last two members of the family. Mr Weasley looked worn-out, greeting his wife with a kiss on the cheek and sinking wearily into his chair. “Merlin, what a week,” he sighed, shaking his head. “I’ll be glad when this all blows over. It would’ve done ages ago if Skeeter didn’t keep pushing those awful articles.”

“At least it’s getting people to take the search for Bertha Jorkins seriously,” Percy pointed out. “Mr Crouch has been saying for weeks that someone needed to look for her.” Behind his back, the twins fluttered their eyelashes and mock-swooned, mouthing ‘Mr Crouch’ over-dramatically. Harry sniggered into his stew.

“Crouch is very lucky Rita hasn’t found out about Winky,” Mr Weasley retorted irritably. “And is probably just hoping it stays that way.”

That set Hermione off about house elves, and Harry winced. He appreciated the sentiment, but she really needed to learn to research something properly before forming an opinion and mouthing off to anyone who would listen.

“Why don’t you all go up and finish packing,” Mrs Weasley cut in before Hermione could really get on her soapbox. “I put all your new school things in your rooms. Hermione, dear, I got that book you asked for. And I finished the laundry.”

“Thanks, Mrs Weasley,” Hermione said automatically, diverted from her tirade. For now.

Everyone of Hogwarts age trudged upstairs, and Harry heard rain thundering against the windows. “Sounds like we finished flying just in time,” he mused, heading up to Ron’s room. All the twins’ things were still in their room, which was housing Bill and Charlie for now. Except, of course, the bag full of Weasley’s Wizards Wheezes stashed in Harry’s trunk, just in case Mrs Weasley decided to do one last search.

Harry hadn’t really unpacked since arriving, so repacking his things didn’t take long once he’d ducked downstairs to go get his broom, trying not to eavesdrop on the conversation the adults were having in the kitchen. Sirius had told him to stay out of it and let the adults handle things, and he was going to try his best to follow that.

When he returned to Ron’s room, the redheaded boy was holding up what looked like a long maroon velvet dress, with mouldy-looking lace at the cuffs and collar. His face was a clear mask of disgust. “What the hell is this?”

Harry had a strong sense of foreboding as the answer popped into his mind. They all had dress robes on their school requirement list this year; Snape had said there was always some sort of formal event involved in the Triwizard Tournament. Harry had, with Remus’ help, chosen a set of dark green robes with gold accents. He actually thought he looked quite dashing in them.

Surely Mrs Weasley wasn’t expecting Ron to wear that?

The woman in question knocked on the door, entering with a pile of freshly laundered school robes draped over her arm. “Here you are, Ron, dear. Harry, are you absolutely sure you don’t want me to do yours as well? I can get them done tonight.”

“It’s fine, thanks, Mrs Weasley,” Harry assured. Ceri had taken care of all his clothes before he’d left, including his robes and his new cloak.

“Mum, you’ve given me Ginny’s new dress,” Ron said, holding out the offending garment.

Mrs Weasley confirmed that they were indeed Ron’s dress robes, and Harry was torn between laughter and sympathy at the look on the redhead’s face. “I had to get them second-hand, there wasn’t a lot of choice,” she snapped, flushing.

“I’m not wearing them!” Ron insisted hotly. “I’d rather go starkers.”

“Fine. Harry, make sure you get a picture; I could do with a good laugh.” Mrs Weasley stormed out of the room, slamming the door behind her. Ron threw the dress robes at his open trunk, making an angry noise.

Harry left him to sulk, slipping out of the room and heading downstairs to see what the twins were up to. “What’s going on upstairs, then?” Fred asked as Harry shut the door behind him. Harry grimaced.

“Ron just found his new dress robes. They’re... not pretty.” He glanced over at the wardrobe, where two sets of dress robes that had to belong to the twins were hanging, ready to be packed. They were clearly second-hand, but still nicer than Ron’s. Both in similar shades of dark purple, one with silver embroidery around the cuffs and hem, the other with bronze piping around the edge. Not a scrap of lace in sight.

“Poor Ronnikins,” George mock-sighed, shaking his head. “So hard done by. He should’ve sucked up his pride and agreed to borrow Bill’s old dress robes, like Mum offered before you got here. He said they were too girly.”

“They had a little bit of pink on them,” Fred elaborated, rolling his eyes. “Pretty snazzy otherwise, if you ask me. I’d have worn them if Bill wasn’t so bloody tall.”

Harry snickered; maybe Mrs Weasley had bought the frilly robes on purpose, after all.

.-.-.-.

It was pouring down with rain the morning they had to catch the Hogwarts Express. As they waited in the hallway for the taxis Mrs Weasley had arranged, Harry glanced at the fleet of enormous Hogwarts trunks stacked by the door. “Mrs Weasley,” he piped up tentatively. “Should we maybe use shrinking charms on the trunks? Muggle taxis might not have enough space for all this.” It would be bad enough travelling with Pig and Crookshanks — Hedwig was off delivering a letter to Gorvak, under the guise of Harry writing to Sirius. Mrs Weasley, already flustered from her husband’s unexpected disappearance to deal with Mad-Eye Moody, looked up with a worried expression on her face.

“Harry’s probably right,” Bill agreed, pulling his wand from his jacket pocket. In short order, he and Charlie had the trunks shrunk, and they ended up in Mrs Weasley’s enormous handbag.

As Harry suspected, the three taxi drivers seemed utterly bewildered at the owl in the cage; Pig wasn't helping, making quite the racket as he was wedged into the back seat on Ron's lap. Crookshanks wasn't thrilled either, and by the time they all reached King's Cross, Harry, Ron and Hermione were covered in scratches.

"I'm really sorry," Hermione said for the hundredth time as they stepped through the barrier onto platform 9 & 3/4, her cat tucked securely under her arm. They stepped to the side, and Charlie started resizing everybody's trunks.

After they'd found a compartment and stowed their luggage away, they all returned to the platform to say goodbye to Mrs Weasley, Bill and Charlie. "Keep in touch," Bill urged with a grin, pulling Ron into a hug once he was done with the twins. "You lot are in for one hell of a year, I want to hear about all of it. You too, Harry," he added, hugging the dark-haired teen tightly.

"I might see you all sooner than you think," Charlie confessed, releasing Ginny with a kiss on the forehead.

"Why's that?" Fred asked quickly. Charlie tapped his nose conspiratorially, winking.

"Secret," he insisted. "Don't tell Percy I mentioned it. It's 'classified information until the Ministry sees fit to release it,'" he droned with a roll of his eyes. Harry's gaze narrowed thoughtfully; did that mean Charlie was involved in the Tournament somehow?

The two eldest Weasley boys delighted in taunting their siblings with veiled references to the secret surprise right up until the whistle blew, and they had to hurry to catch the train. Harry spotted Neville wandering with his trunk as they headed for their compartment. "Oi, Neville!" he called, waving an arm. The round-faced boy looked up. "Wanna sit with us?"

Neville grinned, nodding, and the four of them took their seats, shoving Neville's trunk into the luggage rack with their own and shutting the compartment door. "Why wouldn't they just tell us what's going on this year?" Ron groused. "We wouldn't tell anyone."

"From the sounds of things, we'll find out tonight anyway," Harry placated, as if he didn't already know the secret. "How was your summer, Neville?" He acted as if he hadn't been writing to the other boy regularly, and Neville grinned at him.

"It was great! Gran let me put a whole section for aquatic plants in the greenhouse." As he enthused about all the new specimens he had, Harry's mind turned to the dilapidated greenhouse at Seren Du. He'd intended to start clearing it out over the summer, maybe grow some potions ingredients — he actually enjoyed gardening at the Dursleys — but it had turned out to be a much bigger project than any of them had anticipated. Remus and Sirius had promised to get it emptied out ready for the next summer. Maybe by then Harry would be able to tell Neville about it and get some advice. Neville didn't even know the truth about Sirius, yet.

Several familiar faces stopped in on them throughout the journey, and with each one Ron's retelling of the events of the Quidditch World Cup got more and more elaborate. While he gave Neville a fairly accurate recount, by the time Seamus and Dean reached them he was describing their narrow escape from a pack of Death Eaters, who apparently almost hexed him several times. Harry and Hermione merely shared an exasperated glance.

At one point, they managed to turn the conversation to the match itself rather than the chaos after it, Neville listening enviously as Harry and Ron described it all.

"Gran didn't want to go," Neville said miserably. "She's not into quidditch. It sounds amazing, though."

Ron jumped up to rifle through his trunk, pulling out his little figure of Viktor Krum. "Look at this! We saw him right up close, too. We were up in the top box—"

"For the first and last time in your life, Weasley." The familiar drawl made Harry's head snap up, and he was glad for his darker skin when he felt his cheeks heat ever so slightly. Draco's hair was a little longer than it had been at the Cup, falling into his silver-grey eyes. He looked good. Behind him were Crabbe and Goyle, looking appropriately menacing.

"Don't remember asking you to join us, Malfoy," Harry said coolly, hoping to head off any truly explosive argument before Ron could get a word in. They all had their roles to play, of course, but he didn't want to get into a fight before the term even began.

Sadly, it was not to be. As much as Draco and Harry were friends now, the same couldn't be said for him and Ron, and Draco took any chance to taunt the redhead. "Weasley, what is that?"

A sleeve of Ron's dress robes was sticking out of his trunk, obviously dislodged when Ron had grabbed the Krum figurine. It was swaying with the motion of the train, the lace cuff very obvious. Ron made to shove it out of sight, but Draco was too quick, and soon he was holding the robes out in front of him.

"Good Merlin!" he exclaimed. "Weasley, you weren't thinking about wearing these, were you?" He looked them over in consideration. "I'm sure they were the height of fashion in, oh, about 1890..." he trailed off with a laugh, Crabbe and Goyle laughing right along with him. Ron's face was burning bright red. Harry tried to bring himself to be offended on his friend's behalf, but he just couldn't do it; the robes were awful. Ron should've just taken Bill's old ones, pink or no pink.

"Shove off, Malfoy," Ron scowled, snatching the robes back and tossing them into the corner of the compartment. Even Neville was eyeing them with a grimace.

"Maybe you should think about entering. There's money involved, you know; you'd be able to buy some decent robes then." Harry knew that Draco knew underage wizards wouldn't be able to enter; he was just trying to get a rise out of the redhead. The Slytherin laughed at Ron's confusion. "You mean you don't know?" He chanced a look at Harry, who shook his head slightly. Draco's smirk widened. "Oh, that's just precious! My father told me ages ago. I suppose yours just isn't senior enough to have been told about it."

"Or Ron's father just respects when things are supposed to stay secret," Hermione said icily. Draco laughed.

"As if everyone else's parents didn't tell them immediately. They probably just don't talk about the important things in front of him." Happy with his annual pre-sorting mocking of Ron Weasley, Draco let it go, his eyes turning to Harry once more. Harry wished he could somehow arrange a way to talk to the blond in private, but that would have to wait until they got to school. The train was far too crowded to risk it. Instead he merely quirked his lips in the briefest smile, which turned into a glare when he caught Ron looking at him. When Draco left, Ron slammed the compartment door shut so hard the window cracked.

"Oh, honestly, Ron," Hermione muttered, whipping out her wand to fix it. "You shouldn't let him get to you like that."

Ron, who had been sulking on and off for various reasons since he'd been given the dress robes, merely scowled and squashed the last remaining cauldron cake between his hands. Harry shared an uneasy look with Neville. Rooming with Ron in such a mood was going to be interesting; hopefully he would perk up once the Tournament was announced.

When they reached Hogsmeade station, they hurried to the carriages, not wanting to be out in the deluge of rain any longer than they had to be. "Has the weather ever been so bad they can't take the first years across in boats?" Harry wondered aloud, watching Hagrid lead the group of tiny, bedraggled eleven year-olds towards the lake.

"I don't think so," Hermione replied. "I've certainly never read about it. They always find a way."

Harry cast a quick Drying charm over himself, even though he knew he'd just end up getting soaked again when he reached the castle. It beat having to sit in the carriage in sodden robes.

Thankfully, he was eventually at the Gryffindor table in the Great Hall, spelled dry for the third time — thanks to Peeves and his water balloons — and eagerly awaiting the start of the feast. As the soaking first years were led in, leaving a veritable stream of water in their wake, Harry realised it was the first sorting he'd actually been present for since his own. He was surprised when the Sorting Hat's song was completely different, impressing upon them the virtues of each house individually. Harry's mind cast back to Sirius' words the night before he'd left Seren Du; his insistence that the war would only be won by the houses working together. Perhaps the hat was trying to tell them something.

There seemed to be a thousand first years to sort as Harry's stomach rumbled expectantly, the golden plates in front of him staying frustratingly empty. He tried to pay attention, to keep an eye out for any names that sounded familiar from all his books about the Wizengamot, but other than the Carrow twins — both of whom went to Slytherin — there weren't any he recognised.

At last it was time to eat, and Harry ravenously filled his plate, tuning out most of the conversation around him. He grimaced when Nearly-Headless Nick let slip that Hogwarts was staffed by house elves, immediately setting Hermione off again. That was going to be a problem this year, wasn't it?

At the end of the feast, Dumbledore stood to make his start-of-term speech. Harry hadn't realised the Triwizard Tournament would mean cancelling quidditch, and his outrage was echoed by several others from every house. He caught Cedric Diggory's eye across the room, the boy looking upset at the news. So much for that rematch.

The interruption of Mad-Eye Moody was an unexpected one. Harry felt uneasy when the man's magical eye landed on him, unnaturally bright blue. It felt like it was piercing his soul — he made a mental note to ask Sirius exactly what that eye was capable of.

He didn't know much about the man, just what Mr Weasley had told them that morning, but it was clear he was at least friends with Dumbledore. That didn't exactly inspire confidence in Harry. He'd have to be careful around Moody until he'd got the measure of him.

Harry pretended to be just as startled by the announcement of the Tournament as everyone else. The twins, unsurprisingly, were among those not pleased with the news that only wizards who were of-age by the end of October would be able to enter. "We're so close, we're practically seventeen!" Fred insisted as they walked up to Gryffindor Tower.

"There's got to be a way to get around it," George agreed. "Once our names are in the running, they won't be able to turn us down."

Harry doubted it would be that simple, but stayed quiet as the pair plotted ways to hoodwink the impartial judge. When they extended the offer to Ron and Harry, Harry snorted. "I think I get into enough trouble in the average school year without seeking it out, don't you?" he pointed out dryly. Fred shrugged.

"Yeah, mate, you're probably right. Ah well, more glory for us!"

They went off to their respective dormitories after bidding everyone goodnight, and Harry grinned at Dean's new poster of Viktor Krum. Maybe he should've brought his Holyhead Harpies poster with him instead of leaving it in his room. He could explain it away as a birthday present, or something. Though he'd have to figure out a reasonable explanation for why it was the Harpies. Maybe he could buy a Puddlemere poster in support of Oliver instead.

Changing into his pyjamas, he put all thoughts of quidditch and posters out of his head, drawing his curtains around his bed and setting the usual privacy charms. Now he was back at school, all his plans for the year came rushing back to the forefront of his mind. He wanted to get the heirs closer together, even the Slytherin ones — if he could get them all working together before either Dumbledore or Voldemort managed to get to them, they might have a chance at sorting out the shambles of the wizarding world after the war was over. It was all well and good planning for battle, but someone needed to have a good idea of what came next, or they'd end up doing exactly what they'd done after the last two wars; sticking their heads in the sand and letting Albus Dumbledore take care of everything.

As well as that, he had to keep his head down and out of Dumbledore's way, and figure out just who he could trust within the castle. Right now, it was a pretty short list.

Chapter 19

The next morning Harry woke up early, so he left the dorm quietly and headed down to breakfast alone. There was only a handful of students in the Great Hall already, and as Harry walked towards the Gryffindor table, someone slammed into his shoulder. “Watch where you’re going, Potter.” It was Draco, glaring harshly at him, and Harry returned the look even as he brightened up internally, shoving a hand in his robe pocket and wrapping his fingers around a scrap of parchment that hadn’t been there a second ago. He waited until he was sat down before unfolding it under the table. Tonight, after curfew, fourth floor Charms room?

He glanced up at the Slytherin table, giving Draco the barest of nods, trying not to outwardly smile.

“Morning, Harry!” The cheerful greeting came from Susan Bones, sat on the Hufflepuff bench nearby, absently braiding her wavy copper hair over her shoulder.

“Hi, Susan. Good summer?”

“Wasn’t bad until the Cup happened. Aunt Amelia’s barely been home since, it’s all madness.” Harry remembered that her aunt was the head of the DMLE, and grimaced; no doubt she’d been even busier than Mr Weasley was. “Did you end up listening to that lecture I told you about, by the way?” In one of Susan’s last letters, she’d told him about a lecture that was being broadcast on the Wizarding Wireless, all about how the lack of information for muggleborns entering the wizarding world was leading to a slow muggle-fication of their society, and it was going to lead to them being discovered eventually. It was an incredibly controversial topic.

“Yeah, it was really interesting!” Harry enthused, straddling the bench so he could eat his porridge while keeping up the conversation. “He had a lot of good points, but I did think it was a bit extreme. The wizarding world can be dragged into the future without getting overrun with muggles. I mean, wouldn’t it be so much easier to use pens and notebooks in class instead of quills and a million rolls of parchment? Or hell, computers! They’re getting more popular with the muggles. If someone could figure out how to make muggle technology work with magic, it’d be a total game-changer.”

“That would just increase the likelihood of the wizarding world being discovered, though,” Hannah Abbott pointed out, jumping into the conversation. Her dad was muggleborn, having taken her mother’s pureblood surname when they married, so she was fairly familiar with muggle technology. “Imagine, even if someone managed to figure it out and we had a whole separate internet for the wizarding world. All it would take is one particularly tech-savvy muggle to crack it and we’d be out in the open for everyone to see.”

She made a fair point, and Harry hummed thoughtfully. “Okay, maybe not that much of a cultural exchange, then. But you can’t argue against pens.”

“Oh, Merlin, no! Dad’s been saying the wizarding world should switch for years. One of these days I swear I’m gonna do my homework in biro just to see what the teachers say,”

Hannah said with a laugh.

“The fact of the matter is, if we keep pushing away everything muggle and refusing to learn about them, we’ll only stand out more,” Susan continued, bringing them back on track.
“Harry, you were at the World Cup, weren’t you? You saw what half the older folks thought was a good example of muggle clothing! How do they expect to stay incognito if they’ve got no idea about muggle life?”

Harry remembered some of the more... interesting outfits he’d seen at the Cup. Susan was right. How could wizards blend in with muggles if they didn’t know the first thing about them?

They were interrupted by the arrival of Ron and Hermione, who looked bewildered by the company Harry was keeping. “There you are!” Hermione said by way of greeting, dropping a stack of books on the table beside her. How she could have so many when they didn’t even have their timetables yet, Harry didn’t know.

She and Ron both seemed set on ignoring Harry’s Hufflepuff companions, talking to him as if he was alone. The two girls shared an annoyed look, getting to their feet. “See you later, Harry,” Susan said.

Once they were gone, Ron turned to him. “What you talking to Hufflepuffs for?” he asked suspiciously. Harry raised an eyebrow.

“I didn’t realise it was such a big deal,” he retorted a little sharply. “We were talking about the World Cup.” Sort of. Eventually. Tangentially.

Ron seemed a little wrong-footed that Harry didn’t immediately see the problem in speaking to those outside his own house. “Really, Ron, it’s not like they’re Slytherins,” Hermione pointed out diplomatically, buttering a slice of toast.

Harry wondered what they would’ve done if he had been talking to Slytherins, and scowled into his orange juice.

McGonagall came around to hand out timetables, and Harry eyed his over. Herbology with the Hufflepuffs first thing. Maybe Harry would sit with Hannah and Susan instead of Ron and Hermione, just to show them.

He couldn’t, though. He couldn’t risk Dumbledore getting suspicious of him, and it would be an obvious sign that the Compulsion charm was gone if Harry started socialising with people outside his own house. He was supposed to be the perfect little Gryffindor — and evidently that involved only valuing the opinions of other Gryffindors.

Was it normal, he wondered? Kids spending their whole Hogwarts career only talking to people inside their own house? He glanced around the hall; no, there were plenty of groups with mixed colours on their robes. It wasn’t common, but it wasn’t unusual either. Finishing his breakfast, Harry slowly began to plot. If he could get all the houses mixing together more without it being just him, maybe Dumbledore wouldn’t realise Harry knew the truth. He could pass it off as school unity in the face of international competition; they would all have to rally behind the Hogwarts champion, whoever it ended up being. That would be a good start.

He ignored Ron and Hermione bickering about house elves and stood up, making a vague excuse about needing to get his Herbology book. As soon as he could, he'd have to get the heirs gathered and start tossing ideas around; between them they could surely think of something.

Baby steps, but they'd get there eventually. He was playing a dangerous game, going against Dumbledore right under the man's nose. But as much as Harry had promised Sirius he wouldn't go looking for trouble, he wouldn't just sit and do nothing. Whatever Dumbledore's plan for Harry was, it was clearly supposed to come to a head before he turned seventeen; the goblins had assured him that with the block on his core, Harry wouldn't have survived his coming of age. That meant he was running out of time to get the upper hand.

He'd spent most of last year keeping his head down. It was time to get the pieces moving.

.-.-.

That night, Harry donned his invisibility cloak and made his way towards the fourth floor Charms room, grinning when he saw Draco waiting for him, deck of cards in hand. The blond perked up when Harry removed the cloak. "You're late," he reprimanded, and Harry offered an apologetic look.

"Ron wouldn't go to sleep," he explained. "Are you alright?" Harry was still a little shaken from watching Moody turn Draco into a ferret and bounce him all over the hall. Ron thought it was the funniest thing he'd ever seen, but Harry was horrified a teacher would use that sort of magic on a student. He was glad McGonagall seemed equally horrified.

"I'm fine. Uncle Severus gave me something for the bruises," Draco assured. "It's just my pride that's wounded."

"Moody's a dick," Harry declared. He paused, thoughts turning to graver matters. "How did things go after— after the Cup?"

"It could've been worse. Father was fairly happy with how things went at the Cup; no one got caught, and with all those articles that bloody Skeeter woman put out it's certainly made it memorable." Harry made a face; that was an understatement. "But... Harry, I heard some things this summer. Father... Father said the Dark Lord is coming back."

Harry pursed his lips, staying silent. Wishing he could assure Draco it wasn't true. The blond's face crumbled. "We don't know how, or when," Harry said quickly. "But it's inevitable now. Snape says his Mark is getting darker." He told Draco about the prophecy Trelawney had made at the end of the year before, and how Wormtail was probably with Voldemort now, judging by the dream he'd had.

Not only did Draco know most of Harry's secrets — he was the only one of Harry's friends who knew about Seren Du, after all — but between his father and Dumbledore he was walking the tightrope almost as much as Harry was. It was a relief, being able to talk freely with someone who understood.

By the end of it, Draco was even paler than usual. Both of them had abandoned their cards, and Harry's foot was bouncing anxiously. He was aware that in this particular circumstances, Draco was in far more danger than Harry. "If he comes back, what if—what if Father tries to make me join him?"

Harry reached across the table, taking Draco's hand tightly in his own. "I won't let anything happen to you, or your mother," he vowed. "You can come hide at Seren Du if it comes down to it. No one will find you there. And even if he does come back, surely your father won't expect you to do anything until you're of age?"

Draco scoffed, looking bleak. "You don't know my father."

"If he wants you, he'll have to go through me," Harry declared fiercely. Draco met his gaze with a hesitant smile, then his eyes dropped down to their joined hands. Harry blushed, letting go and hastily picking up his cards.

Voldemort wasn't getting to Draco. Not if he had anything to say about it. Draco was Harry's.

Harry was only just starting to realise how desperately he wanted that to be true.

.-.-.

Thanks to a note passed to Hannah in Herbology, and another to Daphne in Transfiguration, Harry managed to have all the trustworthy heirs meet him in one of the abandoned sixth floor classrooms after dinner the first Thursday back. He made an excuse to Ron and Hermione about having detention with Snape — a cover the man would probably be happy to corroborate if needed — and hurried up to the little-used corridor, slipping into the room after checking no one was watching him.

He seemed to be the last one there. He looked around the familiar faces; eleven of them in total, twelve including him. Harry was amused to realise that between them, they had an equal number from each house. "What's this about, Potter?" Cassius Warrington asked, leaning back in his chair, eyebrows raised. Harry perched on the edge of the teacher's desk, eyeing the group.

"Partly I just wanted to check in, see how everyone was doing. I know a lot of you were at the Cup. But mostly... mostly I had an idea, and I was wondering if you would be willing to help me."

Eleven faces stared at him expectantly. "Voldemort is coming back," he declared. Several people gasped. "Don't ask me how I know. Just call it special Boy-Who-Lived sense." He tapped at his scar pointedly, hoping that was enough of an explanation. He couldn't exactly tell them he'd seen Professor Snape's Dark Mark and it was growing clearer. Or that he'd watched Peter Pettigrew escape and Professor Trelawney had predicted he would aid Voldemort back to power. They'd think he was bonkers. "I don't know how long it'll take, but it's coming. We can't afford to wait until we're all of age to start making changes."

“What do you want us to do, march into the Wizengamot and demand to take our seats early?” Sullivan Fawley scoffed. Harry shook his head.

“No, no, that won’t work. I had something a little more... simple in mind. Dumbledore’s counting on house rivalries to keep people isolated — not just with the Slytherins. If people don’t socialise outside their house, they get more and more narrow-minded, until no one can see anyone else’s point of view. And those who need help aren’t willing to ask for it because it often means going to someone outside their house. If people keep telling Slytherins they’re all dark wizards, of course they’re going to end up going down that path. I was thinking that, since the theme of this year seems to be international magical cooperation and unity and all that bollocks, we could start off a little closer to home.”

“Hmm.” Padma frowned thoughtfully. “What did you have in mind?”

“I’m not really sure yet. Obviously I’d like to spend more time with all of you, but it can’t just be me — if Dumbledore thinks I’m up to something, he’ll start pushing. He’s got a lot riding on me being the good little Gryffindor Golden Boy.” He hadn’t told them about the Compulsion charm, but everyone with eyes could see that the way Dumbledore treated Harry wasn’t a normal headmaster-student relationship. “If all of you start hanging out with people in other houses — it doesn’t even have to be the people in this room, it could be anyone — then when I start doing it, it won’t look as out of place. I hope.”

“What about a study group?” Hannah suggested. “We could have a smaller, private group — just us, meeting every other week or so, to make plans. But then outside of that we could have a big group, any house welcome, any year. We could say that with the tournament disrupting the school year so much, we want to make sure we don’t fall behind in our classes. I bet a bunch of the fifth and seventh years would go for it, too; they’ve got exams they won’t want to fail. Then it doesn’t have to come from you, Harry.”

“Hannah, that’s brilliant,” Harry enthused. “It wouldn’t even have to involve everyone meeting up together all at once; they could meet based on year and subject, get everyone studying the same thing studying together.” If there was one thing that would give people common ground, it was complaining about homework.

“I’ll talk to some of the other prefects,” Cassius volunteered. “It might be too early to start yet; term’s only just begun, and the tournament hasn’t even started yet. Besides, half the sixth and seventh years are planning on entering the tournament, so they’re a little preoccupied. But we can start branching out our friendship groups in preparation.”

“What about the rest of the Slytherins?” Ernie asked, holding his hands up defensively when Daphne whipped around to glare at him. “Obviously you three are alright, but how do we know who else is trustworthy? We don’t know who might already be on You-Know-Who’s side.”

“Do you really think anyone who’s still a school kid can be on his side?” Harry pointed out wryly. “Even if they think they are, they have no idea what war is really like. I’m not saying go out and hug every Slytherin, but don’t treat them any differently than you would a Ravenclaw or Gryffindor or Hufflepuff. If we automatically write them off just because of their house, we’re as bad as Dumbledore.” How many Slytherins could they save just by reaching a hand out in friendship? From what he'd learned from Remus and Sirius over the summer, everyone assumed the Slytherin kids were lost to the dark from the moment they were sorted into the house. That's how Voldemort ended up with such a huge following; they had nowhere else to go.

"So that's your grand plan?" Blaise asked with a raised eyebrow. "Friendship? You do realise you couldn't sound more Gryffindor if you tried?"

Harry grinned at him. "That's exactly why it's so perfect. Dumbledore couldn't possibly get angry about all his students being friends, not without having to face some serious questions." The headmaster would have no choice but to encourage them. "Think about it; all the school-sanctioned clubs are single-house only. Quidditch teams, study groups, hell, even the gobstones club is separated by house. It's like they don't want us interacting with each other. Shouldn't they be trying to encourage inter-house unity? We're all supposed to work together once we leave Hogwarts, after all." The only attempt at inter-house cooperation was pairing them together for classes, but even then that often stayed with one house on one side of the classroom and one house on the other.

"It is a bit weird," Parvati agreed. "Even when Padma and I got sorted into different houses, people acted like I was supposed to just stop talking to her. She's my twin sister."

"So we make friends, then," Susan declared. "And when the time is right, we start up the study group."

"We can start small," Neville suggested, balking a little as every eye in the room turned to him. "Asking to borrow a quill, complimenting someone's hair. Being nice to Slytherins. It'll look weird if we all suddenly want to be best friends with people outside our houses."

"Neville's got a point," Harry agreed. "We don't want to look suspicious."

"I hope you aren't expecting me to be nice to people, Potter," Daphne drawled. Harry snorted.

"Wouldn't dream of it," he replied sweetly. "Just be a bitch to everyone equally and you'll be fine." That made Daphne laugh. After a summer writing letters to the Slytherin girl, Harry was pretty sure he had a handle on her particular brand of humour.

"If we're starting a study group, can we start now?" Sullivan asked, glancing around the group. "You've all done third year Transfiguration. This essay on mammal transformations is doing my head in."

It turned out a lot of them had brought their books with them, having come straight from lessons, and it was an easy transition to working together. Most of them were fourth years, after all. Cassius, the one sixth year of the group, was saved when he admitted he had Herbology homework, and Neville jumped at the chance to help with the advanced work. It made Harry smile to watch his shy Gryffindor friend slowly gain confidence as he explained things to Cassius, who took diligent notes.

Maybe it wouldn't be so hard after all.

....

Hedwig was a smarter owl than Harry gave her credit for; rather than swooping in at breakfast with the rest of the morning post, she waited up in Harry's dorm window, letter securely attached to her leg. Harry was alone when he found her — no need to make up an excuse to hide the letter from Ron and Hermione. As if they had any right to read his mail!

He unfolded the parchment, quickly scanning the goblin's neat cursive handwriting.

Dear Mr Potter

The news of your scar is troubling. I will set my best team on the matter and let you know if we have any results, though this is unlike any prior cursebreaking we have come across in recent memory. It may not be something we can assist with.

The matter of your vault is an easier one, however. I have made arrangements with Farlig for your vault security to be upgraded — no one will be allowed access without you present beside them, unless you have given us prior, in-person permission that can be verified by magical signature. If certain people ask, we will excuse it as standard security changes.

I have also enclosed a list of vault transactions in the last fourteen years — if any of these are unauthorised or unwelcome, we are happy to take recompense from the offender's personal vaults. You are also within your rights to demand any items removed from your vaults are returned.

May your vaults be ever full,

Gorrak

Sr Inheritance Manager, Gringotts Bank

There was a second piece of parchment folded beside the first. Harry opened it up, his heart sinking to the pit of his stomach the more he read.

It had the most recent transactions listed first; Harry's name was written next to almost every one of them. However, there were several that didn't add up — a withdrawal of 30 galleons from Molly Weasley this summer. She hadn't bought anything for Harry; why was she taking money from his vault??

The further Harry read back, the less things made sense. A handful of withdrawals from Molly Weasley over the last three years, all for more than she possibly could have spent on Harry's school supplies. Not enormous amounts, but certainly not necessary. And then he got to the withdrawals from Dumbledore.

Regular money withdrawals — far larger sums than Molly Weasley ever withdrew — as well as what looked like several Potter family heirlooms; books, jewellery, art, all sorts. The listings went right back to November 1981; mere weeks after Harry's parents had died.

Even if Dumbledore had been sending the Dursleys some sort of stipend for caring for Harry — which, he knew from their multiple complaints on the subject, he hadn't — that didn't excuse the heirlooms. That didn't excuse the withdrawals during the school year, when the Dursleys didn't even have Harry.

He'd expected this, but he felt sick. Dumbledore had been stealing from him since he was a baby, when he was supposed to be the man responsible for Harry's safety and welfare. And Mrs Weasley...

He refused to believe it was how it looked on paper. There had to be some other explanation. His school supplies maybe cost more than he expected, or something. Surely she wouldn't steal from Harry. Surely she knew that if she needed it, Harry would happily share whatever he owned with her family?

Harry wrote a quick reply, asking Gorراك to keep the transaction list in the same place he was keeping the magical signature, but otherwise do nothing; if he started reclaiming things from Dumbledore now, it would give the game away. He was furious at the thought of his family's belongings in the claws of that manipulative old man, but there was nothing he could do about it now. The new security measures would stop Dumbledore from taking any more, at least.

As for the other issue, Harry couldn't bring himself to do anything about it yet. Thinking about Mrs Weasley being on Dumbledore's side made him feel anxious and itchy. If she was working for him, how many of her children were? Was Mr Weasley? Could he trust any of them?

He could trust the twins, he told himself. They'd known about him looking into his heritage for a whole year and hadn't said anything to anyone. As for the rest... he'd find that out in time.

He would block access to his vaults, and see if anything came of it. There was little else he could do, yet.

.-.-.-.

Harry had revised his opinion of Professor Moody. The man wasn't a dick. He was insane. Everyone else seemed to be in awe of his approach to teaching, but as Harry left the classroom with green light burned into his eyelids, seeing Neville chalk-white and shaking, he couldn't possibly condone the man's methods. At least Moody had confirmed they'd only have to put up with him for the one year. Everyone around them was talking about it like it was some sort of fantastic show the man had put on — even Ron couldn't stop going on about how the spider had died 'just like that!'

Harry pushed past him and hurried after Neville, slinging an arm around the taller boy's shoulders. "You alright?" he asked quietly. Neville's eyes were glazed over, like he wasn't really present.

"I think I might be sick," he admitted in a whisper. Harry urged him over to a nearby alcove, nudging him into a sitting position.

“Breathe, Nev.” In their summer correspondence, Harry had learned a lot about the other boy, including what had happened to his parents. Harry could hardly imagine what it was like; having your parents alive, but them not recognising you or anyone else, their brains destroyed by excessive torture.

From Moody’s words, they were going to be studying the Unforgivables a lot over the next term. Harry wished it would be worth anything to go to Dumbledore. The man had probably happily consented to showing fourteen year-olds the worst curses known to wizard-kind. Fourteen year-olds with families destroyed by those curses.

There was an odd clunking sound, and Harry turned to see Moody walking towards them. He scowled at the professor.

“It’s alright, sonny,” Moody assured, clapping Neville on the shoulder. “Why don’t you come up to my office, have a cup of tea?” He glanced aside. “You alright there, Potter?”

“I’ve been better,” he bit out.

“I know it seems a little harsh, but you’ve got to know. No point in pretending... anyway. Come on, Longbottom. I’ve got some books that might interest you.” Neville sent Harry a pleading look, and Harry reached out to grab Neville by the arm gently.

“Actually, Professor, Neville and I were going to go finish our Charms essays before dinner. If you don’t mind.” He tried to stay polite, aware that the man still was a teacher, but he was reaching the end of his tether. His vision still flashed green every time he closed his eyes.

Moody stared him down for a moment, then nodded, stepping back. “If you’re sure, Potter. You boys watch yourselves. Constant vigilance!” With that he limped back to his office, and Neville let out a shaky breath.

“Thanks, Harry,” he murmured. “I just... I can’t, right now. Not after seeing him do that. You know what they say about the Unforgivables — for them to work, you’ve got to mean it.”

Harry swallowed harshly. Moody certainly meant it back in the classroom, with the spiders. Had the auror used the curses on people before, too? Surely even aurors weren’t allowed to use that kind of force.

“What was that about, then?” Ron and Hermione appeared from nowhere — apparently they hadn’t gone back to the Tower like Harry thought. Ron seemed entirely oblivious to the tension in the air. “Some lesson, eh? He really knows his stuff. The way that spider just snuffed it, wow, I—“ He seemed to realise who he was talking to, growing quickly silent. Harry’s patience snapped.

“Fuck off, Ron,” he muttered, putting an arm around Neville and heading for the library. He didn’t feel like being in Gryffindor Tower right now.

When he and Neville eventually ran out of excuses to be away from the common room, they made their way back. Harry saw Hermione and Ron in the corner of the common room; Hermione was holding what looked like a collection box, speaking very quickly. Ron looked like he'd rather be anywhere else. He brightened up when he saw Harry, apparently having already forgotten the dark-haired boy was mad at him. "Great! Harry! Hermione, you can tell Harry all about spew, look."

"It's S.P.E.W!" Hermione corrected, but Ron had already vaulted over the back of the armchair and headed up to the dormitory. Harry shared a confused look with Neville.

"What's in the box, Hermione?" Harry asked, already sure he was going to regret doing so.

Hermione's following tirade about house elf rights was the last straw for Harry. "Hermione," he cut her off mid-sentence, "have you ever actually spoken to a house elf?"

"Well, no, but—"

"Did you do any research whatsoever into the specifics of a house elf's bond with its family?" Harry continued. Hermione faltered.

"It's really hard to find information on it in the library."

"Hermione, house elves get sick if they're not bonded to a house," Neville piped up, looking puzzled. "I thought everyone knew that."

"They what?" Hermione was round-eyed.

"Their magic needs the bond to balance it. Without access to the family magics that come from being bonded to a house, the elf's magic gets unstable and starts turning inwards. It's awful to watch, I've heard. Back in the olden times they could survive in the wild on the natural magic in the forests, but then the muggles started chopping them all down, so the house elves started bonding themselves to wizard families instead," Neville told her. Harry would bet anything a family like the Longbottoms had at least two house elves. According to Sirius, the Black family had one at every property, and the Potter family had two at their ancestral home and a few others scattered about. Harry wasn't old enough to claim the Potter properties and elves yet, but he would one day.

"Well... that doesn't excuse them from not being paid! If anything it's worse — they can't leave, so they're forced to do all the work."

"House elves like doing work," Neville told her. "Our elf Hetty was devastated when I decided to start tending the greenhouse myself."

"Maybe you should do a little more research before you start jumping in where you're not needed, Hermione," Harry suggested gently, his heart going out to the crestfallen witch. She was just trying to do the right thing. "By all means, focus on laws to make house elves treated better with their owners. But don't assume what they want without even talking to them." He ran a hand through his hair, wincing against the brewing headache. "Now if you'll excuse me, I'm going to bed. It's been a hell of a day."

"I'll head up too," Neville said quickly, clearly not wanting to be left alone with Hermione after that minor explosion. On the way up the stairs, he put a hand on Harry's arm. "Are you sure you're alright? Seeing that curse in Moody's class couldn't have been any easier for you than it was for me." His eyes were knowing, and Harry sighed. At that minute, all he really wanted was a hug. He hated Sirius and Remus a little bit, for getting him so used to seeking comfort over the summer. He didn't have that anymore.

"I just want to sleep," he admitted, dragging a hand over his face.

And yet, when he was in bed, curtains drawn, he found himself staring up at the ceiling of his four-poster bed, wide awake.

Chapter 20

Harry should have known Ron and Hermione wouldn't stay oblivious forever.

Strolling into the common room after a quick meeting with Draco after dinner — one of their rare pre-curfew meetings — Harry was surprised to see Ron and Hermione sitting on the sofa by the fire. Hermione wasn't doing homework, which was a novelty in itself. "Where have you been?" she asked suspiciously. Harry shrugged.

"Library," he replied, his usual response to excuse his absences. Whether it was meeting with Draco or the other heirs — they'd started their own study group early, because it turned out there were quite a few intelligent people in the group, and between them they had just about every subject covered. Sullivan said his grades had never been better.

"No you weren't. I was in the library and I didn't see you there," Hermione argued. Harry bit back a sigh.

"It's a big library, Hermione. But I was there, and then I finished my Potions essay, so I went for a walk. If you must know." He sank down into the armchair, dropping his bag on the floor. "What does it matter where I was, anyway?"

"You're always disappearing on us these days, mate," Ron accused. "Feels like we barely see you anymore."

He wasn't wrong there, but Harry didn't feel entirely bad about it. There were so many parts of his life he just couldn't share with them, but a lot of them he just didn't want to. If he'd tried hard, he could have told them about his inter-house study group without saying a thing about them being heirs. Hermione was oblivious to all of that politics, and Ron actively hated anything that might give him something in common with Malfoy, so he wasn't knowledgeable enough to put the pieces together either. But Harry liked having people in his life that weren't them. Ron and Hermione wanted to know everything. He thought about his first two years of school, when they acted like it was a personal offence if he didn't share every secret with them, and he went with it because he didn't know how else friendship was supposed to go. Even now they were constantly asking him if he'd heard from Sirius, as if it was any of their business. Harry was just glad they didn't know anything about the dream he'd had in the summer.

And there was still that small voice in the back of his mind that said he couldn't trust them. The voice that said they were more loyal to Dumbledore than him. That voice had never been wrong yet.

"I just like having a little time to myself these days, is all."

"Hermione was wondering if you'd got a girlfriend you weren't telling us about," Ron teased, wiggling his eyebrows at Harry. The dark-haired boy went bright red.

"What— why would you say that? I don't have a girlfriend!" he spluttered. Ron laughed.

"Exactly, that's what I said! I said you'd tell us if you did." He sounded confident.

"Not if she's someone he thought we wouldn't approve of," Hermione retorted. She turned to Harry, giving him a sympathetic look. "If you do, you can tell us. We won't judge you, Harry."

So many answers ran through Harry's mind at that. I've been hanging out with Slytherins. I like boys. I think I have a crush on Draco Malfoy. He doubted they'd be so accepting then. Instead he shook his head stubbornly.

"I don't have a secret girlfriend," he promised.

"Mione, did you really think someone could date Harry Potter and keep it secret?" Ron pointed out, chuckling. "She'd be all over the school with the news."

Harry grimaced. Girl or boy, he'd never date anyone who was excited by his fame like that. Surely they knew that? "If I ever get a girlfriend, you two will be the first to know," he said, confident that would never happen. He was pretty sure that girls just... weren't his thing. Regardless of the blond Slytherin who seemed to be taking up far too much space in Harry's thoughts.

He ignored Ron and Hermione bickering about what sort of girl he might date, digging one of the muggle fiction books Remus had bought him out of his bag and settling in to read. It was hard to pay attention with so much going on inside his mind — when had his friendship with Ron and Hermione changed so much that he felt like they hardly knew him any more? And why was he still trying?

.-.-.-.

Harry stormed out of Moody's classroom as soon as the bell rang, walking too fast for anyone to catch up with him. His knees were aching from slamming into the desk multiple times, and his hands were shaking so hard he couldn't get them to stop.

How the hell could Dumbledore approve of that? Putting underage kids under the Imperius curse! No matter whether it was good for them to know what it felt like, it was wildly illegal, and they definitely should have been sent some sort of consent form for their guardians to sign.

He was furious and in pain and his head still felt all funny from being Imperiused multiple times, and he didn't even know where he was heading as long as it was away. Which is why he was utterly baffled when he found himself in the dungeons, outside Snape's office. He bit his lip; Sirius and Remus did say that he could go to Snape if he was having problems during the school year. The man had actually been fairly decent to Harry in Potions class so far, all things considered.

Harry knocked cautiously.

"Enter," came the curt response. Harry eased the door open, watching the Potions professor's eyebrows rise. "Potter."

Harry opened his mouth to speak, but Snape raised a hand first, lifting his wand and performing several warding charms. Only then did he lower his hand with a gesture for Harry to speak. “Do you know what Professor Moody is doing in his classes, sir?”

“I know he recently performed all three Unforgivables,” Snape said with a disparaging curl of his lip. “I do not know if anything more recent has occurred.”

“He’s putting us under the Imperius curse.” Snape dropped his quill. Harry continued. “He says that Dumbledore wants us to know how it feels, so we can learn to fight it.”

One of Snape’s long-fingered hands rose to clasp the bridge of his nose, and he let out a frustrated sigh. “Of course he does,” he muttered derisively. “Potter, you’re shaking.” He got to his feet quickly, urging Harry into the chair opposite his desk.

“I almost threw it off the first time,” Harry told him. “Professor Moody put me under it another four times, until I could ignore his orders completely.”

When he looked up a few moments later, Snape was thrusting a vial of Pepper-Up potion his way. “Five Imperius curses in a half hour period? You’re lucky you can still form sentences,” he muttered. “What the hell is he playing at? Dumbledore’s Golden Boy is no good to him with his brain leaking out of his ears.”

After the potion, Harry immediately felt better. “No one else in the class was able to throw it off. I think he just wanted to get the better of me.”

“I told Albus it was a foolish idea to bring that madman out of retirement,” Snape said. “He’s had one too many curses to the head.”

“What am I supposed to do?” Harry asked helplessly. “I can’t go to Dumbledore because it was his idea. But I can’t go to anyone else because then it’ll be obvious to Dumbledore I’m not obeying him anymore.” A thought occurred to him, and he froze. “Will he know I got rid of the Compulsion charm? Since I was able to shake the Imperius?” The charm was supposed to make him more suggestible, after all.

“If anything, this probably works in our favour. He’ll believe his Compulsion charm is so strong it overrode even Moody’s Imperius,” Snape assured him. “But I agree, you can’t say anything about it.” He pursed his lips, silent for a moment. “I’m sorry to say, Potter, that I think you’re going to have to just keep at it. With any luck, once you can throw off the curse every time, Moody will get bored and move on. And it is a good skill to have. Even if the methods are... questionable.” He took the empty vial from Harry’s still-trembling fingers, setting it aside. “Just be careful; repeated short-term exposure to the Imperius curse can be dangerous. I want you to come to me if you feel any unusual symptoms, or if he puts you under more than three times in a row again.”

“Yes, sir.” Harry bit his lip. “Not Madam Pomfrey?” Snape frowned in response.

“Until I have ascertained who on the staff is under Dumbledore’s thumb, I think it best we keep this to ourselves,” he said eventually. “Regardless of Poppy’s loyalties, I don’t like the idea of you spending any length of time in the Hospital Wing. It’s much easier for the headmaster to access you there, with plenty of privacy in case he decides you need a little more magical control.”

The thought of Dumbledore cursing him while he was asleep made Harry sick to his stomach. “Going a whole school year without a trip to the Hospital Wing is going to be a tall order, sir,” he remarked with a weak laugh. Snape’s lips quirked.

“I gave you those potions for a reason, Potter. And if you need assistance, you can always come to me. I assume that map of yours will show you the way to my private quarters?” Harry nodded. “Then you have permission, in an emergency, to come to me there if needed. Don’t abuse that permission, Potter.”

“I won’t,” Harry promised, and he meant it. Snape was on their side. Like Sirius said, he was basically family now. Harry didn’t want to do anything to upset the truce they seemed to have reached.

“I want you to sit there for twenty minutes,” Snape instructed. “Read if you must, but I need to make sure you aren’t going to have any aftershocks. You can leave when it’s time for dinner.”

“Yes, sir.” Harry dug through his bag for his book, but he didn’t open it, instead leaning back in the chair and letting his eyes fall shut. If anyone told him last year he’d feel so relaxed in Snape’s office of all places, he would’ve laughed himself sick, but it was just so nice to be somewhere quiet. Somewhere no one expected anything of him, or wanted answers. A little bit of the refuge he’d had at Seren Du.

God, he missed that place. It was going to be a long, long school year.

.-. .

Once the announcement of the arrival of the foreign schools went out, it was all anyone could talk about. Even Draco, when he and Harry met up a few nights before Halloween, slipped in a mention of the two French girls he’d met over the summer, and how they wouldn’t be coming as they were still underage. Harry couldn’t find it in him to be sad about that.

At last, they were all gathered in the Entrance Hall, which was gleaming after its minor makeover. “This way, outside! Stay in line,” McGonagall instructed, fussing and scolding until all Gryffindors were in neat rows by year group outside the school. The other houses were organised the same way, their heads of houses keeping everyone in line. They waited.

Harry was reluctantly impressed by the arrival of both the delegations. Mostly he was glad for the warming charms Remus had put on his school cloak before he’d packed. When the students had emerged from both the carriage and the ship, they all started to head back inside; until the Durmstrang delegation grew close enough for everyone to see their famous member.

“Viktor Krum!” The whisper echoed through the crowd of students; Harry saw Krum duck his head and forge onwards, resolutely ignoring the squeals and mutters of his name. Harry could sympathise there.

“Harry, it’s Krum!” Ron hissed, as if Harry might not have noticed.

“For heaven’s sake, Ron, he’s only a quidditch player,” Hermione said with a roll of her eyes. Ron looked at her like she’d gone mental.

Harry rolled his eyes as they descended into quiet bickering, jogging forwards a couple of steps until he was between Neville and Parvati instead. Parvati was still starry-eyed, but she was a little more composed about it. “I knew he was young, but I had no idea he was still in school!”

“Imagine trying to keep up your grades alongside a professional quidditch career,” Harry muttered with a grimace.

They all settled at their house tables, and waited for the foreign students to choose their places. The Beauxbatons students decided on the Ravenclaw table, while the Durmstrang delegation — following Krum’s lead — made for the Slytherin table. Harry didn’t know what was funnier; watching Draco trying to play it cool as Viktor Krum sat right next to him, or watching Ron quietly fume about it.

Harry studied the foreign delegations curiously; each school had clearly sent only the students who were of age, as they had about fifteen students each. Beauxbatons seemed to be a pretty even mix of boys and girls, while he could only see two girls in the Durmstrang group. Dumbledore stood at his podium, and a hush fell over the room.

All he did was greet their guests and declare the start of the feast, and Harry was surprised at the number of foreign dishes on offer. The house elves had outdone themselves!

“Oh, you should try this, boys,” Parvati urged, gesturing to a large crock pot filled with some sort of stew. “It’s gyuvech, I had it in Bulgaria once with my family. It’s delicious.” Harry and Neville shared a glance, then shrugged, each spooning some of the stew onto their plates. The whole point of the tournament was cultural sharing, after all.

Ron and Hermione were a little further down the table, and Ron finally seemed to have realised Harry wasn’t sitting with them. Unfortunately — or fortunately, depending on how you looked at it — he was promptly distracted by a beautiful blonde French girl coming up and asking to take one of the dishes. Ron was completely tongue-tied over her, and Hermione waspishly gestured for the girl to take the bowl, glaring at the redhead. Harry noticed several other boys goggling at the blonde as she walked back to the Ravenclaw table.

“D’you think she’s part veela or something?” Neville asked curiously, his eyes following the girl as well. Harry raised an eyebrow.

“She could be.” It would explain why all the boys were staring. Did veela not affect women?

“Oi, Harry, there’s room for you up here,” Ron called once dessert appeared on the table, gesturing to the empty seat beside him — the seat he’d cleared for Viktor Krum.

“I’m alright, thanks, Ron,” Harry waved him off, helping himself to cake. Neville snorted at the outraged look on Ron’s face.

“The Golden Trio isn’t so golden anymore, is it?” he murmured knowingly. Harry shrugged.

“My priorities are different now. Theirs... aren’t quite matching up.” He was hoping to spend as long as possible avoiding the inevitable confrontation when they realised he was mostly avoiding them. He just felt so suffocated around them. Ron especially, but if that friendship fractured he couldn’t guarantee what side Hermione would land on.

When the plates were cleared, Dumbledore stood once more, and Harry realised that the two empty chairs at the staff table had been filled. When had Bagman and Crouch arrived?

Filch hauled in the huge casket, which revealed the Goblet of Fire — an impressive object, to be sure. Harry should’ve known the ‘impartial judge’ was a magical artefact. Wizards did love giving decision-making power to inanimate objects.

When they all gathered to head up to their common rooms, Harry found himself bookended by Ron and Hermione once more, though the twins quickly nudged them aside. “An age line!” Fred crowed. “That’s easy to fool! And once our names are in the Goblet, we’re golden!”

“How about it, Harry? Sure you don’t wanna try for it?” George asked. Harry laughed, shaking his head.

“Nah, it’s not for me. But good luck with that.” He doubted something as simple as an Ageing Potion would fool the line, but then again, it was Dumbledore. He was all about encouraging reckless rule-breaking.

At the door to the Entrance Hall, they met up with a cluster of Durmstrang students and their headmaster, Karkaroff. Harry stepped back to let them go through, hoping Karkaroff hadn’t seen him, but it was too late. The man was staring. Harry tried not to squirm; Snape had warned him about Karkaroff. The man was a Death Eater, and a slippery one at that.

Karkaroff’s eyes were fixed firmly on his scar, and behind him his students were staring too, whispering to each other as they realised who Harry was. The only one not staring was Krum. “If you don’t mind, Igor,” Snape’s voice carried over the hushed crowd. “Potter’s ego is big enough as it is without foreigners gawping at him as well. His head may not fit through the door if you keep at it much longer.”

Karkaroff seemed to have realised he’d gathered a crowd, and coughed, heading through the doorway. Harry shot Snape a grateful look, but the man ignored him.

And so it began.

. . .

It didn’t escape Harry’s notice that the day the names would be drawn from the Goblet was also Halloween. He woke up with a bad feeling in his gut, and slipped from the dorm before anyone else was awake, wrapped in a dark blue knitted jumper that still smelled faintly of the detergent Ceri used at Seren Du, and the cloak he’d been given for his birthday. He put the two-way mirror in his pocket on his way out, slowly drawing together a plan in his mind.

Even with the excitement about the Goblet of Fire, Harry was still up early enough that only a handful of people were milling around the Great Hall. He could get used to this; it was nice having breakfast in the quiet. He watched Cassius and a couple of other Slytherins toss their names into the flames, and smirked. Imagine if the Hogwarts champion was a Slytherin?

As things got a little busier, Harry finished off his porridge and left the hall, right as the Durmstrang delegation entered. Each of them had a piece of parchment in their hands. Harry lingered in the doorway to watch them throw their names in one by one, then slipped out of the castle and towards the lake, wrapping his cloak snugly around himself. He found a quiet little nook beside a tree near the bank, setting up his usual privacy charms before taking the mirror from his pocket and speaking Sirius' name. After a few beats, his godfather's face appeared.

"You're up early," Sirius greeted. Harry offered a half-smile.

"So are you," he pointed out. "It's one of those days."

Sirius met his gaze knowingly. "It is, isn't it," he agreed. "How are things at school? The champions are being announced tonight, correct?"

Harry told Sirius everything that had happened since he'd spoke to the man a few days ago, including his little moment with Karkaroff. The mere mention of the man made Sirius scowl. "Stay away from him if you can, Harry," he warned. "He's no good."

Harry had surmised that much for himself. "How are things at home? What are you up to today?"

"Just spending time with Moony. Gonna light a Samhain fire later. Today is... hard, for both of us." Neither of them needed to say why. The death of Lily and James Potter hung over all of them, the wound still achingly fresh after thirteen years.

"I wish I could be there with you," Harry sighed. He hated having to spend Halloween at school. Everyone was too cheerful, and something always went wrong.

"We do too, pup. Make sure someone gives you a hug today, yeah? For me. I'd tell you to go to Severus for one, but I think he might explode if you asked," Sirius joked, making Harry grin.

"Okay. You give Moony an extra hug for me, won't you? For both your sakes." One day they'd all be able to spend the day together, mourning properly. Probably not until after Harry graduated Hogwarts, but... it was a nice thought.

He chatted to Sirius about inconsequential things for a while, basking in the warm feeling he got from having an adult who actually cared about the little things in his life. Not just wanting to talk to him when he was in trouble, or in danger, or they needed something from him — one of the few adults in Harry's life who actually cared about him. Not the Boy-Who-Lived.

Eventually however, Sirius had to go, and Harry pocketed the mirror with a sigh, staring out over the lake. What if he just sat there all day until the feast? What if he didn't even go to the feast? He'd find out who the champions were in the morning. He didn't really care either way.

His privacy charms made external noise a little fuzzy, so he dropped them to let the sounds of nature wash over him; the gentle lull of the lake's tide, the birds and other creatures in the forest chattering away. Very faintly, he could hear the noise of students up at the castle, but it was just far enough that he could pretend they didn't exist. Until someone cleared their throat. "Mind if I join you?"

It was Draco, his pale face half covered by his Slytherin scarf. Harry shuffled over a little, making room for the blond. "What are you doing out here?"

"Pansy wanted to try and get a better look at Krum," Draco explained. "I left her to it. Are you okay? You look sad."

"Just spoke to Sirius." Harry bit his lip, then sighed, meeting Draco's gaze earnestly. "I miss him. Especially today."

"Today? Oh." Draco quickly put the pieces together. "I'm sorry," he murmured. "It must be hard for you. Seeing everyone else so happy."

"It's not just that," Harry said. "It's... something bad always happens on Halloween. Every year. I feel like this year won't be any different, and I'm so sick of it all. I just want today to be over already." His heart hurt, his head hurt, and he was already so tired. The day had barely started and he was ready for it to be done.

"If it makes you feel better, the Weasley twins tried to put their names in the Goblet. The age line spat them back out with beards longer and greyer than Dumbledore's," Draco informed him, smiling slightly. "It was hilarious. I guess they're serious about making sure no one underage goes in."

Harry chuckled. "I wish I'd seen that." He felt a little bad for the twins, but really he was glad they wouldn't be risking their necks for some money and glory.

The pair sat in silence for a while, Draco's shoulder warm against his, both of them watching the giant squid prod curiously at the Durmstrang ship. "At least tomorrow all the fuss will be over," Draco murmured. "The champions will be chosen and the rest of us can just get on with things until the first task."

"Yeah." Harry wished the tournament was the least of his problems. "Draco, I don't know what to do. I can't let Dumbledore know I'm onto him, but I can't just keep pretending I'm oblivious, it's killing me. Trying to pretend Ron's comments about Slytherins don't bother me, that Hermione's nagging isn't overbearing. I can't even hang out with Neville without them getting suspicious, let alone anyone else." The other heirs were doing well in starting some inter-house friendships, but Harry still felt trapped. "Sometimes I just want to say fuck it and come sit with you at the Slytherin table, let the pieces fall where they may. What does it matter if Dumbledore knows I've ruined his plan? He's going to find out eventually."

“Antagonising Dumbledore is a dangerous game,” Draco warned. “He’s more manipulative than any Slytherin, and sneaky about it. If you go against him outwardly without the proper precautions, you could end up expelled, or worse. Being the Boy-Who-Lived won’t protect you from everything.”

“I know,” Harry said with a groan. “I know I can’t. I just... it feels like I’m letting him win.”

“If you were letting him win, you wouldn’t be sat here talking to me,” Draco pointed out. “Not every battle is a big Gryffindor confrontation, y’know. You keep telling me you have a Slytherin side; let that out to play for a while. Work in the shadows. Be sneaky.” He smirked. “Beat him at his own game.”

Harry let the idea roll around in his head for a minute. He’d have to start slowly. “I think I need to send some letters,” he said eventually. “I’m going to need allies outside of the castle as well as in it.” It was time to start letting some of his secrets out; time to find out who he could really trust. He couldn’t dismantle Dumbledore’s grasp on the wizarding world without some help, after all. He’d been toeing around the edge of it, afraid Dumbledore would find out and he’d be done for, but Draco was right. He had a Slytherin side, it was time to use it.

“Right now?” Draco asked, tensing. Harry shook his head.

“Later.” He was far too comfortable to leave just yet. “For now I just need a bit more peace and quiet.”

“Oh. I can go, if you’d...”

Harry rolled his eyes, tugging on Draco’s hand before the blond could go anywhere. “You don’t count, you daft git,” he said with a roll of his eyes, his cheeks pink. It was definitely just because of the cold.

Draco settled back down, his hand still in Harry’s. Boldly, Harry leaned in closer, letting his head fall onto Draco’s shoulder. “I hate Halloween,” he muttered under his breath. Draco’s cheek tilted to press against his hair, his body a warm line against Harry’s.

“I’m sorry about your parents,” he said softly.

The pair sat there under the tree for almost half an hour, Harry’s head on Draco’s shoulder, breathing quietly in the cold October morning. By the time they parted — Draco worried Pansy would be looking for him, and Harry thinking the same of Ron and Hermione — Harry still had the bad feeling in his gut, but he felt calmer. More ready to face the day.

It wasn’t quite the hug Sirius had ordered, but it was good enough.

. . .

True to his word, he went up to the Owlery after parting ways with Draco, calling Hedwig down. “Hello, girl,” he greeted fondly, stroking her head. “Won’t be a minute.” There was a writing desk in the corner of the Owlery, and Harry dug a quill and some parchment out of his bag, sitting down with a thoughtful frown.

The first letter on Harry's list was to Bill Weasley.

Dear Bill,

Hope it's okay that I'm writing to you. You did say to keep in touch, after all. I expect the others have already told you about the tournament, but the champions get chosen tonight. From what I heard, the twins tried to put their names in, but they didn't get past the age line.

I was wondering something — you work for Gringotts, right? Do you know a goblin called Gorrik? I had some dealings with him the summer before third year, and I was wondering how he was doing. What exactly does a curse-breaker do? You said you brought home treasure — is all of your job raiding old Egyptian tombs, or do you ever break curses on people, too?

Hope you're doing well,

Harry

There. Enough of a hint for Bill to hopefully connect some dots — and enough that if Bill was in Dumbledore's pocket, he would go to the headmaster about it, and Harry would know soon enough. If Dumbledore thought Harry was aware of the curse on him, he'd no doubt start sniffing around.

He grabbed a second piece of parchment, thinking a little longer before writing this one.

Dear Charlie,

The secret is out; the tournament is almost underway. Are you planning to come watch some of it? Is that why you said you might see us sooner than expected?

It's a shame the tournament means quidditch is cancelled, though. I was looking forward to using some of the stuff I practiced this summer in a real match. I guess it'll have to wait until next year.

I'm curious — is the Ministry in Romania like the Ministry here? The Durmstang students are pretty quiet about where they're from and how things work, and I was wondering if all European wizarding communities were the same. Do they have a Wizengamot like we do? Are the seats inherited in the same way? No worries if you don't know, I just thought I'd ask. I've been looking into things like that a little more here, and I'd be interested to see if it's much different elsewhere.

Hope you're doing well,

Harry

If Bill and Charlie put their letters together, they could probably get a pretty clear idea of what Harry was really implying. Harry sealed the letters and tied them to Hedwig's leg, hoping both Weasley boys were still living at the Burrow for now. He didn't want to accidentally send her to Egypt or Romania!

She soared off into the horizon, and Harry sighed to himself, officially out of excuses for avoiding Ron and Hermione. He had other letters to write, but they could wait until Hedwig was back.

He thought about going to the library, pretending to do homework until Hermione eventually found him, but it was no use; halfway down the main staircase, he heard a call of his name. “There you are!” The pair hurried towards him. “Mate, you missed it — Fred and George tried to put their names in, but the age line wasn’t fooled by the potion. They got these massive beards, it was brilliant!” Ron enthused. “Where were you?”

“Owlery.” Let them think he was writing to Sirius.

“Oh. Well, we thought we’d go visit Hagrid, we haven’t been to see him yet this term.”

While Harry didn’t really want to spend that much time with Ron and Hermione today, he couldn’t think of a good excuse — and he did owe Hagrid a visit. So he found himself outside once more, this time heading towards the hut. The Beauxbatons carriage was parked close by, no doubt so Hagrid could keep a close eye on the enormous horses.

Visiting with Hagrid was just like old times — if a little bizarre, what with Hagrid wearing his interesting-looking suit. All became clear when they went to head up to the castle for the feast, and the headmistress of Beauxbatons stepped out of her carriage.

“We’ve lost him,” Harry declared when Hagrid started walking alongside the large woman, oblivious to his student companions. Hermione giggled.

The three of them headed up to the castle, which was abuzz with excitement. They found a seat by the twins, who looked no worse for wear after their experience with the age line.

“I hope it’s Angelina!” Fred enthused. “But any Gryffindor will do.”

“As long as it’s not Pretty-Boy Diggory,” Ron muttered under his breath. Harry rolled his eyes.

It was the fastest a Hogwarts feast had ever been eaten. Everyone was wolfing down their food, desperate for the champions to be announced, but up at the head table Dumbledore seemed to be savouring every bite.

After what felt like an age, the plates cleared, and he stood.

Harry’s pulse ticked up, but he couldn’t tell if it was in exhilaration or dread. He still had that bad feeling, he’d been carrying it around all day, and now the champions were about to be announced his stomach was bubbling with something that wasn’t entirely excitement.

Viktor Krum, the first champion. A strong choice — if Krum was as good at magic as he was at flying, he’d be a real contender. He’d already proven he could think on the move.

Fleur Delacour — the girl who looked like a veela. Harry knew literally nothing about her, but her schoolmates seemed disappointed. Though perhaps that was just because they hadn’t been chosen.

When the Hogwarts champion was announced, Harry was almost knocked off his bench by the force of the noise coming from the Hufflepuff table. He beamed, getting to his feet and applauding. “Nice one, Cedric!” he called, ignoring Ron’s scowl at his side. Cedric turned and grinned at him on his way up. Harry was glad; Hufflepuff deserved a little glory.

Sitting down, Harry finally let himself relax, grinning as it took several minutes for the Hufflepuffs to quiet down enough for Dumbledore to speak. There, it was done, the champions were chosen, he had survived another Halloween feast.

And then the fire in the Goblet turned red again.

Harry’s heart turned to ice as the parchment shot into Dumbledore’s hand. The entire hall was so silent you could have heard a pin drop. Everyone stared at Dumbledore, who stared at the parchment. Then he looked up. His eyes fixed on Harry. Oh, no.

“Harry Potter.”

Chapter 21

Harry's knees barely supported him as he started walking down the aisle between the Gryffindor and Hufflepuff tables, keeping his head down and his gaze forward. Whispers were filling the hall, the eyes on him like a physical pressure against his skin. No one was applauding.

Dumbledore urged him through the same door the three champions had walked, into a small side chamber. The three looked up at him, confused.

"Cedric, I didn't do it," Harry blurted, speaking for the first time since his name emerged from the Goblet. "Please, you have to believe me — all of you. I didn't put my name in, I didn't do it."

Cedric's brow furrowed, but before he could ask for an explanation the door opened once more, and Ludo Bagman strode in, beaming. Cold dread entered Harry's heart when the man introduced him as the fourth Triwizard champion.

"I can't be!" he insisted. "I'm too young, I didn't put my name in!"

"But 'e is just a boy?" Fleur Delacour said, a puzzled look on her face. "Zis 'as to be some sort of joke, non?"

"No joke! Harry's name came out of the Goblet, he's magically bound to compete, just like the rest of you!" Bagman's voice was far too cheerful considering the circumstances.

There was a loud noise, and the door slammed open. All three heads of school entered, followed by Mr Crouch, as well as Professors McGonagall and Snape. Harry glanced at Snape with a helpless expression; the man's face was tight, and pale. Nobody looked happy, except Bagman.

Fleur immediately hurried to her headmistress, speaking in rapid French, and the tall woman surveyed the gathered crowd with contempt. "Dumbly-dorr," she said eventually, her voice icy. "Explain."

"I don't remember anything in the rules saying the host school is allowed two champions," Karkaroff agreed. Dumbledore had a look of mild concern on his face, but otherwise seemed quite unruffled. Harry glared at him; was this his fault?

The two heads of the foreign schools continued to question Dumbledore, furious that not only had a second Hogwarts champion been chose, but an underage one at that. Eventually, Dumbledore cleared his throat. "Harry, did you put your name in the Goblet?" he asked, as if he was merely commenting on the weather. Harry glared at him.

"No, I didn't!"

"Obviously 'e is lying!"

“Did you ask an older student to put your name in for you?” Dumbledore continued, still in that frustratingly calm tone.

“No! I don’t want this. I don’t want to be part of the tournament!” Harry insisted. Surely there had to be a way out?

“Well, it’s a bit late for that!” Bagman crowed, chuckling. “The Goblet of Fire is a binding magical contract! Pretty dire consequences for breaking it.”

“But I didn’t enter!” Harry argued. “How can I be bound in a contract I didn’t consent to?”

“Headmaster, I really don’t think we should be rewarding Potter’s... theatrics by allowing him to compete,” Snape sneered. If Harry didn’t know better by now, he would’ve been raging at the man. Beside him, McGonagall was wringing her hands anxiously.

“I demand to be allowed to resubmit the names of my students!” Karkaroff said, Maxime nodding at his side.

The argument continued, Karkaroff threatening to leave, and things just went downhill when Moody entered the room. Even though he was saying all the things Harry was thinking — that someone was doing this to put him in danger, that it had to be someone powerful to fool the magic of the Goblet — it rankled to have the man be the only person outwardly on his side, speaking in such a way that it was immediately dismissed as the ramblings of a paranoid old auror.

When things came to a tense silence, everyone seeming to realise there was nothing they could do about it, Bagman clapped his hands together with a grin. “Right, shall we crack on, then? Champions,” he announced, drawing the attention of the four teens. “The first task is designed to test your daring, so we’re not going to be telling you what it is.” Harry stared flatly at the man as he went on about courage in the face of the unknown — was he serious? They were just going to do the tournament? Was no one but Harry even slightly alarmed by the circumstances?

When they were given all the information necessary, Maxime and Karkaroff didn’t stick around long, taking their champions with them. Dumbledore sent Harry and Cedric off, and soon Harry found himself in the Entrance Hall, walking alongside the Hufflepuff. He paused, looking up at the tall boy. “You believe me, right, Cedric? That I didn’t put my name in?” Cedric looked somewhat conflicted, and Harry’s heart sank. “Right, no, of course you don’t. Why would you? Who wouldn’t love to be in the Triwizard Tournament? As if I haven’t had enough of life or death situations. As if Famous Harry Potter could possibly need more attention.” His tone was bitter, and Cedric winced.

“I didn’t say that! I just... it’s all a bit mad, isn’t it?”

Harry snorted. “Just a bit. Seriously, Cedric, even if I did manage to get my name in, how the hell would I have tricked the Goblet into picking a fourth person? I don’t want to compete! I want you to be the Hogwarts champion, I was thrilled when you got announced! Please, just... I didn’t do this. I don’t want to compete against you, or anyone, but I’m stuck here. I just need you to believe me.”

Cedric stared at him for a long moment, then his shoulders slumped, and he ran a hand through his hair. “I believe you.”

Harry blinked, the words echoing in his head. “Really?”

“Really. You’re clearly not happy about this, and I don’t think you’re that good a liar,” the Hufflepuff added with a brief grin. “Besides, like Moody said; I reckon you have to really know what you’re doing to mess with the Goblet like that.”

Harry couldn’t help himself; he wrapped his arms around the Hufflepuff’s waist, relief flooding him. “Thank you,” he breathed. That was one person — one student — who believed him. He let go, flushing. Cedric’s cheeks were pink too. “I’m sorry about all this. You were supposed to be the one, and I came in and stole your thunder.” Hufflepuff finally had a moment in the sun, and Harry had to ruin it all. Cedric shrugged.

“Not your fault,” he dismissed. “And it’s all for Hogwarts, eh?”

Lips pursed, Harry didn’t respond. He doubted the rest of the school would see it that way.

They parted ways at the stairs, but Harry didn’t go up to Gryffindor Tower. He wasn’t ready to face that yet. Instead he went to the dungeons, only one destination in mind. A place he’d never been, but seen on the map enough times to find his way to. He knocked cautiously. The door opened, and dark eyes greeted him. “I thought you might show up.”

Snape beckoned him into his quarters, and Harry barely got the chance to look around before he was wrapped in a tight hug. “Oh, cub!” It was Remus, his grip almost painful. “I came as soon as Severus told us. Merlin, Harry, what happened?”

“I don’t know!” Harry said once Remus’ grip loosened, looking up earnestly at the two adults. “I didn’t put my name in! Dumbledore says I have to compete; it’s a binding magical contract, apparently!”

“Unfortunately, he’s right,” Snape declared. “The Goblet of Fire is a very old, very powerful magical artefact. Once it selects you for the tournament, you must compete in each task unless you die or are disqualified, or risk losing your magic.”

“How do I get disqualified?” Harry asked. Snape’s face was grim.

“Previously, champions have been disqualified for trying to kill or severely injure another champion.” Oh. Maybe not, then.

“So I’m screwed, is what you’re saying?” Harry surmised. “Great. Whoever’s trying to kill me is finally going to get their wish. Do you think it was Dumbledore? He didn’t look all that put out by it all. And he’s certainly powerful enough.”

“I think the headmaster has other plans for you, and he wouldn’t risk them on something like this,” Remus said gently. “I think this came from… the other side of the board.”

Voldemort, then. Fantastic. Harry felt his hands begin to shake, the shock setting in, and within moments he was being led to a chair and handed a mug of hot chocolate. “Breathe, cub," Remus murmured, his hand solid on Harry's shoulder. "Just breathe."

"I can't do this!" Harry said, his voice strangled. "I'm fourteen! I don't know nearly as many spells as the others, and sheer dumb luck will only get me so far! I'm going to die in this sodding tournament!"

"You will not die." The words came in a firm hiss, and Harry's head snapped up, meeting Snape's near-black eyes. "You're not an idiot, Potter. You're a darn sight more powerful than you give yourself credit for, and after teaching you this summer I have every faith in your ability to survive this tournament. You will have help wherever you should need it — surely you didn't expect us to just throw you to the wolves?"

Harry blinked. Snape took a step back, looking a little surprised by his own outburst. By his side, Remus smiled. "Severus is right, Harry. You're a talented young man, and we'll do whatever we can to make sure you get through this in one piece. Now, why don't you head up to bed? I daresay after all this excitement you could use the rest."

Now that the shock was fading, Harry was pretty exhausted. He gulped down the hot chocolate, feeling the sugar rush through him. "Okay," he said eventually, once his pulse had returned to normal. "It'll be fine. Everything is fine." He looked up at the two adults. "You really think I can do this?" The tournament was supposed to challenge even the of-age wizards. How could Harry compare?

"Absolutely," Remus assured. "You don't have to win. You just have to finish." He took Harry's empty mug, setting it on the coffee table. "Now go on, up to the dorms with you. Call Sirius when you get there, would you? He wanted to come with me, but we didn't want to risk it."

Harry got to his feet, eagerly accepting one last hug from the werewolf. "Thank you," he murmured. "Both of you." He glanced up to Snape. "I'm sorry to barge in. I just... I needed..." He trailed off, the words not quite making it to his throat. He needed reassurance, and he had come to Snape, regardless of whether Remus had been there or not. What was the world coming to?

To his surprise, Snape put a hand on his shoulder, just for a second. "I told you to come here if there was an emergency," he reminded. "I rather think this qualifies."

Harry offered the man a tentative smile, which didn't last long when he geared himself up to head to Gryffindor. Time to face the music.

.-. .

To his surprise, Gryffindor Tower was in the middle of a party when he arrived, and he was immediately dragged into the middle of it. "Brilliant, Harry!" Katie Bell cheered.

"If it couldn't be me, at least it's a Gryffindor!" Angelina enthused. Harry was congratulated and slapped on the back by people he barely even knew, the common room full of cheering and applause. Harry tried to insist he hadn't put his name in, but no one wanted to listen.

A hand wrapped around his shoulder, and Harry fought it as it yanked him backwards, only to find himself looking up at a familiar freckled face. “Alright, Harry?” Fred asked, brows furrowed in concern. He’d pulled Harry up into the dormitory stairwell, and George was leaning against the wall opposite.

“I didn’t do it,” Harry insisted. “I don’t want this!”

“We know,” the twins said, and Harry faltered. George grinned at him.

“You were pretty vocal about not wanting it, mate,” he pointed out.

“And if you’d figured it out, you would’ve told us,” Fred agreed.

“The question is, whodunnit?” George’s words made Harry grimace.

“Moody thinks whoever did it is trying to get me killed. I’d say he’s pretty on the money there.”

Both twins shared a grim look. “Well, you’ll show ‘em, won’t you, Harry?” Fred said, clapping him on the shoulders.

“Yeah, if anyone can do it, it’s you!” George grinned, brown eyes bright. “Give Diggory a run for his money, won’t you?”

Harry appreciated their optimism, but he didn’t want to compete against Cedric. Really all he wanted right now was to go to bed. He said as much, and George ruffled his hair. “We’ll get this winding down, don’t worry. You’d better scarper quick, though,” he added, glancing over Harry’s shoulder. “Creevey brothers, incoming.”

Harry winced. “Thanks, guys.” He squeezed past them and hurried up the stairs, ducking into his dormitory with a relieved sigh. To his surprise, he wasn’t the only one in there. Ron was lying on his bed, an odd expression on his face when he looked up at Harry.

“There you are,” he said. “Congratulations, I guess.”

“What do you mean?” Harry asked warily, though he could already see where the conversation was going. His stomach churned.

“You figured it out. Got your name in the Goblet. You could’ve at least told me, we could’ve both entered.”

“I didn’t put my name in, Ron,” Harry insisted, tiredness creeping into his voice, making him sound snappish. God, he just wanted to go to sleep. “Someone else must have done it.”

“Yeah, right,” Ron said, still with that awkward smile-grimace on his face. “You can tell me the truth, y’know. You were gone all morning, did it take you a while to figure it out?”

“I told you, I was in the Owlery this morning! I don’t know how my name got in the Goblet, but I don’t want this, Ron!” Harry was getting angry, now, and so was the redhead.

"I'm not stupid!" he argued. "All that talk about not wanting it, that was just to throw us off, wasn't it? I guess even you can't resist a thousand galleons of prize money."

"Is that really what you think of me?" Harry asked. "That I'd put myself in this much danger for money? And lie about it?"

"Well what else am I supposed to think?" Ron retorted hotly.

"You're supposed to trust me!" Harry grabbed his pyjamas, throwing them onto his mattress. "But there's not been much of that, lately, has there? I'm going to bed."

"Right, sure — got to get your beauty sleep," Ron taunted. "Probably got a photo call in the morning, or something."

Harry gave the redhead one last glare, then climbed onto bed and dragged his curtains shut forcefully, putting up his privacy wards. Safe in the silencing bubble, he let out a frustrated scream. Ron was infuriating!

Though, he supposed, he couldn't exactly get at the boy for not trusting Harry. It wasn't like Harry had done that in return, after all. Even if it was things like this that proved why.

Not bothering with his pyjamas just yet, Harry dug the two-way mirror out of his bag, leaning back against his headboard to talk to Sirius. When the man's face appeared, the concern in those grey eyes made a lump rise in Harry's throat. "Oh, pup," he murmured softly, knowing. Harry swallowed back a sob. How had things gone wrong so quickly? "Pup, it's okay," Sirius soothed. "You're going to be fine. I love you. It's okay."

Harry squeezed his eyes shut, taking a deep breath. He wished he could believe that.

.

After Harry left, Severus and Remus sat in silence, staring into their mugs of tea. "Could it be Karkaroff?" Remus suggested. Severus shook his head.

"Too obvious. He'll know he's being watched." Severus ran a hand through his hair, and Remus' heart ached. His cub was in danger, and he just had to sit back and let it all happen!

"Are we sure this isn't some plot of Dumbledore's?" he asked doubtfully. The headmaster had proven he was happy to risk Harry's safety in the past. "Some kind of test of Harry's skills?"

"I don't think he did it, but he's certainly willing to sit back and let it happen," Severus said. "He looked quite pleased about it, actually. Which is why I think it's the Dark Lord's doing — Dumbledore wants him to return before Harry is seventeen, that much is clear. If this is the first step towards that, he's not going to stop it."

Remus couldn't stop the growl that emerged at that. The thought of Harry being used as some pawn in Dumbledore's awful schemes made him sick to his stomach. He opened his mouth to speak, but was interrupted by a knock at the door. A look of annoyance flashed across Severus' face.

“What now?” he grumbled, getting to his feet. Remus stayed carefully out of sight, ready to duck into the bedroom should it be someone who wasn’t supposed to know he was there. To his surprise, it was Draco Malfoy. “Uncle Severus,” the boy breathed desperately.

Severus ushered his godson into the room, shutting the door. “What’s the matter?” he asked, concern in his dark eyes. “Is something wrong?”

“Someone’s trying to kill Harry, aren’t they?” Draco said, his already pale face near-transparent with fear. “Getting him involved in this bloody tournament. Is it my father’s fault? Is this what he’s been planning all summer? I should’ve tried harder to listen in—I could have stopped this!”

Severus brought Draco into a firm hug; probably the only person other than Remus he’d willingly show such affection to. “Draco,” he murmured, one hand on the boy’s hair. “This is not your fault. I doubt it’s your father, either — Lucius is far too much of a braggart to have planned something like this without getting me involved.” Remus stifled a snort. “Whoever put Harry’s name in the Goblet is likely out to harm him, yes. But it’s nothing you could have prevented.” He released Draco to look him in the eye. “Draco, you must be careful. If there are Death Eaters in the castle that we don’t know about, they could be watching you. It wouldn’t do for someone to go to your father with word of your… change in loyalties.”

If possible, Draco got even paler, but he clenched his jaw and nodded tightly. “I’ll be discreet,” he promised. “I— you’ll tell me if you learn anything, won’t you? About Harry?”

“Potter’s circumstances are not yours to worry about,” Severus pointed out, his voice surprisingly gentle. “All you need to do is support him, and keep yourself safe. No one can know how you feel about him.”

That finally brought some colour to the young Malfoy’s face, his cheeks turning pink. “Uncle Severus, I—” Draco sighed. “I suppose.” He looked up, his eyes finally landing on Remus, and his shoulders tensed as he realised the Gryffindor had witnessed everything. “Professor Lupin, I…”

“I’m not your professor anymore, Draco,” Remus said warmly. “I told you in the summer, you’re welcome to call me Remus. Don’t mind me here, I didn’t want to interrupt. But I am glad Harry has you to look out for him.” He gave the boy a knowing look, and Draco’s blush rose higher.

“Well, the idiot Gryffindor isn’t very good at looking out for himself, is he?” he muttered. He took a step back, reaching half-heartedly towards the door. “I should go to bed. I’m sorry for disturbing your evening.”

“Nonsense,” Remus waved him off. “Severus is your godfather, you have every right to come to him. If you need some privacy…”

Draco shook his head. “It’s almost curfew, I really should go.” What little vulnerability the boy had dared show his godfather was locked up tight at the presence of a near-stranger. It made Remus’ chest ache, but he didn’t blame the boy.

"Be careful, Draco," Severus warned again, squeezing the boy's shoulder. Draco nodded, hurrying from the room, and they were alone once more.

Remus crossed the room, laying gentle hands on Severus' shoulders, his chest pressing to the Slytherin's back. "Look at you," he murmured with amusement, lips dragging across the man's jaw. "Two teenagers in one night coming to you for comfort. One of them a Gryffindor, even." He grinned impishly. "You've gone soft, Severus."

The Slytherin growled, turning sharply to pin Remus with a glare. "I have not," he insisted. Remus chuckled.

"It's okay to admit it," he teased, a hand sliding down Severus' lapel. "You can glare all you want, but I know the truth. I know there's something here." He gave a gentle pat to the man's ribs, right over his heart. "I've been rather selfish with it all these years, but I suppose I can learn to share." Honestly, seeing Harry start to warm to Severus, seeing the Slytherin let down his barriers in turn — Remus had never been more in love with him in his life. For the first time, it felt like he could truly have this. All of it. All the best parts of his life, together.

Suddenly, Severus' arm snaked around his waist, pulling him in close. Severus' breath was hot on his neck, sending a thrill down Remus' spine. "I assure you, wolf," he murmured, in that dangerously sexy drawl. "Despite what those foolish teenagers may believe, despite what you think — the last thing I am is soft." His thigh slipped between Remus', making the Gryffindor aware of a rather large bulge in his trousers. Remus smirked.

"Hmm, I suppose you're not, are you?" he agreed, allowing Severus to push him towards the bedroom door, his blood running hot through his veins. In the morning, they'd have to deal with the oncoming shitstorm that was the Triwizard Tournament, and Harry's unexpected involvement in it. But the morning was a long way off.

.-.-.-.

There was a heavy knot of anxiety in Harry's stomach when he woke up on Sunday morning, and it took him a minute to remember why. The events of the evening before came rushing back to him, and he pulled his duvet up over his head with a groan. What if he just didn't get up? Ever? They couldn't make him compete if they couldn't get him out of bed.

Sadly, he knew better. A quick Tempus charm showed him it was well into breakfast time, and he grimaced. He had no hope of avoiding everyone at this time of day.

He was the only one in the dorm when he drew his curtains back, and he was glad for the silence as he got dressed. He wasn't ready for another argument with Ron, yet.

Unfortunately, once he got down to the common room he was greeted by another round of raucous applause. The thought of going to the Great Hall and dealing with the people down there sounded like hell, but he needed to eat, and he couldn't stay in Gryffindor Tower when it was like this. He could already see the Creevey brothers on their way over. Maybe he could sneak into the kitchens for breakfast; he'd seen it on the Marauder's Map.

The decision was taken out of his hands, however, when he stepped out of the portrait hole to be greeted by Neville Longbottom's smiling face — and a sausage sandwich wrapped in a napkin, which was quickly shoved his way. "Brought you this," Neville said by way of greeting. "Figured you wouldn't fancy going down to breakfast."

"Neville, you're a godsend," Harry declared, accepting the sandwich graciously. "Is it bad down there?"

Neville winced. "It's... not great." That admission meant it was likely terrible, and Harry cursed. It would be second year all over again, only instead of thinking he was out to kill them, half the school merely thought he was trying to steal the limelight and break the rules. Fantastic. "Want to go for a walk?" Neville offered. Harry nodded; anything to avoid the crowds of people.

Harry didn't have his cloak, but he did have his Silverling's jacket on, so the pair of them headed down to the Entrance Hall and out to the grounds. Everyone they passed stared at Harry, and whispers followed in his wake. It was awful.

"Of course I knew you didn't do it," Neville said with a roll of his eyes, when Harry asked if the round-faced boy believed him. "You hate attention. Ron's still being an idiot about it, though — I don't think he really believes you did it, but he's jealous all the same." The taller Gryffindor snorted. "If he was going to have an issue with being sidelined, he shouldn't have befriended the Boy-Who-Lived," he added in a mutter. "Maybe he thought being friends with you would get him some glory of his own."

The offhand remark reminded Harry suddenly of the letter from Gorvak, and the revelation about Mrs Weasley. Some glory of his own... The pieces were coming together, and Harry didn't like the picture they were making.

He glanced around. They were by the lake, not far from where Harry had sat with Draco the day before, and there was no one around. "Neville," he said slowly. "I know I've asked you to keep a lot of secrets for me so far. But there's a few more I haven't told you yet. Can we— would you sit down with me for a bit?" He gestured to the tree he'd sat by yesterday. Neville's face was serious.

"You don't have to tell me if you don't want to, Harry," he said. "It's okay." Harry shook his head.

"No, I want to. I trust you." He did — Neville had proven himself a solid friend in the last year, and Harry hated to think there were things Ron and Hermione knew that he didn't. Besides, maybe the other boy could help him make sense of it all. He needed people on his side.

The two of them settled down at the base of the tree, facing each other, and Harry put up the strongest privacy wards he knew. Only then did he tell Neville everything — about Sirius and Remus, everything that had happened the year before and over the summer, right up to the letter from Gorvak. Neville listened patiently, his face going through a myriad of emotions. The only thing Harry didn't tell him was the truth about Snape's relationship with Remus, and his status as a Death Eater spy; some secrets weren't his to share.

“Blimey,” he said when Harry finally finished. “I thought it was bad when you told me about the magic block. You have been busy, haven’t you?” Harry snorted.

“Just a bit, yeah,” he agreed. “So you see where I’m at. I need to start getting things together — I can’t just sit around and wait until Dumbledore reveals his plan. I can’t let him get away with stealing my money and my magic. I have to be ready to reveal it on my own terms.”

“Well however me and Gran can help, we’d be happy to,” Neville assured without hesitation. Harry’s shoulders slumped in relief. “I figured you weren’t at your muggle relatives this summer, from some of the things you said in your letters. But... I’m glad you’ve got somewhere to go that’s safe, where you’re happy.” Harry raised an eyebrow at him, and Neville’s gaze grew pointed. “I’ve seen the bruises, Harry, and the scars. And I can tell from the way you talk about them. Those muggles aren’t good people.”

Harry grimaced; he hadn’t realised Neville had seen so much. The boy was more observant than anyone gave him credit for. “All that doesn’t matter, now,” he dismissed, not wanting to get into it about the Dursleys. “I won’t have to stay with them for more than a day or so, hopefully.”

“That’s good,” Neville agreed. He grew pensive for a moment. “This is serious, isn’t it, Harry? Like, world-changing serious.”

“Yeah, you could say that.” Harry bit his lip. “Look, Nev, if you want to stay out of it, I completely understand. Being around me is always a bit chaotic, but things are only going to get worse.”

“Shut up, Harry.” The force in Neville’s voice made Harry blink, taken-aback. “I might not be the bravest Gryffindor around, but you’re my friend, and what’s happening to you isn’t right. Dumbledore — he can’t be allowed to just keep doing whatever he wants and manipulating people for the Greater Good. I’ve been thinking about it ever since you told me what he did last year. I can’t promise to be much help, but I’m in this with you, whether you like it or not.”

Harry had never seen Neville so firm about anything — he was starting to see what the Sorting Hat had in mind when he put Neville in the house of lions. “Okay, then,” he said eventually. “That’s — yeah. Thanks, Nev.” Neville was blushing now, and Harry smiled. “You’ve already been loads of help. I wouldn’t have learned Occlumency without you, and your gran. I was going to write to her, actually — when I make my move, when it all comes out, I’ll need to change my Wizengamot proxy. If we can’t get Sirius’ name cleared... d’you... would she be willing?” He couldn’t take the Slytherin seat from Dumbledore’s hands, but he could take the other three.

“She’d be honoured, Harry,” Neville assured. Harry grinned; that was one load off his mind. It wouldn’t happen for a while yet, but it was good to know he had something in place.

“Good. And —” he paused, hesitant. “I’ve been thinking about telling the other heirs the truth. About Dumbledore, and even Sirius. If I can get them on my side, it’ll be easier to get him out of power when — when I need to.” It made him a little queasy, the thought of actively conspiring against the headmaster, but it would need to happen eventually. The wizarding world couldn't be brought forward with Albus Dumbledore holding it back. "I just don't know if I can trust all of them."

"Well, no one's said anything about you being an heir yet," Neville pointed out. "None of them trust Dumbledore. I think they'd be willing to listen to you, if you wanted to tell them. They're good people."

Harry realised that Neville must have known most of them for far longer than Hogwarts; they probably played together as children. Grew up together. If Neville said they were trustworthy, he believed him. "Oh, and there's one more thing," he added, bracing himself for perhaps the most volatile secret of all. Neville's brows drew together warily. "Y'know last year I said Draco Malfoy wasn't as bad as we thought he was? I'm sort of— friends with him, now?" In all his story he hadn't said a word about Draco, but it didn't seem fair to be trusting Neville with so much but not that.

Neville stared at him. "That's it, right? No more secrets after that?" he checked. Harry ran over things in his mind.

"No, no, don't think so. That's the last one." Well, there was the slight maybe-crush he'd developed on the blond Slytherin, but Neville didn't need to know about that. He'd warm him up to the idea of Draco being his friend first.

"Okay," Neville said eventually. "If you're friends with him, he can't be as bad as he seems."

"Really? Just like that?" Harry had expected some sort of argument, at least. Neville shrugged.

"I thought Cassius was kind of a prat before I started talking to him, but he's actually alright. Even if he is crap at Herbology. If you say Malfoy's not a prat, then I believe you."

"Oh, no, he's definitely still a prat," Harry assured with a laugh. "But... a good one?" He felt his cheeks turning red, and hoped Neville didn't notice.

"Well, you're a bit of a prat sometimes, too, so I s'pose it all balances out," Neville said with a teasing grin. Harry made a noise of offence. "You went after a basilisk, knowing it was a basilisk, with nothing but your wand at the age of twelve! You spent all of last year wandering about at night when there was a murderer out there who wanted to kill you!" Neville pointed out. "Hell, you followed Quirrell down to the Philosopher's stone in first year without a second of hesitation!"

Harry was beginning to regret having told Neville the truth about his first two years at Hogwarts over the summer. "Okay, yeah, but in my defence I was under a Compulsion charm for the first two years," he pointed out.

"And what's your excuse for last year?" Neville asked, lips curled up at the edges. Harry sighed, running a hand through his hair.

"I'm a prat?" he admitted eventually, shrugging apologetically. "I don't know what you want me to say, Nev — we both know I'd be lying if I said I won't do it again."

Neville laughed, shaking his head. “As long as you’re aware of your faults,” he said magnanimously. He glanced at Harry in consideration. “I take it Ron and Hermione don’t know about any of this?”

“They know Sirius is innocent. They were there for that bit,” Harry told him. “But they don’t know about Seren Du, or about Dumbledore. Or Draco. I, uh, wasn’t planning on telling them. Not until I can be sure.”

“If Ron’s mum is on Dumbledore’s side, they might be as well,” Neville realised softly. Harry nodded.

“I always thought it was a bit weird how right as I got to the platform, a wizarding family appears and just starts talking really loudly about muggles,” he admitted. It all felt a little too coincidental, the way the Weasleys had been there to help him, and Ron had been the first friend he met on the train. Even with Hermione and the troll, though he knew Quirrell had been the one to let it into the school, how had she been the only one in danger? He didn’t like to believe it, but now he knew how manipulative Dumbledore could be, he wouldn’t put it past the man. Ron and Hermione were the perfect best friends to keep him oblivious. To keep him in check.

“You deserve better than Ron, anyway,” Neville said with a huff. “He’s always been jealous of you. You don’t even realise when you’re holding yourself back for his sake. Like all those new clothes you got that you hardly ever wear. Your trunk’s full of them, but you’re still in the same five shirts that are way too big.”

“You really have been paying attention, haven’t you?” Harry mused, watching Neville blush bashfully. “Do you know how Hermione’s taking the whole champion thing, by the way?” Harry hadn’t seen her since the Halloween feast.

“She was telling a couple of third years last night that you didn’t put your name in by yourself,” Neville told him. “But she’s not stupid, of course she can see that. That...”

“That doesn’t mean she isn’t one of Dumbledore’s,” Harry finished for him. He sighed, looking out across the lake. “I guess I’ll stick with it and see. Ron’s not talking to me, which is fine, but if I start pushing her away I’ll let Dumbledore in on my plans a little earlier than expected. Besides, maybe she’s trustworthy. I don’t know yet.”

“Maybe,” Neville agreed.

Harry knew they had to go back inside, he had to face the crowd eventually. But his head was spinning with all the information he’d given Neville, all the new information he’d gained from that.

So much for a quiet, normal year.

Chapter 22

Going into the castle for lunch was exactly as awful as Harry thought it would be.

The Great Hall was full of people when he and Neville entered, and all of them looked up at his entry, immediately breaking out into whispers. Harry made to turn around, but Neville yanked him forward. “You’re not going to the kitchens,” he insisted. “Come on, let’s sit with Parvati.”

The Indian girl looked up when the two boys sat beside her, and she glanced at Harry. “You look awful,” she declared, making him snort.

“Thanks.”

Her gaze turned considering. “Some people are saying you didn’t put your name in.”

“I didn’t,” Harry insisted. The Hogwarts rumour mill was a vicious thing, but there wasn’t a single scrap of it that didn’t end up past Parvati Patil or Lavender Brown at some point or another. If Harry wanted an accurate idea of peoples’ opinions, she was the one to ask. “What am I looking at, here?” He pointedly ignored all the people staring and murmuring around him. Parvati twirled a lock of hair around her finger, lips pursing.

“Obviously there are those who think you tricked your way in. Others think you bribed someone else to put your name in for you. Most people are realising that still wouldn’t explain how there’s four champions. But they don’t care whether you did it on purpose or not — they’re just angry it happened at all. Especially the Hufflepuffs,” Parvati reported. Harry sighed; it could be worse, he supposed.

He didn’t really blame the Hufflepuffs, to be honest. He’d be angry too in their shoes. He was stealing the glory from their rightful champion, overshadowing Cedric with all his drama. They had a right to be pissed about it.

He helped himself to some chicken, staring resolutely at his plate, even when the whispers rose dramatically. He didn’t look up until a throat cleared behind him. Expecting some nosy person asking about the Goblet, Harry turned with a scowl on his face, which dropped quickly when he saw the person stood there. “Cedric?” he greeted, bewildered. Cedric flashed him a nervous smile.

“Hiya, Harry. Mind if I sit here?” He gestured to the seat beside him. Harry blinked.

“At the Gryffindor table?” he asked dumbly.

“Yeah.” Cedric had his shoulders squared, but his eyes looked like he might bolt any minute. Everyone was staring at them.

“Yeah, go ahead.” Harry scooted up the bench to make room for the sixth year, staring at him incredulously. “What’re you playing at, Cedric?” he asked under his breath. Cedric’s smile widened, more confident, and he reached for a bread roll.

“We’re in this together, aren’t we?” he said, loud enough for his voice to carry over the whispers of people shamelessly eavesdropping. “Both Hogwarts champions and all. Besides, if the rumours are true, and someone is out to do you in over this, then I reckon it’s my responsibility to help you through this in one piece.”

Harry could hardly believe what the older boy was saying. He was willing to give up his moment, to share it with Harry, just so people would leave him alone? “You are such a Hufflepuff,” he hissed. Cedric beamed.

“Thanks, Harry. Knew you’d see it my way. Pass the soup, would you?”

.-.-.-.

After Cedric’s little display at lunch, things got easier. Several of the Hufflepuffs still seemed resentful, but they were keeping it to themselves; if Cedric wasn’t angry with Harry, they couldn’t be either. After a couple of days, people had mostly settled down about the whole thing. Parvati was right; people didn’t care how it had happened, they just wanted to see what would happen next. And a fourteen year-old boy, Boy-Who-Lived or not, being part of the most dangerous event to happen in centuries... that was something to talk about.

Harry got used to hearing people discuss his chances of survival as he walked through the halls. He told himself it was better than hearing them jeer at him, or call him a glory-hunter. He just had to not let it get to him.

Easier said than done.

Hermione didn’t seem to know what to do with herself, flitting between Harry and Ron with an anxious look on her face, refusing to abandon the redhead but not wanting Harry to think she was on Ron’s side. If that wasn’t a clear sign to Harry that he couldn’t trust her, he didn’t know what was; if she was really his friend, she’d tell Ron that he was being a jealous arsehole and needed to get over himself. How could she be like that after the way he’d treated her last year, when he thought Crookshanks had eaten Scabbers?

Because of that, Harry was spending most of his time trying to avoid people, hanging out in the dorms — when Ron wasn’t there — or in the library. It was one such afternoon that Harry was walking through the common room, on his way up to see if his dorm was empty, when an arm draped over his shoulder. “Hey, Harry. Mind if I borrow you for a bit?” It was George, and Harry automatically looked around for the other Weasley twin. He was nowhere to be found. How odd.

“Yeah, sure.” Perhaps Fred was waiting wherever George was taking him; he braced himself for some kind of prank planning. Instead, he was surprised when George led him to his own dorm room, which was empty. Harry had never been in there before; it was messier than his own, with evidence of Weasley’s Wizard Wheezes all over the place. One of the beds had the curtains firmly shut, and a two-foot radius of clean floor all around it. George shut the door, heading over to the bed warily. “Oi, Kenny, you in here?” He edged closer to the bed, knocking on the invisible wall that surrounded it. There was no response. He turned to Harry, grinning. "Kenneth always keeps his bed warded when he's not in here. Says he doesn't trust us." He had a look of wide-eyed innocence, as if he couldn't possibly understand why. Harry snorted. It must be hard, being in the same dorm as the Weasley twins. "Anyway, Harry, take a seat."

George gestured to the bed next to his own, which Harry assumed was Fred's, and Harry perched hesitantly on the mattress. "What's this all about?" he asked. "Where's Fred?"

"He's off with Angelina," George replied with a fond grin. "I won't ask what they're doing."

Harry snickered; he hadn't realised Fred and Angelina were a thing. "What do you need me for, then?" Surely George wasn't pulling a prank without his brother's assistance?

George sat on his own bed, facing Harry, a surprisingly serious look in his eyes. Harry's pulse ticked up. What was wrong? "When I was about your age," George started, looking like he was choosing his words very carefully. "I started realising some... things. Things I didn't even tell Fred about, at first. It's a weird thing, growing up — so much stuff happening, you're not sure what's normal and what's not. I bet it's even worse for you, what with the people out to kill you and whatnot."

Harry stared at him, utterly baffled, but George ploughed on. "It was getting to the point where even Fred noticed I was acting funny, but I still didn't say anything. We'd always been the same, you see, and I didn't want to start admitting that there might be something different in there. Then Charlie came home for a visit, and he could tell right off the bat. He sat me down, much like we are now, and he talked to me, and he gave me this book. And... now I think it's time I pass that on, because I might be wrong, but I think you need it more than I do, now."

The redhead reached under his blanket, pulling out a slim hardback book with a plain blue cover. He held it out to Harry. "The cover is charmed, so people don't know what it is just by looking at it." He tapped it with his wand, and suddenly it changed, the title written across the front in black lettering. 'A Wizard's Guide To Wizards: A How-To for Male Homosexual Relationships'.

Harry's cheeks burned.

"Like I said, I could be wrong, in which case, feel free to tell me to fuck off," George said hastily. "And even if you're not sure yet, or you're not ready, or whatever, that's totally fine. You can read the book, decide it's not for you, and give it back. But... I can't imagine how torn up about it I would have been if I hadn't had that little gesture of support from Charlie. It might've taken me years to tell Fred, or anyone else. And talking to Lee about it, he said muggles can be a bit funny about that sort of thing. I didn't know what kind of tripe they might've filled your head with."

George shuffled forward so his knee bumped Harry's, his brown eyes earnest. "I just don't want you going through this alone, Harry. You're our little brother, regardless of what Ron thinks, and it's my brotherly duty to make sure you know we love you regardless." He smirked wickedly, and there was that Weasley twin mischief. "And, of course, to make sure you're properly informed about everything." He winked salaciously, and Harry blushed impossibly redder. But George sobered up again, tapping the book cover until it was plain once more and nudging it into Harry's hands. "It's all yours. If you've got any questions, you can come to me. Or write to Charlie, he'll listen. And if you're not ready — hell, if you're never ready — that's fine. The offer's good for whenever. I'm giving you the information, but I'm not pressuring you to make any sort of decision or announcement. Only you can know when it's time for that."

Harry stared at the book in his hands, flipping it open to the index page. Homosexuality in wizarding culture... Marriage rights for same-sex couples... Helpful spells for intercourse... That one made his eyes go wide, and he slammed it shut again. George chuckled.

"Yeah, it's a lot to take in. You don't have to read it all at once. It's just... information is a good thing to have. Even if it might not be relevant to you."

For a moment, Harry thought about giving the book back to him, saying 'thanks, but no thanks' and leaving, never speaking of it again. This was different than the twins teasing him about being a little star-struck over Bill. This was all the conversations his dorm-mates had about girls that Harry didn't feel part of; all the times he found himself glancing at boys in the halls, or in the quidditch locker rooms, or on the street; all the times his heart beat faster when Draco Malfoy smiled at him. This was listening to Uncle Vernon going off about 'queers' and wondering if the man was right, if he really was a freak after all.

This was real.

"Do many people know? About you?" he asked quietly. George shrugged.

"Fred, and Charlie, and Bill. I think Ginny knows. Lee, obviously. Angie and Katie and Alicia, and Oliver. Few others here and there; boys I've kissed, some of their friends, y'know. I don't hide it, but I don't exactly go around telling everyone I meet. Mum and Dad know, though I don't know if Mum's really come to terms with it yet. Merlin knows she still hasn't about Charlie or Bill. At least with Bill there's still hope for grandkids. He likes both," he explained. "As if there aren't other ways of having kids than just knocking a girl up."

"There are other ways?" Harry asked, perplexed. A tiny bubble of hope rose within him; did that mean that even if he was... he could still have kids?

"Well, there's always adoption," George pointed out. "But there's a spell that can take the stuff from two blokes and put it inside a woman and make a baby. It's all in the book. As long as you've got a woman willing to be pregnant for you, you can have a kid. Rumour has it there's some wizard in Spain working on a potion to make men get pregnant, but that all sounds a bit much if you ask me," he added with a grimace. Harry's eyebrows shot up — men being pregnant? Magic really could do anything!

"Wizards don't really care about it all," George continued. "At least, they never used to. With more and more muggleborns coming in, people are getting weird about it. But two blokes or two girls can get married and everything. Their kids are legal heirs — or they can name other heirs, if the family magic is compatible and they don't want kids of their own. You're always going to find people who are dicks about it, but that's life, unfortunately."

“What’s it like?” Harry’s question was barely louder than a whisper, and he couldn’t bring himself to elaborate. Luckily, George seemed to get what he meant.

“I’d imagine it’s about the same as being in love with a girl,” he said slowly. “I’ve not been with many guys. If you want to talk logistics, that’s a very different conversation.” Harry shook his head quickly, feeling like he was going to burst from all the blood rushing to his cheeks, and George snorted. “Maybe after you’ve read the book. But without getting all mushy on you, being able to be honest about it, being myself... it’s like finally putting on shoes that actually fit, after ages of wearing three sizes too small.”

Harry knew what that felt like, quite literally. His whole body ached with the need to feel that way. Was it really just that simple? “Hey, George,” he said tentatively.

“Yeah?”

“Thanks for the book. I think it’ll be really informative.” He sounded like he was thanking him for a book about Herbology!

“You’re welcome, Harry.”

Come on, Potter, he told himself. Gryffindor courage. “And... George?”

“Yeah, Harry?”

“I... I like boys. I’m gay.”

There. He’d done it. George’s eyes went wide. Harry realised his hands were trembling.

“First time you’ve said that out loud, innit?”

Harry nodded, wondering why his heart felt like it was about to hammer right through his ribcage. It was just two little words! George quickly moved across the gap, sitting beside Harry, and drew him into a tight hug. “I’m proud of you, kid,” he murmured. “It’s gonna be alright, you’ll see.” George held him for a long moment. Harry focused on remembering to breathe. “You’ve got loads of people on your side, whether you choose to tell people or not. Because you don’t have to, if you don’t want to. I won’t even tell Fred.”

“No, it’s okay,” Harry assured. “I don’t mind family knowing. I just... don’t want the whole world to know, yet.” As much as he liked to pretend it wouldn’t be a big deal, he knew better. He was Harry Potter. He couldn’t sneeze without making the front page of the Prophet.

“Don’t blame you, mate.” George had his chin propped on Harry’s head, and he pat him on the back gently. “I’m gonna let go now. That alright?” Harry nodded, and they separated, George offering him a grin. “Thanks for trusting me, Harry.”

“It’d be dumb not to when you’d already figured it out,” Harry pointed out.

“I didn’t know for sure,” George insisted. “I just... had a feeling. And regardless, even if you weren’t gay, it’s good to offer all sorts of information. The spells in that book should be taught alongside the usual contraception charms. Well, maybe not all of them,” he added, turning pink beneath his freckles. “But the important ones. People need to know the information is there.”

Harry remembered the excruciatingly painful assembly last year, in which the entire third year class had spent an hour listening to Madam Pomfrey talk about hormones and birth control and ‘the changes of the body’. Not one word had been said about relationships that weren’t between a man and a woman.

“So, while we’re in a sharing mood,” George perked up, smirking once more. “Do you have a thing for my big brother, Harrikins? Any of them. Well, not Percy. Please, Merlin, not Percy.”

Harry made a face at the prospect. “I don’t fancy your brother!” he insisted. “Any of them. I told you! And I don’t fancy Cedric Diggory either,” he added hastily, when George made to open his mouth again.

“Really? I do a little bit,” George admitted shamelessly. “He’s proper fit. A bit too nice, though. And straight. Mad for that Ravenclaw girl, what’s her name, the seeker. Chang.” He shook his head mock-sadly. “Can’t win ‘em all. So is there anyone? What sort of wizard gets your wand going?” He cackled at the mortified expression on Harry’s face. “Come on, Harrikins! If the other boys can talk about which girl’s boobs they want to touch, I’m pretty sure you and I can talk about blokes. No? Too soon?”

“Draco Malfoy,” Harry blurted, eyes shut. He couldn’t help himself. It was the truth, he could finally own up to that. He had feelings for Draco Malfoy.

George stared at him. “So, like, you hate him but he’s pretty so you want to snog him, or...?”

“We’ve been friends since last year, in secret.” If he was trusting George with all his other secrets, he could trust him with this. “I... I really like him, George. Genuinely.” A lot more than he probably should. He didn’t dare look at George, wondering if that was a step too far. Liking boys was one thing; liking Slytherins was another.

“I mean, I don’t really see it, personally,” George said eventually. “But I guess you have always been a bit obsessed with him. And he is quite pretty, objectively. Too pretty for my tastes, but to each their own. Blimey, Harry, you’re not making it easy on yourself, are you? Does he know?” He shook his head. “Of course he doesn’t, you said you’ve not told anyone but me. I think you’re in luck, though, mate — no boy who cares that much about his appearance is completely straight.”

Harry blinked, sure he was imagining things. George grinned at him. “What, you think I haven’t had my fair share of crushes on snakes? Not all of them are evil. And sometimes even the evil ones are frustratingly attractive. I’m more surprised by you two being secretly friends than the fact that you fancy him.” He shuffled around until he was lying on his stomach on the bed, head propped in his hands and feet kicking in the air, fluttering his eyelashes over-dramatically. “Tell me everything, Harry,” he gushed, as if they were at a pre-teen sleepover or something. Harry laughed.

And he did.

....

The biggest surprise of his fourth year so far was quite possibly how much he enjoyed his Potions class, now that Snape didn't actively hate him. Sure, he had to play his part, but much like arguing with Draco, it was far easier to deal with when Harry knew the other party didn't mean it. He graded Harry (mostly) fairly, and Harry knew that whatever was going on outside the dungeons, Severus Snape would never give one single flying fuck about it. He didn't care about Harry's fame, or the Triwizard Tournament, or anything. Even the other teachers were treating him differently — Professor Sprout took five points off him for 'misting incorrectly' the other day. In the dungeons, he was Just Harry.

That meant Harry was actually somewhat looking forward to Potions on Friday afternoon, Hermione walking with him down to the dungeons, chattering on about Summoning charms. Harry indulged her — well, ignored her — having perfected the Summoning charm over the summer with Remus. When they arrived outside the Potions classroom, Harry realised all the Slytherins were wearing some kind of badge — and seemed to be waiting for him to notice. Seeing the smirk on Draco's face, Harry looked closer.

Support Cedric Diggory — the REAL Hogwarts Champion

"That isn't all they do," Draco said loudly. "Look." He pressed the centre of his badge, and the red lettering changed, turning green and forming the words 'Potter Stinks'. Unable to help himself, Harry snickered.

"Oh, really funny," Hermione spat, pulling Harry away by the arm. "Very witty."

"Want one, Granger?" Draco drawled, holding out a badge. "I've got plenty. Only, don't touch my hand, I've just washed it."

Out of the corner of his eye, Harry saw Ron step away from the wall with a furious expression on his face, wand in his hand. Harry ignored him, smirking at Draco. "I'll take one, Malfoy," he said. The Slytherins all stared at him.

"Excuse me?"

"I'll take a badge. Are they free?" Harry almost laughed at the expression on Draco's face; one he was becoming very familiar with. It was the face that said 'I'm not sure what the hell you think you're playing at but I know better than to try and use logic when it comes to you'. Complete with the little furrow on his forehead, it was quite adorable.

"Harry, don't antagonise him." Hermione seemed to think he was joking. "Just walk away."

"Listen to your little pet bookworm, Potter," Draco said, giving the curly-haired girl a disparaging look. That set Ron off, the redhead clearly spoiling for a fight. He raised his wand, but Draco was quicker. At the exact same time, both of them spoke.

"Furnunculus!"

"Densaugeo!"

The two spells met in mid-air and ricocheted off; Harry ducked, but Hermione wasn't quick enough, and Malfoy's spell hit her square in the face. Ron's spell bounced over to hit Goyle, and the large Slytherin bellowed, covering his face with his hands. When he lowered them, his skin was covered in huge, oozing boils.

Hermione, too, had her hands over her face — her mouth, specifically. She wouldn't move them, letting out tiny, panicked squeaks. Ron lunged forward, dragging her hand away. Her front teeth were starting to resembling that of a beaver, growing out past her bottom lip and well on her way towards her chin.

"What is going on out here?" The voice was soft, but it carried through the hallway. Snape had arrived.

Draco and Ron began stuttering excuses, and Snape looked exasperated behind his glare. "Goyle, Hospital Wing," he said, when Draco pointed out the damage done to the Slytherin.

"Malfoy got Hermione, too!" Ron argued.

"I don't see any difference, Professor!" Pansy Parkinson crowed, laughing. Tears began to gather in Hermione's eyes.

"Granger, go," Snape dismissed. Hermione grabbed her bag and practically sprinted from the corridor. "The rest of you, inside, now."

The class began to file in, and Harry slid into line behind Draco. "Oi, Malfoy," he hissed. Draco glanced back, shooting him a panicked look. Harry smirked at him. "I was serious about that badge."

The look on Draco's face said that he clearly thought Harry had finally cracked, but eventually he gave an irritated huff and turned to his table, shoving past Harry.

As he did, something large and round dropped into Harry's robe pocket. Harry grinned.

.-.

They barely got five minutes into class before there was a knock on the door. Snape glared like he was going to set someone on fire for the disruptions; which only increased when it turned out to be Colin Creevey, requesting Harry for... photographs? Harry shot Snape a desperate glance, begging him to refuse, to keep Harry down in the dungeons. The man merely curled his lip in distaste.

"Potter, take your things and get out. I expect ten inches on the proper method for deriving an antidote by next class."

Groaning under his breath. Harry shouldered his bag and followed Colin Creevey out of the classroom, the third year beaming up at him in awe. "Isn't this amazing, Harry? You being the fourth champion and everything?"

"Yeah. Amazing," Harry repeated flatly. "What's all this about, Colin?"

"They didn't really tell me, I was just sent to get you. They want all the champions — I think it's for the Daily Prophet?" That made the boy beam even wider.

"Great. Fantastic." Harry ran a hand through his hair. "Just what I need." A thought occurred to him, and he reached into the pocket of his robes, pulling out the badge Malfoy had given him. He fixed it proudly to his chest, ignoring Colin's look of confusion.

When they arrived at the right room, Colin waved a cheerful goodbye, and Harry entered in trepidation. It was a small unused classroom; he and Draco had used it to play cards in a couple of times. Almost all the desks had been pushed against the wall, except three that had been stood end-to-end and draped in velvet, with five chairs behind them. Ludo Bagman was there, talking to a blonde witch Harry had never seen before, and he grinned at Harry's entrance. In the corner was a man with a big wizarding camera. All the other champions were there too, looking like they'd rather be anywhere else. At least Harry wasn't the only one.

"There he is! Champion number four!" Bagman's gaze dropped down to Harry's badge, and he faltered. "Ha! Funny joke, there, Harry, very clever. In you come, in you come, it's nothing to worry about. Just the Wand Weighing ceremony — got to check everything is in working order before the first task. Then just a quick little interview with Ms Skeeter here, and you'll be on your way. Have you met before, Harry? This is Rita Skeeter, she's doing a little piece on the tournament for the Prophet."

Harry eyed the woman, disgust rising. This was Rita Skeeter, was it? The woman who had caused so much trouble after the cup with her articles. She was wearing lurid magenta robes, her hair done in elaborate curls and her claw-like nails painted vivid crimson, clutching a crocodile-skin purse. She was looking at Harry like she wanted to eat him alive. "Might I have a quick word with Harry before we start?" Skeeter asked, already pulling an acid green quill from her purse. "The youngest champion, you know, to add a bit of colour?"

"Certainly!" Bagman agreed, but Harry shook his head.

"No, thank you." He didn't want to give Rita Skeeter anything she might be able to use against him. Both adults blinked.

"Come now, Harry, it's just a quick interview," Bagman encouraged. Harry held his ground.

"I don't want to. I'd rather my name and picture not be in the paper at all, but with the tournament, that can't be helped. But if you want an interview, you interview all of us. Not just me."

"Really, lad, I don't know why you're making such a fuss." Bagman was sending nervous looks back at Skeeter, who seemed incredibly unimpressed.

"E said non, Monsieur Bagman." It was Fleur Delacour, stepping in front of Harry with her arms folded over her chest.

"Harry's underage, you can't interview him without consent of a guardian anyway," Cedric added, standing by Fleur's side. Bagman chuckled awkwardly.

"Really, I think you're all just getting a little worked up," Skeeter said. "Harry, dear, it'll only take a moment, we'll just pop into the other room for some privacy, just a couple of questions." The 'other room' she pointed at was a storage cupboard.

"What part of no are you not understanding?" Viktor Krum joined the fray now, staring down his hooked nose at Skeeter, eyes cold.

"I'm not going anywhere alone with you," Harry declared firmly. "And I refuse to be interviewed unless it's all of us. I shouldn't be here, anyway. I'm not a real champion." He squared his shoulders in a way that made the 'Support Cedric Diggory' badge even more obvious.

Skeeter opened her mouth to argue, but the door opened, and Dumbledore walked in followed by the other two heads, Mr Crouch, and Mr Ollivander. Dumbledore surveyed the situation curiously; all three of-age champions stood between Rita Skeeter and Harry, glaring at the blonde woman. "Is there a problem?"

"I was hoping to get a quick interview with Harry here, but it seems the poor dear's being a little shy," Rita cooed, squeezing past Cedric to rest a hand on Harry's shoulder, her talons digging into his robes. He shook her off.

"Please don't touch me," he muttered.

"Well, it's time for the Wand Weighing ceremony, but I'm sure you'll have plenty of time to interview Mr Potter afterwards." Dumbledore's response was cheerful. Harry grimaced.

The five judges took the chairs behind the velvet-covered desks, while the four champions took seats on the other side. Cedric looked down at Harry and grinned. "Nice badge, Potter."

"I thought so," Harry replied with a wink.

Ollivander was introduced, and the Wand Weighing itself was a fairly painless process. The old man's eyes lit up when he saw Harry flick his wand out of its holster, handing it over. Harry mentally begged him not to say anything about the wand's... interesting history. Luckily, all the man did was describe it, looking it over carefully. He took far longer than any of the others. A stab of horror caught Harry unexpectedly — what if there was a curse on his wand, like there had been on his person?

No, surely Dumbledore wouldn't allow the ceremony to go ahead if he knew there was something wrong with Harry's wand, something Ollivander would pick up on. Eventually, the old wandmaker shot a fountain of wine into a conjured glass. "Very good, very good. All four wands are in perfect condition," he announced. "The champions may proceed."

"Excellent," Dumbledore said, getting to his feet. "Thank you all for coming, you are now free to leave."

"Not so fast, Dumbledore!" Bagman called, hopping out of his seat. "Ms Skeeter here would like some photos to go with her article!"

Skeeter smirked, beckoning the man with the camera forward. “Just a few,” she purred. “And then, perhaps, an interview?”

“What do you think, Rita — all the judges, and the champions?” Bagman suggested. Skeeter’s eyes landed on Harry once more.

“And a few individual shots, of course.”

“I do not see why that is necessary,” Krum groused. “We are all champions here.” He looked back at Harry, who sent him a grateful glance in reply. If there was anyone who understood how awful it was to be hounded by the press, it was Krum.

Skeeter got them all lined up for group photos, putting Harry right in the middle and insisting it was due to his height. “Take that silly badge off, Harry dear,” she fussed, but Harry shook his head.

“No, thank you.”

“Really, lad,” Bagman chuckled nervously. “I don’t think it’s really appropriate. These photos are going in the paper!”

“Exactly. I’m showing school solidarity,” Harry insisted, keeping his voice earnest. Behind him, Cedric ducked his head to hide a grin.

“Harry.” Dumbledore’s voice was gently scolding. Harry gave him an innocent look.

“Sorry, sir. Is this better?” He pressed the centre of the badge, until the words ‘Potter Stinks’ were emblazoned across his chest. Skeeter cried out in alarm. Cedric lost his battle against giggles.

“Harry,” Dumbledore said again. Harry was sure he was pushing the limits, and about to get himself into trouble, but he refused to let Skeeter walk all over him. The Compulsion charm was supposed to make him reckless, after all.

“You’re right, sir; the original is much nicer.” Harry returned the badge to its original phrase, facing the camera with a smile. “Are we ready now?”

The adults seemed to realise they’d lost that battle, and with an indignant huff, Skeeter took her photos, Harry keeping the badge on. He dug his heels in again when she tried to take individual photos.

“If you’re doing them by school, then Cedric and I should take a photo together,” he said, once she’d already taken pictures of Krum and Fleur.

“But that will upset the balance,” Skeeter protested.

“Just take the photo so we can leave,” Karkaroff snapped. “This has taken too much time already.”

Skeeter paled, and was left with no choice but to take a picture of Cedric and Harry stood side-by-side, with Cedric's arm around Harry's shoulder. The badge was still on Harry's robes.

When they were finally allowed to leave, Cedric burst into laughter as soon as they were out of the judges' earshot. Krum and Fleur were still with them, and even they looked amused. "That was fantastic, Harry!" Cedric wiped tears of laughter from his eyes. "The look on her face!"

"I saw the kind of articles she wrote this summer," Harry said with a scowl. "I didn't want her turning this into the next chapter of the Saga of the Boy-Who-Lived. This should be about you three, you're the real champions here."

"She is not a pleasant woman," Krum remarked, shuddering.

"Shooting 'er down was vairy entertaining," Fleur agreed, smirking. "And per'aps you are not so bad, leetle 'Arry." Harry was fairly sure that was a compliment.

"I'm not here to steal your spotlight, any of you," he promised. "I just want to survive this thing and get on with my life."

The three other champions shared a look, then smiled at him. Harry smiled back, hoping desperately that it meant they were on his side. Or, at the very least, not actively hating him.

.-.-.-.

When he got back to the dormitory after dinner, which had been quite the affair when all the champions sat and ate together — especially once people noticed Harry's badge — Harry found Ron up there, scowling. "You've had an owl," he bit out, gesturing to where Hedwig was sat on Harry's bedside table. "And you've got detention with Snape, for skipping class. Tomorrow night after dinner." He looked less smug than he should have about that, making Harry wonder if he, too, had detention for hexing Goyle. Harry just hoped Snape wouldn't make them serve it together.

Ron didn't stick around long, and as soon as he was gone Harry made a beeline for his owl, offering her a treat from his drawer once he removed the two letters. His stomach twisted, anxiously anticipating what the Weasley boys' response might be.

Hi Harry,

Of course it's okay for you to write! I'm glad to hear from you. Especially once I heard about your name coming out of the Goblet. Are you okay? I expect it's all a bit mad at the school there. The twins said you're handling it well, but if I can help, let me know.

I do know Gorvak, though I don't work for him often, and I'm surprised to hear you met with him. I saw him the other day, actually. He's well, and sends his regards. He also says the matter you last wrote to him about has been taken care of. Is everything alright, Harry?

Being a curse-breaker involves lots of different things — yes, I work on tombs a lot. But I also crack wards on old houses where the owner has died or become unable to give people access, or sometimes where the wards have gone wrong and turned on their owner. And yes, I've worked on cursed people in the past. It's a difficult thing, though; curses interact strangely with a person's magical core, especially if they've been on someone for a long time. Not something you want to go messing around with unless you know what you're doing.

I'm trying to get time off work to come see at least one of the tasks. I know Charlie will be at the first one, if you need to talk to him. He'll pass on a message to me if you need him to, as well.

Look after yourself, Harry,

Bill

Harry let out a long breath, reading the letter over a second time, and then a third. Bill had seen Gorрак — and mentioned him. Had Gorрак let him know about Harry's situation? The redhead certainly seemed to have gathered that something was up; and that Harry didn't want to talk about it in letters. He opened the next one, wondering if it would enlighten him.

Harry,

I can't believe they're making you compete! It's ridiculously unfair. When I got your letter, I thought you were calling in that favour I owe you from our seeker's match in the summer, but then I realised the champions hadn't been announced when you wrote it.

The Ministry in Romania is a little different, as there are fewer old pureblood lines — despite being a big country, it's a fairly small population, compared to Britain. There's sort of a Ministry alliance between a lot of the Eastern European countries — Romania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Serbia, and the like — that all work together to keep things running smoothly. Their equivalent of the Wizengamot is very much the same, however.

I'm glad to hear you've been looking into that sort of stuff. It's only proper. If you have any questions, Bill or I are always happy to help.

See you soon, kid.

Charlie

PS - I heard Ron's being a twat about the champion thing. Ignore him. You're still family, whether he likes it or not.

The end of the letter made Harry grin, assuaging a worry he didn't even know he really had. He held up both letters, relieved to see that neither of them seemed suspicious about Harry's questions. With any luck, they were oblivious to their mother's dealings with Dumbledore, and could be brought around to Harry's side.

Then his gaze caught on a couple of sentences, and things began to click. Charlie will be at the first one. I thought you were calling in that favour. See you soon, kid. He remembered

Charlie's words when he came to see them off at the platform; I might see you all sooner than you think.

If he was reading those hints right...

The first task was dragons.

Chapter 23

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Harry had almost forgotten about the Wand Weighing ceremony, in the face of potentially having to fight a dragon. Thus, when the article in the Prophet came out, it was a bit of a shock.

Somehow, despite Harry's total refusal to give Skeeter anything, she'd managed to make the article about him anyway. It continued over several pages, barely said anything about Fleur and Krum (and misspelled both their names when it did), and didn't mention Cedric at all. There was an enormous picture on the front page that had clearly been cropped from the photos taken of Harry and Cedric together; Cedric's arm was still around Harry's shoulders. The only saving grace was the 'Support Cedric Diggory' badge on his robes, which the picture version of Harry was delighting in changing to 'Potter Stinks' and back again every few seconds.

'Harry Potter: The Unexpected Champion'

All of you will be familiar with the tragic tale of the Boy-Who-Lived. He saved us all and lost everything in the process, left orphaned and alone. Now he's grown and at Hogwarts, and appears to be making waves once more.'

Without any real quotes from Harry — though she'd thrown plenty in that Harry didn't recall ever saying in his life — she'd apparently interviewed several people about him. Harry almost choked on his pumpkin juice when he reached the part about his 'close companion and rumoured girlfriend, Hermione Granger'.

"Well, this is a load of bollocks," Cedric declared cheerfully from the Hufflepuff bench behind Harry, raising his wand and setting his issue of the Prophet on fire. "Alright there, Harry?"

After Harry's little stunt with the badge, Cedric and the other Hufflepuffs had warmed considerably to him. The Slytherins had stopped wearing the badges — apparently they weren't funny if Harry wasn't upset by them — but Harry still had his attached to his school bag. "Yeah, just wondering if it's possible to sue for this," Harry replied, frowning at the article. Surely he could get her for something — defamation of character, or slander, or misrepresentation of a minor. Surely it couldn't be legal to publish that amount of information about him.

"You should ask Susan," Neville piped up from the other side of the table. "Her aunt's head of the DMLE, she'd probably know."

Harry kept that in mind, though he didn't run into Susan until his second class of the afternoon. That meant he spent the whole day listening to people — mostly Slytherins — quote their favourite parts of the article at him, laughing.

"Just ignore it, Harry," was Hermione's helpful advice, as if it was that simple. As if he should just let Skeeter write whatever she wanted about him. This wasn't some silly little school-wide paper, this was a national newspaper.

Finally they had Charms with Hufflepuff, and Harry made sure to get that early, grabbing Susan as soon as she and the other Hufflepuff girls rounded the corner. "Hi, can I ask you something?"

"Sure, what's up?" Susan was one of the few Hufflepuffs who hadn't hated him for even a little bit of time, and Harry would be forever grateful to her for it. Even now, Sally Anne Perks and Megan Jones were glaring at him over Susan's shoulder.

"I was wondering if you knew if it was possible for me to sue Rita Skeeter for that article in the Prophet. I didn't provide any of those quotes — you'll have several witnesses who can assure you that I didn't consent to any sort of interview — and half of what she's said is so wrong it's downright insulting, for me and for the other champions. Can I get her for slander, or something?"

Susan's brow furrowed. "Technically it would be libel, since it's written," she mused, thinking. "If you didn't consent, and your guardian didn't consent, then she shouldn't have even quoted you at all. I don't blame you for being furious, that whole article is just... ugh." She shuddered. "Tell you what, I'll write to Aunt Amelia before dinner and see if she can do anything. She knows loads of lawyers, and I bet there's plenty of them just waiting to give Rita Skeeter what for." She smiled, hitching her bag further up her shoulder as Flitwick opened the classroom door, beckoning them inside. "I'll take care of it, Harry. I'll let you know when I hear back."

"You're the best, Susan," Harry declared vehemently, hurrying to take a seat next to Neville before he could be forced to sit with Hermione. The Slytherins had teased her about the article, too, and she wasn't in the best of moods because of it.

With any luck, Amelia Bones would get back to her niece before much more damage could be done.

.....

The weekend before the task was a Hogsmeade weekend, and Harry let himself be dragged down to the village by Hermione and Neville. On the walk down, he glanced at the dark-skinned girl. "I'd have thought you'd be hanging out with Ron," he remarked cautiously. Since the article, she was somewhat reluctant to be seen with Harry, as people kept asking her if she was his girlfriend.

"Oh. Well." She began to blush. "I thought we might meet up with him at the Three Broomsticks."

Harry stared at her incredulously. "I'm not sitting with him." Ron was still making it very clear he thought Harry was some arrogant little glory hunter.

"Harry, please, this has gone on long enough."

"I'm not speaking to him until he stops being a dick," Harry retorted hotly. "If you want to sit with him, that's fine, but I'll be elsewhere." It was a miracle he wasn't wearing his invisibility cloak; the only reason he wasn't was because Hermione didn't know Neville knew about it. He really didn't want to deal with crowds today — he'd much rather be in the library researching dragons — but the pair of them had insisted (separately) that Harry needed to get out and have fun.

He didn't get as mobbed as he'd expected, once they reached the village. The rest of the school seemed to be following Cedric's lead on things, and since he was ignoring the Prophet article like the garbage it was, most of them were doing the same. They were all just eager for the tournament to start, now.

Neville dragged them both into Gladraggs, insisting he needed to buy his gran a new hat for her upcoming birthday. Harry wandered the clothing racks absent-mindedly, occasionally picking out something. Since Ron had stopped talking to him, and since Neville had pointed out how much Harry was adjusting his own behaviour to avoid offending the redhead, Harry had started wearing more and more of his new clothes. And, to his surprise, he'd actually grown a couple of inches since last summer. He'd bought the clothes a little big, so most of them were still fine, but... he felt like spoiling himself.

Picking out a couple of shirts and a new jumper, Harry eyed the casual robes curiously. Was it time he bought something a little more wizardly for everyday wear? The only wizarding clothes he had were his school robes and the cloak from Sirius and Remus. He examined a pair of slate blue robes, and Neville appeared at his side. "If you're going for robes, don't get Gladraggs; the size-adjusting charms wear out way too quickly. Go for Malkin's or Twilfitt's, and get them tailored," he suggested. "Also, I think you'd look good in burgundy," he added, gesturing to the rack of soft wool jumpers Harry had just come from. Harry grinned.

"Thanks, Nev." He doubled back and picked up a burgundy jumper in his size.

"Is all that really necessary, Harry?" Hermione asked doubtfully, eyeing the bundle of clothing slung over his arm. Harry shrugged.

"I like them, so I'm gonna buy them."

"But you shouldn't be spending all your money so early in the term!" Hermione protested.

"Why not?" Harry raised an eyebrow at her. "I've got plenty more. Not like anyone else is using it for anything," he added sharply, still a little bitter about Dumbledore taking from his vaults.

"You've never been one to care about fashion, Harry."

He didn't understand why she was making such a big deal about him buying a couple of jumpers. "I've been going around in my cousin's hand-me-downs my whole life. I don't have to anymore. I don't want to."

Hermione didn't have anything to say to that, but the frown on her face made it clear she thought his spending was frivolous. Harry threw in an extra pair of trousers just to spite her, shoving it all in his bag on the way out. He caught sight of a familiar crocodile-skin handbag, and he threw himself around the corner suddenly. Skeeter walked right by him, chatting away to her photographer friend. “She must be staying in the village,” he muttered to Neville and Hermione. “She’ll be at the first task, then.”

Harry vindictively hoped he had a case built up against her by then. Amelia Bones had written back promptly, assuring him that it was quite illegal to quote a minor without consent, and the entire article was easily a case of libel, but that Rita Skeeter was a tricky one and it might take some time. Harry was just happy to know there was a lawyer working on it.

They finally made it to the Three Broomsticks, where Harry put his foot down once more about sitting with Ron. “Harry, please,” Hermione urged, but Harry wasn’t having it.

“Hermione, maybe you should just let it go,” Neville suggested gently.

“Oi, Harry!” Harry whipped around at the call, seeing Cedric sat in a booth with Cho Chang, who was waving at him. “Want to join us?”

Cedric was a lifesaver. “See you, Hermione. You coming, Nev?” He didn’t wait for either response, heading straight for the booth. Luckily, Neville was right behind him.

“Hi, Harry,” Cho greeted brightly. “And… Neville, right? Neville Longbottom?”

“Yeah, it’s nice to meet you,” Neville returned.

“You looked like you could do with a bit of a save,” Cho said by way of explanation. “Besides, Cedric keeps ditching me to go sit with you at lunch, so I thought I’d see what all the fuss was about.” She gave him an impish wink, and Harry remembered the time last year where he’d briefly thought he had a crush on her.

“Well, here I am,” he said dryly, holding his arms out as if to say ‘ta da’. Cho laughed. “I’m gonna grab drinks, can I get you anything?”

He bought a round of butterbeers for all of them despite their protests, bringing them back to the table with barely a glance over to where Hermione was sat with a scowling Ron. He’d definitely made the better choice, he thought when he took his seat back in the booth. “So how’s it going?” Cho asked, sipping at her drink. “Have you been driving yourself as mad as Ced trying to prepare for the first task?”

Harry shrugged. He hadn’t told anyone of his suspicions about dragons yet, just in case he was wrong. “Kinda. I’ve been brushing up on spells I think I might need, but it’s hard to prepare for the unknown. I figured I’d just wing it and hope for the best.”

“Your approach to all of life’s challenges, then,” Neville cut in with a smirk. Harry rolled his eyes, but couldn’t deny it.

“I hope they don’t keep all the tasks a mystery,” Cedric mused. “That’d be a nightmare.”

“I think it’s just this one. Supposed to test our quick-thinking and all that.” Considering the last time he’d faced an enormous bloodthirsty beast, he’d stabbed it with a sword he’d pulled out of the Sorting Hat, Harry didn't think his usual method would work for him. All the books on dragons said their eyes were their weakest spot, but he couldn't exactly call Fawkes and have him claw them out. Again.

They tried to keep conversation off the task, but everything turned back to it eventually. It was hard not to, when it was all Cedric and Harry could think about.

He looked up when the door opened, and a familiar imposing figure ducked into the bar. It was Hagrid, walking with... Professor Moody?

The professor's magical eye spun in its socket, landing quickly on Harry. He nudged Hagrid in the side, nodding in Harry's direction. Hagrid grinned, waving, and started trying to squeeze his way through the crowd. "Alright, you lot!" he greeted. If he was confused by Harry's choice in company, he didn't show it. "Harry, I was wonderin' if yeh'd come down to meet me tonigh'? I need yer 'elp with summat. After dark, if yeh don' mind." He gave Harry a pointed look. "It'll be cold, so bring yer cloak." The emphasis made it pretty clear to Harry what he was implying, but just made him look like a weirdo to the rest of the table.

"Uh, yeah, sure, Hagrid." What could he possibly want? Hagrid beamed, nodding.

"Great, I'll see yeh then. Enjoy yer afternoon." With that he went to go sit beside Moody at the bar, leaving Harry blinking after him in confusion.

"What was that about?" Cho asked, frowning. Harry shrugged.

"Not a clue." He'd find out tonight, he supposed.

.-.-.-.

Harry's first stop Sunday morning was the library, to scour all the books on dragons a second time. His little outing with Hagrid the night before had confirmed his fears, although at least now he knew he didn't have to fight or subdue the dragon. Just get past it.

Because that was so much easier.

It was pretty quiet in the library, as it often was on a Sunday morning. He wasn't entirely surprised to find Viktor Krum sat near Harry's usual table, a stack of books beside him. Harry gathered his own reading material, then approached quietly. "Mind if I join you?" he asked. Krum glanced up, then shrugged, gesturing to the empty seat.

He hadn't spoken much to the Durmstrang champion. They had eaten dinner together a few times, all four champions sitting together, but Krum had stayed mostly silent throughout. Still, he'd stood up for Harry against Skeeter, so that counted for something.

"Only a few more days," Harry murmured. Krum's dark eyes flicked up to him.

"Are you scared?" he asked, sounding more curious than taunting. Harry chuckled breathlessly.

"I think I'd be daft not to be, at least a little bit. You?"

"I haff learnt to ignore fear," Krum replied simply. "In quidditch, fear stops you winning."

"Your Wronski Feint at the cup was pretty fearless," Harry agreed. Krum raised an eyebrow.

"You vere there?"

"Yeah, you were brilliant! I play seeker as well," he added, blushing slightly. "For Gryffindor. Cedric is the Hufflepuff seeker, actually. Maybe it's a sign. We're all reckless and crazy, exactly what the Goblet is looking for." That actually drew a chuckle from the reserved Bulgarian wizard.

"I vonder if Fleur plays quidditch," he mused absently. "It vould be fun to all fly together sometime."

Harry took a moment to realise the international quidditch star had just invited him to fly with him, and almost had a small heart attack. "We'll have to ask," he said instead, trying to keep it cool. Krum hadn't bat an eyelash at him being Harry Potter. Harry refused to kick up a fuss about him in return. "Did you bring your broom with you, then?"

"I bring my broom everywhere," Krum assured. Harry hadn't seen him out flying; then again, he probably kept it secret, so he wasn't disturbed. If the hordes of fangirls got excited about watching him in the library — there were three around the corner, even now — they would lose their minds at watching him train for quidditch.

Bored of reading the same paragraph over and over in the hopes it might magically provide him with an answer, Harry let his gaze trail over to the books Krum had out. He froze. Several of them were about dragons. The ones that weren't were on eye-related hexes.

Krum knew about the dragons.

Harry shut his book quickly, straightening up. If Krum knew, and he knew, and Madam Maxime knew — which meant Fleur knew — then... Cedric was the only champion going in blind. Harry couldn't allow that. "I've got to go," he declared suddenly, grabbing his bag and getting to his feet. "I'll see you later, yeah?"

Krum only nodded tersely, going back to his reading, and Harry about sprinted from the library. "Point Me Cedric Diggory," he muttered with his wand out, hoping the older boy wasn't in his common room or somewhere else Harry couldn't get to.

He was in luck. The spell led him to the Transfiguration courtyard, where Cedric was lying on a bench with his head in Cho's lap and a book propped in front of him, surrounded by several other Hufflepuffs. He looked up when Harry came thundering towards him. "Harry? What's the matter?"

"Can I talk to you for a second? Privately?"

Cedric shot him a bewildered look, but stood up and followed Harry across the courtyard and out of earshot. "It's dragons," Harry told him urgently. Cedric's brow furrowed. "The first task. It's dragons. Krum knows and Fleur knows and I didn't want you to be the only one going in with no idea."

"How— Hagrid," Cedric realised, remembering the odd interaction the day before. "Harry... seriously?" He looked pale.

"Seriously," Harry confirmed grimly. "I'm not sure on the specifics, only that we have to get past it, I think. I know it's cutting it a little close to actually be helpful, but, well; it's a start."

"No, it's great," Cedric assured. "Thanks, Harry. I owe you one."

Harry waved him off, and the two parted ways once more, Cedric no doubt off to the library to do what Harry had just finished doing. As Harry walked away, he heard a different voice call his name; this one much less welcome. It was followed by the telltale sound of Moody's wooden leg on the flagstones. "That was a decent thing you did for Diggory there, Potter," he said gruffly.

"It's only fair," Harry replied, not sure how he felt about Moody eavesdropping on his private conversations. It was bad enough that Snape had done some snooping and confirmed that the eye could see through invisibility cloaks.

"Come with me." It was snapped like an order but he had no grounds for it, and Harry shook his head.

"No thank you, sir; I said I'd meet Neville in the common room." A lie, but Moody didn't need to know that. Harry had no desire to be alone with anybody that Albus Dumbledore trusted.

"Potter!" Moody called, but Harry was already walking.

"Sorry, sir, I'm already late. Another time!" He turned the corner, and hurried for the stairs before Moody could chase after him.

Everybody knew about the dragons. Now Harry just had to figure out what to do about it.

.-.-.-.

Harry was dreaming.

He knew that, because while he was on his broom and wearing his Gryffindor quidditch uniform and flying with the rest of his team, the opposing team seemed to be made entirely of dragons. Huge, terrifying Hungarian Horntails, like he'd seen in the woods. It was also definitely a dream because Harry was playing chaser, the quaffle in his hands as he tried to fly past the dragons without getting set on fire, watching Viktor Krum do an effortless Wronski Feint a few feet away. He was so close, the goal was in sight, he just had to fly a little further and...

He woke up with a gasp, eyes snapping open. It took a minute for his heart rate to go down. Even when it did, his eyes were still wide.

Flying.

Could it work? He was only allowed a wand, but... he'd been getting pretty good at the Summoning charm over the summer. Snape always accused him of being a lazy teenager, so Harry had summoned more things just to be a brat. He was pretty confident he could summon his broom from Gryffindor Tower down to wherever the task was being held, as long as he left the dorm window open.

He relaxed into his mattress — at least, as much as he could knowing that in a little over twenty four hours he'd be facing a real live dragon. He had a plan. It wasn't the most foolproof plan in the world, but it was better than him trying to learn a Conjunctivitis curse strong enough to fell a dragon in a day.

Neville looked over at him when he emerged from bed. "Alright there, Harry?"

"Yeah, actually," he admitted, grinning. "Think I've got it all figured out." Neville's eyebrows rose, surprised.

"The task? Really?" Harry nodded. Neville beamed. "Brilliant."

Hermione, on the other hand, was not so convinced. "How can you be so relaxed?" she hissed at him during Herbology, her own anxiety palpable. Harry shrugged.

"I know what I need to do. No point worrying about it any more," he replied. He'd told her about the dragons, only because she wouldn't stop pestering him about studying between classes to make sure he was properly prepared. He appreciated the thought, but why couldn't she believe him when he said he had it under control?

She looked at him like he was mad. "You're going to get yourself killed!"

"It'll be alright," he insisted optimistically.

Now that the task was almost out of the way, he had some other things to be worrying about.

.-. .

Harry skived off Divination, pretty sure that no one would begrudge him that with the task happening the next day. Instead he went down towards the Forbidden Forest, following the path he'd taken with Hagrid. The dragons were, if possible, even more terrifying in the daylight. Harry refused to let it get to him.

He glanced around the gathered dragon tamers until he saw the one with bright red hair, hanging out in front of one of the tents. Harry edged closer, and sent a pebble flying towards the man with a flick of his wand. It hit Charlie on the arm, and he cursed, whipping around. Harry whistled quietly, popping out from behind the trees just long enough to catch Charlie's attention. His eyes widened, and he hurried forwards. "Harry!" he whispered, wrapping the teen in a quick hug, then ushering him further into the trees before they were seen.
"Shouldn't you be in class?"

"It's only Divination," Harry dismissed with a wave of his hand. "I came to talk to you."

“Calling in that favour?” Charlie presumed, glancing back at the dragons. Harry shook his head.

“Nah, I’ve sorted that. This is about the letter I sent you the other week.” That got Charlie’s attention. To Harry’s surprise, the redhead put up several privacy charms, then leaned back against a tree.

“What sort of trouble have you got yourself into now, Potter?” he asked, his tone fondly resigned.

“Did Bill talk to you about the letter I sent him?” Charlie nodded. “Good. See, when I was in Diagon the summer before last year — Ron told you about that, right? Blew up my aunt?” Again, Charlie nodded, grinning faintly. “Right, yeah, well when I was there, I went to Gringotts, and something a bit strange happened.”

He told Charlie what Gorraak and Farlig had found, watching the redhead’s jaw drop.

“Bill wondered if it was something like that,” he admitted when Harry was done. “He said Gorraak only gets called in for really high-profile cases, inheritance theft and magic tampering and the like. And when he spoke to him, asked him about you, well; Gorraak didn’t say anything, but I don’t think he had to.” Charlie ran a hand through his hair. “Shite, Harry. And you’ve been dealing with this alone ever since?”

“Not completely alone, but that’s a whole other story that’ll take too long to tell you now.” Charlie had already been gone for a little while, his coworkers would eventually wonder where he was. “But safe to say, I don’t trust Dumbledore anymore. And...” Here came the hard part. “Recently Gorraak sent me a list of withdrawals from my vault over the years, to see if Dumbledore had taken anything. He had, and I’ll deal with that eventually, but... Charlie, your mum took money out, too. Way more than she could’ve needed to buy my school things for me.”

That threw Charlie for a loop. He slumped against the tree, blue eyes staring at Harry pleadingly. “Mum? Really?” Harry wished he could tell the man otherwise, but he merely shook his head.

“I don’t know if Dumbledore told her to do it, or she just thought she’d go for it since I wouldn’t notice a few extra galleons missing here or there, but... she did it. I didn’t want to believe it either.”

“It’s been hard, raising seven kids on Dad’s salary,” Charlie said with a sigh. “But to think she’d stoop that low...”

“I’m sorry,” Harry started, but Charlie cut him off.

“Don’t, it’s not your fault. She’s an adult, and she makes her own choices. I just... fuck.” He looked like his entire worldview had been rocked. Harry guiltily wondered if he shouldn’t have kept quiet. “If my family have done you wrong, then I swear on the Weasley name I will make it up to you,” Charlie vowed, his words thick with magic. Harry looked up in surprise. Charlie winked. “Heir Weasley, at your service. Bill’s taking the Prewett seat.”

"Well met, Heir Weasley," Harry responded automatically. "Who has the seats now?"

"Dad, but he tends to just give his voting power to Dumbledore. Politics confuse him," Charlie said, grimacing. "It's one of the reasons Bill and I are thinking about coming home, properly. We want to take our seats; you're not the only one who's getting a little suspicious about the way Dumbledore runs things. After this, I definitely don't want him using my family votes any longer than he has to. We haven't spoken to Dad about it yet," he added, "but we were going to soon. I'll talk to Bill about what you've told me — if that's alright with you — and if he's got any ideas for how to help, he'll get in touch."

"Yeah, I was hoping you'd tell him," Harry agreed. "I wanted to, but I can't exactly trust it all in a letter." It was a weight off his shoulders knowing he had two more people on his side. "I'm going to tell the twins, too. Unless you think I shouldn't?"

"They'll be good allies, and they're definitely not on Dumbledore's side," Charlie assured him. He glanced back at the dragons, which were beginning to get rowdy again. "Look, Harry, I should get back to work. But you've given me a hell of a lot to think about. I'll talk to Bill, and we'll be in touch." He placed a hand on Harry's shoulder. "You sure you don't need any help with the task tomorrow?"

"No, I've got it, but thanks." Harry hesitated for a second, but it was long enough for Charlie to pick up on it, and the redhead pulled him into another hug.

"Good luck tomorrow, Harry. I'll be cheering you on." Charlie grinned, cheeks dimpling. Harry wondered if he'd been a bit hasty in telling George he didn't fancy any of his brothers.

Charlie dropped the privacy wards and strolled back out into the clearing as if he'd never been gone, and Harry watched the dragons for a few minutes more before hurrying back up to the castle.

Two more players on the board.

.

At dinner that night, a scrap of parchment found its way onto Harry's plate, and he grabbed it before anyone but Neville could see. Transfiguration room. Curfew. The handwriting was familiar. He glanced across at the Slytherin table, and nodded.

"Is it him?" Neville asked under his breath. Harry hummed quietly in confirmation, burning the note with the tip of his wand.

Since Neville was in the know and very few other people were actively talking to him, it was easy for Harry to disappear right before curfew, keeping the map in hand as he crept through the corridors under the invisibility cloak. Moody was in his office, and Harry hoped it stayed that way.

He arrived first, but didn't have to wait long for Draco. The blond hadn't bothered bringing cards this time. He looked anxious.

“Do you have any idea what you’re getting into tomorrow?” Draco asked. Harry grinned at him.

“I do, actually. It’s going to be great.” If he didn’t die. He was pretty sure he could do it and not die. Like, at least seventy percent sure.

Draco was not amused. “Will Prof— Remus be there?” Draco still struggled to call the werewolf by his first name. Harry shook his head.

“We don’t want Dumbledore to know that I’m still in contact with him,” he said. “And they don’t want him knowing they’re in touch with each other.” Dumbledore didn’t like it when any adult got too close to Harry — except Mrs Weasley. That there should’ve been Harry’s first sign that something wasn’t right. “I promised to call him and Sirius tomorrow night, if I can.”

“If you’re not dead, you mean,” Draco snapped.

“If I’m not too busy celebrating,” Harry corrected, smiling. “Relax, will you? I’ve got it handled. I’ve done worse, you know I have. I’ll be fine.”

“Promise me you won’t do anything stupid and Gryffindor.” Draco’s voice was quiet, raw in a way that made Harry’s chest clench. The dark-haired boy moved closer, offering a hesitantly apologetic smile.

“Everything I do is stupid and Gryffindor. I can’t promise that.” That drew a faint laugh from the Slytherin. Draco placed both hands on Harry’s shoulders, meeting his gaze square on.

“Then just promise me you’ll do your best to just get through this task alive.”

Harry stared into silver-grey eyes, losing his breath for a minute. “I promise,” he whispered, once he was capable of words. It would be so easy to just lean forward, to bridge the gap between them and press their lips together. But he couldn’t. His friendship with Draco was still so tentative in many ways, he didn’t want to risk screwing it up with his stupid feelings. He pulled away, grinning once more. “I’m gonna put on one hell of a show, though, you can count on that!”

Draco looked at him, blinking away a look Harry couldn’t place and gaining a resigned expression. “It’s going to give me a heart attack, isn’t it?” he asked flatly. Harry just laughed.

.-. .

It all went by so fast.

Walking down to the tent, picking their dragons out, avoiding Bagman when the man tried to speak to him privately; before Harry knew it, he was facing a dragon with just his wand in his hand. “Accio Firebolt!” He’d spelled open the dorm window to make sure nothing would be in his way, and to his great relief, the broom came zooming across the lawn towards him. Then he was off.

He didn't do much thinking until he was back on the ground, his brain hitting flight-mode and going entirely off of instinct. When he landed, he could see Charlie Weasley amongst the dragon tamers, punching the air in delight. Draco up in the stands, looking even paler than usual but with wonder in his eyes. Ron looking begrudgingly impressed, still scowling, while Neville and Hermione cheered beside him.

He could see McGonagall walking towards him, smiling. "Very well done, Potter! Excellent flying! Now off to the First Aid tent with you." It was then that Harry noticed he was bleeding from a gash in his shoulder, and he grimaced, heading off towards Madam Pomfrey. Cedric was sat there with burn paste slathered all over his face and chest, but Fleur and Krum looked alright, sitting drinking hot chocolate. Madam Pomfrey cast a quick spell on his shoulder, telling him to sit tight until it healed completely.

"That vas some very impressive flying," Krum said with a soft smile. Harry goggled at him. Viktor Krum just complimented his flying skills.

Before Harry could gather his brains up enough to ask the others what they had done, he was called out to receive his score. 40 out of 50. Not bad at all. "You're tied for first place!" It was Charlie, running up to barrel him in a hug so tight Harry's feet left the ground. Harry was glad Pomfrey had healed his shoulder already. "You and Krum. Bloody hell, Harry, that was amazing! I've got to go, we've got to move the dragons, but really well done! I'll see you soon, yeah? Oh, and they need you back in the champions' tent, Bagman said," he added belatedly, ruffling Harry's hair before running off again. Harry saw Neville waiting for him, but he shook his head, jerking a thumb towards the tent. He'd see his friend back up at the common room.

The other three champions were already there when Harry arrived, and so was Bagman. They listened while the man told them the egg was their clue, and Harry was relieved the next task wasn't until the end of February. Three whole months to figure it out, and get on with other things.

Everyone had left by the time Bagman let them go, so the four champions started walking back towards the castle together. "So what did the three of you end up doing?" Harry asked curiously.

They each regaled him with their own experiences with their dragons, stopping on the lawn near the lake. Neither Fleur nor Krum seemed to want to go back to their respective lodgings just yet. Harry didn't really blame them. He knew there would be a party up at Gryffindor Tower, and he was exhausted just thinking about it.

There was a beat of silence, and Harry laughed, shaking his head. "This is mad, isn't it? This competition. We just faced dragons."

Fleur laughed as well. "I knew eet would be difficult, but I did not expect zat!" she agreed. "I am vairy eempressed, 'Arry. I worried for you when I found out about ze dragons, but you did vairy well for someone so young."

"I, uh, had a bit of a heads up about them. I had time to prepare," Harry admitted, wondering if the others would confess the same. To his surprise, they did.

"Look, forgive me if this sounds crazy, but even when all four of us knew what was happening we still almost died a few times," Cedric said. "I know it's supposed to be a competition and all, but... I like you. I don't want to see any of you dead. So call me a Hufflepuff if you will, but I say we should stick together on this. The competition is supposed to be about international cooperation, right? I'm not saying we need to work on our solutions together, but we could at least keep each other updated about the clues, and offer help if needed. The people running this tournament are insane. They sent a fourteen year-old alone against a full-grown nesting mother dragon."

"You haff a point, Diggory," Krum said slowly. "ve all knew, and yet ve all came up with different solutions. Perhaps if ve vork together, ve can survive this and still put on a show."

"I'm Cedric," Cedric said, holding out a hand. "To my friends, at least."

Krum eyed him for a minute, then shook it firmly. "Then I am Viktor, to all of you."

"So we're doing this, then?" Harry confirmed. "Together? Fuck what the judges say about competition?"

"Zey broke ze rules by making you compete," Fleur agreed, determination in her eyes. "We can break ze rules by 'elping each uzzer survive eet."

"That's settled, then," Cedric said, looking relieved. "We should all get back, I'm sure there's lots of celebrating to be done. But... meet in a week or so to see how everyone's doing on the egg?"

They agreed and parted ways, Harry and Cedric walking up to the castle together.

"That could've gone poorly," Harry commented. Cedric shrugged.

"They're reasonable people, and I don't think any of us expected the tasks to be quite that serious. Not when they said they'd changed things to try and lower the death toll. Any one of us could've been fried to a crisp today. It's like Fleur said; they want us to play by the rules, but we haven't been since your name came out of the Goblet. If we're all helping each other, we're all on the same level; if I win, I'd much rather I did so fairly, and made friends out of the whole thing." He paused, realising how that sounded. "Merlin, I'm such a Hufflepuff."

Harry laughed. "Yeah, but it's alright. We can't all be reckless Gryffindors." He winked, starting up the stairs. "Have a good night, Cedric."

. . .

As expected, a party was raging in Gryffindor Tower. Harry made a good effort to get in the spirit of it, but after the adrenaline rush of flying against a dragon, he mostly just wanted to sleep.

"That was amazing!" the twins exclaimed, letting him down off their shoulders after a victory lap of the common room. "So wicked!"

"It really was brilliant, Harry," Neville agreed, beaming. Harry grinned.

“I was pretty good, wasn’t I?”

“No need to start bragging about it.” Ron’s venomous voice deflated Harry’s happy bubble, and the dark-haired boy glared.

“No one invited you to this party, Ron,” he bit out. Harry’s success just seemed to have affirmed the redhead’s views that he was a glory-hunter.

“Go away, Ronnikins,” Fred urged, smiling viciously at his brother. “Or you’ll see what some of our untested sweets can do.” Having already seen several people turn into canaries and other animals, Ron gulped, slinking away into the crowd. Harry caught sight of Hermione crossing the common room to talk to him, but ignored it. If she still wanted to be friends with Ron, that was her choice.

“So what’s in the egg, Harry?” George asked, taking the hefty golden egg from his hands.

“The clue for the second task, apparently.” Harry took the egg back, running his fingers over it.

“Open it!” several people in the crowd urged, including Neville. Harry grinned. Digging his nails into the groove, he wrenched it open.

...And immediately shut it again. As soon as the egg was open, an awful screeching wail pierced the room, making several people cover their ears. “What the fuck was that?” Fred muttered, wincing.

“No idea,” Harry replied, ears still ringing. “But it can’t be good.”

How the hell was that supposed to be a clue?

Chapter End Notes

Those of you who remember this from the first posting will maybe remember what happens in the next chapter ;) hope this kicks your week off to a great start!

Chapter 24

The morning after, Harry forgot for a minute that the task was already over. He woke up entirely convinced that the task was that morning, and he'd really just dreamed facing the dragon the first time.

Then reality set in, and he slumped against his pillows in a mixture of disbelief and overwhelming gratitude. He'd already done it. He didn't have to do it again. He never had to look at another dragon in his life if he didn't want to.

The castle was abuzz with chatter when he went down to breakfast, though for the first time since Halloween people were looking at him with amazement rather than annoyance. His little flying stunt had been the most visually impressive, according to just about everyone in Gryffindor Tower — Harry thought they were biased, but seeing a group of second year Slytherins staring at him and then break into hushed whispers and bright grins, maybe they weren't.

Either way, it was over. And now he was back to classes like nothing had happened.

Neville was checking on some sort of extra-credit Herbology project right after breakfast, so Harry walked up to Charms alone. At least, he tried; halfway there, he was yanked into a narrow passage behind a tapestry. “What—“ He relaxed when he saw pale blond hair. “Draco, what the hell? Anyone could have seen that!”

“You reckless, idiotic, foolhardy disaster of a wizard,“ Draco hissed, grey eyes burning, fist still clenched in the front of Harry's robe. “Do you have any idea how many years it took off my life watching you fly around with that bloody dragon like it was a game of tag? You could have died!”

“Well, yeah,” Harry said with a shrug. “But I didn't.”

Draco stared at him incredulously. “Gryffindors!” The word sounded like an insult, but it made Harry grin.

And then Draco's fingers tightened around his robe, and he pulled Harry forward, their lips slamming together.

Harry forgot to breathe.

He forgot to do a lot of things, actually. Luckily instinct kicked in and he was kissing back before he could even think about it, his hand settling on Draco's shoulder. They parted, but not far, foreheads pressed together. “Don't you ever scare me like that again, alright?” Draco breathed. Harry was amazed the blond could find words. His head was still spinning, stuck in the moment Draco's lips touched his. Did this mean... what did this mean?

“I, er, can't guarantee that,” he said eventually. “Triwizard champion. Harry Potter. Kinda comes with the territory.”

Draco snorted, reluctantly amused. “A little bit of warning would have been nice, at least. ‘I’ve got it handled, Draco’.”

“I did have it handled!” Harry protested. “Look, I got the egg, I didn’t die, I still have all my limbs. I’d say it was a resounding success.”

The Slytherin stared at him, looking like he regretted every last one of the life choices that had brought him to that moment. Harry wanted to kiss him again. He wasn’t sure if he was allowed. “I have to get to History of Magic,” Draco said eventually, leaning back. Harry didn’t let him go too far.

“Wait a minute, you can’t just leave, are we not going to talk about what just happened?” Had he imagined it? Judging by the blush on Draco’s cheeks, he definitely hadn’t.

“Meet me tonight. Usual time, third floor classroom.” Draco dropped his gaze for a moment, then met Harry’s eyes. Harry was glad he didn’t seem to be the only one whose entire worldview had been rocked in the last five minutes. He thought about pulling him closer, demanding they talk about it now, but they really didn’t have time. He stepped back, letting Draco smooth down the front of his robes.

“See you tonight, then,” he agreed, and with one last lingering look, he was gone.

.-. .

Harry was noticeably distracted through the rest of his classes. Luckily, people seemed pretty happy to put it down to the shock of having faced a dragon the day before.

Hermione seemed to know better, by the suspicious looks she kept shooting him. Things like that were just another day in the life of Harry Potter. “What’s the matter with you today?” she asked at lunch, and Harry shrugged, wishing his brain could think of anything except the feel of Draco Malfoy’s lips on his own. Someone could have walked up to him and given him the solution to the second task, and he probably wouldn’t have paid attention.

“Nothing,” he lied easily. “Just tired.”

The curly-haired girl levelled him with a long, slightly sad look. “I miss the days when you used to tell me things,” she said eventually. A tendril of guilt wormed its way around Harry’s heart. Should he be trusting her more than he was? What if he’d misjudged things?

He shook it off. If Hermione wanted to be told things, she should have stuck up for him when Ron was being a pillock.

“I don’t have to tell you everything about my life, Hermione,” he replied, slightly harsher than he’d intended. Hermione flinched, and Harry felt bad about it for a minute.

There was a moment, right there, that Harry would later look back on and wonder if he could have changed things. If he’d just opened up to Hermione, she might have come around. But he was tired, and he’d just faced a dragon, and kissed Draco Malfoy, and he really didn’t have the brain capacity for anything more complicated. So he let it go, and Hermione pursed her lips, and walked away.

.-. .

Other things that Harry didn't have the brain capacity for included a meeting with the heirs right before dinner, but he didn't know when he'd next get the chance, and the clock was ticking. They deserved to know the truth.

They were all gathered when he arrived, slumping down into his usual empty chair.

"What's all this about, then?" Anthony asked, quill tucked behind his ear as he looked up from an essay he was writing. "Surely you don't want to study that desperately after yesterday."

No, if Harry had his way, he'd be in bed until dinnertime. "I was talking to Neville, and I think it's time I tell you all about the full reason Dumbledore can't know about this. About me. I'm trusting you with an awful lot, and it's unfair that you're not being told why. Also, you'll need to be in on it if we're going to achieve what I'm hoping for."

"And just what is it, exactly, that you're hoping to achieve?" The question came from Padma, her gaze shrewd. Harry winked at her.

"World domination." The answer made several people laugh. Harry sat up straighter, and took a long breath.

"When I was a baby, Dumbledore did a ritual to block my family magics from my core."

There was a beat of silence. Everyone was too horrified to speak. Then finally, Susan swore loudly. The sound of such a filthy curse coming from the mild-mannered Hufflepuff's lips was almost as shocking as Harry's announcement.

"How dare he!" she exclaimed. "If my aunt ever found out, he'd be dead before he could make it to Azkaban!"

"One day, maybe," Harry said with a shrug. "It's not worth getting the truth out just yet. I need too much information from him first."

"He's turning you into a weapon." Harry whipped around to look at Sullivan Fawley, whose dark eyes were frighteningly aware. "A block that extended from a man like him on a person as powerful as yourself, you'd explode as soon as you turned seventeen. Or the moment the block was released."

The realisation went around the room quickly. Harry nodded. "Whatever he's planning, he's aiming for a moment in my life, before I turn seventeen, where he can pull the pin and make me go boom. Along with the block was a Compulsion charm — to make me reckless, and to make me easily influenced. Dumbledore made himself my saviour, with just enough magic to stop me looking for other options. So that when I was surrounded by people who said that all Slytherins were dark wizards and I should hate them, I agreed. When someone told me all Hufflepuffs were the Hogwarts rejects, I smiled and nodded. When I heard that Ravenclaws had their noses too far in books to be worth talking to, I didn't question it. Obviously, I know better now. I got the block and the charm removed before third year, and it's only a matter of time before he finds out. But I'll be ready when he does."

"So where do we come in?" Blaise asked quietly.

"When I expose Dumbledore, it's going to rock the foundations of the wizarding world. As far as they're all concerned, he can do no wrong, and I'm just an idiot teenager with a death-wish and a puffed up sense of self-importance. Skeeter isn't helping with these articles."

"Aunt Amelia's working on that," Susan assured. "You should get a letter from her at the end of the week."

Harry nodded; that was one angle covered. "Between us we have thirteen seats to inherit. I know of three more I can trust. And I'm betting there's a few more, if we can go about it the right way." He glanced pointedly at the Slytherins. There was no way they and Draco were the only Slytherins who didn't want the dark to rise. They just had to be wary of their parents.

"I'm not counting thirteen," Anthony cut in, looking around the room. Harry bit his lip; he had to tell them eventually.

"I'm the heir to the Potter, Black and Peverell seats," he declared. There was no point in telling them about Slytherin; from the sounds of things, that would sit passive his whole life.

"Well, fuck," Daphne muttered incredulously. "That'll take three of Dumbledore's proxy seats away." A catlike smirk flashed across her pale face. "You're going to cause all sorts of trouble, aren't you, Potter?"

"That is how it usually ends up, yeah," he admitted, because even though he didn't try and cause trouble, it always just sort of... happened. "So there's enough of us to have a good safety net when it all goes to shit. But there could be more. Even if they're not with us, if we can make them neutral at the very least — in an ideal world, every student who leaves this castle in the next five years would do so wanting to serve neither Voldemort nor Dumbledore. Because the way things are going, that's a very real choice they're going to have to make."

"Who would you rather we serve, you?" Cassius asked somewhat snidely. Harry winced.

"Merlin, no. I'm asking people to serve no one, but to fight with me. For themselves. For the good of the wizarding world."

A long silence followed his words. It was Daphne who broke it by snorting. "Bit dramatic." Harry flushed.

"You're proposing a third side to the war? Right under Dumbledore's nose?" Susan's sharp gaze met his. He nodded slowly.

"Yeah. Yeah, I suppose I am."

Harry looked around the room at the children gathered in front of him — because that's what they were. Children who had seen too much, who had been raised in a time that didn't give them a chance to be young, but children nonetheless. What was it the muggles were always saying? Children were the future?

If Harry didn't take a stand, he'd be dead before he was seventeen. And if the only people willing to help him were kids his own age, well. He was constantly surprising people — why couldn't they, as well?

.-.-.

Somewhat unintentionally inciting a minor revolution was the least of Harry's worries as he crept through the corridors beneath his invisibility cloak, heart pounding so loud he was surprised it didn't echo off the walls. He pushed open the door to the unused third floor classroom, breath catching in his throat at the sight of Draco perched on the edge of the teacher's desk. He looked up, smile more shy than Harry had ever seen from the young Malfoy. "Hi, Harry."

Harry lingered by the door. Seconds ticked by with neither of them moving. Abruptly Harry realised that Draco's little burst of courage that morning had been more motivated by panic than anything else, and if he wanted another kiss he was either going to have to buck up and do it himself, or wait until he got into another life-or-death situation. And while those were becoming increasingly common for him, Harry didn't want to wait.

He strode across the classroom until he was stood right in front of Draco, almost between his knees, the blond boy freezing at the sudden movement. Harry met his gaze. "I'm going to kiss you, now," he warned. Draco didn't move. Harry leaned in.

This time, both of them were expecting it, and it was so much better. Draco's lips were astonishingly soft against his own, the Slytherin's hand resting on Harry's hip, pulling him just that little bit closer until Harry was stood between Draco's thighs, the blond barely on the edge of the desk. Harry heard a faint moan that may have come from him, but also might've been Draco, and when a tongue peeked out and swiped across his bottom lip, he broke away, blushing.

They stared at each other.

"That was... nice," Harry said lamely. Draco kept staring.

"Nice. Nice? That's really all you've got to say?"

"Well I don't know, do I?" Harry retorted defensively. "I've never kissed anyone before!"

That made Draco blink in surprise. "What, really? So... I was your first?" Harry scowled at him; he had been a little busy thus far in his life! Suddenly, Draco smirked. "Maybe we should try it again. See if I can't do a little better than nice." His words were cocky, but he raised a pale eyebrow at Harry before leaning in again, as if to check it was okay with him. Harry did what he'd been wanting to do for months and slid a hand into the soft blond strands at the back of Draco's head, pulling him back in to a kiss.

Just because Harry didn't know what he was doing didn't mean he wasn't keen to learn.

From what all the boys in his dorm had said, kissing was something that just... came naturally. Harry had always been skeptical, sure that if it ever came to it he wouldn't know what to do and would make a fool of himself, but Draco didn't seem to be complaining. Harry was too busy enjoying himself to over-analyse every little movement, though having someone else's tongue in his mouth was a bit weird. Good weird, though.

Eventually they had to breathe, and Draco leaned back on one hand, looking up at Harry with hooded eyes. "So you like me, then." His tone was unbearably smug. Harry poked him in the thigh.

"You're not a total prat," he returned cheekily. "And... you like me?"

"Despite my best efforts not to," Draco sighed. He reached out with his free hand, capturing one of Harry's and threading his fingers together. "The Boy-Who-Lived and the son of a Death Eater. What will the Prophet say?"

"I don't care," Harry whispered fiercely, wanting to get one thing clear right from the start. "I know it's not safe to be open about... this, not for either of us. But I don't care what people will say when they find out. They don't matter."

Some of the tension seemed to fall from Draco's shoulders. "Good. That's— good." His lips quirked. "I suppose that means I can take the hit to my reputation that will come from being known to fraternise with a Gryffindor."

They stayed there for a minute, holding hands and grinning at each other like idiots.

"So are we, like, boyfriends now, then, or...?" Harry trailed off expectantly, unsure how that sort of thing went. Draco gave an ungainly snort.

"Disaster," he declared affectionately. He leaned forward, pressing his lips to Harry's once more. "Yeah, alright, Scarhead," he agreed, breath whispering across Harry's skin. "I'll be your boyfriend."

If nothing else came from the Triwizard Tournament — and he was still alive by the end of it — at least it had given him this, sort of.

....

Sirius ended the conversation and watched his godson's beaming face fade from the surface of the mirror, then let out a quiet cheer of success. He bounded out of bed, hurrying to the living room and hoping the lovebirds hadn't gone to bed yet. Severus didn't get many chances to get away from Hogwarts, and when he did they tended to lock themselves away in their room for half of it. "Oi, Snape!" he called, finding the pair on the sofa by the fire, both reading. Remus had his bare feet wedged under Severus' thigh. "Our family ties just got closer than ever!"

"I have no idea what you're blabbering about," Severus sighed, looking unimpressed. Sitting down on the coffee table to face them, Sirius grinned.

"Our godsons are snogging," he announced proudly. He'd had his doubts about the Malfoy kid at first, but he was far more Black than Malfoy, and Harry could probably do worse.

The slight uptick of Severus' eyebrow was all the sign he gave of acknowledgment. Remus actually put his book down.

"Don't you think that's information Draco would have liked to bring to me in his own time?" Severus drawled. Sirius shrugged unrepentantly.

"You're a spy, you can fake being surprised."

"As if any of us would be surprised by that turn of events," Remus said dryly, putting his book down. "It's been coming for months."

"Well, the moment has finally arrived. From the sounds of things, seeing Harry put himself in mortal danger made Draco feel all sorts of impulsive, Gryffindorish feelings. He cornered Harry behind that tapestry of Chief Bragge by the Charms room and planted one on him while telling him off at the same time."

Remus gave Severus a look that made Sirius want to vomit a little bit. "Ah, that sounds familiar," he sighed fondly.

"I don't recall you risking your neck nearly half as often as Potter does," Severus retorted evenly. Sirius snickered.

"Yeah, Draco will have to get a handle on that whole 'wanting to snog him every time he does something reckless' thing. He'll be found out in a week." Sirius loved his godson, but Harry's regard for his own personal safety was... not fantastic.

"They'll both have to be careful," Remus said, sobering up. The three of them shared an uneasy look. These were dangerous times for a Potter and a Malfoy to be dating.

"We'll protect them the best we can," Sirius vowed, before grinning again. "Oh, Cissa will be thrilled! Harry's got four houses to his name, you don't get much more pureblood than that." Regardless of the muggle side of his family, that was a sort of status boost that even Lucius Malfoy wouldn't turn his nose up at. If not for the whole 'being Harry Potter' part, of course.

"Don't you dare tell Narcissa before Draco can," Remus scolded. "That's his news to share."

Sirius pouted, but nodded, knowing it wouldn't be fair on Draco to spoil that moment for him. He'd just eagerly await his cousin's owl once she heard the news.

.-. .

It was the worst thing in the world, being on cloud nine and not being able to tell anyone about it. The secret was filling Harry's chest, desperate to burst through his lungs and declare to the world that Draco Malfoy was his boyfriend. But he couldn't.

He did tell George, though. Which had the unintended result of also telling Fred, and Harry used the time to tell them the truth about Dumbledore, too. Both because they needed to know, and to distract them from the news that he was dating a Malfoy.

It sort-of worked. They were too busy being angry at Dumbledore and confused by their mother's actions to really say anything about his choice of boyfriend, but they got round to congratulating him eventually. In between some mild insults to Draco's father, which Harry couldn't really complain about. Draco's father was the worst.

Having two people at school know his secret was enough, sort-of. It had to be, for now.

Harry almost thought about telling Neville, but the other Gryffindor didn't even know that Harry liked boys, and every time he tried to bring it up the words got stuck in his throat. It was ridiculous; he knew Neville wasn't going to judge him. But he still couldn't bring himself to say it. It didn't help that Hermione had decided she wanted to be friends again, and was at his side almost every free moment he had.

Tugging his cloak tighter around himself, Harry surveyed the few remaining blast-ended skrewts that they had just failed to encourage to hibernate, somewhat wishing one of them would set something on fire. Not anything important, mind. But it was freezing outside, and warming charms could only do so much.

"Well, this does look like fun!" The overly-cheerful voice made Harry even colder.

His letter from Amelia Bones had arrived the weekend after the first task, as Susan had promised it would, introducing Harry to the lawyer that would be helping him take legal action against Rita Skeeter. He'd been assured that it was most definitely not legal to quote a minor who had denied being interviewed, and a warning had been sent to Ms Skeeter forthwith. Clearly she was looking for other angles. Harry was amazed the woman was even allowed in the castle.

To Harry's surprise, she didn't immediately come up to him. Instead she started talking to Hagrid about the skrewts, smirking delightedly as the man got more and more flustered. Harry watched with a feeling of impending dread; she was doing this because of him. She knew she wasn't supposed to talk to him, so she was going to start going for the people he cared about instead. That bitch.

"Oh, you're here, Harry. Hello, there!" she greeted far too innocently, before turning back to Hagrid and asking him more about the skrewts, eventually making arrangements to meet for a proper interview at the Three Broomsticks. Class ended, and Skeeter stayed by the hut as the rest of them trudged up towards the castle.

"She's going to twist everything he says," Hermione breathed, horrified. Harry grimaced. "You should've just given her that interview, Harry. She wouldn't be going anywhere near Hagrid then."

Harry stared at the girl, unable to believe what she'd just said. "Excuse me?"

"Well it's obvious the real story is you, and you're not giving her anything! So she's got to get her dirt elsewhere," Hermione said diplomatically.

"The article she did about me was bad enough without me giving her more fuel for the fire!" Harry argued. "She writes nothing but rubbish, and I don't need her dragging my name into her ridiculous lies. My reputation is bad enough as it is."

"Since when have you cared about your reputation?" Hermione's voice was sharp. "Surely, knowing what people think of you already, you should just let her write whatever she wants about you, to stop her writing awful things about anybody else. Clearly she's not going to stop looking for a story from you, she's just going to drag everyone else into the crossfire."

"What, so I should just throw myself under the bus?" Harry spat back. "That's easy for you to say, Hermione; you're not the one whose face is in the paper every bloody five minutes. You're not the one who has to deal with the public's opinion every time you so much as breathe!" He forced himself to try and calm down; if their argument got much louder, Skeeter would hear him, and then she'd really have a story.

"But I was in the paper," Hermione argued. "People think I'm your girlfriend now, because she started making up her own rubbish when you didn't give her anything!"

"And I'm sorry about that, I really am," Harry said earnestly. "But it isn't my fault, and for all we know she would've written that crap anyway. Besides, no one really thinks you're my girlfriend."

Hermione went red at that. "Some people do," she spat. "If you had any sort of consideration for others, you'd stop throwing a tantrum and just agree to an interview."

Harry rather thought that only one of them was throwing a tantrum at the minute, and it certainly wasn't him. Still, he merely shook his head, turning back towards the castle. It wasn't worth the argument.

. . .

Every time Harry opened that bloody golden egg, it just screamed at him. It was getting incredibly frustrating, both for him and the other residents of Gryffindor Tower. The only good thing to come of it was the improvement of Harry's Silencing charm, once Seamus had threatened to throw both Harry and the egg out the dorm window if he didn't stop opening it indoors.

"Does yours just screech the whole time?" Harry asked wearily, sliding onto the bench of the Hufflepuff table next to Cedric. They had only sat together a handful of times since the day after the champions had been announced, but Harry was somewhat starting to get used to it. Cho offered him a wave from Cedric's other side.

"Yes," Cedric groaned, running a hand through his hair. "It's the worst, isn't it? We even tried throwing it in the fire to see if that would do anything, but I think it just made it worse."

“What he means is, Patrick got so pissed off at the noise it was making, he threw it in the fire in the hopes it would stop,” Cho supplied, grinning. Harry snickered.

“I tried ‘exing my egg,’ ” Fleur declared, gracefully stepping over the bench and dropping down opposite them. “Eet did not ‘elp.’ ” Alongside Fleur were two other Beauxbatons students, and a couple of Ravenclaws. Harry recognised one of them as Roger Davies, the quidditch captain.

“What spells did you use? Maybe we can compare lists,” Cedric said thoughtfully.

“It has got to be some sort of creature,” Viktor insisted, sitting much less gracefully on Fleur’s open side. He brought with him a Durmstrang boy, and Cassius Warrington. Cassius caught Harry’s eye, and winked.

“We already faced a creature in the first task, though,” Harry pointed out. “Surely they wouldn’t just make us face a different one? That’s not very imaginative.”

“What if the creature is part of the clue itself?” Cedric suggested. “Like, we don’t have to fight it, but knowing what it is will give us an idea of where it comes from, and that might have something to do with it.”

“Or ze ‘ole thing is just to waste our time, and eet will be anuzzer surprise.” Fleur scowled into her soup as she spoke, clearly fed up with the egg already. Harry could definitely relate.

He saw Neville walk into the hall and do a double-take at Harry’s position, and he beckoned him over, patting the bench beside him. Neville complied, though he looked a little confused at being invited into the odd group.

Neville wasn’t the only extra addition, though. Like a chain reaction, people began to join them; Roger invited a Slytherin girl over, and she brought her Ravenclaw friend. One of the Beauxbatons boys with Fleur managed to flirt enough with Katie Bell to bring her to the table, which of course brought Angelina and Alicia, which naturally brought the twins and Lee Jordan. Cassius swapped places with the Durmstrang boy to sit and talk to his fellow Slytherin, and the next thing Harry knew there were four more Slytherins at the table, striking up a conversation with the Durmstrang boy in what sounded like German. Before lunch was even halfway through, the entire end third of the Hufflepuff table was taken up by students from other houses and other schools. The Hufflepuffs had just spaced themselves between them, happily joining in whichever conversation was closest.

“What if we try making all four eggs scream at the same time? To see if there’s any differences?”

“NO!” was the immediate response to Cedric’s casual suggestion, from everyone in the vicinity who had heard the eggs.

“I’ll be so glad when you lot figure it all out,” Cho declared vehemently. “I swear, I can hear that thing in my sleep these days.” Neville nodded in agreement.

A hush fell over the table, and it took Harry a minute to realise it was because Dumbledore was approaching. He didn't look amused. "Mr Potter," he greeted, his voice cheerful enough. "You and several of your friends here seem to have lost your way to your house tables."

Harry wasn't sure how the headmaster could pin this one on him, or how he could declare forty-odd people, half of whom Harry had never spoken to, 'his friends'.

"There's no rules about having to sit at our tables every meal, sir," Cedric piped up innocently. "Only during formal feasts."

"We're just trying to make the other schools feel welcome," Angelina agreed. She was sat beside a Beauxbaton girl with hair down to her waist, and was fixing it in several tiny braids down her back.

Dumbledore stared at them all for a long minute, then smiled. Harry was sure he wasn't the only one who could see the angry fire hiding in those twinkling blue eyes. "Excellent, excellent." He said nothing more, continuing on his way to the head table, and slowly the chatter started back up. Harry looked up at Susan Bones, who was sat with Parvati and Lavender, discussing dress robes. Susan caught his eye and grinned.

It was beginning.

Chapter 25

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

That one lunchtime seemed to have sparked a trend. Now it wasn't uncommon to go into the Great Hall and lose yourself in a group of mixed-colour robes. Of course, it didn't all change overnight — there were still large clusters of same-colour robes crowded together, looking quite disturbed by all the intermingling. But it was a start. Watching Dumbledore grit his teeth and pretend to be delighted about the development was becoming the highlight of Harry's week.

So of course, something had to bring him down.

"The Yule Ball is a tradition of the Triwizard Tournament," Professor McGonagall declared at the end of their Transfiguration lesson on Thursday, interrupting Harry's rather diligent clock-watching. The sooner she let them go, the sooner he could have a nap before dinner, because after dinner he'd be meeting with the heirs for study group. A study group that would no doubt turn into laughing about Dumbledore's anger and plotting the next step in their slow and careful uniting of the Hogwarts houses.

Well, that explained the dress robes, at any rate. The reactions of the class were a mixture from excited to downright horrified — Harry didn't think it would be so bad, really. It might actually be sort of fun. He'd never been to any sort of formal party before; or, really, any kind of party full stop. There had been one school dance in his last year of muggle primary school, but the Dursleys hadn't let him go. They ended up having to go pick up Dudley early after he pushed a boy into the snack table.

"Potter, a word, please," McGonagall called once she finally released the class, and Harry resisted the urge to swear. He was so tired. Between trying to figure out the egg, meeting with Draco, studying with the heirs and keeping up with his Arithmancy and Runes for Sirius and Remus, he wasn't getting nearly as much sleep as he probably should.

"If this is about the essay, I know I went off-topic, but I got a bit distracted," Harry started, sure that McGonagall was entirely unimpressed with the eight inch long tangent about the difference between transfigured material and conjured material — in an essay supposed to be about the practical uses of Switching spells. Harry hadn't meant to, but he'd found it fascinating, and the words just sort of spilled out. He couldn't even blame it on spending too much time with Remus in the summer; he'd been turning into a bookworm ever since the Compulsion charm had been removed.

"Potter, your grades are better than they've been in your entire school career, and that 'off-topic' section, as you put it, wouldn't have been out of place in one of my sixth year essays," McGonagall told him, the barest twitch at the corner of her lips letting him know she was pleased. Harry preened. "No, this is about the Yule Ball. The champions and their partners are expected to open the dance. I thought you'd appreciate the warning."

Harry's stomach sank as her words became clear. "I have to learn to dance?" he squeaked. "I have to find someone willing to dance? With me? In front of everyone?"

McGonagall's lips twitched further, her amusement barely showing. "Yes, Mr Potter, I'm afraid you do. I'm sure one of your friends will be able to help you; most purebloods take dancing lessons prior to Hogwarts."

For a second, Harry thought she was talking about the other heirs, and his heart stopped when he tried to figure out how she'd found out about it all. Then he realised she was probably just talking about Neville or Parvati or someone. There was no way she was talking about the Weasleys.

"Can't I just face another dragon instead?" he asked meekly. McGonagall's fingers clenched for a second around her wand, like she was resisting the urge to put her face in her hands. It was an expression Harry was pretty familiar with from his housemistress after three and a half years.

"Sadly not, Mr Potter. I'm sure you'll pick it up as quickly as you've been picking up spells lately. I must say, I'm impressed. You get more and more like your mother every year." That made Harry beam, chest fluttering with warmth.

"Thanks, Professor." He flashed her a quick grin, turning away once it was clear he'd been dismissed. He paused in the doorway, glancing back. "Professor?" She looked up. "Does my dance partner have to be from Gryffindor?"

"Of course not! The whole point of the ball is to socialise with our international guests and extend the hand of friendship; that includes the four houses as well. Your partner may be whomever you choose, as long as they are a student at one of the three attending schools."

"And here I was hoping Professor Snape would go with me," Harry mock-sighed, smirking when the Transfiguration professor almost lost her composure for a second. "See you, Professor!" He left the classroom, heading towards Gryffindor Tower and the siren call of his bed.

He had a little under three weeks to find a partner, and learn how to dance well enough to avoid embarrassing them both in front of everyone at the ball.

He would definitely prefer to face the dragon again.

.-. .

Apparently, finding a partner wasn't going to be a problem for Harry. Not if he cared whether he actually knew the girl or not. Within the first twelve hours of news about the ball filtering through the school, he was asked out by no less than five girls he had never spoken to in his life. He was even asked by a second year Hufflepuff, who stuttered so much she could barely get the words out.

Neville found the whole thing hilarious, because he was the worst friend ever. "Just pick someone and ask them," he said, as if it was that simple.

“Alright, who are you asking, then?” Neville went beet red.

“I haven’t decided yet.”

Harry stuck his tongue out, and Neville rolled his eyes. “It doesn’t matter whether I go with anyone or not. I’m not a school champion.” That deflated Harry’s smug balloon, and he scowled again, sitting down at the Gryffindor table for breakfast.

An owl dropped a rolled-up copy of the Daily Prophet in front of Neville, and the glimpse Harry got of the headline made him groan.

‘Explosive Classes at Hogwarts

With all eyes on Hogwarts during the Triwizard Tournament, I, Rita Skeeter, decided to investigate a little of the school’s day-to-day life, and you can imagine my surprise when I discovered the creatures our dear champion, Harry Potter, was forced to interact with as part of his Care of Magical Creatures lesson. No wonder the dragon was such a doddle, if this is what he’s facing in class! I ask you, reader, which creature is more dangerous; the fire-breathing, biting, bang-ended scoot, or the teacher himself, Mr Rubeus Hagrid?’

The whole article went on to talk about how Hagrid was constantly endangering his students with his reckless classes, including a quote from Pansy Parkinson about how Draco had been mauled by a hippogriff the year before, and another from Crabbe about being bitten by a flobberworm. Like with the last article, it was incredibly Harry-centric, though it didn’t have a single quote from him. Skeeter was clearly looking for loopholes.

“Flobberworms don’t even have teeth!” Harry exclaimed, tossing the paper angrily down on the table, almost knocking over a milk jug. “This is such bullshit, how can she possibly be allowed to publish this and call it journalism?”

“There aren’t many laws about what can and can’t go to print,” Neville told him. “The Wizengamot were meaning to get around to it back at the turn of the century, but then Grindelwald happened, and...” The wizarding world had essentially been on pause for the last century, with Albus Dumbledore sticking his fingers in everything and refusing to allow real progress. “It didn’t used to be that bad, but in the last couple of decades the standards have really slipped, once people realised they could get away with publishing fiction if there was a tiny scrap of fact behind it.”

“All the same, this can’t be legal.” Harry looked up at the head table; Hagrid hadn’t come to breakfast. Guilt squirmed in Harry’s stomach as he remembered his last argument with Hermione. Several seats down, she was glaring at him pointedly, Prophet in hand. This wasn’t really his fault, but he still felt responsible. There had to be something he could do about it.

He scanned the hall, catching sight of a curly red ponytail just on its way out the door. Muttering an excuse to Neville, he jumped up and hurried out, calling Susan’s name. She turned, both her and Ernie stopping with curious looks on their faces. “Harry? What’s the matter?”

"Would your aunt mind if I wrote to her again? About Rita Skeeter?" he asked. "I don't know if you saw the article about Hagrid, but it's ridiculous, and there's got to be something I can do about it legally. Or someone could do."

"Aunt Amelia would love to hear from you, Harry, but I don't know if she can be of any help. Trust me, if there was a way to get Skeeter arrested, she would've done it by now," Susan added with a sour look. "The worst the DMLE can do is slap her with a few fines, and the Prophet is happy to pay those; she brings in way too much money for them slinging her muck about." She paused thoughtfully. "What about that lawyer you got in touch with? Maybe she'll have an idea?"

"I can ask." Harry hadn't spoken much to his lawyer, but Evelyn Frobisher seemed to be one of the best. Harry expected as much, if she came on the recommendation of the head of the DMLE herself. "But I can't exactly have her banned from talking to everyone. Especially not the people who can consent for themselves." If only Hagrid had turned around and told her no comment. Then again, she probably would've written that crap regardless.

"Maybe we can get her banned from the grounds except on tournament days," Susan said slowly. "On the claim of disrupting our learning. If Skeeter's allowed to just wander around and interrupt classes for interviews, what's to stop other random adults coming in and doing it?"

Harry grinned; he could put up with Skeeter on tournament days if it meant being rid of her the rest of the time. "That could work! I'll write to Mrs Frobisher and ask. Thanks, Susan." He was about to turn away, when suddenly a thought occurred to him. "Hey, Susan? Are you going to the ball with anyone?"

She blinked at him, eyebrows rising. "Not yet. Why do you ask?"

"Would you want to maybe go with me? As friends," he clarified quickly, feeling his cheeks grow hot. "I have to have a partner to open the ball, and I thought it'd be good to go with someone from a different house. If you'd rather not, I completely understand," he added. "That sort of attention isn't for everyone. But... it could be fun." He wasn't quite bold enough to go with a boy — especially one that wasn't Draco. But going with a Hufflepuff, he could do.

Susan eyed him contemplatively. At her side, Ernie was grinning. "I'll warn you, I've never danced a step in my life," Harry added, wondering if that was a dealbreaker. "But I'm willing to learn."

"I don't have time to teach you, but if you promise to get good enough not to embarrass yourself, I'll go with you," she agreed, folding her arms over her chest. "Even if you're terrible, it'll still be good for my image to be seen with you. And for our little house unity side-project," she added with a grin.

"Your image?" Harry repeated, baffled. She nodded.

"If I want to be Chief Warlock of the Wizengamot by the time I'm thirty, I have to start somewhere, don't I? I'm a Hufflepuff; we don't make waves. Being Harry Potter's date to the Yule Ball will make me memorable.” She spoke as if it was obvious, and Harry merely nodded, mildly terrified of the determination in her tone. “What colour are your dress robes?”

“Green, with gold detail,” Harry answered. Susan smiled.

“Good, I look great in gold.”

“Sooz, we’ve got to get to Defence,” Ernie nudged, gesturing at his watch. Harry realised he was probably going to be late for Potions. Oh well, Snape hadn’t had the chance to take points off him in a while. Maybe he could even wing his way into a detention; Remus was coming to visit in a couple of days.

“Let me know if you don’t find anyone to teach you to dance, Harry,” Susan said. “I’ll ask around.”

“Will do, but I think I have someone in mind,” he assured her. Draco would definitely know how to dance. He was probably great at it, too, the prat. “Thanks, Susan. I’ll try not to let you down.”

She patted him on the cheek gently, smiling in a way that was vaguely condescending, but somehow nice at the same time. “Just be a pretty bit of arm candy for me, you’ll do fine.” That had Ernie laughing. Harry was wondering if he should regret his choices. Maybe Parvati would have been safer.

“Who are you going with, Ernie?” he asked curiously.

“Hannah,” the Hufflepuff boy replied, looking incredibly pleased about it. “Not all of us want to break house boundaries for this one, y’know.”

“He’s fancied her since last year,” Susan whispered theatrically, making Ernie blush. “See you later, Harry!”

Harry turned away just as the hall began to fill with students heading to classes, immeasurably glad he’d managed to ask Susan before he had an audience. He went to find Neville, grinning to himself.

One problem down, just one more to go.

.-. .

Harry was wondering if he should try making friends with people other than Neville — publicly, that was. With Ron still pissed at him and Hermione mostly-pissed at him, he found himself at a bit of a loose end when Neville was off doing things in the greenhouses. With little else to do, he went to the library, planning on getting a head start on the Featherlight charm for the next class.

It was a Friday evening, so the library was fairly busy — as far as the school library went. People wanting to get their homework done before the weekend, or finish stuff they’d been given an extension on and had to hand in before Saturday morning. He glanced around for a free table — Viktor was almost always in the library these days, maybe Harry could sit with him?

He followed the trail of starry-eyed teen girls until he saw the crowd of Viktor's most devoted stalkers lurking around the edge of a bookshelf. They looked furious, muttering to each other and glaring daggers at something on the other side of the shelf. Harry kept out of sight and edged closer, his eyebrows rising at what was making the girls so upset.

Viktor was indeed in the library, but he wasn't studying alone. Hermione was sat right next to him, leaning just a little bit into his space as she read a passage from the book they appeared to be sharing, then said something quietly. Viktor's lips twitched, and he replied, making Hermione giggle. The pair of them looked pretty cozy; no wonder Viktor's fans were upset.

Harry backed out of the scene, feeling conflicted. On the one hand, he liked Viktor a lot, and if he liked Hermione, more power to him. He even liked Hermione, most of the time, even if she didn't like Harry very much these days. He wasn't really sure where their friendship stood — and he wouldn't be until he had proof that she was just friends with him because Dumbledore told her to be — but he still wanted her to be happy.

But on the other hand, if Hermione was working for Dumbledore, he didn't want her getting anywhere near Viktor and messing with the tentative friendship Harry had with the champions. If she was up to something, using Viktor for something... or he was just being paranoid and she happened to be enjoying getting attention from a popular older boy. Harry wondered how Ron felt about the whole thing. If he even knew about it.

Shaking his head and deciding it was none of his business, he went in search of somewhere else to study. The evening was apparently full of surprises, as he rounded a corner to see Blaise, Millicent Bulstrode, Mandy Brocklehurst, the Patil twins and Lavender Brown all sat together, working on what looked like their Potions essay due Monday. He tried to back out of that one, too, but Blaise caught sight of him before he did. "Potter," he greeted neutrally, the barest of smirks on his lips. "Care to join us?"

"I wouldn't want to intrude," he insisted, giving curious glances to Bulstrode, Brocklehurst and Lavender. They didn't seem to be having any issue with the intermingled Gryffindor/Slytherin/Ravenclaw group.

"You wouldn't be," Parvati insisted. "Have you done Snape's essay yet? We've only just started."

"Being brutally honest, Potter; your Potions grade could use all the help it can get," Bulstrode remarked, but she sounded more teasing than cruel. Harry paused for a minute. If they were genuinely inviting him, it would be rude to say no, surely? Bulstrode was known to avoid most of the real Slytherin drama, and if Blaise was encouraging it then she couldn't be too bad. Perhaps the Bulstrode heir could be swayed away from her Death Eater father.

"Well, you're not wrong there," he admitted, dropping into a chair opposite Mandy. Even after his lessons with Snape over the summer, he couldn't be seen to suddenly do well in the Slytherin's class, so Harry was still averaging a Poor.

He pulled a quill and parchment from his bag, leaning in to share Blaise's textbook since he hadn't brought his own. As the girls started discussing the use of marigold stems in healing potions, Blaise's dark eyes flicked up to Harry. "You were busy fighting dragons, so we started the study group without you," he said under his breath, keeping his expression neutral, as if he was just explaining potions to him. "As you can see, it's going well so far. We'll explain more on Tuesday." That was their next scheduled get-together. Harry grinned; he loved when plans came together without his involvement. It was the best.

.-.-.

Practically sprinting up to the Transfiguration corridor as soon as all his dorm-mates were fast asleep, Harry grinned when he slipped inside the unused classroom. "We have got to figure out a regular meeting spot," he said by way of greeting. "I'm starting to lose track of the classroom rotation."

For safety's sake, they never met in the same place twice in a row, keeping up a schedule running through five different unused classrooms. Draco merely rolled his eyes at him. "Find somewhere you can be sure no one will catch on to, and I'll think about it." They'd been incredibly lucky so far — other than Remus catching them that one time last year, they hadn't been caught yet. But since their change in relationship, they'd started meeting up more and more, and it was just a matter of time.

Letting his schoolbag drop to the floor, Harry walked over to meet Draco at the desk he'd cleared off, leaning down to greet the Slytherin with a firm kiss. It still sent a thrill down his spine to know that he could do that; just go over to Draco and kiss him, whenever he liked. Well, as long as they were in private.

He sunk into the chair Draco had set out for him, their knees pressed together under the desk. Draco pulled his deck of cards from his pocket, shuffling. "Busy day?" Harry asked, and the blond shrugged.

"No more than usual. Uncle Severus had me help him top up the Hospital Wing stock after class." Harry was glad that wasn't his job anymore; being responsible for potions that he knew students would be taking had made Harry far too anxious. He was competent now, thanks to the extra lessons, but he was by no means excelling. Draco, on the other hand, was probably top of their year. "Dare I ask what you've been up to?"

"The usual chaos and mayhem," Harry replied, grinning. "Oh, you'll never guess what I saw in the library today." He told Draco about Viktor and Hermione, and the blond made a face.

"I thought Viktor had better taste than that," he complained. Harry nudged him scoldingly.

"Hermione's fine! What's wrong with her?" he argued, worried Draco was going to make a disparaging remark about her heritage. He was better about it in private, but every now and then some of Lucius Malfoy's childhood lessons slipped through. The older Draco got, the more he was learning to think for himself.

"Other than the fact that she could be selling you out to Dumbledore?" Draco pointed out, one pale eyebrow raised. "She doesn't know the first thing about quidditch, why is she drooling over the Bulgarian seeker?"

"Maybe that's why Viktor likes her," Harry reasoned, ignoring the Dumbledore comment. "She doesn't care about his career."

Draco hummed, unconvinced, and played a card that won him the round. Harry cursed, and the Slytherin smirked, leaning in to steal a kiss. "You might be getting better, but you're still no match for me in strategy," he teased playfully.

"Why don't we play Coup le Chat instead?" Harry retorted, preferring the more luck-based game. Draco huffed, but obligingly dealt out six cards each.

Distracted by the talk of Viktor and Hermione, Harry almost forgot to tell Draco the real reason he'd asked for them to meet that night. Well, other than to kiss him. He'd never get enough of kissing his boyfriend. "Hey, Draco? Who are you going to the Yule Ball with?"

Draco stiffened, his fingers fumbling with the card he'd just drawn. "We can't go together," he said immediately. Harry scoffed.

"I'm not that much of an idiot," he agreed. "Though, for the record, I definitely would if I could. But that's why I asked; who are you going with?"

"I was planning to ask Pansy," Draco replied, shrugging. "Our parents will expect it, and she'll be fairly decent company."

"Just make sure she keeps her hands to herself," Harry said with a scowl, not liking the idea of Pansy Parkinson hanging off Draco's arm all night. Draco scoffed.

"Pansy's not interested in anything like that," he dismissed. He bumped his knee against Harry's. "Are you taking anyone, or just going to lurk in the corner with Longbottom all night?"

"I have to take someone," Harry informed him. "The champions are supposed to open the dancing with their partners. I asked Susan Bones this morning."

Draco's grey eyes were amused. "Bones? A Hufflepuff? Clever; showing support of Cedric and his house, branching out from Gryffindor, and allying with Amelia Bones' heir. No one will ever complain about a sweet little Hufflepuff like her." There was a faint twist to his lips, and it took Harry a minute to figure out what it was.

"Don't be jealous," he soothed, placing a hand over Draco's on the table. "She knows we're going as just friends. She's doing it for her image as much as I'm doing it for mine. I've been told I just need to be her arm candy," he added with a grin. That softened Draco a little.

"Malfoys don't share," he said eventually, turning his hand over to lace their fingers together. "Even if no one else knows it, you're mine. The thought of her getting to dance with you in front of all those people, when I can't even look at you without having to make sure I look like I hate you..." Harry pushed a lock of blond hair out of Draco's eyes, tilting his head forward to press their foreheads together for a brief second.

"One day, when this is all over, I'll dance with you in front of the whole bloody Ministry," he promised, kissing Draco slowly. The blond melted into the kiss, fingers threading into Harry's hair. "That's actually something I wanted to ask you about," he added breathlessly when they parted, refusing to get distracted.

"Can it wait?" Draco muttered, going in for another kiss. Harry let it go on for a minute or two, then pulled back.

"I promised Susan I'd find someone to teach me to dance before the ball, so I don't embarrass the both of us," he explained. "You know how to dance, right?"

"I'm a Malfoy," Draco retorted, as if it answered that question. Which, Harry supposed, it did.

"Would you teach me? I know we're both boys, so it'll be different, but... you won't laugh at me." How far they'd come, that Draco Malfoy was one of the few people he could say that to.

A thoughtful hum was Draco's response. "I suppose. If it's to save you looking a fool in front of our esteemed guests," he added wryly. Harry beamed, kissing him again.

"Thank you! I'll try my best, I swear." He made to give Draco another kiss, but the blond boy got to his feet abruptly, rolling up his sleeves.

"Let's see what we're working with, then," he prompted, eyeing Harry expectantly. Harry gulped.

"What? Now?" he asked, alarmed. He hadn't expected to start so soon! He'd thought maybe he could have a day or two to mentally prepare himself. Have Neville show him a step or two, so he didn't totally look like an idiot in front of his boyfriend.

"I need to see if it's going to take me every night from now til Christmas to get you in shape," Draco retorted.

"Oi!" Harry argued. "I'm in great shape!"

Draco's eyes trailed over him, heavy-lidded. Harry shivered. "Hmm, you're not bad." He stepped closer to Harry, resting a hand on the small of his back that dipped down to brush his backside for the briefest of seconds, just long enough to be intentional. "But let's see if you can dance."

"We don't have music," Harry protested.

"Doesn't matter for now, and you can bring your Wireless next time. Quit making excuses, Potter." Draco's smirk turned challenging. "Unless you're scared?"

"In your dreams," Harry returned. Draco winked at him.

"You frequently are," he said without missing a beat, catching Harry when he stumbled and pulling him up into dancing hold. "Now, you'll have to lead Bones, so I'll teach you that way.

It'll be easier for you anyway; following's harder, you've got to do it backwards. It'll feel a bit weird at first, since I'm taller than you, but so's she, especially in heels." Harry wanted to argue, but he couldn't deny it. Susan wouldn't be quite as tall as Draco, but there wasn't a chance of her being the same height as Harry, let alone shorter.

"We'll start off basic," Draco assured. "I'd imagine the opening dance will be a traditional wizarding waltz, and anything that follows probably a fairly simple box-step."

Harry wished he knew what any of those things meant.

"Okay, here we go. Just do as I tell you."

Without any music to follow, Draco instead counted beats quietly, directing Harry with soft words and pointed nudges of his hands. Harry still tripped over his feet for the first twenty minutes, but eventually he started to get the hang of it a little bit. "Look at me, not at your feet," Draco instructed. Harry snapped his head up, meeting Draco's silver gaze. The Slytherin had a soft, unguarded smile at the corners of his lips. It took Harry's breath away for a minute, and his feet stopped moving. Draco blinked at him. "What are you—" Harry cut him off with a kiss, moving his hand up to cup Draco's jaw. The blond hummed quietly. "That's not part of the dance," he said a beat after they parted, looking a little dazed.

"Couldn't help myself," Harry replied, grinning abashedly. "So how am I doing?"

"Not as terrible as I feared," Draco acquiesced. "Definite potential. We should still start meeting up at least every other night, though, just to make sure you get plenty of practice. Unless that'll be too much? My roommates don't much care what I do at night, but yours aren't good at minding their own business."

"I'll make it work." Harry didn't need sleep, right? Not when he could spend several hours a night in Draco's arms. And, sometimes, stepping on Draco's feet. "Every other night, or every night?"

"We'll go for every night this week, then go from there. Can you handle that?"

Harry smirked. "Oh, I don't know, having to spend that much time looking at your ugly mug," he teased, stroking Draco's cheek. "Not sure I can cope."

Draco sniffed haughtily. "One must suffer for one's art, Potter," he said in reply, sounding every inch the puffed up little pureblood lordling his father wanted him to be. Harry laughed, leaning up for another kiss. He liked kissing when they were like this. Having to stretch up on his toes, just a little bit, to get the perfect angle to slot their mouths together without his glasses digging into Draco's face. He didn't mind being shorter than Draco.

They kissed for a few minutes more, then Draco took Harry's hand in his own, nudging him back into hold. "If you can get this tonight, maybe tomorrow I'll introduce the lifts."

Harry's face paled. Maybe dancing wasn't such a good idea after all.

.-.-.-

Since eating meals together had become rather a larger affair than they'd intended, the four champions had to find other ways to get together and discuss progress on the eggs. One afternoon a week or so before term was due to end, they sat out by the lake on a large blanket Fleur had conjured, surrounded by Warming charms courtesy of Harry and Viktor. Harry had gotten pretty good at them over the summer — Sirius still couldn't stand being cold.

"I vote we put the eggs away until after Christmas," Cedric said, lying back on the blanket, his hair mussed and sticking out at funny angles. "All the screaming is doing my head in."

"I put a Silencing charm on mine," Fleur volunteered. Harry snorted.

"Pretty sure that defeats the purpose."

She shrugged. "Eet stops eet from screaming every time eet falls off my dresser."

"How often is that?" Cedric asked with raised eyebrows, which looked a little odd from Harry's perspective as the Hufflepuff was upside down.

"Often enough," Fleur said evasively.

"The rest of the Durmstrang students haff banned me from opening mine vhen they are around," Viktor sighed. "I agree, leaving them until after the Yule Ball is best."

"I'm fine with that," Harry said, nodding. He leaned back on his hands, glancing out across the lake. "Oh look, it's snowing." Just a little bit, fine flakes beginning to dust the surface of the lake. Viktor scoffed.

"That is barely even snow," he dismissed. "In Bulgaria, there is four feet already."

"And I bet it's bloody freezing." Cedric grimaced. "No wonder you're so good at Warming charms."

"It is necessary," Viktor agreed. "Especially for flying."

That reminded Harry of the conversation he and Viktor had had weeks ago, before the first task. "Hey, Fleur; do you play quidditch? Do you even have quidditch at Beauxbatons?"

"Of course we 'ave quidditch," Fleur said, mock-offended. "I am seeker for my 'ouse team."

Harry looked at Viktor, and they both burst out laughing. "I told you!" he crowed. "Must be something about seekers. Reckless idiots, the lot of us."

"You play seeker also, 'arry?" Fleur checked, wanting to make sure they weren't laughing at her. Harry nodded.

"Cedric, too. Viktor and I were talking about it the other day, I wondered if the Goblet was looking for seekers. Gotta be something a bit wrong in the head with all of us, flying around at top speeds looking for a tiny golden ball while the other team tries to knock us off our brooms." There was something a little bit mad about every quidditch player, but seekers were probably the most bizarre.

"I haff never met a sane seeker," Viktor declared wisely. "And I haff met a lot of seekers."

"Sounds about right," Cedric agreed, snickering. Even Fleur laughed.

"I do not think a sane person would enter zis tournament, non?" she agreed ruefully.

"Ve should all fly together sometime," Viktor said, looking out over the lake. The snow was making a vague attempt at coming down harder, settling on the railings of the Durmstrang ship. "A four-vay seeker match."

Harry imagined it, grinning. "That would be brilliant. Where, though?" The quidditch pitch was out of bounds for the year; something to do with the tournament. Harry was pretty sure he didn't want to know a thing about it until he absolutely had to.

"We do not need goals for seeking," Fleur pointed out. "Anywhere on ze grounds will do."

"First Wednesday of winter break?" Cedric suggested. "Just keep it between us, a little friendly game. Nothing crazy."

"You're on," Harry agreed, grinning. He was going to go against the seeker who caught the snitch in the World Cup final. It was going to be epic.

.-.-.-.

Worrying the edge of his cardigan between his fingers, Remus sat down opposite Sirius, whose expression was grave. "Severus has news, doesn't he?" the animagus presumed. He could read Remus easily, after all these years. Remus nodded.

"The Mark is dark enough to make out properly, now," he admitted, stomach churning. He hated looking at that stain on his love's skin — it felt like they were nineteen and terrified all over again. "He's had letters from most of the old crowd. They're confused, but hopeful. They're all just... waiting." Severus could feel it coming, he said they could all feel it coming. One day soon, their lord would call them, and they would answer. "He said Karkaroff's been even shiftier than usual," he added with a grimace. A growl came from Sirius before he could stop himself. They both hated the idea of that scumbag being around Harry, but there was nothing any of them could do.

"Any word from the Ministry yet?"

"Nothing official," Remus said with a shake of his head. "There are rumours, of course. Fudge is in complete denial, won't hear a whisper of it. No one has even seen Barty Crouch since the first task; he's sick, apparently. Still no word on Bertha."

"We all know she's dead," Sirius murmured, grimacing. "Especially if Harry's dream is anything to go by. Poor Bertha was probably just in the wrong place at the wrong time. She was always good at that."

Remus didn't remember much about Bertha Jorkins from school — she was three years older than them — but he remembered her always managing to stumble across things she shouldn't. Once she'd almost walked in on him and Severus kissing, in their fourth year. Only Severus' quick thinking with a Dissillusionment charm had saved them.

"I suspect Voldemort could be resurrected right in front of Fudge's face and he'd still deny it," Remus mused. "Merlin help us if he ends up being our wartime Minister. We'd be doomed."

"He's exactly who Dumbledore wants in power at a time like this," Sirius pointed out. "A useless moron with all the courage of a flobberworm. No chance of him mobilising any useful defence force. Just sit back and wait for Albus Dumbledore to save the day." He made a faint noise of disgust. "How is the old coot, anyway?"

Remus grinned at that. Sirius was going to love this. "Harry and his new friends seem to be pushing his buttons in all the wrong ways," he said, perking up. "Severus said they've all started mixing houses at mealtimes. Apparently you can hardly tell which house table is which, these days."

Sirius barked out a laugh. "Brilliant! There's nothing he can do about that, not without looking like he's stunting progress. All of them are mixing? Even the Slytherins?"

"Even the Slytherins," Remus confirmed. "Mostly with Ravenclaws, but they're branching out to Hufflepuff and even Gryffindor in some cases. Severus said he once saw Cassius Warrington and Adrian Pucey discussing quidditch strategy with the Weasley twins and Angelina Johnson."

"Wow." Sirius looked duly impressed. "It'll be a whole different school by the time Harry leaves, if he's done this much in just a few months."

"I think that's what he's hoping for." Remus reached for his tea, taking a long gulp. "Our boy is definitely up to something. He says it's just study groups and friendships, but I know that look in his eye. That's a Lily Evans Vs The World kind of look." James always used to call it that, when Lily decided there was some injustice she absolutely couldn't stand for, and would plot ruthlessly until it was righted. If Harry was taking on that look in the face of Dumbledore... the headmaster had better watch out.

"Merlin, imagine if Prongsy and Lils could see him now," Sirius sighed, smiling faintly. Remus grinned back, the ache in his chest still present, but less raw. Every day it got easier to talk about them, now he had someone to remember them with. "They'd be so bloody proud."

"Severus said his grades are improving in spades," Remus couldn't help but brag. "Minerva was raving in the staff room about an essay of his that could've come from a sixth year, and Filius said he's picking things up even faster than Miss Granger. Moody's the only one who doesn't seem to be impressed by him."

Sirius scowled at the man's name. "Yeah, well he's in Dumbledore's pocket, isn't he? Never gonna be happy about Harry getting too strong. Pup needs to be more careful; if Dumbledore thinks he's broken the Compulsion charm, he might start looking into things."

"He knows what he's doing, Pads," Remus assured. "They all just think it's research for the tournament paying off in unexpected ways. Or the fact that he's hanging around with older kids more. He spends a lot of time with the Weasley twins, these days. And, of course, the other champions." Truthfully, Remus was a little worried about the rift between Harry, Ron and Hermione. It was going to get explosive; they were all too strong personalities for it not to. It was just a matter of when and how bad.

"He seems happy." Sirius was smiling softly as he spoke, and Remus nodded.

"Happier than last year," he agreed. Deep down, he liked to hope that at least a little bit of that was due to them; he and Sirius and Severus. Giving the boy a safe place to come home to, adults who loved him. Because Severus could deny it all he wanted; he was beginning to love Harry too, just a bit.

"Did you see him?" Sirius asked.

"Just for a little while, he came down to Severus' rooms to have tea. He didn't stay long, though; Draco's giving him dancing lessons to prepare for the Yule Ball."

Sirius snorted. "We should've done that over the summer, as soon as we saw dress robes on the school list."

"I'm sure he's having much more fun learning this way," Remus assured, remembering the blush on Harry's face and the smile in his eyes as he confessed to getting lessons from Draco.

"Oh, I bet he is," Sirius drawled, smirking. "I hope there's pictures. I bet Harry'll look great in those dress robes. He's going with Amelia's niece, you said?"

"Susan," Remus confirmed. "Nice girl. Definite snake in the badger den. She'll look after Harry."

"Hopefully he has a better time of it than we did at that graduation ball," Sirius remarked. A groan escaped Remus' lips; he'd almost forgotten about that.

"I try and block that night from my memory," he confessed, making Sirius laugh. Graduation ball had been an unmitigated disaster, for everyone except James and Lily.

Remus shook his head, setting his empty teacup down and slumping back in the armchair. Harry would probably have a great time at the Yule Ball — no one was likely to hex the dance floor, after all.

It was everything else that came after it, Remus was worried about.

Chapter End Notes

This is officially the last chapter of stuff that was posted the first time around; everything from here on out is uncharted waters! I can't wait for y'all to see this story unfold <3

Chapter 26

The last week of term was dragging. Everyone was even more eager for the Christmas holidays than usual; hardly anyone fourth year or over would be going home, and the few younger students that had managed to snag invites to the ball. Harry watched the clock tick down on the last few minutes of Divination, completely ignoring Trelawney's lecture about... whatever it was she was talking about. Harry would happily admit he'd given up completely on Divination. As long as he checked which bit of the textbook they were at and filled his homework with lots of unfortunate mishaps and ominous predictions, he was making straight Os.

At last, the bell rang, and the entire class scrambled to their feet, making a mad dash for the trapdoor. Harry headed back to the tower with Parvati and Lavender, who were both discussing their dress robes. "Padma and I are wearing saris," Parvati told them, beaming. "Grandma sent them all the way from India. They're gorgeous." Parvati was going with Anthony Goldstein, and Harry was pretty sure Lavender was going with Seamus. Or maybe that fifth year Slytherin boy he'd seen her snogging in the library the other week. It was hard to keep track, sometimes.

"Do you have much family back in India, then?" Harry asked before he could help himself.

"Almost all of Papa's side of the family," Parvati confirmed. "We spend a month every summer out there, and sometimes Yule. We were supposed to go this year, but they understood when we wrote to say we were staying here."

"I wonder if I have any family in India," he mused, speaking more to himself than the girls. "Y'know, extended." He knew the Potters had been in and out of Britain since the 1600s, but Sirius said James' mother was born in India, so maybe he had family there.

"Have you ever been?" Lavender asked curiously. Harry snorted.

"Nope. I've never even left Britain. My relatives don't like me, remember?" The Dursleys would sooner cut their own limbs off than take him anywhere. "They like to pretend I'm just a bit tan."

Parvati grimaced, squeezing his shoulder sympathetically. "If you ever want to go, you can come stay with our family. The House of Patil would be honoured to host you."

That hit Harry with more emotion than he expected, and he faltered on the stairs for the briefest moment. "Thanks, Parvati." He imagined what it would be like, going to the place his family originated. He didn't speak the language, or know any of the culture or his own family history; it would probably be more embarrassing than insightful. Maybe he'd wait until he'd had the chance to raid the Potter vaults a bit, learn more about his heritage.

"I heard a rumour," Lavender drawled, bringing the conversation back to safer topics as they neared Gryffindor Tower, "that you, Harry, are going to the ball with Susan Bones. Care to comment?"

“It’s true,” he confirmed, and Parvati squealed halfway through giving the password, making the Fat Lady scowl at her.

“I knew Anthony wouldn’t lie to me about that! That’s really great, Harry; you two will look good together.”

“We’re just friends,” Harry insisted. Both girls giggled.

“We know,” Lavender chirped. “But that doesn’t mean you can’t make a great pair. And Sally-Anne is fuming, which is always a plus.”

Harry frowned at that. “She doesn’t— Sally-Anne doesn’t fancy me or something, does she?” he asked in mild alarm. He didn’t think the Hufflepuff girl even liked him — she was always glaring!

Both girls giggled, exchanging a look. “No,” Parvati assured. “But, well— she’s always been mean to Susan. As soon as the ball was announced she started saying that no one would ask Susan because she was too fat to get a date.” That made both of them scowl, and Harry’s eyes widened.

“That’s awful!” He was now even more glad he’d asked Susan to go with him. Who the hell did Sally-Anne Perks think she was, saying such things?

“She’s just jealous,” Lavender huffed. “She thinks all the boys should fancy her because she’s skinny. But Susan’s way prettier and nicer. So now Sally-Anne’s going with Wayne Hopkins, even though she really wanted to go with Roger Malone but he turned her down.”

Parvati let out a quiet, wistful sigh at Roger’s name — Harry knew the Ravenclaw boy was, according to many of the girls, the most attractive boy in their year.

“Well I’m just glad Susan agreed to go with me,” he said, not sure he wanted to get deeper into the gossip spiral. “I kept getting asked by girls I don’t even know, it was weird!”

“You’re a Triwizard champion,” Parvati reminded him, grinning. “And unlike Cedric, you’re actually single. Can you blame them for taking a chance?”

Harry managed a smile, even as something in his chest twisted painfully. He wasn’t single, but he couldn’t tell the girls that. Couldn’t tell anyone.

The common room was fairly busy, and the two girls bid Harry goodbye to head up to their dorm and... he was pretty sure they said something about trying out hairstyles. Either way he left them to it, intending on heading up to put his books away and then go find the twins for a little light hexing of random floor tiles in the Entrance Hall. Instead, he paused when a voice called his name.

“Harry, can we talk for a minute?” Hermione and Ron were sat on the sofa in the corner, Hermione’s brown eyes imploring. Ron didn’t look thrilled to be there, but he wasn’t actively glaring at Harry. Harry shrugged, changing course.

“What do you need?” he asked, sinking into the chair opposite. Hermione bit her lip.

"This has gone on long enough," she started. For a second, Harry thought she was going to confess to being a spy for Dumbledore. "I know the two of you have had... issues, this year, but really, you've been friends for far too long to let this silly tournament get in the way of that." Harry bit back a snort; if only it was just the tournament. "It's awful having the two of you fighting, and Harry I know I've been a bit short with you lately, and I apologise for that, but it's been hard, alright? I hate it, and I wish you two would just get over this and be friends again. Ronald, Harry very clearly did not put his name in the Goblet, and he needs your support, not your derision. Harry, you can't blame Ron for being a bit jealous sometimes; these things happen, and you shouldn't begrudge him his feelings."

Harry absolutely would begrudge him his feelings when those feelings made him be an arsehole, but he kept his mouth shut. He had never been able to stand up to Hermione when she brought out her sad voice, and maybe he had been a little hard on both of them lately. He was so worried about Dumbledore, he was seeing enemies everywhere, even in the two people who had been his best friends since he was eleven.

He wasn't saying they could go back to that again. His friendship group had expanded far too much for him to ever be happy with that insular little trio again. But maybe he could stop actively avoiding them, at least. That was probably a dick move on his part.

"Ron's being very silent in all this," he commented. Hermione shot the redhead a pointed glare. Ron looked like he was being forced to drink vinegar.

"I'm sorry I said what I said, about you putting your name in and everything," he muttered. He didn't sound particularly sorry. It was like watching a toddler being made to apologise by their mother. "I just... you get all this great stuff — you're school champion, you might win a thousand galleons, and that's on top of being Harry bloody Potter. And you don't even care."

"I don't want to be school champion," Harry retorted, trying not to get too angry with Ron while Hermione was sat there staring at him pleadingly. "I didn't ask for any of this. I don't know what I'd do with a thousand galleons. And mate, if you want a scar on your forehead, dead parents, and a target on your back, then by all means, go right ahead."

Ron blanched. Hermione winced. "Harry," she scolded. He shrugged, not remotely sorry.

"If he's willing to stop being a dick then I'm willing to speak to him again. But it'll take more than a half-hearted apology for me to actually forgive him."

"Hear, hear!" It was the twins, perching on the arms of Harry's chair with identical grins on their faces.

"You tell our prat brother, Harry. Look, can we borrow Hedwig for a bit?" George asked, ruffling Harry's hair absently.

"Yeah, no problem. She's been bored lately." With all his friends at Hogwarts, and the mirror to talk to Sirius and Remus, he didn't have much use for her save for the occasional letter to Mrs Frobisher, who was busy trying to get Skeeter banned from school grounds except for the tournament.

“Cheers, mate!” Fred beamed.

“What do you need Hedwig for?” Ron asked suspiciously. Both twins rolled their eyes.

“George wants to take her to the Yule Ball,” Fred deadpanned. “We’re sending a letter, you thick git. And no, we’re not telling you who. It’s none of your business.”

Harry wondered if it was anything he might know about. He’d have to ask later.

“Speaking of the Yule Ball, Harry, are you really going with Susan Bones?” Hermione asked curiously.

“Yeah,” Harry said, shrugging. “Why is it such a big deal?”

“You’re a champion,” Fred reminded him. “You breathing is a big deal.”

“You got a date yet, ickle Ronnikins?” George cooed. Ron’s ears went red.

“No,” he admitted begrudgingly.

“Better hurry up,” Fred advised. “All the good ones will be gone soon.”

“Who are you going with?” Ron tried to turn the tables on his brother. Harry rolled his eyes. Had he missed Fred disappearing off with Angelina every other day?

“Angelina,” Fred replied, grinning.

“You actually got round to asking her, then?” Harry asked with raised eyebrows. Fred kept promising to do it, and then forgetting — too busy snogging, George insisted.

“Oh yeah,” Fred realised. He glanced across the common room, where the three chasers were sat by the fire. “Oi, Angelina!” She looked up. “Wanna go to the ball with me?”

“Well that’s romantic,” Alicia muttered with a roll of her eyes. Katie giggled.

“Yeah, alright then,” Angelina agreed, a smile tugging at her lips when she turned back to the other girls. Fred looked back at his brother, smug.

“See? Easy. Hop to it, Ronnie, or you’ll have to go solo.”

The twins left, no doubt headed to the Owlery, and Ron groaned, leaning back against the arm of the sofa. “I’m doomed,” he declared. Harry snorted, sharing a look with Hermione.

“You’ll figure it out,” was his best attempt at being a supportive friend.

“So is Susan the reason you’ve been disappearing so much lately?” Hermione asked impishly. Harry looked at her curiously. “Ron said you’ve been out late a lot.” Harry wondered what Ron was doing, to be noticing that. “Is she your secret girlfriend?”

“I don’t have a secret girlfriend,” Harry groused. “I don’t have any sort of girlfriend.” He desperately tried to keep the grin off his face. Draco was certainly not a girl, even if Harry did tease him for caring too much about his hair sometimes.

“We won’t tell anyone,” Hermione insisted.

“There’s nothing to tell,” Harry returned. “I don’t have a girlfriend. It’s none of your business where I go at night.”

Hermione drew back, glancing into her lap. Harry wondered if he’d overstepped. “No,” she said eventually. “No, I don’t suppose we’re back to there, yet.”

Harry sighed, unsure what to say to her. There were so many landmines in their friendship these days, it was hard to say if it was worth trying to fix.

.-.-.

With only two days left of the term, Harry thought he’d be done having to avoid Professor Moody. The man was constantly trying to get him alone, to talk to him about the tournament, or classwork. There was something about him that made Harry’s skin crawl, but he was running out of reasons to leave his presence without coming off as outright rude. He didn’t want to get a detention over it; then he definitely wouldn’t be able to avoid being alone with Moody. He was honestly surprised the man hadn’t resorted to that yet.

If it got any worse, Harry was going to have to start keeping the map out at all times just to avoid the man. The only reason he didn’t already was because he didn’t want that magical eye catching sight of it. Dumbledore didn’t know about the Marauder’s Map, and Harry definitely wanted to keep it that way. At least the castle seemed to be on his side; staircases changing right when he needed them to, passageways that he was pretty sure hadn’t existed five minutes before he needed them. Hogwarts was definitely trying to look after the Slytherin heir.

Hearing the familiar thunk-thunk of the man’s wooden leg on the tile, Harry ducked into a passageway behind a false wall, cursing under his breath. The man was determined, he’d give him that!

.-.-.

At last, classes were over. Annoyingly, Snape was one of the only teachers who hadn’t given up trying to actually teach the distracted students, setting a quiz on antidotes for the very last lesson. Harry had spent his whole detention after the Wand Weighing catching up on antidotes privately with Snape, though, so it was easy enough. He hurried out of the dungeons as soon as Snape dismissed them, wanting to get an order out to Flourish and Blotts before they closed for the weekend, having had the perfect idea for Remus’ Christmas present. He hoped Hedwig was back from wherever the twins had sent her.

When he eventually got to the common room, after a detour to the kitchens for food — where apparently both Dobby and Winky had been hired? Who knew — he entered only to find Ron sat in a chair looking like he was about to be sick, Ginny hovering over him. The youngest Weasley seemed to be trying really hard not to laugh.

“What’s the matter with him?” he asked. Ginny glanced up at him and smirked.

“He asked Fleur Delacour to the Yule Ball.”

Harry gaped. “He what?”

“I don’t know why,” Ron moaned. “What was I thinking? She was just stood there, talking to her friends — there were so many people watching — but I’d heard she didn’t have a date and I just— it just happened!”

Ginny pat his arm sympathetically, biting her lip so hard Harry thought it might bleed. He sucked in his cheeks to stop from grinning.

“You’ll find someone,” he encouraged.

“What if I don’t?” Ron’s voice was full of despair. “I’ll be the only one in our year without a date!” Was that really true? Harry was impressed at everyone’s ability to pair up. “Except Neville, of course.”

“Neville’s got a date,” Harry piped up, glancing at Ginny curiously. Hadn’t she told him?

“What?” Ron groaned loudly. “Great! Just great. Even bloody Neville’s going with someone, and I’m not. Who’d go with him, anyway?”

“Me.” Ginny’s ears were red, but it was with fury more than embarrassment. Harry was glad he wasn’t the only one wanting to smack Ron for talking about Neville like that. “I’m going with Neville.”

“What? But— what?” Ron didn’t seem to know how to react to that.

“He asked me, I said yes. Neville’s nice.” Her voice dared him to argue.

The portrait hole opened, and Hermione walked in, eyeing the scene with confusion. “Why weren’t you two at dinner?”

“Things to do,” Harry replied vaguely.

“Ron got turned down for the Yule Ball,” Ginny piped up, a little more viciously than she would have before Ron said something about Neville.

“Oh? Eloise Midgeon starting to look a little more attractive, now?” Hermione asked icily. “All the good-looking ones taken? I’m sure you’ll find someone, somewhere who’ll have you.”

Ron scowled. Then his face did a bizarre 180 of emotions, staring up at Hermione in hopeful realisation. “Hermione. You’re a girl.”

“Really? I hadn’t noticed.”

"Well, you can just come with me, problem solved." Ron continued as if she hadn't spoken to him. Hermione huffed.

"Just because you didn't realise I'm a girl, doesn't mean no one else did. I already have a date." She was smiling the tiniest amount through her anger, and Harry eyed her in consideration. He had a sneaking suspicion who that might be; a suspicion that was all but confirmed when Hermione refused to tell Ron who it was.

"I need to find someone," Ron moaned desperately. Harry thought about it for a moment. Just about everyone he knew already had someone; Ron had left it a bit last-minute. If everyone in their year truly did have a date, that didn't leave many options.

"Hey, Ginny," he said eventually. "Did Luna stay for Christmas?" The blonde third year wasn't able to go unless one of the older students asked her. Harry hadn't spent much time with the Ravenclaw girl, but she seemed nice, if a little odd. Ginny liked her, which was enough for Harry.

Ginny pursed her lips. "She did, yeah. Said her dad's off in Hungary looking for... some sort of creature." She glanced down at her brother, then back up at Harry, starting to catch on. "Really?" She made a face. Harry shrugged.

"It'll get her to the ball." She didn't have to actually stay by Ron's side the whole time. Ron would get a date, Luna would get to come to the ball and hang out with Ginny, it was a win for everybody. Especially Harry, who wouldn't have to listen to Ron's griping about not being able to find anyone to go with for the rest of the holidays.

"I'll ask her," Ginny agreed with a sigh. "Only so that Luna gets to come too." Ginny looked like she'd be perfectly happy to see her brother go alone to the Yule Ball. Harry was honestly right there with her — especially with Ron's awful dress robes. But it would be nice for Luna to have fun.

"There you go, Ron," Hermione said, tone still a little cold. "Problem solved."

Ron didn't look thrilled about potentially taking Luna Lovegood to the Yule Ball, but he kept his mouth shut. It was the smartest decision he'd made all day.

.-.-.-.

Luckily, Luna was happy to go with Ron to the ball, promising to owl her father to send her some dress robes before he left on his creature hunt. Ron was still sulking about it — Harry couldn't figure out if his problem was going with a third year, going with Luna specifically, or having had to be set up by his little sister just to get a date — but despite their tentative truce, Harry still didn't spend much time with the redheaded boy, so he didn't care.

The weekend before the ball was a Hogsmeade weekend, and Harry took the opportunity to go down and finish off his Christmas shopping. That was his hope, at least; he'd owl-ordered for most of his presents, but there were still a few people he hadn't found the perfect gift for yet. Draco being one of them.

The dilemma of what to get his boyfriend for Christmas was one that had been plaguing Harry for longer than they'd actually been dating. Even when they'd just been friends — and Harry had had a crush the size of Scotland — what did you get the boy whose parents could and would buy him anything he wanted?

He'd already thought of and then promptly discarded a dozen ideas. He wanted the present to mean something. He wanted it to be special. But what would be special to Draco Malfoy?

Harry was alone in the village, not wanting any of his friends to question who he was buying for, but there were crowds of Hogwarts students filling the streets. By the looks of it, Harry wasn't the only one who had left his shopping until the last second. Teenagers in various states of panic rushed past him, and Harry ducked into the nearest shop to avoid the press of people.

Draco wasn't the only person he had to buy for still. He still needed to get something for Susan to thank her for going to the ball with him, and... he wanted to buy something for Snape, too. He never thought he'd say that, but there he was. Snape was part of the family now, and Harry wanted to get him a Christmas present.

The shop he'd taken refuge in seemed to be a jewellery shop of some kind, and Harry looked around curiously. Draco might appreciate something shiny? Maybe? He shrugged helplessly to himself; it was worth a shot. Browsing the glass-fronted cases, Harry let his eyes trail over the pieces. Suddenly, his eyes landed on something. A small silver pendant of a curled up dragon, its body wrapped securely around a pale blue gemstone. His thoughts didn't turn to Draco; no, he was thinking of the boy's mother.

Perhaps it was cliché. Perhaps everyone gave Narcissa Malfoy dragon-related jewellery because of her son's name. But there was something about the necklace that just felt... right.

Harry glanced up at the middle-aged witch behind the register, offering a polite smile.
“Excuse me? Could I take a closer look at this, please?”

If he was going to start ingratiating himself to the Malfoy matriarch, he'd better start early.

.-

By lunchtime, Harry had secured presents for everyone except Draco. The necklace for Narcissa, a pair of pretty earrings for Susan shaped like shooting stars, and a journal for Snape that would automatically record the status and changes in a potion, for experimental purposes. His purchases were wrapped and stowed securely in his bag, and he decided to take a break and head to the Three Broomsticks.

That turned out to be a mistake, as the pub was packed so tight Harry could barely make it to the bar, so he ordered a sandwich to go and squeezed back out into the street, eating as he walked. He was pretty sure he'd been in every shop in the village, and he was still no closer to finding the perfect Christmas present for Draco.

Looking through the window of a shop selling antiques, Harry was surprised to catch the reflection of a pair of tall redheaded figures. He turned, seeing the twins walking nearby, their heads ducked together and their faces serious. “Fred, George!” he called out to them, watching them both look up in alarm. They relaxed a little at the sight of Harry.

“Harrikins!” they greeted, changing course towards him.

“Fancy seeing you here. All alone, are we?”

“Getting up to mischief?” Fred smirked at him, wiggling his eyebrows, and Harry flushed.

“Christmas shopping,” he replied evasively; there were too many people around for him to risk mentioning who he was shopping for. “What are you two doing out here?” They looked a bit shifty — well, shiftier than usual for the twins.

The pair shared a glance. “Bit of a long story, dear Harry,” George said. Harry got the picture pretty quickly.

“I won’t ask you any questions, you don’t ask me any?” he suggested, watching the twins brighten up.

“See, this is why you’re our favourite!” Fred declared, ruffling his hair. “Be safe, little brother! Watch out for any rogue reporters!” He winked, and the pair disappeared, leaving Harry alone once more.

Harry sighed to himself, eyes scanning the shops once more. This was his last chance to shop before Christmas — unless he got a very speedy owl order in — and he couldn’t go back empty handed.

He grit his teeth, determined. It was his first Christmas with his boyfriend, and his present was going to be perfect. It had to be.

....

The Yule Ball was five days away, and Fleur Delacour had a problem.

“None of these boys are worth my time!” she declared at lunch, looking distinctly unimpressed. “‘Ow am I supposed to look fantastique when all the available ‘Ogwarts boys are... average at best?”

“I’ll try not to be offended by that,” Harry said lightly, and she jabbed him in the side.

“Two champions cannot attend togezzer, or I would ‘ave asked you,” she insisted. “But all the boys I ‘ave considered are taken. I cannot believe Roger abandoned me so last-minute!”

Harry knew she wanted to go with a Hogwarts boy, to continue the theme of international magical cooperation. She had been going with Roger Davies, but then he’d realised that the Gryffindor seventh year girl he had a crush on actually liked him back and was willing to go with him, and he’d very apologetically told Fleur he had to change his mind. Harry couldn’t believe Roger had turned down Fleur Delacour, but he supposed even Ravenclaws could be idiots sometimes.

“What kind of boy are you looking for?” he asked, knowing Fleur’s standards were incredibly high. Perhaps there was a boy who could be persuaded to ditch their date last minute to go with a Triwizard champion.

“‘E must be ‘andsome,’ Fleur said, and Harry gave her a look that said ‘obviously’. “I want ‘im to be taller zan me. A good dancer. It would be nice if ‘e spoke French, but not necessary.”

Harry racked his brain, looking around the hall as if Fleur’s perfect man might just appear out of thin air. As he glanced past the doors of the Great Hall, Cassius walked in, talking to Cedric. Harry froze, a slow smile creeping across his face. “Fleur, I’ll be right back.”

Harry sprinted across the hall, skidding to a halt in front of the two sixth years. “Cassius!” he greeted, and the Slytherin stared at him in confusion. “Do you have a date to the ball?”

“Aren’t you going with Susan?” Cassius asked. Harry rolled his eyes.

“I’m not asking for me, you git,” he muttered, though he did wonder what would happen if he turned up to the ball with Cassius Warrington on his arm. Draco would slaughter them both. “Do you have a date?”

“No,” Cassius said. “I never really got around to asking anyone.”

“Are you good at dancing?”

“Harry, I’m a Warrington.” It was much the same tone Draco had replied with when Harry had asked a similar question, and Harry snickered. He eyed the older boy carefully; he was taller than Cedric. That would make him taller than Fleur, if only by a little.

“Are you entirely opposed to the idea of having a date?” If Cassius wanted to go alone, Harry wouldn’t force him, but it would be doing him a huge favour.

Cassius frowned doubtfully. “I mean, it would depend on the date? And I’d have to check with my, uh, someone.”

“Since when did you have a someone?” Cedric cut in, looking amused. Cassius blushed.

“None of your business, Diggory,” he muttered. Cedric laughed.

“Would that someone be okay with you being a shameless piece of entirely platonic arm candy for a very pretty girl who needs to look good for some pictures?” Harry hoped whoever Cassius was dating wasn’t the possessive type. “I’ll owe you one.”

“I mean, probably?” Cassius shrugged. “I really don’t understand where you’re going with all this, Potter.”

Harry reached out, grabbing Cassius by the wrist and tugging him towards the Gryffindor table. He dragged him right up to where Fleur was sat. “Fleur, this is Cassius Warrington,” he introduced, though he was almost certain they’d met before. “Attractive, over six foot, an excellent dancer, and I'm pretty sure he speaks at least a little bit of French." It was the type of thing purebloods did, teach their kids foreign languages. Draco spoke three.

"You think I'm attractive?" Cassius' voice was quietly smug, and Harry ignored him.

He shoved Cassius down onto the bench, dropping down beside him. "Cassius, I believe you know Fleur Delacour. She's in need of a date to the Yule Ball."

Cassius blinked at him. "A very pretty girl who needs to look good for some pictures? Harry, you said nothing about it being a champion!"

"Oh, did I forget to mention that bit?" Harry replied innocently. Cassius kicked him beneath the table.

The Slytherin turned to Fleur, only looking a little bit like he thought she might eat him alive. "I'm not single," he warned her, and she laughed.

"I am not looking for a boyfriend," she assured. "Just a dance partner. May I?" She got to her feet, and Cassius did the same. Fleur manhandled him into dance hold, looking contemplative. She had to tilt her head up a little bit to look him in the eye, and after a beat, she gave a decisive nod. "You will do quite nicely." Fleur released him, stepping back with a disarming smile. "Would you go to the ball wiz me?"

"I— absolutely, yeah," Cassius agreed, nodding. "I... what colour are you wearing? Do I need to change my dress robes?"

"I will meet you tomorrow after breakfast and we shall compare," Fleur said. "If that is acceptable?"

"Works for me. I've got to go — I was trying to persuade Cedric to help me with a... thing. I'll see you both later?"

They bid him goodbye and Cassius left, still looking vaguely bewildered by the turn of events. Fleur threw an arm around Harry's neck, kissing him on the cheek.

"You are a lifesaver, 'Arry!" she declared in delight. "I 'ad assumed a boy wiz a face like zat would already 'ave a date."

"Cassius is full of surprises," Harry agreed, making a mental note to interrogate the boy about his mysterious paramour at the earliest opportunity. "Glad I could help, Fleur."

All four champions now had dates to the ball. At least, he assumed so — Viktor had yet to tell them who he was going with, but he insisted he had it covered. Harry had a pretty good idea what that meant.

It was certainly going to be an interesting night.

Chapter 27

When the four Triwizard champions had agreed to a friendly little seeker's match before Christmas, they had decided to keep it low-key, just between them.

So, naturally, the entire castle found out.

Harry walked with his Firebolt over his shoulder, wearing his Gryffindor quidditch team robes, down a gap that had parted in the huge crowd of people on the Hogwarts lawn. He met with Cedric, Fleur and Viktor in the middle, as well as another Durmstrang student called Boris. Boris had a whistle around his neck, and was holding a small metal box. "So much for keeping this quiet, eh?" Harry remarked, and the other three grinned sheepishly.

"I may haff mentioned it a couple of times," Viktor admitted.

"I told Cho, and a few friends."

"Ze Beauxbatons students asked, and I could not lie to zem."

Harry laughed. "That's alright. That lot over there are my fault," he confessed, pointing to a cluster of Hogwarts students with the rest of the Gryffindor quidditch team and Neville at the very front. "It's more fun with an audience, anyway." He hadn't expected an audience of quite this caliber, but he could handle it. It was just... practically half the population of Hogwarts, plus all the Durmstrang and Beauxbatons students. Watching him face off against an internationally acclaimed seeker.

No big deal.

Across the crowd, stood in a group of Slytherins and Durmstrang students, Harry saw Draco. The blond was sneering, but when he caught Harry's eye, his expression softened for the barest of seconds. It was enough to give Harry the boost of confidence he needed. He could do this.

"Okay," Boris declared firmly, his voice magically louder to be heard over the crowd. "Here are the rules. All four seekers will begin on their brooms with both feet on the ground and eyes closed. I will release the snitch, count fifteen seconds, and then blow my whistle. Only then can the seekers take off." His Russian-accented English filled the air as the spectators went hushed, practically vibrating with excitement. "There will be fifteen rounds, and whoever has the most points at the end wins. If it is a tie, we will have a tiebreaker round between those seekers. Usual match rules apply. Seekers, are we clear?"

All four of them nodded. Boris grinned. "May I have a volunteer each from Hogwarts and Beauxbatons?"

One of Fleur's friends, a girl called Adrienne, stepped forward with Angelina Johnson beside her. Boris held out the box, flicking it open to reveal a shining golden snitch. "Ladies, please inspect the snitch and assure our audience that Durmstrang is playing fairly."

Both girls checked the snitch over with keen eyes and wands, and eventually stepped back, handing it to Boris. “It’s clean,” Angelina confirmed. “Professional standard, not tampered with that I can see.”

“C’est bon. We are good to play,” Adrienne agreed, grinning. They stepped back to join their friends in the crowd.

“Seekers, take your places.”

Harry stood between Cedric and Fleur, with Viktor on Cedric’s other side. He grinned at them, adrenaline coursing through his body. This was going to be epic.

“Eyes closed please!” Harry squeezed his eyes shut, feeling his pulse in his ears, keeping his breathing steady as Boris announced he was releasing the snitch. The crowd was near-silent, listening to him count down. It was nothing like the seeker’s match Harry had against Charlie in the summer. He thought their audience might be more invested in this than in the Triwizard tasks themselves.

“Three...two...one...” The whistle blew and Harry took off, shooting high up into the sky and immediately looking around for any glimpse of gold. The other three seekers did the same, swooping in fast loops around their makeshift pitch. Harry didn’t bother trying to tail any of them; when there were three potential opponents, it wasn’t worth putting all his eggs in one basket. He’d never played seeker against more than one person before, and he was intrigued to see how it would end up.

He ducked beneath Fleur, who was flying in the opposite direction as him. All thought of the audience had gone right out of his mind, his only focus the snitch.

All of a sudden, he saw Cedric change course abruptly. Harry automatically went after him, not willing to take the chance that it was a fake-out — he’d made the right choice, seeing a tiny flash of gold up ahead. He leaned in flat on his broom, willing it to go faster, corkscrewing under Cedric to get the upper hand. Above him, Viktor appeared, and Fleur wasn’t far behind him. The snitch veered sharply to the left, and there was almost a four-seeker pile-up as they all changed course to follow it. Harry inched forward, feeling other people close in around him, but he was almost there... his hand closed around cool metal.

“First point goes to Harry Potter of Hogwarts!”

He’d caught the snitch. He grinned to himself, seeing Cedric scowl playfully as he slowed down, the chase over. Harry turned to fly back to the starting point, handing the snitch over to Boris.

Fourteen more rounds to go.

.-. .

By round thirteen, the competition was getting intense, but none of the seekers were showing signs of tiring. Viktor was in the lead with four points, while Harry and Fleur both had three, and Cedric was on two. Harry was sweating even in the December cold, but he couldn't stop smiling. He was having the time of his life.

"Round thirteen!" Boris announced. "Seekers, take your places!"

They'd been out there for almost two hours already, and the crowd had thinned a little. Obviously some people hadn't realised just how long it was going to take four seekers to go for the snitch fifteen times. There were still plenty of people out watching them, though — they'd even gained a couple of teachers, in the form of Flitwick, McGonagall and Sprout.

Round thirteen didn't last long — Viktor caught the snitch within the first few minutes, taking him up to five points. Harry grit his teeth, refusing to let the Bulgarian wizard get too much of a lead. If he was going to lose, he wanted to do so by only a point or two.

Round fourteen ended up with Harry hanging practically upside-down off his broom to catch the snitch above the heads of a group of sixth year girls, having to be very careful not to crash right into them. He brought the snitch back to Boris and settled in for the final round. He was only one point behind Viktor. Maybe, just maybe, he could catch it and send them into a tiebreaker.

As they reset, Viktor smirked at Harry. "Coming for my lead, are you?"

"Gonna try," Harry returned with a grin, mounting his broom and squeezing his eyes shut on Boris' command. He took off at the whistle, settling into his usual loop and seeing the other three do the same. All of them were desperate to score one last point — Viktor to secure his victory, Harry to go for the tiebreaker, and Cedric and Fleur to just stop Viktor beating the rest of them by too many points.

Suddenly Fleur was dropping into a dive, determination on her face. Harry automatically moved to follow, eventually seeing what the French witch was seeing; the snitch was practically right next to Boris, back where it had started. Cheeky little thing.

Boris seemed to realise the issue and dropped to his belly on the grass, rolling away before the two seekers could come crashing into him. Fleur was just edging in front of Harry, but he pushed on, leaning as far forward on his broom as he would dare without tipping too far and going arse over teakettle. Fleur clearly wasn't as comfortable pushing the boundaries as Harry, keeping her centre of gravity squarely over the middle of the broom, and it was that hesitation that allowed Harry to edge out and grab the snitch just ahead of her. He had to lurch back as soon as his fingers closed around metal, sliding to a halt.

The crowd was roaring. Cedric was laughing. Even Fleur looked grudgingly impressed. Viktor, on the other hand, pulled up next to Harry, staring at him for a long minute. "I vas not expecting you to be this good," he said eventually, looking quite put out about that. Harry beamed.

They returned to Boris, who looked utterly gobsmacked by the turn of events. "Friends, we have a tiebreaker situation! Harry Potter and Viktor Krum have both finished on five points! Cedric Diggory and Fleur Delacour will bow out for this final round, if I can please have a round of applause for their efforts."

Harry and Viktor both joined in with the applause, and the other two champions were smiling as they shouldered their brooms and walked to join their friends in the crowd. With just the two of them left, a hush fell over the audience. Boris flashed a smirk. “And then there were two,” he remarked, playing with the string of his whistle. “The rules are much the same. Eyes closed, fifteen seconds, start on the whistle. This will be the round that decides it — one snitch, two seekers, winner takes it all. Are you ready?”

The two seekers shared a glance, then nodded. They got into position, either side of Boris. Harry shut his eyes, taking several steady breaths to focus himself while Boris counted down, and then on the whistle he was off.

It was different, playing with two instead of four. Easier, honestly; fewer people to keep an eye on in case they saw the snitch. It felt more like a real quidditch match, except he wasn’t having to dodge bludgers — and he’d never played a real match against such a good seeker before.

The pair of them were circling up high, Harry’s eyes darting back and forth as he tried to find the snitch. Minutes passed. Of course the last round wasn’t going to go quickly; it was like the snitch knew.

All of a sudden, Viktor dropped into a sharp dive. Harry didn’t hesitate to follow — even though he’d seen Viktor use that tactic before, if there was even the chance he was going for the snitch, Harry had to tail him.

He couldn’t see anything as they sped towards the ground, but that didn’t mean Viktor didn’t have it. The grass grew closer and closer, and Harry grinned to himself He’s going for the Wronski Feint. He remembered seeing Lynch smash into the ground at the World Cup — Harry wouldn’t do that. He could handle this.

Knowing Krum was just faking him out, Harry used the dive to keep looking for the snitch, unruffled by the ever-nearing ground. He was barely fifteen feet from the grass when he saw it; a glimmer of gold. He’d have to do almost a total 180 when he pulled out of the dive, but he didn’t think Viktor had seen it.

Viktor was holding out until the last second to pull from his dive. Harry didn’t scare that easily. He was neck and neck with the Bulgarian now, Viktor flat on his broom as if he was chasing the snitch, even though Harry knew he couldn’t be. He had to wait — the snitch was closer to Viktor than him. If he pulled out too early, Viktor would see why, and he’d be able to get there first. Harry had to leave it until the very last second.

The grass was even closer. Viktor spared a split second to glance Harry’s way incredulously, then pulled up, shooting back up towards his previous position, convinced Harry was going to hit the dirt. There. Harry wrenched his broom level and twisted at the same time, his toes brushing the ground as he narrowly escaped ploughing head-first into it, the G-force dragging against him as he spun around, doing a little roll to take out some of the momentum and then speeding forwards until the snitch was in his hand.

He had done it.

He had beaten Viktor Krum at quidditch.

Blood was rushing in his ears as he slowed to a halt and stumbled off his broom, almost falling as his knees buckled slightly. Sixteen rounds of hard seeking was finally starting to get to him, and he couldn't wait to go sit down somewhere. He grinned, holding the snitch up triumphantly, barely hearing the cheers of the crowd as his racing pulse echoed in his skull.

"We have a winner, folks!" Boris was saying, striding over to Harry's side. He grabbed the hand holding the snitch, thrusting it into the air. "Harry Potter of Hogwarts takes it all! Are you all as surprised as I am?"

The official confirmation seemed to be all it took for the dam to break, and the next thing Harry knew he was being hoisted onto the shoulders of the Weasley twins, the crowd swarming around him excitedly.

"He's only bloody done it!" one of the twins crowed, their arms wrapped around his legs to keep him steady. He could see Cedric beaming in the crowd, Cho by his side applauding wildly. Over by the crestfallen Durmstrang crowd was Draco, pretending to be annoyed, but Harry could see the awe in his eyes.

Eventually the twins set him down, slapping him on the back and beaming at him. "Come up to the common room when you're done here," Fred told him. "We're definitely celebrating this. Mate, you just beat Viktor bloody Krum!"

It sounded bizarre when it was said aloud like that. Harry nodded, grateful when the twins herded the crowd back towards the castle, and turned to find Boris and give him the snitch back. The Durmstrang boy was stood beside Viktor, patting him on the shoulder. "That was a tough match," Harry said when he approached, smiling hesitantly at Viktor. He hoped the older boy wasn't too mad about it — he had a reputation to uphold, after all. "You almost had me with that feint there."

"Almost, but not enough," Viktor replied, and he was smiling. "I knew it when I saw you fly against the dragon, but I will say again — you fly very well." He reached out, clapping Harry on the shoulder. "If you are not on your country's team by the time you are my age, it will be a travesty. But when you are, I look forward to flying against you once more."

Harry gaped at him. Was Viktor seriously saying Harry could go pro? Not just pro, but international? "I... yeah," he said breathlessly, unsure what else to say to that. "Anytime you want a rematch, I'm there."

Boris plucked the snitch from Harry's fingers, grinning. "That was fun," he declared, tucking it away safely in its box. "And now the team will get off your back about training, Viktor."

"I don't know," Viktor said ruefully, "perhaps now they will be even more on my back, if I can be beaten by a fourteen year-old." He smiled at Harry to show he was teasing. Then he looked down at himself. "I need a shower."

Harry looked at the state of his own robes, and grimaced. Yeah, a shower and new clothes sounded good. How could he get so sweaty in December?

“See you at dinner?” The two Durmstrang boys nodded. Viktor paused, holding out a hand for Harry to shake.

“I am serious,” he said, dark eyes fixed on Harry. “You haft talent. If playing professionally is something that interests you, I know people. You should not waste that talent, if it is something you love.” He softened slightly. “I know you may haft other priorities. But we will keep in touch, and if you ever need help, I will be happy to assist.” There was something significant about his words and the look on his face — like he wasn’t just offering Harry help with quidditch. Harry shook his hand, equally serious.

“Thanks, Viktor. I’ll keep that in mind.”

The two boys parted, and Viktor let Boris sling an arm over his shoulder as the two of them made their way back to their ship. Harry shouldered his broom, heading up to the castle alone. At least, he thought he was alone. “Oi, Potter!” The quiet hiss made a grin tug at his lips. Draco was leaning up against the back wall of one of the greenhouses, his cheeks rosy from the cold and his hair slightly windswept. Harry’s heart skipped a beat. Merlin, he was gorgeous. “You just had to show off, didn’t you?”

Harry changed course, throwing up a privacy ward as he hurried towards Draco. Giddy from his win and unable to help himself, he grabbed the blond by the hips and spun him around, kissing him firmly. Draco’s arms automatically came up around his neck, chest pressing against Harry’s as he leaned into the kiss. When he pulled back, he made a face. “You’re disgusting right now,” he said, poking at Harry’s sweaty robes. Leaning back against the glass of the greenhouse, he smirked at Harry. “I can’t believe you just beat Viktor Krum.”

“He said I should go professional,” Harry breathed, gobsmacked.

“You certainly could,” Draco agreed. He clearly didn’t care that much about Harry’s sweaty state, as he tugged him closer, sliding a hand down to grab his arse cheekily. “I could do worse than a professional quidditch player for a boyfriend,” he teased. “At least it’ll keep you fit.”

Harry wasn’t sure what hit him harder; the thought of being a pro quidditch player, or the thought of still being Draco’s boyfriend by that time. That Draco didn’t even hesitate to assume they would still be together by then. Unable to find the words, he placed a hand either side of Draco’s head and leaned in for another kiss, moaning softly. “We’re gonna get caught,” Draco muttered between kisses, not slowing down in the slightest. Harry smirked against the blond’s lips.

“Worth it.” Even so, he eventually pulled himself away, still boxing Draco in against the greenhouse glass.

“I suppose you’ve got to go up and celebrate with all your Gryffindor friends,” Draco drawled.

“I’d much rather celebrate with you,” Harry returned. “But also I really want to put on clothes that aren’t sweaty.”

Draco snorted, shaking his head. “Such a romantic,” he teased. “Go on, sod off. If you keep kissing me wearing those, I’m going to find it very difficult to concentrate next time Slytherin play Gryffindor.” His grey eyes were dark and his pupils blown, and Harry smirked. So his quidditch robes did it for Draco, hmm? That was a good thing to know.

Feeling daring, still riding high on victory, Harry leaned in until he was pressed against Draco from knee to shoulder — until he could feel Draco’s hardness pressing against his thigh, and there was no way Draco couldn’t feel Harry’s. He let his lips trail over the blond’s jaw, feeling him tense and arch up into the touch ever so slightly. It was tempting to get carried away. They’d never gone past kissing before, except for a few adventuring hands underneath shirts. Certainly nothing like this. Harry was so turned on he could barely think, but he had enough blood left in his brain to know that getting too hot and heavy out behind the greenhouses was just asking for trouble.

“Think of this next time we play against each other,” he breathed, sucking a kiss on Draco’s neck that the Slytherin would have to cover with a glamour. Then he pulled away, green eyes glinting playfully. “I’ll see you later, Draco. I’ve got to go take a shower.” A cold, cold shower.

Stepping away as if nothing had happened, he grinned to himself at the frustrated groan Draco let out. “I hate you, Potter!” he called as Harry walked away. The Gryffindor laughed, dropping the privacy ward.

He was having an excellent day.

. . .

Luckily, when he got back to Gryffindor Tower, his mussed state could be explained away as quidditch — to everyone except the Weasley twins who were eyeing him knowingly. “Go on, loverboy,” George whispered in his ear, herding him towards the dormitory stairs with a wiggle of his eyebrows. “Go clean yourself up. We’ll stall down here.”

The common room was packed with people; not just Gryffindors, but people of all houses, wanting to celebrate Harry’s victory over the Bulgarian seeker. Even Cassius was there with a couple of his Slytherin friends, only looking a little bit disturbed at being surrounded by so much red and gold.

As tempting as it was to spend more time in the shower thinking about what might have happened if he and Draco had been a little bolder, Harry refused to let his thoughts wander far — the twins could only keep people occupied for so long. He changed into his Holyhead Harpies t-shirt and comfortable jeans, heading back down to the party. Now that he was actually paying attention, he was impressed at how quickly the twins had prepared for the gathering; there was a long table of snacks, no doubt stolen from the kitchens, and a huge stack of butterbeer crates. Music played beneath the chatter of the crowd, and they’d even managed to string some more Christmas decorations up — all in Gryffindor colours, of course.

Harry found the pair sat with an assortment of other sixth years, as well as Neville, Ginny, Ron and Hermione. There was a gap on the sofa between the twins, and Harry squeezed himself into it. “Cheers,” he said, both for the saved seat and for distracting everyone from wondering what was taking Harry so long. Fred merely winked at him, grinning.

“Where’d you get that t-shirt, Harry?” Ron asked, eyeing the green Harpies shirt over. Harry shrugged.

“Birthday present.” Let them think it was from Sirius.

“I’m glad someone here has taste,” Ginny teased, offering Harry a fist-bump. “The Harpies are way better than the Cannons.”

That set Ron off on a long rant about how the Cannons were trying their best with poor management, and Harry rolled his eyes, turning instead to the older students. “Welcome to Gryffindor,” he said to the assorted non-Gryffindors, grinning up at Cho as she returned with several bottles of butterbeer in hand, clambering over the back of the sofa to perch in Cedric’s lap. She handed a bottle to Harry, smiling.

“Oh, I’ve been up here before,” Cassius said offhandedly. “The Christmas decorations are a nice touch, though. Very festive.”

“When have you been up here?” Harry asked with raised eyebrows. The Slytherin’s olive cheeks flushed.

“None of your business, Potter,” he retorted. Harry smirked at him, wondering if it had to do with his mysterious someone. Was Cassius dating a Gryffindor?

“That was some brilliant flying, Harry!” Cho enthused, tapping the neck of her bottle against Harry’s own. “Really impressive!”

“Yeah, I didn’t know you had it in you, Potter!” Patrick, one of Cedric’s roommates, added with a grin. “Bet Krum’ll think twice about challenging people in future.”

Despite definitely being more Cedric’s friends than Harry’s, none of them seemed upset that Harry had so firmly beaten Cedric. Even Cedric himself was grinning, insisting he was proud of himself for even catching the snitch twice. “I was playing well out of my league,” he said, running a hand through his hair. “Both in brooms and in skill. But it was loads of fun!”

“I’ll let you try out my Firebolt sometime,” Harry promised. “You too, Cho, if you want.” The Ravenclaw seeker lit up at that.

While Harry was still getting random people coming up to congratulate him, the party seemed to have changed from a celebration of his victory to an informal Christmas gathering, everyone just enjoying being able to hang out. It made Harry wonder why the school didn’t have some sort of inter-house common room — again, nobody encouraged the houses to mix. It was ridiculous!

The happy atmosphere was abruptly broken when the portrait hole swung open, and McGonagall stepped into the room. She blinked, doing a double-take at the crowd inside. With a wave of her wand, the music cut off, and everyone turned to her with wide eyes. “I was told of a disruption in the Gryffindor common room,” she declared, tone firm. “What, may I ask, is the meaning of this?”

“Harry beat Viktor Krum at quidditch!” Seamus piped up from the back of the room. McGonagall pursed her lips.

“I am aware. I was present,” she said. “That does not explain why the common room is overrun. This is supposed to be a space for Gryffindors!”

“The school rules say we’re allowed to bring guests, Professor,” Katie Bell pointed out. McGonagall didn’t look impressed.

“One guest, Miss Bell,” she retorted sternly. “One guest per person.”

All of a sudden, the crowd shifted. George reached out to sling an arm around Cassius’ shoulders. Fred put a hand on Cedric’s arm. Harry reached over to grab Cho’s hand. All over the common room, Gryffindors were claiming their non-Gryffindor companions, until everyone was in pairs. Every single guest was accounted for.

McGonagall’s face was tight, her lips a thin line that most people assumed was her trying to stifle her anger. Harry knew better — his housemistress was trying really hard not to smile. “Very well,” she said eventually. “Just keep the noise down. And make sure the password is changed by this evening, Miss Dunn.” The seventh year prefect nodded, smiling with her arm linked with Beatrice Haywood from Hufflepuff.

“Yes, Professor,” she chirped, cheeks dimpled. McGonagall nodded curtly.

“Carry on, then.” She let the music resume and turned on her heel, leaving them to their party. Harry let go of Cho’s hand with a grin.

Perhaps the Gryffindor housemistress wasn’t quite as much under Dumbledore’s thumb as he thought.

.

The day after the now-legendary seeker’s match was Christmas Eve, and Harry was up in the dorm alone, reading quietly before lunch. He was sore after all that flying, and not really in the mood for being down in the crowds after the day before. Peace and quiet was becoming a rare thing, and he’d take what he could get.

Leaning back against his headboard, Harry blinked when a piece of parchment suddenly appeared between the open pages of his book. It was a small note, with only two words in a very familiar handwriting. Come down.

What did Snape need him for on Christmas Eve? Harry had assumed the man would be back at Seren Du with Remus. Maybe Remus had come to Hogwarts instead!

Perking up, Harry marked his page and set the book aside, burning the note with a quick spell. Grabbing his presents for the three adults — at the very least he could send Snape off with the presents for Remus and Sirius — he stowed them in his bag and tugged on his shoes, swinging his invisibility cloak over his shoulders.

The hallways were full of people on the way down to the dungeons, but Harry was a pro at avoiding everyone by now, bobbing and weaving through the students without any of them noticing him. He made it to the empty corridor that held the portrait entrance to Snape's quarters, and knocked. The door opened just wide enough to admit Harry, and once he was inside he took off the invisibility cloak, turning to face the room at large. His jaw dropped, before a huge grin overtook his features. “Sirius!”

His godfather was sat on Snape's sofa, and he got to his feet when Harry appeared, beaming. “Hey, pup! Merry Christmas!” Harry raced across the room and threw himself into the man's arms, a little embarrassed by how happy he was to see Sirius. Summer had been so long ago. Sirius kissed his hair, holding him tight. Suddenly, Harry pulled back.

“Is it safe?” he asked, brow furrowing in worry. “What if Dumbledore finds out?”

“Relax, cub,” Remus said from the small kitchen area, where he was pouring a glass of wine. “Dumbledore still doesn't even know that I've been visiting all term; he isn't going to know Sirius is here. It's safe.” Wine in hand, he walked over to wind an arm around Harry's shoulders, squeezing him affectionately. “Merry Christmas. I heard you had quite the quidditch match yesterday.”

“Who told you?”

“I was decorating the steps of the Entrance Hall under Dumbledore's orders,” Snape supplied. “There was a surprisingly good view of the grounds.”

It made Harry smile all the wider to think that Snape had been watching him fly, and then told Remus about it.

“I can't believe you beat Viktor Krum!” Sirius enthused, ruffling Harry's hair. “Amazing, pup!”

Harry blushed, almost saying something about Viktor's insistence he go pro after graduation. It was too early to start making career choices — especially with the way his future was looking. Once there was no longer a Dark Lord out for his blood, or a headmaster trying to manipulate him, then maybe he could think about playing professional quidditch.

“So how have you been, Padfoot? What are you doing here?”

“I'm here to see you, you twit,” Sirius replied with a roll of his eyes. “It's Christmas! Moony managed to persuade Severus to allow a minor Gryffindor invasion for the occasion.” He wiggled his eyebrows, winking at the pair. “He has to stay and chaperone the ball tomorrow, and we figured you'd be busy, so we thought we'd celebrate a day early. Is that alright?”

There was a quiet pop, and Snape's small dining table was suddenly loaded down with food, Ceri stood beside it with a bright grin on her wrinkled face. “Master Harry, sir!” she greeted. “It is good to be seeings you well. You is gettings skinny again,” she added, eyeing him over.

Harry supposed it was probably the stress of the tournament; he'd only forgotten to eat a few times in the last couple of months. "It's good to see you too, Ceri. Did you cook all this?" There was turkey and stuffing and vegetables, fluffy roast potatoes and a huge boat of gravy, even a plate stacked with pigs in blankets. The elf nodded happily.

"Christmas dinner for masters and family," she announced. "Can I be getting anything else?"

"This all looks fantastic, Ceri," Sirius told her. "Thank you."

Ceri beamed once more, then disappeared, and Sirius nudged Harry towards the table. "Go on, pup. Tuck in! You can tell me all about your game yesterday."

The four of them sat at the table, and there was a minor amount of chaos as they all served themselves, passing dishes around and trying not to spill gravy on anyone. When they all had full plates, Sirius cleared his throat. "I won't get too sappy, or Snape might come out in a rash," he said teasingly, "but for a long time, I never thought I'd have this again. Christmas. Love. Family. Yes, even you, you greasy bat," he added, making Snape scowl. "There should be more people at this table, but the world can be cold at times. So I just wanted to thank all of you, for being the warmth in my life." Sirius swallowed a little thickly. Harry wondered how many glasses of wine he'd had already. "Merry Christmas."

"Merry Christmas," they all murmured in response, even Snape, lifting their glasses to tap together in the centre of the table. Harry had been allowed a small glass of wine, and the taste was foreign; he must have made a face, as Remus chuckled opposite him.

"It takes some getting used to," he said, drinking from his own, much larger glass.

Harry was gently bullied into recounting the seekers' match as they ate, before conversation turned to other things, always managing to come back around to the Yule Ball. Every time Harry tried to ask about what the adults had been up to — any time he tried to get information about Voldemort and Pettigrew — he was gently brushed off and the subject was quickly changed. He appreciated that they didn't want to talk about such serious things at Christmas, but Harry was desperate for information. He hadn't had any more dreams that he could remember, but every now and then he woke up with his scar aching.

"Time for presents!" Sirius declared once they had thoroughly demolished the chocolate yule log cake Ceri brought in. He urged Harry over to the sofa, bounding after him. Remus and Snape followed at a more sedate pace, Remus looking thoroughly amused by Sirius' enthusiasm. Snape just looked resigned to it all, his shoulder gently pressing against Remus' once they sat down. With a wave of Remus' wand, a pile of wrapped gifts came floating over from a corner of the room, settling on the coffee table. Harry reached into his bag, adding the presents for the adults to the stack.

"Right, Harry first!" Sirius said, tossing a present Harry's way.

"No, let's all open them together," Harry insisted, not wanting all of them staring at him while he opened presents. His birthday had been bad enough! "Here, I got these for you guys." He distributed his presents, smiling shyly at Snape's look of surprise.

“You got me a Christmas present?” the Slytherin asked quietly, eyebrows rising. Harry nodded, keeping his eyes fixed on his hands in his lap as he shredded a scrap of wrapping paper. “I... thank you.”

There was a painfully awkward silence, until Remus cleared his throat. “These books are brilliant, Harry, thank you! Have you read them?” He started talking to Harry about the stack of Defence books in his lap, allowing Snape to open his present without all the attention on him — something that both Harry and the Potions Master appreciated.

By the end of it all, Harry had a small mountain of presents to take back to Gryffindor Tower, and Sirius was just tipsy enough to be singing Christmas carols at the top of his lungs. None of them were willing to tell him to stop — not even Snape. Sirius had been through a lot in the last decade; he deserved a bit of joy at Christmas. Harry merely joined in with the carols he knew, laughing when Sirius drew closer and closer to Remus, shaking him by the shoulders until he was singing with them as well. Even drunk, Sirius knew to leave Snape well alone, and the Slytherin looked like he was regretting many life choices.

“I think I’d best get this lush back home,” Remus said eventually, laughing. “Let you get on with the rest of your Christmas surprise, Harry.”

“There’s more?” Harry asked, eyebrows raised. Remus winked at him.

“I suggest when you’re done here, you head to the Potions classroom,” Snape told him, his face impassive. Harry’s curiosity began to burn; what could possibly be waiting for him in the classroom? Another present?

Sirius threw himself at Harry, making the boy stumble a little as he was wrapped in a tight hug. “Have fun at the Yule Ball,” the dog animagus instructed. “Dance lots, don’t give a damn about Skeeter or any of the reporters, and snog your boyfriend if you get a quiet minute.” He cackled when Harry blushed. “Seriously, kiddo. You’ve been under a lot of stress lately. Just forget it all and enjoy yourself, alright? You deserve it.” He dropped a kiss on Harry’s forehead, ruffling his hair.

“I’ll try,” Harry promised. He turned to hug Remus. “Thanks for coming. And bringing Sirius with you.”

“We couldn’t miss out on family Christmas,” Remus insisted. A lump grew in Harry’s throat. His first ever family Christmas, of a sort. “I’ll see you in the new year, cub. Behave yourself.” That was said with a lopsided smile; Remus knew better than to genuinely expect that of him. Harry grinned.

“I’ll try,” he said again.

“Not very hard, I’m sure,” Snape drawled lightly. Harry turned to the man, even more wrong-footed about him than he had been during the summer. At least there they were away from school and lessons and all the things reminding Harry of his evil Potions professor. Having Snape like this — like family — in the middle of the school year was weird to say the least. Just a week before, the man had been yelling at him about his stirring technique.

"I'll see you at the ball tomorrow, Professor," he said eventually, assuming the man would be going back to Seren Du as well. He and Remus hadn't exchanged gifts; they were probably going to do their own private Christmas. Harry didn't want to think about it too much.
"Thanks for hosting this."

"I don't believe I was given a choice," Snape replied, though he didn't look too upset by it.
"Enjoy the rest of your day, Potter."

"You could at least try and call me Harry, y'know," Harry replied cheekily, shouldering his bag. "It might not kill you."

"Get out of here, brat." Harry laughed, swinging the invisibility cloak over his shoulders and leaving the man's private quarters.

Harry moved as quickly as he dared under the cloak, heading straight for the Potions room. The door was locked, but a quick Alohomora made easy work of it. When Harry slipped in, he let out a quiet gasp.

The room had been utterly transformed. All the desks and chairs had been pushed to the sides of the room, and in the space in the centre was a dark green blanket laid out on the floor, a tiny little Christmas tree in the centre. Floating all around the room were multicoloured little fairy lights, twinkling softly. In the midst of it all, smiling as Harry removed his cloak, was Draco. "I was wondering when you would show up," the Slytherin greeted, sat on the blanket.

"Draco," Harry breathed, looking around in wonder. "This is amazing!"

"Uncle Severus said as long as it's all back to normal by morning, we can stay in here as long as we like," Draco relayed. He wrinkled his nose. "He also said several other things that I wish I could Obliviate from my mind, but I won't traumatiser you by repeating them."

Harry snorted, even as his stomach turned a little bit at the thought of Snape contemplating any part of his potential sex life. He hadn't had a talk from Sirius or Remus yet — he'd managed to avoid that for now by telling Sirius about the book George had given him. With any luck, it would stay that way.

He left his cloak in a pile by the door and joined Draco on the blanket, leaning in for a kiss.
"What's all this for?"

"There's no way the two of us are going to get any time alone in all of tomorrow's chaos," Draco said. "I just wanted to see you. When Severus told me what Remus was planning for today, I thought I'd jump in off the back of it, since you'd already be down in the dungeons." He smiled shyly, running a thumb over Harry's cheekbone. "I have to take my opportunities where I can. Once school starts back up, you'll be in a dozen places at once again."

"I'll still have time for you," Harry insisted.

"But will you have time for this?" Draco retorted, gesturing to the room at large. "We don't have to be anywhere or do anything until curfew. No one but Severus knows we're in here."

Harry's eyes darkened as his brain ran through several ways the evening could play out — all of which were probably things Snape had told Draco not to do. Well, what the Potions Master didn't know couldn't hurt him.

"If I'd known, I would've brought your Christmas present with me," he said sadly, thinking of the wrapped gift hidden in his trunk. Draco smirked.

"I actually had Ceri help me with that one." He gestured to the small tree on the blanket, making Harry realise there were two wrapped gifts beneath it; one of which was his gift for Draco.

"Sneaky snake," Harry murmured, pressing his lips to Draco's with a soft sigh. "Should we open them now?" He was suddenly nervous about his gift, and he didn't want to spend the whole evening worrying about Draco's response to it.

They exchanged gifts and opened them simultaneously, neither wanting the pressure of being stared at while they unwrapped their present. Harry eyed his curiously; it was a palm-sized disc of shiny black stone, engraved with runes all over. He glanced up at Draco, who smiled tentatively. "It's a Meditation Wardstone," the blond explained. "Put it under your pillow, and it'll make it easier for you to meditate before bed — and strengthen your Occlumency shields while you're asleep. I know you've been having those dreams, and I... I thought it would help."

Harry's breath caught in his throat, his gaze turning back to the stone with awe. "That sounds amazing, Draco... this is brilliant." Harry had never heard of such a thing before; they probably weren't common. What lengths had Draco gone to just to get one for him?

Suddenly, his gift to Draco seemed meagre in comparison. "I, uh— Fleur recommended it," he explained, gesturing to the book of French-language spells in Draco's lap. "Apparently there's some more obscure and older spells in there. I know it's not much, but—"

"I love it," Draco insisted, leaning over for a quick kiss. "I can't wait to find something to hex Weasley with — even Granger will never think of a French counter-spell." Harry snickered; the way the pair had been treating him all year, he'd like to see that, too.

Still beaming from his gift, Harry shuffled closer to Draco. "So what's the plan now?" he asked playfully, watching Draco's eyes widen.

"We could play cards," Draco suggested casually, even as his fingers began to creep up towards the hem of Harry's t-shirt.

"Hmm," Harry agreed, running his fingers through Draco's pale hair.

"We could have another dance lesson."

Harry made a face at that, and Draco chuckled. Suddenly, he stretched his leg out and pushed, toppling Harry gently until he was on his back on the blanket, Draco's knees either side of his hips. The blond leaned in close. "We could talk about how hot you looked on your broom yesterday, and how much of an arse you were to just leave me in that state.” His words came out as a growl, and Harry smirked.

“I thought you liked my arse,” he teased, fingers still twined in the short blond strands at the back of Draco’s head, bringing him in for a kiss. Draco groaned.

“Missing the point, Potter,” he muttered. He lowered himself slowly until he was propped up on his elbows, chest-to-chest with Harry, and both boys gasped as something else connected much lower. Harry wiggled until only one of his legs was between Draco’s, the other bent slightly to keep the taller boy in place as he leaned up into the kiss, sneaking one hand up the back of Draco’s shirt. Draco’s hips rocked down against his, and Harry let out a muffled groan.

“Draco,” he breathed, his pulse pounding wildly. They’d never done much past a little snogging and above-belt groping, and he was near dizzy with how good it all felt. He tugged at the hem of Draco’s shirt. “Can I? Off.”

“You too,” Draco urged, sitting up and pulling off his t-shirt. Harry forgot to breathe for a second. The blond’s skin was pale and flawless, two dusky pink nipples perked on his chest, the ridges of his abs holding a faint dusting of silvery hair that trailed down to the waistband of his trousers. Fuck, he was hot.

Draco’s blush turned out to go all the way down his neck and chest, and he hurriedly pulled at Harry’s t-shirt until the Gryffindor sat up the best he could, trying not to get his glasses tangled in the shirt as it came over his head. It was Draco’s turn to stare.

Harry squirmed, forcing himself not to cover his chest with his arms; the summer at Seren Du had helped, but he was still a little scrawny, with the barest attempt at chest hair just beginning. He was glad for the low light of the classroom, hoping it would be enough that Draco wouldn’t see the scars from his time at the Dursleys. Most of them were on his back, anyway.

“Beautiful,” Draco declared in a whisper, leaning down to kiss Harry, gasping into it as their bare skin pressed together. “Harry, Merlin,” Draco’s hips began to rock more frantically, and Harry matched him, desperate for more friction. It felt amazing, like fireworks against his skin and in his belly, Draco’s lips moving down to suck bruises on his neck, fingers skating up his abs and then down, lower, brushing over the front of Harry’s jeans. Harry moaned, his vision going white as he was overloaded with sensation, coming in his jeans and pressing up against Draco’s fingers. He heard Draco swear softly, bucking his hips a couple more times, and then the blond bit down on his neck to stifle a cry, slumping against him after few moments.

They lay there for several long seconds, breathing heavily, Harry’s fingertips absently tracing the ridges of Draco’s spine. “Wow,” he murmured. Draco shifted a little, tilting his head to look him in the eye.

“If you say that was ‘nice’, I’m going to hit you.”

Harry barked out a laugh. “That was a lot better than nice,” he assured, smirking. “That was... wow.” He’d never done anything like that before. Barely even let himself imagine it. Even without Draco touching him down there, it was still so much better than being by himself in the dorm. “Pretty sure that was on Snape’s list of things not to do in here.”

“Ugh, don’t bring my godfather into this,” Draco said with a grimace. He rolled off Harry, but didn’t go far, their shoulders pressed together. “Now I’m all sticky.”

Harry reached for his wand, casting a Cleaning charm over them both. It felt odd on his oversensitive skin, but it was better than the uncomfortable mess cooling in his boxers. He turned his head to the side, looking at Draco, unable to keep the soft smile off his face. The Slytherin looked at him suspiciously.

“Why are you grinning like a loon? Did I break you already?” Harry laughed again, rolling over so he was the one on top this time, pinning Draco’s hands beneath his own and leaning down to kiss the tip of his nose.

“I’m just really happy,” he admitted, uncaring that it made him sound like the sappiest Gryffindor around. He’d had a great day with his family, and now he got to be alone with his boyfriend. It was the best Christmas he’d ever had.

“Gross,” Draco declared, but he was smiling too, tangling his fingers with Harry’s. “You’re going to destroy my reputation one of these days, Potter.”

“Too late, you chose this,” Harry retorted smugly. He shuffled down until he was lying half on top of Draco, head pillowled on the blond’s shoulder. “That’s the thing about Gryffindors; we’re stubborn. You’re stuck with me now.”

Draco sighed, even as his hand curled possessively around Harry’s hip. “So many regrets,” he murmured, making Harry grin.

“Liar.”

.-.-.-.

It took a lot of effort for the pair to pry themselves apart once curfew drew nearer, but eventually they managed it, Harry giving Draco one last long kiss before leaving the blond to set the classroom back to rights, heading up to Gryffindor Tower. He took his cloak off a few corridors away, falling in with all the other students cutting it very close to curfew. He tried to get the stupid smile off his face before he went into the common room, but it was a lost cause. He kept his head down and made a beeline for the stairs up to the boys’ dorms, praying he could get into bed without anyone asking where he’d been.

Luckily, Neville was the only one in the dorm when Harry entered, and the Longbottom heir gave him a once-over, eyebrows raising in suspicion. “I’m not going to interrogate you,” he said eventually. “I’m pretty sure I don’t want to know.”

“You’re the best, Neville,” Harry said sincerely. Neville grinned at him.

"I'm just glad to see you happy." His hazel eyes turned mischievous. "You, uh, might want to learn some glamour charms, though."

Harry's cheeks burned as he slapped a hand to his neck, where he was sure there were several love bites. Damn it, Draco! Neville snickered.

The dormitory door slammed open, and Ron came stomping in with a dark look on his face. "Where have you been?" he asked Harry rudely. Harry resisted the urge to glare.

"None of your business," he replied automatically, his good mood deflating instantly. "I'm going to bed."

He didn't blame Dean and Seamus for hardly ever being in the dorm these days, if this was what Ron was like all the time. Hopefully things would get better after Christmas.

Chapter 28

After the little Christmas celebration with his family (and his boyfriend) the day before, Christmas Day itself was somewhat underwhelming for Harry, though he did appreciate the visit from Dobby, managing to find a pair of Uncle Vernon's socks to gift the elf. Ron was in a foul mood, but Harry was happy to leave him to it, heading down to breakfast with the other three boys from his dorm. They chatted excitedly about the evening's plans. The rumour going around the school was that the Weird Sisters had been booked for it, and Harry — who had gotten into the habit of putting his Wireless on in the background while he read in the dorm — was hoping it was true.

"Still can't believe you're going with Susan Bones, Harry," Seamus said with a shake of his head. "Now there's a girl with some serious curves." He made a lewd gesture at chest-height to emphasise his point, wiggling his eyebrows.

Harry hadn't really noticed, and he shrugged awkwardly. "She's nice," he said. "And she doesn't mind having to dance in front of everybody." He had assured her that he'd had lessons, and wasn't going to make a fool of either of them. Susan was being very trusting in taking his word for it. "Besides, Lavender's pretty too."

"Don't know how I managed that one," Seamus agreed. "Thought for sure she'd go with that Slytherin bloke in the year above, but I figured I might as well chance it." He smirked wickedly. "She's been all secretive about her dress robes, won't tell me what they look like. I'm just wondering if I'll get to see what she's got underneath them!" He chuckled, and Dean punched him in the arm.

"Not if she hears you talking about her like that, you won't," he scolded. Seamus shrugged.

"You can't say you're not hoping for a little private goodnight with Lisa," he teased, speaking of Dean's Ravenclaw date, Lisa Turpin. The dark-skinned boy ducked his head sheepishly.

"I mean, I won't say no," he drawled, earning a laugh and a punch from Seamus.

"Exactly! What about you two, eh? Gonna sneak your dates off into the courtyard to hide in the bushes?" Seamus wiggled his eyebrows, and Harry made a face.

"Susan and I are just friends," he said for what felt like the hundredth time.

"Ginny has way too many older brothers around for me to even think about anything like that," Neville piped up fearfully. Dean winced.

"Yeah, mate, you don't wanna get on the wrong side of the twins. Not with all that stuff they've been inventing lately." The twins were loving having everyone at school for the holidays; plenty of unsuspecting people around to test their inventions on. Everyone in Gryffindor had learnt to be very wary of accepting food from others.

The conversation turned less crude as they strode in to breakfast, Harry smirking when he saw Snape was conspicuously absent from the head table. Dean and Seamus broke off to go sit with Parvati and Lavender, while Harry and Neville wandered towards the twins.

“Morning, boys!” the redheads greeted, shuffling down to make room. “Merry Christmas!”

“Merry Christmas,” Harry replied. “Thanks for the present!” They’d given him a selection box of some of their latest inventions, with a note encouraging him to use them on their youngest brother when he was being a prat.

“You too, mate!” George said, grinning. Harry’s present for the twins was a voucher for Slug and Jigger’s apothecary, as he knew how many potion ingredients they went through making their products and pranks.

“All set for the ball, are we?” Fred asked, passing the orange juice Harry’s way. “Ready to dance your little socks off in front of everyone, champion?”

“As ready as I’ll ever be,” Harry said, shrugging. “I figured once the first dance is out of the way, it won’t be so bad.” Professor McGonagall had promised him that the champions only had to open the dance by themselves; one song, and then everyone else would be dancing and he didn’t have to step foot on the dance floor again if he hated it. He didn’t think Susan would let him get away with that, but it was a nice hope.

A thought occurred to Harry, and he turned to George. “Who are you going to the ball with?” he asked, realising he had no idea. He’d seen Fred ask Angelina, but George had been surprisingly quiet on the matter.

George’s face turned almost as red as his hair, and Fred’s lit up in a grin. “Our dear brother is crossing enemy lines,” he teased. “Going with that bloke from Durmstrang, the one who reffed your quidditch match.”

“Boris?” Harry checked, humming thoughtfully. The Durmstrang boy was very handsome, and he seemed to have enough of a sense of humour to keep up with George for a night. “Nice one, well done.” George grinned, though he was still pink.

“Figured I’d do my bit for international cooperation.”

“Oh, I’m sure you’ll be cooperating with him plenty,” Fred ribbed, nudging his brother in the side.

“Is it true you got asked by Adrian Pucey?” Neville cut in, not batting an eyelash at the news that George was going with another boy. George snorted.

“Yeah. Probably would’ve said yes if I hadn’t asked Boris already,” he admitted. “Felt a bit bad about turning him down, actually.”

Harry opened his mouth to argue instinctively, then shut it again; Pucey had never actually attempted to foul anyone on the Gryffindor team when they played one another, unlike most of the rest of his team. Even Draco. Harry certainly had no room to judge there. He remembered what George said about Slytherins being attractive, and wondered if the Weasley had a type. “I thought you said you didn’t like pretty,” he said thoughtlessly, and George smirked.

“I said I don’t like the same kind of pretty you do. Adrian’s not pretty, he’s just got cheekbones.”

Neville gave Harry a bit of an odd look at that, and Harry’s stomach squirmed. He really had to tell Neville soon.

After breakfast they went back up to Gryffindor Tower, where the twins attempted to cheer Ron up a bit with several games of exploding snap. That didn’t really work, but the youngest Weasley brother did perk up when they went down for Christmas lunch. The tables were groaning with the weight of all the food, Christmas crackers exploding all over the hall, everyone talking and laughing and excited for the evening to come. They were all kicked out of the hall as soon as lunch was over, so the house elves could re-decorate for the ball, and Fred and George managed to gather a crowd for a snowball fight out in the grounds.

What started out as Hogwarts VS the other schools soon turned into a chaotic free-for-all as alliances were formed and broken, and sacrifices were made. Hermione had intended to just watch, but that went out of the window when one of Viktor’s snowballs ‘accidentally’ went wide and hit her in the shoulder. Harry laughed as a flick of Hermione’s wand had a whole host of snowballs chasing after the Bulgarian.

“Harry, duck!” He followed the instruction instinctively, looking up just in time to see Blaise Zabini get hit square in the face with a snowball. Harry hadn’t even realised Blaise was out there with them. The Slytherin boy scowled, looking for his attacker — Cassius, hiding behind a snow bank Cedric and Cho had built and then been promptly run out of.

“You’re dead, Warrington,” Blaise declared, sprinting away from Daphne’s side and reaching down into the snow.

As the evening drew on and the ball grew ever closer, people slowly began to abandon the snowball fight in favour of getting ready. Ron seemed utterly baffled when Hermione declared she was heading up to her room at five, and even more bewildered when several other girls followed. “How can it take them three hours to get dressed?” he asked, and Harry sighed, sharing an amused look with Ginny.

“You don’t understand girls at all, do you?” the redhead girl said sadly. She hopped to her feet, sending one last snowball careening towards George. “I’m off, I’ll see you boys later. Ron, don’t lose track of time; you’re supposed to meet Luna in the Entrance Hall at quarter-to.” She still didn’t seem thrilled at letting her best friend go to the ball with her brother, but Luna was so excited to get the chance to go at all Ginny wisely kept her mouth shut. Harry suspected she was just waiting for Ron to do something to give her the excuse to hex him.

By six, it was getting too dark to properly see where snowballs were coming from, so the remaining fighters called it even and went back into the castle after a few Drying charms, disappearing off to their respective common rooms. The closer he got to Gryffindor Tower, the more Harry started to feel his nerves. “What if I freeze up?” he fretted. “What if I trip and fall over in front of everyone and Susan hates me and never speaks to me again and I've ruined everything?"

Neville snorted. "Susan wouldn't let you fall over," he assured. "She'd hex you into dancing properly before it got to that." Harry didn't think that sounded like too bad a deal, and he said as much, making Seamus laugh.

"You'll be fine, mate," the Irish boy insisted. "Just don't stare at her tits and you'll be grand." Dean thwacked him over the back of the head.

Harry doubted that was going to be a problem for him, but kept that to himself.

His dress robes were folded neatly in his trunk, and Harry got them out, finding the shirt and trousers that went under them. The shirt was a tunic-style shirt in a muted gold colour, with a high collar and shiny gold buttons down the front. The trousers were so dark green they were almost black, close-fitting without feeling uncomfortably tight. They were surprisingly comfortable, and Harry looked himself in the mirror before he put the robes on over them. He'd chosen that particular shirt because it was vaguely Indian-inspired, and it took his breath away to see himself in it. He'd never worn anything remotely like it before — he'd worried he'd look silly, but it actually looked good!

Shrugging into the robes and buttoning up the front, he turned back to the mirror for the full effect. The robes were a dark emerald green, with gold embroidery around the cuffs and hem that was also Indian-inspired, to go with the shirt.

"Wow, Harry!" Seamus' appreciative whistle cut into his daze, and Harry blushed. The other Gryffindor wore light blue dress robes with a bright purple shirt beneath them.

"It's not too much?" Harry asked, unused to wizarding clothing at all, let alone formal wear.

"You look great," Neville insisted quietly from where he was buttoning up his own robes. They were much more traditional in style, a dark red colour that made his hazel eyes glow. It made him look older, and surprisingly handsome. Ginny was a lucky girl.

Harry told him as much, watching the boy's ears turn almost as red as his robes. Across the room, there was a low curse.

Ron was stood in the middle of the dorm, staring at himself in the mirror with a look of utter disgust on his face. Harry tried not to laugh. His dress robes did look awful. Harry wondered how much he was regretting not taking Bill's old set. "I can't go out like this," Ron groaned. "I'll be the laughing stock of the school!"

"It's not that bad," Dean attempted, keeping a remarkably straight face. Ron glared at him.

"It's hideous! Look at this lace!" The robes didn't look much better on than they did on the hanger, like Ginny had laughingly assured her brother they would. They weren't terrible by themselves — old fashioned, sure, but not the worst — but the fraying lace... it wasn't a good look.

“Come here a second,” Harry said, taking pity on the redhead. Luna would have a terrible time if her date was scowling and sulking all night.

A few Cutting charms later, and there was a... marginal improvement. Harry managed to get rid of the lace, but there were a few frayed edges, and he could do nothing about the old-fashioned style of the robes themselves. For Ron, it wasn’t enough. “I look ridiculous,” he muttered, scowling at his reflection. Harry shrugged.

“Well, I tried,” he said, heading back towards his own bed. Sirius had given him some hair potion that he insisted would tame the wild Potter hair — James swore by it, apparently. Harry was determined to at least try.

Twenty minutes later, Harry hardly recognised his own reflection. With a comb, the potion, and a little help from Dean, Harry’s hair was more ‘tastefully mussed’ than ‘dragged through a hedge backwards’. It was by no means neat — Harry thought that was asking far too much — but it was better.

“I think we’re ready,” Neville declared, appearing at Harry’s shoulder. “Even if we’re not, we have to go. McGonagall will kill you if you’re late.”

He had a point, so Harry bid the rest of his roommates goodbye and followed Neville down to the common room. Ginny was waiting, and the sight of her made Neville almost trip down the stairs. Harry steadied him, grinning.

The Weasley girl was in pastel blue dress robes with a sweetheart neckline, the cap sleeves made out of floaty sheer blue material. There was a gold pendant in the hollow of her throat, and her fiery hair was half-up in an elaborate braid, the rest hanging straight down her back. She had make-up on for the first time Harry had ever seen, her brown eyes sparkling as she turned to look at Neville. “Hi,” she greeted shyly, hands behind her back.

“Hi.” Neville’s voice was a little breathless, and he coughed. “You look really pretty, Ginny.” She grinned, giving a little twirl.

“Thanks! You look great. You too, Harry — I like the hair!”

Harry resisted the urge to run a hand through his hair, undoing all of his and Dean’s hard work. “Thanks, Gin. I’d better go meet Susan, but I’ll see you two at the ball?” He nudged Neville closer to Ginny, clapping him on the shoulder. “Look after her.” He leaned in, kissing Ginny’s cheek. “Look after him.” Then, with a wink, he was hurrying out of the common room.

He’d agreed to meet Susan on the stairs by the Entrance Hall, and he sped past several people in dress robes on their way to meet their own dates. When he caught sight of her, he grinned. Her dress robes were a deep burnished gold colour, tight below her bust and flaring out over the curve of her stomach and the width of her hips. They shimmered in the candlelight, the full skirt trailing all the way down to the floor, and glittering beads embroidered on like constellations. Her hair was pinned up like a bright copper waterfall, and the earrings Harry had given her for Christmas sparkled at her ears. “Not bad, Potter,” she said by way of greeting, eyeing him up and down. “I think I can handle being seen with you tonight.”

"So glad to hear it," Harry replied dryly. "You look beautiful, by the way." If he was remotely interested in girls, he'd probably be having some very confusing feelings right about now. "Shall we?" He offered an arm, and she looped hers through it, falling into step beside him to go find McGonagall and the rest of the champions.

They found them outside the main doors to the Great Hall, gathered in a small cluster, and Cho let out a playful wolf-whistle when Harry approached. "Don't you two clean up nicely!"

She had Cedric's hand in hers, and was wearing gorgeous blue and silver dress robes that were definitely East Asian in style, her hair pinned up with a pair of silver hair sticks. Cedrics's dark blue dress robes were simple but impeccably tailored, and looking at him made Harry's pulse tick up a little.

Beside them were Fleur and Cassius — Fleur looked every inch of her veela heritage in silver satin dress robes with a bodice that hugged her curves and flared out at the waist, her hair hanging loose and needle-straight like a curtain of silk. Cassius' slate grey robes had a slight sheen to the material that complimented Fleur's robes nicely, and beneath that he had a dark green shirt that was open a little at the collar. His dark hair was combed perfectly, and Harry's heart fluttered when the Slytherin smiled at him. How had he ended up surrounded by so many damned attractive people??

"You all look amazing!" he enthused. "Where's Viktor?"

"Over zere, waiting for 'is date," Fleur supplied, pointing across the hall. Viktor stood at the base of the stairs, wearing red dress robes with fur trim. He looked a little uncomfortable in such formal attire, but he was still distractingly handsome. He caught sight of something — or rather someone — that made him stand a little straighter, offering his arm out with a smile. Harry gaped at the girl who took it.

Hermione didn't look like herself at all. She wore dress robes of a floaty periwinkle blue material that shimmered with every movement, standing out against her dark brown skin, and her hair was sleek and straight, done in a very complex-looking up-do that made her look far older than fifteen. She was beaming, showing off her newly-corrected teeth, her lips painted a rosy pink and her pale blue eyeshadow glittering in the low light of the hall. Viktor bowed over her hand and kissed it, then tucked her arm through his own and walked her towards the group, looking very pleased with himself. Harry had to admit, Hermione looked stunning.

"Hi Harry, Susan," she greeted, smiling widely. "You look great!"

All Susan seemed to be able to do was stare. Harry grinned back at his friend. "You look beautiful, Hermione. Viktor, you behave yourself, alright?" he added mock-threateningly, making the Bulgarian laugh.

"I haff no doubt Hermy-own will hex me if I put a foot wrong," he pointed out. He still struggled to say Hermione's name, but she certainly didn't seem to mind.

McGonagall arrived in robes of red tartan, surveying them all with a look of mild pride. "Excellent, you're all here. Are you ready?"

They got in line, Harry at the back with Susan's arm in his, and followed the deputy headmistress into the hall.

The house elves had outdone themselves with the decorations; it was hardly recognisable as the same hall they'd had lunch in, looking like a veritable winter wonderland. Harry was glad the house tables had been exchanged for smaller, round tables, with a main table up at the head of the room where the judges sat, empty seats available for the champions. Harry's eyebrows rose when he saw Percy Weasley sat where Mr Crouch should be, wearing navy blue dress robes that looked brand new. What was he doing there?

As they positioned themselves on the dance floor, Harry let his eyes sweep the crowd for a minute. Ron was staring at Hermione like he'd never seen her before, and even Ginny — who definitely knew who Hermione's date was before tonight — looked stunned. Far away from them, with Pansy Parkinson on his arm in a set of frilly pale pink dress robes, was Draco. Wearing black velvet dress robes that hugged his chest and shoulders, and made Harry immediately want to rip them off the blond boy. How dare he look that good when they were in public and Harry had to pretend to hate him?

Susan cleared her throat to get his attention, setting his hand on her waist. "You promised me you'd be good at this, Potter," she reminded him, her gaze sharp. Harry smiled at her.

"Don't worry, I've got this."

The music started, and they were off.

Draco had been right that Susan would be much taller than him in her heels, but it didn't bother Harry in the slightest as they stepped and spun. He saw the faint look of surprise on her face as he turned out to be fairly capable, before it was replaced by an exhilarated grin; Susan clearly loved dancing. Harry definitely wasn't going to get away with just dancing once. He didn't mind that so much — he was having fun, too.

The first song ended, and after a short round of applause the second one began, the dance floor filling with people. "Who taught you?" Susan asked suspiciously, settling into an easier waltz. "You're better than I thought you'd be."

Harry thought of late nights in empty classrooms with Draco's hand in his, going over the steps again and again, rewarding him with kisses every time he managed to get it right. He grinned to himself.

"You wouldn't believe me if I told you."

.-. .

There were only a handful of dances before it was widely suggested that everybody sit down and eat, and Harry found himself gently herded off the dance floor and up to the top table with the rest of the champions and their partners. He ended up sat next to Percy Weasley, who was oozing with pride. "I got promoted," he declared as soon as Harry sat down. "I'm now Mr Crouch's personal assistant, and I'm here representing him."

"Congratulations," Harry replied agreeably, glad Percy seemed to be doing well at work. He was a bit of a smug git, but he wasn't all bad. Certainly not Harry's least favourite Weasley sibling at the current moment in time.

Speaking of, Harry could see Ron sat with Luna, Ginny and Neville a few tables away. He was entirely ignoring them, too busy glaring at Viktor Krum. It made Harry sigh to himself; that was an explosion he'd love to avoid.

Dinner was surprisingly enjoyable, despite the judges' presence at their table. Harry spent most of it talking to Susan, Fleur and Cassius, as they were sat on Susan's other side. "We've really managed to do well for school representation here," Susan remarked at one point. "One from each of the foreign schools, and at least one from every Hogwarts house. Was that on purpose?"

Harry refused to admit that getting Cassius to go with Fleur had been partly because he was a Slytherin, insisting that it just happened to work out that way. He just hadn't wanted the snake house to get left out.

Susan barely let him sit and digest his food before they were back out on the dance floor, but she didn't stay in his arms for long. "Mind if we trade?" It was Cedric and Cho, waltzing effortlessly towards them, and before Harry knew it he had Cho in his arms, and Susan was off into the crowd with Cedric. Cho giggled, adjusting Harry's hold and nudging him into action.

That started a series of mid-dance partner changes, until Harry had danced with every single one of the champions and their dates, as well as Ginny, Neville, both the Weasley twins, Anthony Goldstein, both Patil twins, Luna, Daphne Greengrass, and at one point Professor McGonagall, who looked equally confused as to how she ended up there. "I hope you're not considering asking Professor Snape to dance," she said with a dubious look towards the dark-haired Slytherin, who was lurking in the back corner of the room, looking surprisingly handsome in jet black dress robes. Harry hoped Remus got to see him in the robes before the night was through, if he hadn't already.

"Don't worry, Professor," Harry assured with a grin as they twirled through the crowd. "Contrary to popular belief, I don't actually have a death wish." That drew a reluctant chuckle from the professor, and when the music ended Harry released her with an over-the-top bow. She shook her head exasperatedly.

"Just like your father," she muttered, fondness creeping into her tone. "Stay out of trouble, Potter."

Harry saluted with a laugh, then turned away to head to the table, his legs starting to ache from all the dancing. He reached for his glass of water and drained it thirstily. Within a few moments, Luna appeared beside him, stealing Susan's seat. "Hello, Harry," she said airily, smiling. Her dress robes were a pretty lavender colour, with strange creatures embroidered on them. Her earrings looked to be made of tiny purple feathers. "Lovely night, isn't it?"

"Brilliant," he agreed, surprised at how much fun he was having. "Where's Ron?"

“Oh, he wasn’t much for dancing, so I left him over there,” Luna replied, gesturing to the other side of the dance floor. Harry could just make out Ron sat alone at a table, scowling into his glass of pumpkin juice. Served him right.

“Probably for the best,” Harry said, gaze scanning the crowded dance floor. Susan was with Ernie, laughing as they waltzed together. Harry’s chest gave a little twinge at the sight of Draco and Millicent dancing together, the shy girl looking pretty in black and silver dress robes. Draco was smirking, the collar of his robe undone a couple of buttons. He was so handsome it physically hurt Harry to look at him. He tore his gaze away, smiling to see the twins messing with Boris, switching partners with him and Angelina so quickly it was hard for him to figure out which twin he was dancing with. Angelina was laughing so hard she could barely stand up straight, which was just making the whole affair even more entertaining.

“I think they’re about to change bands soon,” Luna commented absently, her eyes on the string quartet currently playing. Harry raised an eyebrow.

“Bands?”

“Oh, yes. It won’t be formal dancing for the whole night. I rather think everyone’s had about enough of that. The Weird Sisters will be playing soon.” It was said with a strange sort of confidence that Harry noticed Luna had only sometimes, but she was never wrong when she did. Ginny had wondered if Luna was some sort of Seer, and Harry was starting to think she might not be too far off the mark.

“Really? Brilliant!” Harry was even less prepared for informal dancing than he had been for the formal stuff, but it couldn’t be too hard to figure out.

Sure enough, the quartet announced their final song, and Susan retrieved Harry from the table to drag him back out there. “You holding up alright?” she asked in concern, and he grinned.

“Better than I thought I would be,” he admitted. “But looking forward to something a little less stuffy.” Susan nodded in agreement, and when the song ended, she offered him a low curtsey.

“It’s been a pleasure, Heir Potter,” she said quietly, grinning. He bowed in return.

“The pleasure has been all mine, Heir Bones.” He paused, side-eyeing her. “But you’ll still dance with me to the Weird Sisters, right?”

Susan laughed, linking her arm through his as they headed back to their table. “Yes, I’ll still dance with you,” she promised, patting his hand.

All the champions returned to the tables, and Viktor and Cassius volunteered to go retrieve drinks from the bar, which was serving things more interesting than water or pumpkin juice. Nothing alcoholic of course, but brightly coloured fruity drinks that fizzed and smoked.

“Having fun?” Harry asked Hermione, who had been beaming so wide all night her face had to be hurting.

“The best time,” she said with a giggle. “Harry, this is ridiculous! I’m here in this castle wearing this amazing dress and dancing with an international quidditch star. It’s like something out of a movie!”

Harry laughed, glad she was enjoying herself. Maybe it would ease some of the tension between them. As long as she didn’t think too hard about Ron.

Accepting something bright green and bubbling from Cassius, Harry took a hesitant sip to find it was sweet and tasted of apples. “Not bad!”

The Slytherin stole the drink from Harry’s hand, taking a sip with a contemplative look. “Not as good as mine, you can keep it,” he declared eventually, holding up his neon blue drink. Harry snorted.

“Gee, thanks.”

Susan stole Harry’s drink next, offering her own violently pink concoction in return. Harry shrugged, sipping and getting hit with a blast of cherry. “That’s really good, actually,” he said as he offered it back to Susan, who shook her head.

“I’m keeping yours,” she told him. “You can have that one.”

Harry shrugged, and kept drinking.

As Luna had promised, after a fifteen minute interlude in which people got drinks, chatted and rested their feet, the Weird Sisters arrived on stage, and the students went wild. Harry was amused to see most of the adults had retreated to the back of the room; far enough away to still be chaperoning, but well out of the throng of screaming teenagers.

Harry looked around to see the others had all finished their drinks, and met Fleur’s eye. She was smirking, surveying the group. “Let’s dance.”

They headed onto the dance floor, easily finding a group of familiar faces; Neville and Ginny, the twins and their dates, and Luna. Ron was still nowhere near the dance floor. Harry didn’t even know if he was still in the room. “There you are, mate!” George cheered, his hand in Boris’ and his lips already kiss-swollen. That explained where those two had disappeared off to during the interlude.

The first song started up to a riot of screaming, and Harry soon discovered that informal dancing was mostly a lot of jumping around and shaking your hips, with the occasional ridiculous overdramatic dance move thrown in — usually courtesy of the Weasley twins. It wasn’t a partner type of dance, so Harry was in the middle of a crowd of people, grinning as Susan shimmied up beside him.

He was having the time of his life!

At one point, Susan was stolen for a while by her fellow Hufflepuffs, but she returned quickly with them and their dates in tow. Harry happily shuffled back to make room for the new additions, and was surprised when Blaise and Daphne joined them, dragging Millicent

Bulstrode and Theodore Nott along with them. For a brief moment, Harry was hopeful Draco might join them, but he pushed the thought away; whatever strides they'd been making towards house unity, there was no way Draco could be seen fraternising with Gryffindors and Hufflepuffs. His father would kill him. Harry was even surprised Nott was there — from what he knew, the boy's father was pretty strict about blood purity, and had been one of Voldemort's most devoted followers.

Sure enough, Draco and Pansy were across the room with a group of older Slytherins and Durmstrang students. Harry spotted Adrian Pucey getting rather cosy with a boy from Beauxbatons; clearly not too upset about George turning him down.

A hand tugged on his arm, and Cho nudged him into a dance hold that was very different from the waltz, laughing at the look on his face. "Loosen up, Harry!" she teased, placing her hands on his hips and forcing them to move to the beat. Harry's cheeks were burning, especially when Cedric wolf-whistled.

"Your girlfriend is manhandling me, Diggory!" Harry called. "Aren't you going to do something about it?"

"I could always manhandle you instead?" Cedric offered, laughing when Harry's face went even redder.

After a couple of minutes Cho seemed satisfied with his dancing and retreated back to Cedric's side, holding him in a much more comfortable — and more inappropriate — way than she'd been holding Harry.

Fred sidled up to Harry, dancing all the while, and opened his robes to reveal a plain silver flask in the inside pocket. "Firewhisky?" he offered with a smirk. Harry glanced around, then shrugged; fuck it, he was fourteen and probably going to die by the end of the year if this bloody tournament had its way. He reached into Fred's robes, flipping the lid on the flask and taking a swig, coughing as it burned his throat on the way down. Fred pat him on the back, chuckling. "That's my boy! Let me know if you want more, I've got plenty."

Fred moved off to go dance between Angelina and Lee, and Harry wondered how many other people had been drinking from the flask that night. Then he decided he didn't care, and kept on dancing.

.-. .

Harry's limbs were aching and his head was pounding along with the bass of the music, but he didn't care one bit as he danced, spinning Hermione around with a grin. She was an entirely different person tonight, and it made Harry's heart ache at the cracks in his friendship — cracks he was starting to think were irreparable. Dancing with her, laughing with her and Viktor, it felt... disjointed. Like they were once friends, and they were slipping back into what they used to be, but it didn't quite match up with the people they were now. He suspected Hermione could feel it too; every now and then he caught her looking at him with something sad and knowing in her gaze.

It was nearing eleven, but the band was showing no signs of stopping. Many of the students had gone to bed — or gone off to find a secluded corner of the castle — but there was still a good number of them out dancing. Harry was wedged between Ginny and Luna doing a move that looked like something he'd seen in 70s music videos when he was yanked back towards the Weasley twins, the two girls shrugging and merely grabbing Neville in Harry's place. Harry's brow furrowed when Fred and George started to slowly move him away from the dancing crowd. "What's the matter?"

"Courtyard, west corner, behind the rose bush," George whispered in his ear, shoving him towards the doors. "You can thank us later!"

Utterly perplexed, Harry stepped out into the courtyard, shivering a little at the evening air after being in the huddle of dancers for so long. There were couples dotted around the places, some poorly-hidden in rose bushes while others were making no attempt to hide at all. He raised an eyebrow at Seamus and Lavender, sat on a bench with hands in some very inappropriate places for being in public. Edging around them, he hurried to the west corner, hesitantly approaching the rose bush. A hand whipped out, grabbing him by the lapel and tugging.

A familiar voice muttered a Privacy charm, and Harry relaxed instantly, barely having a second to register the company before lips were pressed frantically against his own. "You're going to kill me, Potter," Draco breathed, hands sliding into Harry's robes and around to the small of his back. "You in those bloody dress robes."

"Like you can talk," Harry muttered, trying to figure out how to get hands on skin as quickly as possible. Draco's robes had so many fucking buttons. "I've been wanting to do this all night."

Harry lost track of the amount of time they stood there kissing passionately, but they never let it get further than that, despite Harry's hand on Draco's velvet-covered arse and Draco's up the back of Harry's shirt. Neither of them wanted to risk doing anything more in such a public place; it was dangerous enough just being near each other. "We're dead if we get caught," Harry said eventually, resting his forehead on Draco's collarbone, sliding his hand up to the blond's hip.

"Worth it," Draco declared, making Harry smile. "Have a little faith in my wandwork, Potter. We won't get caught."

"Oh, I'm sure your wandwork is exemplary," Harry drawled quietly, green eyes bright. "But I don't think that's something you want to show me right now."

Draco's pale cheeks went pink, and he cleared his throat, trying to put a little bit of distance between them so they could calm down. He didn't get very far. "I see all your dance lessons paid off," he said eventually, breathing a little steadier. "You seemed to be a hit."

"All thanks to you," Harry said, playing with Draco's hair. "I still wish I could have danced with you, though."

“Why can’t you?” Draco returned, shifting his grip on Harry until they were in dance hold.
“May I?”

Harry’s laugh was breathless as he took Draco’s hand in his own, meeting amused silver-grey eyes. “I suppose.”

They didn’t need music, swaying with each other to a rhythm Draco hummed softly. It was by no means proper waltzing, more just the sort of side-to-side shuffle people did when slow songs came on, but it was perfect. Draco tilted his head down and pulled Harry closer, until his lips pressed against Harry’s forehead.

Harry could’ve stayed there for hours, in Draco’s arms in the tiny bit of space behind the rose bush, the rest of the world falling away as they swayed gently. Eventually, Draco stopped humming and stepped back a little, bringing Harry’s hand to his lips and kissing the knuckles. “Thank you.”

“Thank you,” Harry returned, smiling shyly. “How did you get the twins to get me out here?”

“Easy,” Draco replied with a shrug. “I told them I wanted to snog you, and I’d be waiting out here until I did. They were remarkably obliging. I think they actually don’t hate me.”

“They don’t.” Harry hadn’t properly introduced the twins and Draco yet, but they were the only two people at school who knew the truth about the relationship; and therefore the only people he could gush about Draco to. There were just some things he wasn’t comfortable talking about with Sirius. “They know you make me happy, and that’s all they care about.” The twins were some of the few people who trusted Harry’s judgement without question. If he said Draco was a good guy, then they were on board with it. It was refreshing not to be second-guessed.

“Oh.” Draco’s lips curled at the corners in a reluctant smile. Harry was pretty sure Draco would like the twins, too, given the chance.

The pair stayed behind the rose bush for a little longer, just holding each other and occasionally exchanging kisses, before Harry sighed. “I should go before someone notices I’m missing.”

“Yes, I suppose I should go say goodnight to Pansy,” Draco sighed. Harry, remembering Seamus’ talk of ‘private goodnights’, scowled. “Oh, don’t look at me like that,” Draco chided. “I mean literally say goodnight, walk her back to Slytherin and make sure she gets to bed okay. I told you, she’s not interested in any of that. And I’m certainly not interested in her.”

Harry offered a sheepish smile in apology. “I just hate that I can’t be the one you say goodnight to.”

“I’m pretty sure that’s what I’m doing right now,” Draco replied amusedly. Harry huffed; the Slytherin had a point.

With one last kiss, they agreed to part ways, Harry going first to avoid suspicion. He glanced around the rose bush, then stepped out from behind it, intending to get back on the path and head inside. Instead, he walked straight into Professor Snape. “Potter,” Snape drawled, his eyes flicking from Harry to the rose bush and back again. His face turned exasperated, and he pinched the bridge of his nose. “For Merlin’s sake, learn some discretion.”

Harry grinned, turning to walk away. “And ten points from Gryffindor!” Snape called after him. He heard the man muttering as he walked in the opposite direction, blasting a rose bush with a spell to reveal a pair of Ravenclaw sixth years in a passionate embrace. “Twenty points from Ravenclaw!”

Harry chuckled quietly; at least Snape was having fun.

He heard raised voices when he reached the Entrance Hall, and grimaced when he got close enough to recognise them.

“You’re fraternising with the enemy!”

“The enemy? You’re the one who’s got a bloody figurine of him in your bedroom!”

“He’s just using you to get closer to Harry!”

“He’s better friends with Harry than he is with me!”

Ron and Hermione were stood at the bottom of the stairs, Hermione’s eyes red with tears. Ron was glaring at her. “You can’t trust him, Hermione. He’s from Durmstrang.”

“Ugh!” Hermione’s noise of frustration echoed through the hall. “If you don’t like it, you know what the solution is!”

“Oh yeah, what’s that?”

“Next time there’s a ball, ask me before someone else does, and not as a last resort!”
Hermione whipped around, startling at the sight of Harry. “Harry. Where have you been?”

“Needed some air. You coming back in?” He jerked his head back towards the Great Hall, and Hermione glanced at Ron for a moment, then nodded decisively.

“Let’s go.” She ignored Ron as she looped an arm through Harry’s, heading back into the hall.

“Ignore him,” Harry murmured. “He’s a jealous git who doesn’t deserve you. Go back to Viktor.” The Durmstrang champion was dancing with Fleur and Cho, and looked delighted to see Hermione had returned, then immediately concerned when he noticed her crying. Hermione sniffed, carefully wiping at her eyes without smearing her make-up.

“Thanks, Harry.” She strode over to Viktor, waving his concerns off and dragging him back to dance.

Harry slipped back into the group, the music still blasting. “Where’ve you been?” Susan demanded, eyeing him over critically. “Nope, nope, changed my mind, don’t want to know. You’re a disgrace, Potter.” Her eyes were teasing, and she took him by the hand to pull him into a dance.

Some time after, there was a loud groan when the band announced the next one would be the final song, but as much as Harry didn’t want the night to end, he was also desperate to go to bed. He was going to ache so much in the morning.

At last the music came to an end, and Harry’s ears rang in the silence that followed. “Alright, you lot,” Cedric declared, his arm around Cho’s waist. “Get to bed. Prefect’s orders.” He winked.

“Yeah, yeah, whatever. Are you in Ravenclaw or Hufflepuff tonight?” Susan asked. Cedric’s cheeks reddened, but after a glance at Cho, he looked back at the fourth year.

“Hufflepuff. Come on, we’ll walk you back. Goodnight, everyone.”

At Cedric’s lead, everyone started saying their goodnights, Susan pecking Harry on the cheek and thanking him for a great evening before hurrying off after the Hufflepuff champion. Harry belatedly realised that neither of the twins, nor their dates, could be found — they must have disappeared after sending Harry to Draco.

Harry, Neville and Ginny waited by the doors for Hermione to say goodbye to Viktor in private; when she finally joined them, her lipstick was smudged and she looked a lot happier than she had been when Harry had dragged her back in the hall. He was glad; she didn’t deserve to have her night end on a low point like that because of Ron.

The four of them dragged their weary bodies up to Gryffindor Tower, Ginny’s high heels in Neville’s hand and his too-big shoes on her feet, while he walked in just his socks. It made Harry smile; ever the gentleman. “That was fun,” Ginny said with a smile, shoulder brushing Neville’s as she walked. “Thanks for inviting me.”

“Thanks for saying yes,” Neville returned, blushing. “I—I had a really good time.”

“I’d say tonight was a resounding success,” Harry remarked. The only thing that could’ve made it better was more time with Draco.

“It’ll only be a success if you tell me who you disappeared off to snog,” Ginny teased, dropping back to shoot him a grin, laughing when he blushed.

“That is none of your business,” he said haughtily.

“So that’s what you were doing outside,” Hermione realised, eyebrows raised. “Who is she?”

“I told you, none of your business. I don’t kiss and tell.”

“You’re no fun, Potter,” Ginny declared. They reached the portrait hole, and the boys bid the girls goodnight, starting up the stairs. Before they reached the dorm, Neville put a hand on Harry’s arm, biting his lip hesitantly.

"Harry, that person you were snogging," he started, and Harry reflexively put up a privacy ward. "Was it Malfoy?"

Harry felt the blood drain from his face. "What?" He forced out a laugh. "What makes you say that?"

"Well, you said you were friends with him. And in all of Hermione's interrogating, you've never said you were seeing a girl."

"Yeah, but Malfoy!"

"I thought it was Cassius at first," Neville continued. "Especially when he said he was seeing someone. But he was still in the hall dancing with Fleur when you were gone, so it couldn't be. And, well, there's always been something between you and Malfoy. I figured if it was anyone else, you would've told me by now." Neville paused, then grinned a little. "Also you did look a bit like you wanted to eat him alive when you saw him in his dress robes. But I don't think anyone else noticed," he added quickly. "I just... I know you, Harry. And if it is Malfoy, it's okay. I reckon you're right that he's not as bad as people think he is."

Harry sighed, running a hand through his hair. "You can't tell anyone Neville," he said seriously. "He could be in serious danger if it gets out. His dad..." He trailed off, and Neville nodded, eyes knowing.

"Your secret's safe with me." Then Neville smirked. "You just might want to look at his arse a bit less when you're in public."

Harry laughed, dropping his privacy ward and continuing up the stairs. "That's just asking far too much of me, Nev," he insisted, yawning. Neville snorted, pushing open the door to the dorm and tiptoeing inside. All the lights were out, and the curtains were drawn on the three other beds.

"Night, Harry," Neville whispered with a smile.

"Night, Nev." Harry barely managed to change into pyjamas and brush his teeth before he was falling into bed, a quiet sigh of relief escaping him. He was so glad he didn't have anywhere to be in the morning; he was going to sleep until at least noon.

.-.-.-.-

Severus let out a long sigh as he stepped out of the floo at Seren Du. It was nearly one in the morning, but the blasted ball was finally over. "Mister Severus, sir," Ceri greeted quietly. "Is you be needing anything?"

"Water, please." Two quiet pops later, and the elf was passing him a large glass of water. Severus drank thirstily, head pounding. "Thank you, Ceri. That will be all." The elf nodded and disappeared, and Severus toed out of his boots and started up the staircase, thinking longingly of bed. He'd seen far more of his students' skin that night than he ever wanted to see again, Igor had started panicking about the Dark Mark in a place where the children could hear, and his bloody dress robes were uncomfortable after several hours wearing them. Yes, he was definitely ready for the day to be over.

He walked silently down the hall, easing the bedroom door open as quietly as he could, not wanting to wake Remus. That turned out to be a moot point; the bedside light was on, and the werewolf was sat up in bed, bare-chested and reading a book. He smiled when he saw Severus, and then his eyes widened, his book falling into his lap. “Well hello gorgeous,” he greeted, voice a little husky. Severus’ pulse quickened instinctively. “I’ve not seen those robes before. Are they new?”

“Relatively,” Severus replied, reaching for the small buttons at the collar. Remus rolled out of bed, stalking over to him in nothing but a pair of low-slung plaid pyjama bottoms. He stilled Severus’ hands with his own, honey eyes dark in the low light.

“Leave them for a second,” he requested. Severus sighed.

“Remus, it’s been a long day and I just want to go to bed.”

“Well I want to rip those robes off you with my teeth,” Remus replied in a conversational tone. Severus choked. His outfit abruptly became much tighter in a whole different area.

“Remus!”

The Gryffindor leaned in, nuzzling at Severus’ jaw, fingers sliding up to undo the top few buttons. Severus couldn’t help but tilt his head back and sigh as Remus’ tongue traced his Adams’ apple, a few more buttons coming loose. “The things I would do to you in these robes if it wasn’t one in the morning,” Remus sighed, running a hand down Severus’ chest. “Gods, you’re sexy.”

Severus wondered if anyone would ever believe him if he told them that mild-mannered, bookish, old-before-his-time Remus Lupin was an absolute minx in private. Then he realised that he never wanted anyone but himself to know that about the Gryffindor; his wolf behind closed doors was an entirely different creature, and belonged to him alone.

“They’re not that different from my usual robes,” Severus pointed out, letting Remus slowly undo a button at a time, revealing the pale skin below. That style of robe didn’t allow for a shirt underneath.

“Oh, but they are,” Remus insisted breathily, finally reaching the end of the row of buttons. He pulled back, giving Severus an admiring glance, robes open over his bare chest. Severus would never be used to being looked at in such a way. Like he was desirable. “Merlin.”

Remus wheeled him around, shoving him gently until he was on his back on their bed, robes still over his shoulders but otherwise open, his black trousers straining at the fly. The Gryffindor’s gaze trailed over him hungrily. “I know you’re tired,” he rasped. “I just... Merlin, Severus. I can’t help myself.”

There was a little of the wolf in his eyes as he spoke — the moon was only two nights away. No wonder he was so damn excitable, Severus thought with a mental roll of his eyes. He hooked his ankles around Remus' hips, drawing him in quickly. "I'm awake now, you fiend," he muttered, as if it was such a hardship for him to have a gorgeous man staring at him like he wanted Severus to be breakfast, lunch and dinner. "Just don't expect anything dramatic."

Remus smirked at him, sliding onto the bed and straddling Severus' thighs, working the buttons of his trousers frustratingly slowly. Severus let out a sound he refused to classify as a whine. "Get on with it," he pleaded, sucking in a sharp breath when Remus' hand finally slipped beneath his trousers, fingers closing around rigid flesh.

The werewolf didn't even bother pulling Severus' trousers off, merely lowering himself down and opening the fly enough to get his mouth around him. Severus arched into the contact, moaning quietly. "Remus," he breathed, fingers clutching at bedsheets. "Remus, please."

Remus hummed around his length, tongue working expertly to send waves of pleasure shooting through Severus' body. He was going for fast and dirty, and Severus was thankful; Remus knew exactly how to play his body, and if the werewolf had wanted to drag things out Severus would have been powerless to resist. After all these years, even with over a decade apart, they still knew each other as well as they knew themselves.

A minute more, and Severus was coming into Remus' mouth with a bitten-off cry, slumping back against the mattress. When he could breathe again, he looked up at his lover with hooded eyes. "What do you need?" he asked softly. Remus shifted, pulling his own pyjama bottoms down just enough to free his cock from the confines, his pupils blown as he looked down at Severus.

"I need you to keep lying there, looking exactly like that," Remus told him, his voice hoarse as he wrapped his hand around himself, jerking quickly. Severus didn't blink, watching the man bring himself closer to the edge, shifting one hand to wrap possessively around Remus' thigh. Tiny little gasps were escaping from Remus' lips, and it was one of the best sounds Severus had ever heard.

Remus came with a growl on Severus' stomach, his eyes glowing gold as he looked at the man beneath him on the bed. Years ago, Severus would have been scared to see his lover with the wolf so close to the surface while they were in bed. Now, Severus just found himself wishing he had the stamina of his youth — and that it wasn't one in the bloody morning.

The tension leaked out of Remus' shoulders, and he slumped down onto Severus, ignoring the mess between them. "Sorry," he murmured into Severus' neck. "Got a bit... carried away."

"You don't need to apologise for that, Merlin," Severus assured, carding a hand through greying hair. "It's been a long day, but if I ever see you with that look in your eye and it doesn't end in this, take me out back and shoot me; I'm officially done for." Remus snickered, pressing a kiss to Severus' collarbone.

"And they say you're not a romantic," he teased. "How was the ball?"

"I caught far too many couples in the bushes," Severus said with a scowl. "Your brat godson being one of them."

"If my brat godson was there, that means your brat godson was right with him," Remus retorted. "Unless Harry has a lot of explaining to do."

"He was there, he just had the good sense not to get caught." Severus had seen him, two minutes after Harry had left, creeping away into the shadows with his hair mussed and his buttons uneven. A disgrace.

"Or you were nice enough to let him slide by," Remus corrected. He muttered a wandless Cleaning charm to get rid of the mess between them, sitting up and pulling Severus with him. "I really do love these robes on you," he mused, pushing them from Severus' shoulders so they pooled on the bed. "Even if they're much better off you." He winked, and Severus rolled his eyes.

"Incorrigible wolf," he muttered, pressing their lips together before climbing off the bed, stepping out of his trousers and striding naked across the room to his dresser for pyjamas. Remus whistled quietly, eyes dancing.

"Sexy snake," he returned, pulling up his pyjama bottoms and laying back in bed with a grin. "Hurry up."

Severus went through his evening bathroom routine quickly, and when he returned to the bedroom Remus had his eyes barely open, the lamp still on. He slid beneath the sheets, welcoming the other man as he sprawled on top of Severus. It was becoming hard to sleep these days, without Remus' weight on his chest. "Nox," he murmured, plunging them into darkness. Remus' stubbled cheek tucked into his neck.

"Love you," he murmured, already half asleep. Severus placed a hand on the man's lower back, getting comfortable.

"And I, you," he said, so softly he would've thought Remus had missed it, if not for the curve of the man's lips against his throat.

Chapter 29

Chapter Notes

Probably gonna update the tags on this soon for some future events. Not sure how far ahead I want to tag for, toeing the line between spoilers and necessary tagging. How do y'all feel about some future pairing tags?

The morning after the Yule Ball started at approximately 11:45 for Harry, which was when Neville shoved his drapes aside and poked him hard in the shoulder. “Before the news gets up to you, I promise that I wasn’t the one who said anything.”

Harry groaned, blinking bleary-eyed at the boy sat on the edge of his mattress. “What?”

Neville handed him his glasses, and the other Gryffindor’s apologetic face came into sharper view. “The whole school is talking about how you snogged someone at the ball last night. No one knows who, but everyone knows it happened. I mean, you did come back looking a bit... ravished.” Neville’s cheeks were pink, and Harry let out another groan, burying his face in his pillow.

“Fuck,” he muttered. Snape was going to have a field day. ‘Discretion, Potter’. Ugh, he was the worst. Maybe Harry could persuade Remus to hex him. “How bad is it?”

“On a scale of one to thinking you’re trying to kill all the muggleborns in the school, it’s pretty minor,” Neville told him. Harry hated that that was a legitimate scale of measuring the school’s general opinion of him. “Everyone’s just curious about who it was. A few girls are insisting it was them, but no one believes them. I think the top three are Hermione, Ginny, or Fleur.”

“...There are people in this castle who think I could pull Fleur Delacour? Are they blind?”

Neville snorted, shaking his head. “They’re just hoping for a scandal, I think. Other names floating around are of course Susan — but not many think it’s her because she laughed pretty hard when someone asked her, and she was on the dance floor all night — and I’ve heard Padma Patil, Daphne Greengrass, Cho Chang, and George Weasley.”

Harry rolled the list of names over in his head. “Well. That’s... varied.” He reluctantly sat up, reaching for the water on his bedside table. He hadn’t had more than a mouthful of alcohol, but he still felt hungover just from all the noise and dancing. “Just the one bloke on the list?”

“So far. I did hear someone suggest Blaise Zabini, but I’m pretty sure that was a joke.” Neville shrugged. “If it helps, I think it’ll all fade out in a few days. There’s bound to be other drama from last night — you’re just an easy target for gossip.” He looked sorry as soon as he said it, but Harry shook his head; Neville was right.

“No one’s suggesting... y’know?” He didn’t dare say Draco’s name, not without a ward up. Neville shook his head, and Harry’s shoulders relaxed a little.

“No, I’ve not heard that anywhere,” Neville assured.

With a sigh, Harry dragged his aching legs over the edge of the bed. “Well, nothing to be done about it, I suppose. Anything else to report?”

“Nothing major. I guess Lavender got caught giving Seamus a blowjob. By Snape.” Neville shuddered, wide-eyed, and Harry burst out laughing.

“How many points did we lose for that?”

“Eighty, I think. But everyone’s practically in the negative after last night, Snape was on a roll.”

“That’s not so bad, then.” Harry yawned, rolling his shoulders back. “I’m gonna take a shower, then I’ll meet you for lunch?” He was starving.

“Sounds good,” Neville agreed, getting to his feet. “Oh, also Ron’s in a bit of a mood, so you might want to avoid him a bit. Especially if he thinks you’ve been kissing Hermione.”

Harry grimaced as he stood. “Fantastic.” Well, Ron had been in a mood all term, it wasn’t like that changed much.

.-. .

He felt much more human after a shower, and with his stomach rumbling Harry jogged down the stairs to the common room, where Neville was stood talking to Ginny and Hermione. “Hiya, Harry,” Ginny greeted cheerfully. “Loads of people think we snogged, so I’ve been telling people you’re crap at it.”

“Thanks, Ginny. I appreciate it,” he replied flatly, and she giggled.

“Always happy to help!”

“I haven’t said anything about the rumours,” Hermione said primly. “Hopefully they’ll go away soon once people realise it’s all a load of rubbish.”

“It’s not though, is it,” Harry said, stretching up with a yawn. Hermione gawked at him.

“You were snogging someone? I thought you were joking!”

“Yeah. I mean, it obviously wasn’t you, or Ginny, or Fleur,” he said with a roll of his eyes.

“But the way I looked I don’t think I can even bother denying what I was doing.” Before he’d passed out, he’d forced himself to go brush his teeth, and one glance in the mirror made it pretty evident what he’d been up to. There was also a pretty large lovebite on his throat that he hadn't glamoured away, though the collar of his shirt had mostly hidden it. Draco was a possessive little bastard sometimes.

"So who was it, then?" Hermione asked. Harry snorted.

"Like I said last night, none of your business. Can we go get food now or what?"

Hermione's lips pursed. "I don't like this, Harry. First you're off dancing with all those people last night, now you're kissing some mystery girl. It's not like you to keep so many secrets."

"How is dancing with people keeping secrets? They're my friends."

"Exactly! Since when were you friends with Daphne Greengrass? Or Cassius Warrington? For that matter, how long have you been friends with Susan Bones?"

"I'm sorry I've been branching out, Hermione, but with you and Ron ignoring me for half the year I've had to look elsewhere for social interaction. Or are you just pissed because they're not Gryffindors?" Harry glared at her, shaking his head. "I thought you were better than that."

"It's got nothing to do with what house they're in!" Hermione insisted, but the slightly screechy tone of her voice betrayed that she was lying. "It just seems awfully sudden that you're so chummy with all these people."

"I've been friends with most of them since last year," Harry told her. "You just haven't been paying attention. And I'm sorry you're jealous that I've got more friends than just you and Ron, but I like them, so you'll just have to suck it up and deal with it." He'd thought they were possibly fixing things, last night. With her on Viktor's arm and dancing with Harry and the others and having a great time, he'd thought there were scraps of their friendship he could salvage. Now he was starting to think he was wrong.

He looked up at Neville and Ginny, who were watching the whole argument uneasily. "Lunch?" he suggested, turning away from Hermione and heading for the portrait hole. They followed after him, leaving Hermione fuming in the common room, and when they were out of earshot Ginny let out a low whistle.

"Well, that was awkward," she muttered, sounding remarkably like her twin brothers. Harry snorted.

"She's been off with me all year, going hot and cold depending on whether Ron thinks he can stomach me or not. I'm sick of it." Hermione was, at her heart, an introvert. She nagged Ron and Harry to study, but always preferred to study alone. She kept her intelligence around her like a shield, warding people off even if they were actually smart enough to hold a conversation with her. She hated being in crowds — last night had been highly unusual for her. She was happy extending the olive branch to Ron and Harry, and then to the rest of the Weasley family, but she had her limits. Evidently Harry's casual friendship with half their year and several people in other years was too much for her to handle.

"Everyone's sort of noticed that the golden trio hasn't been very, well, trio-y lately," Ginny breached. "I s'pose we all thought you'd figure it out."

"I don't know if we will this time, Gin," Harry admitted aloud for the first time. There was so much more going on; so much Ginny wasn't aware of. Harry wasn't sure whether he was being too paranoid when he thought Ron and Hermione were spying on him for Dumbledore, but either way he was a different person with different priorities and they didn't seem able to handle that.

The three of them walked in silence for a while, Harry still glowering a little, when Ginny cleared her throat. "Hey, Harry. On the subject of friendships... I wanted to say sorry, actually." Harry looked at her in confusion, and she ducked her head. "The last couple of years I've been a bit... well, stalker-y is probably one word for it," she said with a grimace. "Only I'd heard so much about you when I was a kid from Mum, and then you were there and you were my brother's friend and you were so nice, and I developed a bit of a crush." She managed not to blush as she said this. Harry didn't bother pointing out that 'bit of a crush' was somewhat of an understatement; he didn't want to be mean.

"Anyway, this year since we've hung out more and everything, and you're so close with the twins, you're basically one of my brothers now and it would be pretty strange to keep fancying you," she said, her words coming out rushed and her ears as red as her hair. "So I'm just gonna nip that in the bud and say I'm sorry for being weird about it before. But if it's alright, I'd really like to be your friend." She looked hopeful, embarrassed by her own actions in the past.

Harry was silent for a moment. "On one condition." Ginny eyed him warily. "Please stop telling everyone I'm crap at kissing."

The redhead burst out laughing, having to stop walking to catch her breath for a minute. "I can do that," she agreed. Harry grinned, slinging an arm over her shoulders.

"Then I guess you've got a seventh big brother." He looked over his shoulder, where Neville was watching them both in utter bemusement. "As your big brother, do I need to have a word with Neville over there?" Ginny turned bright red, and Neville began spluttering.

"Don't you dare," she told him, elbowing him in the side and darting away before he could retaliate. "Or I'll hex you the same as I do my other brothers."

"Noted," Harry said with a grin, holding his hands up in surrender. "I wouldn't really, anyway. Not unless you asked me to. You seem like you can look out for yourself." Growing up with six older brothers, two of whom were Fred and George, Harry didn't doubt that Ginny was probably better at looking out for herself than he was.

Ginny smiled at him, and the three walked side by side for a little longer. Ginny glanced up at him again, before they made it to the Entrance Hall. "Harry," she began. "Since we're family and all... do you think I could have a go on your Firebolt sometime? When the others aren't around? They always make fun of me when I say I want to fly."

Harry thought back to the summer; not once had Ginny played quidditch with them. Harry had assumed it was because she didn't want to. Then he realised none of her brothers had ever asked her. "Yeah, sure," Harry agreed with a shrug. "We can go out before school starts back up."

Ginny beamed, leaning up to kiss him on the cheek — right as they entered the Great Hall. Immediately, a fresh wave of whispers started up. Harry smiled ruefully. "Well, that's gonna be great for the rumour mill," he muttered sarcastically. Ginny winced.

"Sorry."

"Nah, it's alright. People will think what they want. Hell, if it leads them off the trail of who it really is, I'm all for it." If they thought he was dating Ginny Weasley, no one would be looking towards Draco Malfoy.

.-. .

With Christmas over and the spring term rapidly approaching, the students suddenly remembered all the homework they'd been ignoring in favour of the Yule Ball — Harry included. It also meant that the four champions were back to trying to figure out their eggs. Harry had pretty much stopped opening his; he'd heard it scream plenty of times now, and nothing was going to change about it. All he could do was research things that screamed and hope he came across the right one.

That all changed on the 30th of December, when Viktor rushed into the Great Hall, saw Harry and Fleur sat at the Gryffindor table, and hurried over to them. "Vhere is Cedric?" he asked quietly. Harry shrugged.

"No idea. With Cho maybe? Why?"

Viktor glanced around shiftily, then leaned in. "I haff made progress."

Harry and Fleur shared a wide-eyed glance. "I'll find him," Harry said, getting to his feet.

"Meet by the Durmstrang ship vhen you do," Viktor replied, taking Fleur with him when he left. Harry ducked into a side passage, rifling through his school bag.

"I solemnly swear that I am up to no good," he muttered, scanning the map for Cedric's name. He eventually found him down near the entrance to the Hufflepuff common room, Cho by his side.

Harry sprinted through the halls to find the Hufflepuff, skidding to a halt when he almost crashed into him. "Come with me," he urged, grabbing both Cedric and Cho by the wrists.

"Harry, what's wrong?" Cedric asked, following in bewilderment.

"I think Viktor's figured out the egg." That had both of them picking up the pace, and they went outside to see Viktor and Fleur sat on the bank of the lake, right at the edge of the water. Viktor had his egg in his hands.

"Good, you're here," the Bulgarian said, beckoning them closer. The trio sat down, making themselves comfortable.

"Harry said you've figured it out?" Cedric said, and Viktor shrugged.

"I haff made progress. Listen." Viktor picked up his egg and set it in the shallows of the lake until it was entirely covered, then twisted it open. Harry flinched, bracing himself for screaming, but none came. Instead it sounded like... music? "It is easier to hear when you are under the water also," Viktor supplied. "But it is a song. Here."

He held out a piece of parchment, and the other three champions crowded around it to read.

Come seek us where our voices sound,

We cannot sing above the ground,

And while you're searching, ponder this;

We've taken what you'll sorely miss.

An hour long you'll have to look,

And to recover what we took.

But past an hour, the prospect's black,

Too late, it's gone, it won't come back.

Harry read the words over several times. "I assume your eggs will say the same," Viktor said, closing the egg, "but you may want to test them."

"So we must go underwater?" Fleur presumed, brow furrowed in thought. "To wherever ze creatures 'ave taken... whatever eet ees zey will take."

"An hour to look somewhere underwater. Presumably the lake," Cedric said, glancing out over the expanse of water. "Merlin, there could be anything in there."

Harry thought about the aquatic creatures he knew of; surprisingly, his brain went to his muggle upbringing rather than what he'd learned since joining the magical world. "Are there merpeople in the lake, do you think?"

The others stared at him. "I think so," Cho piped up. "I've heard some of the Slytherins talking about it before. They have that window to the lake in their common room."

Harry remembered it; he'd thought it was a bit creepy.

"So merpeople will take something we care about?" Viktor surmised. "That seems... simple enough."

"How did you figure the egg out, anyway?" Cedric asked curiously. The Durmstrang boy blushed.

"I, ah, accidentally dropped it off the edge of the ship," he admitted sheepishly. "It opened ven I vas diving to get it back."

The rest of them laughed, and Viktor merely smiled.

"So we know what we're up against, then," Harry said. "We should all work alone from here on out. Don't want any of our solutions looking too similar."

The others agreed, and Viktor pocketed his egg once more. "No more talk of tasks until February 24th, then," he declared.

Harry wondered if Fleur and Cedric had as much of an urge as he did to check their eggs sang the same song. "Well, if we're calling it there, I've got a Transfiguration essay to write," he said with a grimace. "Unless any of you would like to help me with that?" Unsurprisingly, they all suddenly had places to be, and Harry snorted. "Some help you lot are."

"Why don't you go ask your girlfriend," Fleur teased, nudging his shoulder. She was getting far too much joy over the rumours of Harry's Yule Ball escapades, especially the ones that involved her.

"I thought I just did, dear," Harry replied sweetly, making Viktor and Cedric laugh.

"Away wiz you," Fleur said playfully, making a shooing motion. "I must study also."

The five of them parted ways, Cedric and Cho wandering off towards a different part of the lake, possibly to go test Cedric's egg. Harry continued back up to the castle, lost in thought. He really did have a Transfiguration essay — but now he also had some research to do.

.-.-.-.

The new term began on a bit of a sour note, in the form of another Rita Skeeter article. This one cutting far, far too deep. Dumbledore's Giant Mistake was the headline they woke up to on the first day of classes, and the more Harry read, the deeper his frown grew. "I mean, didn't everyone know that already about Hagrid?" he asked. "Just look at him. Bit obvious, isn't it?"

"There are other ways to get that big, with magic," Neville pointed out. "I think most of us assumed he got hit with a dodgy Engorgement charm as a kid or something. Giants... they've got a bit of a bad reputation."

"Well so have werewolves, and Remus is alright," Harry retorted. "How the hell did Skeeter get this information, though? If he's never told me, I can't see him telling her!" She wasn't even supposed to be on school grounds outside of task days. She hadn't even been able to get permission for the Yule Ball; a photographer had been sent, but a different reporter was along with them. The write-up had been a tasteful article about the whole affair, with a rave review of the Weird Sisters and hardly any mention of Harry save for the bit about the champions opening the ball. It was brilliant.

“Maybe he was telling someone else, and she was eavesdropping. Still doesn’t explain what she was doing on school grounds, though.”

They didn’t have much time to talk about it, or they’d be late for Herbology, but with Care of Magical Creatures on his schedule for before lunch, Harry didn’t worry about it too much. That changed when he arrived at Hagrid’s hut with the rest of his class to find a woman waiting for them who was definitely not Hagrid.

Professor Grubbly-Plank was a perfectly competent teacher. Possibly even a more competent teacher than Hagrid. But that didn’t mean Harry was going to sit back and let Hagrid be bullied out of his job by that awful Skeeter woman. He hung back once class was over, knocking on Hagrid’s door. “Hagrid, it’s me!” he called, knocking louder. “Come on, Hagrid. You know I don’t care about all that. Just let me in.” He kept knocking, and let out a frustrated noise. “Hagrid, for the love of Merlin, if you don’t let me in I’m breaking the door down.” That got a reaction. The lock clicked, and the door opened the tiniest crack, just enough for Hagrid to glare through with one bloodshot eye.

“Go away, ‘Arry,” he muttered. Harry jammed his foot in the doorway, shouldering his way into the cabin. Hagrid clearly didn’t want him gone that bad, or he would’ve tried harder to keep him out.

“Nope, sorry, not listening.” He looked up at the enormous man, his heart clenching at the tear-streaked skin hidden behind his mass of hair. “Hagrid. You can’t really think people care about that sort of thing, do you?”

“Those people do,” Hagrid retorted, gesturing to his table, where a stack of letters sat, most of them opened. “Those people ‘ave a lot to say about it.” He choked out another sob, and Harry threw his arms around the man the best he could.

“Hagrid, if there’s one thing I’ve learnt from the media, it’s that you can’t win over everyone. And unfortunately, the loudest voices are also usually the worst ones. For all these letters on your table, I bet there’s fifty people who read that article, shrugged, and got on with their day.”

Hagrid didn’t look convinced. “They won’t want me teachin’ their kids, not knowin’ what I am.”

“My first ever Defence Against the Dark Arts teacher literally had Voldemort in the back of his head, and no one complained about him.” Of course, no one knew about him, but the point still stood. “No one in this castle knows more about creatures than you do, Hagrid. Sometimes your judgement about what’s class appropriate is a little... off.” Hagrid snorted, unable to help himself. “But you’re a brilliant teacher. Grubbly-Plank’s alright, yeah, but she’s not you. She’d never let me ride a hippogriff,” Harry added, grinning.

“Not sure if tha’s a good thing,” Hagrid pointed out dubiously. Harry shrugged; it had been a good thing for him.

"How did Skeeter even find out all this?" Harry asked, leaning against the kitchen counter. Hagrid sniffed.

"No idea. I was... I was tellin' Olympe — Madame Maxime — but... there weren't no one about when I told her. We were at the Yule Ball, everyone was inside. I jus' thought... it's daft," he said with a shake of his head. "Bloody big bones, I never." That was muttered under his breath, and made little sense to Harry, but he presumed it had something to do with Maxime, and why she'd been curt with everyone since the ball according to Fleur.

"Skeeter couldn't have been at the Yule Ball. Someone would have seen her." Unless she had a way of getting around undetected. Maybe she had an invisibility cloak, like Harry.

"What's it matter 'ow she found out?" Hagrid wailed. "Everyone knows, now!"

"So?" Harry argued. "No one cares, Hagrid; not anyone that matters!" He was still trying to block out Draco's taunts about it, knowing the boy had no choice when he had an audience. Surely Draco didn't really care about Hagrid's blood status. "Class won't be the same without you. Hogwarts won't be the same without you." Harry reached up to put a hand on the man's elbow. "You were the first friend I ever had in the wizarding world, Hagrid. Don't let this be what takes you away from it."

Hagrid sank into a chair, choking on another sob. "Y'know, Harry," he said once he'd composed himself a little. "When I firs' met yeh, yeh reminded me a bit o' meself, like. Parents gone, not quite sure 'ow yeh were gonna fit in at Hogwarts. But yeh did. Look at yeh now." Pride shone in his eyes.

"That's partly because of you," Harry insisted softly. "I thought I wouldn't fit in, and you looked at me like I was mad for thinking it. You told me Hogwarts would be home, and it was. I reckon I wouldn't have even been brave enough to get on the train if I didn't know you were there at the end of it." He'd been desperate to get away from the Dursleys, to do anything to leave that house. But he might have just run away into muggle London instead.

"Don't say that, Harry. Yer a Gryffindor."

"And so are you," Harry reminded, remembering what Tom Riddle's diary had shown him. "The Sorting Hat knows what it's talking about." It certainly had with Harry, telling him he would've done well in Slytherin. If only he'd listened.

Hagrid was silent for a long moment, wiping at his eyes, until finally he managed a small smile in Harry's direction. "Yer wise beyond yer years, y'know that?" he said. "Yer gonna be a great wizard someday."

"I'll be a better one if you go back to teaching me," Harry replied with a grin. Hagrid sighed.

"I... I can', yet," he murmured. "But maybe after a bit. Lie low, like. See if it all blows over." Harry figured that was the best he could get, and he patted Hagrid's hand supportively.

"That's the spirit." And in the meantime, Harry would figure out how the hell Rita Skeeter was getting her information.

“What’s been the matter wi’ you then, these days, anyways?” Hagrid asked, eyeing Harry shrewdly. “Hardly ever see yeh wi’ Ron and Hermione anymore.”

Harry grimaced, running a hand through his hair. “Well, Ron’s still not over me being in the tournament,” he said ruefully. “And Hermione... we’re growing older, Hagrid. People change. I’m sure the friends you had when you were eleven aren’t the same friends you have now.”

“But the three o’ you’ve been through so much together.” Hagrid was frowning now, and Harry sighed, wishing there was an easy way to make the man explain. He couldn’t tell him the truth about Dumbledore; it would break the man’s heart. Hagrid worshipped Dumbledore.

“Sometimes shared trauma isn’t enough to keep people together,” he said eventually. “I’m not saying we’ll never be friends again, but... I dunno, it’s weird right now. I’ve been hanging out with Neville a lot lately, though.”

“Aye, ‘e’s a good kid, the Longbottom lad. Always helpin’ Professor Sprout wi’ the greenhouses.” Hagrid’s faint smile returned. “As long as yer not by yerself too long, Harry. That’ll get yeh nowhere good. ‘Specially not at your age.”

“I’m not alone, Hagrid,” he promised. “And if I am, I know I’ve always got you, right?”

“Always,” Hagrid vowed, covering Harry’s hand gently with his own. “No matter what, Harry, I’m on your side.”

Harry hoped that proved true. “Thanks, Hagrid.” He glanced at his watch; if he was quick, he’d have time to run to the kitchens and grab something to eat before his next class. “Look, I’ve got to go back to classes, but... don’t lock yourself away in here, alright? And don’t listen to whatever’s in those letters. There’s always gonna be people who like to complain about things.”

Harry gave the man one last hug before leaving, hurrying up to the castle the best he could in the snow.

If Dumbledore’s manipulations ever cost him his friendship with Hagrid, Harry would obliterate the old headmaster where he stood.

Chapter 30

With the news that Rita Skeeter was sneaking around the castle, Harry's paranoia ramped back up to a hundred. He had far too many secrets to risk slipping up with any one of them. If he wasn't in or between classes, he was under his invisibility cloak or enveloped by a privacy ward. He made sure to pass the information on to those who shared his secrets, too, which turned into an impromptu study group on privacy wards and silencing spells.

"I don't know how she's getting around, so she could be anywhere," he told the other heirs in their fortnightly meeting. "Just make sure you're never discussing secrets — mine or your own — without putting some kind of warding up."

"Thanks for the heads up, Harry," Ernie said, looking grim-faced. "I had wondered how she was getting all those quotes from the Slytherins. Obviously they're in the know."

Several heads turned towards the trio of Slytherins in the group, but all of them shook their heads. "I haven't heard anything," Blaise said, "but people know I'm at least civil with Harry now, so they're not likely to tell me. These two, either." After the Yule Ball, it was somewhat established that Harry was on good terms with the three Slytherins, and willing to spend time with others. There were plenty of people — Dumbledore most significantly — who didn't seem thrilled by the Boy-Who-Lived's extended social group, but at this point Harry was past caring. He couldn't hide away forever, especially not if he wanted to be able to make real changes when he came of age.

Harry remembered seeing quotes from Crabbe and Goyle in the article, as well as from Parkinson, and made a mental note to ask Draco about it all. He had to warn his boyfriend to be vigilant as it was; perhaps the blond would be able to get information from his housemates. They still trusted him, they'd surely tell him.

"Okay, well, enough about Skeeter," Harry said eventually. "Who wants to help me with some Arithmancy?" With the holidays over, his self-study was back on track as well, with Snape slipping assignments in with his returned Potions homework at the behest of Remus and Sirius. On any given day there was an inter-house study group meeting in the library now, but no one outside his trusted circle could know that Harry was studying the extra two subjects. That left helping him to this lot, or occasionally Fred.

There were a few groans around the table, before Anthony Goldstein pulled out the empty chair between him and Padma. "Come on, Potter," he said with a grin. "Let's get this over with."

Harry grinned back, shifting around the table to take the chair and reaching into his bag. Hermione had it all wrong, seeing the other students as obstacles to her success.

Hogwarts was so much better with more friends.

Of all of Harry's secrets, the one where he was still in contact with his escaped convict godfather was probably the most inflammatory for him and the people he cared about, so Harry made sure he only ever spoke to Sirius at night, in bed, with the curtains warded with about everything he could think of.

"It's starting to make my head spin, Sirius," Harry admitted late one night, looking into his godfather's sympathetic grey eyes. "I've got so much going on — the tournament, the study group, Draco, you, Dumbledore — I'm losing track of who knows what, and trying to keep it all from Skeeter..."

"You've got far more on your shoulders than anyone should at your age, pup," Sirius agreed. "I wish I could help you with it — I wish I wasn't just adding to it."

"You're not," Harry insisted quickly. "I don't know how I'd cope without you and the others."

"It doesn't change that we're just another pile of secrets for you to keep," Sirius said knowingly. "Look, Harry; just focus on what you can control for now. The tournament — you're working on getting the egg figured out. Ask Remus about it next time he's with Snape, he might have an idea. Everything else is beyond your hands. The study group seems to be mostly taking care of itself. Draco's a smart boy, and he'll understand if you need to ease off a little bit while you're so busy. As for Dumbledore, he's clearly willing to just sit back and see what happens with this whole tournament situation, so I don't think you have much to worry about there. He doesn't suspect anything, does he?"

"I don't think so." Harry honestly hadn't seen much of Dumbledore, lately. The man was probably busy dealing with all the behind-the-scenes stuff for the tournament. "He doesn't like that the students are mingling so much these days, but I don't think he can trace it back to me. If anything I think he thinks it's Susan's fault." She was honestly more in charge of the study group than he was, and with her Chief Warlock ambitions all the heirs seemed to gravitate to her anyway.

"She seems very much like her aunt, from what you've told me," Sirius complimented. "I'm sure she can handle it. So there you have it — the only things you really need to worry about right now are the egg and your boyfriend. And from what I've heard, I don't think you even need to worry about your boyfriend. He's pretty keen on you, I'd say." Sirius wiggled his eyebrows, and Harry blushed.

"Snape's been gossiping again, hasn't he?" he groused. He still hadn't forgiven the Potions Master for telling Sirius and Remus about finding Harry at the Yule Ball. Sirius had teased him about it for days.

"Severus? Gossip? Never," Sirius mock-gasped, before laughing. "It's not like he needs to; I can see it all over your face when you talk about your boy. It's very sweet." Sirius laughed harder as Harry squirmed in embarrassment.

"You just wait til you start dating again," Harry muttered. "I'll get you back for all of this."

“You might be waiting a while,” Sirius pointed out, the light in his eyes dying a little bit.
“Hard to get a date when everyone thinks you’re a murdering lunatic.”

“It won’t be forever. We’ll find Pettigrew and get your name cleared,” Harry vowed.

“I’m sure you will, pup,” Sirius agreed, smiling slightly. “You’re a determined little bugger like that.” He shook his head in a slightly canine way, then brightened up. “Anyway, tell me about what the twins have been up to — you mentioned something about hexing the Ravenclaw common room guardian?”

Harry grinned, happy to regale Sirius with the tale of Fred and George hexing the Ravenclaw statue to spout gibberish instead of riddles, so they could only get into their common room by responding with utter nonsense. One day, he couldn’t wait to introduce his godfather to the twins. Though the rest of them might not be safe once he did.

.-. .

Severus strode through the corridor towards the headmaster’s office, smirking to himself when the few students he passed hurried to get out of his way. They really were far too easy to scare.

He wasn’t sure why he’d been summoned, but it couldn’t be good. He gave the password to the gargoyle, stepping up on to the revolving staircase and tightening his Occlumency shields. He was prepared for anything, wondering which loose threads the headmaster might be tugging on now.

Dumbledore was sat behind his desk, smiling genially at Severus when he entered. “Ah, Severus. Thank you for coming so promptly,” he greeted, gesturing towards the bowl of sweets on his desk. “Lemon drop?”

Severus declined, knowing the sour sweets were usually laced with some sort of mild truth-telling potion. “What did you need from me, Albus?” he asked, taking a seat opposite the desk.

“Just a chat,” Dumbledore assured, leaning forward in his chair and clasping his hands together on the desk. “Igor Karkaroff is looking a little nervous lately. I was wondering if you might have any inkling as to why.”

Karkaroff looked like a loud noise might give him a heart attack, these days. Severus didn’t blame him; the man had a lot to be worried about, if the Dark Lord was on the rise again. “I already told you the Mark is getting darker,” Severus replied, because there was never any chance of him hiding that. “Igor is merely worried about how little time he has left.”

“And do you know the answer to that?”

“If you’re asking if I’ve heard anything about the Dark Lord’s return, the answer is no, Albus,” Severus said flatly. The headmaster’s brow furrowed.

"Severus, I understand this is a difficult time for everybody; you especially. However, the side of the light will need as much information as possible should the worst happen." His voice was apologetic, but Severus could read between the lines. 'Don't forget you're still my spy, even if Voldemort isn't around yet. You'll be back at it as soon as he pops his head up'. Typical.

"I am keeping an ear to the ground and my usual channels open," Severus drawled in assurance. "There is simply little information to share." That was true; no one from the old crowd seemed to know where the Dark Lord was, or how he was regaining strength. Severus was both glad and wary that there hadn't yet been a whisper of the name Peter Pettigrew. Severus could only imagine how much information the little rat had taken with him, after living in Potter's dorm for three years, and spending the whole twelve with a prominent light family. The Dark Lord would know far too much by now.

"I'm glad to hear it," Dumbledore replied. "I feared with the tournament going on, especially with Mr Potter's recent circumstances, it would be too much of a cover for Voldemort to gather his followers."

"Surely you don't believe Mr Potter's... circumstances are anything but an attempt by the Dark Lord's followers to kill the boy? Just because I wasn't involved in the plot doesn't mean there wasn't one." If Dumbledore truly thought Potter's involvement in the tournament was just a prank gone wrong, or a fourteen year-old boy's quest for glory, he had finally cracked. Unless the old coot had done it himself, to give Potter another chance to prove himself.

"I think whoever tampered with the Goblet of Fire will reveal themselves in due course, and there is little we can do but support Harry until that time comes," Dumbledore said, sounding entirely uncaring that his precious Golden Boy was in such dangerous circumstances. Sometimes it baffled Severus how this man had ended up in charge of wizarding Britain's children, and no one seemed to notice he didn't give a damn about their welfare. How were people so blind?

"If I may be excused, I have a potion brewing," Severus lied easily, getting to his feet.

"Of course, of course. I trust you'll come to me if you get any further information." Dumbledore stood as well, offering Severus a look that was supposed to be fatherly. "Dark times are coming, my dear boy, and I believe we will need you now more than ever. I am sorry to have to ask you to make this sacrifice once more, but... it is for the greater good."

Severus bit back a snarl. How many lives had this man ruined in the name of the 'greater good'? Instead he merely nodded, face impassive. "Some things are necessary," he said, turning to leave the office. It wasn't until he was back in the privacy of his own quarters that he let his shoulders slump a little, a sigh escaping his lips. And so it began, again.

.-. .

There was a Hogsmeade weekend in mid-January, and Harry found himself trudging down the slushy pathway beside Neville and Ginny, who had insisted he couldn't spend it locked inside, and that Rita Skeeter couldn't make a scandal of him going to Hogsmeade, especially when she wasn't even legally supposed to write about him. Harry was pretty sure Skeeter could and would, but he allowed himself to be bullied out of the castle all the same. He'd been reading up on merpeople for the last four days straight, and it was starting to give him a headache.

Instead, he focused his attention on his companions — Neville and Ginny had been hanging out a lot ever since the Yule Ball. Harry couldn't figure out if they were dating or not. He'd never seen them kiss; but then again, he'd never seen Remus and Snape kiss, yet those two were definitely in love. As they walked, Ginny's shoulder bumped Neville's arm every few steps, and the older Gryffindor didn't seem to mind. Harry's eyes narrowed on their hands as they almost linked between them. Yeah, there was definitely something going on there.

"Let's go to Honeydukes," Ginny suggested, nudging Neville until he changed direction.
"I'm out of sugar quills."

Harry was always happy to buy sweets, and owed Remus some Honeydukes' Finest, so he trailed after the maybe-couple into the sweet shop.

As they strolled from shop to shop, mostly at Ginny's urging, Harry kept an eye out for Hagrid. The half-giant still hadn't worked up the courage to leave his hut, even after a week. The fuss from the article had mostly died down, but Hagrid wouldn't hear it, insisting to Harry that he wasn't ready yet. Harry wondered how much longer it would take for him to be ready.

Shopping finished, Harry suggested they head to the Three Broomsticks, as much as he was dreading the crowd. There was a chance Hagrid could be in there — and he wasn't quite done observing Ginny and Neville yet. Both of them were easy to blush, and there had been a lot of blushing going on all day. It made Harry smile, and he wondered if it had been like this for Sirius watching him and Draco over the summer. His godfather took a lot of joy in insisting they were both oblivious and besotted even then.

Once inside the pub, Harry wished he'd brought his invisibility cloak. When he was inside Hogwarts, it was easy to forget he was a Triwizard Champion; most people had stopped caring by now. Outside, however, was an entirely different matter. Heads turned, whispers started up, and Harry grimaced.

"We can go somewhere else if you want?" Neville suggested quietly. "Back to Gryffindor or whatever."

"No, it's fine," Harry assured, squeezing through the crowd towards the bar. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Ginny's fingers curl around Neville's as they entered the fray. He smirked to himself. "What do you two want? I'm buying."

"Harry, my boy!" He resisted the urge to groan, turning to face Ludo Bagman, who was making his way over from a table full of unhappy-looking goblins. "Good to see you, good to see you! Had a good Christmas?" Bagman glanced back at Neville and Ginny. "You two don't mind if I borrow Harry here for a quick private chat, do you?"

"Actually, we do," Ginny retorted blithely. "He's about to buy us drinks. Come on, Harry." Without giving Bagman time to argue, Ginny hooked her free hand around Harry's elbow and tugged him away towards the other end of the bar. The man looked baffled by the turn of events, and Harry snickered.

“Nice one, Gin.” Ginny smiled with dimpled cheeks.

“I don’t trust that one. He still hasn’t paid the twins their winnings from the World Cup — I caught them writing to him about it the other week.”

As if summoned by their names, Fred and George entered the pub, and upon spotting Bagman, made a beeline for him. Bagman’s blue eyes went wide, and he hurried back to the table full of goblins after a brief conversation with the twins that left them both looking disappointed. Harry thought about calling them over, but then glanced at Ginny and Neville, and stayed silent. They didn’t deserve teasing, not while they were still figuring things out.

Instead, he leaned on the bar and flagged down Madam Rosmerta to order their drinks, elbowing Neville out of the way when the boy tried to split the bill. “No, shush, this round is mine,” Harry insisted, handing over the coins before Neville could use his extra height to reach over him. Rosmerta giggled, shaking her head at their antics.

“Thanks, Harry,” Ginny chirped, sipping at her raspberry fizz.

Crowded at the bar due to lack of seats, Harry had to fight down a grin when Ginny started leaning against Neville, not looking like she even realised she was doing it. It was funny, watching two people start gravitating towards each other like that — after years of watching Ron and Hermione circle in the most uncomfortable orbit in the world, he’d forgotten what it was like for normal people to get together. He didn’t say a word about it, keeping up the conversation about the new player the Harpies had just signed.

Where he was stood, Harry had a perfect view of the door, and thus he couldn’t miss it when Rita Skeeter walked in, wearing bright yellow robes and trailing her photographer behind her. She didn’t seem to notice Harry as she ordered drinks at a small table nearby.

“What’s he doing with a pack of goblins in tow, anyway?” Skeeter was saying to the photographer, smirking. “Showing them the sights”, what tosh. He was always a bad liar. Think we should do a bit of digging? There’s bound to be something that’ll make a good headline — Disgraced Ex-Head of Magical Sports, Ludo Bagman — We just need to find a story to fit it.”

Harry scowled, stepping forward before he even knew what he was doing. “Trying to ruin someone else’s life?” he said loudly, glaring at the blonde woman. Around them, the pub went quiet. Skeeter beamed.

“Harry! How lovely to see you — have you changed your mind about an interview? Come, come sit!”

“I’m not going anywhere near you,” Harry insisted. “How dare you write that article about Hagrid! No one cares that he’s half-giant!”

"Well, if no one cares, then it shouldn't be a problem," Skeeter retorted, smirk dripping with malice. "Why don't you give me a quote, Harry? About the Hagrid you know." She pulled her lime green quill from her crocodile-skin handbag. "The man behind the muscle. Would you call him a father substitute?"

"Are you so bad at your job that you can't get a headline without making up utter tripe?" Ginny cut in furiously, appearing at Harry's shoulder. Skeeter glared at her, lips pursing.

"Sit down, you silly little girl, and don't get involved in matters that don't concern you," she dismissed. Ginny's hands clenched into fists at her side.

"Like you're one to talk!" she argued. "Hagrid's personal life is none of your business, but you stuck your ugly nose in where it wasn't wanted, and now look what you've done!"

Harry recognised the malicious glint in Skeeter's eye, and his heart sank. They were going to end up in more trouble than it was worth. "Come on, Ginny," he urged quietly, placing a gentle hand on her shoulder. "Let's just go." He glanced over at Neville, who nodded and set his mostly-empty drink down, taking Ginny by the hand and urging her out of the pub. Harry didn't look back at Skeeter as they left.

"She's not gonna take that lying down," Neville said with furrowed brows, eyeing Ginny in concern. "She'll be after you next."

"Let her," Ginny replied, scowling. "I'll take whatever that lying cow can dish out."

Harry hoped that was true. If there was one thing Rita Skeeter was good at, it was hurting people.

.-. .

From books about merpeople, Harry moved on to researching water-based spells, trying to find something that might allow him to be underwater for an hour. He found spells for walking on water, transporting large amounts of water, and plenty of spells to help find water, but nothing that told him how to survive in it past the usual limitation of his lung capacity. There had to be something. He was just looking in the wrong place.

Remembering Sirius' words about asking Remus, Harry donned his invisibility cloak one Friday evening and headed down to the dungeons. Remus was usually around on Friday nights, and he'd mentioned something about being there when Harry had spoken to him last.

He glanced around to check the coast was clear, then knocked on the frame of the portrait. It opened, and he snuck inside, waiting until the door was closed before removing his cloak. He looked around the unusually empty room, frowning. "I thought Remus was supposed to be here?"

"He was," Snape replied curtly. He'd taken off his teaching robes, leaving him in just a black shirt and trousers. He looked exhausted, if Harry was honest. "There was a change in plans."

“Is everything okay? Is he alright?” Harry asked, brain immediately throwing dozens of disaster scenarios his way.

“He is well. The mutt is merely having a difficult time; Remus didn’t feel it prudent to leave him alone.”

Harry winced; Sirius was doing a lot better since moving into Seren Du, but every now and then he had nightmares from Azkaban and got stuck inside his own head for a little while. It was happening less and less, especially after Snape helped him with his Occlumency shields over the summer, but... twelve years surrounded by dementors had left him with a lot of damage.

“Oh,” he said, feeling awkward now he knew it was just him and the Potions Master. “I’ll, just, uh— go, then. Sorry to disturb you.”

“Not so fast, Potter,” Snape drawled before Harry could put the cloak back on. The man looked skyward for a moment, like he might regret what he was about to say, but carried on nonetheless. “There was clearly a reason for your visit here. Sit; perhaps I may be of assistance. I am not Remus, but I’m also not an idiot.”

Harry blinked, needing several seconds to comprehend the man’s words. Snape was... inviting him to stay? “Oh,” he said again. “I— okay then. If you’re sure.” Harry walked over to his usual spot on the sofa, and his eyebrows rose when a steaming teacup floated his way. “Thanks.”

Snape sat in his armchair, raising one eyebrow. “Well? What dilemma do you need a way out of now?”

Harry bit his lip. Snape had been a lot better since the summer, in private at least. He could trust him. “Well, I know what the egg’s clue means now. I just don’t really know what to do about it.” He drank his tea, unsurprised that it was exactly the way he preferred it. Snape was a spy, after all; he was supposed to be observant. “I have to be able to breathe underwater for an hour.”

He explained the mermaid’s song to Snape, whose lips pursed. “Of course they’re sending you into the Black Lake in February,” he muttered. “No wonder Poppy asked for those extra-strength Pepper-Up potions. Honestly!”

Harry hadn’t even thought about the issues that might arise from the temperature of the water, and grimaced. Could he hold a Warming charm for an hour? Should he just wear one of his charmed robes, even though it would slow him down in the water?

“There is of course the Bubblehead charm,” Snape continued, demonstrating with a wave of his wand. A large bubble appeared around his head, like he was wearing a fishbowl as a helmet. “Useful for being underwater, and also to avoid noxious fumes from potions. I often teach it to my NEWT students.” His voice was somewhat distorted by the bubble, but Harry could still hear him. Another wave of his wand, and the spell ended. “However, keeping the spell up for a full hour — especially in the face of whatever trials there will no doubt be waiting for you — requires a lot of concentration, and is a risk for someone as unfamiliar with the spell as you are. I would recommend you learn it as a precaution, but not as your main method for the task.”

“So what do I do, then?” Harry asked, watching Snape think.

“There is no similar limitation to the first task, where you could only use your wand?” the Slytherin checked. Harry shook his head.

“It doesn’t say anything about it, so I assume we’re fine to have other things. If not, I could always summon something again,” he added ruefully. “Why? Are you thinking about some sort of scuba diving apparatus? Because I thought about that but I don’t know how mechanised they are, and I didn’t know if the magic in the lake might mess with it.” The last thing he wanted was for an oxygen tank to fail on him in the middle of the Black Lake.

“No, that wouldn’t work,” Snape dismissed immediately. “But there is a plant — gillyweed. If you eat it, you will grow gills; and also sometimes fins. The effects vary from plant to plant, which makes it a somewhat risky approach, but if you carry enough for a second dose, that will cover you should the first dose lose its effects before you’ve finished.”

“Brilliant!” Harry breathed, perking up. He just had to eat this plant and he’d be all set! “Where can I buy it?”

“It’s rather rare,” Snape told him, making Harry falter. Of course it was. Just his luck. “However, it is used in several potions, so I keep some in my private stores. I will provide you with some when the task is nearer.” The Slytherin smirked. “If anyone asks where you got it, tell them you stole from me. There will be a detention for your efforts, after the task. Remus has been looking for a chance to test your Ancient Runes progress.”

Most of Harry’s Snape-related detentions turned into private lessons these days, so that didn’t bother him too much. “You’ll just give it to me? Really?”

“It would rather upset Remus if I just let you drown,” Snape pointed out mildly.

Harry was hit with a burst of bravery — or perhaps stupidity. “You’d be sleeping on the sofa for at least a week,” he teased. Snape stared at him, unimpressed.

“Don’t make me regret my offer, Potter,” he muttered. Harry just laughed.

“Wouldn’t dream of it, sir,” he assured, before sobering. “Seriously, thanks. I was starting to run out of options.”

“I’m sure Mr Longbottom would have enlightened you, had you shared your dilemma with him,” Snape said, and Harry wondered if that was a gentle reminder to trust his friends more. He was happy to talk about the egg with the other champions — at least, he had been before Viktor had solved the clue — but he’d been keeping it quiet around the rest of his friends, not wanting to worry them by explaining what he was about to undertake.

“But then I still would have had to figure out where to get this gillyweed stuff,” Harry pointed out. “So really I just skipped the middle man.”

Once again, Snape looked unimpressed, but he didn't say anything. With his problem solved, Harry wondered if he should leave. He'd gotten quite used to spending Friday evenings in the Potions Master's quarters with Remus, doing his homework and catching his pseudo-godfather up on everything he hadn't managed to tell him through the mirror. The thought of going back to Gryffindor Tower so early made something in his chest twinge sadly.

"I won't help you with your homework," Snape declared flatly. "But if you wish to avoid the antics of the many Weasleys you surround yourself with, you may stay."

Harry checked his Occlumency shields for a minute, worried he had let Snape slip in. But no, they were as solid as ever. He was just pathetic and transparent, evidently. What had his life come to that he'd rather do homework in his most hated professor's private rooms rather than up in the common room with his friends?

"Would you... if you're not too busy, would you teach me the Bubblehead charm? Please?" he requested tentatively. Snape's dark eyes surveyed him for a moment, and then he sighed.

"Very well," he assented. "But if your essay on Monday isn't of O level quality, you'll be in detention until Easter."

Harry laughed, wondering when threats of detention had become endearing rather than terrifying. "Yes, sir," he agreed, grinning.

The Bubblehead charm wasn't particularly difficult, but Snape was right that it took concentration to maintain. Harry couldn't get it to stick for more than five minutes by the time Snape told him to give it a rest and get on with his homework, claiming he had essays to mark. The Potions Master didn't kick him out even then, so Harry settled in to do his homework at the man's coffee table, the pair of them sitting in surprisingly companionable silence as they each got their work done. Every now and then, Harry asked Snape a question, like he might Remus or Sirius. To his utter astonishment, Snape would actually answer, explaining concisely until Harry could make sense of the work he was doing. He was a great teacher when he wasn't being an evil git, in more subjects than just Potions. It was almost like being back at Seren Du, but... easier. Over the summer they'd still had a lot of prejudice and awkward history to work past. Now, Harry was actually enjoying being in the man's company. It wasn't quite as relaxing as being with Remus or Sirius, but it was... nice.

He wondered if Snape was enjoying it as much as Harry was; what he might go and tell Remus about it when he saw the man next. Harry could imagine it already; Remus' eyes lighting up at the news, that happy little proud smile that he got whenever he saw Snape loosening up around people who weren't him. Whenever his newly reunited family started truly acting like one.

Harry didn't mind so much, having Snape in the family. He was Draco's godfather, after all. But all that aside, he was Remus', and that made him Harry's to some degree, too. Whether Snape liked it or not.

Chapter 31

“Potter, stay where you are.” The sharp voice rang out through the Potions classroom, and Harry grimaced, shaking his head when Neville shot him a concerned look.

“I’ll catch up,” he assured, wondering what he was in trouble for this time. Perhaps, after having the weekend to think it over, Snape regretted being so nice to Harry. They’d had a pretty pleasant evening working together in his quarters, and he probably just wanted to make it clear he was still the evil, terrifying dungeon bat Harry had thought he was for the first three years of schooling.

When they were the only two left in the classroom, Snape locked the door and went through a series of privacy wards; he, too, was aware of Skeeter’s subterfuge. Harry stayed in his seat, waiting for the explosion.

“How often do you check the map?”

Harry blinked at the unexpected question. “I— what?”

“The Marauders’ blasted map,” Snape clarified. “How regularly have you been checking it?”

“At least three times a day, lately,” he said. “Looking for Rita Skeeter.” So far nothing unusual had come up, except for Mr Crouch being in the school sometimes. But he was probably just organising tournament stuff. “Why do you ask?”

Snape scowled. “Someone broke into my private stores recently.”

“Was it another champion looking for gillyweed, do you think?” Harry queried, wondering who would be stupid enough to steal from Snape.

“No; the only thing of note that was missing was boomslang skin.” His dark eyes turned pointed as comprehension dawned on Harry’s face. “You haven’t been brewing Polyjuice potion again, have you, Potter?”

“What? No!” Harry denied immediately. “What use would I have for Polyjuice? Wait, how do you know about the first time?”

“Miss Granger was indelicate in breaking into my stores, and left her magical signature all over the place,” Snape replied. “Don’t tell me what you used it for, I’m quite certain I don’t want to know. I assume it had something to do with Miss Granger being partially transformed into a cat.”

Harry snickered at the memory. “Yeah, bit of a mix-up there.” Snape gave him a despairing look. “I swear, sir, I don’t know anything about any Polyjuice being brewed. Couldn’t you tell who did it this time?”

"Whoever it was, they were very thorough in removing any trace of their presence," Snape said, looking quite annoyed by that. "They stole enough for quite a large batch of Polyjuice, so I suspect they won't need any more for a while."

Harry glanced up sharply as the man's words settled in his brain. "You think it's for long-term use."

"I think there is someone in this castle who is not who they appear to be," Snape confirmed. "Whoever it is, they're doing an impeccable job at impersonating their chosen target."

"Do you think they're the one who put my name in the Goblet?" Harry asked grimly. Snape nodded.

"It would make sense, yes. Stay vigilant, Potter, and check the map whenever you are able. If any name is unfamiliar to you, come to me immediately."

"Yes, sir." The map was enormous, but Harry would keep an eye on it the best he could. "Can I go, sir? I'm going to be late to History of Magic."

"Which would, of course, be such a tragedy," Snape retorted dryly, making Harry snicker.

"Oh, I'd be devastated," he agreed. Snape rolled his eyes, turning away.

"Get out, brat. Come to me at lunchtime on the 23rd, I'll get you your gillyweed. The fresher it is, the more potent it will be."

"Thanks, Professor!" Leaving the classroom, he made sure to school his expression into something appropriately downtrodden as he walked past the crowd of second years waiting for their lesson to begin. As soon as he was past them, it turned into a concerned frown, his hands suddenly itching to pull the map from his bag. That was... concerning news. At least now they had something to look for.

.-. .

Harry was getting used to being manhandled out of the common room by one or both of the Weasley twins by now. He didn't put up a fight, letting them drag him up to their dorm room. "What are you two planning now?" he asked suspiciously. They sent him identical innocent grins, which didn't fool Harry for a second.

"Nothing untoward!" Fred insisted.

"We were just talking about you," George said conversationally.

"As we often do."

"And we realised that we're putting an awful lot of trust in that boyfriend of yours."

"We know you say he's alright, but you're a bit daft sometimes."

"No offence."

“So we were thinking, as the only two of your brothers who know the truth.“

“We should meet him, properly, make sure he’s actually a decent bloke like you say he is.”

Harry wasn’t thrown off by the alternating sentences, but their words did make him blink. “You’ve met Draco,” he said, perplexed. “Many times. Played quidditch against him. Remember?”

Both twins rolled their eyes. “We’ve met Malfoy,” George clarified.

“Slytherin Prince and pureblood prat,” Fred added helpfully.

“We haven’t met Draco. Not your Draco, anyway.”

“And we thought you might hex us if we took that meeting upon ourselves.”

“So we decided to ask you if you’d arrange something.” George looked hopeful, leaning against a bedpost. “It’s obvious you’re mad about him. I know you said Sirius and Lupin have met him, so obviously he’s not terrible since they approve, but...”

“You’re family,” Fred finished, his tone surprisingly serious. “And if he’s everything you say he is, then hell, he might end up family too, one day.” Harry blushed furiously — that was getting very far ahead, Merlin, they were only fourteen!

“So can we meet your boyfriend?” they finished in unison.

There was a funny little warmth curling in Harry’s chest. The twins wanted to meet Draco, to see him how Harry saw him, to genuinely get to know him. Even Neville hadn’t said anything more about Draco since the Yule Ball. “You promise you’ll be nice to him?” he asked cautiously. George grinned at him, for once without any mischief or dramatics.

“He makes you happy,” he said simply. “That’s enough to at least get a pass on any pranks for one meeting.”

“After that, we’ll decide,” Fred finished with a smirk. Harry snorted; that was all he could ask for, he supposed. Even he didn’t get a complete free pass for prank immunity. Though that could be because the twins had discovered Harry would give back as good as he got, after spending half a summer living with Sirius and Remus. Harry still hadn’t told them the truth about the two Marauders; he was saving that little gem for when he needed it most.

“I’m meeting Draco tomorrow night,” he said eventually. “I’ll check with him, but you two can come with me.”

The twins beamed. Harry hoped he was making the right choice. The more people he had on Draco’s side when they eventually went public about their relationship, the better.

Harry managed to catch Draco after breakfast the next morning, and the blond looked incredibly uneasy at the prospect of being introduced to the twins as Harry’s boyfriend. But after a promise of no pranks — and several kisses to ease his nerves — Draco agreed to the meeting, and so Harry found himself squeezed under the invisibility cloak with the two tall redheads that night after curfew.

“This thing is amazing,” George murmured softly, in awe of the cloak. “No wonder you sneak about so much.”

“Can we borrow it sometime?” Fred asked. “This would come in handy for so many things!”

“As long as you’re careful with it,” Harry agreed. “It was my dad’s.” He was pretty sure his dad would like the idea of the twins using his cloak to cause mischief. Sirius certainly would.

They reached the empty Charms classroom and Harry nudged the door open, smiling to see Draco perched on the teacher’s desk inside. The Slytherin was nervous, Harry could tell by the line of his shoulders, but there wasn’t a sign of it on his face. Harry dropped the cloak, greeting Draco with a grin. “Hi,” he said quietly, taking a step forward, then hesitating as the twins appeared behind him. He’d never kissed Draco in front of another person before. Was it okay if he did?

The light in Draco’s eyes dimmed a little when Harry didn’t move towards him, and that made up his mind; he closed the distance between them, pressing their lips together without hesitation, even as his cheeks turned red. One of the twins — he was pretty sure it was George — let out a wolf-whistle.

“Our little boy’s all grown up, kissing Slytherins.” That was definitely George, mock-sniffing and wiping an imaginary tear from the corner of his eye.

“Just following your example,” Harry retorted sweetly, making George freeze.

“What do you know?”

Harry laughed, shaking his head; it had just been a hunch, but that definitely confirmed things. George had kissed at least one Slytherin in the past. He wondered who it was.

Taking Draco’s hand in his, he tugged the blond off the desk and closer to the twins. “Draco,” he started, “this is Fred and George. Don’t worry if you can’t tell which is which, yet.” Harry wasn’t even sure how he could tell anymore, he just knew. “Fred, George, this is Draco. My boyfriend.” He couldn’t stop the grin that took over his face at the announcement, and George cooed.

“Look at him, Freddy— about ready to fight us, isn’t he?”

Harry hadn’t realised he’d taken a protective stance, keeping Draco ever so slightly behind him. He blushed, but didn’t move.

“You can relax, Harrikins; this is a peaceful mission,” Fred insisted, holding out a hand towards Draco. Draco shook it, trepidation on his face. “So. Your dad’s a Death Eater.” He said it as if discussing the weather, and Harry flinched.

“Fred.” His tone was warning, but Draco’s hand rested briefly on his shoulder.

"It's fine," he assured, meeting Fred's gaze with his head held high. "He is. But I am not my father, and I'd rather die before I knelt to that twisted monster."

Fred's gaze assessed him carefully, then he eventually nodded. "Good. I reckon Harry won't let either of those things happen to you, so you're alright there."

George jumped in at his twin's side, grabbing Draco's arm in a handshake. "You're better at Potions than Harry is, aren't you?"

"That's not difficult," Draco replied, smirking. Harry jabbed him lightly in the side. He was okay at it, now! "Why?"

"We've been working on this variation of the Swelling Solution for one of our products," George explained, "and we've been having a bit of trouble getting it to only work on certain parts of the body."

Harry was left blinking as his boyfriend was stolen away by the twins, dragged towards some empty chairs and brought into a debate about ingredient measures and brewing times. Still, he couldn't be too mad about it; the twins were trying so hard. They hadn't brought any Wheezes products, and other than Fred's first remark, not a single mention of Draco's family escaped their lips. Harry wasn't sure what he'd been expecting when he'd agreed to the meeting, but something with more of a fight had certainly crossed his mind. Draco had been pretty awful to the Weasley family in the past, even if not to the twins specifically. Their families had a blood feud that had lasted for generations.

He couldn't be much help discussing Potions, but Harry pulled up a chair next to Draco anyway, smiling when the blond tangled his fingers in Harry's without even thinking about it, his other hand making a series of gestures to help explain whatever he was explaining to the twins. A lot of it went over Harry's head, but it was apparent Draco knew what he was talking about, and the twins clearly appreciated the input.

"We might have more questions for you," George warned, after Fred finished writing down Draco's instructions. "We're both decent enough at Potions, but it's never been our favourite. Spells are so much easier to manipulate."

"I suppose I can help where possible," Draco acquiesced. "As long as I can trust you not to use my own work against me."

The twins shared a smirk. "I think that's fair," they agreed. George glanced down at his watch.

"Right, we'd better leave you two alone, then," he said, smirk widening as he gave Harry and Draco a lewd wink. "Don't want to take up your whole night."

Harry was immeasurably grateful for that. He was over the moon that the twins and Draco seemed to get along well, but he also just really wanted to be able to snog his boyfriend in peace.

The twins stood, and George ruffled Harry's hair fondly. "You were right," he declared. "He's not as much of a prat as he likes to pretend he is."

Draco made a vaguely offended face, but Harry ignored him, grinning up at the older boy. "So I can keep him, then?" he asked in a falsely casual tone. Fred snickered.

"As long as you remember to feed him, and walk him, and don't let him piddle on the carpet," he replied, earning a bark of laughter. He clapped Harry on the shoulder. "We'll see you in the morning. Don't stay up too late."

"Remember the spells in the book," George added, making Harry splutter. As if they were anywhere close to needing those spells!

"We'll see you around, Draco," Fred said to the Slytherin, nodding. Draco nodded back, and Harry felt like he was missing something.

"If you have any more Potions questions, write them down and send them with Harry," the blond instructed. "I'll do what I can."

The twins grinned, then disappeared from the classroom, leaving Harry's invisibility cloak pooled on the floor in the doorway. They'd been sneaking around the castle long enough not to need it. Harry didn't really need it either these days, but he brought it out of habit.

There was a beat of silence, then Harry let out a long breath. "That was alright, wasn't it?" he asked worriedly. "They were okay?"

Draco's hands rested on Harry's hips, and the smallest smile curved at his mouth. "I expected more hexing," he admitted. "Possibly a bit of yelling. Certainly not... that."

Harry smiled faintly. "Yeah, they'll surprise you." He hadn't realised how nervous he'd been about the whole meeting until it was over, and his heart was thudding in his chest. "I'd say it went better than either of us expected. They like you." If they didn't, they wouldn't have left Harry behind.

Draco leaned in, lips brushing against Harry's in a way that had the Gryffindor following when he pulled back. "Let's stop talking about Weasleys, shall we?" he drawled, hand sliding around to the small of Harry's back.

There wasn't much talking about anything for a while after that.

.-.-.-.

It was starting to become a thing, Harry thought to himself, entering the common room to see Ron and Hermione sat on the sofa by the fire and staring at him intently. He reluctantly veered in their direction, raising an eyebrow expectantly. "We had something we wanted to say," Hermione said by way of greeting. Harry snorted, perching on the arm of the chair opposite.

"I can see that," he muttered to himself. "Go on, then."

“Everything has been a bit of a mess lately,” Hermione said earnestly. “Between the tournament, and Viktor, and... everything else.” Harry wondered if she was referring to Ron’s attitude, or his many other friends. “I think it all just got out of hand, and we let it. But Harry, the three of us have been best friends since first year. Surely we can’t let a little drama and a boy get in the way of all that?”

She was oversimplifying things so enormously that Harry goggled at her a little. “First off, I’ve never had a problem with Viktor,” he pointed out. “He’s great, we’re friends, if you want to date him then go right ahead. Ron’s the one with that issue there.” The redhead flushed, looking a little angry, but after a glance at Hermione he swallowed it back.

“Ronald and I have worked out our differences,” Hermione assured him. Harry doubted it, but let her keep up her illusion. “We miss you, Harry. I know you’ve been busy with the tournament, but all that aside, this year has been different for all of us. We’ve hardly spent any time together. It feels like we’re losing you.” Her voice cracked slightly, and guilt reared within Harry’s chest. It wasn’t their fault he now had a mountain of secrets he was keeping from them.

“That hasn’t all been my fault,” Harry pointed out, thinking of the multiple arguments he’d had with both of them over the last couple of months. Hermione ducked her head.

“No, it hasn’t,” she agreed. “Which is why I thought it’d be best if we just drew a line under all of that and started over, back how things were. You, me, and Ron.”

Obviously the tentative truce they’d agreed upon before the Yule Ball wasn’t enough for her. Part of Harry wondered why she was trying so hard to salvage a failing friendship; then he realised she didn’t exactly have anyone else to turn to. Maybe he’d been too hard on her lately. On both of them. It had to be strange from their perspective, seeing Harry change so drastically as a person seemingly for no reason. They didn’t know about the Compulsion charm.

Once again, Ron was being very silent, and Harry glanced at the redheaded boy. “What do you reckon?”

Ron looked up at him, smiling very faintly. “I reckon if some nutter’s out to kill you again, you could use all the friends you can get.”

Harry cracked a grin in return, even as his stomach churned uneasily. Ron and Hermione really did deserve more of a chance than he’d been giving them lately, after everything they had been through. Harry wasn’t quite ready to start sharing his secrets, but he could at least stop expecting the worst of them.

“Have you two done the essay for McGonagall yet?” he asked tentatively, offering an olive branch. Hermione beamed, even as Ron groaned at the mention of homework.

“We were just about to start,” Hermione said, reaching into her bulging backpack. “Do you want to join us? I’ll help you if you like.”

Hermione had to be desperate, Harry mused, to be volunteering to help him with work. Not that he needed it these days; if she'd been paying close attention, she'd notice he was doing just fine on his own. "Yeah, alright."

He pulled out his Transfiguration textbook and writing supplies, sliding down into the armchair to lean over the coffee table. Ron grumbled a bit, but got his things out too, and the three of them settled in to work. Harry couldn't really call it working together — despite Hermione's offer, she kept to herself and glared at Ron every time he tried to sneak a look at her parchment — more just working in proximity to one another, but it was a start.

Harry was only half-focused on his work, the rest of his brain still trying to figure out what had prompted the change of heart. Despite the agreed-upon truce, after the disaster of the Yule Ball and the following fallout, Harry had expected to go the whole rest of the year without overtures of any kind from Ron and Hermione. Ginny was still pissed at Ron for ignoring Luna all night, Hermione wasn't impressed by the rumours circulating about her and Harry, and Harry had thought Ron was still convinced he was some kind of traitor for making friends with people from other schools and houses. What had happened to make them so determined to clear the air and start over?

It was a testament to how fractured their friendship had been lately that the sight of the three of them studying together gained many odd looks from the Gryffindors who passed through the common room. Neville was one of them, eyeing Harry in concern, but Harry just waved him off. If they wanted to try, he was willing to try.

When he finished his essay — faster than Ron and Hermione, though Hermione was at least four inches over the requirement with no signs of stopping — Harry sat up with a stretch. "I'll be right back, I'm gonna go get my History of Magic book." Might as well get a head start on the next essay, even if he couldn't finish it in one night.

Heading towards the dorms, Harry started jogging up the stairs, almost falling flat on his face when an arm reached out and yanked him through a door. "What the hell, George?" he asked the redhead, straightening up with a scowl. It faded when he saw the concern on George's face.

"What did those two say to you?" George asked. Harry frowned.

"What? They just want to try being friends again. I guess Hermione misses me, I suppose Ron might as well." Ron was still a little off with him, but he'd tried cracking a few jokes while they worked, some of which were actually funny. To Harry's surprise, that made George grimace.

"I don't want to ruin anything, in case they genuinely mean it," he started cautiously. "But I thought you should know. I saw the two of them talking with Dumbledore after lunch today." Harry's heart sank. "I couldn't get close enough to hear what they were saying, not without risking being caught. But he looked like he was annoyed with them for something, and Ron didn't seem too pleased about whatever he was saying."

"Do you think..." Harry trailed off, unable to voice his concern.

"That Dumbledore isn't happy they're no longer keeping an eye on you, and told them to get back in your good books?" George finished grimly. "I'd bet my broom on it, mate."

Harry's blood became ice in his veins, and George squeezed his shoulder sympathetically. "I'm sorry," the redhead murmured. "If I thought they were honest, I'd let it go, but... there's too much at stake for you to risk this. And honestly, some of the stuff Ron's said about you lately when you're not around, I find it hard to believe he's had a change of heart, even with Hermione pestering him."

"Right." Harry definitely didn't want to know what Ron had said. He wasn't sure he could take it. "Yeah. I... shit." He ran a hand through his hair, hating the way his eyes were starting to itch. He didn't even like Ron and Hermione that much anymore; why did it hurt so much to have his fears confirmed?

All of a sudden he was wrapped in a hug, his face pressed against George's chest. "You're still family," George promised, hand warm and solid on Harry's spine. "You've got us, and Bill and Charlie, and even Ginny. If Ron and Hermione are working for Dumbledore, you're better off without them."

That was true, but it didn't change the fact that they were the first friends Harry had made at Hogwarts; the only friends he'd had for a long time. To learn it was all a lie — even if it had been genuine once, it wasn't anymore — Harry couldn't help but feel his heart break just a little bit.

"Thanks for telling me, George," he said eventually, pulling away and trying to compose himself. "I'd love to say I'm surprised, but..." George shared his uneasy look. "I should go. They'll be wondering what's taking me so long."

"If you need a rescue, you know the signal," George told him, not arguing when Harry left the dorm.

Hurrying up to his own dorm to grab the book he'd originally gone up for, Harry went back down to the common room with a smile on his face like nothing had happened. Hermione smiled back at him when he approached. "Everything alright?"

"Yeah, fine," he lied breezily, cracking open the textbook. They would definitely get suspicious if he turned on them so quickly after agreeing to make friends again, but Harry was pretty sure they'd end up arguing within a week or two and he could break away then. It might be worth trying for a little longer, to give them something to take back to Dumbledore. Reassurance that Harry was still his old self — still under the Compulsion charm and blissfully unaware of anything to do with his inheritance or pureblood culture or the Wizengamot.

If they were going to spy on him, he might as well use it to his advantage.

....

Being friends with Ron again meant it was difficult for Harry to sneak out of the dorm to meet Draco, but he managed it eventually, filling the blond in on the situation as they sat together on the floor of the Transfiguration classroom, a Cushioning charm making the stone surprisingly comfortable. Harry's head was in Draco's lap, the Slytherin's narrow fingers running through his hair, a frown at his lips. "I don't like this," he said eventually. "It's hard enough keeping all your secrets in order when no one is looking at you, let alone with Weasley and Granger sniffing around."

"Someone's always looking at me," Harry insisted. "At least if I know they're looking I can direct them elsewhere." Barely a week into their renewed friendship and Ron and Hermione were already pestering him to open up to them; Ron in the guise of wanting gossip about who he was snogging, Hermione pretending to be concerned about Sirius. Harry wondered if Dumbledore was frustrated at not knowing where the dog animagus was hiding.

"That doesn't mean you should let them look so closely."

"I'll feed them enough lies to get Dumbledore off my back, then wait for Ron to be a prick again and stop talking to them," Harry promised. He'd already managed to get them to believe that Sirius was hiding in Central America, hence the lack of frequent letters. He'd also told Hermione that the people at the Yule Ball were mostly Susan's friends, and he'd just pretended to hang out with them to keep her happy. Susan was fine with that misdirection, happy for Dumbledore to be aware that she was bridging the gaps between houses.

Draco looked doubtful, and Harry sat up enough to kiss the frown off his face, sneaking his tongue between the Slytherin's lips. Draco moaned softly, pulling Harry into his lap. "You're trying to distract me," he declared with an annoyed look. Harry smirked.

"I am, and it's working," he retorted knowingly, trailing a finger up Draco's bicep and across his chest, leaning in for another kiss. "Just relax, and trust me."

Draco's head tipped back against the stone wall, and Harry used the movement to kiss down his jaw to his throat, teasing the sensitive spot below his ear that made Draco grip him tighter and hiss with pleasure.

"You're too damn Slytherin for your own good sometimes," Draco muttered, his hand up the front of Harry's shirt. Harry's green eyes flashed playfully.

"That's why you like me so much." He nipped at Draco's earlobe, rocking forward in his lap a little. They still hadn't gone any further than rutting up against each other, but that was more than enough for Harry. He was getting pretty good at Cleaning charms these days.

Draco's mouth was too busy for him to argue back for several minutes after that, and by the time it was free he was too dazed to remember his objections. Harry was only a little bit smug about that, but it was enough to have Draco scowling at him when they said their goodbyes. "I still don't like it," the Slytherin insisted. Harry kissed him.

"I know. I'm not thrilled about it either," he admitted. "But it won't be forever, and if I'm too resistant to them, Dumbledore will start asking questions." He doubted he'd have to wait long for one or the other to screw up and get angry with him. They didn't like the person he'd become, that much was abundantly clear. Hermione had been biting her tongue all week, and she would only last so long. If Ron didn't explode first, of course.

The pair eventually parted ways, and Harry slipped away towards Gryffindor under the cover of the invisibility cloak. His mind still on the feeling of Draco's soft skin under his fingertips, Harry hardly noticed the insistent push of magic against his own; the castle trying to warn him of something. It was only when he heard the faint thunk-thunk of Moody's wooden leg that he froze. Slowly, he tried to back around the corner, away from the source of the noise.

"Potter!"

He cursed under his breath. The invisibility cloak was useless against Moody's magical eye. "Professor Moody," he greeted, dropping the hood reluctantly. Moody limped closer, smirking at Harry in the dim light.

"Out for a little late night stroll, are we?"

"I don't sleep well sometimes," Harry replied evasively, hoping he didn't look as ravished as he felt. Draco was usually pretty good about not leaving marks, unlike Harry. They both knew Moody could see through glamour charms, and Harry didn't want questions in class. "I'm sorry, I'll go back up to my dorm."

"Don't worry about it, Potter," Moody waved him off. "What McGonagall doesn't know won't hurt her." Harry thought it interesting that he chose to mention the Gryffindor housemistress and not the headmaster. Was he implying Dumbledore already knew, or just that he was likely to tell the man? "Listen, while I've got you here; how are things going with that egg of yours?"

"Fine," Harry replied, eyes narrowing. "I'm not supposed to accept help from people. Especially not teachers." As if he hadn't been helped by Snape plenty already. But Moody didn't need to know that.

The Defence teacher let out a raspy laugh. "Like you'll be the only champion getting outside help," he pointed out. "You sure you don't want to talk it over? My office is always open to you."

"No, I've got it covered, thanks," Harry insisted. "Look, if you're not going to take points or anything, can I go? I'd really like to go to bed now." It was nearing midnight, and he had Potions first thing in the morning. Snape would crucify him if he dozed off in class.

"Aye, be on your way, Potter. But be careful; there's all kinds of strangers in this castle. Even with that fancy cloak of yours, you wouldn't want one to come and snap you up." Moody grinned, though it was more of a grimace, his disfigured face twisting in a way that could easily give a person nightmares.

Harry almost pointed out that Professor Moody was one of those strangers, but quite frankly he was ready for that whole interaction to be over as quickly as possible. He nodded, throwing the hood of the cloak back up to cover himself and hurrying away from the creepy professor.

When he was several corridors away, Harry paused and pulled the map out of his bag, wanting to make sure Draco got back to his common room safely. If Moody came across him too, he might end up drawing some conclusions. His eyes scanned the paper, relief hitting him when he saw the dot labelled 'Draco Malfoy' down in the dungeons, approaching the Slytherin common room. Then, Harry frowned, his brow furrowed.

According to the map, Moody was in his office, behind the desk, like he always was. How was that possible? There was no way he could have made it back that quickly! He kept looking around the map, wondering if there was some sort of mistake, but other than Barty Crouch walking down the hall away from Dumbledore's office entrance — that was an absurdly late meeting, surely the tournament arrangements couldn't be that urgent? — He didn't see anyone out of place.

Harry shook his head, wiping the map away and continuing on to Gryffindor Tower. Perhaps Moody knew of a secret passageway Harry didn't. He wasn't so arrogant to assume he'd figured out all of Hogwarts' secrets, even with the help of the Marauders.

.-.-.-.

The night before the task found all four Triwizard champions tucked away in a small living room in the Beauxbatons carriage, Fleur insisting it was the best place for privacy as none of her schoolmates would bother them. It was certainly more comfortable than hanging out in an abandoned classroom in the castle, so Harry wasn't going to complain.

"So is everyone ready for tomorrow?" Cedric asked, leaning back in his armchair with a bottle of butterbeer in his hand. The champions were all avoiding alcohol, not wanting to be hungover when they plunged into the Black Lake in the morning.

"As ready as I'll ever be," Viktor replied with a shrug. They'd all agreed not to say a word about the methods they planned to use, wanting it to be a surprise when the task began, but it was hard not to talk about what they were about to undertake.

"I am curious about what zey 'ave taken from us," Fleur mused. "I 'ave not noticed anyzing missing."

Harry hadn't either, but his three most important possessions — the cloak, the map, and Sirius' mirror — were in his bag pretty much permanently, so he couldn't see how anyone could take them. Maybe they'd take his Firebolt.

"It's whatever we'll sorely miss," Cedric said, rolling his eyes. "Maybe they've nicked my Potions notes. I've got an essay due on Friday." The other three laughed.

"Maybe they vill take a person," Viktor suggested. Harry and Fleur shared skeptical looks.

"Surely they wouldn't take that risk? If we don't make it in the hour..." Harry trailed off at the pointed look Viktor gave him. "Right, yeah, dragons." They hadn't cared too much about the safety of the spectators in the first task. Who was to say they wouldn't put an innocent person in danger to motivate the champions? "I guess we'll find out in the morning."

"D'you think we'll have to fight the merpeople, or just find them?" Cedric mused. "To get whatever it is back, I mean. Merpeople are supposed to be a warrior race. Do you think they'll just let us take it and go on our way?"

"I'd like to think the challenge is in getting to them in the first place," Harry said grimly. There were all sorts of creatures in the lake that would make it difficult enough. "But I wouldn't put it past them."

"I will just charm zem," Fleur declared, tossing her hair. "Zen zey will 'ave to let me go past."

"Does that work on merpeople, then?" Harry was curious, knowing very little about veela and their charm. "What are the limits of it? Can you charm, like, cats and owls and stuff, or do they have to be humanoid? Or a certain level of intelligence?" Harry presumed if Fleur was capable of charming non-human creatures, she would have tried to charm the dragon in the first task. "Or does it only work on boys? There might be mermaids down there." The dragon was a nesting mother, so maybe that was why it didn't work.

"I 'ave not tested ze specifics," Fleur admitted, looking amused at the line of questioning. "And I am not as strong as a full veela. But a veela's charm will work on anyone 'oo is attracted to 'umanoid women. I would assume merfolk would be similar enough for eet to work."

"That explains why it didn't work on me at the World Cup," Harry murmured in comprehension, realising after a beat of pointed silence that he'd said that out loud. "I mean. Err." His face went hot as the other three stared at him wide-eyed.

"Did you just..." Cedric looked hesitant, like he didn't wait to say it out loud until Harry did.

"Accidentally come out?" Harry confirmed sheepishly. "Apparently. Please don't tell anyone." He wasn't ashamed, not really, but it was attention he didn't really need right now. People were judging him enough as it was without knowing that.

"Your secret is safe wiz us," Fleur promised, reaching over to squeeze his arm fondly. "I admit, I did suspect. I 'ave tried to charm boys wiz you around before, and you did not even seem to notice." Harry blinked, staring at her with raised eyebrows.

"How often do you use that charm of yours?" he asked suspiciously. Her response was an innocent smile, and Harry assumed by the way Cedric and Viktor's eyes turned adoring, she was using her charm right then. Harry laughed.

"I never use eet when eet matters," she promised, the boys turning back to normal after a second. "But sometimes eet is ze easiest way to get boys to leave me alone."

"Not Harry, clearly," Cedric teased, his grey eyes playful without a hint of judgement. "You're stuck with him."

"I haff to say, this makes me feel better," Viktor declared, earning a confused look. "I know you are not the type to interfere with another person's relationship, but I had vorried about the rumours of you and Hermy-own."

"Oh, those are completely made up by Skeeter," Harry promised. "She's all yours, don't worry." That made Viktor grin, and something in Harry's chest twisted. He hadn't realised the Durmstrang boy liked Hermione quite so much. Should he say something? Tell Viktor that his sort-of-girlfriend was maybe spying on Harry for Dumbledore and who knew what she really wanted with Viktor? No, he couldn't do that. The worst Hermione could likely be accused of where Viktor was concerned was using him to make Ron jealous.

It was none of his business, Harry decided. Viktor would leave at the end of the year anyway.

"So who were you with at the Yule Ball, then?" Cedric asked curiously. "If it wasn't any of the girls. It certainly wasn't George; him and Boris made it pretty clear where they were going when they left."

Harry ducked his head, cheeks turning red. "No one important," he lied.

"Was it Cassius? Wait, no, he was still in the hall while you were gone."

"Why does everyone think I'm with Cassius?" Harry despaired, remembering Neville's assumption too. Did he really spend that much time around the older Slytherin? No wonder Dumbledore was getting worried. "Leave it alone or I'll tell Skeeter it was you I was snogging," he told Cedric, who snickered.

"I could do worse," he said with a shrug, winking. "Not sure Cho would be pleased about it, mind. She'd want to watch if I was snogging you."

Harry made a face. "That's more information than I ever wanted about you or your girlfriend." Maybe Cedric wasn't as incredibly straight as George had assumed.

Cedric burst into laughter, and even Fleur and Viktor joined him at the disturbed expression Harry wore.

"On zat note, I think eet is time to go to bed," Fleur suggested, still giggling. "Since 'Arry will not share 'is rendezvous wiz us."

"If we all survive this bloody tournament, I'll tell you," Harry grumbled, getting to his feet.

It was later than they probably should have stayed out considering their early start, but Cedric and Harry weren't remotely tired as they snuck back up to the castle, bidding Viktor goodnight on the lawn. They parted ways at the stairs, and Harry quickly made his way up to Gryffindor Tower, creeping up to his dorm. All the other beds had the curtains drawn, so Harry tried to be quiet as he got ready for bed, squeezing his eyes shut and trying to force himself to sleep. He'd need all the rest he could get.

Chapter 32

The morning of the second task dawned bright and early, thankfully fairly mild for late February. Harry readied himself in the dorm, putting on his swimming trunks under his robe and stuffing the gillyweed in his pocket. Neville was waiting for him in the common room with a bacon sandwich, and Harry grinned at him. “Is the hall a bit mad?”

“It’s been worse,” Neville said with a shrug, “but I still thought you’d prefer to avoid it.”

“Where are Ron and Hermione?” Harry was surprised the pair weren’t there with them, since they were so determined to be his best friends again. They hardly let him go to the bathroom without their company these days.

“I haven’t seen them, actually,” Neville replied. Harry frowned, but shook it off; he had bigger things to worry about.

Eating his sandwich on the way down to the lake, he raised his eyebrows at seeing the stands from the first task constructed on the bank of the lake, overlooking the calm water. Neville hugged him and wished him good luck before hurrying off to get a seat, and Harry made his way towards the judges’ table, where he could see Viktor waiting. There was no sign of Fleur or Cedric yet.

“Morning,” Harry greeted, glad for the Warming charm on his robe. Snape had promised the gillyweed would help him adjust to the water temperature, and Harry prayed he was right about that. It had to be freezing in there. Viktor nodded in greeting, his dark eyes fixed sharply on the water. He was clearly in the zone, and Harry left him to it, scanning the rest of the crowd. He was surprised to see Percy sat in Mr Crouch’s seat, and he wandered over. “Where’s Mr Crouch?”

“He’s still not well,” Percy told him with a frown. “Terrible thing, he hasn’t been in the office in weeks. Of course, I’m handling everything as per his instruction — owls me every morning, you see. I have it all under control.” Percy puffed out his chest. “But of course I wish him the speediest recovery.”

Harry’s brow furrowed; that couldn’t be right. He’d seen Mr Crouch’s name on the map half a dozen times since the Yule Ball. But of course he couldn’t say that, or he’d have to explain the map, and then he’d be in all kinds of trouble.

Before he could ask for any detail on Crouch’s mysterious illness, Bagman appeared at Harry’s side, slinging a heavy arm over his shoulders. “Alright, there, Harry?” He ducked in close, dropping his voice. “Need any last-minute pointers?”

Harry firmly removed the man’s arm from his person, taking a step away. “I’m fine, thanks.” Why was the man so insistent on helping him? Surely Harry didn’t look that pathetic.

The arrival of Cedric and Fleur was the perfect excuse for Harry to ditch Bagman, and he bumped Cedric’s shoulder with his own. “You ready for this?”

“Don’t have much choice, do I?” Cedric pointed out dryly. “Hey, have you seen Cho this morning? She wasn’t at breakfast.”

“I haven’t,” Harry replied, puzzled; that wasn’t like Cho at all. “But I didn’t go to breakfast. Neville brought me up a sandwich so I could avoid the crowd.”

“It’s not him, is it?” Cedric asked with a wiggle of his eyebrows, making it clear what he was referring to. Harry blushed, jabbing the Hufflepuff in the side.

“No!” he hissed, wide-eyed. “It’s not Neville, God! And keep your voice down, Skeeter’s bound to be around here somewhere.”

Cedric looked apologetic, glancing around for any sign of the blonde reporter. “That is weird, actually; she’s usually right on top of the action. Maybe your lawyer finally scared her off.”

“I can only hope,” Harry said ruefully.

It drew closer to the starting time, and as the stands began to fill with people Bagman cast Sonorus on himself, striding out to the water’s edge and starting up a chatter to pass the time. “All four champions are ready and raring to go! For those of you who aren’t aware, the second task is thus; each champion has had a person they care about taken from them, stolen away into the depths of the lake by its resident clan of merpeople. It is up to the champions to find what has been taken from them and retrieve them within the hour!”

At Bagman’s words, all four champions shared horrified looks. “A person,” Viktor murmured grimly.

“Cho!” Cedric gasped, casting panicked eyes on the water’s surface. Harry gripped his arm to stop him diving in then and there.

“They’re safe, they have to be. The task hasn’t started yet.” He wasn’t sure which of them he was trying to reassure.

“But after an hour...” Fleur trailed off, her blue eyes fearful. “I do not know ‘oo zey ‘ave taken from me.” She disappeared, hurrying over to her headmistress, and there was a rapid conversation in French that ended with Fleur’s hands sparking with fire in her fury.

“Gabrielle!” The quarter-veela stomped over to Ludo Bagman, grabbing him by the front of his robe and hoisting him off his feet, glaring. Her hair had flames licking at the tips, and Harry could smell burning ozone. He hadn’t realised Fleur had that much of her heritage in her. “If anyzing ‘appens to my leetle sister, I will kill you, Bagman,” she declared spitefully. Harry’s jaw dropped. Fleur had talked about her little sister before; Gabrielle was barely nine years old! How could they possibly think it was a good idea to put her at the bottom of a lake?

Bagman looked like he was about to wet himself, but he bravely patted Fleur on the shoulder. “Not to worry, Miss Delacour,” he said, voice shaking. “We’ve got every precaution in place.”

That didn't seem to satisfy Fleur, but she huffed, dropping him to the ground and turning on her heel back to the other champions. Harry could see several boys in the stands watching with a mixture of fear and awe; even he had to admit that was terrifyingly impressive, watching her pick up Bagman with one hand.

"Remind me never to piss her off," Cedric muttered. Harry and Viktor both hummed in agreement.

With Fleur pacing like a caged tiger, Bagman and the other judges seemed to realise it was best to get started as quickly as possible.

Harry stripped off his robe and shoes when the other champions started doing the same, leaving him in the swimming shorts and tank top he'd been supplied with the day before. The other male champions were dressed similarly, and Fleur wore a silver one-piece swimsuit, oblivious to the looks she was getting once she dropped her robe. She was too focused on her sister and the lake.

"Champions, you have one hour!" Bagman announced, still eyeing Fleur warily. "Start on my whistle. One... two... three!" Bagman blew his whistle, and they immediately jumped into action. Harry shoved the gillyweed in his mouth and began to chew, wading out into the freezing cold water. All three other champions blazed past him, disappearing under the surface of the water. Harry refused to do so until he was absolutely sure this whole thing would work.

I really should've tested this, he thought to himself as he swallowed the slimy plant, ignoring the faint laughter he could hear from the stands as he stood in the shallows like an idiot. Don't fail me now, Snape.

When it finally started working, it kicked in remarkably quickly, and Harry had to throw himself into the water to avoid choking on air. His feet elongated into flippers, his hands webbing between the fingers, and he grinned to himself as he swam forwards, the water feeling more room temperature than the near-ice he knew it was.

Snape hadn't let him down. He could do this.

.

Much more than an hour later, Harry burst through the surface of the lake and took a glorious gasp of air, having lost his gills about fifteen feet under. He dragged Ron and Gabrielle with him, both of them regaining consciousness once they were above water. Gabrielle's eyes immediately filled with tears as she splashed and gasped her sister's name, and Harry let go of Ron, letting the little girl wind her arms around his neck. "There you go, I've got you," he soothed, unsure how much English she spoke. "Fleur is okay," he said, though truthfully he didn't know what had happened to the French girl. "Can you swim?" Gabrielle sniffled and made a so-so gesture with one hand, the other gripping Harry's shoulder tightly.

"Harry, hurry up! What's she doing here?" Ron asked, impatiently treading water, his red hair plastered to his forehead.

"Fleur never showed up, I couldn't leave her there." Harry started to swim the best he could with Gabrielle hanging on his back. He was glad for all his time in the pool at Seren Du now.

"You idiot, you didn't seriously think they'd let us die down there, did you?" Ron burst out.

"That's not a risk I'm willing to take with the life of a nine year-old girl," Harry retorted sharply. "Just swim." The closer he drew to the bank, he could see a crowd gathered with their wands out, fire flaring from somewhere in the middle. Madame Maxime towered over it all, looking like she was struggling to keep hold of something. Or someone. Fleur.

"Gabrielle!" The crowd was forcefully parted as Fleur broke away from her headmistress' hold in a blast of flames, rushing towards the water's edge. On Harry's back, Gabrielle perked up, calling for Fleur.

"She's fine!" Harry assured as loud as he could, swimming faster. Fleur clearly couldn't enter the water when she was in her veela state, and she prowled the bank until Harry was close enough to let Gabrielle down, the little girl hitting the shallows and sprinting into her sister's arms. Fleur immediately calmed, muttering in French and smoothing a hand down her sister's wet hair. Ignoring Ron as he was bundled away by Percy, Harry hurried to Fleur's side.

"She's okay, right? The merpeople wouldn't let me take her at first, but you didn't show up — I couldn't leave her there."

When Fleur looked up at him over Gabrielle's head, her eyes were filled with tears. "I was attacked by ze grindylows," she sobbed. "I lost my Bubble'ead charm. Water ees not my strongest element." There were still embers flying off her hair, and Harry squeezed her shoulder.

"I got her. She's fine." Next thing he know, he was being dragged into the sisters' hug, Fleur pressing kisses to his face.

"You saved 'er, even though she wasn't your 'ostage,'" she breathed thankfully. "Zank you, 'Arry."

"I couldn't leave her there," Harry repeated, hugging Fleur. Now that he was closer, he could see she had dozens of vicious-looking cuts all over her skin, blood dripping down onto the sand. "Fleur, you need to see Madam Pomfrey."

"She's not the only one, Mr Potter." Harry's head snapped up to see the mediwitch in question stood behind him, lips pursed as she surveyed the scene. "All of you, come with me. Honestly, sending children into the lake in February, it's a wonder you didn't all go hypothermic!"

With Fleur refusing to let go of Gabrielle, the three of them followed Pomfrey over to the first aid tent, where the other five task participants were waiting. Cedric and Cho were huddled together in a fluffy towel, otherwise no worse for wear. Viktor had an arm wrapped around a shivering Hermione, his head human once more, and nearby Ron was sat in a towel of his own, glaring at the Bulgarian boy.

Pomfrey wrapped a towel tightly around Harry's shoulders, then thrust a vial into his hand. Harry recognised it as Snape's extra-strength Pepper-Up potion, and downed it happily, sighing as the steam began to gush from his ears.

"Gabrielle first," Fleur insisted stubbornly when the matron turned to her. Pomfrey huffed, but obligingly wrapped the girl in a towel and gave her a potion too — only then did Fleur allow her to start healing her wounds.

"Alright, Harry?" Cedric asked, his grey eyes dark with concern. "You were down there a long time."

"I'm fine," he assured, casting a Drying charm on himself. He cast one on Gabrielle too, and the girl's violent shivers lessened. "You? Cho?"

"We're both okay," Cho promised, managing the barest smile. "I don't really remember much, to be honest. One minute I was in Dumbledore's office, the next I woke up in the middle of the lake." Cedric definitely didn't look impressed by the proceedings, and Harry didn't blame him. He would probably be far more furious himself if it had been Neville or Draco or even Ginny — especially Ginny, after her ordeal with the Chamber two years ago — but obviously Dumbledore had done the choosing, if he thought Ron was who he'd miss most.

"Harry!" Hermione gushed, eyes bright. "You did it! You worked it out all by yourself!" She sounded equal parts surprised and impressed, and Harry smirked; no one would even believe him if he admitted to getting help from Snape of all people.

"I told you I had it sorted."

"You haff a water beetle in your hair," Viktor said to Hermione, reaching up to gently brush the beetle away. Hermione smiled at him, but turned back to Harry.

"What were you thinking, going back for Fleur's sister like that? You wasted so much time! Viktor said you were there before any of the others."

"I was thinking I wasn't going to let a nine year-old die, Hermione," Harry bit out, wondering how she and Ron both could just trust Dumbledore when he said nothing bad would happen. The first task had been dragons, and they thought everything was going to be perfectly safe?

He could see Dumbledore conferring with the mer-chief at the edge of the water, and then gathering the other judges to discuss something. Harry barely paid attention to the scores — he didn't care if they gave him a zero, as long as he was done with the task. Still, it didn't surprise him to hear that Dumbledore had somehow managed to spin his decision to save Gabrielle into some sort of example of martyrdom, giving him extra points for it. He was tied for first with Cedric now.

"Just one more to go," Cedric said as they were all herded up to the castle, towels still draped around them. "Then it's all over."

“Thank fuck for that,” Harry declared vehemently. He didn’t have to think about the bloody tournament for three whole months; then they’d be told about the third task, and a month later it would be done. “Merlin, I can’t wait to take a bath.” Cedric laughed as Cho made a loud noise of agreement, and they glanced back at Viktor and Hermione; Viktor seemed to be trying to talk to Hermione, while she just wanted to walk up ahead to talk to Harry. Harry was glad Viktor knew he had no interest in Hermione, or it would all look a bit suspicious.

All Harry wanted was a hot bath, a hot drink, and bed, in that order. And to call Seren Du — he needed to talk to Remus about getting a present for Snape. The man had definitely saved his arse on this task.

.-. .

The day after the task was a Saturday, and Harry was inordinately pleased not to have to go to classes. He emerged for breakfast wearing a thick jumper and two pairs of socks, his Gryffindor scarf wrapped around his neck — even after the Pepper-Up and a long bath, he couldn’t quite shake the chill that had settled into his bones. He sat with the other champions and their assorted crowd at breakfast; everyone else who had been in the lake was layered up as well, except Viktor. “I am Slavic,” he said by way of explanation, reaching for the coffee pot.

Fleur had Gabrielle sat on her lap, and was dropping kisses on the girl’s silver-blonde hair every few minutes. She was still clearly shell-shocked from thinking she had failed her sister in the worst of ways. Harry squeezed her hand under the table, offering a supportive smile.

“I get that you lot were all risking your lives down there and everything,” Fred remarked from across the table, “but it was a bit boring for the rest of us to watch.”

Harry had wondered about that. “Did they not have screens, or anything with tracking charms so you could watch?”

Both twins shook their heads. “We sat and stared at the lake for an hour,” Cassius confirmed in a drawl. “It was thrilling, really.”

“You’d think they would’ve figured something out,” Cho mused, leaning into Cedric’s shoulder, swamped by a huge Hufflepuff Quidditch Team hoodie with ‘Diggory’ on the back. “The tournament being a spectator sport and all. At least the first task was fun to watch.”

“Hopefully the third task will be more entertaining,” Harry said. The other three champions groaned.

“Let’s not talk about the third task yet,” Viktor begged wearily.

After he’d eaten his fill, Harry took advantage of Hermione being distracted by Viktor — and thus Ron being distracted by Hermione — and snuck away with Neville and Ginny back to the common room. The rug by the fire was calling his name.

“I can’t believe you’re tied for first,” Neville mused aloud once the three of them were settled in front of the fire, Harry sprawled out on his belly with one of his muggle fiction books open in front of him. “You might actually win this thing, y’know.”

“I don’t know about that,” Harry waved him off.

“He’s right, though,” Ginny insisted. “You’re doing really well, Harry. And you’ve always been good at getting through dangerous situations. You could take the Cup. Imagine if you did win!”

“I don’t care about winning,” Harry said tiredly. “I just want to not die.” It weighed heavy in the back of his mind that whoever had entered him into this tournament had done so for a reason, and had yet to reveal themselves. The clock was running down, and they could end up getting desperate.

.-.-.-.

By the middle of the week, Harry was about ready to hex Ron’s mouth shut. As one of the few people who had been under the surface of the lake — regardless of the fact that he’d been unconscious for 95% of it — he had taken it upon himself to answer the questions of anyone curious enough to approach Harry. He’d gone from admitting to being put in an enchanted sleep for the whole thing, to insisting he’d fought off a whole group of merpeople bare-handed. Even Hermione was getting sick of him; though she was getting sick of everyone, after spending several days being teased about being the one Viktor would miss most.

On his way back from his last class of the day, Harry froze when his name was called across the hallway. “Mr Potter, would you mind following me to my office?” Dumbledore strode towards him, eyes twinkling genially. “I won’t keep you from your friends too long. I merely wish to talk.”

“We’ll see you at dinner, Harry,” Hermione said, tugging Ron along with her, leaving him alone with the headmaster. Harry had no choice but to follow Dumbledore up to his office, the headmaster conjuring a tea set once he was sat at his desk.

“Milk and sugar, Harry?” he offered, as if it were perfectly normal for him to invite a student up for tea without reason, even if that student was Harry Potter.

“Please.” Harry had zero intention of drinking anything Dumbledore gave him. He accepted the mug, putting it to his lips, but didn’t drink. Dumbledore’s smile widened. “Why am I here, sir? Is something wrong? Is it Sirius?”

“Everything is well,” Dumbledore assured. “I have not heard from Sirius for a while, but I am sure he’s doing just fine.” Harry hid a smirk at that; if only Dumbledore knew. “I merely thought I would see how you’re faring after the second task. You’re handling the tournament remarkably well, and I’m impressed. Your use of gillyweed was truly inspired.”

“Neville told me about it,” Harry lied earnestly. He didn’t look Dumbledore in the eye. “I had to, uh, borrow some from Professor Snape. But I think that was worth it.” As promised, Snape had given him three days of detention for theft. The first detention had been spent with Remus going over his Runes, and the second had become a lesson on cauldron monitoring charms while Snape brewed more potions for the Hospital Wing. Harry would have his final detention after dinner.

Dumbledore chuckled. “Professor Snape is often possessive of his store rooms. Sometimes, these things are necessary.” The headmaster’s gaze flicked to Harry’s teacup, and Harry wondered what sort of potion was in it that he was supposed to be reacting to. Dumbledore would notice if the level in his cup didn’t get any lower. Pretending to take another sip, Harry screwed up his nose in concentration, trying to vanish the contents of the cup. He hadn’t tried a Vanishing charm wandlessly before, but with a little nudge of his magical core, the tea disappeared. When he set down the empty cup, Dumbledore looked approving behind his smile.

He didn’t seem to be expecting Harry to pass out or some such, so Harry just continued on as always, still not looking the man in the eye. “How are you feeling about the third task, Harry?”

“It’s a little way off yet, so I’m not too worried about it,” Harry replied. “Maybe in a couple of months I’ll start freaking out. I’m not used to getting so much advanced warning before I end up in a life or death situation, it’s really quite disconcerting.” That made Dumbledore chuckle.

“I can only imagine. You seem to be getting along well with the other champions — no worries about facing them one last time?”

“No, they’re all really nice. I don’t think they expected me to be much competition.” Harry wasn’t sure how he was supposed to be answering when he didn’t know what the potion was supposed to do, so he just kept smiling and hoped for the best.

“You are a young man of many surprises,” Dumbledore complimented. “Have you anything else to tell me? Noticed anything… unusual, lately?”

“Not that I can think of,” Harry said with a shrug, wondering what Dumbledore thought he was mixed up in. “Why, should I have?”

“I was merely concerned; with all the unfamiliar people walking these halls, there’s always the possibility that one of them may wish to do you harm. Would you mind if I just gave you a quick check over? There may be a hex on you going unnoticed.”

Harry’s heart dropped, but he tried not to let it show on his face. His pulse picked up, and he gave a false grin. “Sure!” he chirped, betting anything the tea was supposed to make him compliant. “Madam Pomfrey checked me over after the task, but if you think it’s necessary, sir.”

Dumbledore smiled, raising his wand. Harry had to force himself not to flinch. “Excellent. One moment, please.” He murmured a quiet spell, and immediately Harry felt as if something slimy was crawling over him, stuck to his magical core — the sensation the books said he would feel when someone placed a charm or curse on him. In the back of his mind he vaguely felt his inhibitions lower, but he was mostly concerned about the wrong-feeling magic. He kept up his smile, keeping his panic locked down.

“Am I all good, sir?”

“Yes, you’re in top shape, my boy,” Dumbledore assured. “Thank you for indulging an old man’s fears.”

“Can I go to dinner now, sir?” Harry asked, glancing at the clock on the desk.

“Of course, of course. But are you sure there’s nothing you wish to tell me about, Harry?”

There was a strange moment when the unfamiliar magic choking Harry’s squeezed down, urging him to blurt out all his secrets. Harry raised his Occlumency shields to push the urge away, managing a relaxed shrug. “I can’t think of anything, sir, but I’ll come to you if that changes.”

That seemed to satisfy the headmaster, and he let Harry go with a cheerful wave. As soon as Harry was away from the gargoyle, he squeezed his eyes shut and sucked in a deep breath, shuddering as the magic wrapped tighter around him. It was suffocating. How had he gone years with Dumbledore’s magic on him and never noticed before? Now he was aware of his own magical core, the foreign intrusion felt awful. He’d had some practice with it over the summer — Snape or Remus or Sirius putting curses and charms on him, so he could feel what it was like. None of them had been like this.

He didn’t want to draw attention, so he forced himself to straighten up and head down to the Great Hall for dinner, sitting between Ron and Hermione even though there was an empty seat next to Neville. “What did Dumbledore want?” Ron asked around a mouthful of chicken, and Harry shrugged.

“Just to see how I was holding up with the tournament and everything,” he replied nonchalantly.

“That was nice of him,” Hermione said with a smile. Harry could hardly eat he felt so sick — did Ron and Hermione know what Dumbledore had planned? Had they been warned he was going to be a little different, and it was because of a spell?

“We should play exploding snap after dinner,” Ron suggested. “It’s been ages since we’ve done that.”

“Can’t — detention with Snape, remember?” Harry’s grimace hid his near-palpable relief at having the perfect excuse to go see Snape as soon as possible.

Ron made a face. “Can’t believe the greasy git gave you detention for taking what you needed for the task,” he grumbled. “You’re a Triwizard champion! He should be happy to help you beat those other schools.”

“As if Snape has ever missed out on a chance to give me detention,” Harry pointed out. He forced himself to eat the last bite of his shepherd’s pie, pushing his plate away. “I should get going before I’m late and he gives me even more detention for it. I’ll see you later.” The crush of the magic was getting worse, seeping into his pores until all he wanted to do was run to Dumbledore and spill his secrets. Harry pushed it away, shouldering his bag and hurrying down to the dungeons. He was sweating with the effort of resisting the magic by the time he burst into Snape's office, startling the man. "Help me," he gasped, throwing himself down into a chair, gripping the edge of the desk hard. Snape leapt to his feet, locking and warding the room with a spell as he rushed to Harry's side.

"What happened?" Cool fingers gripped his chin, raising his head so the man could look him over.

"Dumbledore. Cast a spell on me," Harry bit out. "I think— Compulsion, again."

Snape straightened up, waving his wand over Harry. He frowned. "Sit still." He began to chant quietly in Latin, waving his wand in a complicated motion. Much like it had with the goblins, a ball of black glowing magic began to form over Harry's sternum, growing until Snape suddenly wrenched his wand upwards and the ball dissipated. Harry felt the foreign magic smothering his core melt away, and sucked in air like a drowning man. Snape's hand came down on his shoulder, steadyng him. "Easy, Potter." His voice was surprisingly gentle, and he waved his wand again, no doubt checking Harry for any other spells. "You're clear."

Harry slumped back in his chair when Snape released his shoulder, running a hand through his hair. "Thank you. Merlin, that was awful. Does it always feel like that?"

"Being cursed, once you're aware of your own magic?" Snape clarified. Harry nodded. "Not always to that degree — Dumbledore's spell was exceptionally powerful — but yes, it's always... uncomfortable. If you're that sensitive to it now, I suspect the headmaster won't be able to put so much as a light Tracking charm on you without you noticing."

Harry was glad for that, but he hoped he never had to experience it all the same. "Was it the same one as before?"

"I cannot be sure, as the goblins removed that before I had the chance to study it. But it was a powerful Compulsion charm designed to make you both reckless and extraordinarily trusting of the caster, so it's likely, yes."

"I felt like I just wanted to run up to the headmaster and tell him everything," Harry said with a shudder. He blinked, and there was a glass of water being pressed into his hands. He took it with a grateful smile at Snape, downing the cool liquid.

"It is... concerning that he felt the need to refresh the charm. Likely he thinks you're just shedding it as you grow older — not uncommon with adolescents, as their magic is constantly growing and changing."

Harry caught on to what Snape wasn't saying. "But it means he's starting to suspect I'm not under his thumb anymore."

The Potions Master nodded. "You'll have to be incredibly careful in the next few weeks. He will believe the charm is strongest — he may expect you to come to him, or to Weasley and Granger. It will look even more suspicious if you continue on as you have been."

Harry grimaced. “So I’ll spend a few weeks playing good little Gryffindor, make up some things to tell them that’ll have them believing I’ve given up all my secrets, and then...” He trailed off, unsure what came next. Keep pretending until Dumbledore was dead? How long was he supposed to keep up the charade?

“You only need last until the end of the school year,” Snape assured him. “Even so, I think you can get away with avoiding Weasley and Granger before then, as long as you keep your public friendships to mostly Gryffindors. Dumbledore won’t have done anything to change your personality too drastically — people would question if you suddenly refused to speak to the other champions, after being outwardly friendly to them for so long. Likely he just wants a little more insight into your private escapades.”

It was a small mercy, but a mercy nonetheless. “I suppose we’d better figure out what I can tell him to get him off my back, then,” he said with a shrug, pulling his password protected notebook out of his bag.

There had to be something he could let go of, to protect the secrets he really cared about.

.-.-.-

About a week after the second task, Harry walked into the Great Hall to find all eyes on him — not unusual in itself, but the wave of whispers and giggles that broke out immediately after gave Harry a pretty good idea what might have happened. Harry sank into the empty seat between Neville and Ginny, raising an eyebrow at the redhead girl. “What’s the damage this time?” Ginny giggled, passing him a copy of Witch Weekly. He studied the magazine. “Not the Prophet?”

“This one isn’t exactly Prophet material,” Ginny told him, opening the magazine to a specific page. She seemed amused, so Harry figured it couldn’t be too bad. Ron and Hermione sat on the bench opposite them, Hermione casting a disparaging look at the magazine.

“I can’t believe you have a subscription to that rag, Ginny,” she remarked. Ginny shrugged.

“Not all of it is garbage.”

Harry was busy reading the article in question — which was definitely garbage.

‘Harry Potter’s Woes of the Heart

A boy like no other — but still suffering the trials of any teenage love affair. Deprived of love since the tragic demise of his parents, fourteen year-old Harry Potter found solace at Hogwarts; or so he thought. His steady girlfriend, muggleborn Hermione Granger, seems to have developed a taste for famous wizards.’

The article went on to express how Hermione had cruelly cheated on Harry with Viktor Krum, breaking Harry’s heart shortly before the Yule Ball and sending him into Ginny’s arms. “Oi, Gin, there’s a quote here from you about me being a crap kisser,” Harry pointed out, and the redhead snorted.

"Yeah, sorry about that. I told so many people, I suppose one of them went to Skeeter about it. At least she's excusing it as you being heartbroken and not just you being bad at snogging," she said with a supportive pat to the shoulder. "I'm sorry I can't be... 'the one you truly yearn to be with', by the way," she added, checking the article quote by leaning over Harry's shoulder. "Clearly while I resemble your mother, it's not enough to tear your heart away from that harlot over there."

"I beg your pardon!" Hermione gasped when she realised Ginny was talking about her. Beside her, Ron went almost purple in the face. Harry tossed the magazine her way, watching her eyebrows rise into her hairline. "This is... where did she get all this?"

"Out of her arse, by the looks of it," Ginny mused. Neville snorted pumpkin juice from his nose.

"No, the bit about Viktor asking me to come to Bulgaria. That was right after he pulled me from the lake, there's no way she was around to hear it!" Hermione explained. Ron spluttered, grabbing the magazine to read it himself.

"He wants you to go to Bulgaria? Never felt this way about any other girl — don't tell me that's all real?"

Hermione nodded, blushing faintly. "That part is. Obviously the rest of it is drivel."

"I don't know, Granger," the soft drawl of Draco Malfoy cut through the air. "That bit about Potter being a terrible kisser probably isn't too far off the mark. I don't blame you for setting your sights higher. Positively Slytherin of you." The remark made Ron growl, and Hermione glare. Harry just snorted.

"At least I can improve my kissing skills," he said, meeting grey eyes with a devilish look. "Sadly I don't think there's anything you can do about being an utter prat."

"You'd have to find someone willing to help you improve, Potty," Draco taunted. Harry winked at him.

"Are you offering, Malfoy?" That made several people eavesdropping choke on whatever they were eating, while Ginny howled with laughter. Draco went bright red, turned on his heel and left. Harry's smirk widened.

"I can't believe you just propositioned Malfoy!" Hermione hissed. Harry shrugged.

"Made him leave, didn't it?" He couldn't wait to get Draco alone later; he would pay for that comment about Harry's kissing skills.

"Still. Gross, mate." Ron shuddered, making a face. Harry didn't react, even when Neville nudged him under the table, the tiniest grin on his lips. "This article is out of order, though. It makes Hermione look like some sort of... scarlet woman." Ron was blushing as he said it, and Hermione's lips pursed.

“Oh, come off it,” Ginny argued. “No one with half a brain is going to believe this rubbish. I think it’s hilarious, to be honest. Kudos to you, Hermione, for clearly being sexy enough to score two super famous wizards. Sorry I’m such an opportunistic slag that I sunk my claws into Harry as soon as you tossed him aside.” Ron looked like he was going to have a stroke at the language coming from his baby sister’s mouth.

“Quite frankly, I’m offended,” George announced, dropping onto the bench on Ginny’s other side, his twin following. “I spend way more time with Harry than Ginny does. Why can’t I be the opportunistic slag?”

“You were too busy sucking face with Durmstrang boys, remember?” Harry pointed out. George pouted.

“Just the one Durmstrang boy, thank you!” he protested. “Who do you think I am, Hermione?” This was said with a wink towards the curly-haired girl, and actually startled a laugh out of her.

“I can’t believe you’re laughing about this,” Ron muttered, scowling at his plate of eggs. Harry shrugged.

“The worst thing we can do is give it credibility by being upset about it. Best to just laugh and move on.” No one whose opinion mattered would believe it, and it would die down quicker if they didn’t let it get to them.

Ron didn’t look convinced, and Hermione still didn’t seem sure how to react to the whole thing, but then Ginny grabbed the magazine and started dramatically reading the best (rather, worst) bits, so Harry was too busy laughing to care.

.

It was hard, but Harry managed to escape Ron and Hermione long enough to get to the heirs’ meeting a few days later. They were easing up on him a little, after he’d spun a tale about getting a letter from Sirius saying he was somewhere in Ireland, and also told them about seeing Mr Crouch on the map. Even Snape had been confused by that one, but agreed it was fairly harmless on the spectrum of secrets Harry was keeping, and would be a good measure of whether Ron and Hermione had told Dumbledore about the map. He hadn’t said anything directly to Dumbledore yet, but that didn’t seem to be bothering the headmaster, increasing Harry’s suspicions that his two ex-best friends were spying on him. He felt sick every time he thought about it.

He was glad to be in a room full of people who hated the headmaster as much as he did, Susan squeezing his shoulder in sympathy when he told them all about Dumbledore’s plot. “I can arrange for someone to hex Weasley if you’d like,” Daphne volunteered. “Or Granger. I’m sure Pansy would jump at the opportunity.”

“Not Malfoy?” Harry asked with a brow raised. Blaise, Daphne and Cassius shared a glance. Harry’s stomach flipped. “What?”

“Draco has been acting… strange lately,” Blaise admitted.

“Strange how?” Fear gripped Harry’s heart — had Dumbledore got to Draco too? He hadn’t thought to ask Snape to check him over.

“He isn’t going on about how much he hates muggleborns, for one,” Daphne drawled. “He’s been positively nice to the first years. And he came with me when I went to study Arithmancy with Ernie and Terry Boot.”

“It was a bit weird,” Ernie piped up. “I kept expecting him to hex me, but he was surprisingly polite.”

Harry’s panic began to fade; Draco was just starting to lose his Lucius-Malfoy-clone persona. There were worse things to happen. He bit his lip, thinking; it wasn’t his place to start sharing Draco’s secrets, but... he could set the stage for things. “Maybe he’s not as evil as we’ve always assumed.”

Parvati laughed. “Nice one, Harry. As if you’ve not been fighting with him since the day you stepped foot in the castle.”

“When was the last time you heard about me and Malfoy fighting? Actually fighting.” They’d exchanged insults, but they hadn’t raised wands at each other in weeks. He watched Parvati’s face grow confused as she thought it over.

“I think we should trust Harry on this one, guys,” Neville cut in supportively, his eyes knowing.

“What do you know that we don’t?” Sullivan’s tone was a mix of curious and suspicious, and Harry smirked.

“Daphne, Blaise, why don’t you two bring Draco to our next meeting?” he suggested, noting the wide eyes when he used Draco’s first name. “Parkinson and Bulstrode too, if you can convince them.” Draco trusted the two girls, and insisted they didn’t want to follow their parents’ footsteps. They could probably do with knowing they weren’t alone.

“You want us to bring three kids whose parents are Death Eaters to our top secret meeting on how to save the world once the Dark Lord is dead?” Blaise’s voice was unimpressed. Harry nodded.

“Yeah, sounds about right. Not everyone is the same as their parents. Look at Cassius. No offence,” he added to the older boy, who snorted.

“None taken, my father was a stain on the family tree and the rest aren’t much better,” he agreed freely.

“Exactly. So give them a chance, you might be surprised,” Harry said. Not everyone in the room looked convinced, muttering to each other. Eventually, Susan cleared her throat.

“Look, guys, Harry wouldn’t suggest it if he thought it would jeopardise anything we have here,” she said confidently, before turning her hazel eyes on Harry. “You trust Draco Malfoy?”

"I do," he said firmly, ignoring the way several sets of eyebrows rose incredulously. "And he trusts Bulstrode and Parkinson. That's three heirs we could really do with having on our side."

"I still think you've lost it," Blaise muttered. "But alright, we'll bring them. On your head be it."

Harry grinned, even as his stomach churned at the prospect of bringing three more Slytherins into the fold. He was excited to connect Draco with the other heirs, but... the two girls might take a little convincing.

....

That night, when Harry snuck out to meet Draco, he told him about what he'd said to Blaise and the others. "So don't be surprised if you and Bulstrode and Parkinson get approached sometime next week," he finished, sitting back to let Draco process it all. The blond stared at him, his expression unreadable.

"You've never had a civil conversation with Pansy or Millie," Draco pointed out. Harry shrugged.

"I've done study group with Bulstrode a few times; she seems alright. And you trust them."

"That's good enough for you, is it?"

"Why shouldn't it be?"

Draco stared at Harry for a long moment, then leaned in to kiss him, lips curling in a reluctant smile. "Sodding Gryffindor," he muttered against Harry's mouth. "You're lucky I'm not taking advantage of you."

"Mm, feel free to take advantage of me whenever you like," Harry retorted cheekily. "I've a feeling I might enjoy it."

Draco rolled his eyes with a huff, nipping at Harry's lower lip. "Are we telling them about this, then?"

Harry leaned back, needing his head a little clearer for his next thought to form properly. "I think we can admit we're friends," he said slowly. "But not... anything more. I trust them, but they're keeping enough secrets for me as it is, and this is none of their business." He paused, wondering if he'd failed some sort of test. "Unless you want to tell them, of course?"

"I don't need a bunch of heirs nosing into my private life," Draco said haughtily. "It'll be bad enough if my father finds out I'm friends with you, let alone anything else." His expression softened. "Maybe in the future, when things are more dire. When I need to take a stand to be with you. But until then, we'll keep it quiet."

"I'd never make you take a stand to be with me," Harry insisted. "I just want you to be happy and safe."

"You really think I could be happy hiding in some safe-house while you get all the glory by facing the Dark Lord?" Draco retorted lightly, his silver eyes fixed intently on Harry, saying everything that wasn't coming out of his mouth. "I'm going to have to be open about my loyalties eventually. I'm not cut out to be a spy like Uncle Severus." He took Harry's hand in both of his, bringing it up to kiss the knuckles. "When the time comes, I will be by your side. Stopping your idiot Gryffindor arse from getting hexed to death before you can off the bastard."

Despite his derisive tone, his words took Harry's breath away. He almost responded by blurting out three little words it was definitely too soon for, but he held his tongue and just kissed him instead, trying to push everything he felt into the kiss. Draco groaned, pulling Harry closer and tangling his fingers in dark hair. Harry was pretty sure he got his point across.

Chapter 33

Harry entered the next heir's meeting with trepidation, knowing they would have three extra members. The larger group of Slytherins were already there when he arrived, Parkinson and Bulstrode with their arms folded over their chests and wary expressions on their faces as they eyed the rest of the room. Draco had his hands in his pockets and was rocking back in his chair, every inch the effortlessly uncaring pureblood. It made Harry grin. "Sorry, Malfoy, have you got somewhere else to be? You look a bit bored."

Draco smirked at him. "As a matter of fact, I promised I'd help some idiot Gryffindor with a Potions essay. But he was late." His gaze turned pointed, and Harry rounded the table to claim the empty chair beside him.

"You try getting away from Hermione bloody Granger when she's in one of her moods," Harry retorted, elbowing Draco so that only a quick spell had his chair slamming back to rights rather than sending him flying backwards. "You shouldn't sit like that, y'know. You'll crack your head open." He pressed his knee to Draco's under the table in a show of silent support, knowing the blond was far more nervous than he let on.

"I appreciate your concern," Draco replied wryly. "Now, would you care to explain to the girls why you insisted Blaise drag us here?"

Harry looked up, seeing the faces around the room had all turned varying shades of bewildered. Neville was the only one who looked amused, sitting between Parvati and Sullivan. "Right, yeah." Harry stood, turning to the two Slytherin girls, and bowed with palms open. "Well met, Heir Parkinson, Heir Bulstrode," he greeted. "Might I introduce you to... honestly, most of the named heirs of the current Wizengamot seat-holders. We're only missing a handful."

"You're taking the Potter seat?" Bulstrode blurted, her pureblood manners disappearing in the face of such a shock. "We thought you wanted nothing to do with it."

"I didn't know it existed until summer before third year," Harry told her. "Raised by muggles, kept ignorant by Dumbledore."

"Harry, be careful how much you tell them," Susan warned. Harry waved her off, sitting back down.

"Draco trusts them," he reminded her. "That's enough for me. Besides, if we have any hope of convincing them to trust us, they need to know we're not in league with him."

"Harsh words from the Gryffindor Golden Boy," Parkinson teased, leaning forward in her chair in a way that showed off her cleavage where her shirt was undone by several buttons. Harry didn't look for even a second.

"I haven't been quite so golden in a while," he replied evenly. "No one in this room serves Albus Dumbledore. And I know you don't want to serve Voldemort, either." Parkinson flinched.

“The Dark Lord is dead.”

“Is he?” Harry met her eyes with a knowing gaze. Parkinson faltered. “You know as well as the rest of us it’s just a matter of time. Draco tells me neither of you ladies want to follow your parents. No one here will make you. Cassius is here for the same reason. But we aren’t going to tell you to go to Dumbledore for help, either.”

“So what are our options, then?” Bulstrode cut in sharply. “You?”

“If you like,” Harry agreed. “For various reasons, I’m not going to be able to sit this war out. But even if I could, I don’t think I’d want to. Neither side has a particularly fantastic political manifesto, and we in this room plan to offer... let’s call it a third side.” He hadn’t been quite so bold in stating it before, but the others had to know it was where he was headed. “We are the future of the government, as long as we manage to get Dumbledore’s claws out of the Wizengamot and Voldemort’s lunacy removed from society entirely. If you’d like to join us, we would gladly appreciate the extra numbers. If you’d like to turn around and keep your mouth shut and wait for Voldemort to come back, that’s fine. The offer of help stands regardless of what you do from this point on; if you and those you care about ever need a place to avoid either side of the war, you have my word that the Noble and Most Ancient House of Potter will be ready to assist.”

Both girls’ eyes went a fraction wider at the magic that accompanied his vow. “You’re really serious about this,” Bulstrode murmured. Harry nodded.

“I have to be.”

“We aren’t going to let the wizarding world languish like it has been for the last century,” Susan said, unflinching as she eyed the Slytherins. “And we’re certainly not going to let it stay in Dumbledore’s hands. We know that we can be better. But we will do so with all magical people as equals. Purebloods, half-bloods, muggleborns, even those with creature blood; all of them have just as much right to be here as anyone else. If you have a problem with that, you can leave now.”

“I don’t want muggleborns dead,” Parkinson sniffed, “I just want them to stop bringing their filthy habits and customs into our world. If we’re not careful, the Statute will be broken, and it’ll be the Witch Trials all over again.”

“If they have magic in their blood, they have the right to use it,” Draco agreed. “But we also have the right to teach them to be like us, rather than being expected to become like them.”

“That’s fair,” Anthony murmured, relaxing a little. Clearly a few of the heirs had been expecting a rant about blood purity. Harry smiled to himself, wishing he could take Draco’s hand under the table. One meeting wouldn’t change the years of animosity built up in the group, but... it was a start.

“We’ll have plenty of time to talk politics in future,” Harry said, reaching into his school bag. “But I really need to get this essay done.” He set his Potions textbook on the table, digging around for a quill and the half-written essay. “If Hermione tries to help me with it one more time I am going to scream.”

“Well, we couldn’t have that,” Draco drawled lightly. “Let’s see what you’ve got so far.” He stole Harry’s quill off him, setting in to read the unfinished essay with a faint frown on his lips. Harry wished they were alone, so he could kiss it off the blond’s face.

“No wonder your grade has been improving this year,” Parkinson mused, and Harry chuckled.

“It’s not entirely his doing,” he insisted. “I’ve been paying better attention. But not having this git throwing things into my cauldron helps.” Draco elbowed him in the side without looking up from the essay. “Oi! Now who’s the barbarian?”

“It’s still you,” Draco assured. “You’re a terrible influence, too.”

Harry grinned cheekily. “Someone has to keep you humble.”

They were being stared at, but he refused to quit goading Draco, wanting everyone to see that they weren’t going to start hexing each other. That Draco could be trusted.

It would be slow going, but he’d get there.

.-.-.-.

Harry didn’t think much about the extra mail Hermione had been receiving in the days since the Witch Weekly article. Ginny had some too, but not nearly to the level Hermione was getting. Ginny burnt hers without even opening them, but Hermione insisted on reading every one. “I want to know what they’re saying about me,” she said, reaching for the letter on top of the stack.

“Why? It’s all bollocks,” Harry pointed out, picking up a discarded letter. “‘Harry Potter is too fine a young man to be played around by you, trollop’.”

“So you are too fine, but I am okay?” Viktor asked, dropping into an empty seat on Hermione’s other side. He smiled at her, leaning in to kiss her on the cheek; ever since the second task, he seemed bolder in his affections. It was sweet, if Harry didn’t think too much about how false Hermione was.

“I mean, look at me,” Harry said, mock-posing. Ginny smacked him over the back of the head as she passed, not breaking her conversation with Luna. “Rude!”

Suddenly Hermione screamed, jumping to her feet and dropping the letter she was holding. Harry’s wand was in his hand before he could even think about it. Her hands were covered in a yellowish-green liquid that smelled strongly of petrol, and was making enormous boils appear on her skin.

“Bubotuber pus!” Viktor exclaimed, sliding down the bench to avoid the nasty liquid. Hermione’s hands were entirely covered in boils by now, and she bit her lip against a whimper of pain. “Come, I will take you to your medivitch.”

"I'll clean this up," Harry promised, already vanishing as much of the pus as he could see. Viktor placed an arm around Hermione's shoulders, hurrying her out of the hall.

"I warned her not to mess with Skeeter," Ron muttered, still eating despite the chaos. "This is probably just the beginning."

"This has gone too far," Harry muttered, scowling. It was one thing when the articles were just a minor inconvenience he could laugh at; if people were actually getting hurt because of the things Rita was writing about him, that was too much.

"What are you gonna do? Give Skeeter an interview?" Ron asked. "She'd probably stop if you told her who you snogged at the Yule Ball."

That gave Harry an idea.

He jumped to his feet, hurrying around the tables until he was by Ginny and Luna at the Ravenclaw table. "Hi," he greeted, squatting down to be at their level. "Luna, your dad runs a magazine, right? The Quibbler?" He was sure she'd talked about it before to him. The blonde girl nodded, smiling. "Would he be willing to run an article for me?"

"I'd have to check what his schedule is like for the next issue — there's supposed to be a fantastic article about the Blibbering Humdinger coming in — but I'm sure he'd be happy to publish you. Are you going to tell people to leave Hermione alone?" Luna asked curiously. Harry's answering smirk was purely Slytherin.

"Not quite. I'm going to give him the scoop Rita Skeeter wishes she could have."

.-.-.

It only took an evening for Harry to write an article he was happy with, and he brought it down to Luna the next morning, handing over the rolled up parchment. She unrolled it, reading quickly, her pale eyebrows rising with every line. "This is awfully brave of you, Harry," she commented once she was done. Harry shrugged, ducking his head uncomfortably.

"If people want to be angry, I might as well give them something true to be angry about," he reasoned. And then they'd have to be angry at him, and not the people around him. He could handle hate mail.

"Well, I'm sure Daddy would be happy to run it; I'll send it to him right away. I don't know when the next issue will be released, though."

"That's fine. Thanks so much for this, Luna. And thank your dad, too. I really appreciate this." This was the only way he could be sure his words would go to print exactly as he had written them. Luna smiled.

"Anything for a friend, Harry." She tucked the parchment safely inside her robes.

Harry returned to the Gryffindor table, sitting down next to Neville. "What was that all about?" the taller boy asked, and Harry shot him a quick grin.

“Just giving Rita Skeeter something to really complain about,” he replied vaguely. He glanced back at Luna, and then his gaze caught something that made him pause. Ginny was over at the Ravenclaw table too, but she wasn’t sat with Luna. She was sat between two Ravenclaw boys in Harry’s year, and seemed to be flirting pretty blatantly with one of them. Her hand was on his shoulder as she leaned in close and giggled, and the boy smiled shyly at her. Harry looked at Neville. “Why’s Ginny over at the Ravenclaw table?” he asked hesitantly. Neville looked up, eyes casting over to the redhead, and then he looked away, his smile faltering.

“Oh. She’s got her sights set on Stephen Cornfoot, I expect.”

Harry’s brow furrowed, puzzled. “But… I thought Ginny liked you? After the Yule Ball you guys were all… cozy.”

“She does,” Neville confirmed. Now Harry was even more confused. Neville sighed quietly. “We talked about it, the other week. I really like her, and she really likes me, but… neither of us have ever dated anyone before. And she… Ginny says it scares her, how much she likes me, and she thinks, when it happens, we’ll be pretty serious about it. She says she wants to see what it’s like to date other people first.”

Harry blinked. “So… she likes you, and you like her, but she’s gonna go flirt with Stephen because… she likes you too much?”

“That’s about the sum of it,” Neville agreed with a shrug. “I don’t really mind waiting. When she does agree to go out with me, I don’t want her constantly thinking about what she might be missing out on. I’m not really interested in other girls, but if she wants to see what other boys are like… it’s not like I’ve got a hundred other options waiting for me.” His smile turned self-deprecating, and it made Harry frown.

Ginny’s reasoning made absolutely zero sense to Harry — what was the point in dating people you only sort-of liked if there was someone you knew you really liked waiting right there? Even if you did end up only ever dating them? — But he supposed it wasn’t really any of his business. Neville seemed alright with it, even if he was studiously avoiding looking towards the Ravenclaw table.

“Well. Okay, then. If you, uh, ever need to talk about it…” Harry trailed off, and Neville’s smile became a little more sincere.

“Thanks, Harry.” Neville paused, drinking his tea. “So what are you doing with Luna? I thought you hadn’t figured out yet how Skeeter was getting her information.”

“I haven’t,” Harry replied, though he made a mental note to double down on his efforts to figure out. “And when I do, that’ll be going to my lawyer, not to Luna. No, I’m coming out in the Quibbler. ”

Neville dropped his teacup. Luckily, it was mostly empty. “You’re what?”

“I’m not saying anything about, y’know,” his eyes flicked to the Slytherin table for the briefest moment, “for obvious reasons. But if Skeeter’s determined to pair me up with every girl I barely even talk to, well, I can at least correct her on that. Then hopefully no one will get any more bubotuber pus in the mail.” He hadn’t seen Hermione since the incident, though he’d been assured she was out of the hospital wing.

“Harry, that’s… are you sure?”

“It’s bound to come out — heh — sooner or later. At least this way I can control what’s said about me. Do it on my terms.” He wasn’t blind; despite what George said about the wizarding world being accepting of it, there weren’t many people out and proud at Hogwarts. People were still talking about George and Boris going to the ball together. Whether it was the muggle attitudes influencing everyone, or something else… if he was going to make waves in the media, he’d rather it be with the truth than with Skeeter’s lies.

“Wow. Well, as long as it’s your decision.” Neville bumped their shoulders together supportively. “You’ve got me in your corner. And all the others, too. Besides, if anyone’s awful to you about it, you can always set the twins on them.” Harry grinned at that; Fred and George would certainly be happy to correct some viewpoints if Harry asked.

.-.-.-

Luna managed to give him three days warning of the article’s release, and Harry decided he should probably give some people advanced warning. He told Draco first, the first chance they were alone together. The Slytherin gaped at him. “Are you sure?”

“Bit late now if I’m not, isn’t it?” he said wryly, though he knew Luna’s dad would pull the article in a heartbeat if Harry said he’d changed his mind. “I’m sure. People will want to know eventually, and I refuse to hide such a big part of who I am. I just… I imagined my life going forward if I didn’t say anything, listening to people in the papers speculate about which girl I was dating — having people ask me when I was going to get a girlfriend, or if I fancied this girl or the other, and it just felt… awful. I have to pretend about so much, Draco. I’m not pretending about this.”

Draco stared at him for a long moment, then leaned in and kissed Harry breathless. “You noble, attractive bastard,” he muttered when they eventually parted, silver eyes dancing. “You’ll be a role model, y’know. There hasn’t been an out gay wizard of your social standing since Dumbledore came out.”

“Dumbledore’s gay?” Harry asked.

“Yes, but that’s not the point. He didn’t come out until he was old enough that no one wanted to speculate on his sex life anyway. You’re fourteen — young, gorgeous, your whole life ahead of you, and right in the public eye. It’s going to be huge.”

“Yeah, maybe. But I’m used to the papers talking shit about me. I’ll have the people who matter on my side.” Harry dropped a kiss on Draco’s lips, smiling. “I’ll have you on my side.”

That made Draco go a little pink, a reluctant smile taking over. “I can’t let you do it all by yourself. You’re barely civilised.”

Harry laughed. “At least now you’ve got a bit of a warning; plenty of time to think of some snarky little remark to make. Preferably one that’s a little better than insulting my kissing skills,” he teased, watching Draco’s blush deepen.

“I was thinking on the fly, alright? Even at my worst, I’m above insulting people for any perceived promiscuity.” Draco glared hotly. “It didn’t give me many options.”

Grinning, Harry ran a hand through Draco’s hair. He thought it was sweet that, even when pretending to be the Slytherin Ice Prince, he refused to call Ginny or Hermione sluts. “Well, I’ll be happy to take kissing lessons from you any day,” he drawled, sliding into Draco’s lap. “If you think I need improvement.”

“There’s always room for improvement,” Draco insisted, hand sliding down to grab Harry’s arse.

They didn’t talk any more about the article, after that.

.-.

He told the heirs in the middle of a meeting, to distract them from an argument about arranged marriages. Silence immediately followed.

“Well,” Susan said eventually. “That explains a lot.”

Harry snorted. “Thanks, I think?”

“That’s such a Gryffindor move,” Cassius added, though if Harry wasn’t mistaken the Slytherin actually sounded sort of impressed.

“He is a Gryffindor,” Draco sighed, as if it were some sort of unfortunate medical issue.

“You dragging some unlucky boy into the limelight with you, or?” Parvati’s eyes were bright with the potential for good gossip, but Harry shook his head.

“Nope, just me. Anyone I may or may not be involved with doesn’t deserve to be caught up in the mess that is my personal life. Not everyone can be as public as I am.”

“That’s a very roundabout way of admitting you’re seeing someone the public wouldn’t approve of,” Daphne drawled. Harry flushed.

“No comment,” he croaked. Several people laughed.

“Whatever, it’s not our business. Congratulations, I suppose. Is that an appropriate thing to say when someone comes out?” Anthony looked unsure.

“We support you? I don’t know.” Sullivan shook his head, shrugging. “As long as you’re happy. And as long as Rita Skeeter’s furious.”

“That is the plan, yes,” Harry agreed.

Last but not least, Harry gathered a small group of people in Gryffindor Tower the night before the article was due to come out, more nervous than he had been with any of the others. There were a few people in the group he'd already told, and they offered him supportive smiles.

"Hey, so, I'll try and make this quick," Harry started, knee bouncing anxiously. "I just wanted to give you a bit of a heads up about something that's happening tomorrow, since if anyone's likely to get questions, it'll be you lot." He looked around the gathered faces; his dorm mates, three of the five girls in his year, Ginny, the twins, and the rest of the quidditch team. His friends. They wouldn't judge him for this. "Skeeter's been writing a lot of crap about me lately — and about people close to me — so I thought I'd hit back with something true for once. I wrote an article for the Quibbler, it'll come out in the morning. And, uh, so will I, I suppose."

Both the twins looked at him in shock. "Really? To everyone?" George asked.

"Yeah. Better than having it hanging over my head, wondering when someone will find out and tell everyone. At least then it's over with and everyone knows." The more he talked about it to others, the more confident Harry was in his decision. He didn't want to keep having to come out over and over again for the rest of his life. He was in the position of being able to say something and have just about everyone in the wizarding world listen; he might as well say what he wanted.

"That's really brave, Harry," Lavender said supportively, reaching over to pat him on the knee.

"I don't get it," Ron said, frowning. "What's the article gonna say?"

Harry resisted the urge to roll his eyes, wondering if Ron was being purposefully obtuse. "It'll say I'm gay, Ron," he said, glad his voice didn't even tremble. "I've written an article in the Quibbler to tell everyone that Skeeter's article is bullshit because I don't even like girls."

Ron gave a forced-sounding chuckle. "That's a bit drastic, just to get her off your back, isn't it? Just make up a girlfriend or something. Let her think you're dating Ginny. Just because you don't want to tell her who your real girlfriend is."

Harry gave an exasperated look skyward. Ginny put her head in her hands despairingly. "I don't have a girlfriend. I'm not writing the article to get Skeeter off my back — I'm writing the article because I'm gay and people might as well know, if they're going to make shit up about me."

Ron turned pale, then very red, then a little bit green. "You're— what? But— but we've roomed together for years! That's— you can't be—"

"Tell me, little brother, why Harry can't be gay," George asked, his tone icy. Ron went even greener.

"I just meant— he's not like that, y'know? All..."

"All what, exactly?" George's voice just got colder. "Remember who you're talking to, Ronnikins." It seemed to hit Ron that his brother had gone to the Yule Ball with another boy, and he let out a quiet little 'meep' noise.

"Don't worry, I haven't been perving on you while you're changing," Harry said with a roll of his eyes. Of course Ron would have a problem with it. "You're not my type." That made George smirk.

"If you've got a problem with Harry, you've got a problem with us," Dean piped up, gesturing to himself and Seamus. "We like boys and girls. But you're not either of our types either, Ron," he added dryly.

"Welcome to the club, Harry," Seamus added cheerily, winking.

"But I— but you—" Ron didn't seem to know what to say, and Harry didn't really want to stick around for whatever awful jumble of words made it out of his mouth.

"I'm not here to argue with anyone. I just thought you might like to know before the article comes out in the morning. Now I'm gonna go to bed. So, uh, thanks, I guess." Harry got to his feet, and when he did, he ended up bundled in a hug between the three Gryffindor chasers.

"We're proud of you, Harry," Katie said with a grin, kissing him on the cheek. Harry beamed at them.

"This is because of me, isn't it?" He turned at the voice, meeting Hermione's sad gaze. Her hands were still a little raw from re-growing skin. "Because of all the hate-mail I got."

"Not completely," Harry insisted. "I just want Skeeter to know that she can't bully me or my friends. I'll do things on my terms, my way, and she can stuff it. But yeah, it'll be nice if you and Ginny stop getting hate-mail." Hermione's lower lip began to wobble, and Harry sighed. "I'm doing this for me, Hermione. I'm not waiting to be forced out whenever someone wants public opinion of me to take a hit. Might as well get it over with now."

She stared at him for a long moment, then nodded. "As long as it's on your own terms."

Harry turned away to head to the dorms, and from the sound of flesh smacking flesh behind him, Ron had finally managed to get a sentence out. Harry kept walking; George had it handled. It wasn't his problem.

....

He went down to breakfast with Neville on one side and George on the other, Fred and Ginny trailing close behind. Ron was once again not speaking to him, and Hermione didn't seem to know what to do about the whole thing, but Harry continued not to care.

Luna waved at him from the Ravenclaw table, and he waved back, otherwise keeping his head down. An unfamiliar owl flew towards him with the morning post, a rolled up magazine attached to its leg. Harry's stomach swooped like he was doing a Wronski Feint. The front cover had a drawing of some sort of bizarre horned creature, but in bold letters it also had the words ‘Exclusive article from Harry Potter, Page 7’

Harry flicked to page 7, forgetting to breathe as he scanned the article.

‘Harry Potter: The Heart of the Matter’

Since I was a baby, I’ve been in the public eye. Most of that attention has come from an event I barely even remember. But it has brought me fame, and unfortunately there’s nothing I can do about that now. The older I get, the more people want to know about my life — and the more people decide to make up their own facts when I refuse to give them what they want.

Being a teenager is difficult enough without reporters watching your every move. You were all teenagers once, I assume; you remember how it is. It’s hard to figure yourself out, and even harder when you feel like you can’t even breathe without making the front page. But as I grow older, something has become inordinately clear to me, and it feels disingenuous to keep that a secret when so many people seem to care about my love life. I don’t know why; I promise you, it’s not that interesting.

I’m gay.

I’m not dating Hermione Granger, or Ginny Weasley, or any other girl the rumour mill has seen fit to link me with. I’m not dating any girls, and I won’t be, ever. I understand that it’s the default to assume that boys will date girls, but let’s be honest; I’ve never gone with the default option.

I know a lot of people will think I’m confused, or I’m doing it for attention, but they couldn’t be further from the truth. I’m doing this so that people will leave me alone. So they’ll realise that I’m just another fourteen year-old boy, who happens to like other boys, and get on with their lives. I won’t have this information used against me or anyone I care about, and one day, when I’m ready to tell the world that I care very deeply about someone, I don’t want it to be a surprise when that someone is male.

It shouldn’t be a big deal. Love is the strongest magic in the world, and it shouldn’t matter who it’s between.

I would love for there to be no articles about me in the paper, or magazines, but that doesn’t seem to be possible. So I thought I’d give this one straight from the source, so that at least somewhere is printing the truth. Whether you like it or not is none of my concern.’

Harry couldn’t help but grin as he finished reading; it was exactly how he’d written it. Ginny beamed at him, reading over George’s shoulder. “It’s perfect, Harry,” she assured quietly. Neville hummed in agreement on Harry’s other side.

“I’m proud of you, kid,” George murmured, dropping a kiss to Harry’s temple.

Not many people in the school had subscriptions to the Quibbler, but that didn’t matter; it only took a few copies to float around before word began to spread. Harry’s copy made it halfway up the Gryffindor table before it was nicked by Susan, who gave him a thumbs up and passed it to Ernie and Hannah. Harry could see at least three copies on the Ravenclaw table, and two more on the Slytherin table.

Everyone was whispering, but no one was jeering. Not yet.

Harry looked up at the staff table, amused to see a copy of the Quibbler passing from Sprout to McGonagall. His gaze landed on Dumbledore, and his smile widened. The man looked furious. He was hiding it well, but he clearly wasn't impressed. Harry didn't really understand why, but he was happy to be responsible for anything that made the headmaster mad.

.-.-.

Within a day, everyone in the school had read the Quibbler article. Within two, it seemed like everyone in wizarding Britain had read it. Harry had eyes following him everywhere he went — which honestly wasn't that much different from a regular day, except for how some of those eyes had turned speculative. Suddenly, guys he'd never even spoken to before were stopping him in hallways, complimenting him on the article, or his shirt, or his hair. It took Neville pointing it out to him for Harry to realise they were hitting on him. It was worse than when the Yule Ball had been announced!

"Daddy says we've sold more issues of this Quibbler than any in the past," Luna told him one lunchtime, smiling dreamily. "I suppose the article about the Blibbering Humdingers is very popular."

"Oh, definitely," Harry agreed, stifling a chuckle. "I'm glad it's doing well, Luna. Thanks again for publishing it."

"The truth is an important tool," Luna said, and then walked away. Harry watched her go, wondering if he would ever understand her. He doubted it.

Harry had honestly been expecting a little more resistance from his schoolmates. The flurry of owls that greeted him every morning was expected — the letters of support in amongst the hate were actually a pleasant surprise — but so far, none of the other students had dared be openly rude or derisive about his sexuality. Perhaps because there were just enough people in positions of power who weren't straight that the rest of them kept their mouth shut. Draco had bumped into him on the way to Care of Magical Creatures the morning the article went out, just muttering a 'nice article, Potter' and walking away. It was the closest the blond could get to a public show of support, and Harry appreciated it. Even if in private, Draco wasn't quite so thrilled about the whole thing.

"I don't like the way that Ravenclaw sixth year was looking at you at lunch," he said with a scowl the first time Harry got him alone. "Or that Hufflepuff boy in the year below."

"I'm not interested in them," Harry pointed out, kissing the grumpy look off the blond's face. "For some godforsaken reason, I've thrown my lot in with you, and I intend to keep it that way. No many how many blokes look at me during lunchtime." He couldn't help but smile, finding Draco's jealousy adorable. That just made Draco scowl harder.

“But they think they have a chance!” Draco retorted. “Nowhere in that article did you say you weren’t single. All they know is you’re out and looking for someone to tell the world you care very deeply about.”

“What did you want me to say? ‘Oh, by the way, I’m dating this blond Slytherin prat, but keep it to yourselves because if his father finds out we’ll both be dead’,” Harry pointed out a little sharper than intended. Draco flinched, then sighed, his anger fading.

“I know you couldn’t,” he murmured, leaning in to press his forehead to Harry’s. “I just hate that people don’t know you’re mine.”

“I know I’m yours,” Harry assured him. “And you know I’m yours. That’s all that matters.” He tugged the taller boy into a kiss. “You’re mine, too. You know that, right?”

“I know,” Draco promised. “To my endless surprise, I wouldn’t have it any other way.”

Harry’s heart pounded in his chest, and he knew it was way too soon to be having the kind of feelings he was having, they’d not even been together six months, but he couldn’t help himself. He was in deep, and he knew it.

He just hoped Draco was right there with him.

. . .

One person Harry didn’t tell about the article until after it was already out was Sirius; he called the man a couple of days after the Quibbler published, and he could tell from the look on his godfather’s face that he’d already seen it. Harry wondered if Snape had passed it along, or if Remus had seen it somewhere else. He knew Sirius didn’t have a subscription.

“That’s one way to do it,” the animagus declared, grinning. “Very well written, pup. Moony and I are so proud of you. So’s Snape, but he won’t ever say it. You have to sort-of interpret the eyebrows and the sarcasm; I’m getting much better at it, these days.” Harry laughed, shaking his head.

“Thanks, Pads. Sorry I didn’t warn you sooner.” He hadn’t felt the need to, honestly, since Sirius already knew he was gay.

“S’alright. Bit of a surprise when Severus brought it over last night, but I don’t blame you for doing it. It’ll shut Rita Skeeter right up.” Sirius looked delighted by that. “How’s it going down at school?”

Harry told him how things had been since the article came out, including Draco’s jealousy. “He seems to think I’m gonna drop him since there’s all these boys who want to date me now they know I go their way. As if I’d look twice at any of them when I have him.” He shook his head exasperatedly.

“It’s not his fault he couldn’t see how much of a fool you were for him before he decided to kiss you,” Sirius teased. “He doesn’t know he’s stuck with you now.”

"I tried to tell him," Harry insisted pathetically. He paused, biting his lip. "Sirius, am I going too fast with Draco? Not—not physically," he hastened to clarify, feeling his cheeks heat. "But it's only been a few months and I already care way more about him than I think I'm supposed to. Like... like love-kind of feelings, maybe? I don't really know. I don't know what love is supposed to feel like." He hadn't had much of it in his life.

Sirius sighed, though his eyes were fond. "You're probably better off talking to Moony than me about this, pup; I've never really been in love. But from what I understand of it, it happens when it happens and you're best to just let it. Merlin, Remus fell in love with Snape when he was twelve, even if it took him a few years to admit to it. Your dad fell in love with Lily the second he laid eyes on her when they were eleven. I'm not going to sit here and tell you you're too young to love Draco."

"But what if I tell him and he doesn't feel the same? Or something happens and it turns out it's not love after all and I end up ruining everything?"

"I think it's safe to say you're at least a little bit in love with him," Sirius said gently, grinning. "And that's okay! That's great, even! Whether you tell him or not is up to you, but allow yourself to feel your feelings however they come to you. You're young, sure, but that doesn't mean you can't feel these things just as strongly as someone twice your age. And as surprised as I am to be saying it, there are worse people to give your heart to than Draco Malfoy."

"I really think I love him, Sirius," Harry whispered, looking at the closed drapes of his bed as if someone was about to rip them open and laugh at him.

"Then you hold onto him and don't let go," Sirius said firmly. "Some people need to go through a few people before they find the one that fits. Others get lucky enough to find the right fit on the first try. You do you, pup; as long as it feels right, just go with it."

Harry thought about Ginny, flirting with random Ravenclaw boys because she was too scared of the depths of her feelings for Neville. Harry refused to be like that. He had Draco, and he wasn't giving that up for anything, even if his feelings terrified him.

"Thanks, Pads," he said quietly, smiling. Sirius grinned back at him.

"It's what I'm here for, kiddo." He paused then, looked a little more serious. "Severus said Dumbledore didn't seem thrilled by the article."

"He wasn't impressed, no," Harry confirmed. "It was actually quite funny. I don't know what his problem is, though; Draco said he's gay too, so it can't be that."

"He probably just wasn't expecting you to take initiative like that," Sirius pointed out. "The Compulsion charm isn't supposed to make you impulsive in that way."

"Only in ways he can control," Harry said with a scowl. "Well I'm not sorry I did it. I'll just have to see if he tries to cast the charm on me again." He gave his godfather a thoughtful look. "Should I reel things in a bit? Try and play into it, so he doesn't get suspicious? Or d'you think it's a bit late for that?"

“I think that ship might’ve sailed, pup,” Sirius agreed dryly. “And to be honest, I think you might want to start making preparations for the whole thing to go under. I don’t know how long playing dumb is going to work for you.”

It was nothing Harry hadn’t thought himself, but it still made his stomach squirm anxiously.

“Snape says I should hold out to the end of the year,” he said. Sirius hummed.

“I think if you can manage it, that’d certainly be ideal. Only a couple months left now. But he’s going to figure out sooner or later that you’re throwing his charm on purpose, and then it’s just a matter of time before he learns you’ve lost the block.”

“If I can make it through fifth year, it’ll be a miracle,” Harry agreed sourly. “I know it’s coming, Sirius. I’m hoping I won’t have to deal with it for a while, but I’m aware it could happen any day now.” He’d like to get a little closer to being able to claim his Wizengamot seat before having to expose Dumbledore as the manipulative old man he was, but things rarely worked in Harry’s favour.

“Just be careful, pup,” Sirius said. “You’ve got a good crowd around you there, but that’ll be for nothing if Dumbledore gets to you first.”

“I know. I will,” Harry promised. “I just want to focus on getting through the tournament right now.”

He had enough on his plate without adding Dumbledore to the mix.

Chapter 34

As it often does at Hogwarts, life moved on. Harry's sexuality was hot gossip for a week or so, but the Easter holidays began and half the school went home, and the next big topic of conversation overshadowed it, and Harry went back to his usual level of being stared at between classes. There were still a couple of persistent boys trying to flirt with him, but Harry was getting pretty good at ignoring them.

Rita Skeeter tried to fight back with an article about Harry trying to seduce Cedric away from Cho, but it was so laughably pathetic it didn't even register. The woman had lost her edge, and while Harry had no doubt she'd snoop around for some other angle to work, he'd beat her in this particular round. He just wished he was closer to figuring out how she got her information.

Luckily, Draco made a lot more headway on that than he did.

"Between you and the Weasley twins, I'm getting far too used to being manhandled into passageways," Harry remarked when Draco dragged him behind a tapestry. The blond gave him an odd look.

"Why are the Weasley twins manhandling you into passageways?" He shook his head, getting back on track. "Never mind. I have information for you about Skeeter."

Harry sobered up immediately. "What's she done now?"

Draco smirked triumphantly. "Seems your godfather isn't the only unregistered animagus we know," he drawled. It took a minute for Harry to connect the dots.

"No. Really? What's her form?"

"A beetle," Draco told him. "I found out from Crabbe and Goyle; it's how she got quotes from them for the whole Hagrid article. Pansy always met her down in Hogsmeade, but I suppose she thought the boys were too thick to tell anyone about her animagus form. Tiny little thing like that, she could get into all kinds of places."

No one would pay attention to a beetle on a wall — or in their hair. He remembered Viktor brushing the bug from Hermione's hair after the second task. That must have been how she got the information about the pair of them! "That's sort-of brilliant," he admitted. "But definitely illegal, right?"

"Maybe not Azkaban-level illegal, with her contacts," Draco said, "but if it gets out she'll never be trusted to write another article for any reputable publication. She'll be ruined."

"Oh, what a shame," Harry said sarcastically, grinning. He leaned forward to kiss Draco quickly. "I need to go write to my lawyer. You're the best!" Before he could run away, Draco grabbed him by the shirt collar and yanked him in for a proper kiss.

“Don’t you forget it,” he murmured, letting Harry go with a smirk.

It took a minute for Harry to remind his legs how to work before he could leave.

.-.-.

Easter break passed in a blur of homework, spell practice and avoiding Ron and Hermione, for Harry. Due to the tournament, he was exempt from his exams, but that didn’t mean he was exempt from all the work that accompanied them. Harry didn’t mind, really; it was good for him to test his skills after the year’s studying, and it was nice being able to do it with the knowledge that he wasn’t going to be tested on it all. He got his work done early, and spent the rest of the break researching spells that might come in handy for whatever the final task turned out to be.

Finally, on May 24th, Harry was told to meet the rest of the champions and Ludo Bagman by the quidditch pitch at 9pm sharp. He bumped into Cedric in the Entrance Hall on the way down, and fell into step beside him. “What do you think it’ll be?” he asked, shivering a little as they walked out into the evening air.

“Who knows. I was talking to Fleur the other day, she reckons it’ll be some sort of underground tunnel system.” Cedric shrugged, and Harry contemplated the prospect.

“As long as we can still use the quidditch pitch by next year, I don’t really care.” Cedric made a firm noise of agreement.

The pitch had been off-limits since the second task, and when the two boys walked through a gap in the stands, Harry’s jaw dropped. “Our pitch!” Where the smooth lawn had once been was a series of low hedges criss-crossing all over the surface, about three feet high.

“Hello, there!” Bagman was at the centre of the pitch with Viktor and Fleur, waving cheerfully. “Come on over!”

Climbing over the hedges, Harry and Cedric joined the others, staring around in horror. “What’ve you done to our pitch?”

“Isn’t it brilliant? Give it a month, Hagrid’ll have them twenty feet high!” Bagman enthused, his expression faltering when he saw the indignant looks on the two Hogwarts students’ faces. “It’ll all be back to normal by the summer, of course! Not to worry. Now, can anyone tell me what we’re making here?” He asked as if they were a class of toddlers, and got four unimpressed expressions in reply.

“Maze,” Viktor said eventually, and Bagman beamed.

“Exactly that, Mr Krum! The third task is really quite straightforward; the Triwizard Cup will be placed in the centre of the maze. The first champion to touch it will be the winner.”

“We seemply ‘ave to get through ze maze?” Fleur asked, looking down at the hedges around them.

"Well, there will be obstacles, of course," Bagman said, looking quite pleased about it. "Hagrid is providing a number of creatures; there'll be spells to break, all that sort of thing. We can't make it too easy on you!"

He went on to explain the specifics, how they would go in by order of points, and beamed at them when he finished, rocking on his toes. "Should be fun, eh?"

None of the champions looked like they agreed with the assessment, but they all nodded politely. Bagman deflated at their lack of enthusiasm. "Right. Well. If you've not got any questions, we should head up to the castle; getting a bit chilly out here!"

They all turned to leave, clambering over the hedges, and Viktor sidled up beside Harry when they left the stands. "May I talk to you for a minute? Alone?" he asked quietly, his dark brows furrowed.

"Yeah, sure," Harry agreed, perplexed. He waved off Bagman's concerns and followed Viktor away from the rest of the group, heading towards the edge of the forest. "Is everything alright?"

"It is Hermione," Viktor sighed, folding his arms over his chest. "Ever since the second task, she has been... distant. She spends less time in the library, and I wonder if it is because of me?"

"Oh." Harry tried to keep his face blank, wondering what the hell he could say in the face of that. "Viktor, I... it's probably just because of exams, mate. Hermione always gets a bit single-minded when it comes to academics. She's probably just too busy studying in her room to go down to the library. She doesn't like it when it gets as busy in there as it does during exam season." He hoped it was just that. Hoped it didn't have anything to do with him, or Dumbledore.

"You do not think it is because of that Skeeter woman's article? And the press? If I had come on too strong, been too forward..." Viktor looked distressed, and Harry clapped him on the shoulder.

"I don't think it's that," he assured, wishing he could be as confident as he sounded. "No one really remembers the article after mine came out. Just give her a bit of space while she studies, yeah?" He eyed the Bulgarian boy in consideration. "You really like her, don't you?"

"We do not get girls like her in Bulgaria," Viktor said, a smile tugging at his lips. "I am not blind; I know she does not have the same feelings for me that I do her. But... I would still like to end this well even I leave here."

Part of Harry was glad, that Viktor seemed to realise that Hermione was just biding her time while Ron got his head out of his arse, but it still made a pang of sadness rise in his chest. Viktor deserved better.

He opened his mouth to assure the other seeker that Hermione would be alright, when something moved in the trees behind them. He grabbed Viktor by the arm on instinct and pulled him away, raising his wand. "What is it?"

Harry shook his head, keeping his eyes peeled.

The interaction that followed was one of the most bizarre moments of Harry's life, and that said a lot. Viktor was wide-eyed when Harry declared he was going to get Dumbledore. "Don't leave me here with him!" he yelped, gesturing to the babbling Mr Crouch. Harry grimaced.

"I don't really have a choice. I'll be right back!" He turned and sprinted towards the castle, only realising once he reached the stone gargoyle that he had no idea what the password was these days. "Open up, please!" he begged, nudging with his magic, hoping the castle would help him out. "It's important! I need to see Dumbledore!"

The hidden staircase revealed itself, but not because of anything Harry did. Snape stared at him from the stairwell, dark eyes incredulous. "Potter? What's the matter?" He pulled his wand, doing a discreet scan of Harry's magic, but Harry didn't have time to be thankful.

"I need Dumbledore. It's Mr Crouch," he blurted, watching Snape's eyebrows rise. "He's by the forest, I left him with Viktor — he's gone mad! Keeps talking about his son, and Voldemort, and says he needs to speak to Dumbledore, says he's done something terrible."

Snape's gaze sharpened, and he stepped out into the corridor. "By the forest, you say?" Harry nodded. "The headmaster is in his office. I will aid Mr Krum." With that, Snape disappeared, and Harry hurried up the stairs. Dumbledore was sat behind his desk, and he smiled cheerily at Harry's entrance.

"Mr Potter! What an unexpected pleasure. Is everything alright?"

"I need you to come with me," Harry urged. "It's Mr Crouch, he's by the forest. I think he's gone mad. He wants to speak with you."

Dumbledore rose to his feet immediately, his smile dropping. "Lead the way."

As Harry hurried back down to the Entrance Hall, he explained what had happened the best he could. Striding out into the darkened grounds, they both picked up the pace when they saw the glow of wandlight by the edge of the trees. Snape was there waiting, and at his feet was—"Viktor!" Harry's heart leapt to his throat, and Snape shook his head.

"Merely Stunned," he assured, his face sharp in the light from his wand. "No sign of Crouch, Headmaster. Should I go look for him?"

"No, stay here." Dumbledore murmured something, and a streak of silver — a Patronus — shot off towards Hagrid's hut. "Harry, tell me everything you can remember Mr Crouch saying."

"Shouldn't we go get Madam Pomfrey?" Harry asked, eyes still fixed on Viktor's unconscious form.

"No need." Dumbledore revived Viktor himself, and sent Hagrid to fetch Karkaroff. Moody appeared — how he knew something was going on, Harry didn't ask, but Dumbledore didn't look surprised to see him. The next thing Harry knew, Karkaroff was convinced it was all some sort of plot to have Hogwarts win the tournament, Moody was off into the woods in search of Crouch, and Snape was escorting Harry up to Gryffindor Tower.

Harry didn't dare talk to the Potions Master, not with so many portraits on the walls. Heart still pounding, he followed the man through the corridors, still trying to process the events of the last half hour. "Stay in the tower," Snape instructed once they reached the portrait entrance. "Tell no one what you saw tonight. There's enough trouble as it is without rumours spreading. Perhaps it's best if you go to bed early." He gave Harry a pointed look, making it very clear that while he shouldn't tell any of his fellow students, there were two people who definitely needed to know what had just happened.

"Yes, sir." Harry gave the password and stepped inside the common room, blinking at the number of people still up and about. It felt like it had been hours since he'd gone down to the quidditch pitch, but it wasn't even ten yet.

"Alright, Harry?" Fred called from the sofa by the fire, grinning. "What's the third task, then?"

"It's a maze," Harry replied, trying to keep his voice from shaking. "Big hedge maze, over on the quidditch pitch. I guess they're gonna fill it with creatures and spells and stuff. The Cup'll be in the middle, and whoever gets there first wins."

"Wicked," the twins murmured.

"You okay? You're looking a bit pale." That was Ginny, her brown eyes concerned. Harry forced a smile.

"Yeah, just a long day. Lots to think about. Think I'll just go up to bed."

The three Weasleys were clearly concerned about him, but didn't question it when he went up to his dorm, kicking off his shoes and squirreling himself away in bed behind heavily warded drapes. He pulled out the mirror, speaking Sirius' name.

"Hiya, pup! What's wrong?" Sirius' grin dropped when he got a proper look at Harry's face, and Remus squeezed in beside him, looking worried.

Harry told them all about Crouch and Viktor, watching them grow graver and graver. When he was finished, Sirius swore.

"This just gets better and better," he muttered.

"I don't understand," Harry said helplessly. "How does Crouch know Voldemort's getting stronger? And why did he keep talking about his son? Who is his son, anyway?"

"Crouch's son was a convicted Death Eater," Remus explained patiently. "Sent to Azkaban at the end of the first war by Crouch himself. He died, about a year or so in; couldn't handle the dementors, I suppose."

Harry gaped. "He sent his own son to Azkaban?" Sirius was hollow-eyed, as he was whenever anyone mentioned the prison.

"His wife died soon after. She took a turn as soon as he was locked up. Grief, they say," he said quietly. "Crouch has always been firm in his hatred for dark wizards. Sounds like one of them might've got to him at last. Or he just cracked under the guilt."

"But he's been in and out of Hogwarts for ages. I see him on the map all the time." Always wandering about in the late evenings, or sometimes in the middle of the day. "If... Percy said he's been out of the office for a while. How come he's still visiting Hogwarts, if he's been sick?"

Remus and Sirius shared a look. "It's possible he's been looking for signs of darkness at the school," Remus said eventually. "What with Karkaroff about. And Merlin knows plenty of people still don't trust Severus." He scowled briefly. "But if his mind has been going this whole time, who knows what he's been after. Are you sure it's him, Harry?"

"How many 'Bartemius Crouch's can there be?" Harry retorted. Again, the pair shared a look, but they didn't say anything. Harry let out a frustrated noise. "None of this makes any sense."

"It's nothing you can do anything about, anyway," Sirius said, clearing his throat. "Just focus on the third task. A maze, you said?"

Harry had barely spared a thought for the maze all evening, and he slumped back against his pillows. "Yeah. Full of obstacles; they're a bit vague on the specifics. I suppose I'll just practice the usual defensive lot and hope for the best." All his training over the summer would be worth something; it was the most confident Harry had felt about a Triwizard task so far.

"All your little escapades at school will finally come in handy. Good experience, that," Sirius remarked with a grin. Harry snorted, remembering the obstacles in front of the Philosopher's Stone.

"Anything in particular you'd recommend I work on?" he asked, since they clearly weren't going to give him any more information about Crouch. He'd bet anything Snape would go to Seren Du as soon as he was able, and the three would talk about whatever it is they weren't telling Harry. He tried not to let it grate on him too much; he trusted them to tell him what he needed to know. If there was more information... Harry just hoped it wasn't relevant to him. People keeping things from him 'for his own good' tended to have a habit of backfiring in spectacular ways.

Conversation turned to spellwork, and by the time Harry let the pair go to bed, he was feeling a lot calmer. Still utterly confused by the whole Crouch situation, but at least people other than Dumbledore were aware of it.

.-.-.

Once Harry had sent a letter to Mrs Frobisher explaining Rita Skeeter's secret animagus form, it had slipped from his mind entirely in favour of all the other things he had to worry about. As such, he was surprised when three people in dark grey robes burst into the Great Hall one lunchtime, their wands raised. Harry's wand was in his hand before he could even think about it, but Neville gripped his shoulder.

"They're aurors," he breathed. Now Harry looked closer, he could see the Ministry crest on their robes. The man in front, a muscular black man with a shiny bald head, strode up to the head table.

"Headmaster Dumbledore," he greeted, his baritone voice holding a hint of a Caribbean accent. "Apologies for the disturbance, but we have reason to believe there is an unregistered animagus hiding in this school." For one heart-stopping minute, Harry thought he was talking about Sirius. "May we have permission to check the hall?"

"Absolutely, Auror Shacklebolt," Dumbledore agreed, looking vaguely bemused by the intrusion. The auror nodded, then turned back to his colleagues, nodding sharply at them.

Harry's gaze fell on the one female auror, and his eyebrows rose when he realised he recognised her. Her hair was ice blue and down past her shoulders this time, but she was Charlie's friend from the Quidditch Cup. As she walked past the Gryffindor table, she caught his eye, and winked.

The three aurors positioned themselves at the edges of the hall, their spell loud and clear in the silence hanging over the students. All of a sudden, a tiny black dot rising towards the door grew larger, until Rita Skeeter was immobilised in mid-air, a look of shock on her face. Several people gasped.

"Rita Skeeter, you are under arrest for trespassing, unlawful gathering of journalistic information, and the use of an unregistered animagus form," the bald auror declared, walking calmly towards the woman. "You have the right to an attorney, but please be aware, anything you say in the course of your arrest may be used as evidence in trial." With a wave of his wand, Skeeter was on her feet with her hands bound behind her back. Only then was she released from the Immobilising jinx, and her face turned an angry red.

"Injustice!" she screeched as the aurors dragged her from the hall. "You won't get away with this! I'll have all of you sacked, just you watch!" Her words grew faint as they left the hall and shut the door behind them, and there was a long silence, before Dumbledore clapped his hands together.

"Well, that was a break from our usual afternoon routine!" he said, as if it were some sort of organised performance piece. "However, I believe all of you have classes to be getting to soon. Eat up!"

That prompted a wave of chatter to flood the hall, everyone baffled by what had just happened.

"An animagus!" Hermione exclaimed. "That explains so much! No wonder she was able to overhear Viktor and I at the lake." Harry smirked to himself, turning back to his sandwich.

“Aren’t you surprised, Harry?” He looked up, meeting Hermione’s gaze.

“I suppose,” he agreed neutrally. Her brown eyes narrowed.

“Did you have something to do with all that?” she asked suspiciously. Harry put on his best innocent face.

“Me? Never!” Beside him, Neville snorted.

“You could try a little harder to be believable, mate,” he advised. “Your lawyer finally rooted Skeeter out, did she?”

Harry kept silent, merely eating his lunch with a slightly satisfied smile, pointedly keeping his gaze away from the Slytherin table.

That was one problem sorted, at least.

.-. .

With the third task only a few weeks away, and the rest of the school in panic-mode for their upcoming exams, Harry and the other three champions were about ready to be done with it all. As the third task was almost as much of a mystery as the first — they knew absolutely nothing about what they might face in the maze — the four could often be found hanging out in empty classrooms in their free time, going over spells that might be useful. It was probably a breach of the tournament rules to all be training together, but none of them really cared, and their friends all had better things to do.

After a lunchtime session practicing shield charms, Harry headed off towards Divination, already dreading the hot, perfumed fire that burned within the tower. Summer was well and truly beginning, and Trelawney didn’t seem to have noticed, still wrapped in her layers of shawls. Harry felt lightheaded by the time he sat down; trying to stay awake during the lesson was going to be impossible. Even Parvati and Lavender were looking a little drowsy after the first ten minutes.

Harry tried his best to stay awake, but between the comfortable armchair, the heat and the dimmed lights, it was a lost cause.

It had been so long since his last dream of Voldemort that Harry almost forgot what it was like, but the dread seeped in as he found himself in a room with a familiar cold voice.

When Voldemort cast the Cruciatus curse on Wormtail, Harry felt it as if he was under the curse himself. He came to lying on the floor of the Divination classroom, his hands over his scar and his throat sore like he’d been screaming. Everyone was staring at him.

“What was it?” Trelawney pressed, her eyes even bigger than usual behind her glasses. “A premonition? An apparition? You have awoken your inner eye, Potter; tell me what you saw!”

Something had awoken, but it certainly wasn’t Harry’s inner eye. “Nothing,” he lied, pulling himself into a sitting position. His hands were trembling. “Just dozed off. I have a headache.”

“Your scar.” Trelawney’s voice was knowing. “You were clutching your scar.”

Harry didn’t need to look in a mirror to know the scar in question was red and inflamed, like it was fresh. “I think I’m going to go to the Hospital Wing.”

Trelawney tried to call him back so he could delve deeper into the beyond, but Harry ignored her, and all the people staring at him. Shoving his things in his bag, he hurried down the ladder and set off down the corridor — not towards the Hospital Wing, but to the dungeons.

He knocked on the door of Snape’s office, with no idea whether the man was teaching a class or not. Harry was in luck; the door opened, and Snape’s dark eyes met his. “Shouldn’t you be in class?”

Harry waited for Snape to lock and ward the office before he sat down, spilling everything he’d seen in his vision, watching Snape’s lips grow thinner and thinner with every word.

“I’ve been Occluding!” he finished. “My shields are always up. I even have the wardstone from Draco! Why do I still get these dreams?” Harry wasn’t sure why he was calling it a dream when they both knew what it truly was; a vision, a peek inside Voldemort’s head. What Harry had seen had happened, in real time, somewhere in the country.

“I suspect because it is not Legilimency being used,” Snape told him. “Whatever magic still resides in your scar, it evidently left you with a connection to the Dark Lord. Some sort of mental link. Now he’s regaining his strength, his mind is seeking yours more frequently. Whether he knows he’s doing it or not remains to be seen.”

“So he’s just pulling me into his head?” Harry asked, fear gripping his heart. “Will it happen every time I fall asleep while he’s still awake?” How long could a person go without sleep?

“It’s too soon to tell,” Snape confessed. “I’ve never seen anything like this before.”

“Great,” Harry bit out. “So I just have to live with the possibility of getting randomly sucked into Voldemort’s head every time I fall asleep. Fantastic.”

“You said Wormtail had failed him somehow,” Snape said, bringing him back on topic. “Was there any information as to how?”

“Someone’s dead, who wasn’t supposed to be,” Harry recounted, trying to force the dream back into his mind. “Someone sent Voldemort an owl to tell him Wormtail’s mistake had been fixed. So Wormtail must not be the only one who knows where Voldemort is. Also he wants to feed me to his snake.” That was said with a shrug, fairly low in priority compared to the rest of his concerns. “Who d’you think the owl came from?”

“It could be a number of people,” Snape murmured. “There are many Death Eaters who managed to escape judgement.”

Harry bit his lip. There was still one thing he didn’t understand. “Professor?” Snape looked up. “If... Voldemort shouldn’t have a body, right? He was just that weird shadow thing when he left Quirrell’s head. But... how did he hold the wand?”

"It has been a long time since the Dark Lord possessed Quirrell, Potter," Snape pointed out quietly. "With Wormtail aiding him, Merlin only knows what form he inhabits now." Harry's stomach churned. "Here, take this." He summoned a vial from his shelf and passed it to Harry, the label declaring it to be a Headache-Relieving potion. "It's no ordinary headache, but that should take the edge off. I suggest you go back to your dorm and check your Occlumency shields are as they should be. After an intrusion like that, I wouldn't be surprised to find them... rattled."

Harry downed the potion, grimacing at the taste. "Will you tell Remus?" he asked. Snape nodded. "Good. I... can I go back to sleep, or will it happen again?" the vision had left Harry wrung-out, and he was desperate for a nap.

"I imagine the connection only forms when the Dark Lord is feeling particularly strong emotions," Snape said. "As long as he is done... celebrating, you should be safe to sleep. If it happens again, call for Ceri and have her bring you to me."

"Yes, sir." Harry got to his feet, leaving the empty potion vial on the desk. "Thanks. I... yeah. Thanks." He almost thought about giving Snape a hug, desperate for some kind of contact after a vision like that, but he kept his hands at his sides. Their relationship wasn't there yet. He could probably persuade the twins to hug him without asking questions, they were good about that.

Harry left the dungeons, taking his time on the way up to Gryffindor Tower. On the third floor, he paused when he heard voices. "Terrible thing, terrible thing. So close to the end of the tournament, too!" It was Minister Fudge. "With any luck, we'll find him wandering the forest and pack him off to St Mungo's. Can't say I'm surprised he cracked, what with his personal history."

"I'm telling you, he's not in the forest." That was Moody, his familiar growl echoing through the corridor. "He got out of there awfully quickly for someone who's supposedly lost his mind."

"Gentlemen," Dumbledore cut in, "I'm sure there's a reasonable explanation for all of this. Now, shall we?" They rounded the corner before Harry had a chance to hide, and he was left stood at the foot of the stairs, wide-eyed. "Harry. Shouldn't you be in class?"

"I came over a bit faint in Divination," Harry told him, looking sheepish. "Think I've been burning the candle at both ends, y'know, getting ready for the third task. Professor Trelawney sent me back to the tower for a rest."

"Don't overwork yourself, my boy!" Fudge said, looking impatient. "Come, Dumbledore; I have meetings after this one, you know!"

Dumbledore gave Harry one last searching look, then followed Fudge and Moody down the stairs. When they were gone, Harry let out a relieved breath, carrying on up to the Tower.

So even Fudge was involved in the search for Crouch now, hmm? He wondered if they would come up with anything.

.--.

By the next day, Harry's little fainting spell in Divination had been passed along to just about everyone in the school. General consensus was that the pressure of the tournament had made him crack. Harry didn't really care what people thought of him; he had bigger things to worry about.

Sneaking through the Transfiguration corridor under the cover of the cloak, Harry slipped into the classroom, getting quickly to work. He cleaned off the teacher's desk with a quick spell, setting his burden down in the centre. Another series of spells had soft balls of light floating around the ceiling, and two chairs brought up to the desk. Harry seated himself in one of the chairs, and waited.

He didn't have to wait long. The door eased open, and there was an intake of breath as Draco slipped inside. "What's all this, then?" he asked, looking about the room. Harry grinned.

"Happy birthday, Draco."

Draco moved closer, his eyes landing on the small cake on the desk, a single candle burning happily on top. "Where did that come from?"

"I asked Ceri to make it," Harry admitted. "Blueberry and white chocolate, your favourite. And—here." He reached over to pick up the wrapped parcel, thrusting it into Draco's hands. "I hope you like it."

Draco closed the gap between them, ignoring the second chair and straddling Harry's lap to kiss him softly. "And you say I'm the romantic one," he teased quietly, stroking Harry's cheek. The Gryffindor smiled.

"I've picked up a few tricks here and there."

Draco leant back just far enough to unwrap the present between them, revealing a plain wooden box. He opened it with a curious frown, brows rising at the rows of inkwells inside. "It's something the twins have been working on," Harry explained, as Draco picked up a bottle of dark green ink. "Password-protected ink. You set a password to the bottle, and it dries invisible. Whoever wants to read it needs to speak the password with their wand to the paper in order to reveal the message. I thought — things might be difficult, over the summer, for you to properly write to some of your friends. With your dad, and their parents. You can share the bottles around, that way you can write to each other without getting caught."

Draco was wide-eyed as he held the bottle up to the light. "Fascinating," he breathed, then glanced to Harry. "You really do think of everything, don't you?" He smiled fondly.

Harry began to insist that the twins had done all the real work, but Draco cut him off with a firm kiss, his free hand tangling in Harry's hair.

When they broke the kiss, Draco looked towards the little cake. "I suppose I'd better blow out my candle," he mused, still seemingly quite comfortable on Harry's lap.

“Don’t forget to make a wish,” Harry added. Draco rolled his eyes, leaning over to blow the candle out neatly.

“I don’t suppose you remembered to bring cutlery?”

Harry pulled a knife and two forks from his bag, and Draco cut the cake neatly in half. It was sized perfectly for two people, just as he’d requested. Ceri had outdone herself, and the pleased hum Draco let out at the first bite had Harry’s trousers tightening uncomfortably. Draco ate his entire piece of cake perched on Harry’s lap, and both of their trousers were feeling pretty snug by the time they were finished.

“What else do I get for my birthday?” Draco drawled, his eyes bright in the dim light of the room, fixed firmly on Harry’s. Harry smirked, letting his hands wander.

“I’m sure I’ll think of something suitable.”

.-.-.-.

By the morning of the third task, everyone was too busy speculating over what might happen in the task to care about Harry’s sanity, or lack thereof. The students would be having their last few exams that day, and the task would happen shortly after. So far, Harry had spent the exam periods with the other champions, sometimes practicing spells but mostly just lazing about being smug at their lack of exams. He was expecting to do so again, when McGonagall came to him at breakfast. “Potter, the champions are gathering in the chamber off the hall after breakfast.”

“What surprise have they got for us now?” Harry asked with a grimace, wondering if there was going to be some unexpected extra layer of difficulty. They had to do the maze blindfolded, or something. McGonagall smiled slightly.

“You’ll like this one, Mr Potter,” was all she said before leaving the hall. Harry stared after her for a moment, then shrugged.

“Guess I’ll see you later, then,” he said to Neville, finishing off his orange juice and getting to his feet. “Good luck with History of Magic!”

Neville made a face and Harry laughed, heading towards the door to the side chamber. He met up with Cedric on the way over, and eyed him curiously. “Any idea what this is about?”

To his surprise, Cedric grinned at him. “You’ll see.” The Hufflepuff pushed the door open, sending Harry in first. He looked around the room; Amos Diggory was stood next to a pretty dark-haired woman, beaming proudly; over in a far corner were two dark-haired people who, judging by the man’s nose, could only be Viktor’s parents. Near them was a beautiful blonde woman, her hand securely wrapped around Gabrielle’s — Fleur’s little sister. And over by the fireplace…

“Surprise!” Bill Weasley strode forward, grabbing Harry in a hug. He was quickly followed by his mother.

"The champions are allowed to invite family to the final task," Mrs Weasley explained, kissing him on both cheeks. "Dumbledore thought you might like us to visit."

"Charlie wanted to come, but he couldn't get time off work," Bill volunteered. There was a squeal by the door as Fleur entered the room, immediately rushing over to her mother and sister with a babble of excited French. Harry noticed Bill's eyes following her as she passed them.

Harry wasn't sure what would've been worse; having no family to visit, or having the Dursleys at Hogwarts. The latter made him snicker to himself; that would be quite the sight. All the same, he was glad Mrs Weasley and Bill had volunteered, even if he wasn't quite sure how he felt about the Weasley matriarch these days. The only thing that would've been better was if Sirius and Remus could have been there.

"Merlin, it's weird being back," Bill told him, his hand on Harry's shoulder. "Haven't seen the place in years. Bet it hasn't changed much."

"It probably hasn't changed much since my day," Mrs Weasley agreed. "But still, it'd be nice to take a look around."

"Fancy giving us a tour, Harry?" Bill asked with a grin. Harry looked around; all of the other champions were in with their families now. Fleur's gaze kept slipping appreciatively towards Bill, even when Gabrielle tugged on her arm and said something in French. Harry smirked at the French champion, and she gave a pointed look at Bill in reply, her intention very obvious.

"Don't you want to meet the other champions first?" Harry offered, already walking towards the Delacour family. When he was a few feet away, Gabrielle darted away from her sister and wrapped her arms around his legs, beaming up at him.

"'Arry!" she greeted brightly. Harry bent down to kiss her cheeks in a proper French greeting.

"Bonjour, Gabrielle," he said, having learnt a very basic amount of both French and Bulgarian from the foreign champions in the time he was supposed to be preparing for the third task. "Ca va?"

She babbled back a sentence that Harry only caught a couple of words of, and Fleur laughed. "Zat might be a leetle past 'is learning, Gabrielle," she said teasingly, retrieving her sister. "'Arry, introduce me to your family, s'il te plait?"

"Fleur, this is Molly Weasley, and her eldest son, Bill," he introduced, knowing Fleur would connect the dots of the surname. Fleur greeted Mrs Weasley with a polite smile, and when she turned to Bill her eyes grew darker.

"Eet ees a pleasure to meet you," she said, her voice a little husky. Bill's Adam's apple bobbed as he swallowed.

"The pleasure's all mine." He took her hand, bowing over it with a kiss to the knuckles. Behind them, Fleur's mother giggled.

"As my daughter is otherwise occupied," she said amusedly, only a trace of an accent to her words, "I shall introduce myself. I am Apolline Delacour; you must be the young man who saved my Gabrielle."

"Harry Potter," he offered, bowing in greeting. "Your daughter is a fierce opponent, and an even more fierce friend."

"You flatter me, Mr Potter," Mrs Delacour replied, eyeing her daughter proudly. Mrs Weasley, on the other hand, didn't seem to know what to make of the blatant flirting going on in front of her. Fleur wasn't even using her veela charm; none of the other men in the room were looking twice at her. Bill seemed entirely smitten without it.

Harry eventually managed to drag Bill away from Fleur to introduce the pair to Viktor and his parents, though their English was far less fluent. And there was no need to introduce the final family; Amos Diggory gave Harry an assessing look as he approached. "There you are! Bet you're not feeling so full of yourself now Cedric's caught you up on points, are you?"

Cedric turned red. "Dad!" he snapped, shooting his father a scolding look. "Ignore him, Harry. He's been angry ever since Skeeter's first article about the tournament. Y'know, the one where she made out like you were the only Hogwarts champion?" That article felt like a lifetime ago. Amos scowled.

"Didn't bother to correct her, though, did you?" he pointed out sharply. Harry met his gaze without flinching.

"No, I just got her arrested," he retorted, voice cool. "Did you also happen to notice I was wearing a badge with your son's name on it in the pictures? Rita Skeeter's garbage is nothing to do with me."

Amos puffed up, getting ready to respond, but his wife put a hand on his arm and tugged him away with a furious whisper. Cedric gave an apologetic grimace. "Sorry, Harry. He's... difficult."

Neither of Harry's interactions with Amos had been particularly great, but Harry waved it off, smiling. It wasn't Cedric's fault his dad was a bit of a dick. "It's alright. We're gonna go for a wander; see you at lunch?"

Saying goodbye to the others, Harry led the two Weasleys out into the now-empty Great Hall, listening as Bill began to reminisce about his Hogwarts days while they strolled the grounds. He asked after Percy, wondering how he was handling Crouch's disappearance. Apparently, not well.

The rest of the Weasley family were surprised to see their mother and brother when the trio returned for lunch, and Ginny threw herself at her big brother for a tight hug, shoving Harry out of the way so she could sit beside Bill. Harry merely scooted up closer to George.

He was surprised at how frosty Mrs Weasley turned when Hermione joined them, barely greeting the girl before turning back to her children. "Mum reads Witch Weekly," George murmured in Harry's ear. "But she doesn't read the Quibbler."

Harry grimaced, but didn't say anything. That wasn't a discussion he wanted to get into when he had the task facing him in a few hours.

"Hey, Mum," Bill cut in when lunch began to wind down. "Mind if I borrow Harry for a minute? Give him a bit of advice before the task? Man-to-man, y'know."

Mrs Weasley smiled and nodded, shooing them away. Bill led Harry with a hand on his shoulder out of the hall and into a small classroom, locking the door with an impressive set of wards. Harry supposed he was a curse-breaker. "I spoke to Charlie after the first task," Bill said, leaning against a nearby desk. "He told me everything. Merlin, Harry... I'm sorry about Mum."

"It's not your fault," Harry insisted automatically. "I'm... I'm trying not to think about it, to be honest. I think Ron and Hermione are under his thumb, too."

Bill didn't look surprised. "I had a feeling that might be the case. Bollocks. Well, you've got the rest of us Weasleys. Not sure where Dad stands on the matter, mind. Haven't really asked him, just in case." Harry was happy to let Mr Weasley remain oblivious, and said as much. "Now, like I said, I spoke to Gorrak back before Christmas. He mentioned a very unique case of dark magic residue on a high-profile client that he might be putting me to work on this summer. From your letter, can I assume that's you?"

"Bingo," Harry confirmed with a grimace. "Did Charlie tell you about the magic Gorrak already removed from me?" From the way Bill's lips pursed, Harry took that as a yes. "The scar is different; he said he'd never seen anything like it. It also turns out it gives me a direct link into Voldemort's head, so that's not great."

Bill's face turned horrified, and Harry gave him the cliff-notes of his visions from Voldemort. "Blimey, Harry," Bill murmured, shaking his head. "That's one hell of a curse residue. Mind if I give you a scan?"

With Harry's consent, Bill spent the next five minutes checking him over with various spells, muttering under his breath and writing things down in a little muggle notebook he pulled from his pocket. "I swear I've seen something like this before," he murmured, putting the notebook away. "The magic feels familiar, somehow. It's hard to explain," he added at Harry's bewildered look. "I'll look into it and hopefully get you some answers soon. That's not magic you want sitting on you any longer than it has to be."

"It's so mixed up with my core, it hardly feels like foreign magic, to be honest," Harry admitted, remembering how awful it felt when Dumbledore reapplied the Compulsion charm once he was aware of his core. Sure, if he poked at it it felt a little wonky, but otherwise the magic around his scar just felt like an extension of his own, which was a terrifying prospect.

"That's not unusual; it's been part of you for almost your whole life. It practically is yours, now." Bill hummed thoughtfully, then pocketed his wand, clapping Harry on the shoulder. "Come on, then; let's get you back to Mum before she comes looking for us. You can take us up to Gryffindor, I'd love to say hello to the Fat Lady."

Harry and Bill returned to Mrs Weasley, and the three of them spent the afternoon touring the inside of the castle, finding the few things that had changed since they had been students. Harry was intrigued to hear about some of the old staff members Mrs Weasley had stories of; he hadn't realised she had been at the school before Hagrid worked there. Harry had always assumed Hagrid became groundskeeper as soon as he turned seventeen, since he never finished his schooling. Then again, he often forgot exactly how old Hagrid was to begin with. It was hard to judge age under all that beard.

Bill said nothing more about Harry's scar as the afternoon wore on, though Harry caught the curse-breaker giving him contemplative looks every now and then. Harry tried not to let it make him too anxious; there was nothing he could do about his scar, and Bill would surely find an answer soon.

He just had to get through the task.

Chapter 35

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The maze was a blur.

All four champions had agreed to keep an eye out for one another during the task, to help out if it looked like someone was in a really sticky situation. With no idea what could be lurking within the hedges, it had seemed like a good idea.

Then everything went so very, very wrong.

Harry found Cedric at the mercy of Viktor, whose eyes were glassy and unfocused. A quick spell had the Durmstrang champion unconscious on the grass, and Cedric stared up at Harry with fearful grey eyes. “What the hell is wrong with him?”

“I don’t think he was himself,” Harry said, looking down at Viktor with a grimace. “Someone put him under the Imperius curse.” He was pretty familiar with the signs, after Moody’s classes. Cedric went ashen.

“Merlin. You don’t think… Fleur?” Harry hadn’t been the only one to hear her scream, then. He shrugged, shaking his head. All they could hope was that she was okay.

“We should stick together, if we’re the last two left,” Harry suggested. “Either way it’s a win for Hogwarts. And quite frankly, I just want to get this over with. The sooner we’re done, the sooner we can check on Fleur, and get Viktor somewhere safe.”

Cedric agreed, and after sending up red sparks for Viktor, the pair set off.

A sphinx and an acromantula later, and the pair of Hogwarts champions were stumbling up to the plinth to see the Triwizard Cup glowing softly in front of them. Harry had a huge gash on his leg, and Cedric was bleeding from several places beneath his shirt. “You take it,” Harry urged. “You’re the real Hogwarts champion.”

“I wouldn’t have made it this far without you,” Cedric insisted. “You take it. Show everyone what you’re made of, that Harry Potter is a force to be reckoned with. You need that more than I do.”

“Together,” Harry decided eventually, realising the Hufflepuff wasn’t going to back down. “Like I said before; it’s still a win for Hogwarts. We’ll split the money, or whatever.” Cedric could have it all. Harry certainly didn’t need it.

That seemed to satisfy Cedric, and the pair each took a handle. Harry immediately felt like something was hooking him in the navel, and the world spun.

They arrived in what looked like a graveyard, the Cup dropping to the ground between them. “Is the Cup supposed to be a portkey?” Cedric asked, his wand raised in front of him. Harry felt dread building in his gut, every instinct insisting that something was wrong.

“Kill the spare.”

The words echoed in Harry’s head, the flash of light burned into his eyelids, and all of a sudden Cedric was on the ground and Harry couldn’t look away and he was dead.

Cedric was dead.

The feeling of wrongness increased when the cloaked man forced Harry to his feet and began tying him to a gravestone. Harry managed to catch the name on the stone before his head was yanked back around with a hand that was missing a finger.

TOM RIDDLE

Harry stared at Wormtail as the man secured Harry’s bindings. This was not good at all.

He couldn’t help but look back at the grass, where Cedric’s still form lay. He wished the boy would jump up, grinning that rakish grin, and assure Harry it was all a joke, that everything was fine. But he wouldn’t.

He was gone.

He tried to struggle when Wormtail cut into his arm, but it was fruitless, and Harry could do nothing but watch as Voldemort was reborn from the cauldron. He caught the odd hissed word from the snake circling him slowly, but his focus was on the red-eyed wraith of a man in front of him, the parchment-pale face twisted in a satisfied smirk. “We meet again, Harry Potter.”

Uncaring of Wormtail’s whimpering as he bled onto the grass from his stump of a wrist, Voldemort used the man’s Dark Mark to summon his Death Eaters, sending a fiery spark of pain through Harry’s scar. Harry looked around at the masked faces, their bodies shrouded in black robes. He wondered if Snape was one of them. Would he be expected to risk his position at the school to join them? Would Harry have one ally in this graveyard?

He wasn’t surprised to see Lucius in the mix, even as his heart twisted painfully. Draco would be upset; though he knew, deep down, that his father was only loyal to Voldemort, Harry knew there was still a part of him that hoped for his father’s redemption. Hoped it was all an act, and he was truly the loving father Draco had always wanted.

Finally, Voldemort’s attention turned back to Harry. Harry could hardly focus as the man regaled his followers with the story of his return, his head feeling like it was about to cleave in two. But he tried his best; it was all important information. Sirius and the others would need to know.

He’d thought the pain in his head was the worst thing he’d ever experienced, but it was nothing compared to the Cruciatus curse in person. Harry would have been on his knees if he weren’t tied to the headstone; almost did end up on his knees, when Wormtail untied him. It was only sheer stubbornness that kept him upright, his refusal to show any sort of weakness in front of those people.

Even his lessons in the summer couldn't have prepared him for duelling with Voldemort, surrounded by Death Eaters. Voldemort was toying with him, making a mockery of his enemy, and Harry was torn between wanting the man to just kill him and get it over with, and desperately looking for a way out.

When it came, it was in a way that Harry never would have imagined. The golden cage of light; the shades of Cedric, of his parents, of Bertha Jorkins and the muggle man. We're so proud of you, son. His mother's sad smile. Cedric begging him to return his body to his father, pleading for Harry not to feel guilty.

And then he was running, dodging spells left and right, his eyes focused on Cedric's body and the faint glow of the Triwizard Cup. As soon as his hand clenched around Cedric's cool wrist, a wandless Summoning charm had the cup flying into his hand, and the world spun again.

Harry returned to Hogwarts, slamming into the ground just at the edge of the maze. He let the cup fall to the side, his grip still tight on Cedric. The Hufflepuff's face was pale, and Harry choked back a sob.

All around him, the crowd had burst into deafening applause, cheering and whooping at what they saw to be a combined Hogwarts victory. Suddenly, fingers gripped Harry's shoulder, and he was wrenched up to meet Dumbledore's gaze. "Harry," the headmaster said, looking down at Cedric. "What happened?"

"Voldemort," Harry gasped out. "He's back."

He just managed to see a flare of what looked like triumph in Dumbledore's eyes before his vision was blocked by a lime green bowler hat. "What's going on? What happened? Oh my word!" Fudge's eyes went wide. "The Diggory boy! He's—"

Dumbledore tried to pull Harry away, but he clung tighter. "No, he told me," he muttered. "He wanted me to bring him back. He shouldn't have been there." If he hadn't told Cedric to take the Cup with him, if he'd just accepted the victory and gone alone, Cedric would still be alive. Kill the spare. Harry was the only one supposed to be in the graveyard. It was his fault.

"Harry, there's nothing you can do for him now." Dumbledore's voice stood out amongst all the others, but Harry refused to let go of Cedric. Everything around him was a haze of screams and whispers and shadows, people sobbing, the word dead being passed around over and over, Fudge's voice getting progressively higher as he grew more and more panicked. Dumbledore released him, but a different set of hands gripped him by the shoulder, wrenching him off of Cedric and away from the huddle. Harry tried to fight it, but after multiple rounds of Cruciatus, he couldn't have fought off a kitten.

"No," he murmured, feeling the stranger usher him across the grass, stumbling as they hit the castle steps. "No, I can't leave Cedric."

“Easy, lad,” it was Moody, and Harry struggled harder. “You need a lie down, you’ve had quite the shock. Come on, that’s it.” Harry couldn’t pull away as the man took him up to a room he vaguely recognised as the Defence teacher’s office; quite different to how it had been when it was Remus’. “Tell me what happened.”

“Voldemort’s back,” Harry mumbled. “I have to get back to Cedric.”

“Back? He’s returned?” Moody checked. Harry nodded. “What else happened? Did he call his Death Eaters? Who was there?” Moody kept bombarding him with questions, pushing a potion vial into his hand, but Harry refused to drink it, knocking it away and letting it smash on the floor.

“Foolish boy!” Moody roared, his magical eye whizzing around in its socket. “Tell me what happened, so I can know if my hard work has paid off!”

Harry gaped at him. Moody smirked viciously, his scarred face turning grotesque. “Yes, I did it. I put your name in the Goblet; I turned the cup into a portkey; I made Krum attack his fellow champions. It was a bloody miracle and a half you even made it that far! Refusing all my help, making it through by the skin of your teeth. You certainly didn’t make it easy on me, Potter! But it was worth it, if my master has returned.” He raised his wand, turning on Harry. “Imagine how pleased he’ll be to hear I’ve tied up his loose ends for him.”

“Stupefy!”

All of a sudden, Moody toppled to the ground. Harry looked around to the office door, which was hanging off its hinges, to see Snape and McGonagall rushing inside. “Professors!” Harry gasped. “Moody — he did it. He did it all. Voldemort’s back and it’s his fault.”

McGonagall looked horrified, and Snape quickly bound the Stunned man. “I’ll fetch the headmaster,” the Gryffindor housemistress declared, hurrying from the room. Snape dropped to his knees in front of Harry, cupping his jaw to look him in the eye.

“Did he curse you?”

Harry shook his head. “Tried to get me to drink, but I didn’t,” he said, gesturing to the mess of potion on the floor. Snape scowled, then held up a vial from his own pocket. Harry drank it without hesitation, and the world immediately regained focus, though his hands were still shaking. “Sir, Voldemort’s back.”

“I know.” Snape’s eyes flicked down to his left forearm. “Are you alright?”

There were so many ways Harry could answer that question, but he settled for just a nod. He wasn’t dying — that he knew of — and the damage had been done now.

Snape straightened up at the sound of hurried footsteps growing closer, and by the time McGonagall returned with Dumbledore he was on the other side of the room, staring down at the bound Moody with distaste.

“Sir, Professor Moody!” Harry said as soon as Dumbledore’s blue eyes landed on him. The headmaster was furious, though Harry couldn’t tell what part of the whole evening had made him so. He certainly didn’t seem upset about Voldemort’s return.

“That is not Alastor Moody,” Dumbledore announced, striding over to the unconscious man and staring down at him. “I knew as soon as he removed you from my sight. You have never known the real Moody.” He reached down, pulling the hip flask from Moody’s robe. He popped the cap and held it out to Snape, who sniffed it, sneering.

“Polyjuice,” he declared, meeting Harry’s gaze. That solved the puzzle of who had broken into his office.

“But then— who is he?” Harry was baffled, but Dumbledore seemed to know exactly who to expect once Moody’s face returned to its original form. He sent Snape off to get truth serum and Winky the house elf, McGonagall to get Pomfrey, and then Harry was alone with the headmaster and an unconscious stranger. Harry’s heart thudded against his ribs, his wand in his hand, just in case the fight wasn’t yet over.

Far from it; Dumbledore practically ignored him, discovering the real Alastor Moody inside a magically expanded trunk. It was only when the man on the floor began to change did Dumbledore pay attention once more.

The scars melted away, the fake eye popping out as the socket was once again filled. The wooden leg fell to the ground with a clunk. Eventually, Harry was left staring at a man with a bedraggled mop of straw-blond hair, his skin pale and his face surprisingly young. He looked about the same age as Sirius, if not younger, though he was prematurely wrinkled around his eyes and brow.

“Crouch.” Snape had returned, and was stood in the doorway staring at the young man on the floor, realisation in his eyes. Winky let out a wail at his side. “Barty Crouch.”

Harry wrinkled his nose, confused — that definitely wasn’t Mr Crouch — before it hit him. Mr Crouch’s son.

The Barty Crouch he’d been seeing on the map all year long was the younger Bartemius Crouch, not the elder.

“I thought he was supposed to be dead,” Harry murmured. Dumbledore’s eyes twinkled.

“I believe that’s exactly what he wanted us all to think.” He didn’t wait for McGonagall to return, taking the small vial from Snape and dropping three drops of liquid into Crouch’s mouth. Then, he revived him, keeping his wand out.

Harry barely dared to blink as Barty Crouch Jr told his story of escaping Azkaban, Winky letting out moans of despair every few sentences. He learned the truth about the Dark Mark at the Quidditch World cup, and his involvement in the Triwizard Tournament after Voldemort came to Crouch’s house. He learned of Barty Crouch Sr’s death.

At some point, McGonagall had returned, Pomfrey in tow, and the two women were struck silent in horror as they listened. When Dumbledore was satisfied, he put Crouch to sleep with a spell.

“Minerva, would you mind standing guard while I take Harry here upstairs for a minute? Poppy, if you could, Alastor is down in that trunk, he’s in a rather dreadful state and could use your assistance.”

“Potter should come as well,” Pomfrey insisted, but Dumbledore shook his head.

“I’m afraid I need Harry for just a little bit longer. Severus,” he added, turning to the man. “Please go out to the grounds and fetch Cornelius Fudge; he’ll undoubtedly want to question this man himself. Tell him I shall be in the Hospital Wing in half an hour’s time if he should need me.” He moved to stand beside Harry’s chair, helping him onto his feet. Pain seared through Harry’s leg. “Up you get, there you go, my boy. This will only take a moment.”

The last thing Harry wanted to do was go up to Dumbledore’s office with him, but he didn’t seem to have much of a choice. Dumbledore’s grip on his arm was surprisingly firm for such an elderly wizard, and he led Harry slowly up to his office.

The journey was a haze of pain, but soon he was sat in a chair in Dumbledore’s office, Fawkes perched on his knee. It helped a little to have the phoenix’s warmth with him, but it didn’t do a thing to aid the jumble of thoughts in Harry’s mind, or his throbbing leg.

“Harry.” Dumbledore’s voice cut through the fog. “I need you to tell me everything that happened tonight.”

“Professor, I really just want to go to sleep,” Harry pleaded, his voice cracking. “Can this not wait until the morning?”

“I’m afraid it cannot.” Dumbledore leaned forward in his chair. Even in his hazy state, Harry knew not to look him in the eye. “Start from the beginning, Harry. Don’t leave anything out.”

Slowly, with his eyes closed, Harry began to recount what had happened in the maze. By the time he’d reached the part where Cedric was killed, his voice was trembling, and he jumped when the office door slammed open. “Harry!”

A faint sob escaped Harry’s lips as Sirius rushed to his side, wrapping him in a tight hug. “Oh, pup,” he breathed, stroking Harry’s hair. “It’s okay, you’re alright, we’re here, we’ve got you, you’re safe.” Harry glanced up to see Remus stood behind Sirius, glaring at Dumbledore.

“What the hell are you playing at, Albus, bringing him up here alone after an event like that? Harry needs rest!” he thundered. Dumbledore didn’t flinch.

“Some things are more important than comfort, Remus. Though now you two are here, I’m sure Harry would be happy to allow you to stay.”

Harry’s fingers twisted in Sirius’ robe. His godfather wasn’t going anywhere.

With Sirius' arms around him and Remus' hand on his shoulder, it was easier for Harry to tell his story. He didn't even think about what might not be prudent to tell Dumbledore, his brain too messy from the evening's ordeal, so he just spilled everything. Both the Marauders tensed when Harry told them of the shades that had emerged from Voldemort's wand; echoes of Lily and James Potter. He kept going right up until the moment he grabbed the portkey. "And then I came back to the school," he finished eventually, his throat raw and his heart aching. Saying it all out loud, reliving every moment, made it real in his mind. Cedric was dead. Voldemort had returned.

"Can he go get medical care now?" Sirius asked sharply.

"Madam Pomfrey is expecting him," Dumbledore agreed. "Harry, you have shown immense bravery tonight — equal to that of those who faced Voldemort in the first war. You have shouldered a great burden, and it is time for you to rest from it. Sirius, would you like to stay with him?"

"I'd like to see you stop me," Sirius retorted. "Come on, pup. Can you stand?"

Harry made to push himself up, and let out a cry of pain as his leg throbbed. Fawkes fluttered down to the ground, leaning his head against Harry's calf and shedding a few tears — the wound healed, but Harry still felt like his limbs were made of jelly.

"I've got you." Remus smiled softly, turning his back to Harry and placing the teen's arms over his shoulders. The next thing Harry knew, the werewolf was lifting him in a piggyback. Harry let his head rest on the man's shoulder, eyes falling half-shut.

Sirius returned to his animagus form and padded alongside Remus as he carried Harry out of the office and towards the Hospital Wing. Harry was vaguely aware of Dumbledore following them, but he was so tired, and he was still trembling from the Cruciatus curse.

When they reached the Hospital Wing, it was to an entire crowd of Weasleys, plus Neville, Hermione, Fleur and Viktor. They all jumped up at the sight of Harry, though several of them looked perplexed at seeing him carried by Remus.

"Poppy, he'll need a Nerve Tonic," Remus called, ignoring the audience to set Harry on the edge of one of the beds. Madam Pomfrey's eyes widened.

"Cruciatus?" she checked, and Remus nodded. Mrs Weasley gasped.

"Oh, Harry!" She rushed forward to hug him, but Remus stepped between them.

"Madam, I must ask you keep your distance; Harry has had quite the ordeal this evening, and he needs medical care and a lot of rest."

"Professor Lupin? What are you doing here?" Hermione piped up.

"We were concerned." His plural brought their attention to the large black dog sat at Harry's feet, and Ron and Hermione let out quiet 'oh' sounds.

"If Harry wishes you all to stay with him, you may," Dumbledore announced. "But please save your questions until he is ready."

Pomfrey returned with several potion vials, and Harry drank them as soon as he recognised Snape's handwriting on the labels. The matron glanced down at the dog, who stared back at her silently. "This dog will be remaining with Harry for a while," Dumbledore told her, his tone one not to be questioned.

"Very well. Into bed with you, Mr Potter," Pomfrey urged, her voice surprisingly gentle. Harry didn't care that he was still in his torn and bloodied tournament clothes, merely lying back on the mattress. Remus helped him with his shoes, pulling the blanket up over him.

"Harry." It was Viktor, approaching the bed hesitantly. "I am sorry, for what I did in the maze."

"It wasn't your fault," Harry assured tiredly. "Are you alright? Fleur, you as well?"

"We are fine," the French witch told him, offering a smile that didn't reach her eyes. "We will return to our families, but... we wanted to make sure you were okay." She approached the bed with a cautious glance towards Sirius, who didn't move. Her fingers curled around Harry's, squeezing gently, and tears welled in her eyes. "Sleep well, 'Arry. We will return in ze morning."

Viktor clasped Harry's shoulder briefly, then nodded, and the pair left the room. Harry wondered how much they'd been told; he'd tell them the whole story in the morning, or as much of it as he could bear. They deserved that much. They were all in the tournament together.

Once Harry was in bed, Pomfrey offered him another potion vial. "It's Dreamless Sleep," she explained. "I would recommend you drink all of it."

Harry's gaze turned to Remus, who smiled and moved closer. "We'll be right here until you wake up." Sirius let out a quiet bark of agreement, and hopped up onto the end of the bed to curl up beside Harry's feet. Harry drank the potion, barely managing half of it before he was slumping against the pillows.

As he laid back down, the world became hazy, his eyelids suddenly very heavy. With Remus' fingers smoothing over his fringe, he fell asleep.

.-. .

Harry awoke slowly, feeling warm and fuzzy, and like he could happily drift back off to sleep. But he could hear very faint shouting, and when he blinked his eyes open he realised he hadn't been asleep long at all.

In all the chaos of Fudge bursting into the room, no one but Sirius and Remus noticed Harry sitting up and putting his glasses back on. The huge black dog shuffled further up the bed, resting his head in Harry's lap and looking up at him with soulful eyes. Harry pet him on the head, offering Remus a halfhearted smile.

Somehow, it didn't surprise him that Crouch had been 'accidentally' Kissed before a confession could be recorded. He didn't think Dumbledore was surprised, either — it was much easier for the Ministry to stay in denial if the only proof of Voldemort's return was the word of a fourteen year-old boy. When Fudge began to doubt Harry openly, Harry stared the man down.

"I can offer Pensieve memories, if you like," he suggested hoarsely. Fudge began to splutter.

"Highly unusual! I hardly think— as if we could take memories from a boy and expect people to believe it!"

Fudge continued to have his head firmly buried in the sand as he argued with Dumbledore, ignoring the headmaster's suggestions about the dementors and the giants. Harry didn't know why Dumbledore was bothering; they all knew Fudge wouldn't accept Voldemort's return until the man appeared in front of him himself.

Even when Snape showed off his Dark Mark, he refused to believe it, making his excuses to leave. He almost forgot to give Harry his winnings — Harry had entirely forgotten he was owed them. When the Minister left, Dumbledore let out a sigh.

"There is work to be done," he declared. By now, everyone in the room was watching the headmaster. Waiting for him to take over, as he had done in the first war, Harry realised. It made his stomach clench uneasily.

Dumbledore issued orders, and no one hesitated. Though Bill gave Harry a weighted look before he left; he would no doubt be in touch as soon as it was safe. When McGonagall and Pomfrey had both left as well, Dumbledore turned to the bed, giving Sirius a pointed glance. "It is time," he said simply.

Sirius growled quietly, but he shuffled to the edge of the bed and transformed, sitting at Harry's hip. Mrs Weasley screamed.

"Sirius Black!" she exclaimed, raising her wand.

"No!" Harry said, shielding Sirius the best he could. "He's innocent. It's okay!"

"What is he doing here?" Harry had almost forgotten that Sirius and Snape were supposed to loathe each other; they were glaring as if they were hoping to set the other on fire with their eyes.

"It is time to put your differences aside," Dumbledore insisted. "You are on the same side now. I will settle for a lack of open hostility."

Harry bit back a laugh as the pair shook hands, gripping tight enough to attempt to break fingers. They were probably enjoying that little act far too much. Beside him, Remus' eyes danced with amusement.

"So... not a mass-murdering lunatic, then?" Ginny piped up, eyeing Sirius warily. Harry smiled wearily at her.

“Nah, not quite. He’s my godfather.”

She nodded, apparently happy to accept that explanation. The twins and Neville, who had heard about Sirius from Harry but never met him, looked perfectly comfortable in the situation. Harry was honestly surprised Dumbledore had let them stay.

“Sirius, I need you and Remus to set off at once. The old crowd must be alerted,” Dumbledore instructed. Sirius’ eyes turned stormy.

“I’m not leaving until I know Harry’s alright,” he insisted. “A few hours won’t lose us the war, Albus. We’re leaving in the morning, and no sooner.”

Dumbledore’s lips thinned, but he didn’t argue; he couldn’t, not without revealing how little he cared for Harry’s wellbeing. “Very well, but you must leave first thing tomorrow. Severus, you know what you must do... if you are ready.”

“I am,” Snape replied, though he was paler than usual. Harry’s hand clenched beneath his blanket; Dumbledore wasn’t even hesitating to send him back to that awful monster.

“Then hurry. And good luck.” Snape swept from the Hospital Wing, and Dumbledore turned back to Harry. “I must go downstairs; I should see to the Diggorys. Harry, take the rest of your potion. I’ll see you all in the morning.”

Harry’s heart ached at the reminder of Cedric, and he closed his eyes against a fresh wave of grief. When Dumbledore left, he looked up at Sirius, who scooted back on the bed to put an arm around him. “He’s right, pup, you should get some sleep. We’ll stay with you.”

“Take your potion, Harry,” Mrs Weasley encouraged, still sending nervous glances towards Sirius. “Try and get your mind off things. Think about what you’re going to spend your winnings on, eh?” She tried for a smile, but it just made Harry wince, staring at the bag of galleons accusingly.

“I don’t want it. I shouldn’t even have it, I didn’t win.” He and Cedric had taken the cup together. It was his fault Cedric was dead.

“Cedric wouldn’t want you to blame yourself, mate,” Fred told him softly. “You couldn’t have known what would happen.”

Logically, Harry knew Fred was right, but that didn’t mean his heart believed it. He had survived and Cedric had not, because he was Harry Potter and Cedric was the spare. The Cup had been a portkey because of Harry. It was always because of Harry.

“You guys should go back to the dorm,” he muttered, looking away. He was going to cry, he could feel it, and he refused to do so in front of such a large audience. “Get some sleep, come back in the morning.”

“Only if you promise to sleep too,” Neville insisted. Harry nodded, though he didn’t speak the words.

Mrs Weasley was hard to convince, but eventually the twins managed to ease her from the Hospital Wing, leaving Harry alone with Remus and Sirius. His eyes began to burn.

“Your potion,” Remus started, but Harry shook his head.

“Not yet.” If he kept pushing the reaction away, it would only get worse. “Just... just give me a minute.”

Sirius pressed a kiss to his forehead, squeezing him around the shoulders. “Whenever you’re ready, pup.”

Leaning into his godfather’s embrace, Harry let out a shaky breath, feeling a couple of tears leak from his eyes. Cedric was dead. Friendly, funny, overwhelmingly Hufflepuff Cedric. The boy who had become a good friend to Harry in the last year, who had been one of the first to believe him when he said he hadn’t entered the tournament. The boy who loved quidditch, and his friends, and his girlfriend — oh, God, Cho. She would be devastated. Harry hoped she had someone to comfort her. He hoped she didn’t blame him.

The door creaked as it opened, and Harry tensed, expecting another round with Dumbledore. There was no one there — at least, not until after the door was closed, and a murmured incantation removed the Dissillusionment charm on the two people who had entered.

“Harry.” Draco hurried towards the bed, ignoring Sirius and hoisting himself up to pull Harry into his arms. “Oh, thank Merlin you’re alright.”

Harry couldn’t stop the dry, aching sob that broke free, and he buried his face in the front of Draco’s robes, letting his boyfriend soothe him with a hand rubbing his back.

“He wouldn’t believe that you were fine until he saw it with his own eyes,” Snape volunteered, striding towards the bed. Now that they didn’t have an audience, he eyed Harry with concern. “I must apologise, Harry. I had all the pieces of the puzzle, and yet I failed to put them together until it was too late.”

It took Harry a minute to realise what the man was referring to, and then he eyed him incredulously. “Crouch had all of us fooled. You couldn’t have known.”

Snape didn’t look convinced, and Remus put a hand on his shoulder, leaning in close. “It wasn’t your fault, Severus. This would have happened one way or another. The circumstances are tragic, of course, but... it was inevitable.”

“My father was there, wasn’t he?” Draco asked, voice hollow. Harry sucked in a sharp breath.

“Yeah,” he confirmed. “Yeah, he was.”

Draco’s grey eyes shuttered for a moment, and when he opened them again his jaw was set. “I won’t let him get to you.” He held Harry tighter, lips pressing to his hair.

“Everything’s going to change now, isn’t it?” Harry asked dully. Everything he’d been working towards in the last year — everything he’d planned, it was all coming to fruition. Progress could not be made until Voldemort was dead, but unfortunately that meant he had to be alive again first. The war was on their doorstep, and it was time to fight on two fronts. “We have to make plans. We have to be ready.”

“You have to sleep,” Remus corrected softly, still holding the vial of potion. “You’ve had one hell of a day, cub. Get some rest. We can make plans when you’ve had time to recover, whenever it’s safe to do so.”

Harry wanted to argue, but he knew the werewolf was right. He was in no state to start planning a war.

“Draco, I should return you to your common room before someone notices you’re missing,” Snape added, gently touching his godson’s shoulder. Draco’s hold on Harry tightened for a moment, and then he sighed.

“The Slytherins will be worried about me,” he agreed. “They’ll want answers. I don’t know what to tell them.”

“As much of the truth as you can,” Snape replied. “They must all soon make choices. We can only hope they make the correct ones.”

Harry wondered how many students in Slytherin — and indeed, in other houses — had a parent who had been present in the graveyard earlier. How many children would be dragged into a war that wasn’t theirs to fight.

Draco cupped Harry’s face, kissing him tenderly. “I’ll see you as soon as I can,” he promised softly, then slid from the bed. He glanced up to Sirius. “Lord Black, I’d like you to write to my mother, but I don’t know if it’s safe for her to receive mail.”

“I can get a message to her,” Sirius assured. “And the offer still stands. Whatever protection the House of Black can give is yours whenever you want it. You’re family, in more ways than one.”

Something in Draco’s shoulders loosened, and he nodded, stepping back. Snape made to leave, but Remus’ hand tightened. “Be careful, Severus,” he pleaded, honey eyes fearful as he met his partner’s gaze. Harry was surprised to see Snape soften, leaning into the touch for the barest moment.

“As careful as I can. I shouldn’t be gone long; the school term isn’t over yet.” Was he headed to speak to the other Death Eaters, Harry wondered? Or to Voldemort himself? Either way, he was walking a dangerous line, even if it was one he’d walked before.

Remus’ hand moved to cover Snape’s heart for a brief moment, then he straightened up, pulling himself together. A practiced move — how often had he let the man he loved walk into the jaws of death? Harry didn’t know how he could bear it.

The two Slytherins left, and Remus stared after them for just a beat too long. “Here,” he said eventually, handing Harry the potion. “You need to rest. If you’re ready?”

Harry probably could've fallen asleep without the potion at this point, but he dreaded to think what his brain might conjure if he did. He took the vial, downing the whole thing in three large gulps. Sirius eased him down to lay his head on the pillow, then transformed back into a dog and stretched out alongside him, a comforting warmth. Harry let his eyes fall shut, and they did not open again.

Chapter End Notes

I'm sorryyyyy please don't hate me too much~

If you would like to read a fic in which Cedric does not die and lives happily ever after, may I direct you to my Harry/Cedric founders reincarnation fic 'The Same, But Different'?

Either way, sorry. It had to be done.

Chapter 36

Harry woke after eight hours of restful, dreamless sleep. His body felt miles better — all his injuries from the night before had been healed, and the Cruciatus shakes had gone. But his heart still had a raw, gaping hole in it; the kind that made it hurt to breathe, hurt to think.

Sirius and Remus were still there, but they couldn't stay long. "Albus won't let us stick around much longer," Remus said sadly. "He's already been by three times this morning to see if you've woken up yet."

"Merlin forbid I have people who care about me more than the war effort," Harry replied dryly. Remus bent to kiss his forehead, right over his scar.

"Don't you forget that, cub," he breathed. "Our first priority is always you. Always."

Harry's heart hurt for an entirely different reason. He'd never been someone's priority before.

Sirius transformed back long enough to give Harry a hug and promise to be in touch soon. "This changes our plans, but we'll figure it out. You won't be with those muggles any longer than you have to be," he assured. "Love you, pup."

"Love you too," Harry replied, getting one last hug from both men before Sirius became a dog once more, and the pair left the Hospital Wing.

Alone for the first time since it had all happened, Harry let out a shaky breath, tucking his knees up to his chest. He wanted to call his friends back from the dorm, to surround himself with noise and people so he didn't have to try and think. He wanted to never see another human being again, not until the hole in his heart was closed over. He wanted it all to stop.

The door opened, and Madam Pomfrey bustled in, giving Harry a soft, knowing smile. "If there was a potion I could give you to make it all go away, Mr Potter, I would," she told him gently. "Sadly, magic can only do so much. Time will have to take care of the rest."

A wave of her wand summoned a set of pale blue pinstriped pyjamas, and she held them out to Harry. "I want to keep you until at least dinner. Go ahead and shower, it might help. I'll have breakfast waiting when you get out."

She drew back the curtains on a bed a few rows down, and Harry's eyebrows rose at the sight of the real Alastor Moody sprawled unconscious in the bed. "Is he alright?"

"He will be," Pomfrey assured. "He's had quite the year, but it's nothing permanent. Go on, off with you, get out of those awful clothes."

When he stood, Harry looked down at himself, grimacing at the dirt and blood covering his clothing. Yes, pyjamas seemed like an excellent idea.

He tried not to take too long in the shower, though half the time was spent just trying to breathe, willing the tears to come and the dam to break so he could just get it over with. He hadn't properly cried yet. He'd come close, had some tears escape onto Draco's shirt the night before — but it felt like it was all building up inside and he just needed to release the pressure, only it wouldn't go. Eventually he gave up, shutting off the water and drying himself with a spell, staring into the mirror for a long time. He had a scar on his forearm, now, where Wormtail had cut him, jagged and ropey. It could join his scar from the basilisk, his scars from the Dursleys' care. Marks of a boy who was more weapon than child. At least in the eyes of some.

As promised, there was a steaming bowl of porridge waiting on his bedside table, and a fresh set of sheets on the bed. Pomfrey was gone, and the curtains around Moody's bed were drawn once more.

As he ate, Harry forced his emotions aside to start thinking on the more rational side of his brain. Voldemort was back. He had to prepare for the worst. He wished he had his notebook, or at the very least a quill and parchment; his brain was buzzing with thoughts, plans and ideas and questions. He remembered Remus' words from the night before; we can make plans as soon as you've had the chance to recover.

He wasn't alone in this. As soon as he could get to Seren Du, they could figure it all out. No doubt by then they would all have a better idea of where things stood. What Voldemort was planning.

There was a knock on the door, and it swung open tentatively. The trio on the other side made the hole in Harry's heart rip open a little wider. Fleur, Viktor, and — "Cho."

The Ravenclaw girl's face crumpled, and she dashed forward, throwing her arms around Harry's neck. "Oh, Harry!" Her eyes were red and puffy, making Harry wonder if she'd spent the whole night crying.

"I'm so sorry," he choked out, holding her tight. "Cho, I'm so, so sorry, it's all my fault."

"I don't know what happened last night, but I know that's not true," Cho insisted, pulling back to look him in the eye. "Cedric cared about you so much, Harry. If he died helping you, or protecting you, or whatever he was doing — he would've wanted it to be that way."

That twisted the knife deeper in Harry's chest. "That's just it, though!" he burst out angrily. "It wasn't any of that! He was just in the wrong place at the wrong time, and they killed him for it!"

"I zink you should tell us what 'appened," Fleur cut in gently, a hand on Harry's shoulder. "Zen we can make sense of zis mess, non?"

Cho perched herself on the edge of Harry's bed, wrapping her fingers around his. Fleur took Remus' empty chair, and Viktor leaned against the bed opposite. "Vhenever you are ready, Harry," he murmured.

Harry took a deep breath, and began to talk.

He didn't tell them the details. He didn't feel the need to go into the specifics of the ritual, or the Death Eaters, or the strange Priori Incantatem as Dumbledore had called it. They weren't there for that. They were there for Cedric. "If I'd taken the Cup by myself, Cedric would still be alive. If I'd listened to him—“

"Yeah, and if he'd listened to you, You-Know-Who wouldn't be alive right now, but Cedric would still be d-dead," Cho pointed out, faltering on the last word. "If he'd stopped being so bloody Hufflepuff for five minutes." She choked out a laugh that was more of a sob, shaking her head. "Everything about that maze was designed to make you get there first. You said Crouch was rigging the whole thing. Cedric shouldn't have even been there, but he was, because both of you cared more about each other than some stupid competition. There was no way you could've known what would happen, and Cedric would hit you if he were here to listen to you blaming yourself."

"How can you say that?" Harry asked plaintively. "How can you sit here and comfort me and hold my hand when I'm the reason your boyfriend is dead?"

"Voldemort is the reason my boyfriend is dead!" Cho's dark eyes were burning, and she seemed to have surprised even herself by saying the name. "Don't cheapen his death by making it your own burden, Harry. It's not fair to either of you."

Harry wished he could believe Cho's words, but it didn't stop the guilt constricting his heart, so he kept his mouth shut. "What did Dumbledore tell the rest of the school?"

Fleur and Viktor shared a glance. "He said that Cedric's death was the first casualty of a new war," Viktor relayed. "He said he would explain more when time had passed, and allow a period of mourning."

That was appropriately vague and dramatic for Dumbledore. "And... Cedric's parents? What were they told?"

"The truth, mostly," Cho piped up. "That their son was killed by You-Know-Who's followers, because he got in the way of them resurrecting their master. They... they'd like to come see you before they leave, if you're okay with that?"

Harry couldn't think of many things worse than having to look the Diggorys in the eye and apologise for being alive when their son was not. But he didn't think he had the right to turn them away, under the circumstances, so he said yes.

"When do you all head home?" He directed his question to Viktor and Fleur.

"After ze leaving feast," Fleur told him. "Madame Maxime wanted us to leave sooner, but... she spoke to Professeur Dumbledore and 'e persuaded 'er to stay." Harry remembered Dumbledore saying something about speaking to Hagrid and Maxime about a job, and he wondered if it was due to that.

"Ve haff no headmaster," Viktor added with a shrug. "But ve are the ones who steer the boat anyvay. Ve vill go home when the term is finished." At Harry's look of confusion, he explained about Karkaroff's disappearance. "Ve all knew he vas a Death Eater. I suppose he vas too scared to face his old master."

"So what will happen with Durmstrang?"

"Our deputy headmaster is a good man," Viktor assured. "He vill take over."

The door opened behind them, and a small crowd of Gryffindors paused in the doorway. "Oh, you've got company. We'll come back later," Neville said apologetically, but Cho shook her head.

"No, no, it's fine. We were mostly done anyway." She hopped off the bed, turning to Harry with a solemn face. "Thank you, for bringing him back. I'll... I'll tell Amos and Caroline they can come up and see you in a bit."

"We will see you at dinner, 'Arry," Fleur said, kissing his cheek softly. "Get some rest."

The champions and Cho left, and Neville, Ginny and the twins took their place at Harry's bedside.

"How are you feeling?" Ginny asked. Harry let out a long breath.

"That's... that's a really good question, Gin." He was simultaneously feeling a thousand things and also overwhelmingly numb.

"Is there anything we can do to help?" Neville looked earnest, and Harry managed a small smile.

"Turn back the clock twenty-four hours and make it all go away?" he joked. Where was Hermione's time-turner when he needed it?

"Mum went home, but she sends her love," Fred relayed. "She tried to talk Dumbledore into letting you come straight to ours for the summer, but he told her you needed to go to the muggles for a while."

Harry grimaced. "Not happening."

"Is that where you stayed last summer? With Sirius and Lupin?" Ginny wasn't daft, she knew Harry hadn't been with his muggle relatives. Harry nodded.

"I can't say where. But hopefully I'll be back there soon." He couldn't wait to be back in his room at Seren Du, in their little bubble of security.

"Good." Ginny's voice was firm. "I'm glad someone managed to get you away from those awful people. Neville filled me in on the whole Sirius Black thing, by the way. Hope you don't mind."

"Saves me having to do it," Harry said with a shrug, happy to have Ginny up to speed.

"So... if you don't mind us asking... what really happened last night?" George's question was tentative. "If you're not ready to tell us, that's fine," he added hastily.

"No, no, I can." Telling the other champions had been slightly easier than telling Dumbledore. Maybe it would get better the more times he said it; sink in a little deeper, so he could actually believe it had happened. So it wasn't all some awful nightmare.

Unlike with the champions, this time Harry tried not to leave anything out. Ginny buried her face in Neville's shoulder when he described watching Wormtail put the twisted baby in the cauldron and see it emerge as Voldemort. Even the twins were pale and grim-faced when he described the way their wands had connected, and he'd used the distraction to run.

"Bloody hell," George said in the end. "So that's it, then. He's really back."

"He's really back," Harry confirmed dully. "And he's got most of his followers with him."

"So what's the plan now?" Fred asked without hesitation. Harry blinked at him. "Mate, you're gonna be in the thick of it whether you like it or not, and if you think we're gonna stand by and watch you risk your neck, you've got another thing coming."

"He's right. Whatever you're doing, we want to help," Ginny said vehemently. "And if you tell me I'm too young I'll hex you."

"Hell, we're all too young for this," Harry pointed out with a wry quirk of his lips. "I... thanks, guys. We don't really have a plan yet. Need to talk to some people first. But once I know what's happening, I'll let you know."

"Whatever we can do to help, let us know," Neville said. "Gran, too. She doesn't think much of Dumbledore, but she's on your side."

When Harry thought about all the people he'd have to talk to, all the decisions he'd have to make in the next few weeks, it made his chest tighten uncomfortably. He pushed it away. There was time for all that later.

Ginny cleared her throat, drawing their attention. "What... what about Ron and Hermione?" At Harry's raised eyebrow, she continued. "They were up here last night too. They know some of what happened. But I'm not blind; you clearly don't trust them anymore. What are we supposed to tell them, if they ask?"

"I've got pretty good evidence that Ron and Hermione are spying on me for Dumbledore," Harry admitted, hating the words even as he said them. "If they ask, play dumb, act like you don't know any more than they do. And be careful; if they're watching me, they might be watching you as well."

Ginny nodded, showing no sign of sadness or disappointment that her brother was doing such a thing. Harry wondered if the twins had told her about their mother, yet.

Harry yawned, and Ginny immediately nudged him back into bed. "You should get some more sleep. We'll leave you to it. You'll be out for dinner, yeah?"

They said their goodbyes and left Harry alone once more. He ran a hand through his hair, biting his lip against a fresh wave of grief, and rolled over to bury his face in his pillow.

.-.-.

Meeting with Cedric's parents had been nothing short of awful, but Harry had made it through. He'd explained to them what happened — the truth, in case Dumbledore had seen fit to lie to them — and apologised over and over. Amos Diggory was quiet, but Caroline Diggory held him tight and insisted it wasn't his fault, that he'd done everything he could.

It certainly didn't feel like it.

He tried to offer them the Triwizard winnings, but they refused to take it. Harry was left staring at the sack full of galleons, wondering what the hell he was supposed to do with it. Send it to Gringotts and throw it in with the rest of his money? That seemed a waste. Were there charities, in the wizarding world?

Twenty minutes before dinner, Madam Pomfrey checked him over and declared him fit to leave. "Only if you want to, Mr Potter," she added with concern in her eyes. "It's no trouble to me if you want to stay another night."

As much as Harry was dreading having to face the rest of the school, the prospect of spending a night alone in the Hospital Wing was worse. Dumbledore had come by to visit not long after the Diggorys, and being alone with the headmaster had set him on edge. The night before had been fine, as Remus and Sirius had stood guard, but he didn't have that now. He'd much rather be in his dormitory.

He thought about skipping dinner, but his rumbling stomach decided that for him. He shook off the brief thought of going to the kitchens instead; he'd have to face everybody eventually. Might as well get it over with

As he walked from the Hospital Wing to the Great Hall, dressed in a fresh school uniform the house elves had fetched for him, several people stopped and stared at him walking past. He ignored them, keeping his head down as he entered the hall, whispers echoing in his wake.

"Harry!" He looked up at the call that came louder than all the other murmurs of his name, seeing Cho waving at him from the Ravenclaw table. She wasn't alone; Viktor and Fleur were with her, and the twins, and Ginny and Luna, and Neville and Susan and Hannah, and a dozen other people who had become a regular presence in their hodge-podge social group over the last few months, including several of Cedric's Hufflepuff friends. Between Cho and Viktor was an empty seat, and Harry walked towards it, dropping down onto the bench. Cho leaned into his shoulder for a brief moment, squeezing his arm. "How are you holding up?"

"I should be asking you that," Harry retorted quietly. He looked around the group, all of whom were giving him encouraging smiles. "You guys didn't have to do this."

"Yeah we do," Cho insisted. "So let us do it. You're our friend, and you were Cedric's friend, and he'd come back and haunt all of us if we just left you to the wolves."

There were several people around the room who had dark looks on their faces as they stared at Harry, even from the Gryffindor table. It was a familiar sort of look; the look of people who thought Harry was dangerous, deranged, the next Dark Lord in the making. They probably thought he'd murdered Cedric himself.

"Thanks."

Cho smiled at him, reaching over to start piling mashed potatoes on her plate.

There wasn't much conversation through the meal; a few attempts at making summer plans, or relief at the end of exams, but nothing like the usual buzz of noise. Harry looked down the table, feeling like something was wrong. Someone was missing, but he couldn't figure out who.

Eventually, it hit him; there were most of the usual Slytherins in their group, but Cassius was missing. He craned his neck to look over at the Slytherin table, seeing the sixth year boy eating with his head down, surrounded by his year mates. He looked pale and wrung out. Harry's heart clenched. Had his uncle been in the graveyard too? Had he already drawn the line on Cassius' behalf?

"Susan," he called softly to the girl sitting a few seats over on the opposite side of the table. She looked up, frowning at the grim look on his face. He gave a pointed glance to Cassius. "We need a study group meeting."

Understanding dawned in her eyes, and she shook her head. "Neville already gave us the rundown, before dinner," she assured. "I'll owl you in the summer, we'll figure things out."

That didn't satisfy Harry, but he couldn't say anything further when they were surrounded by so many people. Susan gave him a pointed glance. "Not everything's all on you, Harry. Let me take care of this one for a bit."

Harry didn't have the energy to argue with her.

.-. .

Announcing the return of Voldemort in the middle of the end of term feast was a bold move on Dumbledore's part, but Harry wasn't surprised. The headmaster had already practically declared war on the Ministry, threatening Fudge with the inevitabilities of his continued ignorance. It was a smart move, too; those who were against Voldemort would see Dumbledore standing for the truth and align themselves with him, encourage everyone to put the Ministry in his hands — because obviously they were too incompetent to keep running themselves, with Fudge in charge. Harry wondered if they'd forgotten who had endorsed Cornelius Fudge to begin with.

The game had begun, and Dumbledore was setting up his pieces. Harry would have to start doing the same, soon. The prospect made his stomach squirm anxiously. Was he really going to take on Dumbledore, the Ministry, and Voldemort?

He didn't really have a choice. Someone had to end this cycle of war and death and misinformation. Someone had to put a stop to Dumbledore's quest for the Greater Good, before he brought the wizarding world to its knees.

He looked to the Slytherins during the feast, their drawn faces and solemn eyes. He hadn't had the chance to speak to Draco in the week since the task; all of them were being watched, now more than ever. He hoped Slytherin House knew they had options. He hoped they hadn't given up already.

The feast came to a quiet end, and Harry retreated up to the dorm with Neville. He hadn't spoken to Ron and Hermione since the night of the third task. They didn't seem to know what to say to him. Harry wasn't in any rush to speak to either of them; maybe if he was lucky, Dumbledore wouldn't see the need to have them spy on him, now that Voldemort was back.

Dean and Seamus had kept to themselves in the last week; Harry hadn't asked what they thought about Cedric, or Voldemort, or any of it. He was too scared of the answer. So they said nothing when Harry changed into pyjamas and sequestered himself away behind the drapes of his bed and his usual privacy charms. He was about to call it an early night, when the mirror began to vibrate beneath his pillow. He pulled it out, answering the call and smiling at Sirius' face.

"Hi, pup. Glad I managed to catch you. How was the feast?"

Harry's smile faltered, and he told Sirius what Dumbledore had said. His godfather didn't seem surprised either. "We suspected he might do as much. Setting himself up as the leader of the light again."

"What have you been doing? Where are you?" Harry hadn't managed to speak to his godfather since he'd left the Hospital Wing, the mirror going unanswered the few times Harry had been able to try it. Sirius grimaced.

"I'm in a place I never thought I'd have to go back to," he said, which gave Harry zero information whatsoever. "Moony and I have been gathering the old crowd — everyone who fought against Voldemort the first time around. And a few who weren't old enough the first time, but will happily join us for the second." There were voices in the background, and Sirius winced. "Listen, pup, I don't have long. There's a bit of a snag in our summer plan."

Dread rose in Harry's gut. "What do you mean?"

"Dumbledore wants you monitored this summer," Sirius told him. Harry cursed. "Yeah. He wants a 24/7 guard outside the Dursleys' house, ready to follow you any time you leave the property."

"I'm not staying with them all summer." If he was left to Uncle Vernon's hands after having Snape boss the man around the summer before, he wouldn't survive to see his fifth year.

"Absolutely not," Sirius agreed without hesitation, and something in Harry began to un-twist. "We haven't quite figured it out yet, but there's got to be a way to get you out of there without Dumbledore knowing."

“The guard will be outside the house, right? Why don’t we just claim I’m being locked in my room all summer. Wouldn’t be the first time.” Something dark flashed across Sirius’ face at that admission, but it was gone in an instant.

“That could work. Someone would notice when owls don’t arrive, though.”

Harry frowned; he hadn’t thought about that. “I’ll talk to the twins.” If anyone was able to think of a way to circumvent magical supervision, it was them. “If it comes down to it, I can say the Dursleys have forbidden me from getting any post all summer. Again, not the first time. The twins will back me up, they know what my aunt and uncle are like.” Ron did too, but he wasn’t likely to say anything in Harry’s favour these days.

“It gives us options. See what the twins think, and let us know. Severus will come to pick you up as soon as it’s safe to do so. We haven’t confirmed how strict the monitoring is going to be, yet, but it looks like it’s just gonna be someone invisible hanging out by your house. Having a bunch of charms and the like over your house would be a dead giveaway.”

The voices in the background grew louder, and Sirius cursed. “I’ve got to go. Talk to the twins, and I’ll see you soon. Love you.” He didn’t wait for a reply before ending the call, leaving Harry staring at his own tired reflection.

If Dumbledore’s meddling stopped Harry spending time with his real family this summer, there would be hell to pay.

.....

The first of July dawned bright and clear, and Gryffindor Tower was a flurry of activity as everyone packed up their trunks and made their way down to the Entrance Hall. Even more than usual, everyone was eager to get home. Even Harry, for once, though he had to hide his enthusiasm. He trusted Sirius when the man promised he wouldn’t leave Harry to the Dursleys. They’d figure it out.

The hall was much more full than usual, with the Durmstrang and Beauxbatons students getting ready to leave as well. Harry was a lot more sad than he thought he’d be watching them go; he’d made friends with a surprising number of the foreign students over the last few months, not just Fleur and Viktor. Out of the corner of his eye he saw Boris and George kissing, and smiled sadly. Neither of them were serious about each other, and would part on good terms, but it was still unfortunate that things had to end.

Surrounded by people promising to keep in touch and owl each other, Harry squeezed his way through the crowd to find Fleur and Cho hugging each other tightly, both with tears in their eyes. Fleur beamed at him when he approached. “‘Arry!” She released Cho and grabbed him, kissing both his cheeks. “We will see each other again soon,” she promised. “I am trying to get a job ‘ere, to improve my Eenglish.”

“And to see a bit more of Bill Weasley, too, I bet,” he teased, remembering the outrageous flirting before the third task. God, that felt like months ago. Fleur’s cheeks pinked.

"Zat would 'elp as well, yes," she admitted with a grin. Sobering, she pressed their foreheads together briefly. "You 'ave been a great friend to me zis year, 'Arry Potter, and I 'ope to be ze same to you in return. Eef you ever need me, I will be zere. Zis fight is for all of us." The fire in her eyes reminded Harry exactly why she'd been chosen as Beauxbatons' champion.

"Thank you," he said sincerely. "I'll keep that in mind." He didn't want to lose touch with Fleur, or any of his new friends.

She hurried off to say goodbye to someone else, and Cho touched Harry's elbow gently. "Can I write to you? Over the summer?" she asked. "I... I've liked getting to know you better, this year. Ced was gonna invite you over to his for a bit, this summer. He thought you might want to get away from the muggles, y'know? I'd imagine you're probably not allowed to visit anyone anymore, though."

Harry hadn't been allowed to visit anyone but the Weasleys before Voldemort had returned, but he didn't tell Cho that. His heart ached for the future that might have been. "I don't know if I'll be allowed to get owls," he confessed. He hadn't had the chance to talk to the twins yet. "But if I can, I'll write to you, yeah? I've liked getting to know you, too. I'm glad we're friends, Cho."

Cho gave him a watery smile, and she hugged him. "We won't let him win," she declared vehemently, her voice a little choked. "We'll fight him. For Cedric."

She stepped away, and someone tapped Harry on the shoulder. He turned to see Viktor smiling down at him. "The Durmstrang ship is about to leave," he declared. "But I did not vant to go without saying goodbye."

Viktor wasn't the most tactile person, but he grabbed Harry in a brief, firm hug nonetheless, meeting his gaze intently when they parted. "Var is coming," he said solemnly. "And should you need the aid of Durmstrang, ve vill be happy to assist. As I said; our deputy headmaster is a good man."

Harry nodded. "I'll keep in touch." He cracked a smile. "Maybe we'll play quidditch against each other some day." Viktor chuckled, clapping Harry on the shoulder.

"I vould like that very much, Harry. Very much indeed." It was a pipe dream, a fantasy of a time when war was past, but they could hold onto it all the same.

"What's happening with you and Hermione?" Harry asked curiously. He didn't see the bushy-haired girl around anywhere. Viktor's smile faltered.

"She has promised to write to me, but things haff been... different, lately. I think perhaps she is not the girl I thought she vas." He eyed Harry knowingly. "She is not the friend I thought she vas."

It didn't take a genius to see that Hermione hadn't been anywhere near Harry since the third task. He could imagine how that came across to others. "I'm sorry." Whatever Hermione was to him, Viktor had liked her a lot.

"Vat is it you say here? There are other fish in the sea?" Viktor said, shrugging. "I am young, there is time."

Harry hoped Viktor found someone who truly deserved the strong, incredible man that hid behind the awkward, surly exterior.

The other Durmstrang students called out to their stragglers, and Viktor clapped Harry on the shoulder once more before following, falling into stride beside Boris as they returned to their ship. Soon after, Madame Maxime gathered her students, and they too were headed home. Harry grabbed his trunk and headed towards the doors, joining Neville and Ginny in waiting for the carriages. The twins joined them soon after, George's hair mussed in a way that made Harry snicker.

"Shut it, Potter," George said good-naturedly, elbowing Harry in the side. "I've seen you look worse."

The carriages began to arrive, and Harry stifled a grimace when they ended up sharing one with Ron and Hermione. It was inevitable, when he was with the rest of the Weasleys, but he wished it wouldn't happen. He didn't know what to say to either of them — would they let him just back out of the friendship without issue, or were they still trying to keep hold of him on Dumbledore's orders? He felt like they would have already tried to make amends — again — if they wanted to continue being his friends over the summer. Perhaps they recognised a lost cause, at last. Or they just assumed Harry would be thrown in with them whenever Dumbledore decided what to do with him. As if he would go passively into anything like that.

But he couldn't make any moves until he had talked over his options with Sirius and Remus and Snape. He was playing a very dangerous game.

The seven of them ended up in a train compartment together, though conversation was stilted at best. Harry spent the whole journey looking for an opportunity to get the twins alone, but it didn't happen until the very end, when they were the last ones out of the compartment at King's Cross. "Hey, wait," Harry urged, grabbing George by the arm. He shut the door quickly, raising a privacy ward. School wasn't over yet. "I need your help with something."

He explained his predicament, and the twins' faces grew contemplative. "We'll figure something out," Fred promised. "Can't leave you with those muggles all summer."

"Could be a good one to add to our product line," George agreed, grinning. "I get the feeling you're not the only one who might need a decoy, these days."

All of a sudden, Harry had the most brilliant idea he'd had in a long time.

He threw his trunk open and reached inside, grabbing the sack of galleons he'd thrown in there. He held it out to George. "Take this," he insisted. Both twins stared at him incredulously.

"Harry, mate..."

"I'm serious. Take it." Harry forced the bag into George's hands. "I don't need it, I don't want it, and after Bagman screwed you guys over you could do with it. Consider it an investment in Weasley's Wizard Wheezes. We'll need laughter now more than ever."

He glared at them both until they looked like they were no longer going to argue, and George stashed the bag away in his trunk. Harry grinned triumphantly. "Good. Just don't tell your parents where you got it, alright?" He was bundled in a crushing group hug.

"This won't go to waste, Harry," Fred promised, ruffling his hair.

Despite their lacklustre OWL marks, the Weasley twins were two of the smartest people Harry knew, and he had no doubt that they'd take the wizarding world by storm in the next decade or so. He was glad to know the Triwizard money would be going towards something worthwhile.

They caught up with the others on the platform, and Harry walked with the Weasleys through the barrier, unsurprised to find the Dursleys waiting on the other side. He said his goodbyes and strolled towards his scowling aunt and uncle.

"Come on, boy," Vernon hissed, grabbing him by the collar and shoving him towards the car park. "The sooner we get you home, the sooner we can get rid of you."

"We didn't want to come at all, but that awful boy insisted we keep up the charade. More trouble than you're worth, you are," Petunia told him. Harry refrained from pointing out that that awful boy was now a man in his thirties, smiling down at the empty owl cage sat on top of his trunk. He'd sent Hedwig ahead to Seren Du, not wanting to anger his relatives even more by making them transport a live owl.

Sirius' promise rang in his ears as he was forced into Vernon's car. He would be gone soon. He wouldn't be left with the Dursleys.

He could go home soon.

Chapter 37

To Harry's relief, he didn't have to wait long; Snape arrived at eleven in the morning the first day of summer, and glared at Aunt Petunia while Harry gathered the few things he'd unpacked.

The sight of the enormous manor house eased a tension Harry hadn't even realised he was carrying, but he gave a puzzled frown when Remus was the only one to greet them. "Where's Sirius?"

"Come inside, we'll explain over tea." Remus hugged him, but didn't say anything more until they were comfortably ensconced in the living room, a tea set on the coffee table with a plate full of homemade raspberry scones; Ceri was delighted to have Harry home again.

"First off, Sirius is fine," Remus assured, before Harry could worry too much. "But you might not see much of him this summer. Dumbledore has... persuaded him to offer up one of the other Black family properties as headquarters of the Order of the Phoenix."

Harry had heard a little about the Order, from Remus and Sirius' stories of his parents. Dumbledore's resistance against the darkness. "The Order has re-formed, then?"

Remus nodded. "As soon as Sirius and I left Hogwarts, Dumbledore had us gathering up the old crowd. He asked Sirius if he could use the house maybe three days after Voldemort returned. It all happened very quickly — clearly he's had his plans waiting for a while now." The werewolf didn't look impressed. "We can't tell you exactly where it is — it's under a Fidelius charm — but it's in London. Unfortunately, because Dumbledore has no idea about this place, he believes Sirius has been living on the run for the last year, and has invited him to live at headquarters."

He looked about as pleased with Dumbledore inviting Sirius to live in his own house as Harry did, and even Snape made a face. "He's being watched, too, then," Harry surmised, crestfallen. "Cooped up in that house under Dumbledore's thumb as much as I'm supposed to be at the Dursleys'?"

"That's about the sum of it, yes. Sirius will get away to come here whenever he can — he's been quite happily cultivating a rather grouchy persona, to excuse away shutting himself in his room for hours at a time — but I'm afraid you won't be seeing as much of us all as you did last summer. Albus knows I have my own place, though he doesn't know where it is, and he knows I don't currently have a job, so he expects me to be at headquarters quite often."

"And as far as Albus is concerned, he owns my soul, my body and every minute of my time," Snape cut in with a grimace, "so it's hard to say what he'll be expecting of me this summer."

"Between the three of us, we should manage to always have someone here to keep you company," Remus assured. "But things may be a bit quieter for the next month or so. With any luck, Dumbledore will agree to move you shortly after your birthday, as usual."

"I can keep myself occupied," Harry said, though he couldn't completely hide his disappointment. "I'm just glad to be here."

He claimed one of the scones for himself, then looked up at the two adults on the other sofa. "So how much can you tell me? What's Voldemort up to, do you know yet?" It had only been a week since the night of the third task, but Harry felt like an age had passed in which Voldemort could be gathering strength and numbers.

"I have not yet been summoned, though I suspect I will be soon now that term has ended," Snape told him. "Many of the Dark Lord's old followers have returned to him, and will soon be making overtures towards new ones."

"Has anyone found Karkaroff yet?"

Snape grimaced briefly. "Igor was found, yes. He is... no longer with us."

Harry had expected as much, but it still made him flinch. The man had been creepy, but he didn't deserve whatever awful death he'd been given at the hands of Voldemort and his people.

"Other than that, there's not much to tell," Remus admitted, leaning against the arm of the sofa. He looked weary, though Harry wasn't sure if it was the full moon or just the stress of the last week. "The Order is gathering. The Ministry continues to deny any hint of Voldemort's return — they'll no doubt start firing anyone who's too close to Dumbledore, soon."

"But surely Dumbledore wants as many of his people in the Ministry as possible?" Harry asked, confused. If Dumbledore wanted to keep his hold on the wizarding world, surely he'd need to keep the Ministry under his thumb?

"Oh, he'll keep some of his people in there. Those who manage to hide their allegiance, or are too valuable to fire. But think of it this way, Harry; the Ministry is going to fall, sooner or later. With Fudge at the helm, it's a sinking ship. How will it look if everyone on Albus Dumbledore's side is removed from their jobs, and then the Ministry crumbles?"

It all began to make sense to Harry. "It'll look like Dumbledore's people were the ones keeping it afloat," he realised. "Then when it's all over, the Ministry will be handed to Dumbledore's people to fix it again." The prospect made him nauseous.

"Albus has been playing this game for longer than the three of us have been alive, combined," Snape pointed out, lips in a thin line. "It is dangerous, for us to try and play against him."

"It's a risk worth taking," Harry insisted. "People will die if we don't. I'll die if we don't. I refuse to let him use me or anyone else to further his own gains."

"How have things been going on your end?" Remus questioned, reaching for another scone. "What has the school been like, in the wake of... everything?"

"Honestly, I'm not really sure," Harry admitted. "I kinda kept my head down, after everything. I'm sure Professor Snape's already told you about what Dumbledore said at the leaving feast?" Both adults nodded. "So yeah, there's that. There's definitely plenty of people who aren't convinced by it all. Who knows what they'll think of it by next year. I need to owl Susan as soon as it's safe — she said Neville told all the heirs what happened in the graveyard, but I didn't manage to meet with them before school broke up. Everyone's still in shock over Cedric, I think." Harry tried not to think about it too much, though that was hard with the nightmares. If he let the gaping hole in his heart take over, he'd be useless.

"Understandable." Remus ran a hand through his hair. "It looks like we're playing a waiting game right now, for the most part."

"Well I don't want to twiddle my thumbs while I wait," Harry insisted. "I want to get as much done as I can this summer."

Ceri popped into the room to summon them down for lunch, and Remus insisted on no war-talk at the table. Luckily, Harry was distracted by the arrival of Sirius.

"No one's home," he assured, rounding the table to squeeze Harry's shoulders, and then drop down into the seat beside him. Ceri waved her hand, and a fourth plate floated over. "I assume Remus filled you in?"

"You're living at Order headquarters now," Harry said, frowning only slightly. "Who else is around there?"

"I'm the only one there full-time," Sirius explained, talking between mouthfuls of food. "But there's been Order business every day since Dumbledore claimed the place. Not every meeting holds everyone. And there's been talk of the whole Weasley family moving in now school's over. Albus says it's because their house is too easy to reach, and everyone knows they're a light-aligned family, but really I'm betting he wants his little puppets nice and close to the action, so they can drip-feed you information without telling you anything important at all."

"He's got another thing coming if he thinks Ron and Hermione will tell me so much as the bloody weather these days," Harry said with a snort. "Has he not figured out that we don't talk to each other anymore?"

"Ah, but teenage friendships are fickle, and you'll need all the friends you can get in these trying times," Sirius replied in his best Albus Dumbledore impression. "You'll have to watch out for those two. If anyone's going to make Dumbledore realise you've shed your spells, it's them."

"No war talk at the table, Sirius," Remus warned. Sirius rolled his eyes, but obediently continued eating until his plate was empty. Harry quickly followed, wanting to get back to the important stuff as soon as possible.

Once everyone was finished they returned to the living room, Sirius sitting on the sofa beside Harry with his feet tucked up underneath him.

"I want to train," Harry declared. "Harder than last summer. I want to be as prepared as possible when the war comes. I know I'm young, but I'm part of this, and I'll need to know as much as I can."

"We know," Remus agreed, and Harry blinked. He'd been prepared to fight for that one. "There's no point in keeping you tucked away and hoping you'll stay out of trouble. It hasn't worked once yet," he added with a brief grin. "The schedule might be a little more erratic, but we can work with you like we did last year. Severus will probably cover most of it; if anyone knows what you'll need to know to fight Voldemort, it's him."

"We will do away with time devoted to practicing schoolwork," Snape told him. "I have faith in your ability to pass your OWLs without a summer of extra preparation. I will teach you what I can, but you must be willing to learn. All of it." His dark eyes bored into Harry's. "Not all of what I have to teach you will be light. Sometimes you can only fight darkness with darkness."

"I'll learn it," Harry said. "I trust you." Snape wouldn't teach him anything that wasn't useful. He needed to know how the other side worked in order to fight them.

"Once we've learnt what the Order and Voldemort's first moves are, it'll be easier to plan more long-term," Sirius said. "Getting rid of Voldemort won't be simple, but there's got to be a way, and I'd bet anything that Dumbledore knows what it is. He won't tell anyone, of course, but maybe if he leaves enough hints we'll be able to figure it out."

"Surely whacking him with a killing curse will do the trick?" Harry asked, brow furrowed. The three adults looked grim.

"The Dark Lord has devoted a lot of time towards the study of immortality," Snape revealed. "The fact that he managed to return at all means he must have managed it to some degree. Whatever magic he has performed must be reversed before we can be rid of him."

The prospect of Voldemort being immortal had Harry's lunch sitting heavy in his stomach. "Fantastic. Of course, the secret lies with Dumbledore. Merlin forbid he tell anyone just in case they steal his glory from him."

"We'll find a way," Sirius vowed.

"How much am I letting Dumbledore control me this year?" Harry asked. "He's bound to have some idea that the Compulsion charm hasn't stuck by now. And I'll be honest, I really don't think I can force myself to go back to playing nice." He'd made too many overt moves away from that behaviour, and if he went back to it he might not be able to do what he needed to do.

"Let him think you've simply grown too old and too strong for the Compulsion to stick," Remus suggested. "If my suspicions are correct, he's got bigger things on his plate right now, but as long as he can keep you close and downtrodden he'll be happy. He might actually prefer you isolating yourself from Ron and Hermione, as long as he doesn't see you gain too many new friends. He'll want you to feel like you have nothing worth living for, whenever he's ready to have you sacrifice yourself."

It was a grim time indeed when they were talking about it so plainly. “As long as he doesn’t find out I’ve lost the magical block,” Harry replied. “How do I make sure he doesn’t find out?”

“The check was easy for the goblins, but it’s a complicated bit of magic for wizards. He’d need to have you alone and unaware for at least thirty minutes,” Snape explained. “Don’t end up in the Hospital Wing, and you should manage to avoid it.”

Harry had managed to stay out of Pomfrey’s care for most of the previous year — up until the end, at least. “I’ll try my best.”

“You’ll have to be very careful meeting the other heirs, this year,” Sirius said. “The closer the lot of you get to coming of age, the more Albus will want to keep you separated. Isn’t one of them seventeen now? The Warrington kid?”

“Yeah. His uncle won’t let him take the family seat, though.” Harry had a thought, and he turned to Snape. “What’s going to happen with the Slytherins? All the ones whose parents are Death Eaters?”

“As of yet, nothing,” Snape assured. “The Dark Lord is not yet desperate enough to want to mark underage wizards. They will have their roles to play at school, of course — some more openly than others. And I too must play my role. But Slytherins are nothing if not resourceful.”

Harry was even more glad that he’d managed to get to almost all of the Slytherin heirs before Voldemort returned. There were other students with Death Eater parents, of course, but the ones in his year made up a solid chunk of them, and they needed to know they had options. With any luck, the younger years would avoid the war, and the older years... Harry prayed they could keep the casualties to a minimum.

“We’ll try and keep the inter-house relations strong with the Slytherins, especially the younger ones,” he promised. “Those who have to play their parts are one thing, but the reputation of Slytherin house is bad enough as it is. The last thing we want is a bunch of eleven and twelve year-olds thinking the rest of the wizarding world hates them. That’s how we got in this mess to begin with.” And that too was Dumbledore’s fault. Cunning and ambitious never meant evil before.

“I will protect my charges the best I can,” Snape said. “Unfortunately, as the Dark Lord must believe me loyal, those who are questioning their loyalty would never come to me. Having other avenues for them would be appreciated.”

“Maybe Blaise could be that for them. His mother is neutral, everyone knows that. I’ll owl him about it as soon as I can.” Harry had a long, long list of owls to send as soon as possible.

“Speaking of owls, do you know if the twins have made any progress on solving our little monitoring problem?” Sirius asked. Harry shrugged.

“No idea, I only managed to ask them on the train. I suppose I just have to hope no one owls me until they figure it out. Am I being monitored already?”

"Yes; ten people on a rotating schedule, to watch you all hours of the day. You got lucky; Albus almost put Moody on the rotation, but then I suppose he found another job for him," Remus said. Harry winced; Moody and his magical eye would've made it very hard to hide Harry's absence. "Sadly, he wouldn't put me in for it. Said it would be unfair to make me watch you when I'm not allowed to speak to you."

"Basically he can't trust you not to give the game away," Harry said ruefully. "He's not completely daft, then."

"No, it seems not," Remus agreed.

Sirius glanced down at his watch and grimaced. "I should probably get back to headquarters; someone usually pops in around five to make sure I'm not up to mischief."

"They expect a lack of mischief? You really have got them fooled, haven't you?" Harry grinned. Sirius barked out a laugh.

"For the most part. Twelve years in Azkaban gives me an excuse for all kinds of weird personality quirks."

"What about the quirks you had before you went to Azkaban?" Snape drawled. "What's your excuse for those?"

Sirius laughed harder. He leaned over to give Harry a hug, ruffling his hair. "I'll try and get away again when I can, but use the mirror or send Ceri if you need me urgently." He bid goodbye to Remus and Snape, then called Ceri to take him back.

"You should go unpack your things, Harry," Remus suggested. "I think we've said about all we can for now."

Harry obediently left the adults alone and retrieved his trunk from the hallway, levitating it up to his room. He turned his Wireless on to listen to music while he unpacked, a smile on his face at being back in his own bedroom. It was good to be home.

.-. .

Harry was ready to dive right into training the next day, but Remus had other ideas. "It's your first real day of summer, cub," he insisted over breakfast, "and I know once you start it'll be all you do. Take today to have fun, get used to being back here. Go fuss over Buckbeak, he's missed you." His face softened knowingly. "You haven't had any real length of peace and quiet to process what happened since the third task, have you?"

Harry's heart twisted painfully. "That was mostly intentional." He'd had one evening at the Dursleys, in which he'd read a book to keep himself distracted from the hollowness in his chest.

Remus snorted, shaking his head. "As bad as your mother, you are; she didn't like facing her grief either. Her dad died right around exam time in sixth year, and she worked right through it until she about had a breakdown." He put a hand on Harry's back, rubbing soothingly. "Take some time to let yourself feel things. You'll appreciate it later on."

"What if I just do my homework all day?" Harry suggested hopefully. Remus levelled him with a flat look.

"I'll have Ceri confiscate all your textbooks. No homework until you've had fun for a bit." He blinked, his own words echoing in his head. "I don't think that's how grounding is supposed to work. You're a weird kid."

"So I've been told." Harry thought about arguing further, but Remus was pretty set on it, and it had been a while since he'd been flying. His Firebolt had been sorely neglected since Christmas. "Fine. Can I go fly? Will you be home today?" Snape had already left on Order business, and Harry wasn't supposed to go flying if no one was in the house, just in case something bad happened.

"I'll be here until five; there's an Order meeting tonight, so we'll all be out for an hour or so, but we'll be back in time for dinner."

"That's fine," Harry assured. He could handle a couple of hours alone. "I'll see you at lunch. Thanks for breakfast, Ceri!" he added to the house elf, who beamed at him.

Some of the tension in Harry's shoulders left him as soon as he kicked off into the air, and he closed his eyes against the breeze as he flew in slow laps around the half pitch. The last time he'd been on his broom, he'd beaten Viktor Krum. The last time he'd been on his broom he'd been with Cedric.

Part of Harry hated Remus for forcing him to take stock of his emotions like this, but he knew it was for the best. At school everything had been so loud; even when people were giving him space, the whispers had still been present. He hadn't felt any right to mourn Cedric when there were people like Cho and Patrick around; people who had known Cedric for years, who had loved him.

He still didn't feel much of a right to mourn Cedric now. Not when it was his fault the boy was dead.

Everyone he'd said as much to had yelled at him for thinking it, but he didn't see how it could be any other way. The Cup was a portkey because of Harry, Cedric had touched the Cup because of Harry; he was dead because of Harry.

Harry wondered if it would have hurt less if he hadn't spent half the year getting to know Cedric, becoming friends with him, competing against and alongside him. If Cedric was just some random Hufflepuff student, would he still feel a tidal wave of grief every time he so much as thought about him?

It was so unfair. Cedric was one of the best of them. He was Hogwarts champion for a reason, but more than that, he had been good. So Hufflepuff it had driven people mad sometimes, in the best of ways. He'd hoped to join the aurors when he left school. He'd wanted to fight Voldemort — he'd told Harry, one night, that he would be at his side when the fight came.

But the fight got to him far, far too soon.

Harry let out a scream that was lost in the howl of the wind as he sped up, and he realised he was crying. He hadn't cried since the night in the Hospital Wing.

The hole in his heart was back, bigger than ever, and Harry imagined reaching into his chest and grabbing the edges and just pulling until the hole was so big it consumed him entirely, just let all his grief and rage spill out until it was all that was left of him. Sometimes, it felt like it had already done so.

He was glad, so very glad, that he wasn't being left at the Dursleys. It was bad enough being there for a regular summer; if he'd been left alone with his muggle relatives and all this grief and anger, he surely would've gone mad. Nothing to do but sit and worry at the edges of the hole, fall deeper and deeper inside it, let the guilt swallow him up.

It surprised him when he heard a bell ring in the distance — how was it lunchtime already? He'd barely even started! But apparently he'd been flying through his grief for far longer than he realised. His hands were clenched so tight around his broom it ached to move them, but when his feet touched the ground the hole in his heart felt a little bit smaller.

It wasn't magically better. Like Madam Pomfrey had said, there was no potion or spell that could fix that. But it was a start.

He was glad it was just Remus in the kitchen when he came in; he didn't think he was quite ready for Snape to see him in that state. The werewolf's face softened, and he held out his arms. Harry didn't hesitate to fall into them, burying his face in the man's chest. "I'm so sorry, cub," Remus murmured, stroking his hair. "I know he was a friend of yours, and he was far, far too young. I'm sorry."

Harry thought about his own grief, and thought about what it must have been like for Remus when Harry's parents died. They hadn't been much older than Cedric, and they were practically his family. "How did you do it?" he asked croakily. "How did you move on, when you lost Mum and Dad?"

"Honestly, for a long while, I didn't," Remus admitted. "I went through a bit of a rough patch. But eventually I realised that Lily would've kicked my arse six ways to Sunday if she saw what I'd let myself become, and James would have been right behind her." He held Harry close. "I know it sounds hard, but the best thing you can do for those you've lost is live. Carry on living, even when they couldn't, because that life is precious and you never know when it's going to run out. It never goes away, not truly. There are some days I can hardly breathe for how much I miss James and Lily. But those days get further apart, in time. Especially now I have you back in my life."

Harry was silent for a long moment. "More people are going to die, aren't they?"

"It's very likely, yes," Remus confirmed, voice tinged with sadness. "War and death go hand in hand. But if we're smart, and we're lucky, then the deaths will be minimal. And if we're very lucky indeed, everyone we care most about will survive the war. But I can make no promises." He leaned down to kiss Harry's hair. "You can't blame yourself for every casualty of war, Harry. Even the ones you think you could have prevented. That way lies madness, and I love you far too much to let you do that to yourself."

"I love you too, Moony." Harry still marvelled at how easy it was to say those words and mean them, after years of having no one to say them to at all. He had so, so much to be grateful for, these days. "I'll... I'll try." Guilt was a hard creature to shake, but he was working on it.

"That's all I can ask." Remus smiled, patting him on the back and guiding him towards the table. "Now sit down and eat, you must be starving."

.-. .

Remus left for the Order meeting at five, and Harry entertained himself by reorganising his bookshelf; he was slowly filling in the space, and was eager to buy more now he was home. He'd almost run out of fiction books entirely. When Ceri called him down for dinner, he was slightly disappointed not to see Sirius, and angry once he heard the reason why.

"The Weasley family and Hermione Granger are moving into headquarters tonight," Remus told him, grimacing faintly. "It's earlier than we expected. It'll be harder for Sirius to get away, but he promises he'll come over as often as he can."

"What are they all doing there, then? Surely they aren't involved in the Order; half of them are still in school!" Harry couldn't see Mrs Weasley letting her kids get involved in a war council, Dumbledore or no.

"Oh, certainly not," Remus confirmed. "They'll be cleaning mostly, I expect; the house is in a bit of a state. The twins weren't happy at being left out of meetings, since they're of-age, but Molly overruled them."

"I have no doubt they'll find a way to eavesdrop by the end of the month," Snape pointed out dryly. Harry snorted.

"By the end of the week, more like," he remarked. "They're very quick when they're motivated properly." He stabbed a roast potato. "What else is the Order up to?"

"Not much, in all honesty. We're still just gathering people and getting the word out. Albus has a few people in the Ministry trying to weed out those who aren't loyal to Fudge, but it's slow going."

"Several members of your guard seem concerned that you have not left the house," Snape told him. "Albus suggested you were merely grieving. He isn't worried about your lack of movement; with any luck, it'll stay that way."

"It's only been a few days yet," Harry said doubtfully. People wouldn't buy the grieving excuse for much more than a week or two, surely?

"I didn't manage to speak to the twins, but now they're living at headquarters it should be easier. They seemed surprised to see Sirius there; I think they thought he'd be with you," Remus added.

"They know I wasn't at the Dursleys' last summer. They probably assumed I'd be more with Sirius than you; they know Sirius is my godfather, they don't know you're practically my other godfather." That proclamation made a brief smile flicker across the werewolf's face.

"Well, if you want to send a message to them, let us know and we'll find a way to get it to them."

"You should tell them you're the Marauders," Harry suggested with a grin. "They'd do anything for you, then."

"We'll save that for when we really need a favour," Remus returned. "Or when Sirius starts going stir-crazy and needs a distraction."

"Merlin help us all if those three ever team up," Snape sighed. "It's a small mercy that I only have to survive one more year of them at school."

"It'll be quiet without the twins around," Harry agreed, though Snape was probably happier about that than he was. "So. I can start my training tomorrow, right? What's first?" Taking the day to relax had been good, and sorely needed, but he was eager to start doing things.

"You'll find out in the morning," Remus said, shaking his head with an indulgent smile. "If we tell you now, you'll spend the rest of the night reading up on the subject and pestering us to start early."

"Well, yeah. What else am I supposed to do all evening? You forbid me from doing homework." Snape raised an eyebrow at that, and Remus flushed.

"Stop making me sound like a monster for wanting you to enjoy your summer freedom," he argued, rolling his eyes. "If you're that desperate to write an essay, I won't stop you."

Harry shrugged; he didn't actually want to do his homework yet. "I'm open to suggestions."

"You're a brat, is what you are," Remus growled playfully. "You can play chess with me, and tell me how things have been going with Draco. Getting second-hand information from Sirius probably isn't as accurate as I'd like it to be."

Harry couldn't help but smile at the mention of his boyfriend, though it was lessened by the fact that he hadn't managed to spend time with him in the last week of term. He was desperate to write to him. He'd do that in the morning, if it was safe.

"Must I be present for that conversation?" Snape asked despairingly. Remus smirked.

“Well, you’re welcome to go to bed early,” he drawled. “But we get so little time together these days...”

Harry laughed as Snape glared at his partner, unimpressed at the blatant attempt at emotional manipulation.

And yet, he followed them to the living room, letting Remus lean back against his legs as he sat on the floor to play chess with Harry, pretending to ignore them while he read a book and Harry gushed about Draco. Harry knew better, though; he could tell the man was listening, as his lips quirked whenever Harry mentioned something Draco did that was particularly Slytherin.

He cared. He just refused to admit it. But Harry was starting to learn his tells.

Chapter 38

Harry woke up early the next morning, keen to start his training even though he knew it wouldn't start until after breakfast. He filled the time with his Charms homework, and met Remus and Snape down in the kitchen for breakfast.

"Now will you tell me what the plan is for today?" he pleaded, turning hopeful green eyes on Remus. The werewolf sighed.

"I suppose," he agreed, a smile creeping across his lips. "Unlike last summer, we won't divide the day into subjects; there are too many different things to teach you, and they all overlap. After lunch we'll start you off with some duelling practice, see where you stand there. But this morning I'm going to test you on Arithmancy and Runes. You have been keeping up your study, haven't you?"

"I have." Harry had spent a lot of time in the last week of school working on them; it was a good way to keep his mind busy. "So, duelling? What else?"

"If you are going to be fighting Death Eaters, there are many curses you will need to become familiar with," Snape said. "They won't stick to stunning and disarming you. I'll be teaching you to recognise some of the more common dark curses by sight and feel, and even to cast many of them yourself. There may be times when you don't want to risk your opponent escaping unharmed."

Harry swallowed sharply. He got the feeling it was going to be a very different duelling practice to the ones he'd had last summer. "I can do that."

"I will also be trying to drill some strategy into your Gryffindor skull," Snape continued. "If you are going to be leading the resistance against both Dumbledore and the Dark Lord, you need to learn to think like they think, to beat them to their mark. You will not win this war if you are one step behind the whole time, on either front."

"You're going to teach me to be a Slytherin," Harry realised with a smirk. Snape's eyes glittered.

"You keep insisting you would have done well in my house. It's time for you to prove it."

Harry could hardly wait.

.-.

He passed Remus' Arithmancy and Runes tests with flying colours, and the werewolf beamed with pride when he handed Harry back his papers shortly after lunch. "Well done, cub. If you keep it up, you'll get Os in your OWLs with no problem."

At last, Snape took Harry into the duelling room, rolling up the sleeves of his dark blue shirt. "Your duel with the Dark Lord was a mockery," he declared. "He was toying with you. You won't be so lucky next time. You need to learn to protect yourself from all sides, from whatever spell they may send your way — the Dark Lord may insist that he be the one to kill you, but that won't stop his servants trying to harm you, or your friends."

Harry drew his wand, readying himself at the end of the duelling strip. In all his practice for the third task, he'd gotten pretty good at both defensive and offensive magic. Nowhere near the level of Snape, but he was fairly confident he could hold his own. He'd been doing well at the end of last summer.

Snape faced him, bowing over his wand. "Let's see how much you remember."

The duel began and ended in less than a minute flat. Harry was on his back, staring at the ceiling and wondering how he'd gotten there. A hand appeared in his vision. "Get up, try again."

"You were going easy on me last summer," Harry accused, allowing the man to pull him to his feet. Snape smirked.

"Of course I was, you were thirteen. Things are different now. Death Eaters won't go easy on you because you're a child."

The second duel, Harry managed to last almost five minutes. "Better," Snape approved, hoisting him up again. "Tell me what the problem here is."

"You're still using schoolyard spells." Snape hadn't sent anything stronger than an Impediment jinx his way. The Slytherin nodded.

"I will continue to do so until I can be confident you know how to dodge. Several of the darker hexes cannot be blocked by your average Shield charm. I will, of course, teach you more advanced shields, but should you find yourself in battle with an unfamiliar spell headed your way, it's always safer to dodge than to shield and hope it works." Snape's smirk widened. "Your quidditch reflexes will come in handy here, Potter. Again."

.-. .

Harry and Snape duelled until dinner, by which time both of them were sweaty, but Snape actually had an expression on his face that Harry might generously consider a smile.

They had taken breaks, to let Harry catch his breath, but even those had been spent with Snape demonstrating some of the curses and hexes Harry might come across in a real battle. By the end of the session, Harry was getting pretty good at dodging most of the spells Snape sent his way.

"Tomorrow I will show you a variant of the Shield charm that will work for stronger spells, but takes more concentration to cast, which is why it's not commonly taught." Snape passed Harry one of the glasses of water Ceri had brought, and Harry drank deeply. "Have you been keeping up your Occlumency shields?"

"Yes, sir." Harry didn't dare let them waver with Dumbledore about.

“Good. Being able to clear your mind and compartmentalise is an essential skill when duelling; a true battle requires you to be paying attention to a dozen things at once. Emotions cannot get in the way — a split second of distraction is all it takes to kill you.”

“Have you ever duelled against Death Eaters, sir?” Harry asked curiously. Snape’s lips thinned.

“We were often encouraged to duel each other to sharpen our skills. The Dark Lord didn’t like us holding back on each other; he said if we were weak enough to die, we didn’t deserve to serve him. I learned not to be weak.”

Harry sincerely doubted Snape had ever been weak, but he held his tongue.

They bumped into Remus in the kitchen when they went to put their glasses away, and the werewolf sniffed the air, then made an exaggerated face of disgust. “You two smell like you’ve been busy. Good session?”

“Potter isn’t as terrible as I’d feared,” Snape replied, the closest thing he’d give to a compliment. Remus grinned.

“Glad to hear it. Go wash up for dinner, both of you; I’ll lose my appetite if I have to smell that while I eat. Worse than James and Sirius after quidditch.”

Harry laughed, obediently heading out of the kitchen to take a shower. Snape didn’t follow, and he refused to think too hard about why.

. . .

Training continued the next day, though it finished early due to another Order meeting. Snape set Harry the task of reading up on the pros and cons of different types of shields, so he happily whiled away the hour in the library, with Ceri occasionally popping in to check on him while she made dinner. She took the responsibility of looking after Harry while he was home alone very seriously.

Remus and Snape returned just in time for dinner, and Remus took something out of his pocket and set it on the table in front of Harry. It was a smooth grey stone, about the size of a chicken’s egg. “Uh... thanks?”

“It’s from the twins,” Remus said, as if that explained anything. “They said it should solve your owl problem, at least. It’s supposed to take on your magical signature strongly enough that it’ll fool owls into thinking your delivery address is wherever you set it. They’ve been working on it for a while, apparently; ever since Ginny got all that hate mail from that Skeeter article. You can charge it up, then we’ll have Ceri pop it over to the Dursleys, and any owls sent to you will go there, so your watchers won’t wonder why you aren’t getting any post.”

“But what about all the people I want to owl me without Dumbledore knowing about it?” Harry asked, thinking of Draco and all the heirs. Not only would it be terribly inconvenient to have all those owls going to the Dursleys, it would raise far too many questions.

“Sirius had an idea about that. He said you should write to the twins and Ginny, telling them the Dursleys have forbid you from getting letters all summer. It’ll tie in nicely with the story that you’re locked in your room. Then we can give it a week or so, and if owls stop coming, we’ll pick up the stone and deactivate it, then you can get mail here instead. It just means you can’t owl any of your other friends until you’re clear.”

“I didn’t know for sure if I’d be able to owl them at all,” Harry pointed out. He picked up the stone, running his fingers over it. “This is brilliant! I knew they’d figure something out.” He pocketed the stone. “I’ll write to them after dinner. Although,” he faltered, “if I tell them not to write to me, does that mean I won’t be able to write to them all summer? Surely they’re not allowed to send owls off to whoever, living at Order headquarters.”

“Severus and I can play delivery owl for any letters you want to send them.” Snape cleared his throat pointedly. “Oh, alright, I’ll play delivery owl,” Remus corrected exasperatedly.

After dinner, Harry followed Remus’ instructions to push his magic into the stone until it glowed faintly, then they sent it off with Ceri to put in his room at Privet Drive. “How will we know if it works?” Harry asked.

“Ceri can keep an eye out for any approaching owls, and just pop you back there when you need to open the window. That’ll help convince your watchers you’re still there, too. Your aunt and uncle never have to know,” Remus said. “And if owls show up here, well, we know it hasn’t worked, and we’ll think of something else.”

Harry had faith in the twins. The stone would work.

He grabbed his writing supplies and brought them down to the living room, biting his lip as he thought about what to write. It was a letter that the Order would definitely read; he had to make it believable.

Dear Fred, George and Ginny,

I hope you’re having a good start to your summer! Mine has been... not great. The Dursleys are off with me again, so I’m stuck in my room for the foreseeable future. It’s not so bad — it’s too hot to go outside much anyway.

Speaking of the Dursleys, they’re not happy about the idea of me having owls coming and going — they said some of the neighbours noticed last summer, and they got too many questions. The only reason they’re letting me let Hedwig out now is that I promised to send her to you asking you not to write to me this summer. It won’t be forever; hopefully I’ll get to come stay at the Burrow soon. We just might have to celebrate my birthday a bit late.

If you’re with anyone else who might want to write to me, could you pass on the message? I don’t want a repeat of the summer before second year.

Hopefully see you all soon!

Harry

That should do it. The remainder of the summer before second year would also be a good way to convince people the Dursleys would lock him up all summer; and maybe make a few people think twice about the kind of conditions Dumbledore was willing to leave a teenage boy in.

Harry hurried up to the Owlery, where Hedwig flew down to perch on his shoulder, butting his cheek with her face. “Yeah, yeah, I’ve finally got some work for you.” She hadn’t been out except to hunt since he’d left Hogwarts; she’d be glad for the chance to really stretch her wings. “Here you go. Fly safe, girl.” He secured the letter and let Ceri transport Hedwig to leave from Privet Drive, then went back downstairs to write the letter he really wanted to send the three Weasleys.

Dear Fred, George and Ginny,

As you can probably assume, I’m not at the Dursleys’ house. I’m somewhere a whole lot better. I hear you’re not in your usual place, either. Hope that’s going well for you.

Fred, George, the stone is in place and hopefully we’ll test it with your return letter with Hedwig. Maybe Sirius can send one too with whatever owl he’s got with him, just to see if it works for owls other than her.

If you can convince everyone not to write to me, I’ll turn it off and be able to write to some of our other friends without anyone questioning me. Remus has agreed to be the go between for any letters between us. He’s living here too, when he’s not where you are.

I speak to Sirius most days through other means, and he keeps me pretty well updated on what’s going on there, but let me know if anything interesting happens. What are Ron and Hermione up to these days? Have you seen much of Dumbledore?

Ginny, if the twins haven’t suggested it already, you should try and learn Occlumency over the summer. Ask them to explain it to you. But it’ll be safer if you know it, with Dumbledore around. Until then, don’t look him in the eye.

Give Sirius a hug from me. I hope you’re all doing well.

Love,

Harry

He rolled it up, sealing it with a tap of his wand. “Would you give that to the twins next time you’re at headquarters?” he requested, holding it out to Remus. Remus nodded, tucking it into his cardigan pocket.

“Will do. I’ll probably be over there tomorrow for a bit; check up on how your guard is doing. I’m awfully concerned about you, y’know, you never leave your room,” he said with a wink, making Harry grin. “Fifteen more minutes, then off to bed, alright? It’s getting late, and you need your sleep.”

The gentle chiding was so normal, so automatic, that Harry was breathless with emotion for a second. He imagined a life in which he'd grown up like this; with Remus and Sirius and Snape, in a house full of love. He'd thought he was over that childish wish. Apparently not.

He took a steady breath, hoping Remus hadn't noticed. Snape was eyeing him with an unreadable look, and Harry didn't meet the man's gaze.

At least he had it now. Better late than never.

.-.-.-.

A few days later, Harry was surprised by Sirius' arrival shortly after lunch, the man bursting into the library and interrupting Harry's lesson with Remus. "The Order think I'm sulking in my room about not being able to bring you to headquarters," he said by way of greeting, ruffling Harry's hair. "I reckon that gives me at least two hours. Mind if I take over, Moony?" He pulled a book from the pocket of his robe, and Remus' eyebrows rose, a smirk flitting across his lips.

"It's time, is it? By all means, go ahead; we can pick this up tomorrow."

"Time? Time for what?" Harry asked, trying to see the title of the book. Sirius hid it behind his back.

"You remember last summer, when you promised you'd keep up your grades? You didn't have exams this year, but Severus assures me you're doing well in all your classes, and Moony showed me your Arithmancy and Runes tests from the other day. I think it's time I held up my end of the bargain."

It took Harry to remember the exact promise he'd made, but when it clicked, his jaw dropped. "You'll teach me to be an animagus?" he asked excitedly. Sirius tossed him the book, and Harry caught it reflexively.

A Complete Guide to the Animagus Transformation. It looked old, the edges a little worn. "This is the book your dad and I used when we learnt. There's a few more books in the library here on the subject, but this should teach you everything you need to know."

Harry's heart stuttered; his dad had used this book. His dad had studied these pages, read it over and over, maybe even made notes inside. His touch became even more reverent. "Can we start now?"

"That's what I'm here for!" Sirius agreed, dropping into the chair beside Harry. "I'll warn you, it's a bit boring at first. Finding your form can take a bit of time, though it's easier if you've already got a good base in Occlumency." He reached to open the book to the first chapter; Finding Your Form.

Harry read quickly. Finding an animagus form involved a lot of meditation to prepare, and then entering some sort of trance with some potion fumes in the air to actually find the form itself. "Moony brewed the potion for us last time, but Severus said he'll do it," Sirius informed him. "So it should be ready by Saturday. Think you can meditate enough by then?"

Harry would meditate continuously until Saturday if it meant finding out his animagus form.

Sirius explained the basics to him, and sat opposite him to help him through it to begin with. “You can’t just think about being an animagus,” he said softly, his hands in Harry’s. Harry’s eyes were closed, and his breathing was steady. “You have to let your magic do the talking. Breathe into it, let it search your mind until it can find the form waiting to be unlocked. Everyone has one; some are just a bit shit.” Harry snickered, his concentration broken, and he opened one eye to glare at Sirius. “Oops, sorry,” he said with a grin.

“Don’t expect it to happen instantly. These things take time,” Remus murmured.

Harry tried to focus, do what Sirius and the book said; let his magic reach within him. But it was a lot easier said than done. After a while, he began to get a headache, so he opened his eyes and told Sirius as much.

“Good, that means you’re doing it right,” Sirius assured. “Like Moony said, it takes time. You’ve got five days before the potion will be ready, and we don’t have to do it as soon as it’s brewed; it’ll keep for a month. There’s no rush to this, Harry.” He glanced over Harry’s shoulder, and frowned. “You alright there, Moons?”

Harry turned around, catching Remus quickly wiping at his eyes. “Yes, yes, I’m fine,” he insisted. “It’s just... Merlin, it’s like looking in a pensieve.” Sirius’ mouth twisted in a grimace, but he covered it with a smile.

“It can’t be, I was way better looking when I was sixteen,” he insisted jovially. “And Prongsy was never that short.” He got to his feet, striding over to Remus and pressing their foreheads together for a minute. “If James can’t teach him, he’d be happy to know we are.”

“Do you think I’ll be a stag, like my dad?” Harry asked softly, not wanting to interrupt their moment. Both men turned to look at him.

“I don’t think so. James needed those antlers to hold his massive ego,” Sirius joked, making Remus choke on a laugh. “It wouldn’t surprise me if you’re something with wings, the way you are on a broom.”

“That would be cool,” Harry agreed, but it didn’t feel quite right. Privately, he hoped he was something that could run with Moony and Padfoot on full moons. He wanted to be part of that.

Sirius insisted that Harry shouldn’t push through his headache to continue, so they gave up on the meditation for now. Instead, Harry pleaded for stories about Sirius and his dad learning to transform.

“When you start working on the transformation itself, it comes in stages, yeah?” Sirius said, grinning. Remus groaned; he knew where the story was going. “So your dad, right, he was dead set on transforming before me, so he’d work on it any spare minute he got. Including in the dorm between meals. And one day, I hear a crash, so I run up to the dorm thinking he’s become a great big stag in the middle of the room, only to find him perfectly human but for the massive set of antlers on his head, all tangled up in his bed curtains!” Sirius howled with laughter at the memory, shaking his head. “It took me and Moony both to get him out of there, and then he could barely stand up, the antlers were so heavy. We had to go to dinner like that and pretend it was a prank gone wrong.”

“He didn’t manage to get rid of them until about one in the morning,” Remus added, chuckling.

“Not as bad as the tail I got stuck with for about two days,” Sirius pointed out ruefully. “It was a nightmare! I couldn’t sit properly in class, people thought I had some sort of medical problem.”

“Nah, Robin Waters just told everyone he shagged you bow-legged,” Remus informed him. Sirius’ eyebrows shot up.

“Did he, now? That explains so much.” He snickered to himself. “Anyway, Harry, the moral of the story is, be careful when you practice, and make sure you’ve got an alibi if you do get stuck with unexpected animal parts. Preferably a better alibi than I apparently did.” He flushed at that, and Harry laughed.

“Noted.” He couldn’t wait to start working on the transformation itself. Saturday couldn’t come soon enough!

....

Severus should’ve known the peace wouldn’t last. When the first week of July passed by without so much as a twitch from his Dark Mark, he thought he’d managed to avoid it, but then it burned when he was in the middle of brewing a potion, and he swore softly.

He took the coward’s way out, telling Ceri to let Remus know where he’d gone. Then he donned his robe and mask, walked to the property line, and disapparated.

It surprised him, how easy it was to fall back into that role. He’d expected difficulty clearing his thoughts, drawing up that darkness within him that had drawn him to Voldemort to begin with. There was so much light in his life these days. But with the knowledge that that light was on the line if he should fail, by the time he walked up the steps to Malfoy Manor he was a perfect loyal Death Eater, and always had been.

Seeing the Dark Lord again was an eye-opening experience. Harry had described his twisted, snake-like appearance, but Severus hadn’t realised it was so grotesque. He didn’t look human anymore.

“I have stayed close to Dumbledore, my Lord. The old fool believes me loyal to him, but I only serve you. I knew when you returned you would need someone at the school, someone in the headmaster’s good graces. I positioned myself where I thought it best to turn young minds to your cause.” The words came easy. The screams came easier. Even when the Dark Lord was pleased with your work, he’d still Crucio you just to remind you of what could happen should that change.

"It's a shame you weren't able to save my loyal servant from the dementors," Voldemort hissed, his red eyes surveying Severus as he kneeled on the floor, shaking. "But he told me how much Dumbledore trusted you. He even began to doubt you himself, but I knew the truth. You have always been one of my most loyal servants, Severus."

"I am honoured to remain so, my Lord."

The meeting was short, and Severus was glad for it. The Dark Lord just wanted to reconnect; assess Severus' loyalty, and instruct him to report back with any information on Dumbledore or Harry Potter. Severus felt he got off rather lightly, all things considered. He could still walk away under his own power, after all, even if he was bleeding from a few places.

Remus was waiting on the lawn when he apparated back to Seren Du, his dressing gown wrapped around him and a worried frown on his tired face. It was dark, but the lights were still on in the house. "Oh, Severus," the Gryffindor murmured, hurrying to wind Severus' arm over his shoulders and help him inside.

"Where's Potter?" Severus didn't want the boy seeing him like this.

"In his room, I sent him to bed. What do you need?"

"Nerve Tonic. Regular strength." The line of Remus' shoulders relaxed slightly; Severus wasn't in need of the extra strength tonic yet.

"Ceri." At Remus' soft call, the house elf appeared. "Run a bath for Severus, please, and fetch a bottle of his Nerve Tonic." Ceri nodded, and moments later small hands were pressing a vial into Severus' empty palm. He checked the label, then downed it, not even flinching at the taste. It had been a while since he'd needed one of those.

They stumbled up the stairs together, Remus using his werewolf strength to keep Severus upright, and by the time they made it to the bathroom the bath was full and steaming. Severus rolled his eyes when Remus' hands began to work at his robe. "I can do it," he insisted, but Remus gently smacked his fingers away.

"Let me take care of you." His voice cracked. Severus' heart clenched. It couldn't be any easier for Remus to watch him go than it was for him to leave himself. "Merlin, I'd hoped we were done with this the first time around."

"Sadly not," Severus bit out, wincing when several of his bleeding wounds were exposed to the open air as Remus unbuttoned his shirt. "Careful."

Remus' nostrils flared, and he sucked in a sharp breath. "Soon," he vowed softly, helping Severus step out of his clothes. When he was naked, the werewolf's eyes roamed over him critically. Severus resisted the urge to cover himself. Remus had seen him nude more times than he could count, but Severus couldn't bear it when it was like this. Shaking and bleeding and still feeling filthy from kneeling at the Dark Lord's feet.

A murmur of spells, and his wounds healed. Remus nudged him towards the bath. "Go on, it'll help."

It did, the hot water soothing Severus' aching muscles, releasing some of the tension that had gathered from the curse. Remus stayed out of the bath, though his hands trailed soothingly over Severus' shoulders. "Oh, my love," he breathed, kissing Severus' cheek. "My brave, brave love."

"It wasn't even a bad one," Severus insisted. Remus shot him a chiding look.

"And I'm grateful. But that doesn't mean I'm happy about letting you go off to him. Merlin, Severus, when Ceri came to me... it was like the first war all over again." Severus remembered it well; by the time he and Remus had reconciled, the war was well underway, and Severus was being summoned every few days. Neither of them ever knew what state he'd return in; sometimes, it was a bloodied heap on the doorstep. Every time, Remus picked him up and healed what he could and ran him a bath, just as he was doing now. Every time, he held Severus, loved him, soothed him until he felt human again.

Severus did not deserve Remus Lupin.

Remus reached for the shampoo, and Severus was treated to the sensation of skilled fingers massaging his scalp, washing the blood from his hair. He let his eyes fall shut, his own hands trembling too much to do anything but rest on his thighs and wait for the aftershocks to stop. He was out of practice at taking the Cruciatus. He'd have to build that back up.

Water poured over his head, careful to stay out of his eyes. Remus stood, dropping his dressing gown to reveal his bare chest. He looked healthier these days than he had even when they were in their youth; at peace with his wolf, well-fed by Ceri, reunited with at least some of his pack. The sentimental part of Severus liked to think he was a little responsible, too. Remus was beautiful.

"May I join you?" the werewolf asked. Severus nodded. There were some times, after a meeting, that he couldn't bear to be touched by gentle hands. This wasn't one of them. He needed Remus' skin like he needed air.

Remus unselfconsciously shed his pyjama trousers, stepping into the water. Remus had chosen their room because it was closest to the largest bathroom; the one with the bath big enough for three people, let alone two. The Gryffindor settled down and pulled Severus into his arms, his hands running up and down Severus' chest. Lips pressed against his shoulder. "I love you," Remus murmured, the words so earnest they rattled Severus' soul. "I'm proud of you. You're so, so brave."

Severus couldn't have said how long they sat there in the bath, Remus' hands and words drawing him back to himself again, back to his humanity. He was almost embarrassed; such a minor meeting shouldn't have sent him into such a state. He was about to face far worse in the coming months.

But Remus wasn't the only one who'd thought they were done with all this, for so long.

Severus relaxed into the embrace an inch at a time, letting his hands shift to settle on Remus' knees where they bracketed him. Remus' soothing murmurs paused. "Are you mine again?"

"I am always yours," Severus whispered fiercely. The words came harder to him, they always had, but for as much as Remus Lupin was devoted to Severus Snape, Severus was twice as devoted in return.

Lips pressed against his jaw. "Shall we go to bed?"

"Please."

One spell had the bathtub draining, and another had them both dry. Remus shrugged on his dressing gown and wrapped a towel around Severus' hips, just in case Harry happened to be wandering the halls. Severus left the towel on the floor as he crawled into bed, Remus joining him without bothering with new pyjamas. On nights like this, both of them preferred as much skin as possible.

It had been almost a decade and a half since Severus' last meeting, but the routine was still as familiar as breathing to them both, as automatic as Remus' post-moon rituals. Before the light went out, Severus met Remus' gaze. "I will always come back to you," he vowed, fingers still trembling ever so slightly as he cupped Remus' jaw. "He will not have me."

"Damn right he won't," Remus agreed, eyes flashing gold. "You're mine." Remus' mouth met his, and Severus lost himself for a moment, Remus' body covering his own, his tongue sliding languidly between Severus' lips. They were both too tired to do anything more, but Severus needed to ground himself, and Remus needed reassurance. When they parted, Remus turned off the light. "Sleep," he urged, settling into his preferred sleeping position, sprawled on top of Severus. Severus set a hand low on his partner's back, letting the weight of him anchor him back to reality. The Dark Lord couldn't touch this, couldn't have this part of his life. Voldemort, Dumbledore; neither of them could have Severus, truly. His soul belonged to one man only.

.-.-.-.

Harry awoke with a gasping breath, his chest heaving and his pyjamas damp with sweat. He sat up, reaching for his glasses. His pulse thudded in his ears. When he squeezed his eyes shut, he saw Cedric Diggory's empty grey eyes.

It wasn't the first nightmare. Harry doubted it would be the last. They took various forms, but they all ended the same; Cedric dead, and Harry unable to do anything about it.

At least he'd stopped having the ones where Cedric blamed Harry for his death.

A quick glance at his bedside clock told him it was almost seven; a little early for breakfast, but not by much. He grabbed clean clothes and hurried across to his bathroom to rinse off the sweat and try and make himself feel human again. It only sort-of worked, but he felt a little better.

To his surprise, Remus and Snape were up as well when he entered the kitchen, both with mugs in front of them. Snape's copy of the Prophet sat on the table beside him, unopened. Both of them looked weary, too.

Remus glanced up when Harry arrived, his honey eyes quickly taking in the bags under his eyes and his damp hair, the hunch to his shoulders and half-curled fists. The gaze quickly became knowing. “Which one?” he asked, and it took Harry a minute to parse the question.

“Cedric,” he said eventually. He hadn’t had a trip into Voldemort’s head since that one Divination lesson. Remus relaxed a little, though his lips pursed.

“Do you want to talk about it?”

“Not really,” Harry replied honestly. He accepted the arm that wound around his waist for the brief moment he walked past, heading for the teapot. Ceri floated a mug out of the cupboard for him. “Were you expecting it to be the other one?”

“Severus was Called last night,” Remus told him. Harry froze. “I was worried you might have seen it.”

“Are you okay?” Harry asked quickly, turning his gaze on the Potions Master. Now he knew what to look for, he could see Snape’s night had been even worse than Harry’s own.

“I am fine, Harry,” Snape replied. He had to be tired if he was using Harry’s first name.

“Will I train with Remus today?”

“For this morning, yes. We will return to duelling in the afternoon,” Snape said, raising his mug to his lips. His hands didn’t shake.

“Unless you need a break,” Remus added, still watching Harry with concern. “If you need more sleep...”

“No, I’m fine,” Harry insisted. The last thing he needed was more sleep; more of an opportunity to see Cedric’s face.

“If we’re ever pushing too much, just tell us,” Remus said, tone serious. “This is still your summer holiday. The situation might be... escalating, but that doesn’t mean you aren’t allowed to say no.”

“If I was at the Dursleys I’d be shut away with no wand, no contact and no idea what’s going on in the world,” Harry pointed out. “I might as well do something worthwhile since I have that freedom. I’m happy to train; I’m still having fun. This is way better than anything else I could be doing.” He still got to fly and swim some evenings, and had even ridden Buckbeak once, though he’d had to stay inside the tree line. “But it’s not all about me, so if either of you need a break—”

“If we need a break, we will tell you,” Snape cut him off curtly. “But I am fine. I can handle meetings with the Dark Lord; they’re likely to become a regular part of my week, now.” Over his shoulder, Remus grimaced.

“Then nobody needs a break, and everyone’s fine,” Harry surmised, daring Remus to say otherwise. The werewolf snorted.

"I can't tell if you're picking up Severus' habits, or they're habits you both got from Lily," he remarked in amusement, eyes darting between his partner and his godson. Harry stared at Snape. Snape stared back.

If Harry was picking up habits from the Potions Master, the world really had gone mad.

.-.-.

Having seen Severus off to a meeting with Dumbledore — the lesser evil of the two masters he pretended to serve — Remus went back into the house in search of Harry. He found him in the living room, sprawled out on the floor surrounded by parchment, a quill in hand. Remus eyed the scene curiously. Harry seemed to be writing about five different things at once, occasionally humming thoughtfully. "What are you up to, cub?"

Harry startled, glancing over his shoulder at Remus. "Writing letters," he explained, turning back to his parchment. "I want to start reconnecting with people as soon as we can turn the twins' redirect stone off. I've got a letter for Draco, obviously, but I need to write to Neville and Susan and the other heirs, see who I can get away with writing to — I've got a feeling Cassius' uncle might be checking his mail. I really hope he's okay. And I promised Cho I'd write to her. And Fleur and Viktor, though those two can probably wait; Hedwig will be gone for a while with those journeys."

Remus' eyebrows climbed higher with every name. "Well, you'll certainly be keeping the owls busy. Let me know if you need to borrow Horatio, he doesn't get much work these days." He was getting on a bit, but still in fine condition to deliver within Britain.

"Really? Thanks." Harry smiled. "I probably won't keep up with everyone all summer, but I missed my chance to talk to everyone in the last week what with... everything that happened. I need to catch up on some stuff. We need to make plans for next year."

There was one piece of parchment that looked more like a list than a letter, and Remus gestured to it. "What's that?"

"Oh, that's a list of current Wizengamot seats," Harry said. "I'm working out which are currently held by Death Eaters, and more importantly, which of those have kids that I know don't want to follow Voldemort. I'm also trying to figure out who holds the neutral seats, and see where they're likely to fall on matters. I've been reading through the voting records for the last five years or so, and there's a few that really shouldn't be allowed to keep their seats once the war's over. But half of them haven't publicly revealed their heir, so there's not much I can do about it." Harry swung himself into a sitting position. "I thought if I could get the list to Susan, she could start asking around; she's way more connected with this sort of stuff than I am."

"Wow," Remus said, for lack of any other words. "That's a lot of research, I'm impressed." Here Harry was, a few weeks shy of fifteen, and planning a political revolution while he wrote letters to his friends.

Harry shrugged self-consciously. "It's all public information. I'm just compiling it. Susan will know what to do with it all."

"Still, it's no small feat." Remus thought Harry was giving the Bones girl a little more credit than was due. "You're starting your career in politics early, I see."

"Oh, no, I'm just a figurehead," Harry insisted. "I don't really want to go into politics. I mean, I'll take my Wizengamot seats of course, and do what I can there, but it won't be my full-time job."

"Oh? And what will that be, then?" Remus asked, half expecting him to declare he wanted to be Minister for Magic, or Head Auror, or even Headmaster of Hogwarts. Harry's grin turned a little lopsided.

"I'd like to play professional quidditch," he said, just a touch of hesitation to his words. "Viktor said I'm good enough. And I like quidditch. I think it'd be fun. I could get ten or fifteen good years playing once I graduate, then I'll figure out something else to do." His grin faltered. "If I survive the war, at any rate."

"You're going to survive the war," Remus said reflexively, refusing to even contemplate any other options. He thought over Harry's words; having seen him fly, even with dementors in the mix, he had no doubt that Harry could indeed go pro if he wanted to. Perhaps it wouldn't satisfy the wizarding world's ideal as a career for their saviour, but quite honestly they could go fuck themselves. "What team would you want to play for? The Harpies will never sign you." They'd been women-only since their inception.

Harry paused, then brightened up significantly. Remus wondered sadly if he'd expected to be told not to have such frivolous goals. Hell, Remus didn't care if Harry snapped his wand and lived as a muggle, as long as he was happy. "I thought maybe the Magpies, or even Puddlemere, especially if Oliver's still playing with them by then. It'd be great to play with him again. But I'm happy with whoever, really." He bit his lip. "Viktor said I could make the national team if I wanted."

"Viktor knows better than most," Remus agreed. "Though honestly, that's not saying much; the England team is a bit of a joke these days. Maybe if you joined it they'd actually be able to win a match."

Harry laughed. He ran a hand through his hair, looking so much like James for a second Remus' breath caught. "Yeah, maybe. I dunno, it's all a ways off yet. I've got other things to focus on." His face grew so serious, so much older, and it made Remus' chest ache. He wished he could wrap the boy up and smuggle him away, far from Dumbledore and Voldemort and anyone that might harm him, so he could be a normal teenage boy instead of worrying about duelling and politics and whether he might die before he finished school. But he was Harry Potter, and the war would follow him wherever he went.

"Doesn't mean you can't have goals," Remus said, smiling in encouragement. "You need something to fight for, a future to look to. I think becoming a professional quidditch player is a fine idea."

Harry beamed at him. "Thanks." He looked down, fiddling with one of the letters nearby. "I was going to ask Susan to tell her aunt a little about my... situation. About Dumbledore. I think it's time to start building a case."

Remus almost asked if Harry was sure, but he held his tongue. Amelia Bones was a savvy woman, and if anyone could secretly start building a case against Albus Dumbledore, it was her. “Would you want to deal with him before or after Voldemort?”

“Ideally, after,” Harry replied. “As much as I hate him, he’s a useful person to have around in a fight, and so are his connections. But I wouldn’t want it to be long after; I don’t want to risk him getting hold of the Ministry. And there’s a fairly good chance I won’t be able to wait that long — I don’t know how long it’s going to take to get rid of Voldemort, and it’s only a matter of time before Dumbledore realises I’m onto him. I want to be ready, just in case.”

“That’s smart.” Dumbledore no doubt had several backup plans and contingencies in place. You didn’t get to where he was without being very crafty, and very paranoid. “Is there anything I can do to help?” Remus could hardly believe how natural it felt to defer to Harry on matters of politics and war — he was fourteen. James and Lily’s boy! But he knew what he was doing, and he was far more capable than Albus Dumbledore had any idea of.

Looking at Harry, working so hard in so many different ways, and still finding time to worry about those he cared about, Remus felt a wave of confidence overtake him, his faith sinking into his bones. They would win this war, and Harry would be the one to do it.

They just had to get him there, first.

Chapter 39

After a full week without owls arriving at Privet Drive, Remus deemed it safe to remove the mail redirection stone. Ceri retrieved it, and Harry spoke the deactivation spell, turning it back into a plain-looking stone once more. He handed it back to Remus; it might be handy for the future. “Can I borrow Horatio, please?” Harry asked, his brain turning to the stack of letters waiting on the desk in his room.

“Yes, just don’t send him overseas,” Remus replied. Harry grinned and nodded, then hurried up to his room.

Snape’s owl Asphodel was already gone when Harry went up to the Owlery, but the other three were there waiting for something to do. Hedwig hooted softly, flying down to land in front of Harry. “Okay, let me get this figured out.” He didn’t want to overload one owl more than the others, but there were some people he couldn’t send Hedwig to.

Letters to Neville, Susan and Cho went with Horatio. Letters to Blaise, Daphne and Draco went with Artemis — to give Draco his last and wait for a reply, as always. Finally, he attached letters to Charlie, Bill, Viktor and Fleur to Hedwig; she was the strongest, and would best handle the international flight.

He watched the trio of owls fly off into the horizon, letting out a long breath. It was a start. He had the whole summer to get his ducks in a row, now — certainly his two opponents would be doing exactly the same thing.

. . .

Much like last summer, Harry’s guardians refused to work him hard on the weekends. Remus let him do his homework, and even practice some more frivolous spells, but there was to be no serious training on weekends.

Luckily, Harry was assured animagus training didn’t count.

“It doesn’t always work on the first try,” Sirius warned him, making sure Harry was comfortably situated in the middle of the mound of cushions on the living room floor. “We can always brew the potion again in a month or so.”

“It’s going to work,” Harry declared confidently. Across the room, he heard Snape snort quietly.

“Ever your father’s confidence,” he muttered, the words sounding less like an insult than they would have a year ago. The Potions Master approached with a large vial in his hands, the potion securely stoppered.

“Are you ready?” Remus asked quietly, and Harry took a deep breath, relaxing his shoulders. Meditation. It was all about following his magic.

“Yeah. Let’s do it.” His hands were steady as he took the vial from Snape, carefully pouring the potion into the bowl in front of him. The three adults stepped far back as the potion began to steam, its faint green vapours twining around Harry. He breathed it in with his eyes closed, lungs filling with the scent of smoke and green wood and magic. He let his mind fall into the meditative state that had become so familiar to him in the last week, and even before that. He let his magic relax, reach out, curl inwards. He followed it, followed the ozone smell to the deep heart of himself. He didn’t dare think, couldn’t let his brain do anything other than follow its instinct. Animals relied on instincts, after all.

Inside his mind, he was in a forest. He was barefoot, the earth soft under his feet, trees towering all around him. It wasn’t a forest he recognised. Something told him to walk deeper, so he did.

It was dusk, the faintest light from the fading sun filtering through the trees, just enough to let Harry see where he was going. He looked down at himself, and saw he was entirely naked. He wasn’t cold, and he couldn’t find it in himself to be embarrassed. He kept walking.

Something was humming. Distant, quiet, tuneless but somehow… comforting. Familiar. His magic, maybe? It pushed him forward, urged him to keep walking. The air smelled like new growth.

The trees parted to reveal a small clearing, tufts of lush green grass sprouting from the forest floor. In the centre of it all, sat staring at Harry with yellow-green eyes, was an animal.

Harry stepped forward. The animal didn’t blink. Its pointed ear twitched, the white tip of its tail dragging to curl around its body.

“Hello,” Harry greeted, bowing to the creature. It rose on four paws and ducked its narrow snout to the ground, its gaze still locked with Harry’s. It cocked its head, and sat down again.

Harry drew closer. When he looked at it, he could see a smattering of lighter-coloured fur on the animal’s forehead, right where his own scar would sit. The rest of its fur was a dark russet-red, fading into white under its belly. “You’re beautiful, aren’t you?” Was that a narcissistic thing to say? Harry didn’t really care. It was a fact.

The animal stood once more, turning a graceful circle so Harry could look at it from all angles. Its footsteps were soundless on the dark earth, and it froze when Harry took one more step towards it. He reached out a hand. The animal jumped closer, butting its head against Harry’s fingers.

And then he woke up.

He blinked his eyes open, staring at the ceiling of the living room. He’d fallen back against the cushions, at some point. The potion in the bowl had stopped steaming. Harry still felt a little lightheaded, but a grin split his face.

“Well?” Sirius asked, still far across the room but looking at Harry with hopeful grey eyes. Harry sat up, a quiet laugh huffing between his lips.

"I'm a fox." He'd gone into the experience with a handful of ideas about what his animagus form might be, and fox wasn't anywhere on the list, but now he couldn't imagine being anything else.

"You found it!" Sirius whooped, diving into the cushion pile to hug Harry tightly, almost knocking over the potion bowl in his enthusiasm. "A fox? Really? Blimey, I thought for sure you'd be a bird! That's brilliant, Harry."

"Cunning yet mischievous, bold yet quick-thinking, seen as both an omen of luck and misfortune depending on the culture and the situation," Remus informed him, because of course he had random fox facts tucked up in that brain of his. "I'd say that suits rather well, for a snake in lion's clothing. Congratulations, Harry."

"I'll have to buy some books, won't I?" Harry knew the next step; studying the natural state of his animal form, learning as much about it as possible, and continuing his meditations until he knew his animal skin as confidently as he knew his own. That was the part of the process that tripped up a lot of people; refusal to own up to all facets of their personality, to face their flaws and acknowledge them. You couldn't return to your own skin if you didn't fully claim it as yours.

"I don't think we've got anything on foxes in the library, but we can check," Sirius said, shrugging. "If not, you know where the catalogue is, yeah."

Harry's gaze trailed over to Snape — the Slytherin hadn't said anything yet, and part of Harry yearned for his approval as much as Sirius' or Remus'. Finally, his dark eyes softened ever so slightly around the edges. "You're about to become far more trouble than you're worth, aren't you?" he remarked. "An animal known for sneaking about, and native to Britain to boot. I should've known, from the legacy of the Marauders."

"You're part of that legacy now, Snivelly," Sirius declared cheerfully. Snape glared at him.

"Let's head down for lunch," Remus suggested. "We can talk about the next steps while we eat. Then you can get in a bit of duelling practice before we head over for the Order meeting tonight." The meetings were becoming all the more frequent, but Remus and Sirius assured Harry there was rarely anything of note decided during them. Harry privately suspected Dumbledore kept gathering everyone just to make sure he could keep a close eye on them.

.-.-.-.

Harry spent almost the entire hour and a half the adults were at the Order meeting in his room in a meditative state with the aid of his wardstone, studying his fox form. The potion was only required the first time; once you'd already accessed that little corner of your magic, it was easier to find it again. Harry needed to learn exactly what the fox looked like, moved like, sounded like — he needed to know it as well as he knew himself.

Sirius had warned him that the animagus transformation was not the most thrilling bit of magic to learn. There was no flashy spell and bam, you're an animal. There was a lot of meditation, and introspection, and a slow, gruelling process of patience and time that made

Harry wondered how any of the Marauders had managed it, but he supposed they had been properly motivated.

Luckily, Harry often found himself with hours to spare and little else to do, and growing up at the Dursleys had definitely taught him both patience and introspection. If he could spend a week locked in a cupboard with nothing but his own thoughts, he could happily retreat into his own mind to play with the fox version of himself.

Remus and Snape returned, but Remus' ‘no war talk at the table’ rule was still in place, so Harry had to wait until after dinner to get his information. “What are they planning?” he asked eagerly, desperate for any kind of direction with which to build his own plans around. Sadly, he was disappointed.

“Honestly, very little,” Remus remarked. “It’s all a bit frustrating, really. We go, we argue in circles for an hour and come up with nothing, then Albus tells us it’s been a wonderful productive meeting and we can all go home.”

That sounded more like a second year Gryffindor/Slytherin class than a room full of the light’s greatest defence, and Snape’s lips twitched when Harry said as much. “Considering the majority of the Order are Gryffindors, we can’t really expect much more,” the Slytherin declared, ignoring the eye-rolls from his Gryffindor companions. “If there were enough Ravenclaws and Slytherins to get a majority and start organising the facts, we might make progress, but it seems rather intentional that Albus is letting the meetings stay chaotic.”

“To direct away from the fact that he isn’t actually doing anything about Voldemort,” Remus supplied. Harry grimaced. “The main topic of contention tonight was you, actually, Harry.”

The teen raised his eyebrows, and Remus smirked. “It’s finally occurred to some of your watchers that it’s not normal for a teenage boy to never leave the house. Albus insists it’s all part of your grieving process about Cedric — even though the twins shared your letter about the Dursleys with their parents and Sirius. The headmaster is quite certain that you’re merely prone to exaggeration in your anguish, and would just rather be left alone.”

Something burned within Harry, right beside the overwhelming gratitude that he wasn’t in fact stuck at the Dursleys like people thought he was. Dumbledore was so quick to throw him aside at the end of every school year, once he’d fulfilled his daring feat and saved lives at great risk to his own. Harry wondered how long it would take his watchers to realise that the supervision was not for Harry’s own safety, but to make sure he wasn’t up to anything suspicious.

“Imagine what state I’d be in if I was actually left alone to wallow in grief. I might not have made it back to school,” he mused to himself, missing Remus and Snape sharing a mildly alarmed look.

“There are enough people concerned about your lack of activity that I think it might be good to have you go back every now and then, just for a little bit,” Remus suggested, after a beat of silence. “Sit in the window and look sad for fifteen minutes or so, then have Ceri bring you home. Just to prove you’re still in the house.”

"I can do that," Harry agreed. His aunt and uncle never had to know he was there — fifteen minutes of sitting and looking sad would be good thinking time. He was doing so much thinking, these days. He felt like a Ravenclaw.

They were interrupted by a soft hoot, and then through the open living room window came a large pharaoh eagle owl; Bill Weasley's owl. It had a letter in its talons, which it dropped in Harry's lap. Harry's brows furrowed; that was a much quicker response than he'd expected.

Dear Harry,

Surprise! I'm back in England. With the current political climate, I've taken a job closer to home. Gorrak himself has asked me to head the research team on a rather difficult case he's had on his desk for a little bit. I'm sure you know the one.

I've heard you're being watched, but I've also heard that you're not where you're supposed to be. If that's the case, would you possibly be able to meet me at Gringotts in the morning, at around nine? Bring someone you trust. It's important.

If you can't make it, let me know and I'll figure out some other way to get the information to you. But it's not something that should be mentioned outside of protected walls, and Gringotts isn't just good at keeping gold safe.

Hopefully see you tomorrow,

Bill

"Gorrak's got Bill looking into my scar already?" Harry said, reading the letter a second time in case there were any more subtle hints he might've missed. "Well, Charlie did say he and Bill were looking at moving closer to home to try and take their Wizengamot seats from Mr Weasley." He looked up at his two guardians. "Can I go?"

"It sounds like it's worth the risk. We'll go in disguise," Remus confirmed. "I'm sure the goblins will understand."

If Bill had found a way to remove the magic on Harry's scar, he would've said so in the letter. But maybe he'd at least identified it.

"Well, at least that's one less international letter for Hedwig to deliver," Harry said. He hoped she was doing alright in her voyages to France, Bulgaria and Romania. "Has Bill been at any Order meetings?"

"No, and Molly hasn't mentioned him either. He must've only just got back in the country," Remus said with a frown.

"If he needs to meet with you before his own family, it must be urgent indeed," Snape remarked, also looking grim. Harry shrugged, turning back to the letter. They'd find out in the morning, he supposed.

.-.-.-.

Their identities carefully hidden thanks to Snape's spells, and Harry dressed in one of Remus' casual robes that had been resized to fit him — with a promise to order him some causal wizard-wear at the earliest opportunity because really, what young man didn't have a single robe outside his school uniform? — Harry and Remus apparated into Diagon Alley at eight forty-five the next morning. They strolled to Gringotts with the air of a father and son just grabbing a bit of spending money before a fun day out; entirely ordinary in the usual summer crowd of the alley. Harry scanned the goblins at the desks when they entered, and tugged Remus over towards Farlig. He placed his wand on the counter. "Good morning, and good fortune. I believe I have a meeting."

He currently looked nothing like Harry Potter, but that didn't slow Farlig for a second, and the goblin gave him a toothy smile. "This way, please, sirs." He hopped down from his chair and led Harry and Remus into the back rooms, to a door with Gorrak's name on it. He rapped sharply on the door, and it opened.

As the two of them stepped through the doorway, their disguise spells melted off them. That was no worry; Remus had anticipated as much, and they'd reapply spells when they left. Inside the office were Gorrak and Bill, the eldest Weasley son jumping to his feet to grab Harry in a hug. "Good, I'm glad you could make it."

Harry exchanged greetings with Gorrak, then turned back to Bill. "What is it you needed to talk to me about?"

Bill's freckled face turned serious. "You might want to sit down for this. Both of you." Remus took a chair beside Harry, within reach if Harry needed him. Harry appreciated it. Bill leaned against Gorrak's desk, fiddling with the fang in his ear. "You remember when I scanned you, Harry? Before the third task? And I told you the magic in your scar looked familiar." Harry nodded. "I went back to Egypt and did a little digging, and eventually I remembered where I'd seen it before. One of the first tombs I ever cracked, way back when I was still an apprentice. There was this doll, see? It had this really weird vibe to it. Darker than anything else in the tomb, and there was some pretty nasty stuff in there — the locals all thought it was haunted, said they heard moaning coming from it sometimes. The owner had been a very rich, very evil wizard. There were a load of scrolls about immortality, and then the doll, which I couldn't figure out."

Bill bit his lip, his hands white-knuckled on the edge of the desk. "I called my supervisor in, and he took one look at the doll and the scrolls and declared an immediate evacuation of the tomb. Lit the whole thing up with Fiendfyre as soon as everyone was out. I asked him why, and he told me the doll had been used for some of the blackest magic this world would ever see, and not a single hint of it could be allowed to make it to the public. I was wet behind the ears, so I didn't question him, but it stuck in my memory. I went to talk to him last week, told him I'd come across that magic again but I couldn't tell him where, and I needed to know what it was so I could deal with it."

"What is it?" Harry asked, wondering what his scar could have in common with a cursed doll in a haunted tomb.

"He told me the doll was something called a horcrux," Bill started slowly. "A very rare, very old, incredibly dark piece of magic. Most of the knowledge has been lost these days, but like anything, you can find it if you know what you're looking for. It basically involves the caster using an act of cold-blooded murder — the worst evil a person can commit — and taking the energy from it to rip a piece of their soul free from the rest. That soul fragment is then stored, usually inside an object, so that even if the caster should die, their soul remains on earth, unable to move on until it is whole. It's the closest to immortality that magic has ever been able to grant."

There was a long, tense silence in the office. Even Gorрак looked deeply troubled.

"Usually inside an object," Harry repeated, a slow sense of dread building within him, "but sometimes inside a person. My scar is one, isn't it?" Part of Voldemort's soul was inside his body. It made sense — his visions, his claim to the Slytherin seat, his parseltongue abilities. If he'd housed part of another wizard's soul for most of his life, that would include some of his magic, too.

Remus reached across to grip Harry's hand tightly, his face pale. "Is that even possible?"

"I haven't found any literature on it," Bill replied. "But like I said, there's not much on horcruxes out there. If someone has used a living being as one before, it's no longer documented."

"How do we get it out?" Harry asked; he didn't much care how it got there, he just wanted it gone. Bill's expression told him it wasn't going to be that easy.

"Usually, a horcrux can be destroyed by damaging it beyond all magical repair. Fiendfyre, basilisk venom, some extremely caustic potions, the Killing curse. That's fine when it's housed within an inanimate object."

"Less fine when it's housed within my living body," Harry finished for him, his lips a thin line. Things were slowly starting to make sense. "Dumbledore knows." Both men blinked at him, confused. "He's got to. It's why he's done all this; put the block on my magic, kept me away from anyone who might care about me. He knows that I have to die in order for Voldemort to properly die, so he's leading me into that. Teaching me to sacrifice myself for the greater good. The block was probably a failsafe; if I refused, he could just wait until I turned seventeen and obliterated myself and those around me."

"You are not going to die!" The words were growled from Remus quite unexpectedly, his eyes glowing gold as he stared Harry down. He blinked, the wolf retreating, but there was still fire in his gaze. "Bill, is there any way to move the soul fragment outside of its container? Or from one container to another?" he asked, as if they were talking about repotting a mandrake and not removing soul pieces from Harry's literal body.

"I haven't found anything yet, but I've barely started looking," Bill admitted. "If there's a way, we'll find it."

"Mr Weasley is one of the finest curse-breakers employed by this bank, Mr Potter," Gorрак said, speaking up for the first time since he'd greeted them. "And Gringotts has far more resources than most wizards are aware of. Rest assured, if it is at all possible, we will find a solution."

“What happens if we kill Voldemort before we destroy the horcrux?” Harry asked curiously.

“He’ll go back to being the shade creature that possessed Professor Quirrell,” Bill explained. “With the potential to return again. We’d have peace, but it would be temporary. We’d be constantly on the lookout for his return.”

“And with the number of followers he has, it’d only be a matter of time before someone helped him do it,” Harry said grimly. If Wormtail could manage it, it couldn’t be that difficult. “Well, you can rule out basilisk venom. I got bitten by one when I was twelve, but then again I didn’t actually die from it; Fawkes healed me. So maybe it only works if I die.”

Bill’s blue eyes went wide. “I thought Ginny was joking about that,” he muttered faintly. Remus snorted.

“Never assume anything is a joke when it comes to Harry,” he advised. If the situation weren’t so dire, Harry would’ve grinned.

“Well. At least now we know what we’re up against,” Harry pointed out. As soon as they could figure out how to get the horcrux out of Harry, Voldemort was mortal. And if they couldn’t, well... there were worse ways to go than dying to save the world. “Gorvak, feel free to use the money from any of my vaults to fund whatever’s necessary for this research. I trust you.”

The goblin bowed his head, and the look on Bill’s face made Harry feel like those words weren’t often said from wizard to goblin.

“While I’ve got you here, Harry, can I do some more in-depth scans?” Bill requested. Harry shrugged, assenting; whatever might help.

Once again, Harry found himself lying back on a transfigured medical bed in a back office in Gringotts. Bill pulled out his notebook and pen, and he and Gorvak both spent the next fifteen minutes murmuring spells in all sorts of languages, making lights glow around Harry and strange tingling sensations happen and even at one point a loud noise like a gun going off. Harry stayed still through all of it, though his curiosity burned. He’d never experienced so much raw magic before, it was exhilarating!

“Blimey, Harry. Your core’s a bit massive, isn’t it?” Bill remarked, gesturing for him to sit up. “Happy to report there’s no adverse effects from all the years sitting under the block. If anything, it’s grown extra big to spite that — have you noticed your magic doing anything unusual in the last year or so? More instances of accidental magic, emotional discharges, that sort of thing?”

“I mean, yeah, but doesn’t everyone rattle the windows every now and then?” He’d seen Sirius and Snape do it a couple of times, when they got really angry.

“Not usually,” Remus piped up. Harry blinked.

“Oh. Well that was all happening before, too, so I didn’t really notice. I’m a lot better at spells than I used to be.” Before the block he’d been a fairly average wizard; certainly nothing to tell tales about. Now, he could do most of his spells non-verbally, and quite a few without a wand as well. It was so much easier when you realised that all the specific pronunciation and wand movements weren't actually necessary, not if you could nudge your magic in the right way. Harry had been wondering all year why more people didn't do it.

Maybe it wasn't quite as easy for everyone else as it was for him.

"Well, you've got a lot to be working with, so I'd recommend you find some productive way of channelling it," Bill said. "You'd be great at warding, that always takes a lot of power. Kinda the inverse of my job. Or maybe spellcrafting. You're not taking Arithmancy, though, are you?"

"I'm doing it independently," Harry told him. "That and Runes. I'll take OWLs in them at the end of the year." He couldn't wait to shock Dumbledore with that one. Bill grinned.

"Good, good. You'll figure something out, then. For now, just make sure you do plenty of magic when you can, or it'll build up and go a bit haywire when you're particularly emotional. It'll all stabilise once you're of age, but a growing wizard's core can be a bit... finnicky, especially one your size."

"Why don't they teach anything like that at Hogwarts?" Harry muttered, shaking his head. Bill shrugged.

"It's mostly a pureblood thing, to be honest, so they probably expect peoples' parents to have warned them. Muggleborns have growing cores too, obviously, but they don't have family magics interacting with theirs so it's not as volatile." He clapped Harry on the shoulder, transfiguring the bed back into a chair. "Anyway, the good news is, the rest of your magic is clear and healthy. Doesn't seem to be any negative effects from having a bit of Voldemort in your head. I'll start working on some theories, and see what I can find." His crystal blue eyes locked onto Harry's. "I'll figure this out, kid, you hear me? You're not sacrificing yourself for this war."

"Okay," Harry agreed, though they both knew he would if it came down to it. "Thanks, Bill."

"No problem." Bill grinned, ruffling his hair, and shook Remus' hand. "I've got to get going, but it was good to meet you properly. I'm sure we'll see plenty more of each other in future."

Bill bowed his head to Gorra and said something in Gobbledygook, then left the office. Gorra turned to Harry. "May Gringotts be of any further assistance to you, Mr Potter?"

A thought drifted into his head, and he bit his lip. "Actually..." He glanced back at Remus. "While I'm here with a guardian present — could I possibly visit the family vaults? The heirloom ones." All four of his family lines had separate vaults for money and items, and while Harry had the itemised lists of everything in the latter, he wanted to see it for himself. There were some books he wanted to grab, too.

"Of course, Mr Potter," Gorra agreed. "If Mr Lupin consents to accompany you."

"I suppose we might as well, while we're here," Remus agreed.

Gorrak stepped out of the office, and Harry was surprised to see Farlig had been stood outside the whole time. “Mr Potter wishes to visit his heirloom vaults,” he told the younger goblin. Farlig nodded.

“Excellent. Follow me, sirs.”

Gorrak did not come with them, so Harry bid him farewell and followed Farlig back to one of the mine carts that would take them down to the vaults.

The vault Harry had been to the last couple of times — first with Hagrid and then with Mrs Weasley — was, he had discovered, his personal trust fund vault. The section of the Potter family money he was allowed to access until he turned seventeen. Harry could look at the other vaults full of gold, but he couldn’t actually take anything from them until he was of age. That was fine; there was more in the trust fund vault than he could possibly spend in the next two years anyway.

The family heirloom vaults, on the other hand, were much deeper in the Gringotts catacombs. Harry couldn’t have said how long they were in the cart, passing rows and rows of vaults that got progressively older and more solid-looking. He was pretty sure he saw a flash of fire, but they were going so fast he couldn’t quite tell. “Do you have a preference on which to visit first, Mr Potter?” Farlig asked, slowing the cart down a little.

“Let’s go Peverell first.” He knew the least about that line, after all.

The Peverell family heirloom vault wasn’t particularly large, and didn’t hold a huge amount inside it. A chest full of silverware stamped with the family crest; a wardrobe full of old robes; a few wands from long-deceased family members. Remus stuck close to Harry as he perused the vault’s contents, just in case anything was cursed.

Behind the wardrobe there was a bookshelf, and Harry’s eyebrows rose at the astonishing number of copies of the same book, all in various editions and reprints. “The Tales of Beedle the Bard, Remus, what’s this?”

“It’s a book of children’s stories,” Remus explained, looking equally confused. “Merlin only knows why there’s so many. Perhaps someone in the family was a collector.”

Harry flicked through some of the books, careful with the ones that looked like the bindings might crumble to dust at a strong wind. He was pretty sure he’d seen the title in the library at Seren Du, but he hadn’t thought much of it. He might have to go back and look.

On closer inspection, he found what he was looking for — The Peverell Family Magics and Traditions. A leather-bound book in surprisingly good condition, with a sprawling family tree on the first double page. Harry found his own name, tracing it back up through his father’s line. The tree had quite a few offshoots into other pureblood lines that it didn’t elaborate on after the initial marriage, only following the heir’s progression down the line. Right at the top were the earliest recorded Peverells; three brothers by the name of Antioch, Cadmus and Ignotus. To Harry’s surprise, he was descended from the youngest brother — Antioch had no children at all, and Cadmus’ line sprawled as long as Ignotus’, to the point where Harry lost track of it on the complicated chart.

“May I remove this from the vault?” Harry asked Farlig, and the goblin nodded.

“Everything in the vault is yours, Mr Potter,” he informed him. “You may remove whatever you wish.”

It was tempting to grab anything that looked interesting and take it home with him, but Harry figured a lot of it was probably safest where it had been for the last however many years, and he could always come back another time to explore properly. The book was the only thing he removed from the Peverell vault.

Next they went to the Slytherin vault. As expected, there was a truly astonishing amount of green and silver, and snakes made up most of the decor. Harry again wished he could spend hours down there investigating everything — there was far more in this vault than the previous one. Huge cases full of books, glittering jewellery and weapons and housewares, portraits wrapped in canvas, an entire suit of armour with the helmet shaped like a spitting cobra. There was nothing more recent than the mid-19th century, according to Remus.

Harry found the Slytherin family book on a pedestal next to a statue of a bearded man, and he put that in his bag as well. He had to tear himself away from the vault after that, and Remus chuckled. “We can always come back, cub. When there’s more time to spare.” When Harry was older. When he wasn’t being watched. When Voldemort was dead. Harry wouldn’t have anything resembling time to spare until then.

The Black vault filled both of them with trepidation, having heard all sorts of horror stories about the family from Sirius. This vault was huge and full of all manner of things, none of which looked like they were entirely safe to touch. “One day, when the war’s over,” he declared, tiptoeing through the vault with Remus at his shoulder, aiming for the family book sat on a dresser. “We’re going to come back here with Bill and Sirius and Snape, and we’re going to get rid of every cursed, dark or potentially lethal object.”

“A fun activity for all the family,” Remus agreed wryly, ducking when a scarf hanging on the edge of a mirror lunged out and tried to bite him. With its fangs.

Harry grabbed the book and hurried back over to Farlig in the doorway, giving the goblin’s amused face a dubious look. “You can help too,” he decided. “Anything we can dismantle the spells from, we can sell it.” The goblins would like that. Harry didn’t care as long as he wasn’t releasing cursed stuff into the general public.

By the time their mine cart slowed to a halt outside the Potter vault, Harry’s palms were clammy and his heart hammered against his ribs. Remus squeezed his shoulder. “We don’t have to do this today, cub,” he said softly. “We can come back another time. Or Farlig can go in and get the book.”

Harry shook his head, climbing out of the cart and placing his hand on the vault door as he had done with the previous three, letting it feel his magic. The door melted away.

Unlike the previous three, the Potter heirloom vault was a riot of colour.

Harry didn't know what to look at first; the gleaming wood chests overflowing with treasure; the huge piles of bright tapestries and rugs and what looked like saris; the beautiful furniture stacked all over the vault; the towering bookshelf in the corner with hundreds of titles nestled safely inside. His breath caught in his throat.

"I went down here once, y'know," Remus told him. "James brought Sirius and I down to come pick out an engagement ring for Lily from the family selection. Not sure where Pete was that day, but he didn't come with us. It wasn't quite as full then — some of the furniture was still at your grandparents' house. But when they went into hiding, they had the Potter elves clear out all the properties of anything that might be valuable, just in case. Lily always said when the war was over they'd come back down and pick some out for their own house, so you'd be able to grow up with your heritage around you." He smiled sadly, crossing over to a beautiful cabinet engraved with elephants and stained various shades of red and orange and gold. "This was in your grandparents' living room. Sirius got stuck in it once when we played hide-and-seek with some of Euphemia's friends' grandkids."

Harry snickered, feeling the emotion well in his chest. These things all belonged to his family, had memories for his father or his grandparents or other relatives. He would never learn those memories.

"I can't claim any of the Potter properties until I'm of age, can I?" he asked sadly. Farlig cleared his throat.

"Not legally. But were you to visit one and ask the wards for access, as the last blood Potter, they are unlikely to deny you," he said shiftily. "We at Gringotts cannot pass on the deed until you are a legal adult, but as none of your properties are under any sort of Fidelius that we know of, there is nothing stopping you from finding them."

A slow smirk crept over Harry's lips. "Huh. Good to know." He was happy at Seren Du, but there was a war coming, and God only knew what might happen. It was nice to know he had options.

This was the hardest vault of them all to walk away from with only the family book. Remus squeezed him around the shoulders, kissing his hair. "We'll come back," he promised. "We'll sit and look at every single item in the vault, if you want to."

He did. He really, really did.

Finally, he asked Farlig to take them back up to the surface so they could head home. It was so different, seeing all those heirlooms in person rather than just a list on a roll of parchment. His entire family history, crammed into a handful of vaults. Remnants from when all four families had had dozens of people within them, multiple lines to inherit and collect and claim items from the vaults, enough to fill all of the family houses. Now it was just Harry. What was he supposed to do with all that stuff?

As the cart flew through the tunnels beneath the bank, Harry let himself dream. He dreamed of a house with a huge garden, with the elephant cabinet in the living room and the bright rugs on the floor, and the Peverell family silverware in the cupboards — Sirius could have the Black family stuff, wherever he was living. He dreamed of several sets of tiny footsteps running through hallways, and a ring from the Potter vaults sitting on a pale, thin-fingered hand.

He blushed, glad the darkness in the catacombs hid his embarrassment from Remus. Maybe he was getting a little ahead of himself there.

But it was a nice dream.

Chapter 40

Harry and Remus returned home to find Sirius had joined Severus in his waiting — Harry had told him about Bill's letter over the mirror before going to bed the night before.

In all the emotion of visiting his family vaults, Harry had almost forgotten about Bill's revelation. He twisted his fingers in the cuffs of his robes as he sat down on the living room sofa. "Bill knows what the magic in my scar is," he declared, not meeting anyone's eyes. "It's something called a horcrux."

Snape cursed, which startled Harry into looking up incredulously. His usually impassive Potions Master had horror in his dark eyes. "Is he certain?"

"You know what that is, then?" Remus asked in shock. Snape nodded.

"I've heard of them before. Honestly I'd thought them a myth. I certainly never expected they could be made from a living creature."

"Would someone please explain to me what a horcrux is?" Sirius bit out impatiently. Harry found himself lost for words, but luckily Remus wasn't. He filled Sirius in, glancing at Snape every now and then to check their information matched up, forging on when the Slytherin nodded. With every word, Sirius grew paler.

"There's a piece of that monster inside Harry's scar?" he croaked, rushing to Harry's side. "How do we get it out?"

"Bill doesn't know yet," Harry said weakly. "He's going to do some research."

"I will do some research of my own as well," Snape assured. "I'm sure I have some alternate avenues to Mr Weasley." He still looked shaken, leaning against the back of one of the armchairs. "Considering the circumstances, Potter, I believe there is something I should tell you. Something Dumbledore insists you not learn until the time is right."

"Until he's ready for me to die, you mean," Harry realised. Snape nodded sharply.

Harry's stomach was already a mess of knots and anxiety, and he didn't see how things could get much worse. "Tell me."

Snape told him of a job interview. He told him of a scared young man desperate to please his master, eavesdropping on a woman and an old man in the back room of a dirty pub. He told him of a prophecy.

"I only heard the first half. Albus Dumbledore is the only person alive who knows the full extent of the prophecy, and he has not seen fit to share it with me — or with you. I'm not sure what he hopes to gain from keeping you ignorant, but until we learn what the rest of the prophecy says, we may never know."

The one with the power to defeat the Dark Lord approaches. Born to those who have thrice defied him, born as the seventh month dies.

Harry felt like he'd been punched in the chest. That was the reason Voldemort had killed his parents? Because of half a prophecy? "But... how? How can I have the power to defeat him? There's got to be more powerful wizards than me." Sure, Bill said his core was strong, but he couldn't be that special!

"For all we know, there's something about you in particular," Remus said. He didn't look surprised by any of this; he'd heard the prophecy before. How long had he known? "Maybe something to do with your family magics. You've got quite a few of them, after all."

"Or maybe it means Harry because only he can get rid of the horcrux and make Voldemort mortal again," Sirius suggested.

"But how can that work? If not for the prophecy he wouldn't have attacked me, and then I wouldn't have been a horcrux in the first place!" Harry argued. There was no way Voldemort would've shoved part of his soul inside a toddler on purpose. And if he had, he definitely wouldn't then try to kill said toddler multiple times.

"Prophecy magic is a tricky one to work with," Remus pointed out. "It could've been a self-fulfilling prophecy, or there could be something in the rest of the prophecy that details what the power is."

A thought struck cold in Harry's chest. "What if the power is the release of my magic from the block when I turn seventeen?" he asked in a hollow voice. "What if that's why Dumbledore put the block there? The overload of magic is the only thing that could destroy the horcrux and Voldemort."

"It can't be," Sirius said immediately. "I don't care what the bloody prophecy says, there's no way you're going to let yourself die to kill Voldemort. There's got to be another option."

Harry appreciated the sentiment, but he was not that important, and if his death was the only way to get rid of Voldemort then he would happily do so.

Though he would check that there were no other alternatives, first. He wasn't that reckless.

When the initial shock of the prophecy itself passed, another aspect of Snape's story drew to the front of Harry's thoughts. He turned to the man. "You were the one who overheard the prophecy. You went to Voldemort about it."

Snape's eyes shuttered. "I did," he confirmed. Harry swallowed.

"Did you know? When you told him, did you know?"

"I had no idea he was going to go after any child, let alone you and your family," Snape whispered harshly. "I believed the approach meant a person coming closer, perhaps from abroad; not the birth of a child. As soon as I realised how he was interpreting the prophecy, I rushed to Dumbledore to turn myself in and beg he protect you, and the Longbottom boy as well.” Harry hadn’t even realised Neville fit the bill too, his birthday the day before Harry’s. “Believe me, Harry; if I had even the slightest inkling of what was to happen, I never would have told him. By that point in my life I was already doubting my choices; that was just what tipped me back onto the right path.”

Part of Harry still didn’t understand how Snape could’ve become a Death Eater to begin with, when he had Remus who loved him so fiercely and Harry’s mother who had been his best friend as a child. But he doubted he would get that story, not until he was much older. It was clearly a long and complicated one. He just hadn’t realised it culminated in Snape indirectly being responsible for the death of Harry’s family.

Remus and Sirius knew, and yet they still thought of Snape as family! How was he supposed to reconcile that?

“I think I’m going to go to my room, if that’s okay.” Harry stood on shaky legs. Had he been looking, he would’ve seen heartbreak flash through Severus Snape’s eyes for just a moment before the usual impassive mask fell into place.

“Harry, please,” Remus started, but Harry shook him off.

“I need to think.” He left the living room, heading to his bedroom on autopilot and shutting the door quietly behind him. He wouldn’t slam it. He wasn’t having a tantrum.

He didn’t even know if he was angry. He should be; he had every right to be. But whether it was the hole in his heart that had formed after Cedric’s death, or something else entirely, Harry couldn’t bring himself to be angry at Snape.

Snape clearly had enough anger at himself for the both of them.

He didn’t know what he was feeling. The day had been full of so many revelations, so many emotions... he was just tired. He had the soul of a madman attached to his own, and he was the owner of hundreds of heirlooms he couldn’t possibly be worthy of, and he was prophesised to defeat a Dark Lord, and he was still hiding from Dumbledore and he couldn’t even go out in public without a disguise, and his boyfriend’s father was an awful human who worshipped the Dark Lord Harry was supposed to defeat, and nothing about his life was normal.

Apparently, nothing had ever been destined to be normal about him. Not since he was born.

There was a knock on Harry’s door, and he didn’t invite them in, but he also didn’t tell them to go away. After a beat, the door opened. “Hey, pup,” Sirius greeted cautiously, slipping into the room. “I have to head back to headquarters, but I didn’t want to leave without saying goodbye.” He edged closer to the bed. “Are you... okay?”

Harry let out a bitter laugh. “Would you be okay, in my position?”

“Merlin, no; I’d be crying in a corner somewhere! But we Blacks have always been a bit on the emotional side,” he replied with a wink. He sat on the edge of the bed, his eyes soft and sad. “You know Severus isn’t to blame for all this. He’s spent the last fifteen years trying to repent for that one little mistake. He cares about you.”

“I know,” Harry agreed quietly. He wished he had the words to explain the mess inside his head. “I’m not—I’m not mad at him. Voldemort and Dumbledore are the only ones at fault here. Manipulating others for their own gain. I just... today has been a lot.”

“Moony told us you visited the heirloom vaults,” Sirius said. Harry nodded. “I wish I could’ve been with you, pup. One day I will. I’ll tell you everything I can remember about whatever we find in there.” The dog animagus shuffled up the bed to bring Harry into a hug, lips pressing to his hair. “You’re not alone, Harry. Whatever happens next—with the horcrux, the prophecy, everything—we aren’t going to let you face him alone.”

“That was Dumbledore’s plan,” Harry pointed out. Sirius scoffed.

“Dumbledore can go fuck a hippogriff,” he declared vehemently. “His plans are usually terrible for everyone but himself, and I for one am done with going along with them.” Sirius smiled. “We’ll figure this out. From what Severus tells us, Bill Weasley is a smart chap, and Severus himself has more knowledge of the Dark Arts than anyone else I know. There’s got to be a way. You can’t give up hope.” He kissed Harry’s scar, then pulled back. “I’ll see you when I can, alright? I love you.”

“Love you too,” Harry replied automatically, managing a faint half-smile as his godfather left. When he was alone once more, he slumped back against his pillows, squeezing his eyes shut.

Merlin, he needed a nap.

.

Over the next few days, Harry didn’t leave his room much. He appeared for meals but was silent through them, and when he didn’t show up for his training neither Snape nor Remus called him down. Snape seemed to be avoiding him as much as possible, often skipping meals in favour of brewing potions. Remus just looked at Harry like his heart was being torn in two by the silence. Harry wished he could reassure the man, but he didn’t know what to say. All his words dried up in his throat. He didn’t hate Snape, but every time he tried to say it he thought of the piece of Voldemort’s soul lodged in his head and how it was maybe Snape’s fault it was there, and sure, okay, he couldn’t have known that would happen but he had still been in a place in his life where following a man like Voldemort without hesitation had been an option—no, a joy—for him, and how the hell was Harry supposed to understand that when Snape had Remus in his life?

Remus, who was classified as a dark creature but who rescued baby birds and helped them back to their nests. Remus, who always had a kind word for everyone, and believed chocolate was the cure for everything. Remus, who had seen Harry so alone and desperate for family, and given him stories of his parents even when it had to be hurting him to think of them.

If Snape could have Remus and still become a Death Eater, what hope did Harry have? He hadn’t known love for most of his life, and now he had it he wasn’t even sure he could keep it, because he might have to die in order to save them all.

Luckily, he was distracted by an influx of owls, as his friends slowly began to return his letters. Most of the heirs had sent general updates on their summers, wishing Harry well with his and making vague illusions to the things they'd been working on through the school year. Susan sent a letter and a book — he read the letter first, relief flooding him when the Hufflepuff assured that her aunt was on board and ready to start digging discreetly into Dumbledore's history. She also seemed to have started a summer project of her own, and was recruiting the rest of the heirs; hence the book.

There's a lot to get through, and we're going to be too busy to do it when Voldemort falls, so if we're prepared now it'll be easier later, Susan wrote, explaining her plans. She had sent Harry The Self-Updating Record of Ministry Laws and Regulations: Vol 2, with the request that he read through chapters 30-39 and make note of any law that needed to be changed, or done away with entirely, and categorise them by urgency. Apparently the best time to make changes to the law was after a particularly large upheaval — like a war — when people were worried about falling back into old habits and positions were changing hands due to death or incapacitation. The last couple of times, Dumbledore had just swept in and taken care of it all, and thus nothing had changed in almost a century. Now, they had a lot of work to do, and Susan wanted to be able to start immediately.

The book was in chronological order, and was spelled to automatically record any change or abolition of laws. Susan had set herself the last ten chapters of volume 3, which were all the most recent laws, as they were often the most contentious. Harry's section was mostly innocuous, though there were some truly bizarre laws that he couldn't believe had to be put in place. What had happened to make it necessary to create a law banning people from transfiguring themselves into owls for the purpose of delivering mail?

Still, Susan had asked, and it gave Harry an excuse to stay in his room but still feel productive.

He also got a letter from Draco; shorter than he would've liked, and with a worrying contents.

H,

Glad to hear you're back where you're supposed to be. I hope it stays that way.

I might not be able to write to you much this summer. My father has invited several old friends to stay at the manor, including one I believe you encountered shortly before the end of term. I plan to stay out of their way, but they might have other ideas. Rest assured, even if I cannot write to you, I will be thinking of you.

I have spoken to mother about coming to visit, and that may still be possible. Keep your fingers crossed.

Yours,

Draco

Voldemort was living at Malfoy Manor. Voldemort was in Draco's home. When he'd first read the letter, everything within him had urged for him to go to Malfoy Manor and stage a rescue, but he knew that would be foolish. Draco had given no reason for anyone to believe he wasn't as loyal as his father, and Narcissa would die before she let anything happen to her son. They both knew where Seren Du was, and knew they were always welcome.

That didn't stop Harry from worrying. He kept the letter on his bedside table, picking it up every now and then to re-read the last two words, his heart giving a little skip each time. Yours, Draco. It was nothing he hadn't said in person, but... it felt like more.

One quiet dinner, three nights after the prophecy revelation, Remus cleared his throat. "Harry," he started, and Harry immediately knew he wasn't going to like what the man had to say. "Dumbledore has given me a mission. I'm to visit a werewolf pack in the New Forest and try and convince them to side with us instead of Voldemort."

Harry definitely didn't like it. "How long will you be gone?"

"I don't know. Hopefully not more than a week," Remus assured. "The moon and the few days either side of it. But... Sirius won't be able to get away from headquarters all that often. It'll just be you and Severus in the house. And Ceri, of course."

Harry glanced over at the Potions Master, who was keeping his gaze to his plate. Harry hadn't spoken much to him since he'd learned the truth, and it was starting to wear on both of them. Snape's mouth was tight in the corners, and every time he did catch Harry's eyes he looked sad. Remus was worse, but Snape clearly wasn't enjoying the silence either.

Eighteen months ago, Snape would have begged to not have to speak to or interact with Harry Potter. Eighteen months ago, Harry never would've thought seeing Snape sad would tear at that hole in his heart.

"That's okay," he said eventually, before taking a deep breath. It was time he tried some words, whether they fell in an orderly fashion or not. "I don't blame you, sir. For my parents. I'm sorry if I made you feel like I did. It was just a lot to take in, and the horcrux, and—there's a prophecy about me, and people died because of it, but you couldn't have known that. I just don't understand. Why me. Why you? Why were you even a bloody Death Eater to begin with, when Remus loves you so much and I know, I know you love him, I can see it, I'm not blind. How could things get so bad that you could still go to him? You all just say things were complicated back then, and I get that, and I probably don't have the right to ask for the truth for any of it. I just don't understand how you could go to Voldemort and how Pettigrew could go to Voldemort when both of you had people you loved! People who loved you! He still managed to get you, and his soul is in me and what if he gets me too? He said we were alike, in the diary, when I was younger, and he was right, he was so right, I'm just like him and I can feel it sometimes and it hurts and I don't want to be like him but what if I am and what if all of this is for nothing and what if his soul and my soul are the same thing now? And what if I hurt people — what if I hurt you — what if this power I'm supposed to kill him with actually just makes me worse than he is and Dumbledore was right to bind it all along and I—"

He stopped speaking, mostly due to his inability to breathe. He was hyperventilating, his chest rising in quick gasps, and then there were arms around him pulling him against a wiry chest, a soft voice telling him to breathe and to count with him as the chest beneath his face inflated and deflated slowly, carefully, until Harry was doing the same.

He looked up into Snape's near-black eyes. "You are truly your mother's son," the man declared softly. Somewhere above him, on the other side of the table — when had Harry ended up on the floor? — Remus snorted out a surprised laugh. "I am glad you don't blame me, even when I still blame myself. You have every right to be angry," Snape told him, still keeping that same even tone of voice, like he was talking to a particularly spooked animal. "As for how I became a Death Eater, that is a very long and complicated story that starts with an awful man and ends with several different awful men, and it is not a story for tonight, though perhaps one day I may tell you. Needless to say I regret my choices, and I will do what I can to atone for them. But you are not me, Harry, and you are not Pettigrew. Yes, you have had awful people in your past, and awful things happen to you. And you have several awful things in your future, too. But you have the knowledge gained from watching the rest of us make mistakes. More importantly, you have more compassion in your heart than I have ever seen from anyone except your mother." Snape's lips curved in perhaps the first true smile Harry had ever seen from the man.

"Lily loved openly, and without hesitation. She did not love everyone — and if she hated you, you definitely knew about it — but if she loved you, she would do anything for you. If you threw that love aside, you would regret it. Merlin knows I did. Luckily, she deigned to give me a second chance, eventually."

The Slytherin's arms were still around Harry's back, surprisingly strong for a man so thin. Harry's heart still rabbited against his ribs. "You are like your mother in so many ways, and that is the reason you will never become like the Dark Lord. He was denied love through his childhood, and that made him bitter and angry and determined to see everyone else be denied love as well. You were denied love through your childhood, and it made you all the more determined to make sure no one else suffered the same way. You learned love and you gave it in spades. You made that choice. He made a different one. Having a piece of his soul within you does not change that."

Harry could do nothing but stare. Not only was that the most words he'd ever heard Snape say in one go, but it was the most honesty he'd ever heard from him, the most humanity. This was the Severus Snape that perhaps only Remus and Draco ever got to see these days. The Severus Snape that Harry's mother knew, before everything went so horribly wrong.

Snape seemed to realise he'd said quite enough, as his cheeks flushed faintly and he cleared his throat. "And if you think we're going to just let you sit around with a piece of the Dark Lord inside your head, you're even more daft than I thought you were."

"Oh, and he's back," Remus remarked, squatting down beside them with a grin. "That's it, Harry; Severus just used up all his emotions for the next year, no more for the rest of us." Snape glared at him, and Remus' grin widened. He kissed the man on the cheek. "You big softie," he teased. With one hand on each of their backs, Remus hauled them up to standing.

"He's right, Harry. You are so full of love, it's unfathomable to me how you could possibly become like Voldemort. For one thing, we certainly wouldn't let you."

"Promise me that," Harry begged. Snape's words were nice, but Harry still didn't believe him. Not when there was that dark, ugly thing inside him, that twisted piece of magic so intertwined with his own.

"We promise we won't let you become a Dark Lord," Remus vowed. "Easiest promise I'll ever keep." He gently tugged Harry out of Snape's arms and into his own, stroking his hair. "Everyone in this house has struggled with darkness at some point or another, Harry. Even Sirius. Look at the family he came from. And there is nothing wrong with acknowledging that darkness within you. Dark does not necessarily mean evil. Severus is still a dark wizard, but he's not an evil man. I'm a dark creature, but I'm not evil. Peter Pettigrew had never successfully cast a dark spell in his life before joining Voldemort, and yet I think we can all agree whatever little bit of good left in him died a long time ago. Now," he said, glancing between Harry and Snape, "I have to leave in the morning, so I would very much like to spend my last night at home for a while in the company of two people I love dearly. Let's have Ceri make some hot chocolate and bring it to the living room, shall we?"

Harry couldn't help but smile; typical Remus Lupin response. Chocolate solved everything.

.....

The house was quiet without Remus around. Not because Harry and Snape were still at odds with each other — after Harry's little breakdown and Snape's uncharacteristic burst of emotion, there was no way they could continue that stalemate — but because neither of them was really prone to conversation for conversation's sake, and without Remus around to nudge them into it, they just... didn't.

But there was an understanding between them. Another barrier had come down. Harry resumed his training, and Snape continued to teach him about dark magic, maintaining that Harry would need to know it, and insisting he was strong enough to know when to stop. In the evenings, Harry read the book from Susan, or worked on his animagus form. He'd owl-ordered a book about foxes and their anatomy, and it was proving very helpful indeed.

"Professor?" he asked one evening, breaking the companionable silence between them. Snape looked up from his own book, raising one eyebrow. "Did you ever try to become an animagus?" It seemed like such a useful piece of magic, Harry couldn't understand why everyone didn't do it. Sure, it was difficult, and not everyone could, but why did so many people not even try?

"When I learned what the Marauders had done, I brewed the potion to discover my form," Snape admitted. "It is a crow. The form was not suitable for what I'd hoped to use it for, and I was incredibly busy, so I never continued to learn the transformation. I only seemed to get busier as time went on."

A faint smile tugged at Harry's lips as he interpreted the Snape-speak — a crow couldn't run with a werewolf on the full moon, therefore he had no interest in being an animagus. He was starting to learn why Remus insisted Snape was a romantic, deep down. “I think it’d be cool to be a crow. Flying without a broom and everything. Do you like flying, sir?”

“I do, though I don’t often fly for pleasure these days.”

“You could come fly with me sometime if you wanted to,” Harry suggested, hardly able to believe his own mouth. Snape paused, then looked back down at his book.

“Perhaps.”

Harry grinned, turning back to the chapter he was reading about the evolution of foxes.

. . .

That night, he had a dream about Voldemort. No, not a dream — a vision. Harry couldn’t remember the details, just that his scar hurt when he woke up, and he felt nauseous, but strangely triumphant. He told Snape about it when he came down to breakfast. “Do you know what he might have been doing?”

“I do not,” Snape replied, lips thinning. “I have not been Called since that first meeting. I suspect I will be soon, though. Especially if the Dark Lord has made progress on whatever he is planning.”

“These dreams won’t stop even if I strengthen my Occlumency shields, will they?” Harry asked dully. Snape shook his head.

“We can assume the connection exists because of the soul fragment inside your scar. That puts him already inside your defences. However, I believe that keeping your shields up keeps the connection one-way — you can be pulled into his mind, but if he were to try and reach into yours himself, he would hit your shields. He can reach your dreams, but not your thoughts — and not your actions.” Harry didn’t ask how Snape knew that was a concern of his, when he hadn’t even known he was truly concerned about it until the man brought it up. “I do not believe he can possess you through this connection. Certainly there is no evidence that he has tried.”

“Even though sometimes I feel feelings that aren’t mine?”

“Emotional transference is not possession,” Snape told him. “Now finish your breakfast and get dressed, I’ll meet you in the library.”

Harry was surprised they weren’t in the duelling room, but grateful. He was always tired after a night in Voldemort’s head.

. . .

In all the chaos that had surrounded the visit to Gringotts, Harry had almost forgotten about the other part of the trip; until he picked up his bag while tidying his room and remembered the four books inside. He removed them carefully, setting them side-by-side on the desk. His four family lines. His heritage, on paper.

He picked up the Potter book first. The other three were bound to be fascinating — especially the Slytherin book! — But Potter was the name he'd known for so long, the name he associated with family.

Like with the Peverell book, the first page was the family tree. Harry pored over the names; his grandparents, great-grandparents, people going all the way back to long, long before the colonisation of India. It faded out into a series of question marks around the 10th century, but Harry was still gobsmacked to be able to trace his lineage back that far.

The book opened with several hand-written chapters of family history, detailing their roles in early wizarding culture, and how they had originally come to Britain with a Mongol raid in the early 11th century, members of the family zigzagging all over Europe and India, marrying into all sorts of families before settling mostly in India when it was colonised. They eventually returned to Britain when the Ministry was formed, to take a place on the Wizengamot and have a say in the foundation of Wizarding Britain, but the Indian magic remained strong in the line.

After the history came the Recorded Family Traits — Harry's eyebrows rose when he saw that parseltongue was a trait recorded in at least thirty prior members of the Potter family, though fewer and fewer as time passed. The last one had been back in 1883. Maybe he hadn't got that from the Slytherin side, after all!

There were all sorts of things that popped up in the line, though several of them had notes where they may have appeared from a conflicting family magic or creature inheritance. Harry was amused to see how often his family crossed over with the Blacks over the years.

The rest of the book was all about the traditions and etiquette specific to the house. A few paragraphs in, and it became pretty clear to Harry that he was going to need Sirius' help with all of it. There was no way half of that stuff could still be applicable. For one, nobody carried a sword anymore!

He smiled to himself all the same, returning to the family tree, unrolling the seemingly endless scroll of parchment to reach his own name.

The Potters had a long and varied magical history, with a lot of great names and deeds throughout. Harry only hoped to hold up to that legacy.

. . .

Much to Harry's surprise, he was still perfectly happy spending time with just Snape even after Remus had been gone for five days. There had been a few arguments — they hadn't magically had personality transplants, after all — but he was pretty sure they'd reached something maybe close to friendship.

Harry was on the floor of the living room surrounded by parchment and books, as he so often was these days. Snape actually had to step over him to reach the sofa. "Must you?" he sighed, and Harry snickered.

"It's easier this way," he insisted, checking something in a nearby book before crossing out something on one of the parchments.

"Dare I ask what you're doing?" Snape said with raised eyebrows. Harry wriggled into a sitting position.

"I'm trying to figure out the origins of Dumbledore's proxy seats," he explained. "There's got to be heirs for at least some of them, and if not the line should be declared extinct. Obviously he's got mine, and the Founders, but there's these other two and I can't figure out where they came from. Unless one of them is his own? But I didn't think he had a blood claim to any seat — Blaise says that's why he became headmaster."

"Mr Zabini is correct," Snape told him. "The Dumbledore family only goes back four generations, to a muggleborn. Which are the two seats you cannot identify?"

"There's the Ross seat, which I've got some early history for in some of the old Wizengamot books, but nothing particularly recent. And the Prince seat, which I can hardly find anything about," Harry said in frustration. A strange look passed over Snape's face.

"I believe the Ross seat belongs to Minerva McGonagall," the man declared, "and the Prince seat is mine."

Harry gaped at him. "What?" How was that possible? "You're— but all this time, you never said! How?"

"My father was a muggle. My mother was Eileen Prince; third child of Octavius Prince, and not expected to inherit a thing. But both her older sisters died childless, so the line passed to me. By the time my mother passed, I was working at Hogwarts. Albus does not allow his teachers to hold Wizengamot seats; he insists it distracts from our teaching duties. He's held my seat in proxy ever since, and Minerva's for long before that." Snape's lips curled in distaste. Harry kept gaping.

"So you're technically Lord Prince?" he asked, astonished.

"If I had ever been given the chance to step foot in the Wizengamot, I would be," Snape replied. "But as that has not happened, I am still only the heir to the line. I believe Minerva is the same; her brother held the title before she did, but his children were both squibs, so when he passed away it moved to her."

"But the rule about teachers not holding seats, that's Dumbledore, right? That's not a school rule?" If the Founders themselves could do both, Harry didn't see how other teachers couldn't.

"Indeed," Snape confirmed darkly. "Albus put the rule in place when he first hired Professor Horace Slughorn. He claims it's to make sure our full attention is on the welfare of the students."

"To make up for the fact that his isn't?" Harry remarked bitterly. Then, he brightened up. "But this is brilliant! All we have to do is get Dumbledore removed as headmaster, and he's off the Wizengamot for good! I'll change my proxy to someone else, the Founders' seats will go to the new head, and you and Professor McGonagall can have your seats back!"

"Removing Albus Dumbledore from Hogwarts is a feat that many have tried and failed to do," Snape pointed out. Harry shrugged.

"I still think it's doable," he said nonchalantly. "I'll squeeze it in somewhere around killing a Dark Lord."

Snape's dark eyes met his for a long moment, filling with a mix of exasperation and utter resignation. Harry just grinned.

.-.-.

At last, Remus returned home. He'd been gone for just over a week, and Ceri popped in to announce his return while Snape and Harry were duelling. They halted immediately, and Harry beamed. "We can finish early, can't we, Professor?" It was only four, but they'd been working all morning too. And there was no way Snape could deny he'd missed Remus.

"I believe we can end here for the day, yes," Snape agreed. Harry cheered, holstering his wand.

They met Remus in the entrance hall. The werewolf was somewhat ragged, with dark circles under his eyes and a healing scratch along the line of his stubbled jaw, but he was smiling. His eyes lit up when he saw them. "My boys," he breathed fondly. Snape made a face.

"I'm hardly a boy," he pointed out, making Remus chuckle. He leaned in close to Snape, smiling.

"You've been my boy since you were thirteen. Get used to it." His nose brushed across Snape's cheekbone in a very wolfish move, his hand on the nape of the man's neck. When he was satisfied, he bundled Harry in a tight hug. "Oh, I'm so glad to see you haven't killed each other!"

"Oi!" Harry argued playfully. "We wouldn't kill each other. You'd be upset." The greying man barked out a laugh.

"I've missed you, cub," he declared, smoothing down Harry's messy hair. "How have you two been? Be honest. I'll ask Ceri to tell me if you're lying."

"We've been good, actually," Harry insisted. "He hasn't been grouchy or anything. Well, a bit in the last couple days. I think he missed you." He dodged the Tripping jinx Snape sent his way, but wasn't quite fast enough to miss the Stinging hex that immediately followed.
"Rude!"

"He's been grouchy, hmm?" Remus drawled, turning amused eyes on his partner. "Harry, go see what treats Ceri has in the ice box, would you? I'm craving something sweet."

"You could not be any less subtle, oh my God," Harry said flatly, turning on his heel. "Fine, fine, I'm leaving so you two can snog in peace!" That earned him another Stinging hex on the way out, and he yelped.

There were in fact several home-made eclairs in the ice box, and Harry munched on one while sat on the countertop, trying not to listen to any noises that might come from the hallway. Ceri popped into the room, scowling at him. “Master Harry should be sittings on chairs, not on Ceri’s nice clean counter,” she scolded lightly. Harry jumped down, pulling a chair out.

“Sorry, Ceri. These eclairs are great, though!” The elf’s scowl faded, and with a click her fingers there was a tray on the table with several more eclairs, and some mini chocolate tarts.

“I will be takings these up to the living room for masters,” she told him, then disappeared. Harry eyed the kitchen doorway warily.

“Are you two done yet?” he called dubiously. Remus’ laughter greeted him.

“Yes, it’s safe!” he assured. When Harry returned, the pair were stood close together and Remus’ hair was a little messier than it had been before, but other than that they looked unflustered.

“Ceri’s got eclairs and chocolate tarts in the living room,” he reported. Remus’ face lit up.

“It’s so good to be home!” He started up the stairs, Snape close behind.

“How was your trip? What are the werewolf pack like?” Harry asked as they walked, curious to hear about an actual proper werewolf pack. He’d only heard stories before, and he was pretty sure the stories in most textbooks were wildly inaccurate. He doubted they sacrificed a small muggle child every full moon. Someone would’ve noticed that.

“It was an eye-opener,” Remus declared. When they reached the living room, Ceri had the tea set ready as well. “I’ve been to werewolf packs before — Albus sent me in the first war, and I spent a bit of time with them in between when I was really desperate. I was never comfortable around them before. This time... Merlin, the difference in Moony now I’m no longer under that curse!” He ran a hand through his hair. “I don’t know how Albus ever expected me to be able to negotiate with them while still suffering its effects. They never quite accepted me in the past, and I think that’s why. They could tell my wolf and my self were disjointed, out of harmony. This time... it was much, much easier to fit in with the pack. I still wouldn’t call it comfortable,” he added ruefully. “But it was better. They could actually respect me, this time.”

“Maybe that was Dumbledore’s plan,” Harry suggested. “To have you fail to negotiate because you weren’t in touch with your wolf.”

“It certainly would make it easier for him,” Remus agreed. “Even with me getting along better with them, they aren’t exactly thrilled about the prospect of joining Dumbledore. He’s been promising to overhaul the werewolf legislations for decades, but never actually done anything. They thought it might change when they heard he’d let a werewolf — me — attend Hogwarts, but I think they realised that was a one-off rather than the start of a new trend.” He reached for an eclair, frowning faintly. “Luckily, they don’t really trust Voldemort either. I think they'd rather stay out of it, to be honest, but they know if war comes that's not going to be an option. If they fight and lose, they'll die; if they fight and win, they might gain a few more rights but they'll still probably die; and if they don't fight at all, they'll surely die as well in the end."

"There's always another option," Harry pointed out. Remus' eyebrows rose. "They fight with me — with us — and when we take back the Wizengamot we give them the rights they deserve." He'd already found several outrageous creature-related laws in his section of the Ministry Regulations book that he was planning on bringing to Susan's attention.

"You really plan to be that open against both Dumbledore and Voldemort?" Remus questioned.

"I think I'll have to be, don't you?" Harry couldn't imagine being able to get any of the things he needed while sticking under Dumbledore's shadow. "I'll keep acting dumb as long as I can, but I'm running out of time. I expect by the end of the year, Dumbledore will be onto me, so I might as well start playing against him now."

"It could come in useful, having the werewolf packs on our side," Snape agreed thoughtfully. "If they're willing to agree to it. A fifteen year-old boy isn't the most inspiring leader, even if he is the Boy-Who-Lived."

"Yeah, okay, fair point," Harry agreed. "But it can't hurt to offer, right? Let them know we'll be working on the legislation regardless, so if they want to stay out of it that's totally fine, but we'd appreciate the help if they want."

Remus was silent while he ate his eclair. "It's worth trying," he agreed eventually. "I'll keep it in mind next time I'm sent out there. I'll have to report to Albus at the next Order meeting that this wasn't exactly a success, so he'll probably ship me back out after a few months. Hell, half the wolves aren't even willing to believe Voldemort's back yet." He took a sip of his tea, eyes darting to one of the chocolate tarts. "Anyway, how have things been here? What have you two been up to?"

Harry grinned, bouncing in his seat a little. "I turned the tip of my nose black the other day while I was meditating!" he announced proudly. It was his first visible sign of the animagus transformation. Remus beamed at him.

"Harry, that's brilliant! Tell me everything." He kicked off his shoes and wedged his feet under Snape's thigh, earning a half-hearted eye roll. Harry happily told the man about the minor transformation, and how it had taken a few hours for him to undo it.

Yes, the house was far too quiet without Remus around.

Chapter 41

It was a good thing Seren Du was in the middle of nowhere, because the number of owls coming for Harry was beginning to get absurd. Now his friends knew it was safe to write to him, they were all more than happy to do so.

“Blimey, Harry,” Sirius remarked when he was over one afternoon, watching another two owls swoop in through the window. “Even I wasn’t this popular in school.”

“You weren’t planning a government coup,” Harry pointed out dryly, scratching Susan’s owl behind the ears. The other owl surprised him; he hadn’t heard from Cassius yet this summer.

“True, but even so. Can’t you pass a lot of this over to Susan, and just get updates from her?” The plan to sort out the Wizengamot was definitely more Susan’s than Harry’s. He was busy with the whole war on two sides situation.

“Nah, I like being in the loop. Besides,” he added, offering both owls a bit of croissant off his plate, “half of these letters aren’t even about that, we just wanted to keep in touch.” It was a novelty to him, having this many people who actually cared what he was up to. He hadn’t heard from Ron and Hermione, after convincing everyone in the Order that the Dursleys wouldn’t let him receive owls, but from what the twins and Ginny were saying the two of them didn’t seem enormously sad about it. The three younger Weasleys he actually liked regularly sent letters to him through Remus.

He opened Cassius’ letter first, eyebrows furrowing at the short missive.

Dear Harry,

Just checking in to let you know I’m alright. Hope your summer is better than mine has been. My family are pretty enthusiastic about the current political situation, if you get what I mean. They want me to be involved as soon as possible. I’ve managed to hold things off for now, but I can’t wait to get back to school.

I’m at a friend’s right now, and will be for the next couple weeks, so you can write me back now but once I’m at home it’s probably best you don’t. Pretty sure my uncle’s reading my mail. Luckily Draco and Pansy are acceptable people to write to, so they’ve been keeping me updated with that fancy ink Draco has. Slightly glad my guardianship situation means I’m not involved in Susan’s law hunting project.

Before you worry your little Gryffindor head about me, I’m unharmed, and should stay that way until school. We Slytherins are good at surviving adverse conditions.

Enjoy your summer,

Cassius

Harry's heart ached for the Slytherin. He was about to start his final year at Hogwarts; after that, he would have no more excuses left for his uncle. He wondered which friend Cassius was staying with, whether it was the secret someone he'd mentioned over Christmas. He hoped so — Cassius needed someone in his corner right now.

Susan's letter didn't surprise him — her reaction to the news that Dumbledore had been forced into stepping down as Chief Warlock of the Wizengamot. It was poorly-hidden gloating, combined with fear now that the position would be held in interim by Minister Fudge. The only thing more dangerous than a political figure with a hidden agenda was a political figure with barely two brain cells to rub together.

"I've got another one for you," Remus announced, walking into the living room and tossing a letter Harry's way. He snatched it out of the air, smiling at the sight of George's handwriting. "Busy mail day?"

"The kid's getting more post than Gilderoy bloody Lockhart," Sirius grumbled, getting to his feet. "If you're here, I'd better scarper. Someone will notice I'm missing soon." He ruffled Harry's hair as he passed. "Stay out of trouble, Little Red."

"We're not calling me that," Harry insisted for the hundredth time. Sirius had declared that as an official Marauder — or soon-to-be one, once he got his animagus form — Harry deserved a proper Marauder nickname. He was testing a few out, and each was worse than the last. Remus said that James had been responsible for all of their nicknames the first time around, and there was a reason for that.

Remus took Sirius' spot on the sofa, and Harry jotted down replies to Susan and Cassius, sending their owls on their way. He thought about opening the letter from the twins, then looked at his watch; he was supposed to be down in the duelling room by now. "That'll have to wait," he murmured, tucking the letter inside his book and leaving them on the armchair. "See you, Moony!"

"Have fun, don't die," Remus called back nonchalantly, already engrossed in a book. Harry snorted.

Snape hadn't nearly killed him in at least a week now. Harry still needed the occasional Healing charm or potion by the end of his lesson, but he was getting a whole lot better. To his surprise, Snape was waiting for him in the entrance hall. "Follow me."

Instead of turning to the duelling room, Snape led him through the kitchen and out onto the back patio, continuing across the expanse of grass. "Most of your battles will not be in duelling rooms, on level ground," Snape told him, striding past the swimming pool. "They will be in corridors, or side-streets, or on grass. There will be trees and potholes and houses and puddles, things that you will trip over or have to work around. Things you may be able to use to your advantage."

Harry's eyes widened a fraction when they hit the tree line and kept going. He'd never actually been into the woods out here yet. He'd never needed to.

Snape seemed to know where they were going, and eventually halted in a small clearing. “We duel here today,” he declared. “Use whatever you can to achieve your goals. Learn to think outside the box — you’re good at duelling, yes, but you’re also good at Transfiguration, and Charms. Winning isn’t about playing fair.”

“It’s about surviving,” Harry finished, familiar with the phrase by now. He flicked his wand into his hand, glancing around the clearing for anything that might be of use. A fallen branch, about ten feet behind Snape. The little muddy spot off to the left that could trip him up if Harry could nudge him in that direction. Trees that would make good coverage. This was much more Harry’s style.

They bowed, and the duel began.

....

It was one of those rare times that Harry was left with only Snape in the house. Remus had been guilted into staying at headquarters for dinner, so the table at Seren Du was much quieter. Harry didn’t mind too much, though. At least until Snape almost dropped his fork. His hand went to his forearm, and Harry’s heart sank. “He’s Calling you now?” Snape nodded.

“It’s stronger than usual; this must be urgent.” The Slytherin got to his feet, abandoning his half-eaten dinner. “I’ll be back when I can. Hopefully Remus will be home soon; if you need him sooner, send Ceri. Don’t practice any magic you can’t reverse.” A new warning, after Harry had accidentally stuck himself to the ceiling while practicing some of the spells he’d learnt from a lesson with Remus, and had waited there for an hour until Snape and Remus returned from their Order meeting.

“Be safe,” Harry said in return. Snape nodded sharply, then swept out of the room to retrieve his mask and robe. Harry didn’t watch him go; seeing the man dressed in Death Eater regalia made his stomach turn.

Harry finished his dinner morosely, though he perked up a little when Ceri offered him brownies and ice cream for dessert. It was a miracle they weren’t all Dudley-sized, honestly. When he was finished, he took himself up to his room. The living room always felt too quiet when he was the only one in it.

Unfortunately, no non-reversible magic counted out his animagus practice. He was starting to get partial transformations now, just a little bit at a time, but Remus was worried he’d transform in some horrible way when there was no one home to help him, so he’d made Harry promise he wouldn’t try if no one was in the house.

That left him with only a few options, but Harry was happy to take one of them. It had been a while since he’d worked on his wandless magic. He sat cross-legged in the centre of his bed, letting the tension flow out of his shoulders.

It was getting easier, the more he worked on his animagus transformation. Sirius said it was because he was getting used to accessing his core without a focus — the transformation was technically just very advanced wandless magic. Harry just thought he was finally getting used to having all of his core available to him.

He started going through everything he could remember from second year Charms — he'd already nailed all his first year spells. The Freezing charm and the Engorgement charm came easy, but the Shrinking charm stuck a little bit for some reason. He glared at the rubber chicken (a remnant fake wand) that was currently the size of a small dog, lying on his bed. He nudged at his magic. The chicken began to shrink.

He was distracted by the sound of the front door opening, and leapt off the bed, hurrying down to see Remus in the hall. He deflated. "Harry, is everything alright?" Remus asked, not used to such an eager greeting. "Where's Severus?"

"He got Called," Harry explained. "I was hoping you were him."

Remus' smile faltered, and he cursed softly. "How long has he been gone?"

Harry checked his watch. "About an hour and a half," he replied. Remus relaxed a little.

"Good. We're not allowed to worry until it's been at least four hours, that's the rule," he insisted. Harry wondered how many times Remus had panicked before they'd had to implement that rule. How often he still worried, regardless.

"How was the Order meeting? And dinner? How is everyone?"

Remus hung his cloak up on the hook, walking with Harry up to the living room. Ceri had hot chocolate waiting when they arrived. "The meeting was fine; Arthur and Kingsley are a little worried about the movement of some of the known Voldemort supporters within the Ministry, but they haven't done anything overt yet. Dinner was as it always is."

"Loud and chaotic?" Harry said knowingly, earning a brief grin.

"Quite that, yes. Tonks sent a whole block of knives flying, it was just Kingsley's quick reflexes that saved it all. Bill nearly lost an eye in the process," Remus added, making Harry snort. He was so curious about the other members of the Order, the ones he didn't know. As much as he loved being at Seren Du and never wanted to leave, part of him wanted Dumbledore to make the decision to move him to headquarters, just so he could meet all these people. And see the Weasleys again, of course.

As they drank their hot chocolate, Remus told him about some new products the twins were working on, and how furious Mrs Weasley was about it all. Harry let him talk; it was better than sitting waiting in anxious silence for Snape to come home.

Harry scar began to ache a little bit, but in the way it did when Voldemort was happy. A few moments later, the front door opened. Remus spilled a little of his hot chocolate. They both jumped up and headed for the stairs.

Snape didn't look hurt, and Harry let out a quiet sigh of relief, watching Remus run towards the man and run hands over his shoulders. His nostrils flared, trying to sniff out any hidden injuries with his werewolf senses. “I’m fine,” Snape insisted softly, his voice gentle in the way it only ever was with Remus, and only sometimes; when he thought they were alone, or when Remus seemed particularly vulnerable.

“He’s happy,” Harry commented, grimacing against the pain in his forehead. “What happened?”

“He’s discovered that the full prophecy about you was recorded and put in the Department of Mysteries,” Snape answered, eyes dull. “He’s going to start going after it.”

“The Department of Mysteries? Isn’t that, like, impossible to get in?”

“Not to get into, but to navigate, yes. Unless you’re an Unspeakable, you’ll be hard pressed to find your way around,” Snape confirmed. Harry was glad to see the man’s hands weren’t trembling around his discarded mask; he hadn’t been Crucio’ed tonight, then. “I’ll go see Dumbledore in the morning, but this doesn’t bode well.” His eyes were fixed on Harry as he said that, and Harry raised an eyebrow. “Only those who are the subject of a prophecy can touch a recorded version of it.”

And the prophecy Voldemort wanted... “Shit,” Harry said. Snape nodded. “Well, at least I have a warning, now. Stay away from the Ministry.” If Harry didn’t go there to take it, then Voldemort himself would have to go into the Ministry to get it, and that was unlikely to happen.

He could see Snape begin to lean heavier on Remus, and cleared his throat. “I’m going to bed. I’ll see you both in the morning.” He knew they had some sort of routine for nights like this, just like they had routines for before and after the full moon. Harry didn’t want to intrude on any of their private stuff. He hurried back up the stairs, briefly ducking into the living room to retrieve his abandoned hot chocolate before heading to his room.

So Voldemort finally had a plan. Harry wondered if Dumbledore would tell him the prophecy now that they knew Voldemort wanted it. Or, indeed, if he would tell Harry anything at all about what Voldemort was up to. As far as they were all concerned, Harry was stuck in Privet Drive with zero information and zero contact with the wizarding world.

Knowledge was power, and Harry had more knowledge than Dumbledore would ever be able to guess.

.-.-.-.

Harry’s fifteenth birthday crept up on him. It was the first time he’d almost forgotten to stay up until midnight; he’d been so busy training, and then he’d managed to turn his hair red while working on his animagus transformation, and he’d just lost track of the day. It was only when he was getting ready for bed that he saw the date on his alarm clock and remembered.

Nevertheless, he woke up early and surrounded by owls, all jostling for space as they offered their burdens to him. Harry laughed, setting about releasing the packages one by one. Sweets and books and a new passworded journal, a Tutshill Tornadoes pennant from Cho — forever trying to lure him away from the Harpies — and even Fleur and Viktor had sent him presents!

It was by far the most Harry had ever been given on his birthday, and he wasn't even done yet!

Full of excitement, he bounded down the stairs and beamed when he saw Sirius at the breakfast table. "I figured if there's ever a time I can get away with sulking in my room the whole day, it's your birthday," the animagus teased, opening his arms for a hug. "Happy birthday, kiddo!"

Instead of waiting his turn for a hug, Remus merely wrapped his arms around both of them, kissing Harry's hair. "Happy birthday." He let go, nudging Harry to sit down in front of his plate of pancakes, overloaded with cream and fruit. "What do you want to do today, Harry?"

Harry bit his lip; he'd been hoping one of them might tell him about a surprise, like last year. "What are my options?"

"Same as usual," Remus replied, shrugging. "Flying, swimming, playing with Buckbeak. Maybe a trip to the cinema, if we're careful." Harry tried not to let his face fall.

"Or you could stay here and wait for your visitors to arrive," Snape drawled from behind his copy of the Prophet, eyes glittering.

Harry lit up, practically bouncing in his seat. There were only two people who would visit Seren Du. Sirius laughed. "I think that's decided it," he teased, making Harry blush. "It's fine, it's fine — you'd rather spend your birthday with your boyfriend, we get it."

Suddenly, Harry wondered if it was a good idea to have Draco over, with Sirius and Remus around. The teasing was bad enough when it was just Harry talking to them about the Slytherin.

Pretending his cheeks weren't as red as the strawberries on his plate, he wolfed down his breakfast. "They should be here in half an hour or so," Sirius declared, a wave of his wand summoning a stack of wrapped presents as soon as Ceri cleared the table. "Just enough time to give you these."

Opening presents in front of the three men was slightly less awkward than last year, now he was a little more used to them spoiling him. Defence books, some prank items, and a set of duelling robes that had to have cost a pretty penny. "This is brilliant, thank you guys," Harry gushed, beaming when Sirius ruffled his hair.

"Only the best for our pup turning fifteen! Love you, kiddo. Let Ceri put those away, let's go wait outside for your boyfriend." The dog animagus laughed, dodging the elbow Harry aimed at his ribs. Nonetheless, Harry followed him outside to the front drive, wandlessly summoning a bright red rubber bone from a few feet away. He'd bought it as a joke present for Sirius' last birthday, only for the man to become surprisingly attached to the thing. Harry flung it across the grass, watching his godfather transform mid-stride and go bounding after it.

Padfoot's inky fur gleamed in the summer sunlight; even as a dog, his improvement in the last year was obvious. Sirius hardly even looked like a man who had seen Azkaban anymore — if not for the shadows in his eyes and the tension in his shoulders, you'd never guess.

Indeed, all four of them were looking miles healthier than they had this time last year. Harry had caught Snape grumbling about needing to buy new trousers thanks to Ceri's cooking, and Remus teasing him that he was no longer two-dimensional. As for the werewolf himself, between his peace with his inner wolf and the training he was helping Harry with, he was broader in the shoulders and hiding some impressive muscles beneath his cardigans and mild-mannered smile.

Harry was just glad Snape had stopped leaving Nutrient potions in pointedly innocent places for him to find. He knew he would never be as tall or stocky as his father, not after his childhood, but the Potions Master's expertise had corrected far more than Harry had ever thought possible. He actually looked his age, now!

So caught up in his introspection of how far they'd come in a year, Harry almost missed the crack of apparition signalling the arrival of their guests. He and Padfoot both turned their heads towards the noise, the dog dropping his toy and transforming back to a man in an instant — not quite quick enough to hide what he'd been doing from his smirking cousin.

"I always wanted a dog when we were children," she teased by way of greeting, leaning in to kiss Sirius' cheek. "Seren Du is treating you well, cousin. I'm glad to see it."

"You're always welcome to come share the benefits," Sirius replied, grey eyes scanning the woman in concern. "Pardon my saying so, but you look like you could use it." Indeed, Narcissa Malfoy was as perfectly presented as always, but she hadn't bothered to glamour over the dark circles below her eyes, and she seemed a little thinner in the cheeks. Harry felt a small spark of pride to see the dragon necklace he'd bought her sitting at her throat.

"My lord husband is putting my hosting skills to the test this summer," she said primly. "I can't say I approve of his choice of houseguests."

Beside her, Draco flinched minutely. Harry reached for him, not even hesitating to pull him into a chaste kiss despite their audience. "I'm glad you're okay," he murmured, hugging the blond tightly. He felt Draco's shoulders slump, the taller boy relaxing against him for just a second.

"You, too. Happy birthday."

Narcissa squeezed Harry's shoulder, smiling fondly at the pair. "Many happy returns, Harry, darling. I'm glad we were able to get away for the day — though I think Draco might've run away and come here by himself regardless."

Her son blushed, and Harry grinned.

"Why don't you boys go hit the quidditch pitch for a little while?" Sirius suggested. His gaze kept returning to Narcissa, his worry obvious. Harry figured he probably wanted to talk to her privately.

"Yeah, okay." Slipping his hand into Draco's, Harry turned towards the pitch, while the pair of Blacks strolled back to the front door. Draco's shoulder bumped against his.

"It's good to see you," he said softly. "You look good."

Harry would've blushed, if he wasn't reminded of the last time Draco had seen him; on the train home from Hogwarts, still raw from Cedric's death and terrified Sirius wouldn't be able to find a way to get him safely away from the Dursleys'. "I've been able to get some rest," he said eventually.

Draco snorted. "I could do with a bit of that." He did look like he hadn't been sleeping well. Harry squeezed his hand.

"We don't have to fly. We can just sit, if you want."

"No, no." Draco untangled their fingers, drawing his wand and his shrunken broom from his pocket, resizing it in one fluid motion. "I've hardly been able to fly all summer. It's... not always safe, to be outside the house." His lips twisted in a sneer. "Not always safe to be inside, either."

Harry's heart clenched painfully. Here he'd been enjoying his freedom, and poor Draco had been dealing with a nightmare made reality. "Come here for a second." He nudged the broom from Draco's hand, winding his arms around the blond's lithe hips. Automatically, Draco's arms came around Harry's shoulders, holding him close. He was tense, up until the moment Harry tucked his chin into the hollow of Draco's neck. A beat, two, then the Slytherin finally let go of his rigid posture, slumping into Harry with the quietest of sighs.

"It's good to see you," Draco repeated, barely louder than a whisper. "I've missed you."

"Me too," Harry breathed, closing his eyes to take in Draco's heartbeat against his cheek. Merlin, he'd needed this. He wished Draco could stay all summer; even when Harry had to leave Seren Du to go play Gryffindor Golden Boy, at least his boyfriend would be safe from the monster in his home. But it would raise too many questions. Draw too many lines they weren't ready to draw yet.

The two boys stood there for a while, just taking each other in, until Draco finally drew in a deep breath and dropped his arms. Harry kissed him, and when he pulled back they were both smiling.

"Let's chase the snitch for a bit, shall we?" Draco suggested. "We can talk after lunch."

They had so much to talk about, but Draco didn't look like he was ready for that, and quite honestly Harry wasn't either. He'd much rather just fly with his boyfriend on his birthday, and pretend they were normal, just for a little while.

.-. .

Lunch was timed perfectly; just as the bell rang, the clouds that had been gathering all morning began to let loose their burden — Harry and Draco were both a little waterlogged by the time they made it inside. Snape made quick work of that with a couple of Drying charms, squeezing Draco's shoulder. "It's good to see you well, Draco," he murmured, his tone warm in that way only Remus and Draco warranted. Draco looked a little brighter for seeing the man, and a curl of guilt rose within Harry; here he'd been monopolising Draco's godfather, too. He was the worst boyfriend!

Ceri had prepared a feast fit for royalty, with another masterpiece of a cake; this one covered in small fondant foxes, which prompted an explanation for the two Malfoys.

"Corrupting him further, are you?" Narcissa remarked to Sirius, who grinned unrepentantly.

"That's so cool," Draco said, envy in his eyes. "Uncle Severus, can I—"

"I planned to brew the potion for you once you had returned to school," Snape cut him off smoothly. 'When it's safer' went unsaid, but the delay didn't bother Draco. He beamed, ignoring his mother's eye-roll.

"If I had known you'd start taking godparenting advice from this cretin, I might have protested more at your choice in companion," the Malfoy matriarch grumbled. It was all for show; Harry knew if she really didn't want Draco learning, Snape never would have mentioned it. Quite frankly, any advantage Draco could have would be worth it.

"And here I thought I was your favourite family member," Sirius mock-gasped.

"Andromeda remains my favourite, as you well know," Narcissa replied. "Regardless of whether or not we're on speaking terms." Her grey eyes were sad. Sirius cleared his throat.

"About that. Recent events have put me back in touch with her daughter; she's an auror, you know." From the look on her face, Harry didn't doubt Narcissa knew exactly what her niece was doing with her life. "Obviously we've had to be fairly careful how we talk, with certain manipulative old windbags floating about." Remus snorted. "She helped me get in touch with Andi again. Explain my innocence and all."

Almost imperceptibly, Narcissa's grip tightened around her cutlery. "Sirius, I can't—"

"I'm not saying you have to," Sirius continued. "I'm just letting you know I'm working on sorting out how close to Dumbledore that side of the family is. I never could tell how much of a hand he had in her running off with Ted — not that I begrudge her that, he's a top bloke. But if you want me to pass on a message once I'm certain she can be trusted, I'd be happy to."

"I'll think about it," Narcissa said eventually, lips pursed. "Let's not do anything reckless, though. There's far too much at stake."

"Andi would rip the world in half for her littlest sister and you know it," Sirius argued gently, softening in the barest smile. "You need an out that can't be traced back to me, Cissa. Just in case the boys end up public; I'd be the first place your husband would look."

"We're being careful," Harry piped up indignantly.

“I know, pup, but things happen. You always need a back-up plan.”

“I appreciate your concern, but I have it handled,” Narcissa declared. “I’m worth far more at my husband’s side than I would be cowering behind my sister’s skirts.” Her smirk was cold, and every inch a Slytherin. “I’ve always been a better dueller than Lucius, at any rate.”

That drew a short laugh from Sirius. “And he knows it,” he muttered proudly. “I know you want to help, but all the same... I think it would be worth getting back in touch.”

“Andromeda would be pleased to hear you weren’t as lost as she feared,” Snape said, quiet voice cutting through the tension between the cousins. Narcissa’s expression faltered.

“...I suppose,” she said eventually. All of a sudden, she cleared her throat, and was smiling once more. “How rude of us, carrying on this dreadful conversation over Harry’s birthday meal. I do apologise. Though I feel you’ve hardly noticed, with those moon-eyes you’re giving my son.” This smirk was equally Slytherin as the last, but much warmer, a playful glint in her eyes. Harry ducked his head.

“Mother!” Draco complained, his pale cheeks turning crimson. “Leave him alone.”

“And miss my one chance of the year to watch my darling boy and his beau be so smitten?” she teased, smoothing her son’s hair down with a saccharine smile. “I believe it’s my right as a mother, after watching the pair of you be so utterly oblivious last year.”

Harry wondered if it was possible to explode from too much blood to the face. He looked to his godfathers for help, but knew they would be useless. Sirius’ grin spelled danger.

“Does my bitter old heart good to see young love,” he sighed dramatically. “Harry’s been positively heartbroken, unable to write to his boyfriend all summer. It’s torture, watching him sigh away at the window, yearning for his paramour.”

“Sirius!” Harry let out a strangled yelp, eyes wide. He didn’t dare look Draco — or anyone — in the eye. “None of that is true!” Sure, he’d hated not being able to write to Draco. And maybe he’d spent more time than he should have worrying about how Draco was faring with Voldemort in his house. But there had been no sighing at windows.

“I do hope Draco has been a little more discreet in his pining, considering your company,” Snape drawled, dark eyes alight with amusement. Great, now even Snape was getting in on the teasing!

“I haven’t been pining!” Draco protested. “And I bet you were worse when you were my age. You’re with a Gryffindor too, you know.”

“But my Gryffindor knew where I lived in the summer, and knew that my parents hardly cared where I was,” came Snape’s easy retort. Remus’ smile widened at the possessive, going starry-eyed like he always did when reminiscing about the good parts of his teenage years. Harry could hardly imagine it; Remus coming to visit Snape in his muggle town, sneaking away together for privacy over the summer. He grimaced — he didn’t want to imagine it.

“We’re just glad you’re happy, pup,” Sirius said, eyes wide with feigned innocence. “After all those nights you spent gushing about Draco to me before you got together, pretending you only liked him as a friend, wondering if he would ever like you back—“ He stopped talking abruptly; mostly due to his nose turning into a bright green teapot. “Oi! Little blighter!”

“Excellent wandless transfiguration, Harry. Well done,” Remus complimented. “Though if you think it’s going to stop him talking, you’ll have to try a lot harder, I’m afraid.”

“Narcissa, did I ever tell you about when Harry told me of his first kiss?” Sirius continued loudly, voice a little nasal thanks to the crockery on his face.

“We’re leaving!” Harry declared, jumping to his feet. With a wide-eyed look at Draco, he grabbed the blond’s hand.

“Oh, but you haven’t finished your cake!” Narcissa protested, admirably stifling her laughter. Harry reached to snatch his plate, Draco’s half-eaten cake levitating over to rest next to his.

“We’re going upstairs.” Cake in one hand and boyfriend in the other, Harry made for the door, his blush starting to feel permanent.

“Keep the door open!” Sirius called in their wake, cackling gleefully. Harry groaned, picking up his pace. Why had he thought it was a good idea to have Draco over with Sirius around??

He couldn’t bear to look the Slytherin in the eye until they were far away from the kitchen, almost to Harry’s room. Then he was blushing for an entirely different reason, Sirius’ parting words echoing in his head. What would Draco think, Harry dragging him up to his bedroom?

“I’m sorry,” he stuttered, skidding to a halt. “We can go to the other sitting room, or somewhere — we can’t eat cake in the library, but I—“ He was cut off by a kiss, Draco smiling against his mouth. They were both still blushing when they parted.

“It’s fine.” Draco pushed the door to Harry’s room open, taking the cake from the Gryffindor’s grasp. “You couldn’t have picked up some forks on your way out?”

Harry rolled his eyes, transfiguring a pair of forks from a couple of quills on his desk. “I was a little busy trying to escape before Sirius said something that made me want to crawl in a hole and die.”

The two boys made themselves comfortable on the bed, plate of cake between them. “I should’ve known he would pull something like that. He’s been teasing me about you for ages,” Harry groused.

“You can’t help it that you’re blinded by my good looks,” Draco reassured airily. “You’re only human.”

“Oh, don’t you start,” the Gryffindor muttered. “You’re just as bad as I am.” He refused to be embarrassed about fancying his boyfriend, but Sirius’ teasing was on a whole other level.

Draco grinned, shuffling over, careful to avoid knocking the empty cake plate. “I am,” he agreed shamelessly. “I’m absolutely awful about how much I’ve missed you this summer.

Positively Gryffindor about it. You've ruined my reputation."

Harry rolled his eyes, grinning as he let Draco crowd his space. "Your reputation is doing just fine," he argued, sliding a hand into the soft blond strands at the nape of his neck. "But it's nice to hear I'm not the only sappy Gryffindor here."

Draco hummed, kissing him in lieu of a reply. Harry shifted them to get more comfortable, pulling Draco half on top of him. He sighed into the kiss, hand moving to cradle Draco's waist, their legs tangling together. All of a sudden, Draco froze, pulling back. Harry frowned. "What's wrong?"

"Harry, I— about what your godfather said."

Harry almost groaned at the reminder of Sirius' embarrassing words, wondering which part Draco objected to most. Then he saw the look in the blond's eyes, hesitant and shy, and comprehension slammed into him.

They were in his bedroom. On his bed. Alone.

His pulse ticked up a notch— was Draco suggesting... what was he suggesting? They'd never been alone together like this before. Somewhere that wasn't a classroom, or a hidden corner of the school where they might be found at any minute. Somewhere with a bed.

"Everything we've done has been great, truly—" Oh, Draco was talking again, Harry should probably pay attention. "— I just don't know if I—I mean, things are going— maybe we shouldn't—"

"Draco," Harry interrupted, brows furrowing. Draco was getting more frustrated with every word he tripped over, his body tense and uncomfortable. "Talk to me."

"Can we maybe just slow it down a bit?" the Slytherin blurted all at once, then bit his lip. "Fuck. I mean, just because we're up here in your room, doesn't mean we have to, y'know. Do anything." He wouldn't meet Harry's gaze now. The Gryffindor frowned.

"Do you not want me to kiss you?" he asked, suddenly worried. He tried to untangle them, but Draco held tight.

"No!" he blurted. "No, no, this is good. I just... oh, bugger it all," he muttered under his breath. "I know you've had that book, from George, and it's got all sorts of... stuff in it. But I—I don't think I'm ready to go any further than we have just yet. Even if now would be perfect for it, because we're here and alone and even though Sirius was teasing I bet he wouldn't even care if we did shut the door, and my mother just wants me to be happy, but all the same I can't—I don't—Merlin, I can't think when I'm looking at you like this."

Harry might be an idiot Gryffindor with blood flowing to lots of places other than his brain right now, but even he could put those pieces together. He frowned, stroking the back of Draco's neck. "Draco, breathe," he soothed. "We don't have to do anything. I'm sorry if you thought—if I was pushing, or something, I didn't mean to. I don't think I'm ready either," he admitted. He'd read the book cover to cover at this point, and maybe in the privacy of his bed at night he liked to imagine doing some of those things with Draco, but they hadn't done more than take their shirts off and rub off against each other so far, and the thought of getting naked together was... overwhelming, to say the least.

"Oh," Draco said softly, the wind taken from his sails. "You don't want to?"

"At some point, yeah," Harry murmured. "But not right now. I swear, I wasn't thinking anything like that when I brought you up here. I just really wanted to be with you, without all the teasing and stuff."

Little by little, Draco began to relax. His body pressed against Harry's, but it wasn't done to arouse. Harry adjusted them until he was on his back, Draco curled up under his arm. "You know you're always allowed to say no, right?" he said, tracing gentle patterns on the Slytherin's arm. Draco made a quiet, noncommittal noise, but didn't say anything.

Harry had once had a conversation with George, after he'd admitted he and Draco were together. It had started out embarrassing, as those sorts of conversations often did, but George had talked to him about consent and boundaries, and how it was only worth doing things if all parties were equally into it and involved. The older boy had insisted Harry should never feel pressured into anything, and he'd prank Draco for a week if the Slytherin ever tried.

He didn't think Draco had anyone like that, to have that conversation with him. Snape, maybe. But Harry didn't see that happening; certainly not in the same way George had done things. And Slytherins were a little weird about relationships and stuff; it was always a power play, to some degree. Maybe they didn't have chats about consent at all.

His heart ached, and he held Draco tighter, kissing his hair. "I swear, I'll never make you do anything you don't want to," he promised. "Even if we're in the middle of something and you change your mind, just tell me and I'll stop, okay? We can do something different, or hell, I'll go take a cold shower or something." He tried to get a laugh from his boyfriend, but barely managed a smile and an eye roll. "There's no rush to do things. I don't care if the other boys act like it's some sort of competition or whatever." The Slytherins were probably even worse than the Gryffindor boys for bragging about 'how far they'd been'. "They're all going so quickly, I doubt they really know what they're doing, anyway," he joked, and that got a quiet chuckle. Finally, Draco's stormy grey gaze met his. Harry smiled. "I just like being with you. Even if we just cuddle. Though I really, really like kissing you," he admitted, a little bashful.

"Kissing is good," Draco agreed, his fingers curling in the hem of Harry's t-shirt.

"We've got plenty of time to get to everything else," Harry insisted. He resolutely ignored the little voice in the back of his head telling him he'd die before graduation, that the war would get to him quicker than he'd like. That was no reason to push things. He'd rather die a virgin than make Draco uncomfortable. "Right?"

Abruptly, he thought that maybe Draco wasn't thinking as long-term as Harry foolishly was; sure, he made comments sometimes, but he'd never really said that he expected anything like that.

"I can see you panicking," Draco declared with amusement, kissing Harry firmly. "I wouldn't go into something as reckless and idiotic as dating the bloody Boy-Who-Lived if I wasn't in it for the long haul. You're stuck with me, Potter." There was a soft expression on his face as he spoke, one that made Harry's heart ache with words he hadn't said, words he desperately hoped Draco thought too, words he wasn't brave enough to voice between them yet.

"Then we can go as slow as we want," he said instead. "It'll be worth the journey, when we get there, and we know each other better." Every time things got more heated between them, he discovered a new part of Draco that made the blond moan, a sensitive spot or a way to touch him just right. The longer they took with that, the better it would be when things... progressed.

Draco's eyes darkened, and he tilted his head up, capturing Harry's lips with a ferocity that put a firm end to the talking part of that conversation.

For the first time all summer, Harry felt like he could truly breathe. Sure, it had been great having Remus and Sirius to talk to about Cedric and Voldemort and his fears, and they had gone a long way to helping him work through his grief. But lying there with Draco, first kissing and then talking quietly, cuddled together on his bed, Harry could feel the ragged edges of that hole in his chest begin to knit themselves together again.

Eventually the conversation faded out — Harry losing the words to talk about his emotions regarding what had happened in the graveyard; Draco not wanting to taint a nice day with discussion of the Dark Lord invading his home. Neither of them was truly okay, but there was nothing they could do to change that. Not yet. Summer would be over in a month, and then they'd have a whole other set of problems to deal with. They could worry about them together then; this was the last time they'd see each other for a while.

"Do you think the Defence teacher will be any good this year?" Draco asked absently, shifting up to look Harry in the eye without getting a crick in his neck. Harry scoffed.

"With the current track record? Unlikely," he muttered. "Merlin knows how half our year will pass their OWLs."

"Don't say that word," Draco protested. "It's all Father's been able to talk about this summer. Exams this, OWLs that, I'd better do the Malfoy name proud with my results." He grimaced. "I can't wait until it's all over. Exams, school, this bloody war. Then maybe I'll be able to live my own damned life."

Harry pursed his lips. He didn't often dare think about all that. What came after.

"Maybe I'll join you in professional quidditch," Draco continued. "Just to piss off father. We'd have to play on the same team, though; I've heard the schedules are a nightmare."

A warmth settled in Harry's chest. There was no doubt in Draco's voice about them staying together, after everything. No hint that Harry might not make it through.

"We can't both be seekers on the same team, though," he pointed out, deciding to go with Draco's fantasy; they could pretend they were normal teenage wizards, with no war and no prophecies and just their schooling to get through. They could dream.

“Don’t be daft; I’d be a chaser,” Draco retorted without missing a beat. “I know better than to think I can beat you to the snitch; you beat Viktor Krum, for Salazar’s sake. The only reason I’m seeker for Slytherin is that there were no openings for chaser in our second year. Plus I was a little idiot who foolishly thought I could beat you with a faster broom.”

“Then why didn’t you switch in third year?” Harry asked, sure that one of the Slytherin chasers had graduated at the end of their second. Draco’s gaze turned sheepish.

“Riling you up was fun,” he admitted. “I didn’t want to let anyone else have that pleasure.”

Harry smirked. “Possessive little git,” he teased fondly. “Staking your claim before you even realised you fancied me.”

“You’ve always been mine, Potter,” Draco agreed. Harry’s throat tightened — how very true that was.

Pushing past the wave of unexpected emotion, Harry rolled on top of Draco, grinning smugly. “Maybe you’ll get lucky in this year’s match against me,” he teased.

“Maybe you’ll get distracted looking at my arse,” Draco retorted, even as his hands moved to cup Harry’s.

“Draco, darling, I have a Firebolt,” came Harry’s swift reply. “You’ll be the one looking at my arse. And remembering exactly what happened after I beat Viktor Krum to the snitch.” That brief moment behind the greenhouse was still one of Harry’s fondest memories — and the beginning of many a late-night fantasy.

“Then if you do win, you’ll know it was because I was too busy imagining getting you out of your quidditch robes.” They weren’t trying to rile each other up again, but Harry couldn’t help but grin against Draco’s jawbone.

“Excuses, excuses,” he whispered, kissing the soft spot beneath Draco’s earlobe.

“Maybe I won’t go professional,” Draco continued, fingers tracing the ridges of Harry’s spine. “Healer training is best done straight out of school, after all. I’ll let you go chasing the snitch, and I’ll be waiting to heal all the bruises when you get whacked by bludgers.”

Harry closed his eyes, the picture forming in his head; coming home after a long day of training, kissing Draco hello and letting the blond fuss over his minor injuries. Maybe they’d cook dinner together — or rather, Draco would watch Harry cook, because Merlin knew the spoiled little pureblood had never stood at a stove in his life. But Harry would teach him. They’d figure it out.

“That sounds really good,” he confessed, voice going somewhat hoarse with the power of the emotion welling in his chest. “We’ll get a house, somewhere in London, because you’ll be working longer days than I will and I can apparate or floo to wherever I’m training. We’ll ward it so your mum and our godfathers can’t come over unless we invite them, or Sirius will be a nosy bugger. Maybe on the days I'm not training, and you're not too busy, I can bring you lunch and we can eat it together outside the hospital."

Harry hadn't been to St Mungo's, but there had to be a park nearby or something. A tree they could sit under, sharing sandwiches on warm summer days, before Draco had to get back to another endless shift of healer training.

In his head, the dream went further — Draco would become a fully qualified healer, one of the best young healers St Mungo's had seen in decades. Harry would play for England, and take them all the way to the World Cup Final at least once. And when he was done with quidditch, either through injury or boredom, maybe he'd get a Defence mastery. He could write textbooks; something that would allow him to be at home with their kids. However many they had. Hell, maybe he'd even teach, once they were all old enough to be at Hogwarts.

Did Draco even want kids?

He wasn't brave enough to ask.

"Sounds like a solid plan to me," Draco murmured. "We've got it all figured out." He sighed, breath tickling Harry's cheek. "Just got to get a sodding Dark Lord out of the way, first. And my father."

"If your father tries to stop us, I'll hex him," Harry assured, not wanting to touch on the whole Dark Lord matter. He felt Draco frown.

"That's not what I'm worried about," the blond dismissed. Harry caught his eye with a quizzical look, and Draco's expression darkened. "He raised me, Harry. I know I've had mother, but... you remember what I was like, before. I wanted to be just like him." His face twisted in a grimace. "Part of me thinks I always will be, in the end."

"You were twelve, Draco. We're all idiots at twelve."

"But that's twelve years of idolising a monster. Twelve years of him shaping me into the perfect little pureblood heir. The perfect soldier for his master. You think I'm better, but I'm not, deep down. I'm exactly what he raised me to be. I'll always be a Malfoy."

"You're a Black, and you know it," Harry argued without hesitation. "Don't pretend your mum hasn't raised you, too. You're a Slytherin, Draco, that doesn't make you your father. Hell, Snape's more your dad than Lucius Malfoy, in the ways that matter. And look at him — he's certainly not the picture of a light wizard, but he's still a good man. He still has the love of a good man, and a family."

"He just had to do awful things to get there."

"And he'll be damned if he lets you follow in his footsteps," Harry pointed out. He refused to let Draco believe, even for a second, that he might have anything but blood in common with Lucius Malfoy. "Don't think like that, Draco. You're a good person."

Draco sighed, pushing Harry's fringe back off his forehead. "I wish I could have your optimism, Scarhead."

Harry grinned, leaning up to steal a kiss. "I'm a Gryffindor, it's what we do," he joked. "Just trust me. Do you really think I'd let you end up like your dad?" Do you really think I'd love you if I thought you could be?

The words were on the tip of his tongue, but he held them in. He didn't want the first time he said it to be during such a grim conversation.

Besides, he felt like Draco knew anyway.

The blond settled under Harry's body. "Promise me you won't," he pleaded. "Promise me you'll stop me becoming like him."

In the back of his mind, Harry's memory flashed back to earlier in the summer, sitting distraught on the kitchen floor and looking up at Remus and Snape. Promise me you won't let me become like him.

"Easiest promise I'll ever keep," he rasped, echoing Remus' words with his heart thudding against his ribs.

Maybe between the lot of them, all those promises would be kept.

Chapter 42

Chapter Notes

CW for non-graphic discussions of a medical emergency/hospitalisation, discussion of death of a teenager.

It tore at Harry's heart to watch Draco and his mother leave — the only bright spot was that Harry had convinced Sirius to lend Draco his two-way mirror, just for the rest of the summer. He saw Sirius regularly, and always had Remus or Ceri to get him if he needed him. Harry couldn't bear to send Draco back home, knowing who was there, if he didn't have a way to communicate.

With his birthday a fond memory, and a new determination burning in his chest — a new fantasy in his mind, of life with Draco after the war was over — Harry threw himself into his training, unsure how much longer he'd have before Dumbledore deigned to allow him to leave his relatives', and his peace would be broken.

Unfortunately, Harry had no idea how quickly that day would come.

Only a few days after his birthday, Harry was training with Remus; Snape had been summoned by Dumbledore for the day. Duelling with Remus was always an interesting experience; he had a totally different style to Snape, but was clearly just as knowledgable, and now he'd stopped worrying about hurting Harry he was quite the challenging opponent. Harry knew the man was still holding back, but it was less than before. There was progress.

Suddenly, the door slammed open — both of them turned their wands instinctively towards the noise, lowering them at the sight of Snape. He looked grave, his lips in a thin line.
“Potter, you need to go to your relatives, immediately.”

Harry's heart sank. “Do they know I'm missing?” Had someone finally decided to investigate the fact that he never left his room?

“Not yet, but they will soon. The Ministry will be there any minute.”

Staring up at Snape's dark eyes, Harry felt his pulse begin to race. “The Ministry?” Had there been an attack on the house?

“There's no easy way to say this. Someone set a dementor loose near your relatives' home, no doubt hoping it would find you. Instead it found your cousin.”

The words echoed in Harry's mind like he was underwater. He barely registered Remus swearing quietly, placing a hand on Harry's shoulder. A dementor, in Little Whinging?

“Dudley? Is he...?” He didn’t need to finish. Snape’s face said it all. “He’s been kissed, hasn’t he?” His stomach lurched.

“I’m afraid so. I wish there was time to explain, but you need to be back in your bedroom before anyone comes to find you.”

“We won’t leave you there long, cub,” Remus assured, wrapping an unresponsive Harry in a tight hug. “I promise.”

Harry couldn’t do anything more than splutter out a few weak agreements, before Ceri appeared with huge worried eyes and took him by the hand. In an instant, the duelling room of Seren Du was replaced by his old bedroom at Privet Drive.

He’d been back a few times, to sit at the window so that his watchers didn’t worry he was dead. The Dursleys had no idea about any of it.

Faintly, he could hear the TV on downstairs; some singing competition show that Petunia liked to watch. His heart thudded in his ears. Did they know yet? Were they even there?

A moment later, Ceri reappeared with his school trunk, and a few other things she settled around the room to make it look like he’d been living there. Harry almost laughed; no one who looked at this room could imagine he was comfortable there, regardless of how much of his stuff was lying about.

“The door is being unlocked, Master Harry,” she assured quietly, wringing her hands. “Call for Ceri if yous be needing anythings.” With a short bow, she disappeared, and Harry was alone.

He stood, in the middle of the room, feeling utterly bereft.

What had just happened??

He didn’t have time to think for long. The doorbell rang through the house, and he swallowed as his throat suddenly grew dry. Carefully, he crept towards the door, cracking open the cat flap at the bottom and crouching to press his ear to the gap.

“Hello, Officer. Is everything alright?” Petunia had answered the door. She had the tone she used when anticipating a juicy bit of gossip. Harry almost gagged.

“Are you Petunia Dursley?” It was a female voice, barely audible over the TV from the living room. “I’m sorry, is your husband home?”

“What’s this all about? Vernon! Vernon, it’s the police!” Petunia’s shrill call rang out. Harry heard the creak and grunt of Vernon levering himself off the sofa, and the TV suddenly went silent.

“What?” Heavy footsteps; Vernon joining Petunia in the hall. “What do you want at this time of night?”

“My apologies, Mr Dursley. I’m afraid it’s about your son.”

"Is my Dudders in trouble? He's a good boy, Officer; if he's done anything, it's those awful friends of his, leading my poor boy astray," Petunia insisted immediately. The officer must have had a look on her face that gave away something, because Petunia let out a quiet whimper.

"I'm so sorry to tell you this, Mr and Mrs Dursley — your son was found in the underpass off Wisteria Walk, he seems to have had some sort of brain bleed. He's... he's unresponsive."

Petunia gasped in horror. Harry was utterly still, fingers clenched around the edge of the cat flap. If this was the muggle police, did the Ministry even know?? Snape seemed sure they did. Were they busy rounding up the dementor? Or was this police officer just an auror in disguise?

Through his aunt's sobbing, Harry heard snippets of the rest of the conversation; Vernon insisting they would head straight to the hospital, demanding to talk to a superior, asking who found Dudley. Just as Harry was about to sit up in case either of them came upstairs for something, he saw a flash of feathers by the window. Wide eyed, he scrambled across the room, opening the window quietly just in time for a medium-sized brown owl to swoop in and drop a letter on the bed.

It was just a scrap of parchment, a short missive in messy, rushed handwriting.

Harry,

Don't go anywhere. We're trying to figure out what happened. Whatever you do, don't leave the house.

Arthur

He couldn't help the derisive snort that left his lips. Don't leave the house? Was Mr Weasley not aware that, as far as the Order was concerned, Harry hadn't left the house all summer??

If he had been out of the house, maybe the dementor would've found him instead of Dudley. His stomach lurched again.

The owl left as soon as it delivered its letter, not waiting for a response. Harry sank onto the bed with shaking knees, curling his fingers around the ragged duvet.

Dudley had been Kissed by a dementor. He was... if not dead yet, then as good as.

All because Harry had been tucked away safe at Seren Du, where nobody could find him.

Part of him was relieved. If he'd been here, if it had been an ordinary summer like Dumbledore and the Order believed... he no doubt would have been right in the dementor's path. He could cast a Patronus, sure, but he wasn't allowed to do magic outside of school. He would've been expelled, or worse — the Dursleys hadn't always let him keep his wand in the summer.

Was that what whoever had sent the dementor had hoped would happen? They had to know he could defend himself against them; everyone at Hogwarts knew he could cast a Patronus after the rumours floating around from third year, and he was sure they must have seen him use it against the boggart dementor in the maze during the Third Task. Had his attacker been hoping to get him expelled? His wand snapped, banned from Hogwarts — an easy target for Voldemort?

He looked up when another owl flew in through the still open window. This one was larger, and had a longer letter, though it too didn't stay for a reply.

Harry,

I'm so very sorry about what happened to your cousin. This is a truly terrible event, and rest assured I have people investigating the matter as we speak.

I have spoken to members of the Ministry who deal in covering up instances of magic use in front of muggles; due to the nature of the way Dudley was found, they have told the muggle officials the boy died of natural causes. The Ministry is also trying to bury this information amongst its people; I'm afraid Minister Fudge is still unwilling to see the truth of Voldemort's return, and refuses to believe someone other than the Ministry might have control over the dementors. It is being treated as an outlying incident, and no doubt will have vanished from record by the morning.

Stay inside the house, and don't do anything rash. A Ministry official will likely be by shortly to discuss your whereabouts and explain the truth to your aunt and uncle. Answer any questions they may have — you did nothing wrong here, Harry. This is all just a cruel and unfortunate case of poor timing.

I will keep you updated as the case progresses. Stay safe, and stay alert.

Sincerely,

Albus Dumbledore

Harry had to read the missive several times over, staring incredulously at the elaborate cursive.

A cruel and unfortunate case of poor timing?? His cousin was soulless. Someone had purposely tried to endanger Harry, and Dudley was dead as a result. Here Dumbledore was acting as if it was just a bit of a mix-up!

He snorted in disgust, shaking his head and tossing the letter aside. He wasn't remotely surprised the Ministry was trying to cover it all up. It wouldn't be great for Fudge's reputation if it got out that not only had a dementor gone on a jaunt far from Azkaban, but it had hunted down the Boy-Who-Lived and kissed a muggle in the process.

Abruptly, Harry realised that his hands were trembling, his breath coming short and fast. He tucked his knees up to his chest, trying to steady himself. He was fine, why was he panicking? The danger had passed — he'd never been in any danger to begin with! Only Dudley had.

Without even thinking about it, he fumbled a hand into his pocket, closing his fingers around the cold surface of the two-way mirror. He could call Sirius, see what was going on.

Wait, no. Sirius was no longer holding the mirror's partner.

He swallowed thickly. Usually he let Draco call him; it was safer that way. But... it was late, Draco would likely be in his room. Surely he could risk it? If he wasn't alone, he just wouldn't answer.

"Draco Malfoy," he whispered, bringing the mirror up to stare at it. He held his breath, not daring to blink, until staring back at him were worried grey eyes and a faint frown.

"Harry? I wasn't expecting your call, is everything alright? Where are you?" Draco's blond brows furrowed, and he tried to peer past Harry's head to figure out his surroundings.

"Draco," Harry choked out, watching his boyfriend grow alarmed.

"What's wrong?"

"My cousin. There was—he's—" Harry sucked in a sharp breath, and when he exhaled the whole story came spilling out. Draco listened, eyes getting wider and wider in horror.

"Sweet Salazar," he swore when Harry was finished. "Well. Thank fuck you weren't there."

"But if I had been, I could've saved him! I could've cast a Patronus!" Harry argued, the guilt welling within him.

"And been expelled for underage magic!" Draco retorted sharply. "If someone has enough clout in the Ministry to send a dementor after you, I bet they could easily make sure you were punished for defending yourself." A strange look flashed across his face. "I bet it was my father. He's got Fudge in his pocket, he could arrange something like this easily."

"Draco, no," Harry insisted. "Don't go down that road. There's plenty of people who want me dead, not just your dad." But he couldn't help the part of him that agreed; it would be very easy for Lucius Malfoy to have done this.

"I'll keep an ear out for any mention of it. If it was him, or one of his friends, no doubt they'll be upset to hear you're okay." Draco's face softened. "You are okay, aren't you? I mean, it's awful, but... your cousin was a terrible person. You weren't exactly close."

"Doesn't mean I wanted him dead," Harry spat.

"Of course not!" Draco agreed quickly. "I'm just saying, I'd rather him than you. And for all he's your blood family, it's not like it was Longbottom or the twins or anything."

Harry's heart twisted at the thought of any of his friends being in Dudley's position. No, Draco was right — while he wouldn't wish the dementor's kiss on his worst enemy, let alone his brute of a cousin, part of him was selfishly glad that no one he truly cared about had been harmed.

He couldn't take another Cedric, not so soon.

"Yeah. Yeah, I just... I was supposed to be here. Someone who wants me dead knows where I live." Clearly Dumbledore's fabled protections weren't all they were cracked up to be. How had none of his guard not noticed what was going on? A dementor was pretty easy to identify!

He opened his mouth to say something, but was cut off by the doorbell ringing once more. His heart dropped to his stomach. "That might be the Ministry. I need to go."

"Be careful," Draco urged. "Call me back when you can."

Harry cut the connection, slipping the mirror back in his pocket and keeping his wrist poised to remove his wand from his holster. He hurried downstairs, peeking through the window to see two men in robes. One was an auror, with the crest displayed on his chest; the other had plain black robes, and was stocky and narrow-eyed. Harry hoped for the neighbours' sake they had Notice-Me-Not charms up; the gossip hounds of Privet Drive would have definitely noticed the police presence at Number 4.

Harry opened the door, warily eyeing the two wizards in front of him.

"Mr Potter," the auror greeted with a nod. Harry realised it was the same man who had come to help arrest Rita Skeeter. Shacklebolt, wasn't it? He was an Order member! Sirius and the others had talked about him, he was sure of it. "I'm Auror Shacklebolt, and this is Mr Runcorn from the Misuse of Magic Department. May we come in?"

"I haven't used any magic," Harry blurted. Shacklebolt cracked a half-smile.

"We know, Mr Potter."

Harry stepped aside to let them in. Runcorn was scowling, a look of distaste on his face as he eyed the blatantly muggle hallway, the pictures of the Dursleys on the walls. "We won't be long," he said curtly, looking like he'd rather be anywhere else. "We simply need to know your whereabouts this evening."

"I've been home all day," Harry replied. It hit him suddenly that he probably wasn't supposed to know about what happened to Dudley. "What's going on? The police were here, they said my cousin was in hospital or something. Was... was it magic related?"

He watched Shacklebolt's face grow grim. "It was, I'm sorry to say. I don't know how to tell you this, Mr Potter, but earlier this evening a dementor found its way to Wisteria Walk, and attacked your cousin on his way home. He... he was Kissed. I'm sorry."

"Found its way?" Harry repeated, unable to help himself. "Like it was just wandering about? I thought dementors were supposed to stay in Azkaban!"

"It's none of your business what the dementors are doing," Runcorn snapped.

"It is if they're sucking the soul out of my cousin!" Harry argued. Shacklebolt held out a placating hand.

"I know this must be upsetting," he said, his voice calm and even. "I promise you, the Ministry is doing everything it can to get to the bottom of this situation." Harry doubted that. "We merely need to ask you some routine questions. You say you stayed home all day?"

"All day, every day," Harry confirmed, trying to keep most of the bite out of his tone. From what he knew, Shacklebolt was part of his guard; he would know that already. An unreadable look crossed the bald wizard's face.

"Right. You didn't notice anything unusual? A cold spell, flickering lights?"

"I didn't notice any of the usual signs of dementors, no." Harry folded his arms over his chest. "I had the lights off, anyway. I was trying to get an early night." An easy lie. The lightbulb in his room hadn't worked in years. The lights were always off.

"An early night, on a Saturday in the middle of summer?" Runcorn sneered.

"I don't sleep well, these days," Harry snapped in reply. "Nightmares." He thought he saw a smirk cross the man's face for the barest of moments. Shacklebolt, on the other hand, looked sympathetic.

"Understandable, after... what happened. Your aunt and uncle didn't notice anything?"

"Not that I know of. But I haven't spoken to them much this evening." If Shacklebolt was part of the Order — part of Harry's guard — then he likely knew about the difficult relationship between Harry and his relatives. But Harry refused to give Runcorn the satisfaction of any kind of insight into his home life. There was something about the man that put his back up, his magic itching in disgust. "What are they being told?"

"At the moment, the muggle doctors are telling them what they believe to be true; that your cousin suffered a spontaneous brain bleed that has caused him to go catatonic, and left him in a vegetative state. Mr Runcorn and I will wait here with you for them to return, and explain things properly to them."

Harry grimaced. "I would really rather you didn't."

"We won't be an imposition—" Shacklebolt started, but Harry shook his head.

"Not that. Telling them about the dementor. My aunt and uncle... they aren't fond of magic." He flicked his gaze to Runcorn, unsure how best to word things. "It confuses them. Scares them a bit, I think. All my aunt really knows of magic is that it killed my parents. If she knows it killed her son, too... it would devastate them." And they would murder him, because they would assume it was his fault. Which it sort-of was; the dementor certainly wasn't there randomly.

"That is highly unusual, Mr Potter," Runcorn began.

"I'd say it's an unusual situation, Mr Runcorn," Harry retorted waspishly. "Please, if you've any decency, let my aunt and uncle believe their son suffered a tragic and unexpected natural death. Let them mourn their son without adding the confusion of magical creatures to the mix. It'll be hard enough explaining what a dementor is to them, let alone what one was doing all the way out here by itself. I don't want to scare them."

Shacklebolt pursed his lips. "Perhaps you're right. It can't do any harm to let them believe what the doctors said. It's not like it changes the poor boy's outcome at all."

"Tell them, don't tell them, it makes no difference to me — if they don't know, they can't go screaming about dementors through half of Surrey and cause the Obliviation team the stress," Runcorn remarked with a roll of his eyes. God, Harry wanted to hex the man. Did he not care even a little bit that a teenage boy was all but dead? Just because the boy was a muggle.

"Very well; I'll go with your wishes, Mr Potter. And once again, I'm terribly sorry for your loss, and the Ministry will do whatever we can to find the truth of the situation. If there's anything we can do to help, please do let us know." Shacklebolt seemed sincere, but it just made Harry angrier. They both knew the Ministry wasn't going to do a damned thing.

"Thank you. I think I'd just like to go to bed, if you don't mind." Harry sent a pointed glance to the door.

"Of course. Send an owl if you have any questions or concerns, or you change your mind about telling your family and they wish to speak to an official," Shacklebolt said. Harry knew he would be doing neither of those things, but he nodded all the same, managing a tight attempt at a smile. The two wizards didn't bother going back out the door, merely apparating straight out of the hallway. Once they were gone, Harry let out a long breath, running a hand through his hair. Merlin, this was a clusterfuck of a situation.

. . .

The Dursleys weren't back until early the next morning. Harry was awake as soon as he heard the front door open — he'd barely been asleep, uncomfortable in the room after getting used to his bed in Seren Du, his dreams full of cloaked amorphous figures and sucking, rattling breaths.

Petunia was sobbing quietly. Harry wondered if she'd been crying the entire night. He heard Vernon murmuring to her, his voice surprisingly soft. Of course, the only things the man seemed to actually care about were his reputation and his son.

"I'll put the kettle on," Petunia declared shakily.

"No, Pet, let's just go to bed. We had enough tea at the bloody hospital," Vernon sighed. If Petunia protested, Harry couldn't hear it. He listened silently to the stairs creaking under Vernon's weight, and their bedroom door shut with a click. His heart was in his throat.

He couldn't stay here. So far, his aunt and uncle had no idea he'd returned — if Vernon saw his face now, so soon after losing his son... Harry probably wouldn't have much of a face left by the end of it. Even if Ceri brought him food, he'd still need to use the bathroom. If he stayed, they'd notice him eventually.

He couldn't stay here.

Waiting a while, until Vernon's loud snores drifted from the master bedroom, Harry sat up in bed. "Ceri," he called quietly. The house elf appeared immediately. She had a tea tray in her hands; a cup of tea, two of his favourite chocolate biscuits, and a plate of toast with the cherry jam he liked.

"If Master Harry is wanting a bigger breakfast, Ceri can cook," she began, but Harry waved her off with a smile.

"This is perfect, thanks, Ceri." He doubted he could stomach much more. Guilt coiled in him like acid, making him nauseous every time he thought about Dudley. "Is anyone home, Ceri? Or are they all with the Order?"

"Seren Du is being empty — everyone is at the other house, sir. Mister Remus gave Ceri this to give to Master Harry." She pulled a folded piece of parchment from the pocket of her pinafore dress.

Cub,

The Order is a bit blindsided with this whole mess. Currently trying to figure out the next step. With any luck, they'll agree to move you here soon. Sit tight, I'll be in touch when we know more. We love you.

Moony

He sighed, letting the note flutter to the mattress. More waiting, then. "Thanks, Ceri."

Ceri bowed, then disappeared, leaving Harry alone with his breakfast. He dunked a biscuit in his tea, careful not to let it break.

Hopefully he would be saved soon, whichever way it happened. He couldn't stand being in Privet Drive for long.

.-.

Luckily, Harry only had to wait until early that afternoon — he was just debating with himself whether to risk a bathroom run, when Ceri appeared in his room, bringing Remus with her. The werewolf immediately strode to Harry's side, wrapping him up in a tight hug. "I'm so sorry, cub," he murmured. Harry leaned into the embrace.

"I didn't even like Dudley," he argued feebly. Remus pulled back just enough to shoot him a knowing look.

"That doesn't mean his death doesn't hurt," he replied. Dropping a kiss on Harry's hair, he straightened up. "The Order has been trying to push the Ministry into properly investigating, but it seems to be a lost cause. Since no one magical was harmed, and the dementor has been returned to Azkaban, they seem to be done with the matter." His opinion of that was clear on his face.

"I expected as much. Do we know who did it yet?" He couldn't shake Draco's worry that Lucius was responsible. He'd spoken to his boyfriend again before going to sleep, just to assure him he was okay. The Slytherin seemed convinced his father was at least partly to blame.

“Not yet. It’s likely we never will, with the investigation being closed up. Kingsley said you asked for your aunt and uncle to be left unaware.” There was curiosity in his tone. Harry grimaced.

“If they knew it was magic-related, they’d blame me. I can’t risk them thinking that... especially if I have to stay here until Dumbledore sends someone to get me.”

Remus’ eyes flashed gold for a moment. “I won’t let them hurt you ever again,” he vowed fiercely. Harry’s jaw clenched, but he stayed silent. He didn’t want to have that conversation — not now, preferably not ever. “The good news is, Dumbledore has decided to have the Order retrieve you during your cousin’s funeral. A few people seemed quite surprised and upset that you wouldn’t be able to go and say your goodbyes, but he insisted it was the safest time to extract you.”

“I wouldn’t be welcome there anyway,” Harry pointed out ruefully. He wasn’t sure if he’d want to go even if he could. “Funerals take a while though, right?” He’d never been to one, wizarding or muggle. Cedric’s funeral was too small. It had been almost two weeks after his death, though — Harry wasn’t sure he could last that long at Privet Drive.

“It’s on Thursday. I suppose your aunt and uncle wanted to get things done quickly,” Remus told him. “They’ll be sending someone to collect you on Thursday at two.”

“Can I come home?” Harry blurted, unable to help himself. “The Dursleys don’t know I’m here. If I’ve got a few days... the Order won’t find out, right, if I’m not here? The guard hasn’t changed?”

“No, the guard is still the same. Dumbledore thinks it unlikely that a second attack will come so soon after the first, if at all.”

“Then can I come home? Please?” He hated how his voice cracked. “I don’t want to stay here by myself, not even until Thursday.”

Remus sighed, pulling him closer again. “Oh, cub.” He nosed Harry’s temple wolfishly. “Of course. Of course you can come home, love.”

Harry practically melted in relief.

.-. .

Unlike last summer, when Harry had been determined to fit as much fun and freedom as possible into his last days at Seren Du, he was subdued in the few days before Dudley’s funeral. The whole household was — even though Harry hadn’t been anywhere near the attack, the knowledge of how close he could’ve been weighed heavily on all of them.

Harry made sure to tie up all his loose ends, writing letters to all those he’d no longer be able to talk to until school started up again. He promised Susan he’d keep going through the laws the best he could; between all of them they were making good headway into the project, and she was attacking it with true Hufflepuff determination. The only person he told about what happened to his cousin was Neville, promising to give his friend the whole story when they were back at school. He spent a little time with Buckbeak, went for one last fly by himself, and made cookies with Ceri to try and cheer himself up.

By Wednesday evening, all he had left to do was repack his trunk for school. The decision of which books to bring with him seemed even harder this year; not only because his exams were approaching, but because he had so many things he wanted to learn before he was thrown into his next near-death experience.

“Severus has copies of most of those in his quarters.” Harry whipped around, seeing Remus in the doorway. The werewolf was the only other adult who had been around since the dementor attack; the Order were around too much for Sirius to get away, and Dumbledore had errands for Snape to run. Most of the time, Harry had been alone. “If there’s anything you need in them, I’m sure he’ll let you borrow them.”

Harry looked down at the set of Defence texts in his lap. “That’s good to know.” He eased them back on the shelf, looking at the rest of his pile. “Do you know if I’ll be able to train during school time?”

“Harry, it’s your OWL year, you’ll be busy,” Remus started, but Harry rolled his eyes.

“I think training is a bit more important than some exams, Moony,” he reasoned. “Besides, you’ve all said I know enough to do well. I’m not worried about my exams.” That was the truth. He’d come on in leaps and bounds since having his magic unblocked, and was at least a year ahead of himself in most subjects.

“You’ll still have lots of homework, though, and quidditch.”

Harry levelled the werewolf with a determined expression. After a few moments, Remus sighed. “If you insist, I’m sure Severus will find the time. As long as you’re able to keep Dumbledore oblivious. It might not be safe.”

Harry hadn’t thought about it like that. The last thing he wanted was for Dumbledore to get suspicious of any interactions between Harry and the Potions Master. “Okay. But I can still work on things alone.” He was making good progress with his animagus transformation, and he didn’t want to let his duelling skills get rusty. It could cost lives otherwise.

“Just remember, you’re still only fifteen,” Remus reminded, carding a hand through Harry’s messy hair. “A powerful fifteen, but fifteen all the same. Let the adults do their jobs in protecting you, the best we can.”

“That doesn’t always work out too well in practice,” Harry pointed out. Still, he leant into the touch. “I’ll try, Moony.”

“You’ve got a lot on your plate this year, cub.” Remus cracked a faint smile. “Just focus on your classwork and your government takeover, let us work on the rest, alright?”

Harry laughed. “Yeah, okay.” The government takeover was mostly Susan’s brainchild, but Harry was a big part of the driving force. He was the figurehead needed to push for change — and to eventually knock Dumbledore off his pedestal, when they were ready. It wouldn’t be for a while yet, but the heirs wanted to make sure everything was in place and ready as soon as they could strike. The Ministry and the Wizengamot had been left to languish and grow corrupt for far too long.

“Are you about ready for tomorrow?”

Harry knew Remus wasn’t asking about the state of his packing. His chest tightened, anxiety clawing its way up as he thought about being surrounded by people again. Having to slip back into his Golden Boy persona. Having to face Ron and Hermione and Dumbledore, and a bunch of strangers — worse, having them offer their condolences for Dudley like they had any idea how Harry felt about the matter.

Even Harry didn’t know how he felt about the matter.

“I think so. As ready as I’ll ever be.” He drew a steady breath, glancing up at Remus. “I just... What happened to Dudley is my fault. I know, I know — I couldn’t have done anything, blame it on whoever sent the dementor, whatever,” he added before Remus could argue. “But the fact of the matter is, he’s dead because someone wanted me dead. Just like Cedric. And I... I hate that he’s dead, and I hate that I feel responsible. I hate that I feel sorry for them, when they were so awful to me for so long, but — they didn’t deserve this. No one deserves this. My aunt and uncle hate me, but they loved Dudley, and I— he was just a kid, y’know? He was only fifteen.”

To his horror, there were tears welling in his eyes. All of a sudden, he was wrapped in Remus’ embrace, head pillowed against the man’s broad chest. “It’s okay, cub,” he soothed. “It’s a complicated situation; you feel whatever you need to feel. Your family are terrible people, but you’re right — they didn’t deserve to lose their son so young, no matter what they’ve done. Dudley didn’t deserve what happened to him. But you are in no way responsible, Harry. You don’t deserve any of what’s happened to you either. And their tragedy doesn’t detract from how they’ve treated you for so long. It doesn’t redeem them.”

“I can’t face them again, Moony,” Harry whispered through his tears. “They might not know what happened, but I do, and this— this will have broken them. I don’t know what they’ll do to me if I see them again.” Even if they had no idea of the truth of Dudley’s death, it wouldn’t stop them from blaming their misfortune on Harry. They’d been doing it his whole life; everything from a bad day at work to an unfortunate turn in the weather was Harry’s fault, and he’d been punished for it.

“I don’t know what’s going to happen in future. I can’t know that,” Remus said, his voice soft. “But I know that Sirius and I would die before we allowed you to be alone with those monsters again. I don’t know what they’ve done to you, cub — I hope one day, you might feel comfortable enough to tell us — but I swear to you, they won’t lay a finger on you again as long as I live. Even if you’re forced to spend time under their roof.”

There was a hint of a growl, a touch of the wolf to his promise, and it settled something deep within Harry’s chest. A promise like that, coming from Remus — Harry believed it.

.--.

Ceri dropped Harry off at the Dursleys' at half past one on Thursday. With his trunk at his side, he didn't have to bother trying to make the room look lived-in. His door was locked from the outside, he knew; all eight latches. This had to be believable, and there was no way the Dursleys would have left him home alone with the door unlocked, regardless of how long they might be. They'd let him piss on the floor before they gave him free access to their house.

Harry sat on the edge of the bed, stroking Hedwig's feathers through the bars of her cage. She seemed unimpressed by the change of scenery, but they had to keep up appearances.

His knee bounced as he waited. He forced himself not to think about his aunt and uncle, what they might be doing — had the service started yet? Were they carrying the coffin to the cemetery?

He was torn from his thoughts by the sound of apparition; multiple people, downstairs. Even though he'd been expecting them, he still jumped up, wand in hand and pointed at the door. He heard muffled voices; some familiar, some not.

The footsteps on the stairs were strange; a rhythmic shuffle-thud, almost like someone had a limp, or walked with a heavy cane. "Potter!" The bark sent a shiver down his spine. He shook it off, reminding himself that this was not Barty Crouch Jr — this had to be the real Alastor Moody. "Merlin's balls, have you got enough locks on there?"

"Locks?" A female voice, again familiar, though Harry couldn't quite place it. "What, on the outside?" Someone jogged up the stairs. Harry felt his cheeks burn — how many people had come, to gawp at the truth of the home life of the Boy-Who-Lived? How many members of the Order had decided to see why he hadn't left the house all summer?

"Give us a moment, Harry." He relaxed; that was Remus. He heard several clicks in quick succession, and the door swung open.

Squeezed together on the small landing outside his room stood Moody, Remus, and the bright-haired auror who was friends with Charlie. This time, her hair was bubblegum pink. She grinned at him, waving. "Wotcher, Harry!"

Her name was Tonks, Harry remembered. Nymphadora Tonks — Andromeda's daughter. She was Sirius' cousin.

Harry didn't lower his wand. "Moony," he greeted neutrally. "What creature was in the tank in your office the first time we had tea together?" The only one of the three he actually knew; he wasn't taking any chances. Even though he could feel with his magic that it truly was his pseudo-godfather, it didn't hurt to check.

"A grindylow," Remus replied promptly. Harry lowered his wand, sliding it back into his holster.

"Constant vigilance!" Moody barked, a smile twisting his scarred face. "Good lad, Potter."

“It’s nice to meet you, Professor Moody.”

“Bah!” Moody’s fake eye whizzed around in its socket. “Didn’t do much teaching, now, did I? Just Moody to you. This is Tonks. Dumbledore sent us to get you out of here.”

“That’s why you couldn’t go to the funeral,” Tonks piped up, her hair colour dimming sadly for a brief moment. “We’re really sorry you can’t say goodbye to your cousin properly, Harry.”

“That’s not why I’m not at the funeral,” Harry told her bluntly, watching her nose wrinkle in confusion. “But I’m glad you came while my relatives were out.”

“You all packed?” Moody asked gruffly, limping forward, eye still whirring. It prickled at Harry’s skin uncomfortably; exactly how much could he see with that thing? Harry still wasn’t sure.

“Just about.” He made a show of grabbing some quills and parchment off his desk and tucking them into his trunk — he wasn’t supposed to know he was being rescued, so he hadn’t wanted to be completely ready for them. Stuffing some clothes in haphazardly, he shut the lid, pretending to look around for one last check. “I’m ready.”

“Is the cat yours? Or your family’s?” Tonks asked curiously, gesturing to the cat flap. Harry’s return smile was bitter.

“That isn’t for a cat.” He would have felt bad about the bewilderment on her face, but really, was she being so oblivious on purpose? He’d been locked in. Eight times over! “How are we getting to... wherever we’re going?”

“Apparating,” Remus supplied. “It’s not the most comfortable thing in the world, but it’s the most discreet way to travel at this time of day. We’ll have to do a few different jumps, to make sure we don’t leave a trail.”

“Mad-Eye here wanted to fly you out,” Tonks volunteered, sounding amused. “But we can’t do that in broad daylight.”

“Yes, yes, it’s a shame we can’t wait ’til nightfall. Bloody muggles,” Moody groused. “Let your owl free, Potter, she’ll meet you there.”

“Would if I could, sir.” Harry was getting a perverse amount of pleasure from playing this authentically; Hedwig’s cage was padlocked, as it would have been by Vernon if he’d truly stayed all summer.

“Ah, I’ll get it.” A tap of Remus’ wand, and the padlock dropped to the ground. Harry opened the cage — Hedwig, bless her devious little heart, made a show of stretching out her wings and adjusting her feathers, as if she’d been cooped up for weeks. She butted her head against Harry’s chin, nipped him on the ear, then took off out the open window.

“Right, let’s get moving, then. We’ve been dawdling too long as it is.” Moody straightened up, passing Harry’s trunk to Tonks, and Hedwig’s cage to Remus. “Take my arm, Potter.”

It felt wrong to be trusting Moody to apparate him, even though he knew this was the real deal. Remus gave him an encouraging look over Moody's head, and Harry squared his shoulders, before gripping Moody's forearm tightly.

When Remus had said 'a few different jumps', Harry hadn't imagined the stomach-churning, disorienting hell that followed. A crack, and they were stood in a dingy alley somewhere. Before he could even breathe, Moody had let go of him, and another hand grabbed his arm. "Hold tight!"

Another crack, and he was in a field. His head was spinning. The hand on his arm let go, and a vaguely familiar arm wrapped around his waist, pulling him against a firm chest. "I've got you, cub."

Another crack — this time he was on a rocky cliff. His stomach lurched. Remus let go of him. He was gripped by the wrist tightly.

Another crack, Harry's vision blacked out for a second; when the world returned to focus, he was stood in the middle of an ordinary muggle street, Moody holding onto his wrist, practically keeping him upright. A half-beat later and Remus and Tonks appeared, Remus stood close behind Harry, discreetly steadyng him. "Sorry about that, cub. It's a little much when you're not used to it, but it's the safest way."

Harry had thought he was getting used to apparition by now, but he didn't think he'd ever get used to that. "I might be sick," he declared, hearing Tonks giggle.

"Pick a point and stare at it 'til the world stops spinning, there's a lad," Moody instructed, no sympathy in his tone whatsoever. "Can you read?"

"Generally? Yes. Right now? Debatable."

Tonks giggled again. Even Moody snorted, lips twisting in amusement. "Read this."

It took a few seconds for Harry's vision to steady enough to make out the words on the scrap of parchment Moody thrust his way. It was in Dumbledore's unmistakeable handwriting.

The Headquarters of the Order of the Phoenix is located at Number Twelve Grimmauld Place

Harry read it again, committing it to memory. When he looked up, there was a whole new building squeezed in between numbers eleven and thirteen. The parchment in his hand burst into flames, scattering ash on his shoes.

Finally, he would get to meet the Order.

Chapter 43

Chapter Notes

CW for mentions of child abuse/neglect

The first thing Harry registered upon stepping through the door of Number Twelve was his godfather's smiling face.

"Sirius!" His relief was real; he hadn't seen the man in almost a week, and what a hell of a week it had been. He threw himself into his godfather's arms, some of the tension leaving him when Sirius hugged him tight.

"I've got you, pup," he promised in a fierce whisper. "You're alright."

Harry almost broke down there and then, but muffled voices reminded him they weren't alone. Reluctantly, he pulled back, making a face when he saw their surroundings. Sirius had mentioned the house was in poor shape, but he hadn't expected it to be so... dark.

"Good to see you, mate!"

"About time you showed up!"

The twins were whispering, which Harry found odd, but they beamed at him from behind Sirius. Nudging past the animagus, George ruffled Harry's hair, tucking him between himself and Fred and leading him through a door off to the side. Harry found himself in a very full kitchen, the smell of cooking meat making his stomach rumble.

"Oh, Harry, dear!" The twins were dislodged as their mother hurried over, and Harry tried not to stiffen too much when he was bundled in a rib-cracking hug. "Look at you, you're far too skinny, you poor thing!" She patted his cheek, eyeing him over with a frown on her face.

"Pale as a ghost, too. Have you been getting any sun at all?"

Harry wasn't that pale, and he grit his teeth — as far as she knew, he'd been shut in his room all summer; was she trying to rub it in?

"I'm afraid you can't stay long; it's almost time for the Order meeting. But I'll make you a quick sandwich to take up with you — did you have lunch? Never mind; you're a growing boy, you can always eat more! I'll only be a minute."

Harry turned towards the table, around which were several people he didn't recognise, all of whom were staring at him with varying levels of interest. He was saved having to say anything by the door opening, and Ginny skidding in past Tonks.

“You’re here!” she crowed in delight, practically jumping on Harry in a hug. He couldn’t help but laugh, smiling into her strawberry-scented hair.

“Hi, Gin.”

When she pulled back, she kept her hands on his shoulders, studying him carefully. “You’re looking better than I thought you would. Are you alright?” Harry didn’t know how much of the question was for show, and he shrugged.

“All things considered, not bad.” That seemed to be enough for the redhead, and she nodded decisively.

The door opened again, and Snape strode in, his customary sneer on his face. Harry didn’t react at the sight of him, though he saw the faintest flicker of approval in the man’s dark eyes when he saw the Gryffindor. “I see we are to be blessed with Potter’s presence once more,” he drawled. Sirius growled, only to get a whack on the shoulder with Mrs Weasley’s wooden spoon.

“Severus, goodness, is it time already? Kids, come on, we’d better get you upstairs — yes, Fred, George, for the last time that means you as well! I don’t care if you’re of age, you’re still in school, and you’ll stay out of all this.” With a plate piled high with sandwiches floating behind her, Mrs Weasley beckoned Harry over. “I thought I’d put you in with Ron, dear; I’ll show you the way.”

“Harry’s taking my old room, Molly,” Sirius said, stepping forward and placing a hand on Harry’s shoulder. “I’ll take him up.”

“Nonsense; the boys share all the time when they’re at the Burrow, it’s no trouble.”

“Harry is my godson, and this is my house,” Sirius reminded her firmly. “He’s had a difficult summer, and if he wants the privacy of his own bedroom, he can have it.”

Mrs Weasley turned to Harry, as if expecting him to argue and insist he wanted to share with Ron. Harry had no intention of doing so, and flashed his godfather a smile. “Thanks, Sirius.”

“No problem, kid.” Sirius grinned, reaching out to steal one of the sandwiches. “Come on, I’ll show you around. Stay quiet in the main hall, now; my mother’s portrait is sleeping. She’s a bit of a hag, you don’t want to wake her up.”

That explained the whispering earlier. Before Mrs Weasley could protest, Sirius had grabbed the plate of food and was headed for the door, three redheads and Harry in his wake. They tiptoed up two flights of stairs, lined with a grotesque collection of severed house elf heads, and turned to a door with a tarnished silver nameplate. Sirius Orion Black. Sirius nudged the door open with his elbow.

It was as dark and austere as the rest of the house, though clearly teenaged Sirius had done his best to lighten it up — a Gryffindor banner took up half of one wall, along with a collection of muggle posters of scantily clad women posing with motorbikes. Sirius flushed sheepishly. “I was a bit enthusiastic with the Sticking charm when I was young. Wanted to piss off Mum. I’ll figure out how to get them down, don’t worry.”

Harry snorted. “S’alright. Not like they do anything for me.” At least they were muggle posters, and wouldn’t wave and wink at him like the girls he’d seen in some of his dormmates’ dirty mags. “This was your room, huh?”

“My childhood prison,” Sirius agreed wryly. “Until I abandoned ship and moved to the Potters’. Feel free to snoop — Merlin only knows what’s in here, I haven’t been through it since I left.”

The three Weasleys hung awkwardly in the doorway, and Harry beckoned them in. “I don’t mind,” he assured. “I wanted to talk to you guys anyway.”

“I’d better get down to the meeting,” Sirius said, rolling his eyes. He set the sandwiches down on the bed, then reached into his jacket pocket. “Moony gave me this, by the way.” It was Harry’s trunk, which he resized and set at the end of the bed. “I think Tonks still has Hedwig’s cage.”

“Brilliant, thanks.” Harry gave Sirius one last hug, then let him leave. As soon as the door shut behind him, George raised his wand, putting up a privacy ward.

“Just in case Ronnienkins comes snooping when he realises you’re here,” he declared. He perched on the edge of the bed, raising an eyebrow at one of the muggle women in the posters before leaning back against the wall. “So. How you doing, kid?”

Harry couldn’t help the snort that escaped him. Kicking off his shoes, he made himself comfortable on the bed, leaving plenty of room for Ginny and Fred too. He reached for a sandwich, his stomach rumbling. “I was doing great until a dementor killed my cousin,” he said flatly. All three redheads winced.

“I’m so sorry, Harry. It’s awful, what happened. Even if your cousin was an arse.” Ginny squeezed his hand sympathetically. “But you’ve been okay besides all that?”

“Yeah, mostly. I still... I still have the odd nightmare, about the graveyard,” he admitted. “But Remus has been really great helping me work through stuff. And I kept busy. I’m not the interesting one, though; what’s been going on here?”

Even though he’d been exchanging letters with the twins and Ginny through Remus all summer, there was still tons they hadn’t talked about. Harry knew the basics, of course; the Order had meetings here, and in the mean time the kids cleaned the house. But he knew the twins had figured out a way to eavesdrop, and he wanted to know how much they knew.

He was impressed by the explanation of the Extendable Ears, though hid his smile when Ginny complained Snape was onto them and had started warding the door.

“We don’t know much about what they’re doing,” George admitted. “But You-Know-Who has been quiet all summer. No raids, no mysterious deaths, nothing. We think he’s making the most of Fudge refusing to believe he's back — gathering his forces in secret while no one's really looking for him."

Harry hummed in agreement; that fit with what little Snape had told him, and what he'd seen through his scar.

"Do you... have you been getting the Prophet, wherever you were?" Ginny asked cautiously. Harry winced; he understood her trepidation.

"Unfortunately, yes." Even without Rita Skeeter on the payroll, the Prophet was doing a fine job of coming up with ridiculous stories painting Harry as a lunatic and Dumbledore the same. Harry couldn't say he was surprised, and he didn't entirely hate the way they were discrediting the headmaster. He wasn't looking forward to going back to school, though.

The twins exchanged identical grimaces. "Yeah, it's all a bit of a mess," Fred muttered.

"Have you seen much of Dumbledore?" Harry asked. While he'd been working on his plans for the upcoming year, he'd toyed with the worry that some of his friends might be under similar Compulsion charms like he once had. Maybe that was the reason Ron and Hermione were reporting back to the headmaster on him.

He could hope.

"He's been in and out for Order meetings. Stayed for dinner once or twice," George volunteered. "I haven't seen him talk much to Ron or Hermione, though — except for when he told them not to tell you anything sensitive in letters."

"What letters?" Harry remarked, rolling his eyes. "I bet he didn't care a bit that I wasn't leaving the house, that they knew."

Here, Ginny bit her lip. "Dad brought it up a few times. He was part of your guard at first. Dumbledore reassigned him when Dad started talking about sending a note through your window to check you were okay."

"I did wonder if anyone was remotely concerned that I didn't seem to leave my room ever," Harry said derisively.

"They were all just told to let you grieve," Fred confirmed. "We tried to explain that you'd told us your relatives wouldn't let you have mail, and what they were like and all. Dumbledore wouldn't have any of it; he convinced everyone that he'd know if you were harmed in any way, and they just had to leave you be. He said it might upset you more to have contact with the magical world before you were done grieving your loss of innocence." He made a face, and Harry did the same. What a load of bullshit!

"I'm so glad it was all a ruse, or I'd really have been fucked this summer," he mused. A shudder ran down his spine when he imagined it; being tossed to the Dursleys alone and unaided, after watching a friend die and Voldemort rise again right in front of his face. That gaping hole in his chest, left to fester all summer... he would have been in a dark, dark place.

Ginny bumped her shoulder against his sympathetically. “Ron and Hermione have been in their own little world all summer. They’re not together,” she added quickly at his surprised look, “but they don’t spend much time with us except when Mum makes us all clean together. Hermione tries to talk to me sometimes, when Ron’s pissed her off, but... all she wants to talk about is you, and all the things we’d have to do to help you once you got here.”

“Control me, you mean,” he said, grimacing. “Merlin... I’m not looking forward to that for the next month.”

“Are you going to keep pretending you’re friends?” George asked. “Or has that ship sailed?”

“I think by now, Dumbledore is pretty aware I keep shedding his Compulsions,” Harry said. “I don’t mind him thinking that as long as he’s not suspicious about the blocks.” He’d spent a lot of time thinking about how he would go about the upcoming school year; the time for hiding completely had passed. Let Dumbledore think he was just having a bit of a rebellious phase; let the man try and bring him to heel. Harry putting a wrench in his plans might hopefully leave him on the back foot, and allow Susan and her scheming to start crumbling his pedestal.

“So we’re all good to prank Ron this year?” Fred’s brown eyes were bright with mischief. Harry grinned.

“Be my guest.”

“Wicked,” the twins murmured in unison. Harry almost felt sorry for Ron. Almost.

“What else has been going on, then? I thought Bill would be here? And Percy?” He thought Charlie was the only one still out of the country.

The siblings shared a loaded glance. “Bill’s got a flat that Gringotts put him up in, he only comes in sometimes. Percy...” Ginny trailed off. The twins scowled.

“We don’t talk about that prat anymore,” George declared. Harry raised an eyebrow. That sounded like a story.

“He’s practically attached at the hip to Fudge,” Fred explained. “Siding with him on everything, thinks Dumbledore’s cracked and you’re an attention-seeking little brat. He had one hell of a row with Mum and Dad before we moved in here — said some bad shit to both of them, but Dad especially. Stormed out, we haven’t seen him since. Mum cries every time she so much as thinks about him.”

Harry let out a low whistle. “Wow.” He never would have expected that of Percy. Supporting the Minister, yes — he had always placed a lot of importance on rules and order and authority structures. But to go against his family... that was surprising.

“Right. No talking about Percy, got it.” He hummed thoughtfully, wondering if there was anything else to catch up on. It was easy with these three; he’d been talking to them all summer, there wasn’t much of a gap to fill in. And he definitely didn’t want to talk about Dudley or dementors or any of that yet.

Reaching for another sandwich, he grinned. “So, tell me — how hard should I go on the temper tantrum in front of the others?”

Dumbledore wanted a broken, grieving teenage boy, isolated from his friends and loved ones?

Harry would deliver that and more.

.-.-.-.

They were up in Harry’s room for a few hours before Sirius knocked, letting them know the meeting was over and dinner would be ready shortly. “I’d offer you the tour, but quite frankly, the less you see of this god-awful place, the better,” the animagus remarked to Harry as they walked downstairs. The twins had apparated away to go check on a potion they were brewing, while Ginny had disappeared to pester Tonks into staying for dinner.

“It is a bit… grim,” Harry agreed, looking around at the peeling wallpaper and dark wood panels. “Was it any better when you were a kid?” He couldn’t imagine growing up in a place like this.

“Bit cleaner,” Sirius said. “But the decor hasn’t changed. I swear, if I’m stuck here much longer I’m gonna gut the place and remodel it. Might be a fun project once you’re all back at school.”

“If the house will let you,” Harry half joked. The dark magic soaked into the walls was practically tangible; he got the feeling it would fight any renovations. Sirius grinned, baring his teeth.

“That’s half the fun of it, pup! Quiet, now.” He put a finger over his lips, stepping cautiously into the main hall, gesturing towards a heavy velvet curtain covering most of one wall. Harry assumed it was not in fact a window.

“Your mum?” he whispered. Sirius nodded.

“She’ll be the first thing to go, as soon as I can figure out how. I’ll knock the damn wall out if I have to.”

The kitchen was still the hub of activity, though most of the Order members had left. That was a shame; Harry was curious to meet them. He noticed Snape had gone, too.

“Harry!” Ron goggled at him from across the table. “When’d you get here? Where have you been?”

“In my room. Got here a bit after two.”

“Your room? You’re sharing with me, mate. Mum said.”

“Yeah, turns out Sirius cleared out his old room for me, so I’ll be in there.”

"It's good to see you, Harry. You're looking well." Hermione's voice was cautious — she clearly knew better than to expect a warm welcome. Harry clenched his jaw.

"Hermione." He nodded in her direction.

Mrs Weasley looked perplexed by the stilted interaction, but breezed through it regardless. "Sit, sit, dinner will be ready in a few. Do you want a drink, Harry, dear?"

When she offered him a glass of pumpkin juice, she set it in front of the seat beside Hermione. Harry moved it to claim the free space between Ginny and Sirius. Ginny squeezed his knee under the table.

"Have you met Tonks yet, Harry?" she asked, gesturing to the pink-haired auror on her other side. "She's great!"

"Briefly. Hi." Harry waved, making Tonks grin.

"Hiya. Finally got your land legs back?" she teased.

"Just about, yeah. You're an auror, right? I remember you from the Rita Skeeter thing."

"Ahh, that was a good day," Tonks sighed, a satisfied look on her face. "Yup, that was me! Kingsley — Shacklebolt, the other auror there, I think you met him the other night — he's in the Order too." She gestured further down the table, where the bald auror was sat talking to Mr Weasley. He looked up at the sound of his name, smiling.

"It's nice to meet you properly, Mr Potter. I'm truly sorry for the previous circumstances." He looked it, too. Harry just nodded a little stiffly.

"Tonks is also my cousin," Sirius cut in, leaning an arm across the back of Harry's chair. "I don't know if I mentioned that. Her mum's mum was my dad's sister."

"Mum was disowned when she married Dad, though," Tonks informed him cheerfully. "So we're not technically part of the Black family anymore."

"Count yourselves lucky," Sirius said, rolling his eyes. "Not exactly a great club to be part of."

"Tonks is a metamorphmagus!" Ginny enthused, before the conversation could get soured by talk of Sirius' relatives. Harry's eyebrows shot up.

"That's supposed to be really rare, isn't it?" He'd read about the trait in the Black family grimoire. Tonks smiled, her nose becoming long and narrow like the old Disney cartoon of Pinocchio.

"Rarer every generation!" she confirmed. "I'm the only one in Britain, as far as we know. There's a fair few in Europe though, and in the States. Came in handy for the disguises part of my auror training!"

"She takes requests, too. Show him the duck!" Ginny bounced eagerly in her seat, laughing when Tonks' nose and mouth became a bright yellow duck bill. "Merlin, that never gets old."

When her face was back to normal, Tonks shot Harry a wink. "What do you think?"

"Very cool," he confirmed, grinning.

The conversation was interrupted by Mrs Weasley's declaration that food was ready, and the chaos began; dishes floated every which way as people summoned what they wanted, occasionally both summoning the same thing at once and causing a minor spill. Harry was learning first-hand what Sirius had meant about his cousin being clumsy — in serving herself, Tonks had almost flung the beef shoulder across the table, caused an avalanche of mashed potato, and somehow got peas in Remus' hair.

"I'm so sorry, Remus!" she exclaimed, cheeks turning pink. The werewolf smiled, brushing the vegetables from his hair and vanishing them.

"No worries; I've had worse from food fights back in my school days."

"That was not an invitation, boys," Mrs Weasley reprimanded when the twins lit up. George pouted, making Harry snicker.

"Do all these people live here, then?" he asked, quietly, wondering how he was ever going to get peace and quiet. The Weasleys in themselves were a large crew, but there were at least five other people besides.

"No, they're just here for the free food," Sirius assured. "It's just you, me and the Weasleys here permanently. Until you lot all bugger off to school, that is." A shadow crept into his eyes, one Harry hated seeing. He pressed his knee to his godfather's.

"Sometimes I wish I didn't have to."

"Don't be silly, Harry." Across the table, Hermione pursed her lips at him. "You love Hogwarts. And you have to go back; we have our OWLs this year." She paused, smiling. "Don't worry, I've already started working on your revision schedule. And we're mostly just cleaning around here, so you'll have time to do your summer homework."

"I've already done my summer homework, Hermione," Harry told her, resisting the urge to roll his eyes.

"Again? Harry, I really wish you'd let me check it this time."

"I've been locked in my room for a month with nothing to do and no contact with the outside world," Harry bit out. "Homework was all I had — I think it's as good as it's going to get."

That seemed to knock the wind out of Hermione's sails a little.

"You know we would've written to you if we could, Harry," she insisted, ducking as a plate of bread rolls nearly decapitated her. "But even if we could have, Professor Dumbledore told us not to put any sensitive information in a letter."

"There were other ways to get in contact with me! Hell, last time I couldn't write to anyone, Ron and the twins showed up at my window! What's the matter; couldn't find your way without a flying car?" he retorted.

"The Order were watching you. They said you were fine." Ron seemed unconcerned, too busy stuffing his face

Harry stilled. "What do you mean, the Order were watching me?" He wanted to know exactly what constituted 'watching'. Especially after what happened to Dudley.

"Dumbledore assigned you guards, of course," Mrs Weasley informed him, bringing more gravy to the table. "After that awful business with the tournament, surely you didn't expect him to leave you alone all summer; anything could've happened to you!"

"And none of these guards seemed concerned that I never left the house?" Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Sirius wince at his icy tone.

"Well," Mrs Weasley faltered. "After what happened with the poor Diggory boy... we rather suspected you just needed time to process."

"We were there to keep you safe," Tonks piped up hesitantly. "We didn't want to intrude."

"Keep me safe, right. And I bet you all thought I was locked in my room to keep me safe, too. Two bathroom breaks a day, meals through the cat flap. A list of chores twice my height to keep me safe." He mentally scolded himself; he hadn't meant to say that much. Beside him, Sirius stiffened.

There was an awkward beat of silence. "I'm sure your aunt and uncle were just trying to give you space, dear. It's difficult to know how to help someone grieve." Mrs Weasley finally took a seat beside her husband.

"The last thing they want is to give me space; I might get up to something unnatural," Harry drawled. "Seriously — I had people watching me twenty-four-seven, and none of you thought it was strange that I didn't so much as go in the garden?"

There were several uncomfortable faces at the dinner table. Harry didn't feel sorry for them — if not for the intervention of Sirius and Remus and Snape, the summer he was pretending to have had would have been a very real possibility; worse, even. He wouldn't have been able to use Silencing charms at Privet Drive — if Vernon had been woken up by his nightmares, Harry would have been belted raw.

"Great. Good to know people only care what happens to me when it involves Voldemort." Several people flinched at the name. "Would Dumbledore's supposed protections have told you if I'd died? If I needed help?"

"We wouldn't have let any Death Eaters get in the house, Potter," Moody snapped, his electric blue eye whizzing around its socket.

The laugh that Harry let out was cold. “Yeah, because Death Eaters are the only thing that could possibly cause me harm in that house.”

“Harry, really, now—“

He ignored Mrs Weasley, green eyes flashing angrily. “For that matter, where the hell was my guard when a dementor was sucking the soul out of my cousin just round the corner?”

There were several people who wouldn’t meet his gaze, then. Kingsley Shacklebolt was one of them. “I’m afraid that was an error on our parts. It was Mundungus’ shift to watch you, and he... neglected to inform his relief that he’d be leaving early for a meeting.”

“Mundungus who?” Harry’s glare searched the group, though he knew everyone at the table. Whoever Mundungus was, he hadn’t stayed past the Order meeting. Probably knew Harry would want to kill him.

“Mundungus Fletcher,” Moody said. “Thief and a scoundrel, but a good set of eyes and ears to have when you’re looking for unsavoury types. Idiot buggered off to see a bloke about counterfeit cauldrons.”

“Meanwhile, my cousin was dying,” Harry roared. “Mundungus Fletcher had better bloody hope I don’t meet him any time soon, or the only place he’ll be finding cauldrons is up his arse.”

“Harry!” Mrs Weasley looked scandalised. “Language!”

“You didn’t even like your cousin, what do you care?” Ron complained. “He was a bullying prat.”

“And because of that, he deserved to die, did he?” Harry shot back. “I shouldn’t feel bad that he had his soul sucked out by a monster that was looking for me, just because my cousin was a bully, is that it?”

“He didn’t mean it like that, Harry.” Hermione, always ready to leap to Ron’s defence. “I understand you’re upset, we all do. It’s terrible, what happened to your cousin. But Mundungus didn’t mean any harm, he feels awful about it, really!”

“Oh, that’s alright then!” Harry crowed, getting to his feet and slamming his hands on the table. “Everything’s fine because Mundungus didn’t mean any harm. I’ll just pop on back to let my aunt and uncle know, shall I? I’m sure they’d be delighted to hear it.”

“Kingsley said you didn’t even tell them about the dementors. They don’t know anything about it,” Ron pointed out.

“Yeah, because they’d bloody kill me if they knew I had something to do with it!” Harry shouted. His scar began to ache, anger coiling in his gut like a snake made of fire. “The amount of injuries I’ve had just from existing around them, you think I’d survive telling them that magic killed their precious boy? Worse, that magic aiming to kill me did it? They’d do Voldemort a bloody favour!”

Out of the corner of his eye, Harry saw Remus' eyes flash gold, and he knew with a sudden sick feeling that he'd said too much. His mostly-for-show temper tantrum had hit too close to the truth, in his desperation to make these people feel some sort of guilt for what they'd done all summer.

And maybe, deep down, he wanted them to know the truth. Wanted them to be aware of what he put up with every time he left Hogwarts, what he'd survived for years before learning about magic.

But he didn't want to be there to watch them react to it.

"I'm going to bed," he muttered, chair legs screeching against the tile. Just as he opened the door, several people called his name — and the velvet curtain covering Mrs Black's portrait flung wide open, revealing a large painting of an older woman with venomous eyes.

"Scum! Blood traitors and filth, in my house!" she screeched, beginning an impressive tirade. Harry ignored her, storming up the stairs to his bedroom. Merlin, he was glad Sirius hadn't made him share with Ron.

Slamming the door shut only slightly muffled the portrait's cries, and it was several minutes before things went silent again. Harry sat on his bed with his knees tucked up to his chest, his hands pressed against his face. His scar ached, and the anger was still raw within him. When he took several deep breaths, he could feel the oily taint of the horcrux within him mixed up in it all — Voldemort was angry too, and it was feeding into Harry's rage. That explained a lot.

Not all of it was Voldemort, though. Most of it was Harry. He couldn't help it — here were people who were supposed to care about him, think of him like family, and they were all too happy to leave him to fend for himself at the Dursleys' and not think twice about it. Happy to put him back in his box and forget about him until it was time for him to be Gryffindor Golden Boy Harry Potter once more.

Pushing back tears and trying to stop the raw edges of the hole in his chest reopening, he almost missed the gentle knock on the door. "It's just us, pup."

The door opened, Sirius and Remus looking sadly through the gap. "Can we come in?" Remus asked softly.

Harry made a noise that was neither acceptance nor denial, but the two men took it as permission, shutting and warding the door behind them. Sirius perched on the edge of the desk. "That was quite something, pup. Even James wasn't that good when he got going." Sirius' attempt at levity fell flat, and he ran a hand through his hair in frustration.

"Harry," Remus began, warily approaching the bed. When Harry didn't yell at him, he continued, sitting on the mattress a couple of feet from Harry's curled up form. "I know... when we took you from your aunt and uncle's house after your third year, we never really — we didn't address the situation. We were just happy to have you, and delighted to see you coming out of your shell at last." He reached out, placing a gentle hand on one of Harry's socked feet. "Perhaps that was our error. Perhaps we should've had you talk about things back then. It's too late, now. We just let Severus keep giving you potions and let you bluster on past it."

"You knew about the potions?" Harry blurted. Sirius cracked a wry smile.

"You think Ceri wouldn't tell me that healing and nutrition potions were being left in my godson's room? Hell, you think old Snape could keep a secret like that from his Moony-love?"

Remus' cheeks went pink, but he didn't falter. "Severus said it was up to you to deal with things how you preferred, and we should give you the space to do so. Considering his... experience in the matter, I followed his advice. But Harry, if you need to talk about it — any of it. We're here to listen."

"I'm over it, really," Harry insisted. "Mostly." He would never truly be past it all. He would always be the boy in the cupboard under the stairs, at least at heart. But he was growing despite that. "A lot of what I said I was just saying for effect down there. But that doesn't make it a lie, or exaggeration. Vernon really would have tried to kill me if he knew the truth about Dudley. And... the way I described the summer, the food through the cat flap and two bathroom breaks a day and the chores — that's how things were, before. After the incident with the bars on my window." He'd told them about that, he remembered. That should've given them enough of an idea even back then.

"And the scars?" Sirius asked softly, moving from the desk to the bed beside Remus.

"Are long since healed, and I'm fine," Harry insisted, squeezing his eyes shut. "You—Moony, you said I'd never have to go back there. Anything else doesn't matter."

"And I meant it," Remus promised. "Whatever happens, you'll never have to lay eyes on those awful people again, we'll make sure of it. But... if you ever want to talk about what they did to you. Or if you want to get rid of some old wounds. Even if you can't talk to us — I have it on very good authority that Severus is an excellent listener, and even better with Scar Reducing Cream," he added with a half-smile. "Any one of the three of us will do whatever we can."

"We aren't exactly the poster children for happy families, either," Sirius pointed out roughly. "Moony's parents treated him like a monster, mine tried to make me a monster, and I don't know the details of Snape's but it has to have been bad to make him such a miserable little git so young—ow, Moony!" The werewolf was unrepentant as Sirius rubbed where he'd just been hit on the shoulder. "My point is, we aren't as rose-tinted as the Weasleys. We can handle it, if you want to tell us."

Harry appreciated the thought, truly. But knowing they'd had crappy childhoods didn't make him any more eager to recount his own.

"I know, Pads," he said eventually. "I just... I just need to get some sleep, I think."

"It's been a long day," Remus agreed. He leaned in, pressing a kiss to Harry's forehead, frowning when he saw the inflamed scar. "Is it bothering you again?"

“Not really,” Harry shrugged. “I’ll meditate before bed, I’ve got my wardstone.” It wouldn’t stop him being dragged into a dream if Voldemort was determined, but maybe it would be one of the nicer ones — that mysterious endless corridor instead of Voldemort torturing his servants.

“If you need Dreamless Sleep, call Ceri. Severus has some in the medicine cabinet at home.”

“Thanks, Moony.” Harry managed a smile that was mostly genuine, if a little strained. The werewolf smoothed Harry’s messy hair down.

“I’ll see you in the morning, cub. Sleep well.”

He left, and Harry looked expectantly at Sirius; his godfather looked like he had something to say.

“I’ll never forgive myself for going after that rat bastard instead of making sure you were okay,” he said eventually, voice shaking. Harry’s heart clenched.

“Sirius, no, it’s not your fault!”

“If I’d protected you like I was supposed to, you never would have gone to them!” Sirius argued. There were tears in his grey eyes, his face pale. “But I can’t undo what I did. All I can do is promise to be better in future. You’re always my first priority, pup, no matter what. I swear. I’ll be a better godfather to you.”

“You’re the best godfather,” Harry assured him, shuffling closer for a hug. “Let’s face it, Dumbledore probably would have found a way to get you out of the picture somehow. He needed me to grow up thinking I was worthless.” Sirius flinched at that. “It all worked out in the end, and you’re here now. Please, let’s just draw a line under that part of my life, yeah? It doesn’t matter anymore.”

Sirius sighed, his head tilting to lean against Harry’s. “If you say so, kid. But if you ever want to talk. Or... don’t tell Moony, but if you ever want them to pay for what they did to you... I’ve already served twelve years in Azkaban. I figured I’ve got some room to do a few things to make it actually worth it.” There was a darkness in his stormy gaze — not like the darkness of Voldemort and his people, torturing for fun; more like the darkness in Narcissa Malfoy’s when someone threatened her son. A reminder that Sirius was raised a dark wizard, and knew all the things a dark wizard knew. And he wasn’t above using them.

“They aren’t worth it, Siri,” Harry insisted. “What happened to Dudley is enough.” He’d done enough damage to that family with his existence. He was too tired to want vengeance. He just wanted it all to be over.

“I suppose. But the offer stands.” Sirius winked, kissing Harry’s forehead and getting to his feet. “I’ll leave you to settle in. I’m in the room at the far end of the hall if you need me for anything. Molly and Arthur are upstairs, and the kids are all on the floor below — you should be pretty undisturbed in here.”

“Thanks, Pads. I’ll see you in the morning, yeah?”

“Love you, kiddo.”

“Love you, too.” Once Sirius had left, the door shut quietly on his way out, Harry slumped against the headboard with a long, drawn-out sigh.

It had been a long week. But he had the sinking feeling it was going to be nothing compared to the weeks left until he would return to Hogwarts.

Chapter 44

When Harry entered the kitchen the next morning, an awkward hush descended over the gathered occupants. He stifled a grimace, though a glimmer of satisfaction rose within him. Good; let them feel guilty after his outburst the night before. They deserved it.

He almost made a beeline towards Remus — at Seren Du, the morning often began with the werewolf handing him a cup of tea and ruffling his hair, telling him the training plan for that day while Harry let the caffeine drag him into wakefulness. But he couldn't do that here; not only would there be no training, but as far as most of the people in the room were concerned, Harry had barely interacted with Remus since the man had left his teaching post.

Luckily, Sirius was stood by the kettle, and offered up a steaming mug with a half-smile. "Morning, pup," he greeted.

"Sit down, Harry dear — eat up! You must be starving!" Mrs Weasley insisted, then froze at her choice of words. "Do you want bacon or sausages? Or both! I'll put both on; growing boys need their protein!" Her slightly-too-high voice made Harry wince.

She put the plate at the empty setting beside Ron, and once again Harry moved it over to sit by the twins instead. Mrs Weasley pursed her lips at that, but didn't say anything.

Harry wondered how long everyone was going to be walking on eggshells around him, after last night. Maybe if he was lucky, he could have them keeping their distance until school started up.

"Did you sleep alright, Harry?" Remus asked, a knowing glint in his eyes. Harry shrugged.

"Well enough." He gave the man a weighted look; no nightmares. Something in Remus' shoulders relaxed.

"Glad to hear my old posters didn't scare you off," Sirius joked. Harry snickered.

"I'm just glad they don't move," he replied dryly.

"There's still the other bed in my room, mate," Ron piped up around a mouthful of fried egg.

"No, thanks. I'm fine where I am," Harry assured evenly.

The awkward silence continued; no one really seemed to know what to say, whether to Harry or to anyone else. Eventually it was broken by Ron's eyebrows suddenly turning bright pink, growing out rapidly until they were two enormous bushy caterpillars on his face, taking up most of his forehead. The twins smirked and high-fived each other, and Harry burst out laughing.

"Oi!" Ron slapped a hand up to his face, feeling the overlarge brows with a wide-eyed look of panic. Mrs Weasley glared at the twins.

"Boys! Honestly, what have I told you about magic at the table?" She pulled her wand and tapped Ron's forehead, attempting to end the spell.

There was a beat, and then the eyebrows shuddered — before blooming into glittery pink flowers. Ginny screeched with laughter, and even Remus' neutral expression cracked. Ron's panic grew.

"What happened? What did they do?" He had both hands up now to cover his eyebrows, while Hermione tried to pull them away so she could get a closer look.

"Fred! George!" Mrs Weasley barked menacingly. The twins held their hands up.

"It'll go away on its own!" George promised.

"I think they're rather fetching," Fred agreed, yelping when the wooden spoon was brought out. "Ow, Mum! It's just a bit of fun!"

"You'd think being old enough to use magic outside of school would make you a bit more responsible with it!" Mrs Weasley scolded. Personally, Harry didn't see what the problem was; it wasn't hurting Ron, and the twins wouldn't use any magic they couldn't counter. It wasn't like they'd burned his eyebrows off or anything!

"Leave them be, Molly. It's a great bit of magic," Sirius complimented, giving the twins a thumbs up. That just seemed to increase Mrs Weasley's wrath.

"Don't you go encouraging them, Sirius Black — they'll get themselves in trouble if they carry on the way they're going. You of all people should know better!"

"I of all people?" Sirius repeated indignantly. "What exactly is that supposed to mean?"

Mrs Weasley's lips thinned, but she didn't say anything.

"Let's all just calm down," Remus soothed, resting a hand on Sirius' shoulder. "Ronald, I'm sure your eyebrows will be back to normal in no time. If not, I'm sure the twins would be happy to correct it. Molly, the boys are just having a bit of harmless fun; with all the serious discussions going on lately, I can't really blame them."

"Hermione, leave it," Ron grumbled, batting her hands away from his face. "You can't do anything anyway."

"Speaking of serious discussions," Harry cut in loudly, figuring now was as good a time as any. "When's the next Order meeting? It sounds like I've got a lot of information to catch up on." He was done with being kept in the dark to 'allow time to grieve'. The Order didn't know how much he was aware of, but he refused to let them continue pushing him aside until it was time for him to face Voldemort again.

"See!" Sirius barked triumphantly. "I told you he'd want to be involved."

"Harry, dear, don't be silly; you're far too young to be in the Order," Mrs Weasley dismissed, ignoring Sirius entirely. "You don't need to be involved in all that."

“I think I’m already involved,” Harry pointed out. “If someone’s sending dementors after me, I want to know what else to expect!”

“You’re safe here — this place is unplottable, and under Fidelius. No one will get to you here,” Mrs Weasley assured him. “You just relax and enjoy the rest of your summer, dear.”

“Yeah, okay, I’ll relax here while someone might be sending another dementor after my aunt and uncle, or worse,” Harry snapped back, unable to help himself. “And what about when I get to school? I won’t be safe there!”

“That’s ridiculous; Hogwarts is the safest place in the world.”

“Cedric Diggory died last year!” Harry was up on his feet, hands slamming against the table. You could’ve heard a pin drop in the wake of his explosion. “Both of us were kidnapped by a Death Eater who had been teaching us the entire year without anyone noticing. The year before that, there were dementors crawling all over the castle. Before that, a massive basilisk! And before that, literal Voldemort possessing a teacher. Hogwarts has never been safe, and I want to know what’s going on. I’ve gone all summer without a scrap of information — not so much as a bloody quidditch score!”

“You had your Wireless,” Ron pointed out. Harry glared at him.

“You know damn well the Dursleys lock my trunk under the stairs the day they get me home from the station. I barely managed to smuggle my homework out — if they’d heard a radio in my room, I’d have been dead.” Once again, everyone winced at the reminder of his life with his muggle relatives. Harry couldn’t bring himself to feel remotely bad about bringing it up again.

“You don’t need to go looking for trouble,” Mrs Weasley tried to soothe. “You’ve got exams to focus on.”

“Surely it’s easier not to go looking for trouble if I know where the trouble is to begin with?” Harry pointed out. She didn’t seem to have an answer for that one, face reddening as she stuttered objections.

“The Order is for adults, Harry,” she said eventually, folding her arms over her chest.

“I think Harry’s close enough, after everything he’s been through,” Sirius retorted. “Why shouldn’t he be allowed to sit in? He deserves to know what Voldemort’s up to, especially when it involves him!”

“He’s just a boy!” Mrs Weasley argued, turning on Sirius now. “You’re supposed to have his best interests at heart, not be sending him off to war before he’s even taken his OWLs!”

“I’m not saying we start sending him out on missions, for Merlin’s sake!” Sirius exclaimed. “I just think he deserves to hear what’s going on!”

“If Harry gets to go to meetings, I want to go as well,” Ron demanded. Mrs Weasley whirled around to glare at him.

"None of you children are attending Order meetings, and that's final!" she screeched. "If you don't like it, take it up with Dumbledore; I'm sure he'll agree with me."

Harry scowled — there was no way in hell Dumbledore would allow Harry to go to Order meetings. He needed his little pawn as oblivious as possible.

Sirius was scowling too, and even Remus looked unimpressed by the whole argument. Some of Harry's ire cooled — they would both tell him anything he needed to know.

It was just frustrating, to know that he was closer to the action than ever, and yet still expected to keep his head down and pretend to be an ordinary teenage boy without a care in the world. He couldn't even take his frustrations out on Snape in a duel, or on the quidditch pitch.

God, he missed home already.

.-. .

Apparently, while Harry and the other teenage members of the household were too young to be part of the Order, they weren't too young to be put to work in making the house habitable for said Order. After breakfast he was handed a rag and a spray bottle, and sent with Ron and Hermione up to the drawing room, where they were told to clear out the china cabinet and check for infestation.

"Infestation of what?" Harry asked with a grimace of disgust. Hermione pursed her lips.

"Doxies. We got most of them out of the curtains yesterday before you got here, but there might be more hiding elsewhere." She opened the china cabinet, coughing at the swirl of dust it sent up. "Watch your fingers, boys; some of this stuff might be cursed."

The shelves of the cabinet were full of all sorts of odds and ends; small weapons, tarnished silver boxes, several crystal potion vials with curious-looking contents, and even a coiled snakeskin.

Harry watched Hermione use her rag to pick up one of the boxes, tossing it into a rubbish bag. His brows furrowed — if they were potentially cursed, surely they shouldn't be touching them? At the very least, they should have wands ready. Neither Hermione nor Ron even had theirs with them.

Surely they didn't think their magic would be traced here? The house was unplottable!

But as he kept watching, neither of them used so much as a Shield charm. "If this stuff is dangerous, surely someone old enough to use magic should be dealing with it?" he said cautiously. Hermione glanced over at him.

"They're busy with the important things, Harry," she told him, voice dripping with condescension. "Besides, Mrs Weasley scanned it yesterday and said it's probably fine, we just have to be careful."

"We've dealt with worse," Ron agreed. Harry bit his tongue against the retort that they had dealt with worse with their wands. If anything truly tried to get at him, he could always use wandless magic.

Still, as he got stuck in with removing items from the cabinet, he had to wonder what kind of scan Mrs Weasley had done; some of these things were dripping with dark magic. Ron yelped as a snuff box tried to bite his finger off, flinging it into the rubbish bag.

Harry pulled out a large silver serving tray embossed with the Black family crest, and looked around. "Is there somewhere Sirius wants us to put this stuff?"

"Mum said just chuck it all," Ron dismissed. "It's all dark — not like Sirius has any use for it anymore, is it?" He snorted.

At his sides, Harry's fists clenched. "Did she ask Sirius that?" These things were family heirlooms, centuries old. They were the Black family legacy — Harry's family legacy. It wasn't even cursed, it was just a serving tray!

"Sirius hates this house," Hermione told him. "He doesn't want anything to do with his family."

That didn't sound like something Sirius would say — since he'd learned Harry was his heir, he'd become determined to redeem the Black family name eventually, no matter what it took.

But Harry didn't want to cause yet another argument, so he reluctantly put the tray in the bin bag, and turned back to the cabinet.

He frowned, recoiling — in the corner of the cabinet, tucked away behind a vase Hermione had just removed, was a gold locket with the letter S embossed on the front. And it was full of dark magic — familiar dark magic.

It carried the same oily, disgusting feeling as the magic in Harry's scar.

His heart leapt into his throat. Carefully, with the rag covering his hand, Harry reached for the locket. It didn't seem to react when he picked it up, but he could feel the magic brushing up against his own like he'd had a bucket of cold water dumped over his head. He shuddered, then glanced up at Ron and Hermione, who were bickering over a crystal bottle that Ron was insisting contained blood.

While they were distracted, Harry put the rag-wrapped locket into his trouser pocket, resolutely trying to ignore the magic rolling off it in waves.

He'd get a closer look at it later, in his room. But in the back of his mind, there was a sinking certainty that he already knew what it was.

The question was, how the hell had it ended up here?

Once they had the cabinet completely empty — something that took several hours, and more than a couple of close calls with cursed objects — Hermione insisted they move it to check for doxies nesting behind it. Just as they were getting ready to pick up the heavy piece of furniture, the drawing room door opened.

“Lunch is— whoa, whoa, what are you three doing?” It was Bill Weasley, whose eyes went wide in alarm at the sight of them.

“Clearing the cabinet, like Mum said,” Ron replied with a shrug. “Thought we’d check it for doxies.”

Bill’s gaze flicked from the cabinet, to the bulging rubbish bag, to Harry — who gave a discreet nod and a pointed glance, expressing his own feelings on the matter. “I told Mum I’d deal with that!” Bill fussed, waving his wand and raising a shield over the rubbish bag.

“Bloody hell, what was she thinking? You three could’ve been killed!”

“We were fine!” Ron argued.

“None of you should be touching anything in this damned house without an adult present! There’s all manner of curses on all sorts of things! Tonks and I found a hairbrush that was enchanted to take a bite out of your skull the other day, just lying on a shelf!” Ron paled, and Hermione gasped.

“But— but Mrs Weasley said it was all safe, she’d checked it,” she said, voice wobbling.

Again, Bill’s eyes moved to Harry, who shook his head ever so slightly. The cabinet contents was not safe.

“It’s not your fault,” Bill assured. “I just need to have a word with Mum about the kind of jobs she’s giving you lot. Bloody hell. Anyway, leave that thing where it is — lunch is ready. Also, hi, Harry; good to see you.”

“Hi, Bill,” Harry greeted, as if he hadn’t already seen the redhead that summer. “The twins mentioned you were around.” He paused for a moment — he didn’t want to raise suspicions, but he really didn’t want to go to lunch with that thing in his pocket. “Hey, can I borrow you for a second? There’s a locked drawer in the desk in the room I’m staying in, Sirius says he can’t remember being the one to lock it and he thought we should get you to take a look first. Just in case.”

Bill frowned, then caught the insistent look in Harry’s eyes, and nodded. “Yeah, no problem; I’m sure it’ll only take a second. You two go on ahead, tell Mum we’ll catch up,” he said to Ron and Hermione. Ron, not ever one to miss a meal, dragged a protesting Hermione down the stairs, while Harry led the way to his bedroom. When they were inside, he warded the door.

“There’s not actually a locked drawer in the desk, is there?” Bill presumed, glancing at the desk in question. Harry grinned lopsidedly.

"There is, but Sirius knows exactly what's in there, and he says I won't open it if I know what's good for me," he replied dryly, chuckling at Bill's look of mild disgust. "No, I wanted to show you this — I found it in that cabinet we were clearing out." Carefully, he dug the locket out and set it on the desk, nudging the rag away so Bill could see it clearly. "It has the same magic as my scar, Bill. I think it's another horcrux."

"Another?" Bill asked, aghast. "You think he made more than just you?"

"I wouldn't put it past him." Voldemort had already more than proved he was willing to take an innocent life. "Even if it's not, it feels awful and needs destroying, but I really think it is, Bill."

Bill scanned it with several spells, his expression growing more and more grave. "I think you're right, mate." Reaching into the pocket of his leather jacket, Bill pulled out a dragonhide bag, and levitated the locket inside it. Immediately, Harry felt the pressure of the magic ease off. "There; that'll keep it protected until I can get it back to work, do some investigating. I'll take care of it, don't worry, Harry." He pocketed the bag again, then clapped Harry on the shoulder. "I'm sorry about your cousin, by the way. Awful stuff."

"Yeah," Harry agreed, heart clenching briefly. "S'pose you've heard it's all being swept under the rug."

"Merlin forbid the Ministry take responsibility for anything," Bill retorted wryly. "But they'll get theirs, eventually. Once the right people are in power." He squeezed Harry's shoulder, nudging him towards the door. "Come on; if we don't hurry up, Ron'll have eaten everything."

Harry snorted — even Ron might struggle with the amount of food Mrs Weasley cooked in this house, never sure how many people she'd be feeding. But he was hungry, so he let Bill lead the way down to the kitchen, both of them tip-toeing past Mrs Black's portrait.

While they ate, Bill tried as tactfully as possible to tell his mother the kids shouldn't be dealing with cursed objects unsupervised.

"Well there's only so much cleaning they can do without their wands," was her response, and Bill grimaced.

"Maybe they shouldn't be cleaning, either?" he suggested. Clearly he wasn't going to point out that they could definitely use magic without getting into trouble — Harry wondered if Mrs Weasley had forbidden everyone from revealing that fact to Ron, Ginny and Hermione. "It's the summer, Mum. Just let them relax."

"The kids have plenty of time to relax as well, Bill, don't worry," Mrs Weasley assured. "But if I didn't give them anything to do, Merlin only knows what sort of trouble they'd get into!" She laughed, shaking her head. "Though I do see what you mean about the cursed cabinets; they can stick to taking down wallpaper until they're back at school. There's certainly plenty of it that needs to go!"

Harry glanced over at Sirius — he didn't seem to be paying much attention to the conversation, reading over a piece of parchment with Tonks.

After a month of sharing the house with the Weasleys, he'd probably just given up arguing. Harry would have, too.

He ducked out quickly after finishing his lunch, ignoring Hermione's call to go over their summer work together. He caught up to Sirius, who was headed up to his own room. "What's up, pup?" the animagus asked, offering a grin. Harry shrugged.

"Feel like I've hardly seen you since I got here." He didn't say much more — he was uncomfortably aware of the number of portraits on the walls, watching their progression up the stairs. Their painted gazes burned into the back of his head, and he wondered how many of them were loyal to the head of the Black family. Probably not enough to make it safe to talk.

"I know what you mean," Sirius agreed. "Why don't I help you get your room together? Move the last of my teenage crap out of there!"

Harry was glad his godfather seemed to get the hint, and the pair of them headed to Harry's room, immediately throwing up wards. "You alright, kid?" Sirius, asked, concerned. Harry sighed.

"Fine. Just... wishing I was back at Seren Du."

"Tell me about it," Sirius hummed sympathetically. "How was your morning? Were Ron and Hermione awful?"

"Honestly they barely talk to me most of the time. I don't think they're trying very hard to still be friends with me." Perhaps they'd gotten too used to not having him around.

While Sirius fired random spells at the scantily-clad women on the wall, hoping to unstick them, Harry told him all about the cabinet adventures from the morning, as well as the locket he'd given to Bill. Sirius' face went dark.

"Bet it was bloody Reggie," he muttered. Harry eyed him quizzically. "My little brother, Regulus; he was a Death Eater. Died when he was eighteen — either he fucked up something important, or he tried to run, we were never sure. There was never a body recovered; he just showed up as dead on the family tapestry one morning. Little idiot." His mouth was scowling, but his eyes were sad. Harry's heart ached — eighteen was far too young to be serving a Dark Lord, let alone dying from it.

"You think Voldemort gave him the horcrux? What, to look after?"

"This house is safer than most places," Sirius pointed out. "It'd be a good place for it. Y'know, if I hadn't come along," he added with a sharp grin. "Or maybe old Voldie hid it here himself — he certainly visited plenty, my mum thought he was brilliant. He could've tucked it away and left no one the wiser." He shook his head, like he was trying to shake off memories. “Lucky you found it, then. Bill’ll take care of it. Just add it to the pile of shit from this house I’m paying for the goblins to destroy.”

“I— Ron said Mrs Weasley told them to just chuck everything out. Even the stuff that isn’t cursed.”

Sirius’ smile grew twisted. “Oh, I’m sure she did. Easy to be careless with things when they don’t belong to you, isn’t it?” He looked up at Harry, and his gaze softened. “Don’t worry, pup. Molly thinks I’m disposing of all the rubbish bags as she sets them aside to be chucked. Really I’m going through them with Moony and Ceri — the cursed stuff needs properly managing, and anything worth keeping is going to the family heirloom vault, just in case you want it when you’re older. Or your boyfriend does,” he added with a wink. “Him and Cissa have as much of a right to it as we do, I think.”

Harry’s shoulders slumped in relief. “Good. I thought — I know you’ve got bad memories of your family,” he said cautiously. “I didn’t know if that would extend to the things they used to own.”

“The Black family wasn’t always awful,” Sirius told him. “It’s just in the last century or so — a bunch of them got mixed up with Grindelwald, and it all went downhill from there. But a few generations of shite shouldn’t make the whole family a write-off. And I’ll be damned if I let Mundungus bloody Fletcher make money from selling my family silverware,” he added with a growl.

“Seriously? He tried that?” Harry asked incredulously, outrage brewing when Sirius nodded. “Why is this Fletcher bloke even in the Order? He sounds useless.”

“He’s Dumbledore’s contact in the less reputable parts of the magical community,” Sirius quoted with a roll of his eyes. “As if he’s even good at that. Idiot’s useless in a fight, has double-crossed half the dodgy dealers in the country, and can’t be trusted as far as you can throw him. But Albus insists he’s useful, so he stays. Merlin only knows what plans the old goat has for him.”

Harry scowled. He’d like to be given five minutes alone with Fletcher.

He pushed the bloodthirsty urges away, grinning when a spell from Sirius had all the posters fluttering to the ground.

“There we go!” the animagus cheered, vanishing the posters with a flick of his wand. “Knew I’d get there eventually.” He turned to Harry, winking. “You can put up pictures of sexy boys now, if you want.”

“I think I’ll pass, thanks,” Harry said with a snort.

“Hmm, yeah; don’t want Draco getting jealous,” Sirius teased, yelping when Harry shot a Stinging hex at him. “Oi! You’ve gotten far too used to doing magic whenever you want.”

“I haven’t done any in front of the others, don’t worry,” Harry assured. “They still think they’ll get in trouble. Has no one explained to them how the trace laws work?”

Sirius shrugged. “They’re Molly’s kids. If she doesn’t want them doing magic, that’s her problem. Don’t see why she’s so determined to lie to them, though; they’d be able to clean much faster with magic.”

“Wouldn’t we just,” Harry groused. “It’s like being back at the bloody Dursleys. I thought you said every Black property had a house elf?”

A dark look flickered across Sirius’ face. “There is technically a house elf bound to this house. His name is Kreacher. But he’s mad as a box of monkeys and dangerously obsessed with my mum and the darker side of the family — I didn’t think it’d be safe to have him around with the Order needing secrecy and everything. So I sent him off to one of the unoccupied Black properties where he couldn’t do any harm.”

“Why didn’t you bring Ceri here?”

“And give Dumbledore access to a good Black house elf?” Sirius retorted. “Worse, give Molly access to one of my elves? She’d be bossing poor Ceri around like she was the head of the damn family — she’s certainly got no trouble doing so to me and every other bugger under this roof. Conveniently forgetting it’s my roof and I allow her and her family to live under it. Besides,” he smirked a Marauder-ish smirk, “cleaning the house by hand is giving everyone something to do. Made it easier for me to come see you at Seren Du if they were all occupied. Dumbledore and Molly are the ones who want it clean and empty of cursed objects — it certainly doesn’t bother me any. I grew up surrounded by all this filth, and it’s still cleaner than Azkaban.” He winked at Harry. “I’m not gonna be here any more than I have to be, pup. But if they want to slave away with rags and such to make this place presentable, they can be my guests.”

Harry snickered to himself. “So you do know how to be a bit Slytherin when it suits you,” he accused playfully. Sirius’ answering grin was devious.

“Don’t know what you’re talking about, pup,” he replied drily. “I am the very epitome of a Gryffindor.”

“Just as much as I am.”

“Exactly,” Sirius agreed, grinning. Harry couldn’t help but grin back.

At least he had allies, in this awful house. He could survive the next few weeks.

.-. .

That night, Harry made sure the house was quiet and his door was warded before he pulled a small silver mirror from his bedside drawer and propped it up on his knees. “Draco Malfoy,” he murmured quietly. It took a few beats, but soon Draco was staring back at him through the glass. Just seeing him made Harry’s heart stutter, warmth flooding to his fingertips.

“Where are you now?” Draco asked, eyeing him curiously. “That isn’t the muggles’ place.”

"I can't tell you where," Harry told him. "Like, physically cannot tell you." Understanding dawned in Draco's silver gaze.

"You're with them, then? Dumbledore's lot?"

"Unfortunately," Harry sighed. "It's nice to see the twins and Ginny again, but..."

"But you're also stuck with Weasel and Granger," Draco finished knowingly. "Are they being awful?"

"Not actually as bad as I expected, honestly. It's mostly Ron's mum trying to push us together even when everyone else can see we're not friends anymore." Thanks to Mrs Weasley's meddling, he'd been forced to eat dinner sat between Ron and Hermione. He'd survived mostly by ignoring them entirely and talking to Ginny, who was sat opposite. To their credit, Ron and Hermione didn't seem keen to talk to him either. "I think they realised they went too far with ignoring me all summer. After I maybe yelled at them a bit."

One of Draco's pale eyebrows rose, and Harry filled him in on his little tantrum the other night. By the end of it, Draco was biting his lip to keep from laughing. "And you say I'm dramatic," he teased, shaking his head.

"You can't say they didn't deserve it," Harry argued, blushing.

"Oh, that and far more — I'd have hexed them all for leaving you alone like that." There was a protectiveness to his tone that made Harry blush harder, though for entirely different reasons. "Still, be careful; you don't want to alienate yourself from them entirely, not this early in the game. You don't know what the headmaster is expecting of you."

Harry scowled — Merlin, he wished he didn't still have to play Dumbledore's stupid game. "I know," he assured. "But it's fine if he thinks I'm naturally shedding the Compulsions; apparently that's normal during puberty, especially after traumatic events. Remus says so," he added with a fond roll of his eyes. "As long as I can get through the year with him thinking I still trust him — and thinking I don't know much more than he's allowed for me to find out — I should be alright."

It was a tricky line to walk, especially when all he wanted to do was hex the man into oblivion, but until Harry was in a better position to fight, he had to play it safe.

And with the discovery of a second horcrux — neither of which he'd told Draco about, just to be safe — he had no idea how long it would take to be ready to fight Voldemort. He just hoped he could hang on that long.

"You're putting a whole lot of faith in Dumbledore assuming you can't outwit him," Draco said, his expression showing just how unhappy that made him. Harry offered the blond a smile.

"Draco, Dumbledore assumes no one can outwit him. He's spent years believing himself to be infallible — he's not going to lose sleep over a fifteen year-old boy who just seems to be going through a bit of teenage angst. The worst he'll do is make Ron and Hermione stick to me like glue once we're back at school."

"They'd better not," Draco muttered with a scowl. "I'm not going a whole year with only our public facade. Even the study group don't know the truth."

"We'll figure something out," Harry promised. "I won't let that happen." He wouldn't survive the school year if he couldn't meet with Draco in private. He'd go mad before Christmas. "Besides, you're the one who should be careful. You're the one with a bloody Dark Lord in your house."

Draco made a face. "Don't remind me."

"How bad is it?" Draco opened his mouth, and Harry gave him a pointed look. "Honestly."

The Slytherin sighed. "It's... bearable. Obviously, I hate it," he added. "But I'll survive. I'm more worried about Mother — she's expected to be an active participant in whatever that madman requires. I just have to keep to myself, and agree with every word he says at mealtimes."

Harry bit his lip. "It's only a few more weeks."

"For me," Draco replied. "Not for Mother."

Heart aching, Harry wished he could reach through the mirror and hold his boyfriend close, kiss away the pained expression in his eyes. "She knows she has options," he said instead. "She's making her own choices, and she won't tackle more than she can handle. Your mum is strong, Draco."

"She shouldn't have to be!" Draco burst out angrily. "Not in her own damn house!"

"I know." God, he hated that it was three weeks before he'd see Draco again. Hated there was nothing he could do to help.

"If anything happens to her, Harry..." Draco trailed off, fear on his face.

"We won't let it," Harry assured softly.

They both knew he couldn't control that. But if it helped Draco, Harry would happily pretend.

.-.-.-.

The sight of Seren Du up ahead of him made Remus' shoulders relax, even as guilt wormed its way through him at the same time. He felt bad, being so happy to be home when Sirius and Harry were stuck at Grimmauld.

But in his defence, his happiness was less about the place and more about the person within.

He found Severus in the smaller living room; the more private one that they liked to use when they wanted to be alone somewhere that wasn't their bedroom. The Slytherin looked up, sympathy veiled in his dark gaze.

"You do not want to be in that house right now. Hell, I'm glad I'm not in that house right now," Remus declared, dropping onto the sofa beside his partner. He had only stopped in for a couple of hours — dinner, and a little time after — but that was enough for the tension to wrap its way around him, making his hackles rise and his mind itch in the corner where the wolf lived. It wasn't just about Harry, either; the way Molly was treating Sirius made him want to yell at the woman, and while some of that was the approaching full moon, a lot of it was just his own frustration. Did she not realise what she was doing to Sirius?? She was lucky he was in a much better mental state than he was pretending to be, or she'd be driving him right to do something reckless just to get away from the house; away from her.

Maybe that was the point, he thought with a scowl.

"I can imagine, after the things Potter let slip on his arrival," Severus said with a faint frown. He had left by that point, but Remus had told him everything that had happened over dinner and after. Everything they'd been able to fill in the gaps about, regarding Harry's home life.

"I swear," Remus growled, eyes flashing gold, "if I ever see Petunia again..."

"She is not worth your anger," Severus told him, lips quirking ruefully. "Believe me. I have known that woman since she was a girl, and quite frankly she is worth very little indeed. Her husband... he is worth even less, but deserves a lot more," he snarled dangerously. The murderous glint in his eyes might have frightened another, but Remus could only agree with it. To know those people had treated his cub like that.

"At least he's away from them. He has us, now." Remus scowled briefly, knee bouncing restlessly. "It would be better if we could get him away from Molly and Dumbledore, too, but... it's a step."

"Indeed. And while there may be some less than ideal company at Grimmauld, at least he will have the three redheaded demons he actually likes. And Black," Severus added, far less contempt in his tone than there might have been a year ago. Remus grinned.

Suddenly, a thought occurred to him, and a heat flickered within him. There was a much more productive use for his restless energy, here.

"Meanwhile, the two of us get this place to ourselves," he drawled playfully, intentions clear. Severus' eyes darkened, his gaze trailing over Remus' form. Remus hadn't exactly been aiming for this when he'd come home, but it was a much better way of relieving his tension than punching or cursing something. And it seemed Severus wasn't too adverse, either.

"That is a benefit," the Slytherin agreed, setting his book aside. Remus pounced, sliding a hand into that fine dark hair and pulling Severus into a heated kiss. Severus didn't go easily, pushing back, dominating the kiss and swiftly moving both of them until Remus was pinned back against the arm of the sofa. "You're sure no one else is coming home?" Severus asked, and Remus smirked.

"Nope," he said, popping the p. "Just us, all night, I promise." The look in Severus' eyes made his blood race, and he reached up to undo his tie, tossing it to the floor. Severus' long, talented fingers were already working on the buttons of Remus' shirt.

Remus wasn't letting himself be the only naked person in the room, and he hurried to match Severus button for button, peeling the black shirt off his lover's pale skin. The firelight cast long shadows over them, highlighting the dips of Severus' collarbones and the flex of his arms. Remus bit his shoulder lightly, feeling the man's hips jerk against him.

"What are you after, wolf?" Severus growled, and Remus smirked; what an excellent question to be offered.

"Whatever you're willing to give me," he returned, relaxing back against the sofa. Severus wasn't often the more aggressive one of the two of them, but sometimes Remus needed to be taken out of his own head before the tension within him ate him alive, and his Slytherin was excellent at that.

Dark eyes brightened with arousal, and Severus reached for his wand. Within moments the pair of them were naked, and Remus' breath hitched as cool air hit his flushed arousal. Then Severus' body was over his, pressing hard against him, those amazing hands wrapping around his cock as lips hungrily devoured his own.

As the kiss deepened, they both realised it wasn't quite enough. Parting with a ragged gasp from Remus, Severus stood, and Remus had a split second to admire his naked form before he too was being pulled to his feet. He wondered if they were moving it to the bedroom — and then Severus firmly but gently manoeuvred them both down onto the plush rug, straddling Remus' hips. Remus smirked. "In front of the fire? Such a cliche," he teased, arching up as Severus grabbed his hands and raised them over his head, pinning them to the floor with one hand. Remus whined, arousal shooting sharp through him; with his werewolf strength he could easily break Severus' hold if he wanted to, flip them over and change the dynamic, but half the fun was letting Severus pin him down like this.

Besides; Severus knew spells that would keep Remus in place, if he really didn't want him moving. This was more for show, but it was enough.

Severus was methodical as he kissed his way down Remus' body, avoiding the one place Remus wished he'd touch most. But then he summoned a vial seemingly out of nowhere, and Remus didn't mind at all, amber eyes glowing as a pillow was shoved unceremoniously under his hips.

There was no holding back between them; Severus knew exactly how to make him fall apart, driving into Remus with abandon, every thrust utterly perfect as stars burst behind Remus' eyelids. Remus couldn't remember what he'd been angry about, could barely remember his own name, all that mattered was Severus inside him, over him, holding him down and fucking him. He came with a loud shout, and Severus followed not long after with one last powerful thrust, his hand almost painfully tight around Remus' wrists as he rode out his orgasm. When he was finally ready to move, he pulled out and leaned down for a hard kiss. "Better?" he growled, and Remus chuckled breathlessly.

"Perfect," he sighed, whole body feeling sluggish. "Fuck. I needed that." They'd both been tense lately, with Severus now back at Death Eater meetings and both of them having to deal with Dumbledore and the Order. Remus realised belatedly that they'd hardly had any time alone together in weeks — no wonder he was so wound up.

Severus helped him to a sitting position, pulling Remus into his lap, uncaring of the sticky mess between them. He massaged Remus' shoulders, soothing any aches that might have come from having his arms up like that. Remus leaned into him, humming softly. "I'm not that old and fragile," he teased, though he didn't move to stop his partner's ministrations. "You used to have to do a whole lot more than pin me down to hurt me." Merlin, some of the things they used to get up to... not all of the injuries Remus blamed on the full moon were actually due to the wolf.

"And I used to be able to fuck you on the floor without my knees aching," Severus drawled in response. "Things change." Remus eyed him worriedly, but Severus shook his head ever so slightly. "I'm fine," he assured, softening into another kiss.

"Good. I'd hate to break you when we've just got the house to ourselves," Remus teased, earning a harder kiss and a bite to the lip.

"I do not break, wolf," Severus muttered, and Remus' eyes flashed.

"That sounds like a challenge," he replied flirtatiously, knowing that he was the only person in the whole world Severus would even consider doing anything that could be considered breaking for. It was a heady feeling indeed.

"Need I remind you, we are not eighteen anymore," Severus pointed out, fingers digging into Remus' shoulders. "If you're trying to get me going again, it's going to take considerably more time to recover." Then he glanced down between them. "Though evidently werewolf stamina counts for something."

Remus smirked, though he wasn't actually looking for a round two. "Not right now," he dismissed. "I'm just thinking, for the rest of the summer... both of us are going to need a hell of a lot of stress relief, with everything we've got ahead. Maybe I should take a shopping trip next week." There was a weight to his voice suggesting exactly what kind of shopping he had in mind, and he felt Severus tense.

"That... would not be a bad idea," the Slytherin agreed, and Remus felt triumph flare within him.

"For now, though, I think we should run the bath," he suggested, leaning back to stretch out his back. He wasn't ready to make Severus put clothes on, yet; a bath sounded like a perfect idea.

As they stood, Remus looked down at the pair of them, naked and still sticky with come and lube, some of the mess staining the rug. He snorted, shaking his head. "And you say we're not eighteen anymore," he joked lightly, raising one eyebrow. "Merlin. Well, thank God for this house; we couldn't do that at Grimmauld, or Hogwarts." Bless Sirius' family for being so fucking rich and pretentious, that there were living rooms with fireplaces he could have sex in front of like something out of a trashy period romance novel.

Severus looked up at him, amused. “Perhaps if we did, Albus would finally have that long-overdue heart attack,” he said with false consideration. “Molly, too, if we timed it right.”

Remus laughed, imagining what might happen if any of the Order could see what had just happened in that room.

Sometimes, he wished he could spill their secret, just to see the looks on their faces.

One day, the time would come. And he couldn’t wait.

Chapter 45

Chapter Notes

This fic has passed 3k kudos, you guys are awesome! <3

Harry hadn't realised how much he'd come to value the freedom of the summer until it was taken away from him. Grimmauld Place might not be a cage in the same way Privet Drive had been, but it was a cage nonetheless — if anything, this was worse, because he was expected to be happy about it. Be glad he'd been rescued and brought to a place where he could have information dangled in front of him but be denied it, where his desires were utterly steamrolled over in favour of what someone else thought was best for him.

Sure, those who were expecting him to be pleased didn't know the safe haven they'd torn Harry from, but it was grating all the same.

At least he had some friends around who were sympathetic.

And he had Sirius back properly. That was nice, too.

Harry was just sick of being pushed into spending time with Ron and Hermione, especially since the pair seemed to have realised that Harry was no longer magically inclined towards their company. They didn't really want to hang out with him either, though Hermione continued to make a good effort. Everyone seemed certain that his abrasiveness was just from the trauma he'd been through in the last few months, and he'd be back to his usual cheerful self by the time school went back.

It was a shame they didn't seem to realise that he was perfectly cheerful around certain people.

For example, he was content in the library with Fred, George and Ginny, under the supervision of Bill while they looked through the Black library for anything dangerous. "I don't know why this is our job," Ginny mused as she pulled a huge stack of books from the shelf, depositing them at the table in front of Bill. The curse-breaker was checking each book for unsavoury magic, and was supposed to be checking the contents too for anything dark or alarming, disposing of books he thought would be deemed inappropriate.. Really he was just splitting them into two piles — one to remain in the library there, and the other to be smuggled out through Remus to Seren Du. Not that Bill knew where they would end up, just that Remus would take them somewhere safe.

"Mum thought Hermione might be too tempted to read if she did it," Fred supplied, levitating books back onto the shelf once Bill was finished with them.

“Because we four are of course, utterly allergic to the very concept of reading,” George continued dryly. “Oi, Harry, can I borrow this one?” He held up a book from the ‘sneak out’ pile, on the potions use of contraband creature products. Harry snorted.

“If you can keep it hidden from your mum, sure,” he agreed. George winked at him, shrinking the book down and pocketing it. Both twins already had a small collection of books in their pockets that they had promised to look after, and Bill had a stack of his own, too. Harry didn’t mind; as long as the books were kept out of the hands of Dumbledore and his ilk, he was happy for his friends to raid the library as much as they wanted. He also got a vindictive sort of glee when he thought of how disappointed Hermione would be with only the ‘appropriate’ remains of the vast collection.

Of course, she’d had access to the library for the whole summer before he’d showed up, so perhaps she’d already had her fill.

He snorted to himself; as if that were possible, with Hermione Granger.

The five of them continued their work quite happily, up until the point Sirius knocked on the door, calling them down for lunch. Ron and Hermione were already in the kitchen when they arrived — they had been paired with Remus to try and clear out one of the upstairs drawing rooms, and didn’t look nearly as happy about the assignment as the library crew.

Harry ignored the perpetually-empty seat at Ron’s side, heading down the other end of the table to sit between Ginny and Bill. Mrs Weasley clucked her tongue at the space between Harry and the other two-thirds of the ‘golden trio’ — then something in her gaze softened, and she smiled.

“I’m glad this summer is giving you and Ginny plenty of time together, Harry dear, but be careful you don’t neglect your friends,” she said, giving Harry a conspiratorial wink, while he stared at her in utter confusion. Beside him, Ginny groaned quietly.

“Mum, I’ve told you a thousand times, it’s not like that,” she insisted. Mrs Weasley chuckled, patting her daughter’s head as she set plates down in front of them.

“I’m just saying; a first romance is exciting, and I know what it’s like to want to spend all your time with them, but friendships are important too.”

Harry, who had just taken a sip of water, choked. “I’m sorry, what??” Out of the corner of his eye, he noticed Sirius bite his lip to stop himself laughing, while Remus sighed in exasperation.

“I told you,” Ginny said, rolling her eyes. “Mum reads Witch Weekly, but not the Quibbler.¹”

Harry blinked. “Mrs Weasley, Ginny and I aren’t dating,” he said. That only made her smile wider.

“You don’t need to keep secrets from me, dear — Arthur and I are delighted. As long as you take good care of our little girl,” she added with a giggle. Ginny blushed as red as her hair.

"No, seriously, we're not, I— have you thought that all summer?" Incredulity crept into his voice. "Surely someone showed you the Quibbler article?"

Mrs Weasley's lips pursed. "Oh, that silly little rag has always been full of nonsense. Really, I'm amazed old Xeno Lovegood gets enough money to keep it in print!" She waved him off, starting the dishes washing in the sink.

Harry grimaced — so she had seen the article, then. She just refused to believe it. "I mean, I don't know enough to comment on the rest of the stuff in the Quibbler," he admitted — sure, a lot of it seemed like nonsense, but Harry wasn't so arrogant as to assume anything he didn't understand was made-up — "but I wrote that article myself. I asked Luna's dad to print it. Ginny and I aren't dating; I'm gay."

Water sloshed over the edge of the sink as Mrs Weasley abruptly dropped a saucepan. "Really, Harry — you should be more careful about what you allow the media to say about you, even if it is in a small magazine like that. Whatever you think you might be feeling, it's rather hasty to go and spread something like that about everywhere; you're only fourteen, after all."

Harry stiffened. Across the table, he saw both twins grimace. A stilted silence filled the kitchen.

"So I know my own mind when you think I'm going out with your daughter, but when I say I'm gay it's hasty?" Harry was slowly beginning to realise why he was almost always paired with Ginny to do chores around Grimmauld. Anger bubbled in his belly.

"Mum, come on, not this again," Bill started, sighing.

"If you aren't with Ginny, that's perfectly fine, Harry," Mrs Weasley said, ignoring her eldest son. "Though the two of you would make a wonderful couple. But there's no need to go saying things you can't take back."

"I'm not likely to take it back," Harry retorted sharply. He wished he could say something about Draco — something to make Mrs Weasley realise he wasn't just confused, or whatever else she'd convinced herself was going on in his head. Then again, he doubted even his relationship with another boy would change her mind on that; it didn't seem to have done any good for George or Charlie, from what he'd heard.

"I think he knows his own mind, Molly," Sirius piped up, the barest hint of a growl in his voice. Mrs Weasley huffed.

"Well, you would say that, wouldn't you?" she muttered derisively. Harry clenched his hands under the table, trying to rein in his magic before it made the plates shatter.

"I'm going to eat in my room," he declared, getting to his feet. He glanced over to the twins and Ginny. "I'll meet you back in the library in half an hour."

"Harry, really, there's no need—" Mrs Weasley tried, but he ignored her, picking up his plate and striding to the door. Before he could even leave, he heard her sigh. "He'll come around, Ginny darling, don't you worry," she said softly, though in the utter silence of the kitchen it carried just fine.

"I don't fancy Harry, Mum!" Ginny protested angrily. "I wouldn't want to date him even if he was straight, which he's not."

Harry didn't stick around for anything else Ginny might have said — as glad as he was that she was sticking up for him, he was too tired to sit and listen to Mrs Weasley try and talk him out of his own sexuality. A knot formed in his chest; why did she have such a problem with it? Not just for Harry, but for her sons, too? Was it truly just about wanting them to have children?

He shook his head, bumping his bedroom door open with his hip. It didn't really matter anymore; long gone were the days where he hoped for Molly Weasley's approval.

God, he couldn't wait for school to start.

.-. .

After that fateful afternoon in the kitchen, Mrs Weasley had stayed conspicuously silent, though the approving smiles she gave Harry and Ginny every time they so much as looked at each other were beginning to grate. While Harry wasn't one to involve himself in other peoples' relationships, part of him hoped Ginny would soon agree to get together with Neville, just so he didn't have to deal with being shoved her way every five minutes.

On top of her stubborn insistence on Harry and Ginny making a wonderful couple, Mrs Weasley seemed utterly oblivious to the tension between Ron and Hermione and the rest of the household. It was at the point where Harry was beginning to wonder if she was under some sort of Confundus charm — only for Remus to assure him that Snape had discreetly checked every member of the Order, and sadly her actions were entirely her own.

The confirmation that Mrs Weasley had been taking money from his vaults of her own volition hardened something within Harry — he no longer felt bad about snapping at her when she got too overbearing.

He kept to himself the best he could, each day making him miss Seren Du more and more. He couldn't even be distracted with the Order meetings happening regularly; they took great care to keep him very firmly away from any Order business, though Sirius and Remus would tell him anything he needed to know. From the sounds of things, Dumbledore's elite group were fairly stalled in their plans to deal with the rise of Voldemort and his followers.

Harry wondered if Dumbledore might ever tell them about horcruxes. He didn't have any doubt that the man knew about them — though he clearly hadn't had any idea about the one residing under his very nose, in the locket.

Harry was relieved when Bill pulled him aside one afternoon, when anyone who might be suspicious of such things was distracted elsewhere. "I wanted to try something. Do you mind...?" He held up his wand, gesturing with his free hand towards Harry's scar.

"Go for it," Harry assented, bracing himself while Bill cast something in a language Harry didn't recognise. There was a strange tugging sensation, both over his scar and around the centre of his chest, and Bill looked relieved. "What was that for?"

"One of the other curse-breakers working on this was wondering if the continued exposure to the horcrux from such a young age might have a sort-of blending effect on the host soul," Bill explained. "She thought since your magic was growing kind of around the soul fragment, it might assimilate it in a way that makes them almost indistinguishable." The alarm must have shown on Harry's face, as Bill quickly continued. "The spell I just did confirmed that they're two separate, distinct entities. They can be separated," he assured. Harry visibly slumped in relief. "We don't know how yet, but we'll figure it out."

Bill spoke with such confidence, Harry couldn't help but believe him. "And the locket?"

"Destroyed," Bill confirmed.

"Thank fuck," Harry muttered, though trepidation gathered in his chest. "Though, Bill, I was thinking about something the other day — how much do you know about what happened with Ginny in her first year? With the Chamber of Secrets?"

He'd been toying with the idea ever since they'd discovered the locket and realised his scar wasn't the only horcrux. The more he thought about it, the more it seemed to make sense.

Bill frowned. "Something about you killing a basilisk? I'll be honest, Mum and Dad didn't tell us much." Harry had expected that. He gave Bill a quick run-down of the events; focusing more on the odd behaviour of Tom Riddle's diary, and less on the whole basilisk situation. Even so, by the end of the story Bill was wide-eyed and a little green behind his freckles. "Bloody hell, kid."

"Yeah, there's a reason Dumbledore swept that one under the rug." The Prophet would've had a field day with the knowledge that the headmaster had let a basilisk roam the school for a year. "Anyway, I think—I think the diary was another horcrux."

Bill's face grew grave. "From the sounds of it, I think you might be right." He quirked an eyebrow. "Don't suppose you have access to the diary now, so I can run tests on it?"

Harry shook his head — that would've been helpful, but considering he used the diary to help free Dobby, he couldn't regret giving it back.

"Thought as much. Ah, well — I'll get the team looking into it. I don't know if there's any way to find horcruxes — especially not a way that won't let old Snake-Face know we're onto him — but at the very least we can start brainstorming for others he might have. He can't have made too many more; the soul would be too unstable for him to resurrect himself after more than about eight or nine splittings."

Harry's stomach lurched at the idea of so many horcruxes existing in the world. "I hope it's not that many."

Bill grimaced, nodding in agreement. “You and me both, mate.” He ran a hand through his hair, which was loose for once. “Well, if that Potter luck holds, maybe you’ll stumble across a couple more on your adventures,” he remarked wryly. Harry snorted.

“You never know.” He wasn’t sure just how far the Potter luck would extend. “At least that’s two of them out of the way, for sure.” Hopefully, soon, they could add the third to the list. “Are... have you figured anything else out, with my scar?”

The redhead looked apologetic, which was an answer in itself. “We’re working on it. I promise you, we’ll figure something out. Gorrak’s got Gringotts’ best and brightest on the case — and me,” he added, smiling bashfully. Harry elbowed him in the side, rolling his eyes.

“Gorrak told me you’re one of the best they’ve got, don’t get humble on me now,” he teased. Bill nudged Harry away, blushing.

“Either way, we’ll get it sorted. You just focus on the three hundred other things you seem to have going on in your life,” he teased.

Considering Bill was only privy to about half of Harry’s secret plans, that felt like an understatement. The curse-breaker ruffled Harry’s hair, signalling an end to the conversation, and they stepped out of the room they’d holed up in — opening the door directly in Tonks’ face. She stumbled to a halt, looking between the pair with raised eyebrows. “Something I should know about, you two?” she asked, innuendo heavy in her voice. Harry blushed brightly. Bill, on the other hand, just laughed.

“As if I wouldn’t be taking the opportunity to piss Mum off with that, if it were the case,” he teased, hand resting on Harry’s shoulder. “Besides, Tonks, you already know where my interest lies.”

“Ah, yes,” Tonks drawled, looking devious. “Pretty veela intern girl.”

Harry’s eyes went wide. “Intern girl?” He whipped around, looking up at Bill. “Is Fleur interning at Gringotts?” He couldn’t think of another veela girl they might have been talking about, not after the way Bill had behaved at the third task. And Harry knew from his last letter from Fleur that she’d been looking into Gringotts jobs in England, though he’d been moved to Grimmauld before she could tell him any more.

“Shit, I forgot you two were friends,” Bill muttered, cheeks going pink. Tonks lit up.

“Harry, you know the girl Bill fancies?” she asked excitedly. Harry grinned.

“She was the Beauxbatons champion. She’s great.” He glanced to Bill. “I’d ask her out sharpish if I were you. She’s not impressed by a man who waits around.” She would say yes, Harry was sure of it.

Bill’s blush brightened, while Tonks cackled. “That’s you told, Weasley,” she teased. “Now, off with you; I need to talk to Harry here.”

Bill's embarrassment faded in the wake of concern, but Harry discreetly shook off his worry. He wasn't sure what Tonks wanted, but he doubted she'd do anything to him with half the Order around. Sirius said his cousin was one of the good ones.

"We'll catch up with you in a bit," Harry assured the eldest Weasley, and followed Tonks through to the small parlour nearby. He kept his hand ready to draw his wand from its holster, especially when she privacy-warded the door. She turned to face him, and her eyes darted to the movement — then immediately turned sad.

"I'm on your side," she blurted. "I mean—I wanted to say sorry, for how I acted when we came to pick you up from your relatives' house."

Harry tensed, eyeing her suspiciously. "Why, because you feel bad for taking this long to figure it out?" he asked, somewhat harshly.

"No, because I knew from the start and I was trying to see if Mad-Eye would say anything," came the reply. Tonks sighed, her hair shifting from pink to a deep purple. "Well, I didn't know the specifics. I don't think any of us did. But... Sirius is my cousin. I knew right from the get go that things weren't right with him and Dumbledore. I talked to him about it, the few times it was just the two of us in the house. He told me he was worried about you, that he knew the muggles didn't treat you right — and he knew Dumbledore knew that, and kept sending you back there anyway."

Trying to keep his face impassive, Harry was internally wide-eyed at the onslaught of information. That was not what he'd expected — why hadn't Sirius warned him he'd spoken to Tonks??

"So you're not Dumbledore's biggest fan either, then?" he surmised, wondering exactly what he could get away with saying. Tonks snorted derisively.

"Not hardly. Old man always did put his nose more places than it was ever wanted," she retorted. "I'm here because Kingsley's here. And Kingsley's here because he wants Voldemort gone, and he knows that's more likely to happen with Dumbledore than the Ministry." She paused. "Sirius told me you're the Black heir," she admitted. "That makes you family. And if you've learned anything yet about being a Black, it's that family comes first." The smile she shot him was vicious, and Harry grinned back.

"He mentioned he'd talked to your mother. He didn't tell me he'd told you." It was exhausting, trying to keep track of who knew which secrets. Harry would write it down if he wasn't so worried about the information getting into the wrong hands.

"Most people think that because Mum was disinherited, I don't give a toss about all that pureblood Wizengamot stuff," Tonks drawled. "It makes me a good target for people like Dumbledore to try and sway over to their side. As far as the Order's concerned, I think all purebloods can go hang. Now I'm not trying to barge my way in to whatever secrets you've got going on; I just wanted to let you know that you've got an ally in me, for whatever you need. Kingsley, too, even if it doesn't seem like it," she added, correctly interpreting the look on Harry's face. Harry hadn't spent much time with the older auror, but from the little he had seen, the man seemed very... by the book. "He's head of the Shacklebolt family. He's been dealing with Dumbledore on the Wizengamot for years now, he knows how the headmaster works. And he knows how the Ministry works. But while he was technically a Ravenclaw, he's always had a solid Slytherin side to him."

Tonks grinned, and Harry grinned back.

"That's good to know." He wouldn't let them in on what he was really doing, not until he knew how much he could trust them. But it was definitely nice to know there were two more Order members who weren't mindless Dumbledore puppets.

It would make it much easier to steal them over to his side, once he was ready.

.-.

Bill and Tonks both stayed for dinner, and Harry was amused by the way both of them eyed each other suspiciously, glancing back to Harry as if they could somehow intuit what the other had needed to talk to him about. Harry ignored the whole thing, chatting with Remus instead. At least until Bill cleared his throat.

"I got a letter today, Mum. With some news you'll be pleased about," he said, barely stifling a smile. Mrs Weasley eyed him curiously. Bill's smile widened. "Charlie got a job as a senior handler at the reserve in North Wales. He'll be home by the weekend. For good."

All the redheads in the room made exclamations of surprise and joy, Mrs Weasley even shedding a few tears in delight. "Oh, Arthur! Our boy's coming home!"

Mr Weasley took her hand and kissed the back of it, beaming. "That's brilliant news, Bill," he said.

"I'll get one of the rooms upstairs cleared out for him," Mrs Weasley started, but Bill shook his head.

"Oh, don't worry; I offered him my spare room for when he's not at the reserve," he assured. Mrs Weasley made a quiet sound of protest, and Bill grinned at her. "No offence, Mum, but no one wants to move back in with their parents after they've lived by themselves for five years." His voice was playful, and Mr Weasley pecked his wife on the cheek.

"Let the boys have their space, love. I'm sure Charlie will be over for dinner plenty. And Order meetings," he reminded. That seemed to placate the matriarch — or at least, her excitement overshadowed it all.

While the twins quietly wondered if they could get Charlie to bring them home dragon scales for experimenting on, Harry smiled into his shepherd's pie. With Bill and Charlie both back in the UK, that meant they would soon be ready to take up their Wizengamot seats.

His plans were all beginning to line up. He couldn't wait to see how things would play out.

.-.-.

The next morning, Harry woke with a sharp gasp, empty grey eyes the only thing he could see. He cursed softly, clenching his hands in his duvet — his brain had somehow melded his guilt about both Cedric and Dudley, until his dream became watching Cedric get his soul taken by a dementor in the middle of that graveyard.

Harry could still feel the cold.

He took a shower in an attempt to warm up, glad it was still too early for most people to be awake, and desperately wishing he was still at Seren Du. There, nightmares were greeted with a sympathetic hug from Remus, a cup of tea from Ceri, and then at least an hour of forcing his brain into more productive pursuits by duelling with Snape.

Harry couldn't believe how much he actually missed the Potions Master.

Nightmares in Grimmauld Place were an entirely different kettle of fish; Harry had wiped all traces of it from his face by the time he went down to breakfast, not wanting either Mrs Weasley or Hermione to begin the concerned questioning, as if he were one wrong word away from another shouting match.

They might not have been far off with that assessment, but the nightmares wouldn't be the thing to trigger it. He was just so tired. After weeks of being free to process his grief, Remus and Snape and even Sirius giving him the space and comfort to do so on his own terms, having to lock it up tight — or worse, perform his grief for the satisfaction of others — was beginning to gnaw at him, constantly, making his skin itch and his stomach churn. It wouldn't be so bad if he could sneak off for a quick cuddle with either of his godfathers, but there was hardly a moment of privacy in Grimmauld. It was somehow worse than the Burrow the summer before; despite being a much bigger house, everyone seemed to congregate in the same five rooms, and Harry wasn't quite brave enough to go exploring in the rooms that hadn't been fully cleaned and cleared of dark magic. Hiding in his room only got him so far — Ron and Hermione had figured out where it was after the first week.

With school drawing ever closer, they seemed to have decided it was time to bring Harry back into the fold — or someone had instructed them to, perhaps. Either way, it meant the pair were constantly hounding him for attention now, Ron pestering him to play chess or exploding snap, while Hermione asked incessantly about his summer homework.

He got lucky, through breakfast. Ron was busy stuffing his face, and Hermione seemed too tired to begin the Harry Inquisition. He was able to keep his head down and eat his breakfast — and ignore the concerned glances Sirius sent his way. Remus had gone, no doubt back to Seren Du for the day. Part of Harry hated him for being able to travel so freely.

Since Hermione was under the weather — Harry heard her mutter something to Ginny about cramps, and wisely decided to ask no further — the teenagers were allowed a chore-free morning. Harry told Ron that he too wasn't feeling well, and the oblivious redhead decided both his friends had clearly caught the same germs, so he went to go bother the twins while they rested.

Unfortunately, Harry's luck began to fail around lunchtime.

He was just beginning to hope he might get a peaceful afternoon, too — perhaps enough privacy to call Draco on the mirror, even — when Ron claimed the seat beside him at the table. “Alright, mate. You seem to be feeling better.”

Harry didn’t answer.

“I guess Hermione’s staying in her room for the day,” Ron continued, unperturbed. “Look, d’you think that, y’know, while she’s not around — could I take a look at your Charms essay? She won’t let me copy hers, not even just to get cliff notes so I can write my own version. You keep telling her you’ve done it already. Unless you were lying? You can tell me, mate — we can do them together, before she finds out and yells at you. Merlin, she’s gonna be a nightmare this year with OWLs coming up.” He chuckled. Harry didn’t.

“I’ve written my essay,” he confirmed.

“Brilliant!” Ron grinned. “So can I borrow it?”

“No.”

The redhead faltered. “What? Come on, mate. I’m not gonna copy it, I just wanna see what you’ve written so I know I’m on the right track.”

Harry gritted his teeth. The low-level headache he’d had since he’d woken up was rapidly spreading, his pulse thudding in his temples. He could already feel his magic buzzing under his skin — after stretching it to its limits while training with Snape the first half of the summer, it was not doing well being cooped up these last few weeks.

“We’re going into fifth year, Ron. You should be able to write your own damned Charms essay by now,” he bit out. Ron snorted.

“You sound like Hermione,” he complained. “Mate, seriously, I—“

“No, Ron,” Harry cut him off, voice louder than intended. Around them, everyone went silent. “You can’t copy my essay, and I’m not your ‘mate’. ” His tenuous hold on his emotions shattered, along with the jug of pumpkin juice in the middle of the table. Chair scraping against the tiles, he got to his feet. “Do your own bloody homework, and leave me alone!”

He’d hardly eaten, but he didn’t care, storming from the kitchen before anyone could call him back. It was a stupid thing to get so upset over — he didn’t even care about the Charms essay, but Ron talking to him as if the entire last year hadn’t happened, as if he and Harry were still best friends... it was the final straw.

He reached his room and slammed the door in his wake, throwing himself down on his bed. His magic leapt eagerly to ward the door, and Harry wished more than anything that he could curse something, or go flying, or just get out of this damned house. He almost called Ceri to take him over to Seren Du, consequences be damned. Sirius had managed to escape for a few hours a week before Harry had moved there; surely they could do something to give him the same freedom?

He would never ask, though. It wasn't worth the risk — now Harry was here, there would be chaos if he went unnoticed for more than about ten minutes.

Besides, if he went to Seren Du they'd have a hard time getting him to ever leave again.

A knock on the door made him groan, but his ire lessened when he recognised Sirius' magic on the other side of the door. He dropped his ward, inviting the animagus in and rolling onto his side. His cheeks flushed at the look on his godfather's face. "I'm not mad at you," Sirius assured. "Not like Molly is. But she can stuff it, quite frankly — her youngest son is an arse." Harry snorted. "Did yelling at him help any?"

"Made me feel a bit better," Harry muttered, shifting aside so Sirius could join him on the single bed. The older man shuffled beside Harry, leaning against the headboard and stretching his legs out. After a beat, Harry rolled closer to him, burrowing his face in the man's side. "I hate this, Padfoot," he admitted, eyes stinging with tears. "This house... it's bad enough on its own, but they just won't leave me alone. I've got no privacy and far too many secrets and I still can't get a full night's sleep without waking up from one nightmare on another, and as soon as I wake up they're just pestering me and it's only going to get worse when school's back in because Dumbledore will be there, and no one here seems to even care that Cedric is dead or that Dudley is dead or anything! I can't even bloody go outside for some fresh air!" Across the room, the desk rattled. Harry swallowed back the lump of emotion in his throat. "I want to go home, Sirius," he whispered, staring up at the man with desperate eyes, red-rimmed and tearful.

"I know, pup," Sirius sighed, running his hand through Harry's hair. "I do, too."

Guiltily, Harry realised that Sirius had been stuck in this house for just as long as he had. He opened his mouth to apologise, but Sirius shook his head. "No, don't — I've had years of experience being trapped in this dump with people I hate," he said wryly. "I'd say at least we've got some good ones on our side — the other Weasley kids, and Remus, and even Tonks when she's around — but it's really not the same when all you need is a day or two to yourself." He kept stroking Harry's hair, and the boy leaned into the touch, feeling the tension slowly leak from his frame. "I'm sorry, pup. You've not had time to process anything about your cousin — that's a complicated bit of grief if I've ever seen one. And hell, you haven't really dealt with Cedric's death yet, not really." His voice was knowing, and Harry didn't deny it. The Hufflepuff's death still felt like a gaping wound in his chest. "I wish I could do more to help. I wish it wasn't so easy for Molly to boss me around in my own damn home."

"She's got Dumbledore on her side," Harry pointed out. "You never stood a chance."

"Neither of us did," Sirius agreed. "I wish I could take you home and let you fly and swim and bake with Ceri for a while. Wish I could get Draco there, and Cissa too — get them out of that bastard's clutches, get them somewhere safe. But... safe won't last long, these days, until we've done something about it. And doing all those things would only bring more trouble down on our heads."

Harry hummed quietly in agreement. Slowly, his breathing was beginning to steady itself again, his emotions draining from him until all he had was exhaustion and a deep, aching sadness. "I didn't mean to have such a meltdown." He wasn't going to apologise to Ron, but he'd have to deal with the awkwardness that would follow, and probably a scolding from Hermione about his temper, when she found out.

"I think you're owed more than a few of those," Sirius retorted. "Ron was being a prick, anyway — you were right, he's old enough to do his own homework." His hand stopped moving, resting on the back of Harry's neck, a comforting weight. "But you can lock him out of here 'til dinner. And the twins and I will up our pranking game to try and keep him off your back. There's only two more weeks until school, and then you'll have all your other friends around, and it'll be easier to avoid Ron and Hermione."

There was a sadness to Sirius' voice, and Harry's heart clenched; he would get to go back to school and escape Grimmauld Place, but Sirius wouldn't. "Are you going to be alright, when I go?"

"Oh, don't worry about me, pup," Sirius replied, bravado lingering at the edge of his smile. "Once all you kids are gone it'll be easy for me to pretend to sulk in my room all day. I can have Ceri pop me home and hang out with Beaky in the sunshine. I managed alright last year, after all."

Harry remembered all the days he'd called Sirius and seen the shadows in his face. All the times Remus had stayed at Seren Du to keep him company. Sirius was doing lots better, but Azkaban's scars were still present. "I'll always worry about you," he confessed, burrowing deeper into the man's chest. Sirius held him close.

"I know, kiddo. But honestly, I'll be alright. I can survive anything after Azkaban."

Harry sighed, longing for the day that Sirius — and himself — no longer just had to survive, but could truly enjoy life.

"Two weeks feels like forever," he admitted softly. Even at the Dursleys, summer had never dragged on so long.

"Tell me about it," Sirius agreed with a snort. Then he grew serious. "D'you want me to ask Snape for some more Dreamless Sleep?"

It was a tempting offer, but Harry shook his head. "It won't help in the long term." It would only delay the dreams. He couldn't take the potion forever. "Just... can we hang out here for a bit?" It was nice, being in the quiet with Sirius. Almost like being back at home.

"As long as you like, kiddo," Sirius agreed without hesitation. He started to stroke Harry's hair again, playing with the messy black strands. "We don't have to leave 'til you want to. Or if you want to kick me out and get some time to yourself, that's fine too. I'll just go hex all of Ron's pants to scream at him when he gets a boner."

Harry choked, burying helpless giggles in Sirius' jumper. "Maybe in a bit," he agreed.

He couldn't deny a Marauder his fun, after all.

Chapter 46

At this point, Harry felt like he deserved a medal for not hexing Ron Weasley into a gibbering puddle of sludge. Hermione was almost as bad, but she was thankfully distracted by Mrs Weasley declaring the library ‘safe’. With less than two weeks left before she was back at Hogwarts, the young witch was determined to read as much as humanly possible.

In-between harassing Harry about the state of his summer homework, his future revision schedule, and anything else she could think to pick at, of course.

Ron just continued to talk to Harry as if they were still best friends, crowing about how great it would be to be back at school and how Harry would kick the Slytherins’ arses at quidditch with his Firebolt. The obsession with dominating the other houses — especially Slytherin house — was wearing on his nerves.

Harry had to wonder what their angle was — if they had been told by Dumbledore to continue befriending him, was this really the way they thought to do that? Sure, it might have worked when they first met, but he was eleven and drowning in compulsion charms then! He would’ve befriended a statue if Dumbledore’s spells had directed him to.

It was becoming incredibly clear to him that there was a reason the pair had no friends outside of each other, and Harry.

“Surely this is too much, even for them,” he mused to Remus one afternoon, hiding in the werewolf’s bedroom. “If they really wanted to try and be friends again, I’d have thought they’d try it a bit more gently.”

“I don’t think either of those two know what gentle is,” Remus replied dryly. “It does seem odd, though. Hermione’s a smart girl, she should’ve realised making you angry isn’t likely to endear them to you.”

“She just thinks I’m struggling with my feelings,” Harry muttered, recalling something he’d overheard her saying to Tonks when she thought Harry couldn’t hear. “The only feeling I’m struggling with is the one telling me to punch Ron.”

Remus snorted, shaking his head. “At least you’ve got Ginny and the twins.”

Harry made a face — he did, but the twins were locked in their room at all hours frantically trying to develop more joke products for the upcoming school year, and spending time with Ginny by herself was causing Mrs Weasley to make all kinds of uncomfortable comments.

“I’m worried about what Dumbledore might have Ron and Hermione do if I’m not friendly with them again soon,” he confessed, finally speaking aloud something that had been niggling at him for a while now. “I mean, he clearly knows his compulsions have failed. If he tries more, or...” Harry didn’t like to think about how far the headmaster might be willing to go. Ron and Hermione had access to him in Gryffindor Tower; his dorm, his trunk, everything. If Dumbledore pressed them to do some kind of magic on Harry for his own good, there was little he could do to escape it.

"If you need to, you can always fake friendship with them," Remus pointed out. "It'll add another burden to your shoulders, but it might be necessary to keep you safe."

A noncommittal hum sounded in Harry's throat. Then his brow furrowed, as another long-brewing thought finally surfaced aloud. "Do you think Dumbledore has spelled them, like he did me?" He hated how hopeful he sounded. "Put compulsions on them to make them treat me a certain way?" If he hadn't had the security of his other friendships through his fourth year, Ron's treatment of him after his name came out of the Goblet would have devastated him — he would've been desperate to take the redhead back by the time he deigned to apologise. Would Dumbledore go that far, to keep Harry vulnerable?

Remus sighed, running a hand through his hair. "It's possible," he admitted, though he sounded doubtful. "There's a meeting before dinner if you like. I can have Severus stay and try to check them."

Harry raised his eyebrows. "Would Snape actually be willing to stay for dinner, here?" The man was always one of the first ones to leave when Order meetings ended. Harry hadn't seen him for more than five minutes in total since he'd left Seren Du.

A small, fond smile flickered across Remus' face. "He will if I ask him," he assured, and Harry grinned.

"He'd do anything if you asked him," he teased, watching the werewolf blush. It was strange, to think of Severus Snape in such a way, but it was absolutely true; if there was one thing Harry had learned in the last year, it was that the Slytherin would live and die at the behest of Remus Lupin.

"Alright, enough of that," Remus muttered, nudging Harry's shoulder. "Unless you want me to mention the list of things Draco would be willing to do for you."

It was Harry's turn to blush, and he shook his head. "I'll stop," he promised. "But... if Snape wouldn't mind, that would be great." At least then he would know. Then he could stop hoping.

"He might even enjoy it; getting to torture Gryffindors even in the summer," Remus joked. "It'll be good for you, too — blow off some steam with someone who won't treat you like glass."

Harry couldn't deny, that sounded good. He hadn't expected to miss Snape's bluntness so much, but after having half the house pussyfoot around him — even Remus and Sirius sometimes, though they tried not to — he couldn't wait to snipe at someone who would be equally sharp in return.

Sure enough, when Harry and the other teenagers were allowed down into the kitchen after the Order meeting, there was a tall, black-clad figure stood in the room.

It was worth it just to see the blood drain from Ron's face.

"Professor Snape is staying for dinner," Mrs Weasley declared, false cheer in her voice and confusion in her eyes. Harry couldn't really blame her; if he hadn't asked for it, it never would have happened. He wondered what sort of motive Snape had given for the odd behaviour.

"But—" Any protest Ron might've made died when dark eyes narrowed in his direction. Instead, a tiny squeak escaped him, and he hurried to sit as far away from Snape as possible.

Harry, more than willing to play his part, shot the Potions Master a moody glare. Amusement flashed in the man's eyes for the briefest moment.

Snape ended up sat between Remus and Kingsley; the two most tolerable Order members, as far as he was concerned. Though he played up his disgust at having to sit beside Remus.

Harry was amazed the werewolf could keep a straight face through it all. More than that, he was amazed that no one but him and Sirius seemed to realise that Snape's grumbled insults followed by Remus' too-mild witty retorts were the pair flirting.

Gross.

"So, Severus," Mr Weasley said cheerfully, passing a bowl of cabbage further down the table. "Are you ready for school to go back? Feeling like the castle is too quiet yet?"

"Ready to have my time invaded by imbeciles who can barely brew a Swelling Solution?" Snape drawled, sending a pointed look in the direction of the Gryffindor teens. "I think not."

Mr Weasley chuckled, as if it was supposed to be a joke. "Ah, but I'm sure there's a few talented kids in the mix who make it all worth it."

"We try our best, Dad," Fred chirped bravely, earning a Snape-glare of his own.

"Such a shame you've only got us for one more year, isn't it, Professor?" George added. The pair seemed bolstered by the fact that they — presumably — couldn't earn detention during the holidays. Though Harry noted they weren't quite bold enough to try any pranks at the dinner table. He'd seen George pocket some jelly-bean-like things the moment he'd seen Snape in the kitchen; no doubt the evening's entertainment rescheduled.

"On the contrary, Mr Weasley; I believe the entire school will rejoice if the two of you actually make it to graduation."

That just made the twins grin wider.

The possibility that they might not make it to graduation had Mrs Weasley pursing her lips. "You boys had better buckle down this year," she warned. "You only get one chance to take your NEWTs, after all — you'll never get a good Ministry job without them. I'm of half a mind to ask Professor Snape to keep a stern eye on you, make sure you aren't getting up to trouble."

"I have better things to do than keep a pair of Gryffindors from getting themselves expelled," Snape said coolly. His ire didn't seem to bother Mrs Weasley, who continued to stare down her twin sons.

"You've got a lot to live up to, you know — all three of your older brothers got excellent NEWT results."

Harry hid a scowl behind a forkful of roast lamb — how dare she compare them with their brothers like that? They were different people! Besides, it wasn't like there was anything to truly worry about; Fred and George had excellent grades, when it actually mattered. They might only have three OWLs each, but they were all Os — it took a lot of brains to come up with the prank products and spells they created, after all.

The only thing more laughable than the twins failing their NEWTs was the idea of either of them getting a job at the Ministry.

"Leave the boys be, Molly," Sirius called languidly. "I'm sure they'll do fine in their exams. If even James and I could get our heads on straight long enough to pass our NEWTs, your two will manage alright."

"A fine example, Black — considering you and Potter got more detentions in your seventh year than any other," Snape pointed out acidly. Sirius just grinned at him.

"Aw, it's sweet that you kept count for us, Snivelly."

Snape scowled. "Only to see if a certain number would finally result in expulsion."

"What number did you get to, Sirius?" George asked.

"We'll see if we can beat it." Fred was smirking, right up until a wooden spoon whacked him on the shoulder.

"Absolutely not! Sirius, don't you dare encourage them," Mrs Weasley snapped. "Honestly, think of the kind of example you're setting for Harry, if nothing else."

Sirius glanced over at his godson, and winked. "I'd say Harry's doing grand, all things considered."

"If you mean he's following in his arrogant father's footsteps, mutt, you would be correct." Snape let his eyes land on Harry, challenge clear. A thrill shot down Harry's spine — oh, it was on.

"Don't talk about my dad like that," he retorted hotly, glaring at the professor. "He wasn't arrogant."

"Watch your manners, Potter," Snape scolded. "I dread to think what kind of fanciful lies the mutt and the wolf have been filling your head with this summer, applauding your rule-breaking recklessness.” His eyes flashed, a sneer twisting his features. “There won’t be a Triwizard Tournament to stroke your over-inflated ego, this year. Perhaps you may finally learn some humility.”

“I managed just fine without the three years before the Triwizard,” Harry shot back. It was hard to maintain the hateful look in his eyes; this was fun. When he felt a smile threaten to creep through, he drew up on all his frustration at being trapped in Grimmauld. “I’m sure there will be something to keep me busy. Another Death Eater teacher, perhaps. Has Dumbledore hired a new Defence teacher yet?”

“Professor Dumbledore, Potter,” Snape corrected. “And that’s none of your business.”

“That’s a no, then.” Harry’s lips twitched. “Blimey, is it really getting that difficult to find people who don’t want to kill me?”

Someone further down the table snickered. Harry thought it might’ve been Tonks.

“Despite what I’m sure your dogfather has told you, the world — and Hogwarts’ staffing practice — does not actually revolve around you,” Snape drawled at him.

“Yeah, kid; Defence professors were dropping like flies long before you hit the scene,” Bill joked, winking at Harry.

The rest of the Order managed to diffuse the situation, keeping conversation relatively civil through the remainder of dinner — though Harry couldn’t help throwing a few more snide remarks Snape’s way, which were returned in kind viciously. It felt good, being able to actually argue with someone who wasn’t just going to coddle and patronise him. Someone who could handle it if Harry’s venomous tongue got a little too sharp.

It helped too that the others were looking at him like he was either utterly mad or incredibly brave, speaking to Snape like that, even outside of school. Perhaps it was foolish of him, but it helped cement Snape’s reputation as hated dungeon bat — especially when he promised Harry a week of detention once school started back up.

“You can’t do that! It’s summer!” Harry argued indignantly, making Snape smirk in satisfaction.

“Watch me,” he hissed.

“I think that’s enough for one night,” Remus cut in, his professorly ‘disappointed’ face firmly in place. “Harry’s had a difficult summer, Severus; you can’t punish him for things he says outside of school. Though he really should apologise,” he added with a pointed glance at the dark-haired teen. Harry huffed mulishly, glaring up at them.

“Sorry, sir,” he bit out. Remus gave him a look that said he might be overdoing it a touch, but Harry held firm.

“No matter,” Snape dismissed. “I’m sure he will earn those detentions soon once school begins, if he cannot learn to keep a civil tongue in his head. I should have expected his attitude to get worse once Black became involved in his care.”

That set Sirius off again, and really, those two had far too much fun picking at each other.

“Why don’t I walk you out,” Remus said, pitching his voice loud enough to be heard over Sirius’ scathing tone. “Molly, thank you for dinner, it was lovely.” He turned the disappointed face back to Harry. “Cub, I expected better of you. Professor Snape is a guest here, and even in the summer he is still your teacher.”

Even knowing it was just a front, the tone still sent a squirm of guilt through Harry’s gut. But he went full throttle into teenage-angst, scoffing and shoving his chair back. “Whatever,” he muttered. “I’ll be in the library.”

He stalked from the kitchen, managing to make it all the way up to the privacy of the library before bursting into laughter. He didn’t have to wait long before the door opened, Remus and Snape slipping in and warding the door behind them.

“Brat,” Snape accused without heat, and Harry grinned at him.

“Don’t tell me you didn’t enjoy that.”

A flicker of a smile was the only answer the tall man gave.

“Yes, yes, very funny, both of you,” Remus said, rolling his eyes. “Honestly, I thought you were going to give Molly a heart attack, the way you two were carrying on. Sirius, too!” He eyed them both exasperatedly. “Sometimes I think I made a mistake in getting you all to befriend each other.”

“Too late,” Harry chirped, grinning. “Also, like the two of you can talk — frankly I’m astounded no one has realised the truth, all that flirting going on.”

That brought a blush to both their faces. “People see what they want to see,” Remus said, shrugging. “And no offence, Severus, but no one in that room wants to see even a hint of you having a sex life, let alone with me.”

Snape gave his partner a quick smirk, eyes burning. “Their loss.”

“Uh, hello, I’m still here, please stop,” Harry begged, knowing this was his punishment for being a sassy little shit in front of half the Order. “Back to business, please? Professor, did you manage to test them?”

The pair grew serious, Snape turning back to Harry. “Neither Mr Weasley nor Miss Granger are under any spells, compulsion or otherwise,” he confirmed quietly. Harry’s jaw tightened — the tiny fragment of hope he’d kept alive in his chest died.

“Right. Everything — that’s all them, then. They’re working for Dumbledore of their own will.”

“Likely he’s manipulated them into believing they’re helping you. Or, at the very least, helping the wizarding world at large,” Snape said. It made Harry feel a little better, but his stomach still soured; it might be Dumbledore's instruction, but their obliviousness to Harry's emotional state was all them.

"Thank you for checking, sir. I appreciate it."

Snape nodded. "I took the liberty of checking the other Weasley children — they, too, are clear. The headmaster evidently does not see them as a threat to his control over you."

Now that was good news, relief rising in Harry. "Hopefully it stays that way." So far, only Remus and Sirius had been enchanted in any way, other than Harry himself. The two people who were most likely to take Harry out of Dumbledore's clutches.

"Keep a keen eye on those close to you — if you believe their behaviour to be suspect, tell me and I shall test them," Snape assured. "We have come too far to let carelessness be our downfall."

The prospect made Harry feel sick; if Dumbledore got suspicious of any of the heirs, it would only take a few well-placed compulsions and perhaps some truth serum to have all of Harry's work destroyed.

"We'll all be vigilant," he promised.

Satisfied, Snape nodded, then turned to Remus. "Do you need anything further, or can we go?"

"You go, I'll be over in a few." Remus ran a gentle hand down Snape's arm, giving him a look that Harry couldn't begin to decipher. Snape merely nodded, and disappeared.

"Is everything alright?" Harry asked, eyeing the werewolf hesitantly. Why would Remus need to stay behind?

"You tell me," Remus returned. "Those digs about the Defence professor weren't just to rile up Severus."

Remorse flooded Harry's gut. "You know I wasn't talking about you, right?" he assured quickly. "That night with Wormtail was an accident — you were the best Defence professor I've ever had, and you never should have left. I don't count you in the number that tried to kill me." He didn't want Remus to think Harry blamed him for what happened, even for a minute.

The man smiled slightly. "That's good to know, but that wasn't what I meant." Harry blinked, confused. "Are you that worried about this year's teacher endangering you?"

"Oh. Well, uh, track record hasn't been fantastic," Harry pointed out. "I wouldn't say worried, more... expecting the worst? Though it is concerning that we're this close to term and don't have one yet." Anyone who was such a last-minute hire was bound to be a problem, for one reason or another.

"You're not wrong, there," Remus agreed with a grimace. "With any luck, you'll get someone who's just incompetent rather than actually dangerous."

Harry, thinking of Lockhart, didn't say anything about how the former could easily become the latter. "As long as I pass my OWLs, I don't mind either way."

"I think that's one subject you don't have to worry about, cub," Remus said, ruffling Harry's hair. "You could take your Defence OWL tomorrow and get an O, I'm sure of it."

Harry preened; truthfully, he couldn't wait to take his exams. To put in to practice all the studying he'd been doing in secret, all the progress he'd been hiding.

"It's Potions I'm hoping for the O in," he admitted. "I want to see Snape's face when he has to admit I'm not as hopeless as he insisted."

Remus laughed. "Severus has every faith in you getting an O. He wouldn't have let you ease off your Potions lessons earlier in the summer, otherwise." His smile turned fond, as it often did regarding the dark-haired Slytherin. "He'll push you hard in class, but that's just because he knows you can do well. Even if he'll have to put up a fuss about letting Harry Potter into his NEWT class," he added teasingly.

Looking at him, Harry couldn't believe no one in the house was aware of the true relationship between the two. Hell, that they had never let it slip as teenagers, let alone the adults they were now. "Hey, Remus?" The werewolf quirked an eyebrow expectantly. "How come even the Order don't know about you and Snape? I can understand keeping it secret at school and everything, but... everyone here already knows what side he's on." It had to be exhausting, to pretend to hate the man you loved even in the comfort of a place that was supposed to be safe.

The Marauder's gaze grew melancholy as he met Harry's eyes. "It's complicated, Harry," he sighed. "Part of it is just Severus' reluctance to let his guard down among people he doesn't trust. Half the Order think he's still loyal to Voldemort and just playing Albus to keep himself safe. If even one person were to say the wrong thing in front of the wrong people..."

Harry grimaced — it could spell Snape's death.

"But on top of that, we can't let Dumbledore find out. So much of his trust in Severus — so much of Severus' position, and the knowledge he gets from it — is because he believes Severus owes everything to him. He needs to believe that Severus does not trust anyone but him; that he has nothing of his own to live for." There was pain in his eyes — a familiar kind of pain, to Harry.

He wondered how long Snape had gone believing that was the truth.

"I'm sorry," Harry said softly. "That— that's no way to live."

"It is what it is," Remus dismissed, managing a half-smile. "We have always kept our relationship hidden, and it has served us well so far. Eventually it will not be necessary, but until then... I have him back in my life, and that's the most important thing. I don't need other people to be aware of my love for it to be real."

Harry couldn't imagine what those twelve years were like for them, when Sirius was in Azkaban and Snape and Remus were apart and all of them were so, so lonely in so many ways. They had been hard enough for Harry, as a child. The adults had all kinds of other problems.

He couldn't imagine having to spend twelve years pretending he didn't feel the way he did about Draco.

"I hope you get to be open about it, soon," he said instead. Remus smiled, squeezing his shoulder.

"You and me both, cub." He glanced up at the clock. "I'll take my leave, if you don't mind? I think you've been in here long enough for the others to think you're done sulking."

Harry grimaced; he was amazed they hadn't been interrupted already. "Yeah, probably. See you tomorrow?"

Remus hugged him, kissing the top of his head. If Harry grew much more, he'd have to bend down a little for the werewolf to do that, and it made him grin. "Bright and early. Have a good night, cub. Sleep well."

"You, too."

Remus stepped back, and in the blink of an eye he was gone. Harry's stomach clenched enviously — Snape and Remus got to go back to Seren Du and be alone together.

One day, he would get to be back there, with Draco, and with his family. He just had to hold on until then.

. . .

The weekend brought with it a buzz of excitement, and a storm of baking courtesy of Mrs Weasley.

Charlie was home.

As promised, he came for dinner the day he returned from Romania, a still-red burn on his forearm that he hadn't even bothered to try and hide from his mother's disapproving gaze. He showed up with Bill, immediately catching Ginny as she threw herself at her older brother. "Oof, watch your elbows, there, Gin," he joked, mock-winded even as he lifted her off her feet in a hug. The rest of his siblings crowded him, full of questions about the Welsh reserve and what Charlie would be doing there. Harry hung back, though Charlie still managed to wade through the sea of redheads to give Harry a hug.

"Good to see you, kid," he enthused, then his eyes darkened. "I'm sorry about Diggory. And your cousin."

Harry's heart clenched. "Yeah. Thanks. Welcome back, though."

“Oh, not you again!” Tonks’ loud groan made them both look up — she was stood in the doorway, smirking at Charlie. “I thought I got rid of you for good.”

“Shut up, you love me,” Charlie declared, striding across to wrap the auror in a tighter hug than even Ginny had earned. Tonks yelped, shoving him away when he tried to smack an exaggerated kiss to her cheek.

Harry had forgotten the pair were friends; it seemed like a lifetime ago that he’d been first introduced to Tonks at the Quidditch World Cup.

“I hope you get eaten by a dragon,” Tonks said, wiping her cheek with an exaggerated grimace. Charlie barked out a laugh.

“Missed you, too, mate.”

The commotion had drawn the last few members of the household down to the kitchen; Sirius stood in the doorway, Remus at his shoulder, looking both amused and bewildered by the pair’s antics.

“You must be Charlie,” Sirius greeted, holding out a hand. Charlie shook it, blue eyes trailing appraisingly over Sirius.

“And you’re the infamous Sirius Black,” he returned. “Have to say, you look a lot better than you do in those Wanted posters.” His cheeks dimpled in a grin when Sirius laughed.

“I should hope so! Those Azkaban photographers never got my good side.”

Remus introduced himself as well, and the next thing Harry knew they were all being herded to the table, which was groaning under the weight of all the food Mrs Weasley had cooked to celebrate her son’s return.

For once, Harry was entirely overlooked in the kitchen of Grimmauld Place — everyone wanted to know what Charlie had been up to since the First Task, which was the last time he’d been home. The stocky redhead was in fine form, regaling them all with stories of his dragons, and the coworkers he’d left behind in Romania. He sounded sad to have parted from them, but his joy at being back with his family was obvious.

No one even looked Harry’s way, except when Charlie told him the Horntail’s eggs had hatched, and she was more ferocious than ever. “In case you ever fancy round two,” he joked, blue eyes sparkling. Harry snorted.

“I’ll stick to quidditch, thanks,” he replied dryly. Charlie could keep his dragons, thank you very much.

. . .

His return to Hogwarts was so close Harry could almost taste it — so close he’d entirely forgotten about booklists, until Ginny knocked on his bedroom door with two envelopes in her hand. “Cutting it a bit close, aren’t they,” she remarked, tearing into her own.

“Good thing there’s only two new books,” Harry agreed, scanning his list for the coming year. Ginny huffed.

“Speak for yourself. I’m lucky I can have George’s old books — Diagon’s gonna be a nightmare.”

Harry grimaced. “Are we going to owl-order, or…?”

“Mum’s gonna pop out and grab everything, once we’ve figured out what we all need. So I guess you’ll be owl-ordering.” Her brown eyes were knowing — she was fully aware of her mother’s forays into Harry’s vault, and the security measures put in place to stop that. Harry’s stomach clenched; no one had noticed anything amiss, yet. Hopefully Gringotts could keep her out without putting suspicion on Harry.

Ginny was eyeing the envelope in his hand expectantly, and Harry peered at it — just the two pieces of parchment, as always. “What?” he asked her, baffled.

“Oh, nothing. I was just expecting— well, fifth year, innit? Prefect badges?”

“Oh yeah.” That had completely slipped Harry’s mind. “You think Nev, maybe?”

Ginny brightened, “I hope so. His gran would be dead pleased.”

Harry hoped so, too; Neville would make a great prefect. It might encourage him out of his shell a bit more, too.

There was a high-pitched shriek from downstairs, closely followed by Mrs Black spitting profanities from her portrait. Harry and Ginny shared a knowing look. “Hermione?”

“Hermione,” Ginny agreed.

There was no way the female Gryffindor prefect wasn’t her. “Merlin help us,” Harry muttered under his breath, making the redhead giggle. The last thing Hermione needed was the illusion of authority.

Deciding to get it over with, the pair headed downstairs to find Harry’s year mates — sure enough, Hermione was holding a shiny prefect’s badge like it was the most precious thing in the world.

The surprise was the matching badge in Ron’s hand.

“No way,” Ginny murmured. Then, louder; “Ron, you’re a prefect?” She said the word like one might say fungus or pus-filled boil. Her brother glared at her.

“What’s that supposed to mean? Yeah, I’m a prefect.” He squared his jaw in challenge, eyes flicking smugly towards Harry.

“What?” Mrs Weasley had chosen that exact moment to come by, carrying a pile of laundry. Ron looked up, and showed his mother the badge. “Oh! Oh, my! Ronnie!”

The twins were summoned by the commotion, and looked equally as disgusted as Ginny when they realised what had happened. Their jokes couldn't quite hide the flash of pain that crossed both their faces when Mrs Weasley declared that was 'everyone in the family'.

"Congrats, Ron," Harry said once she'd left with the promise of buying Ron a new broom. Ron's smug look returned, and Harry smiled evenly. "Good to see Dumbledore has faith in your ability to handle the workload of a prefect on top of your OWL revision. Personally, I'm glad I only have to deal with studying and quidditch."

The redhead's expression faltered — clearly he hadn't thought about the actual effort involved in being a prefect.

"You've got your priorities right, Harry," George agreed, grinning. "None of that responsibility nonsense."

"There's no need to be jealous, Harry," Hermione said primly. "I'm sure Professor Dumbledore had his reasons for picking Ron over you."

"Oh, completely," Harry agreed, throwing her off her stride. "I get into way too much trouble, he'd look bad to reward me for it. Nah, seriously, best of luck to both of you. Though I'm sorry it's probably fucked up those revision schedules you worked so hard on, Hermione."

Beside him, he noticed Ginny's cheek twitch with the effort of holding a straight face. Hermione frowned. "Oh, no, you're right — I should re-write those now!" She turned as if to leave, then paused. "Harry, is it alright if I borrow Hedwig, to tell Mum and Dad? You don't need her, do you?"

Harry was tempted to say no just to be difficult, but Hedwig hadn't really left Grimmauld since Harry had arrived; he hadn't wanted to risk writing to anyone, not sure what Dumbledore might consider unacceptable. "Yeah, go for it; she could do with the chance to stretch her wings. I think she's in the upstairs parlour, the one with the big window. I'm gonna go finish packing."

And so he went upstairs, leaving Hermione eagerly chattering to Ron about the adjustments she would make to their revision schedules — oblivious to the dawning horror on Ron's face.

Harry smirked to himself; oh, that was far too easy.

If Dumbledore was expecting Harry to be upset about not making prefect, he truly had lost his grasp on things.

.-.

Despite what he'd said, Harry didn't really have that much packing to do. He'd only brought from Seren Du what he would need for the school year, and a few quick spells had everything stacking neatly into his trunk. But with his usual shadows aflutter with the news of prefect-hood, Harry took the opportunity to dig out his two-way mirror. "Draco Malfoy."

After a few moments, the blond's face appeared in the glass. A tightness in Harry's chest eased. "Hey. I've missed you."

Draco's face softened. "Missed you, too, Scarhead." There were dark circles under his eyes that made Harry's heart ache. "Merlin, I can't wait to be out of here tomorrow. Did you see booklists finally arrived? I thought they'd forgotten, honestly."

"I think Dumbledore only just managed to find a new Defence professor," Harry supplied. "I have to say, I'm not impressed at their book choice, whoever they are. Slinkhard, ugh." He made a face, and Draco hummed in agreement.

"I don't know who it is, but Father said Fudge is very pleased by the appointment, so that doesn't bode well."

It definitely didn't; a tiny knot of trepidation formed in Harry's belly. Perhaps he'd been too flippant in his jokes about teachers trying to kill him.

Teachers trying to support the Ministry might be worse.

"Anyway, that doesn't matter. Let's see it, then," Draco prompted, lips curving in a smirk. Harry blinked, perplexed. "Come on, Potter." His silver eyes darkened playfully. "I'll show you mine if you show me yours."

Then his hand appeared in frame, long fingers carefully cradling a green and silver prefect badge.

"Oh!" Harry's stomach did a complicated little flip of emotions — joy; pride; the briefest snatch of jealousy; frustration, that Draco would now be busier. "I, uh, didn't make prefect."

Two pale blond eyebrows shot up. "Really?"

"Dumbledore, giving me authority?" Harry pointed out with a snort. "Don't be ridiculous — it might make me think I'm actually worth something." He rolled his eyes, hoping Draco didn't catch the little twist of bitterness as his joke fell a fraction short.

"I expected he might want to show a bit of support for his Golden Boy, considering what the Prophet has been saying about you all summer," Draco reasoned. His brow furrowed. "I'm sorry. Who is it, then; Longbottom?" Harry must have made some kind of face, for Draco blanched. "Don't tell me it's Weasel."

"Him and Hermione," Harry confirmed dryly. "Everyone's very proud."

"Merlin's beard," Draco muttered. "Granger was a given — that badge has been hers since first year. But Weasley, seriously? What was Dumbledore thinking?"

"Probably some kind of incentive for Ron to keep an eye on me," Harry said with a shrug. He'd had some time to think about it, and it made sense. "Give him something to lord over me to keep him happy — something the famous Harry Potter doesn't have. Better than giving it to me and having another thing for Ron to be jealous over." God, Harry was exhausted by all the posturing. "I think I've pissed him off by not being mad about it. As far as I'm concerned, it's one less thing for me to worry about." He smirked at his boyfriend. "I was hoping it would mean more free time in my schedule to sneak about in unused classrooms, but clearly I'm going to be awfully lonely on that front."

"On the contrary, it just means I have a reason to be out past curfew, while you've got that fancy cloak of yours," Draco returned, a huskiness to his voice that made Harry's heart stutter.

His birthday felt like eons ago, now. He couldn't wait to have Draco in his arms again. "Seriously, though, I'm proud of you. I know you worked really hard to get that badge." Ron would probably say that Draco's father had bought him the badge, but Draco's grades spoke for themselves.

A pale flush rose on the blond's cheeks, a pleased smile crossing his lips. "Thanks. I expected it to be Blaise, honestly; he's a more politically sound choice."

He was the only Slytherin fifth year boy not directly connected to Death Eaters. "Your father aside, I think Snape would've had a fit if it was anyone but you. Dumbledore wouldn't have overruled him on this." Not like he almost definitely had with the Gryffindors — there was no way McGonagall would have picked Ron Weasley over the rest. Hell, even Seamus would have been a better choice than Ron.

"I can't wait to take points off Weasley the first time he insults me," Draco said with a smirk, and Harry laughed.

"God, there goes our chance at the House Cup." Even Ron's ability to take points wouldn't save them, considering prefect point adjustments had to be reviewed by the head of house.

There was a strange thud on Draco's side of the mirror, and the Slytherin boy froze. "I have to go," he whispered. "I'll see you tomorrow."

Before Harry could say anything, the mirror was blank. He growled under his breath.

The sooner Draco was away from that hellhole, the better.

. . .

That evening, there was a party at Grimmauld Place, celebrating the two new prefects. Someone had conjured a banner, and the kitchen was decorated in red and gold. Half the Order was there — whether to celebrate or just to enjoy free food — and Mrs Weasley was happier than she had been all summer as she flitted between groups of people, offering up drinks and food, happily gushing about the newest prefect in the family.

"Harry, dear, I'm so sorry but I wasn't able to get your new schoolbooks," she said, an annoyed frown on her face. Harry tensed. "The goblins have changed the rules — they wouldn't let me in without you there, even though I had your key. I would have just bought them with the rest, but, well; the Slinkhard book isn't cheap, and..."

“Not to worry, Mrs Weasley, I’ll owl-order them tonight before I go to bed.” Hedwig had already returned from Hermione’s parents, bearing a congratulatory letter and some sugar-free sweets. “They’re probably just tightening security because of Voldemort being back. Worried about people under Imperius and the like.” He said this with a lackadaisical shrug and a half smile, and the Weasley matriarch sighed.

“Something like that, I’d imagine. Really, I don’t know what Albus was thinking, leaving the school lists so late in the term. All those poor first years in Diagon today, hardly knew which way was up!” She bustled off, heading to greet Kingsley as he flooed in, still in his auror uniform.

Harry ended up stood with Charlie and Tonks, butterbeer in hand. The metamorphmagus had joined the Weasley clan this evening, with waist-length red hair and freckles across her cheeks.

“Sprout would’ve rather dug up the greenhouses than made me prefect,” Tonks declared, grinning. “This one, on the other hand, was Minerva McGonagall’s pride and joy.” She elbowed Charlie in the side, and he went pink.

“Only when I wasn’t in detention for trying to sneak creatures into the dorm,” he protested. “Or in detention with you for some kind of trouble or another.”

“Andromeda Black’s daughter? Trouble?” Sirius cut in with a mock-gasp, hand going to his chest theatrically. “Well, I never!”

Harry had known Charlie and Tonks were in the same year at Hogwarts, but it was only now he was realising how inseparable they had been in their school days. “You’d almost think trouble runs in the family or something,” he piped up cheekily. Sirius barked a laugh.

“Or something,” he agreed. “Don’t worry, cousin dear; us Blacks never made prefects. Only Cousin Cissa ever got a badge from our generation of the family.”

“You mean you weren’t a prefect?” Harry feigned shock, earning another laugh.

“Me? You know damn well I was in too many detentions with James to ever get that badge. No, that was dear old Remus’ honour. He was the good boy.”

They looked over, where Remus was seemingly trapped in a conversation with Hermione — a rather one-sided conversation, by the looks of things.

“I can see that,” Charlie mused. “He’s got that sort of trustworthy vibe to him.”

“It’s all bullshit,” Sirius assured. “He was responsible for just as many pranks as me and Jamie — he was just better at not getting caught. Damn werewolf nose, little cheater,” he grumbled fondly. He squeezed between Charlie and Harry, slinging an arm over his godson’s shoulders. “Nah, a prefect badge is more trouble than it’s worth. Now, the quidditch captain badge, that’s the one you want, pup. All the perks, none of the responsibility. The prefect’s bathroom is a hell of a thing.”

“You weren’t quidditch captain either,” Harry said, raising an eyebrow, and Sirius winked.

“No, but Robin Waters was Ravenclaw captain, and he was very generous with the password. For the right price.”

“Spare me the details,” Harry said, mock-gagging and making Charlie snicker.

“Quidditch captain is definitely less work than prefect,” he said, then grinned cheekily. “I would know, I was both.”

“Ooh, alright, show-off,” Sirius teased, grey eyes sparkling.

Across the room, Harry saw Ron glance his way — all afternoon, the redhead had been waiting for Harry to do something, or say something; any kind of sign of jealousy. It had to be eating him up inside that Harry genuinely didn’t care about badges.

Tonks slipped away to go talk to Kingsley about something, and Harry left Charlie and Sirius playfully sniping at each other in order to go and get more food. When he turned back to the crowd, he jumped — Mad-Eye Moody was right at his shoulder, electric blue eye fixed on Harry. “Alright, Potter. I’ve got something to show you.”

Harry knew this wasn’t the same man who had hounded him all of the year previous, but that didn’t make him any less uneasy — all through the summer, it had become clear that Moody was Dumbledore’s man through and through, and Harry didn’t trust him for a second. Nevertheless, he let the man lead the way to a couple of empty chairs at the kitchen table, and watched as a folded photograph was pulled from his pocket.

He had no idea why that was something Moody thought he might enjoy. Staring at all the people who had been part of the original Order, so many of them now dead or worse — seeing Neville’s smiling parents, stood not far from his own. So many other too-young faces, with no idea what was in store for them.

He wasn’t hungry anymore.

“Yeah, thanks, Moody,” he muttered, handing the picture back and making a quick escape. He didn’t get far — Mrs Weasley called a toast to the two prefects, her cheeks rosy and her arm around a squirming Ron, a beaming Hermione on her other side.

In another life, Harry might have felt something seeing that; envy, or pride, or something. Mostly he was just bored.

Charlie had cracked open a bottle of firewhiskey — keeping it carefully hidden from his parents as it was passed around Bill and Tonks and even Kingsley. As tempting as it was to stay and watch them get tipsy, Harry knew nothing truly interesting would happen with Mrs Weasley around. Instead, he snuck over to the twins, who were daring Ginny to eat increasingly suspect Bertie Botts Beans.

“Want to go upstairs?” he asked quietly, eyes darting towards the door.

“Hell yes,” came Ginny’s immediate response, throwing a strange purple bean at Fred.
“Cards?”

The four of them slunk out of the kitchen — noticed by Sirius and Bill, but not stopped — and tiptoed past Mrs Black’s portrait, heading for Harry’s room. There, they shut the door and made themselves comfortable on the floor, Harry pulling a pack of cards out of his satchel where it waited with his clothes for the next day.

“Have to say, mate, I’ll be pleased to see the back of this house,” George remarked, shuffling the cards expertly. Harry made a noise of agreement.

“I wish I wasn’t leaving Sirius behind. But it’ll be great to be back at school with everyone.”

“You missing your boyfriend?” Fred cooed, laughing when Harry’s cheeks reddened.

“Hang on, do you two know who it is?” Ginny asked, narrowing her eyes at her twin brothers. The pair shared a look.

“We can neither confirm nor deny,” George said, though he was grinning, which really gave it away in itself. Ginny scowled.

“Not fair.”

“Sorry, Gin. It’s not just my secret to tell,” Harry apologised halfheartedly. There was a lot she knew, but still plenty she didn’t, and Harry wasn’t sure how good her Occlumency was yet. Draco’s safety was too important.

Ginny mock-sniffed. “See if I give you any of the good gossip about my own love life, Potter.”

He made a face that had her kicking him in the shin. “You can definitely keep that gossip to yourself. Even if it’s Neville. Especially if it’s Neville.” There were some things he didn’t need to know about his best friend and his pseudo-little sister.

Mention of the other Gryffindor had Ginny blushing, which of course had the twins teasing her relentlessly; first about Neville, but then about some Ravenclaw boy she’d apparently been writing to.

Harry shook his head, still bewildered by the whole situation. They’d sort it out eventually, he hoped.

Obviously the party downstairs was not quite as exciting as intended; one by one, people trailed up to Harry’s room — first Sirius, flushed in the face and starting to edge into melancholy at the thought of them all going to school in the morning. Shortly followed by Bill, complaining about people insisting he got a haircut. Charlie arrived soon after, which of course meant Tonks joined too, and then Remus sniffed them out, looking amused to see so many people crammed into Harry’s bedroom.

“So this is where the real party ended up, is it?” he remarked dryly, snatching the bottle of firewhiskey from Sirius’ hands and necking back a shot. “Molly keeps thinking everyone’s gone home without saying goodbye.”

“Whoops,” Charlie giggled, leaning back against the edge of Harry’s bed. “We probably shouldn’t stay long, anyway. Work in the morning and all that.”

“And you kids have a train to catch,” Tonks said, sticking her tongue out at the Gryffindor teens. “Which means I’ve got to make sure you get to that train.”

“Ugh, we’ve got a guard?”

“You’ve got a guard,” Bill corrected. Harry rolled his eyes.

“Lucky me.”

Someone downstairs made some sort of loud noise, which set off Mrs Black’s portrait. Sirius groaned, dragging himself to his feet. “I’d better deal with that,” he muttered, squeezing past Charlie and between the twins, eventually reaching the door. He swayed a little as he walked, and Harry and Remus both sighed.

“We knew this day would be difficult for him,” Remus said, meeting Harry’s gaze sadly. “I’ll go make sure he doesn’t drink himself to death. Get to bed, kids, it’s getting late.”

“Yes, Professor,” Tonks sing-songed, before bursting into giggles. The werewolf rolled his eyes.

“I wasn’t talking to you, but good to know where your mental age is at,” he joked, shaking his head. “Goodnight, everyone.”

That seemed to be the unspoken end of the party; Ginny snuck away before her mum or Hermione could find her and say anything about her being in Harry’s room. The twins apparated back to their own bedroom. Tonks assured Harry she’d see him in the morning and slipped out; before the two eldest Weasleys could do the same, Harry reached out to grab Charlie’s arm. “Hey, Charlie; y’know how you owe me a favour? From the seeker’s match last summer?”

“What do you need?” the redhead asked without hesitation. Harry bit his lip.

“I... would you keep an eye on Sirius, while I’m at school? Just drop in here every now and then, make sure he’s doing alright. Make sure your mum isn’t bothering him too much. I just — I worry about him, cooped up here.” Sure, Sirius might be able to get to Seren Du sometimes, but it wouldn’t be often enough for Harry’s liking.

Charlie’s face softened, and he patted Harry’s shoulder. “I’d do that even if I didn’t owe you one,” he assured. “Don’t you worry, kid. Sirius is a good bloke; we’ll keep him from getting too lonely.”

Bill muttered something that Harry didn’t quite catch, but whatever it was had Charlie blushing as red as his hair, glaring at his brother. “Shut up,” he hissed, turning back to Harry. “You just worry about your own stuff, let us take care of Sirius, yeah?”

Harry grinned, a weight off his shoulders as he bid the pair goodnight, finally alone in his room.

Sirius would probably be fine. But it couldn't hurt to have a couple extra pairs of eyes on him, just to make sure.

Chapter 47

Chapter Notes

Little later than usual, sorry, I am having A Day :)))) However I'm very glad to see that after the last chapter y'all are on board with one particular direction this fic is going~ Enjoy!

When he woke up, he knew the fast-fading dream had not been his own.

There was a certain feeling, to a Voldemort dream. A slick, oily sensation, much like the feel of foreign magic stuck to his own. But more than that, it was the same endless corridor with the same locked door. His head ached even as he shook it off, but he already knew he wasn't going to tell anyone. Especially not Sirius. No point in worrying him right before they said goodbye.

Harry found out about the whole boggart debacle once he made it downstairs. Guilt squirmed in his stomach — apparently, it had initially appeared as Bill's dead body, and since the curse-breaker was up in Harry's room, Mrs Weasley hadn't realised it was a boggart at first. But it wasn't his fault Bill was upstairs, and they'd all sorted it in the end. Mrs Weasley was fine, if a little pale.

It certainly didn't stop her shouting up and down the stairs all morning, herding her children through the pre-Hogwarts routine. Everyone had given up trying to close the drapes on Mrs Black, and after stealing some breakfast Harry avoided the chaos the best he could — his trunk was packed, Hedwig's empty cage resting on top of it, and she would meet him at school once she'd retrieved his owl-order of school books.

"Alright, pup?" Sirius snuck in, wincing from the volume of the chaos in the hall. "You about ready?"

"As I'll ever be," he confirmed. "The others aren't, I take it."

Sirius gave him a lopsided grin. "What gave you that idea?" He snickered, shaking his head. "Y'know, I thought about coming with you — as Padfoot, of course. But Moony pointed out that bloody Wormtail has probably given all our secrets away to his master," he sneered viciously. "Last thing I need is to be recognised by Death Eaters. So, ah, I'll have to say goodbye here."

Harry strode across the room, hugging him tight. "I wish you could come see me off." Every year, he watched kids hugging their parents before boarding the train, heart aching with envy. The Weasleys just weren't the same as having people there only for him.

“One day,” Sirius promised, holding him close. “Still two more goes after this one. Plenty of time to clear my name.”

Harry hoped they could manage it. “Are you going back to Seren Du?” He felt Sirius nod.

“Soon as the house has cleared out,” he confirmed. “Reckon I can get at least a couple of hours of sunshine. Moony’s going to tell everyone I’m sulking in my room when they get back from dropping you off.”

“Good.” Harry hated the idea of leaving him, but at least it would give him the chance to get out of the house. “I’ll get the mirror back from Draco and send it through Snape as soon as I can.”

“Sounds good. You look after yourself, alright? I’m not just talking about Dumbledore.” Sirius sighed, leaning his chin against Harry’s forehead. “I wish you didn’t have quite so much on your shoulders, pup. I hope you have a nice, quiet year, but I feel like that’s asking far too much. So all I can say is; study hard, fly well, make time for your friends, and definitely make time for your boyfriend.” His smile pressed to Harry’s hair. “Keep working on your animagus transformation, I bet you’ll have made loads of progress by Christmas.”

Harry had hardly had any free time to work on the magic since leaving Seren Du, and he was keen to properly get back to it. “You’ll look after yourself too, yeah? There’s enough people around that you shouldn’t be alone when the cold gets bad. As long as you tell someone,” he said pointedly, pulling back to look his godfather in the eye. “Bill, or Charlie, or even Tonks. She seems alright.”

“Yeah, she’s a good one. Course, with Andi as her mum, she wouldn’t be anything less.” Sirius was dodging the subject, and Harry narrowed his eyes until the man sighed. “Fine. I’ll tell people, if they’re around. I’m not nearly as bad as I was last year, though.”

That was true, but also he was daft if he thought Harry didn’t see how the ghosts of Azkaban could drown him some days.

“I don’t think I’ll make it through the whole school year without tipping Dumbledore off,” Harry confessed quietly. “Especially not exams. I’m not sabotaging myself on those.” His OWLs were important, and if he’d made it that far without the headmaster realising at least some of the truth, he probably wouldn’t make it much further.

“Do what you can. And remember, you’re not alone.” Sirius ruffled his hair. “You’ve got all of us here willing to help, and all your friends at school. Bill’s working on the scar situation. Dumbledore needs you, pup. Whatever his plans are, he can’t do anything to you, not if he wants to see Voldemort defeated.” His face grew serious for a moment. “And if he puts those blockers and compulsions back on you, we will notice, and we will fix it. I promise.”

Had his deepest fears been that transparent? A cold sweat gathered on the back of his neck every time he thought about being left to Dumbledore’s mercy, being shaped and brainwashed with magic and sent back to the ‘right path’ as a prisoner in his own body while his friends watched on, oblivious.

Before Harry could say anything, Mrs Weasley screeched up the stairs for them all to gather before they would be late. Harry hugged Sirius tight. “I love you,” he murmured. “I’ll see you at Christmas. And talk to you on the mirror.”

“As often as you need me,” Sirius vowed, smiling. “I love you too, pup. Give ‘em hell for me, yeah?” He winked, and Harry was laughing as he left his room, jogging downstairs while Sirius levitated his trunk for him. The whole entourage was crammed in the entrance hall, waiting — the school-age Weasley kids, Mr and Mrs Weasley, Moody, and Remus. Tonks was waiting elsewhere, as Harry discovered when Mrs Weasley practically forced him out the door. With one last wave to Sirius, he was off.

. . .

Getting everyone safely and discreetly to the platform — at least, as discreetly as possible when one person was Harry Potter and the rest had hair like traffic cones — was quite an ordeal, and Harry breathed a sigh of relief when he was finally on the train.

“Ron and I are supposed to go to the prefect carriage,” Hermione declared, once the twins had disappeared to find Lee. Harry shrugged. That was fine by him.

“Cool. Ginny?” He gestured down the train, and she led the way without even glancing back at Ron and Hermione, checking each compartment for familiar faces. To Harry’s delight, they found Neville also wandering the train — and then found Luna in a compartment by herself.

“Oh, good; I was hoping you’d find me,” she said by way of greeting, beaming at Ginny.

“Hi, Luna,” Harry greeted cheerfully, bemused by the strange glasses resting on the girl’s face, a copy of the Quibbler upside-down in her hand.

There was a brief awkward moment as Ginny squeezed too close past Neville to go sit with Luna, but they managed to get settled with their trunks up in the luggage rack just as the train sped out of central London.

“How was the rest of your summer?” Neville asked, hazel eyes sympathetic. Harry shrugged.

“Oh, y’know. Ups and downs.” He’d had a little contact with Neville while at Grimmauld, but only through tacking paragraphs on the end of Ginny’s letters to the other Gryffindor.

To Harry’s surprise, there was a knock on the door, and it slid open to reveal Susan Bones’ smiling face. “There you are! I’ve been looking for you since I saw Ron Weasley go into the prefect carriage.” She screwed up her nose to show what she thought of that decision, and Harry laughed.

“I would’ve thought you’d be in there with them.” Susan was a shoe-in for prefect, he’d thought.

“Nah, Dumbledore knows he can’t control me. Hannah and Ernie got the badges,” she explained. “Of course, he can’t control them either, but he doesn’t know that.” She winked. “I’ll let them have their romantic corridor patrols together; I’m far too busy this year.”

Harry was glad there was someone else who didn't care about being passed over for prefect, shifting over to make room for her so she could shut the door properly.

"How's it all going? I have the notes for you, by the way." The enormous stack of parchment with all his notes on the laws Susan had asked him to look at was safely in his trunk, where it had been since he'd left Seren Du. The Hufflepuff's face lit up.

"Brilliant. It's going well, actually; everyone's been way more helpful than I anticipated. Of course, there's only so much I can do at this stage — but you keep assuring me you've got my roadblocks handled," she teased.

"One at a time, I'll get to them," he joked in reply — just a controlling headmaster and a Dark Lord to do away with, nothing major.

"Good lad." Her smile dropped, and she rested her hand on Harry's arm for a moment. "My aunt told me about what happened to your cousin. I'm so sorry, Harry."

A lump rose in Harry's throat, and he cleared his throat. "Thanks. It— yeah, it wasn't great. I just can't believe a dementor actually got that far."

Susan's face darkened. "Aunt Amelia's furious. Fudge and Scrimgeour — he's the head of the aurors — keep telling her it was just a rogue dementor, that there's no need to look into it now it's been contained. As if a rogue dementor would get that far and only Kiss one person on the way." Her mouth set in a grim line. "I wish there was more we could do to get justice for you."

"Knowing your aunt even tried is help enough," Harry assured — even if the rest of the Ministry was corrupt as hell, it was nice to know he had an ally in Amelia Bones.

The atmosphere brightened when another knock on the door heralded Lavender and Parvati, who stayed for a while to talk to Harry and Ginny about their summer in India with Parvati's family. Susan left, but Anthony Goldstein swung by with Michael Corner, whose presence had Ginny blushing and Neville's jaw clenched painfully tight. Blaise and Daphne even stopped in briefly; in fact, the only one of the heirs group who didn't make an appearance was Cassius. Something that had the worry in Harry's stomach growing sharper — if he didn't know that Draco had written to the older boy regularly throughout the summer, he'd wonder if Cassius was even on the train.

They had obviously been side-tracked on the way back from the prefects meeting — or perhaps just hadn't been keen to find Harry again, which was fine by him — as when Ron and Hermione found them, Hannah and Ernie were in the compartment, along with Sullivan Fawley who was deep in conversation with Luna and Ginny about something.

"Where are we supposed to sit?" Hermione asked, dragging her trunk along behind her. Harry wondered why she hadn't shrunk it yet.

He shrugged. "Sorry, we're a bit full in here. Maybe there's room in one of the other compartments?"

Ron tried to stare the group down, but he was no match for Ernie's dead-eye expression, and he broke away first, flushing angrily. "Come on, 'Mione, let's find somewhere quieter," he muttered, already turning away. Hermione huffed, shutting the door hard in her wake.

There was a beat of silence, then Hannah giggled.

"You're at that point, then, are you?" she asked, linking her fingers with Ernie's in the stocky Hufflepuff's lap.

"I've been beyond that point half the summer," Harry groaned. "Once I moved in with them, they spent the whole month alternating between being pissed off at me, and trying to be my best friends again. I'm sick of it."

"So you're done pretending with them? Neville checked, and Harry nodded.

"I don't care if they think it's teenage angst, I've got actual friends to be hanging out with now."

"Can't say I'm surprised," Ernie mused. "They weren't exactly proper friends to you last year. What were they expecting?"

Harry hummed in agreement — Dumbledore would likely have something to say about it, but Harry couldn't be bothered to care anymore. If the old man wanted him to stay friends with Ron and Hermione, he wouldn't have let them ignore Harry for the first half of summer.

Though there was no reappearance from the two Gryffindor prefects, the compartment slowly emptied as people left to greet other friends, until once again it was just the three Gryffindors and Luna. Harry stretched his legs out, propping socked feet up on the seat opposite. Sometime soon, they'd have to change into their robes, but there was a little more time yet.

Just as he was beginning to consider a nap, there was yet another knock on the compartment door.

"Merlin, we're popular," Ginny remarked — only to freeze when a head of platinum blond hair snuck in.

Harry couldn't help the grin that stretched across his face, though at a swift kick to the ankle from Neville, he quickly schooled it into something less lovestruck. "I was wondering if you'd show up. Chill out, Ginny; we're friends now. I'll explain later, promise."

Luna didn't seem to even notice the interruption, engrossed in the Quibbler once more. Ginny eyed Draco suspiciously, but eventually nodded. "You and your secrets, Potter," she grumbled.

"Those never-ending secrets," Draco agreed drily. "I can't stay long. I told Crabbe and Goyle I was going to the bathroom." Harry snickered, sitting up straight so Draco could perch on the seat beside him. It was torture, having him so close and having to maintain a friendly distance. "I just wanted to confirm that myself and the others will still come to study group when we can."

“Even Cassius?” Harry asked, brow furrowing. Draco nodded.

“Yes, but we’ll have to step up our acting game. No civility outside of study group, unless it’s Blaise or Daphne. We’re working on things within the house,” he added in assurance. “Keep us in the loop, alright? And do try not to be offended by anything we may do or say in public.” He glanced askance, including Neville in that. Harry just grinned.

“When have I ever been offended by something you did or said?” he teased, laughing when Draco just stared at him. “Don’t worry, it’ll be fine. We’ve kept things hidden this long, after all.” Kept some things hidden even from their inner friend group. “But if you hex me, I’ll hex you back.”

Draco’s gaze met his, and heat flared for just long enough to send a frisson of electricity through Harry’s body. “Challenge accepted, Potter.” He straightened out his uniform, which already had the shiny prefect badge pinned to the lapel. “Just remember, I can give detentions.”

There were a dozen things Harry could say to that, and none of them were appropriate for present company. “I’d like to see you try,” he joked instead, green eyes burning into silver.

There was a long pause, then Neville coughed pointedly.

“I’d better go,” Draco remarked. Then he paused, digging into his trouser pocket and pulling out the two-way mirror. “Here, you can have that back. Thank you for lending it to me.”

Harry quickly stashed it away, smiling. “Glad you got some use out of it.” So very, very glad — he would’ve worried himself sick all summer without that means of communication.

He wished he could speak plainly, but he wasn’t quite ready to out them to Ginny and Luna yet. Instead he met Draco’s gaze pointedly as the blond stood to leave. “We’ll catch up properly soon, yeah?”

“Once things settle down,” Draco promised. He straightened up, nodding to the compartment at large. “Longbottom. Weasley. Lovegood. Enjoy the rest of the journey.”

And then he was gone.

Silence stretched between them.

“You have a whole lot of explaining to do,” Ginny declared. “Both of you,” she turned her glare on Neville, who gulped.

“It’s a long story, Gin,” Harry sighed, checking his watch. “Let’s get changed and then I’ll tell you, yeah?”

She was already in on so many of his secrets, Draco’s loyalty was one more she could handle.

As for their relationship — she’d have to remain oblivious to that, for now.

The four of them stuck together on the way off the train, Harry hiding a smile at the sight of Hermione bossing first years about while Ron stood by her side looking longingly at the carriages up to the castle. His gaze slid over to where Hagrid would be waiting to take them to the boats — and he paused. Hagrid wasn't there. Instead, Professor Grubbly-Plank was the one calling for the first years to gather round.

Where was Hagrid??

Harry knew the man had been on some sort of mission for the Order over the summer — something to do with giants in France, Remus hadn't been too knowledgeable on the details. But surely he wasn't still there? Fear gripped his chest; had something happened to Hagrid?

No. Someone would have told him.

"Harry, you're blocking the door," Ginny said with a roll of her eyes, grabbing him by the elbow. He let her drag him over to the carriages, and got his second surprise of the evening, in the form of huge black skeletal horses hooked up to the previously self-driving carriages.

"What the..."

"They're thestrals." He jumped, whipping around to see Cassius stood at his shoulder, gaze fixed on the ghoulish creatures. Harry stared at him; the Slytherin boy was thin, his usually tanned face pale. His already prominent cheekbones looked painfully sharp, and there was a faint distortion of magic around his eyes that betrayed the glamour he was using, no doubt to hide dark circles from sleepless nights.

Or worse, bruises.

"Cassius..." Harry breathed, watching the boy's face harden. There were students all around them, this was not the time nor place to ask about Cassius' summer. But, God, it looked like he'd had a shittier one than even Harry.

A halfhearted glare was all Harry got, before the Slytherin was stalking off to join his housemates in a carriage. Harry went with his three friends, lips pursed in thought as the carriage rolled towards the castle.

He'd read about thestrals; they could only be seen by people who had seen death. It made sense to Harry, why he could see them now.

Had Cassius always been able to, or was that a product of his summer?

He hoped Draco could talk to the older Slytherin, even if no one else could.

Hagrid wasn't in the Great Hall either, when they filed in to take their seats. Luna danced off towards the Ravenclaw table, and Ginny moved to sit with Colin and some of her other year mates. Firmly ignoring Ron and Hermione, Harry and Neville continued a little further down the table to sit near the rest of the Gryffindor quidditch team, and Lee Jordan.

"Hiya, Harry," Angelina greeted, smiling broadly with her hand in Fred's on the tabletop. Fred looked a lot happier than he'd been in the summer, too — George had regularly teased him about how much he'd missed his girlfriend, and clearly he was not remotely ashamed by it. It made Harry want to look towards the Slytherin table, but he couldn't risk it.

"Hey, everyone. Good to see you." He grinned quickly. "Let's hope they don't cancel quidditch again this year, hmm? Congrats, Angie," he added, seeing the shiny captain's badge on her robe.

"They'd better bloody not," she muttered, glaring up at Dumbledore suspiciously. "This is our last chance for another cup win."

It made Harry's chest hurt to think about quidditch without Angelina — and without the Alicia and the twins, who would graduate with her — and when he glanced over at Katie, he could see she felt the same way.

"Let's hope there's a brilliant keeper somewhere in this lot, then," Katie remarked, looking over the assorted Gryffindors. Harry had almost forgotten that they still had to replace Oliver, since there had been no quidditch the year before. He wondered if that had anything to do with Ron's request for a new broomstick.

"Never mind that," George cut in, smirking. "Have you seen the fresh meat up at the head table?"

Harry turned his eyes to the teachers, and flinched at the blaze of pink sat right beside Dumbledore. "Who the hell is she?" She looked like an overgrown toddler, with her round face and fuzzy pink cardigan.

"New Defence professor, got to be," Fred said. "Looks like you're in luck, Harry — I highly doubt she's a Death Eater, with a wardrobe like that."

The girls giggled, but Harry only felt dread, remembering Draco's words about Fudge's delight with the appointment.

Time would tell, he supposed.

A hush descended over the hall as McGonagall brought the Sorting Hat to its usual place, and a long line of first years filed down the middle of the hall. Harry braced himself for a song.

He did not expect the one that followed.

The clear warning about inter-house rivalry hung heavy in the air, long after the sorting itself had begun. Harry looked up at Dumbledore — the headmaster's lips were curved in a genial smile, but Harry could see the annoyance in those twinkling blue eyes. He was not happy with that hat.

"Bit on the nose, wasn't it?" George whispered, leaning close to Harry. Harry hummed in agreement, sharing a look with Neville.

Hogwarts was on their side, he could feel it.

At the end of the Sorting, the tables filled with food after some brief words from Dumbledore. Harry was ravenous, and eagerly began to fill his plate.

“Guess the hat’s told us, then,” Katie remarked, passing Harry a bowl of peas. “Better keep up our study groups. I’m glad — I swear, my OWLs wouldn’t have been half as good if not for some of the Ravenclaws helping me out.”

“You got good marks, then?” Harry asked, and Katie beamed as she nodded.

“Are they really as hard as people say they are?” Neville asked anxiously. Katie’s smile softened.

“They’re not too bad. As long as you remember to go over the early years of stuff as well as just what you learn in fifth year. But the teachers are good at making sure the important things are covered, and now everyone revises together I’m sure you’ll do great. Well,” she added, glancing doubtfully at the brand new professor. “DADA might be a bit hit and miss. But hell, that’s what you’ve got Harry for, isn’t it?” she joked. “I bet he knows more on the subject than I do.”

“Probably knows more than our new teacher, by the looks of her,” George agreed, bumping Harry’s shoulder as a flush filled the younger Gryffindor’s cheeks.

“There’s something familiar about her,” he said, looking back up at the woman as she cut dainty little bites of chicken. “I’ve seen her before, somewhere. Maybe in the paper?”

“We’ll find out soon enough,” Fred dismissed. “Can you pass the gravy?”

As they ate, Harry happily listened to the three chasers talk about their summers. He tried to, at least; hearing his name whispered from a dozen different directions was rather distracting, as much as he was somewhat used to it after all these years. Luckily, from what he could gather only a handful of people were calling him a lunatic and quoting the Prophet; the rest were remarking on how he wasn’t sat with Ron and Hermione.

He smiled vindictively into his roast beef. Perhaps with the whole school talking about it, they might finally leave him alone.

Dinner made way for dessert, and when the room was full of groaning stomachs and straining belts, Dumbledore vanished the plates with a wave of his hand, standing up. Harry stifled a yawn as the headmaster went through the usual warnings about the forest and banned objects, perking up when he gestured to the woman in pink at his side.

“Professor Umbridge, our new Defence Against the Dark Arts professor,” he introduced. Out of the corner of his eye, Harry saw Susan at the Hufflepuff table, glaring like a scalded cat.

He knew that name. Why did he know that name?

It hit him just as the woman stood to make a speech of her own, clearing her throat in a falsely delicate way. Her every word sent a chill down his spine.

She was Fudge’s Senior Undersecretary. The very definition of a Ministry toadie.

Worse, she held the Selwyn seat of the Wizengamot, and was responsible for most of the awful, restrictive, bullshit creature laws. Harry had heard Remus and Snape cursing her name more than once — indeed, further down the table, Snape looked like he wanted to kill her where she stood.

This was not good.

It was hard to pay attention through her long-winded, Ministry propaganda-filled speech, but Harry did his best. Throughout the hall, the other heirs were doing the same. Susan looked furious.

Umbridge may be smiling sweetly, but her words were poorly-disguised venom. Fudge was watching Hogwarts, now — he didn't trust Dumbledore, and he certainly didn't trust the students. Harry wondered how many of last year's quiet rebellions had made their way back to the Minister's ear. How much he knew about how ready a bunch of teenagers were to utterly destroy him.

As Umbridge finally finished, taking her seat once more, Harry caught Susan's eye intently.

Their plans were going to have to change.

Chapter 48

As everyone began to make their way out of the Great Hall, the number of people trying to get a glimpse of Harry Potter increased — as did the number of people making snide remarks about his sanity. The one saving grace was that Hufflepuff House was mostly silent on the matter; they knew he and Cedric had been friends, and they (hopefully) knew that he wouldn't have lied about the older boy's death for attention.

"Come on, Harry. I know the password, let's get out of here," Neville urged, nudging him gently. "Don't listen to them. It's just because we're new back — once they settle in and remember they like you and the Prophet's a bunch of crap, it'll be fine."

Harry wished he could have Neville's optimism, but he was no stranger to the school at large hating him. He just hoped he had enough friends spread throughout the houses to stop things getting too bad — and hoped that, regardless of what they thought about him and about Voldemort, the students would be offended by the very concept of the Ministry interfering at the school.

Ginny appeared at his side just as they reached the doors, and she was scowling. "Did you hear what that Umbridge woman was saying?" she hissed angrily, but Harry cut her off with a sharp look.

"Not here," he warned under his breath, tapping his ear and then looking at the crowd around them, hoping she got the picture; there were far too many people listening.

Her shoulders tensed, then she nodded sharply, and they were silent for the rest of the walk up to Gryffindor Tower. Neville gave the password — explaining delightedly how it was the name of a species of rare plant he'd gotten for his birthday, so he was sure to remember it — and Harry couldn't help the way his heart eased at the sight of the Gryffindor common room. His first real home.

Not many people had made it up thus far — the three of them had squeezed past the crowd and taken a few shortcuts, not wanting to be gawked at. "We can talk things over properly at the weekend," Harry said, keeping his voice low as he looked at Ginny. "Best to just observe for now."

She didn't look happy about it, but she nodded all the same. "I'm going to bed, then. Goodnight, boys." Seemingly without thinking, she leaned up on her toes and gave Neville a kiss on the cheek. When she pulled back, they were both blushing furiously, and Ginny disappeared with a squeak, practically sprinting to her dorm. Harry watched her go, then looked back at his dazed friend.

"It's been far too long a day to get into that," he decided, shaking his head and dragging Neville towards the stairs up to the boys' dorms.

"It's... complicated," Neville agreed, sounding wistful.

Whatever it was, Harry hoped it was sorted out this year. He'd finally rid himself of the Ongoing Saga of Ron and Hermione; he didn't need to be party to another romantic disaster.

Changing into his pyjamas up in the dorm, Harry wished he could talk to Sirius. He'd have to get the second mirror to Snape as soon as possible, so it could be passed on to his godfather.

Dean and Seamus entered just as Harry was pulling on his shirt, going abruptly silent when they saw him. Harry offered the pair a strained smile.

"Alright, Harry," Dean greeted, somewhat awkward. "How was your summer?"

"Oh, y'know," Harry replied evasively, shrugging — that was a can of worms he absolutely did not want to get into. "Yours?"

Dean looked at him, then glanced at his best friend. "...Better than Seamus'," he settled on. Harry sent the Irish boy a curious glance.

"Me mam didn't want me to come back," Seamus said eventually, focusing most of his attention on the quidditch poster he was putting up.

"Why not?" Neville asked curiously.

Seamus went quiet, his gaze flicking to Harry, and Harry put the pieces together with a heavy heart.

"She reads the Prophet, doesn't she?" he said knowingly. "What, didn't want you sharing a room with a lunatic?" There was more bite to his voice than he probably should've let out, but he was tired, and of all the places to deal with this shit he hadn't expected his own dormitory to be one of them.

Seamus scowled at him. "Don't you dare say anything about my mother," he snapped back. "The hell are we supposed to think, what with you showing up with Cedric Diggory's bloody corpse last year?"

Harry flinched.

"Oi," Neville said sharply, surprising everyone, including himself. "Don't, Seamus. We all know what happened there."

"But we don't, do we?" Seamus retorted. "We just know what he said." He waved a dismissive hand at Harry. "Him and Dumbledore, dropping cryptic shit about You-Know-Who being back and then buggering off for the summer."

"I can't control what Dumbledore does," Harry said hotly. "And I can't control what the Prophet writes. But after seeing my friend murdered in front of me and then being used in a ritual to resurrect a Dark Lord, I think I deserved a bit of bloody peace and quiet!" He tossed his school shirt at his bed, roughly grabbing his toiletries bag from his trunk.

"And we're just supposed to believe that, are we? No proof but your word?"

"Look at it this way," Harry roared, eyes flashing. "You can sit there and think I'm crazy; fuck knows I can't stop you. You can think I'm a liar and a lunatic and everything else the Prophet says about me. But on the off chance I'm not lying and Voldemort is actually out there, do you really want to take the chance of not being prepared?"

Seamus was milk-white at Harry's words, and even Dean had gone ashen-faced. Harry snorted. "Thought not." Then he stalked past them, heading for the bathroom just as the door opened to admit Ron.

Harry just wanted to brush his teeth and go to sleep, and hope to hell he didn't dream of that fucking corridor again.

..

Cool grey eyes surveyed the Slytherin common room, watching the assorted students greet each other after a summer apart, no longer on display in the Great Hall. They were still far more reserved than most, but Draco could see the tension leave each pair of shoulders as they stepped into their dungeon haven.

He watched closely, seeing the way certain students gravitated towards others, avoided some. The lines were already being drawn. Those with parents in the Dark knew the storm was coming, and they had instructed their children to ensure they remained on the correct side, to make sure they kept away from their classmates whose loyalties could not be certain. Even right down to the brand new first years, currently getting the 'Welcome to Slytherin' speech from Pansy, Draco could tell which way their parents leaned just by watching them interact with their peers.

It made the knot in his stomach tighten. He was going to have to walk those lines very carefully. A large number of people in this school knew his true feelings on the matter — he just had to hope they kept his secrets as well as they kept Harry's.

Draco wasn't so naive to think that he too wasn't being watched. Being Lucius Malfoy's son wasn't enough to give him immunity — if anything, it would make him a beacon. A shining example of how the future soldiers of the Dark Lord's army should act.

A very tall pedestal from which to fall, if he were caught.

If he was sensible, he'd keep his head down; befriend all the other Junior Death Eaters, avoid Harry Potter entirely, and hope the war ended before he was forced to make a clear choice.

But he'd long ago lost the ability to be that sensible. Right about the time he realised his heart skipped a beat when those vivid green eyes looked at him with joy instead of anger.

He looked across the room, meeting Blaise Zabini's even stare. They had talked about it, in encoded letters, over the summer. As much as Draco would love to help nudge his fellow Slytherins out of the Dark Lord's clutches, he was in far too precarious a position for that. Blaise, on the other hand, was a known neutral party. His mother lived in Italy, and couldn't give a single fuck about any Dark Lords.

Blaise would be the beacon for the light, lurking in the shadows. Blaise would quietly position himself to be the guiding hand for any students questioning their desire to follow their parents' footsteps. To become everything the rest of the world said Slytherins were. To fall right into the trap Dumbledore had spent decades priming.

It was dangerous. Blaise knew it, and so did Draco. But someone had to do it, or Slytherin House may crumble, and that wasn't a possibility they were willing to risk.

Draco turned away from Blaise — their friendship would have to end here, in public. If Blaise was about to start making overtures to the light, Draco couldn't be seen to approve it. Just another relationship for him to keep hidden.

"Draco, darling, stop lurking over there and show the boys to their dormitory," Pansy called, offering a slight smile. She was in the same boat as him — worse, even, because her father was already surveying the ranks of eligible young men in the Dark faction, and might not wait until Pansy was graduated to make a decision.

"Coming, dear," he assured drily, stepping forward to do his duty.

At least he had some of his friends, still.

Crossing the common room, he almost bumped into a tall figure, and reached a hand out to steady himself.

"Oh, sorry, Draco. I wasn't looking." Cassius Warrington offered the weakest attempt at a smile. "Long day, you know? See you in the morning." He was off before Draco could say anything — if Draco wasn't mistaken, there was an ever so slight limp to his walk.

Draco scowled to himself. He'd have to watch that one carefully. Cassius didn't have the luxury of time, like the rest of them.

.-.-.-

Severus was scowling as he stepped out of the fireplace at Seren Du. A minute later, Remus appeared opposite him, holding on to Ceri's hand. The house elf vanished as quickly as she'd appeared, leaving the greying werewolf behind. "Sev?" Remus greeted, perplexed. "What's the matter?"

"Umbridge," he growled out. Breathing steadily and trying not to shatter the crockery, Severus explained the scene he'd been blindsided with upon his arrival at the welcoming feast. Remus' eyes grew more horrified with every word.

"How could they allow that bitch to teach children??" he gasped. Severus glared at the wall.

"Albus was unable to find a suitable appointment, so the Ministry was forced to step in." If this wasn't a long-standing plan of Fudge's — and likely Lucius Malfoy's — Severus would eat his cauldrons. He was surprised Lucius hadn't mentioned it to him; then again, he didn't often talk to Severus about his Ministry dealings, except to gloat when they were successful. And Severus had been avoiding him somewhat, this summer.

"You should've heard the speech she gave. The Ministry don't like the things Dumbledore's spouting, so they're determined to interfere in Hogwarts and undermine him. No doubt Fudge has his little sycophant searching for something he can use to get Albus sacked." Truly, Severus wouldn't mind that outcome — if there was any way to trust that whoever the Ministry replaced him with wouldn't be a thousand times worse. Better the devil you know, after all.

"Well, that explains the bloody Slinkhard book," Remus muttered derisively. "I suppose we should be grateful she didn't set someone more like Argent."

Just the name of the man who wrote books detailing the number of ways to dispose of werewolves and other dark creatures made Severus hiss angrily. "No, instead we'll have a whole year of children learning nothing but theory, and being told to shut up and let the Ministry handle everything," he spat. "And I have to sit at the same bloody table as her for every meal of the day and somehow not slip poison in her tea."

The woman was utterly foul — responsible for half the woes of the last fifteen years of Remus' life, and here to cause trouble in his school besides.

Remus stepped forward, hands sliding over Severus' shoulders, kneading at the tense muscle. "With any luck, the curse on the position will take care of that for us," he joked quietly, brushing a kiss across Severus' cheek. The Potions Master couldn't help but lean into the touch, turning towards his Gryffindor like a flower seeking the sun. "She'll come after you," Remus murmured knowingly. Severus was a Marked Death Eater, and they knew damn well Fudge didn't believe anything about him being a spy for Dumbledore. "But not until after she's already gone for Hagrid, and Flitwick, and every teacher on staff who takes offence at her presence. She's there to keep the students downtrodden and complacent — who does that better than Professor Severus Snape?"

His amber eyes were dancing teasingly, Severus could hardly believe how calm he was being. The woman had made his life hell, would be making his family's life hell for the next year, and here he was making jokes. Severus would have been plotting a dozen or more accidents for her to befall while on staff.

He already had eight lined up in his mind.

Soft lips pressed to his, a hand cradling the back of his neck. "She'll be after Harry," Remus continued. "And his friends, if she ever realises they're just a year or two away from completely tearing her beloved Ministry apart. And look on the bright side — if she's busy at the school, she won't have the time to pass any more of her barbaric creature laws." Remus paused, looking up at him. "Has Dumbledore taken proxy of her seat?"

It was hard for Severus to think with those gentle fingers stroking the short hairs at the base of his neck, and it took a couple of seconds for him to answer. "No, she's kept it. Fudge's doing, I'm sure." Remus frowned, but stepped in closer.

"Shame. But this isn't the end of the world, Severus. This is an enemy we know. And this is an enemy you, my devious snake, can easily outwit." When the Gryffindor pulled back, his eyes were glowing, lips curled in a wolfish grin. "She's going to think she can take on our cub, and she's wrong. He and his friends will knock her down before she even realises what they've done. All you have to do," he leaned in for a slow, chaste kiss, "is protect Harry while he puts that ridiculous Potter luck to good use. Which you had already planned to do this year. Anything you can do to infuriate that bitch is just a bonus."

Severus' lips twitched in a reluctant smile. "Sounds like you've got it all figured out," he drawled lightly. Remus smirked at him.

"She's a hideous excuse for a human, and she's going to get exactly what she deserves, one way or another." The satisfaction in his tone while talking about the downfall of that odious Ministry hag, the delight he was taking in the idea of her comeuppance — that was the man Severus knew and loved, innocent on the surface but devious underneath. And it was doing things to Severus' libido, heat gathering low in his gut.

"I don't want to talk about Dolores Umbridge anymore," he said intently, reaching out to take Remus' hand. He should be getting back to the school — first night back often ended with some homesick first year at his door — but he wasn't sure when he could get away again, and it would take a stronger man than him to walk away from Remus Lupin with that look in his eyes.

"Good." The werewolf's fingers tightened around his, tugging him towards the staircase.
"Neither do I."

....

When Harry first got down to breakfast, he was momentarily disappointed at the sight of four solid blocks of same-colour robes; had all their progress last year been for nothing?

Then his drowsy brain noticed the four heads of house handing out schedules, and he blinked — oh, that made sense. No need to send the teachers all over the hall. With any luck, they'd be back to their mingling by lunch.

Ignoring the feeling of eyes on him, Harry and Neville went to sit with their three favourite Weasleys. "Morning, lads," George greeted chirpily. "Ready for your first day of OWL lessons?"

"You ready for your first day of NEWTs?" Harry retorted dryly, making the redhead laugh.

"Oh, I think we'll manage just fine."

Harry and Neville looked up as McGonagall floated a pair of schedules towards them, and Harry shot her a quick grin in thanks. "Let's see what we've got, then." Harry looked at his schedule, and sucked in a sharp breath.

"Blimey; not giving you an easy start, are they?" George remarked, peering over Harry's shoulder, his own schedule ignored in his hand. "Binns, Snape, Trelawney and Umbridge all in one day. What a winning combination."

It seemed to be a unanimous agreement that Umbridge's classes were going to be awful. Harry grimaced — at least with double Potions he'd have a chance to relax.

He paused, running that thought back through his head.

Oh, how things had changed.

"Fred! George!" The screech made Harry wince, and the twins whipped around to see a furious Hermione storming over, a poster in hand. Harry recognised it as one of the advertisements for product testers the twins had shown him before leaving Grimmauld, planning on putting up in all the common rooms. "I should put you both in detention for this! You can't advertise for testers in the common room!"

"Please, O' Wise Prefect, point us to the exact section of the school rules that says we can't," Fred asked, grinning. Hermione's eyes narrowed.

"You shouldn't need to see the rules, it should be common sense!"

"There's a warning about the risks," Ginny pointed out mildly from the opposite side of the table. "As long as everyone consents, they're fine."

The twins shared a smirk as Hermione's anger grew, her nostrils flaring. "That can't be within the rules," she hissed. "Back me up, Ron!"

"Leave me out of this!" Ron yelped, already sat at the table further up and piling his plate high with breakfast foods. Hermione glared at him, then turned back to Fred and George.

"If I catch you two giving anyone one of your untested disasters, you'll regret it," she warned them, then stalked off to go and sit with Ron. Harry looked over at the two sixth year prefects, who were sat with a bunch of first years and helping them figure out their schedules.

"She does realise that there are other prefects in Gryffindor, right? And that one of them is your roommate?" he asked, frowning in confusion. "It's not all down to her."

"Kenny doesn't care what we do as long as we don't test it on him," George agreed cheerfully. "Don't worry, Little Miss Rulebook will learn eventually. She won't be able to keep an eye on everyone and still revise for her OWLs — especially not the way she studies."

"And with Ron as her prefect partner," Fred added, rolling his eyes.

"Well, on that shining note, we're gonna see if we can sell a few things before Herbology," George said, patting his satchel with a conspiratorial wink. "Good luck with your Hell Monday, chaps." He used a spell to ruffle Ginny's hair with a grin, and then the two of them were off. Neville snickered as Ginny tried to re-do her hair, then looked down at his schedule in dismay.

"It really is awful," he sighed. Harry shrugged.

"Could be worse," he mused, though he wasn't sure exactly how.

At least the rest of his schedule wasn't too bad — though, considering it was OWL year, there was probably no 'easy' configuration of classes. Harry was determined to apply himself this year, though; Dumbledore knew the compulsions were broken, there was no need to downplay his academic abilities. As long as he didn't perform any enormously strong feats of magic, he would be fine.

He was sick of holding back for the sake of others. He didn't have to worry about upsetting Hermione, or making Ron jealous. He liked learning — maybe not as much as the Ravenclaws — and he wanted to do well this year.

He wanted his godfathers to be proud of his exam results. Hell, he wanted Snape to be proud, too.

With that in mind, Harry finished his breakfast, and he and Neville headed off to Binns' classroom.

..

History of Magic was perhaps not the greatest class to begin his resolution to do well in class; everyone knew the only way to actually get a good grade in that subject was to self-study and ignore Binns entirely. Still, instead of using the forty-five minute period to doze off like he might have done in the past — or to doodle like Ron seemed to be doing — Harry sat in the back with Neville and a cluster of his Hufflepuff friends, making plans for the first study group of the year. The regular study group, not the heirs one; though Susan had a determined look in her eye that made Harry wonder what she had in mind to combat Umbridge's influence.

He was secretly very, very glad that Susan was the one spearheading the whole Wizengamot Takeover situation; she knew more about wizarding politics than he ever would, and had far more clear ideas and solutions than Harry. Also, he had other priorities; namely training to kill a Dark Lord, and getting rid of Dumbledore.

He would work on his end of the bargain, and Susan would deal with the rest.

In Potions, Harry was happy to partner with Neville, despite the skeptical look Snape levelled at him when no one else was looking. He wasn't going to abandon his friend in his least-favourite subject, even if it would be more of a political statement to sit with one of the Slytherins. Perhaps later in the term, if he could get Neville's confidence up, they could split up and sit with Blaise and Daphne; the only two 'safe' Slytherins now Voldemort had returned.

Harry tried his best not to look at the back of Draco's head while he stirred his Draught of Peace. Snape was throwing them right in at the deep end, setting a tricky potion that required precise measurements and careful timing. "You're doing great, Nev," Harry murmured supportively, looking over at his friend's cauldron. It wasn't quite the same shade of lilac as Harry's, but it was still purple.

Neville's hand trembled around his knife. "I can't do this," he moaned, voice quiet. "I'm going to fail Potions."

“No you’re not,” Harry insisted. “Come on, just take a breath. You’re ace at Herbology — you know exactly what every one of these plants does, and how they interact with each other. Just think of it as an extension of that.” If he could get Neville to get over his fear of Snape, the other Gryffindor would probably do very well in the subject.

If only he could tell his friend that the Potions professor wasn’t as awful as he made out to be.

He kept on top of his potion the best he could while also quietly coaching Neville through his, going silent every time Snape was even remotely near their corner of the classroom. It didn’t stop the man from strolling by and making snide remarks every five minutes or so, but that didn’t bother Harry; he just had to remind himself that, unlike in the summer, he had to refrain from replying. He kept his head down, focusing on his Draught of Peace — which he’d brewed before under Snape’s instruction, at Seren Du — and by the end of the class, Harry and Hermione were the only two Gryffindors whose potions were emitting a delicate silver vapour. Neville’s was puffing out clouds of pale grey smoke, which seemed a much better outcome than either of them anticipated. Certainly better than Ron’s, which was spitting green sparks.

“What is this, Potter?” Snape drawled, giving the cauldron a look of disgust. Harry fought down a smirk.

“Draught of Peace, sir.” He tried not to sound too confident, but he knew damn well there was nothing Snape could properly criticise about it. Snape knew, too, if the blink-and-you’ll-miss-it flash of approval in his eyes was anything to go by.

“We’ll see about that, won’t we?” came the cool response, before Snape gave one last disparaging glance at Neville’s cauldron and continued back up to the front of the classroom, barking out orders to bring a flagon of potion up for grading. Harry allowed himself a small smile as he bottled his draught.

Snape could belittle him and his father and his skills as much as he wanted during class, Harry knew it was all for show. And even if he found a way to give Harry a failing grade for every single piece of classwork, it would have no bearing on his exam grade.

Harry was going to get that O in Potions if it killed him.

. . .

Giving Ron and Hermione a wide berth at lunch — Ron was complaining about Potions, while Hermione was furiously marking up her class schedule and comparing it to her revision timetable — Harry and Neville went to sit at the Hufflepuff table instead, with Hannah and Ernie.

Harry’s first instinct had been the Ravenclaw table, but then he’d realised that beside Luna, Ginny was sat flirting up a storm with Michael Corner. He wasn’t going to subject Neville to that.

"Have you had a class with her yet?" Hannah asked quietly, eyes flicking up to the pink-clad woman at the head table. Neville shook his head.

"This afternoon, we've got a double," he said, grimacing.

"We've got her tomorrow," Ernie supplied. "You'll have to let us know how it goes."

"When's Susan thinking?" Harry asked, knowing the redhead would want everyone to meet soon. The two Hufflepuffs shrugged.

"Figured we'd let everyone settle in first, see when clubs and quidditch and everything are meeting. But soon," Hannah said. "There's a lot to talk about."

The four of them shared a knowing glance.

They spent the whole lunch hour at the Hufflepuff table, then reluctantly headed for the North Tower, where Divination awaited them. "I wish I could drop this bloody subject," Harry muttered, sitting on the stone floor beneath the silver ladder. They were early; the first ones there, in fact.

"At least it's one less exam to really study for?" Neville attempted optimistically. Harry snorted — Sirius had told him that the exam was going to take more than just making up a bunch of predictions. He would actually have to have knowledge about the different manners of divination, and when each was best used.

If only he could let on early that he planned to take the tests for Arithmancy and Runes, then he could drop classes. But that would make Dumbledore far too suspicious.

And so, with a sigh, Harry clambered up the ladder into the heavily-perfumed classroom. Not begrudging Neville as he went to go sit with Terry and Anthony — his usual class companions, since Harry had previously always sat with Ron — Harry looked around somewhat helplessly.

"Harry," a soft voice called, and he turned to see Parvati Patil gesturing to an empty armchair at the table she shared with Lavender. Harry beamed at the two girls, happily joining them — just in time to see Ron throw himself in his usual seat, then blink at the empty chair beside him.

"You're lifesavers, you are," the dark-haired Gryffindor declared under his breath, making the girls giggle.

"Figured you might want a save," Lavender told him. Then she put on a mock-severe expression. "But there's no slacking off at this table, Potter. We have a reputation to uphold you know."

Before Harry could answer, Professor Trelawney swept into the classroom. She blinked owlishly at the new seating arrangements — Dean had sat with Ron, whether through choice or through pity Harry wasn't sure.

As Trelawney began to talk about dream interpretation, Harry was surprised to see his table-mates writing neat little notes in vivid purple ink, frowns of concentration on their faces.

“You two really care about this subject, don’t you?” he remarked softly, once the three of them were bent over the copy of The Dream Oracle.

“A lot of people think it’s a load of waffle, but it’s actually really interesting. Even if you don’t have the Sight,” Lavender insisted.

“It’s not for everyone,” Parvati acknowledged with a smile, “but we like it.”

“Do either of you have the Sight?”

“Lavender has a little bit,” Parvati said, a touch of envy in her tone. “I don’t, but my grandmother does so I grew up with a lot of respect for the subject. Not all Seers are as ... odd as Lovegood.”

She spoke with such confidence, and of course, it made perfect sense that Luna was a Seer, like Ginny had always wondered. All those odd creatures she spoke of and the way they affected people, the way she seemed to just know things.

Not many other people seemed to have figured it out, though, judging by the way Luna was treated by her peers.

“Don’t worry, Harry.” Parvati pat him on the arm, grinning. “Stick with us, we’ll make sure you get at least an E in this class.” Her expression turned conspiratorial. “Word is you’re aiming to upset Granger from her top spot this year.”

The Hogwarts rumour mill would never fail to amaze Harry. “We’ve had two classes!” How could people already be talking about his dedication to his studies??

The two girls shared a look, then giggled, and demanded he recount a dream for them to interpret.

“I— can we do one of yours, instead?” he pleaded, grimacing. “My dreams... aren’t great. After the third task...” He trailed off, and Lavender gasped, wide eyes filling with sadness.

“Oh, of course,” she breathed, horrified. “Oh, you poor thing. Have you asked Madam Pomfrey for a sleeping potion?”

“Can’t take it every night, what’s the point?” he confessed grimly. The pair shared sympathetic expressions, and huddled in a little closer, while Lavender happily relayed her dream about looking for her childhood pet hamster in the Herbology greenhouses.

The bell went before they could move on to Parvati’s dream, and it caught Harry by surprise — the class went much faster when he wasn’t hating every second of it and mocking the whole subject with Ron. As he stepped down from the ladder, a shoulder shoved roughly against him. “You three looked pretty cosy up there,” Ron remarked bitingly. “Thought you were queer, mate?” His face was full of accusation, and Harry just rolled his eyes.

“Struggling to see what friendship looks like, Ron?” he retorted. “What a surprise.” He picked up his pace, wanting to put as much distance between himself and the redhead as possible, and the two girls jogged to catch up with him.

“Was he always that awful?” Parvati remarked in disgust. Harry shrugged.

“If he was, I never realised. I think he’s gotten worse since last year though.”

“He’s been going downhill since the Yule Ball,” Lavender said. “The whole Viktor Krum thing.”

Now that Harry thought about it, she was right — somewhere between Hermione’s relationship with Krum, and Harry coming out in the Quibbler, Ron had become mighty sensitive on the topic of relationships.

“It’s not my fault he can’t get his head out of his arse where Hermione’s concerned,” Harry groused. “They spent the whole summer together, he had plenty of opportunities.”

“Are Hermione and Krum over for good, then?” Lavender asked, always keen for gossip. Harry shrugged.

“He told me she hardly wrote to him over the summer, so I’d imagine so.” That reminded him, he had to write to Viktor at the weekend, now he was away from Grimmauld.

“You kept in touch? That’s so nice.” Parvati smiled. “If he’s single again, think you could put in a good word for us?” she joked, and she and Lavender both giggled as Harry blushed.

The good mood died quickly as they reached the Defence Against the Dark Arts classroom, waiting outside. To no one’s surprise, they shared this class with the Slytherins, too — Dumbledore did love pairing the two volatile houses together in the more potentially catastrophic subjects.

“Nice to see you’ve lost your shadows, Potter,” Blaise drawled in greeting, giving a pointed glance over to Ron and Hermione further down the hall. Harry smirked briefly.

“These things happen. How was your summer?” He focused on the Italian boy purely to stop himself from staring at Draco. The blond Slytherin looked exceptionally attractive today, his slightly-longer hair swept neatly away from his face.

Blaise was saved having to answer by the classroom door swinging open. The Slytherin eyed it warily, then stepped back, giving an ‘after you’ gesture. Harry rolled his eyes, leading the way into the classroom.

Over the years, he had seen this room in a lot of different ways; from the dozens of portraits of Gilderoy Lockhart, to the huge stockpile of Dark Detectors Crouch-As-Moody had chosen to decorate with. But he’d never seen it so...bare.

There was nothing on the walls. The shelves contained only piles of extra Slinkhard books — Defensive Magical Theory, and the others that the younger students were using — and at the front of the class was only a single blackboard. And Umbridge, in that fluffy pink cardigan, smiling like a spider might at a fly caught in its web.

A shiver of trepidation ran down Harry's spine. He pushed past it, heading for a free desk in the middle row, behind Fay and Sophie. Hermione, of course, went straight for the front row, dragging Ron with her.

Everyone was silent as they sat. Umbridge just smiled wider.

The chorused-greeting she insisted on like they were at muggle primary school was bad enough, and when she instructed them to put away their wands Harry knew it was going to be awful.

Her 'Ministry-approved' course aims made him want to gag. Of course Fudge didn't want students actually learning anything remotely useful in this class. If he admitted there was need for defensive spells, he might actually have to admit there was something out there worth defending against.

He hadn't actually had the chance to read his copy of Defensive Magical Theory yet, as it had only arrived that morning, but as he skimmed through the introductory chapter he could tell it was going to be just as dry and useless as every other Slinkhard book he'd ever read. Which, admittedly, was only one — Remus had caught him reading it and gone on a very long-winded rant about how Wilbert Slinkhard wouldn't know so much as a Disarming charm if it stripped him bare and slapped him on the arse.

He glanced up to see how the rest of the class was handling it, and was surprised to see Hermione in front of him with her book closed and her hand in the air. He looked across at the Slytherin side of the room — they all had one eye on the curly-haired Gryffindor, waiting for the show to begin.

Umbridge, who was sat at the desk and blithely ignoring her student's imploring gaze, lasted a whole lot longer than Harry anticipated. Eventually, when she could no longer pretend Hermione wasn't there, she smiled at the girl as if she'd only just noticed her. "Did you have a question about the chapter, dear?" she asked sweetly.

Harry was marginally surprised at Hermione's blatant disrespect. The Hermione Granger he'd met in first year would never dare question authority. Perhaps three years of friendship with Harry Potter had done more to her than he'd thought.

Or perhaps she just rejected any authority that wasn't Dumbledore's.

"We're not going to use magic?" Ron blurted incredulously, drawing Umbridge's ire to himself.

"Are you a Ministry-trained educational expert, Miss Granger?" Umbridge asked when Hermione continued to argue.

"Are you, Professor?" Harry cut in, unable to help himself. He might have shed his compulsions, but he was still a Gryffindor — and Umbridge couldn't be allowed to just patronise them so completely. He couldn't let her get away with spewing her Ministry bullshit; more than that, he couldn't let people think he in any way supported it.

"Hand, Mr Potter!" she barked, and Harry flung his hand in the air.

"Are you a Ministry-trained educational expert, Professor Umbridge?" he repeated with false innocence. "Only, I thought for sure you were the Undersecretary to the Minister. I'd really love to hear about your teaching qualifications."

Someone sniggered from the back of the classroom. It might have been Pansy Parkinson. Umbridge scowled.

"Senior Undersecretary, Mr Potter," she corrected pointedly. "And I do not believe it is your place to question my teaching ability. Minister Fudge and the Department of Magical Education have appointed me to this role, and that is all you need to know. Furthermore, my curriculum has been designed by the Ministry's best and brightest minds in education, and is guaranteed to correct the erroneous and downright irresponsible teaching you have previously suffered under."

Harry's hand was still in the air. "And we're supposed to pass our OWLs without ever having performed the spells we're to use in the exams, are we?"

"With a firm enough understanding of the theory, you will all be perfectly capable of performing the necessary spells under controlled exam conditions," Umbridge assured, her smile turning vicious.

"And Merlin forbid we ever need to use those spells again in our lifetime, in non exam conditions," Harry retorted. Umbridge's beady eyes narrowed.

"What use would you have for those spells once you leave this school, Mr Potter?" She gave a girlish giggle. "You speak as if you expect to be attacked the moment you step foot outside the castle!"

Harry clenched his jaw; so this was her angle, was it? He should have known. She was here to discredit him, to goad him into shouting about Voldemort's return so she could call him a lunatic and make him look like a foolish child in front of his classmates.

Well, two could play at that game.

"I don't know, Professor, I certainly could have used some of those spells this summer when a dementor sucked the soul out of my muggle cousin."

Several sharp intakes of breath sounded around him. Umbridge's face turned the same sort of colour Harry usually saw on Uncle Vernon, right before Harry got the living daylights beaten out of him.

"Ten points from Gryffindor, Mr Potter," she snapped.

"For making a true statement?" he asked, eyebrows raised. "You can't deny it, Professor — the Auror Department case notes are available for anyone who wants to look." Everyone in the class was staring at him now, their books utterly abandoned. Harry's pulse thudded in his neck, though his hands were steady; Umbridge wasn't even close to the most intimidating thing Harry had ever experienced.

"What happened to your cousin is of course, a devastating accident," Umbridge relented, "but you cannot use one outlying example as a call for everyone to have free use of offensive magics. The laws are there for a reason, after all, Mr Potter. The Ministry exists to protect its citizens."

"So my cousin didn't count because he's a muggle?"

"That is not the point, Mr Potter."

"What about Cedric Diggory?" Harry was on a roll now. "Where was the Ministry to protect him when a Death Eater hit him with a Killing curse?"

Umbridge stilled. "Cedric Diggory's death was a tragic accident," she said, venomously sweet. She looked away from Harry, facing the class at large. "You have all been told that a certain Dark wizard has returned from the dead," she announced. "That is, of course, a lie. Certain members of our community are trying to scare you into believing this Dark wizard is at large, and that sort of fear-mongering will not be tolerated."

"If I'm lying about Voldemort, what happened to Cedric? Or are you blaming that one on the Triwizard Tournament? Because I'll remind you, Professor, that Minister Fudge was one of the most staunch supporters of bringing back the tournament, despite peoples' fears over the previous death averages, and he was the one to assure everyone that steps had been taken to prevent a lethal outcome." He smiled coolly. "So which is it?"

"Detention, Mr Potter!" Umbridge screeched. "Tomorrow evening, five o'clock. My office. And I will kindly ask you to cease disturbing your classmates and return to your reading."

Harry paused, anger bubbling within him, trying desperately to remember everything Snape had taught him over the summer about not letting his emotions get the better of him.

"One last question, Professor. About your course aims." He plastered an innocent smile on his face. He was starting to lose feeling in his hand, from how long it had been in the air.

"What now, Mr Potter?"

"If the Ministry's stance is that none of us will ever need to use defensive spells outside of class, and the only time we should cast them is in controlled exam conditions, why do we bother learning them?"

She stared at him, and he stared back, unflinching.

"I beg your pardon?" Her falsely-girlish voice was painfully saccharine.

"Well I thought the whole point of school was to learn things that would benefit us as adults, in the real world. So if defensive spells are not necessary in the real world, why are they on the Ministry's curriculum?"

“For those looking to pursue a career as an auror—“

“Then why not leave them all til auror training?” Harry cut in, trying not to outwardly smirk when she scowled.

“Another ten points for interrupting me, Mr Potter,” she said immediately. “Now, as I was saying, for those looking to pursue a career as an auror, a firm grasp of the theory of these spells is necessary.”

“The aurors only know the theory, too? That explains a lot,” Harry remarked cheerily, earning another wave of hastily-muffled giggles from his classmates.

A vein in Umbridge’s temple twitched.

“Come here, Mr Potter,” she beckoned softly. Harry got to his feet, striding calmly up to stand in front of the desk. He wondered if she was going to curse him, or perhaps smack him across the hands with a ruler like in muggle schools. The whole class held their breath.

Instead, Umbridge pulled out a small roll of pink parchment, and scrawled a note that Harry could not see. When she was done, she sealed it with a tap of her wand and held it out to him. “Take this to Professor McGonagall, dear. Now, please,” she requested.

Hiding his confusion, Harry did as bid, stopping at his desk to gather his things — he wouldn’t be coming back, even if he had time left. He didn’t look at anyone on his way out.

Let Umbridge try and salvage that one, then.

Chapter 49

Once he was finally alone in the corridor, far from the Defence classroom, Harry allowed himself a quiet chuckle. The detention was frustrating, but he'd had worse, and he privately thought he'd handled that quite well. Sitting and accepting her Ministry propaganda hadn't even been an option, as far as he was concerned; but he hadn't said anything about fighting Voldemort, or made any outlandish claims — he'd just pointed out the facts, and the inconsistencies in her own logic.

Remus would be proud.

Ignoring Peeves juggling inkwells and singing about his sanity — or lack thereof — Harry strolled calmly up to the Transfiguration professor's office, knocking on the door. After a few moments, McGonagall opened it, and stared down at him in bewilderment. "Potter? Shouldn't you be in class?"

"I've been sent to see you," he informed her. Her eyebrows rose.

"Sent?"

Harry held up the pink roll of parchment by way of explanation. The Gryffindor housemistress' lips thinned. "Come in, then."

Taking the scroll, she unsealed it with a tap of her wand, absently gesturing Harry into the chair opposite her desk while she read. Eventually, she looked up at him, expression unreadable. "Is this true?"

"I wouldn't know, Professor; I don't know what it says."

"Is it true that you shouted at Professor Umbridge?"

"Well, I wouldn't say shouted," Harry said. "Raised my voice, perhaps." McGonagall didn't look impressed.

"You disrespected her, and the Minister?"

"I suppose."

"You called her a liar?"

"Not in so many words."

"You insisted that He-Who-Must-Not-Be-Named killed Mr Diggory last year?"

"I pointed out that if he didn't, the Triwizard Tournament — which Minister Fudge was responsible for — was at fault, and she was welcome to choose who to blame."

McGonagall stared at him for a long moment, quietly despairing. Then she sighed. “Have a biscuit, Potter.”

Harry blinked as a tartan biscuit tin was levitated towards him. “I...” What?

McGonagall just stared at him, until he’d selected a Ginger Newt and taken a bite. “It’s the first day of term, Potter. You need to be more careful.”

Harry swallowed. Not quite the scolding he’d anticipated. She actually sounded anxious. “I never explicitly said that Voldemort had returned,” he told her. “I said that a Death Eater had killed Cedric, and she was welcome to draw her own conclusions. Oh, and I, uh, sort-of blamed the Ministry for what happened to my cousin.”

McGonagall’s lips pursed. “My condolences,” she murmured, and he nodded. He supposed he was going to be getting a lot of that, now; the story would be all over the school by dinner. “But that doesn’t excuse this kind of behaviour. Acting up in Dolores Umbridge’s class could cost you much more than house points and a detention.”

“I know,” Harry agreed. “But I know what she’s here for. I know what she’s trying to do.”

McGonagall eyed him carefully. “Yes, I think that you do,” she murmured. “I suppose it would be too much to ask you to keep your head down in her classes?”

Harry couldn’t help but grin. “Professor, no offence, but when have you ever known me to keep my head down?” The despairing look returned, and he chuckled. “If she’s focused on me, she’s distracted from everyone else.” Let McGonagall think he was talking about Dumbledore, about the Order. Harry couldn’t give two fucks about them — but if Umbridge was busy playing word games with him, trying to get him to incriminate himself as a liar and a lunatic, then she wouldn’t have time to pay attention to Susan and the rest getting into place to take Fudge down as soon as they all came of age.

And the more he could get the Ministry puppet to deny Voldemort’s return, the easier it would be to unseat Fudge and his whole useless regimen when the Dark Lord finally reared his ugly head.

“You’re just a student, Potter — it’s not your responsibility to protect everyone else.” McGonagall sounded like she was worried about him, and Harry shot her what he hoped was a reassuring smile.

He had no idea how much she knew about Dumbledore’s meddling, but the fact that she didn’t approve of him martyring himself for the cause was a positive sign. Merlin, he hoped she wasn’t in cahoots with the headmaster. The school needed her far too much.

“I’ll be alright, Professor. It’s just a detention.”

“Actually, according to this note, it’s detention every evening this week,” the woman corrected with a slight frown. Harry cursed under his breath. “Language, Potter,” came the automatical scold.

"Sorry, Professor. But every evening this week? That's outrageous!" Then a thought occurred to him, and he laughed. "Oh, that's brilliant!"

"I beg your pardon, Potter?" His housemistress was eyeing him like the rumours of his insanity might not be too unfounded. Harry grinned at her.

"A whole week of detention, just for pointing out some facts — that's gonna make her look really in control, isn't it?" If she had just dismissed him out of turn, given him the one detention and ignored the rest, she would've shown that his words didn't matter to her. But a whole week's worth — everyone would see that Harry had struck a nerve.

She thought she was making an example of him, but really, she was only making one of herself.

There was a flicker in the Transfiguration professor's eyes — something like pride, if Harry looked carefully. "Be careful, Potter," she reiterated. "Dolores Umbridge has friends in some powerful places, and you cannot afford to have your future limited so young."

"Oh, don't worry about me, Professor," he said cheerfully. "I'm going to play professional quidditch after graduation. I don't think the Ministry has any say in that."

McGonagall stared at him, her lips twitching like she was trying very hard not to laugh. "Then I'd best see that trophy remaining on my shelf this year," she said, glancing at the Quidditch Cup, still in pride of place after Harry's third year. He beamed.

"I'll do my best."

.-. .

As expected, everyone knew about Harry's clash with Umbridge at dinner time.

Of course, many people were taking it as confirmation that he'd lost his mind, but mostly people just seemed entertained by Harry's bold and unashamed call-out of the Ministry. Especially once it was confirmed that a dementor had indeed Kissed a muggle teenage boy in the middle of Surrey, and the Ministry had covered it up.

Umbridge looked furious.

"I can't believe you," Neville declared, shaking his head. "No, I can, actually. That's the worst part."

Harry grinned smugly, feeling quite pleased with himself. "All I did was point out that there seem to have been a lot of tragic accidents under the Ministry's purview," he said, shrugging. "Not my fault she got upset about it."

"You're going to be in detention for the entire year," Neville despaired.

"Nah." Harry wasn't bothered. "Not with Umbridge, at any rate. Snape will miss me cleaning his cauldrons."

The other Gryffindor boy let out a moan of dismay, and Harry just chuckled. Across the hall he saw Luna enter the room, and he waved her over, gesturing to the empty seat at his side. To his surprise, she brought Sullivan Fawley with her.

“Hello, Harry,” Luna greeted airily. “I hear you’ve had a rather exciting first day back.”

“Don’t encourage him,” Neville groaned, and Sully snorted.

“Did she really say you weren’t going to use magic the entire year? In your OWL year?” He sounded offended by the very concept. Harry nodded.

“Apparently if we know the theory well enough we’ll be able to do the spells perfectly on our first try — in our exams, while being graded on our performance.” He rolled his eyes, and the Ravenclaw boy grimaced.

“What a load of nonsense. Merlin — we’ve had some truly interesting Defence professors over the years, but you know, I think this might be the first to cause an entire year group to fail both their OWLs and NEWTs.”

Harry rather thought that was exactly what Fudge was aiming for. Sometimes he wondered if the Minister wasn’t in league with Voldemort himself; surely he couldn’t just be that incompetent?

“Wait, people passed their exams when Lockhart was teacher?” Neville asked incredulously. Harry echoed his surprise.

“Professor Umbridge never said we couldn’t use the spells outside of class,” Luna remarked, absently spooning soup into a hollowed-out bread roll. “Only that they weren’t permitted inside the classroom.”

“Looks like we know what most study groups will be focusing on, then,” Harry agreed, wondering how many people were about to get kicked out of the library for using magic near the books. Not everyone was willing to sneak into abandoned classrooms after curfew.

“That’ll keep Madam Pomfrey busy,” said Neville, shaking his head.

As Sully asked Neville a question about Herbology, Harry tuned out of the conversation, trying instead to make out the whispers of conversation including his name happening all over the Great Hall.

It felt ambitious to be trying to convince everyone that Voldemort was back, when the Ministry and the Prophet were doing their best to shut down even the vaguest insinuation that such a thing could be possible — and when Voldemort himself was being so frustratingly silent.

They would find out eventually, when the Dark Lord made his first move.

The more immediate problem was discrediting the Ministry without sending everyone straight into Dumbledore’s arms. Harry didn’t want people to see it as supporting one or the other; he just wanted them to think for themselves, to start to question the information they were being fed so blindly. To be prepared to fight if it came to it.

There were far too many puppetmasters pulling strings for his liking — his best bet would be to just cut every single one he could.

.-. .

The teachers seemed to be determined to make their students very aware from the start that they were now preparing for their OWL examinations — even after one single day of classes, Harry and his year mates had a small mountain of homework. After dinner, Harry and Neville went up to the common room to get started on it; with the number of people still talking about Dudley, Harry didn't want to face the library to try and find an inter-house study group.

Hermione had already claimed the comfortable chairs by the fire, Ron at her side, so Harry and Neville set themselves up on the opposite side of the common room. Not far off, Fred and George were handing out sweets to a bunch of first and second years, holding clipboards and grinning. One by one, the first years slumped unconscious, caught by the Cushioning charms the twins had layered up. Harry nudged Neville to get his attention as Hermione stormed over, fury burning in her eyes. They watched amusedly as the fifth year prefect tried to go toe-to-toe with the twins, who were utterly unbothered by it, continuing their experiment. The first years did seem totally fine, once Lee had given them the other half of the Fainting Fancies — not that Hermione was placated by that in any way.

“You going to put us in detention?” George dared cockily. Hermione squared her shoulders, narrowing her eyes at him.

“I’ll write to your mother,” she retorted, and a low ‘oohh’ resonated around the common room.

“Low blow,” Neville murmured, wincing. Indeed, the twins looked horrified at the very prospect.

“Won’t stop them, though,” Harry said knowingly. “They’ll just get sneakier about it.” Fred and George Weasley were not going to be stopped by one single prefect, not when they were so close to their dream.

After that, the noise in the common room ramped up, starting to nag at Harry’s headache. Glancing around, he raised a discreet privacy ward around the pair of them; one that would dampen the noise. Neville gave a small sigh of relief. “Thanks, Harry.”

“No problem.”

They worked in silence for a few more minutes, and then Neville cleared his throat. “So, uh... how was your summer, really? Other than, y’know.” He waved a hand, as if to encompass the dementor attack and Ron and Hermione’s pestering and Harry’s total lack of privacy in one single gesture. “I know there’s stuff you wouldn’t tell Ginny or anyone. Not that you have to tell me,” Neville added quickly.

"No, no — I was going to anyway. I... it was actually really nice, up until everything went to shit. I was... somewhere safe, at first, with Sirius and Remus. They started teaching me how to duel properly." Neville didn't know about Snape, and it was best kept that way.

The blond boy grew serious. "You're getting ready to fight him, then?"

Harry nodded. "I have to. Sooner the better, right?" He couldn't say anything about horcruxes either, but he could tell Neville about some of the things he'd learned.

"Draco came to visit for my birthday, too," he added, a smile tugging at his lips. Neville's eyes danced.

"Oh, did he, now?" he drawled. "How nice of him." Harry elbowed him in the side, ducking his face to hide his blush. Neville laughed. "Have you seen him yet? Y'know, properly?"

Harry shook his head sadly. "No, and all my new detentions won't make that any easier." With any luck, Umbridge would only keep him for an hour or two, and he'd still have the nighttime free to meet Draco without falling hugely behind on his homework.

Harry doubted it.

"If you need me to cover for you, just say the word," Neville offered. Harry's chest grew warm; Neville really was an excellent friend to have.

.-. .

Flitwick and McGonagall were also of the mind to overload their students with work, each starting their classes with a fifteen minute lecture about the importance of OWLs and how difficult they were going to be. Harry wondered if that was actually the case, or if all the Hogwarts teachers had decided the best way to prepare their students was to over-prepare them, by making them expect much harder exams than they would get.

That seemed more like a surefire way to intimidate students into a breakdown, but perhaps mental fortitude was supposed to be part of it, too. Harry wasn't sure. Either way, he was wondering how he was going to find time for all his extra-curricular activities on top of his existing schoolwork; especially if Umbridge had him in detention as often as she clearly wanted to.

Though it was very entertaining to watch Hermione frantically re-adjusting her revision schedule after every class, once she realised how much time she would have to devote to homework instead of her own study plans.

He kept up his small rebellions against the house divides in class, sitting with Anthony in Transfiguration and Susan in Charms — blending houses was easier, in classes that didn't involve Slytherins. It made Harry's heart ache to see how withdrawn the snake house had become, and he hoped it wouldn't be quite so bad in the lower years; they were far, far too young to be forced to choose sides in such a way.

At lunch, Harry was once again at the Ravenclaw table — this time sat with Cho. “I wanted to thank you again for writing to me over the summer,” she said quietly, offering a shy smile. “It... it’s been hard, without Cedric. I’m glad I’ve still got friends like you, and the Hufflepuff boys.” Cedric’s old roommates, from what Harry could see, seem to have taken Cho under their wing; which, considering she spent most of her time with them before due to hanging out with Cedric, wasn’t surprising.

“Of course, yeah. I’m glad we’re friends, too. Last year was fun, even with all the parts that... weren’t.” He paused, eyeing her in concern. “Are you doing okay?” He couldn’t imagine what it was like for her, being back at school with everyone whispering about Cedric’s death, being confronted with all the memories of her boyfriend.

The smile she gave him was strained around the edges. “I’m getting there. Like I said, it’s been hard. But it’ll get easier.”

Harry wrapped an arm around her shoulders, giving her a quick squeeze. “I’m always here if you need me,” he promised.

“Honestly, just knowing the truth of what happened was a big relief,” she confessed. “If I’d been left with just that vague stuff Dumbledore said last year, I don’t know how I’d be feeling.” She sniffled a little. “I just wish everyone else would believe what you say, too. Patrick and the boys do, when I told them — not the details, just, y’know, how he died,” she added quickly. Harry hadn’t left much out in his explanation to her and the other Triwizard champions, so he was glad she wasn’t spreading the entire story about. “But all those people who believe the Prophet... it’s like they’re just laughing at Cedric’s death, y’know? Saying it was an accident, or part of the tournament — like he wasn’t good enough to make it to that Cup.” As she spoke, she glared pointedly up at Umbridge. Harry wondered if Cho had had a DADA lesson yet.

“As far as I’m concerned, Cedric Diggory won the Triwizard Tournament,” Harry declared plainly. “I wouldn’t have been at the Cup if not for him.” And for Crouch rigging the whole maze in his favour, but that was beside the point. “They’ll see the truth, one day. Voldemort won’t stay quiet forever.”

Cho’s smile became a grim line.

“We’ll be ready, when he does.” Her eyes were fierce, and Harry believed her. Even if he hoped that none of them would need to join that fight.

.-. .

It was tempting, during Care of Magical Creatures, to ask Grubbly-Plank when Hagrid would be coming back. But if he truly was out on a mission for the Order, either she didn’t know or she did and wouldn’t tell him. Instead Harry kept his head down and studied his bowtruckle, quietly hating the guilt he felt from enjoying the calm, informative lesson so much. Hagrid was wonderful, but his classes were always... exciting.

He could have done without Draco and Pansy making cutting remarks about the half-giant under their breath, but most of Harry’s ire in response was feigned; they were doing what was expected of them, and so was he.

If he took joy out of Draco getting into such an argument with Ron that he hexed the redhead, well, no one needed to know that.

Half of the Slytherins didn't seem to know what to do with the other two-thirds of the 'Golden Trio'. They seemed torn between their desire to belittle Gryffindors, and their animosity — real or otherwise — towards Harry. Seeing Harry equally pissed off with his two housemates seemed to take some of the fun out of the taunting, for them; they were slowly turning their sneers on Neville instead. At least, the ones who were brave enough to risk insulting the Longbottom Heir did.

The ones who were so confident in Voldemort's victory that they didn't think the Longbottom name would be worth anything, in a year or two.

He didn't have much time for dinner before he was due at his detention, and as he wolfed down some food while trying not to make himself sick, Angelina dropped onto the bench beside him. "What's this I hear about you having detention at five on Friday?" she asked flatly, anger underlying her tone.

"All week," he confirmed. "Umbridge."

Angelina scowled darkly. "Harry, I told you I wanted the whole team at keeper tryouts."

Harry cursed; he'd completely forgotten about those. "Shit, I'm sorry, Angie. If I thought she'd let me reschedule, I'd ask." Umbridge would likely be delighted to hear she was making Harry miss out on quidditch.

"I'm of half a mind to make you ask anyway," the chaser muttered, glaring at the table. Then the fight seemed to leave her, her shoulders slumping. "I know some things are bigger than quidditch, Harry. I've talked to Fred about stuff." Harry wondered exactly what the redhead had told her. "But — please, for me, try not to get any more detentions? Quidditch this year is really important. It's my last chance, our last chance. We can't win the cup with our star seeker stuck in detention every bloody night!"

"I'll try my best," he promised, though really it was out of his hands. "And I promise I'll get along nicely with whoever you pick as keeper." Luckily, as the seeker it was less important for him to mesh with the rest of the team, but he could understand Angelina wanting a good bond between them all. It would be hard to replace Oliver.

"Good. Now get moving — it's almost five, and if you're late she might give you even more detentions."

Harry looked at his watch, then swore, jumping to his feet with a bread roll still in his hand and sprinting for the doors. Thanks to a couple of Marauder shortcuts, Harry made it to Umbridge's office just in the nick of time.

When the door opened, he blinked, his eyes taking a moment to adjust to the... pink-ness of it all. The walls were covered in dainty porcelain plates decorated with various cats wearing bows and sprawling cutely. As Harry walked in, it felt like a hundred sets of eyes were on him; a shiver ran down his spine.

At the desk, Umbridge stood, her overly sweet smile in place once more. “Good evening, Mr Potter,” she said, staring him down until he replied in kind. “Please, sit.”

There was a single desk opposite hers, with a blank piece of parchment on the surface. Harry sat, watching her expectantly. “You’re going to be writing lines for me, this evening. With a rather special quill of mine,” she added, when he moved to grab his own. He watched as she pulled out a jet black quill with a wickedly sharp nib, setting it on the desk in front of him.

“May I have some ink, please, Professor?” he asked evenly. For some reason, that made her giggle.

“Oh, you won’t be needing any ink,” she told him, smiling. “I want you to write ‘I must not tell lies’.”

Harry almost asked her to please elaborate on the lies he had supposedly told, but even he could recognise that now was not the time for sass. He’d just promised Angelina he wouldn’t get more detentions, after all. “How many times?” he asked instead, mind already on the huge load of homework he had to do.

“As long as the message takes to sink in,” Umbridge said, giggling once more. Harry screwed up his nose in confusion, but shrugged, and began to write.

His breath hitched as a sharp pain began on the back of his right hand. The words he wrote on paper — appearing in shiny, dark red ink — also carved themselves into the back of his hand. They healed over immediately, leaving little more than a slight red patch, but it was enough.

Umbridge watched him over her clasped hands, sat behind her desk looking entirely too smug.

Harry put his head down, and kept writing.

He’d heard about these quills — Blood Quills, Bill had called them, when he’d once been explaining to Harry how magically binding contracts were signed. They were used to sign in blood, to prove a person was who they said they were. They were not designed for repetitive use.

The pain grew sharper with every line, every time the words reopened and re-healed on the back of his hand. But he didn’t flinch, nor shake, nor slow down for even a second, acting as if he was writing with an ordinary quill.

If Umbridge thought pain was the way to control Harry, she had another thing coming. This was nothing compared to what he had grown up with. After ten years and one and a half summers with the Dursleys, Harry was an expert at ignoring pain in order to complete tasks.

He began to tune out the continuous burn and sting of the quill cutting into his flesh, mentally composing his Herbology essay while he wrote the simple lines. It was interesting, the words

Umbridge had chosen for him — he'd expected her to be more upset about his blatant disregard for the Ministry's authority. He hadn't even talked that much about Voldemort in class.

Fudge had definitely sent her to keep an eye on Harry, to try and shut him up and get him to conform to the Ministry's party line.

Good luck to them, there.

An hour passed, then two. The sky in the window turned pitch black. Still, Harry showed absolutely no reaction to the pain, turning over his parchment to write on the other side when he ran out of room. He meditated as he wrote, wondering when he would next have free time to practice his animagus transformation. Never again, if his homework load was anything to go by.

At last, Umbridge cleared her throat. "Come here, Mr Potter."

Harry went to her, holding out his hand for inspection. The skin had healed over, but it was red and tender, like a bad sunburn. Umbridge pressed her fingers to it, and looked annoyed when Harry didn't so much as twitch.

Really, she'd have to do better than that.

Letting him go with a snide remark about the message sinking in more in tomorrow's detention, Umbridge didn't stop Harry when he stuffed the sheet of parchment in his own bag, leaving the office. He didn't know much about blood magic, but he knew enough not to leave his own blood lying around in the enemy's grasp.

Pausing in a hidden passageway on the way up to Gryffindor Tower, Harry murmured a Healing charm over the back of his hand, sighing quietly in relief when the redness began to fade. It was practically gone by the time he got back up to the common room, where he found Neville and Ginny were still up, sat at the table by the slowly dying fire.

"You guys didn't have to wait up for me." It was midnight already — Umbridge had kept him writing lines for almost seven whole hours.

"Had homework to do, figured we might as well. How was it?" Neville asked, shifting his books over to make table space as Harry began to empty his school bag, looking for his Herbology textbook. He needed sleep, but he could at the very least write the notes he'd made in his head during his detention.

"Just lines," he replied dismissively, hoping they wouldn't notice the tightness to his smile.

He wished Draco still had the other half of the two-way mirror. Or that he'd been able to pass it back to Sirius by now. He would give anything to sit and talk to one of them — even if he couldn't tell them about the Blood Quill, he just wanted to feel that reassurance, that comfort.

But both of the mirrors were still in his trunk, and he had an obscene amount of homework to do before he could even think about relaxing.

“That’s not so bad, then,” Ginny said, smiling his way. “A week of lines, a few late nights doing homework — not the end of the world.”

“Yeah,” Harry agreed, though his hand still ached, and would no doubt feel a thousand times worse after a whole week of evenings like that.

He could handle it. He’d had worse.

Chapter 50

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

With every teacher trying their best to drown the fifth-years in work, it was no surprise that the heirs were struggling to find a time to meet up. Susan caught him in the corridor on his way to Divination the next morning, raising a quick privacy ward. “We need to have a study group,” she told him, and he grimaced.

“I’d love to, but I’ve got detention with Umbridge every night this week.” Susan swore, her gaze sympathetic. “Go ahead and meet without me, though. Nev can catch me up. I’ll give him my notes for you, too.”

“That’ll work. I’d imagine you already know what I’m going to say about Umbridge, anyway.”

Harry smiled wryly. “I think I’ve got the gist of it. We just need to make sure she doesn’t catch wind of what we’re up to; the last thing we need is Fudge having enough forewarning to try and worm his way out of consequences.” Sometimes it was utterly galling how long it was going to take for all of them to turn seventeen and be in a position to implement their plans — how long Fudge and his cronies, along with Dumbledore and his ilk, could keep ruining peoples’ lives for their own gain.

“It’s going to be a tough year,” Susan agreed, looking grim.

“I’ll do what I can. I make a rather excellent scapegoat,” Harry said with a wink, making her giggle. “Always happy to bang on about Voldemort a bit more if it’ll get her off your case.”

“Good to know.” She seemed amused. “Aunt Amelia believes you, by the way. She’s trying to do what she can to prepare the Ministry, but they’re all sticking their heads in the sand.”

“I figured as much. If it would help, I caught the names of some of the Death Eaters who were there that night — she might not be able to arrest them, but she can at least keep an eye out.”

Susan nodded eagerly, and Harry made a mental note to write the names down for her later and slip them in with the law notes. “Listen, Susan, I know things are all kinds of chaotic with OWLs and Umbridge and everything, but we need to make sure the wider study group continues. You heard the Sorting Hat — now more than ever, we have to break down those house boundaries.” The last thing he wanted was fear causing people to retreat back into old habits.

“Don’t worry, we’ve got it covered,” she assured. “We’ll especially need it for Defence, Merlin,” she added with a shudder. “You just get through your detentions, alright? Leave the unity to me.” She shot him a confident grin, then glanced down the corridor. “I’ve got to get to Arithmancy, I’ll see you later.”

She dropped the privacy ward, hurrying away just as a crowd of students spilled into the corridor. Harry set off towards Divination at a half-jog, his brain feeling full to bursting with all the information and secrets he was trying to keep straight. After his detention, if he managed to get his homework done in a reasonable time, he decided he would sit up with his password-protected notebook and try and straighten out his thoughts. With Umbridge looming over his shoulder and Voldemort biding his time, Harry needed to have a plan.

. . .

He had Herbology first thing after lunch — which, of course, meant Neville went down to the greenhouses as soon as he'd eaten, to spend some time talking with Professor Sprout before class started. Harry wasn't too keen on joining him, so he finished his lunch alone and then sat in a quiet corridor working on his Potions essay, knowing it was the most difficult piece of homework on his list.

When he finally started heading towards Herbology, a pale hand reached out from behind a tapestry and yanked him into a hidden alcove, and Harry almost went boneless from sheer relief. He immediately pulled Draco close, leaning back against the wall and tugging the blond into a long, slow kiss. Draco pressed him against the stone, fingers cupping Harry's jaw. When they parted, Harry took what felt like the first proper breath he'd had in weeks. "Hi," he greeted, smiling softly.

"I've got a bone to pick with you," Draco murmured, though there was no heat to his voice. "What do you think you're doing getting a week's worth of detention?"

"You were there," Harry pointed out, absently playing with the knot of Draco's Slytherin tie. "I couldn't help myself."

"I saw that." Draco was smirking, and Harry's chest filled with an odd sort of pride. "You were certainly entertaining, knocking her down a few pegs like that. But I do question your intelligence in making enemies so early in the year."

"She had it out for me before I even stepped in her classroom," Harry pointed out, stroking up Draco's pale neck, fingers trailing up into the soft, short hair behind his ear. "We both know why she's here. Bet she'd give me detention for breathing at this rate. I might as well earn it."

"Don't push it," Draco warned, even as he arched into the touch. "It's going to be difficult enough to find time with you with her around, let alone with you in detention every bloody evening. I swear, if this level of homework keeps up all year, my brain will have melted out of my ears before I even get to my exams."

"It's the worst, isn't it?" Harry agreed. "We'll find some time to sneak away this weekend, promise. Then we can compare schedules and make plans." They probably wouldn't get to see each other in private as much as they had the year before, but Harry would take any scraps of Draco's time he could manage.

"Sounds good," Draco agreed. He took Harry's hand in his — and Harry wasn't quick enough to hide his flinch. "What's the matter?"

“Nothing.”

“You’re a shit liar, Potter,” came Draco’s immediate retort. “To me, anyway. What’s wrong with your hand?” He lit the tip of his wand, holding Harry’s hand up to his face. “Why’s it all red?”

Reluctantly, Harry told him about the Blood Quill. By the end of the explanation, Draco was flushed with anger. “No wonder my father likes her so much,” he muttered. Carefully, he turned Harry’s hand over in his, bringing it up to his lips and pressing the most gentle, tender kiss to the inflamed flesh. Harry’s heart skipped a beat at the gesture, ears going pink.

“It’s fine, really,” he insisted. Draco gave his hand another butterfly-soft kiss.

“Go to Uncle Severus, after your detention,” he urged.

“If I heal it up, Umbridge will just make me do more lines.” She wanted her message to leave a permanent mark. Draco fixed him with a level stare.

“That’s what glamours are for, idiot,” he pointed out lightly. “Go to Severus, see what he can do. Blood Quills are dark magic, you don’t want to mess with over-exposure to one.”

The worry in his voice niggled at Harry’s heart, until he sighed, leaning into Draco’s embrace. “Fine,” he relented. “I’ll go tonight.” He was hoping to avoid the Potions professor ever finding out — Snape knowing meant Remus knowing, which meant Sirius knowing, which meant explosions.

“Good boy.” Draco kissed him in satisfaction. “I have to go to class, and so do you.”

Harry let out a quiet whine at the thought of leaving the darkened alcove, but after one more long kiss and the promise of meeting up properly once Harry was done with detention, they parted ways, one at a time to make sure nobody saw them.

The rendezvous, however brief, was exactly what Harry needed to help him get through the day, right up until his second detention.

If Umbridge was expecting some kind of reaction or pain response this time, she was sorely disappointed — the words bloomed on Harry’s flesh just as easily as they had the night before, though the pain was already worse. Once again, he didn’t even twitch; his mind was on his Divination homework this time, thinking up a dream he could put in his diary that was in no way related to the graveyard or that mysterious corridor.

There was thinly-veiled fury in Umbridge’s eyes when, at the end of the detention, Harry was perfectly content to let her study his hand, pressing down on the still-healing cut.

She had nothing on Vernon Dursley.

Harry bid her goodnight, gathered up his bloodied parchment, and left the office. As soon as he was out of sight, he slung the invisibility cloak over his shoulders and set off towards Snape’s personal chambers.

He answered the door so quickly, Harry wondered if Draco had mentioned something. “What are you doing out this late?” the man asked, once they were safely inside with the door shut. Harry dropped the cloak, offering an apologetic smile.

“Only just finished detention.” One of Snape’s eyebrows ticked up in disapproval.

“So long past curfew? Tut, tut, Dolores.”

“Yeah, so, uh, don’t expect my Moonstone essay to be amazing. I wrote it over lunch break today.”

A brief smirk crossed Snape’s lips. “I’m sure I will delight in finding the flaws,” he drawled, before eyeing Harry over once more. “You didn’t come here just to apologise for the state of your homework.”

Harry dropped his gaze, suddenly reluctant. But he’d made a promise. “I... I told Draco I’d come show you.” Snape looked at him, expectant. “Umbridge is making me write lines with a Blood Quill.” He thrust out his hand, where the faintest outline of ‘I must not tell lies’ was still valiantly attempting to heal over.

A low curse escaped the Slytherin’s lips. “Your detentions start at what time?”

“Five,” Harry reported, wincing at the thunderous look on the man’s face. “The pain doesn’t bother me, but she’s going to keep going with it until the message sinks in, she says. And, well, I don’t really want to walk around dripping blood all the time, if I can help it.”

“Even I never forced you through a bloody seven hour detention, let alone forcing you to mutilate yourself! The nerve of that woman. This is not a legal use of Blood Quills.”

“What can we do, report her to the Ministry?” Harry’s tone was wry, and Snape’s thin lips twisted. Between Fudge and Dumbledore, there was no safe authority to alert, and attempting would bring far more attention to the castle than Harry was willing to deal with right now.

“It’s fine, really,” he insisted. “I’ve had loads worse, and it’s funny watching how angry she gets that I’m not visibly in pain. I’m only telling you because Draco made me.”

“As he should,” Snape agreed firmly. “Stay there.” He disappeared into his private lab, returning a minute later with a bottle of something yellow and a pad of white gauze. “This is essence of dittany. It’ll speed up the healing.” He reached for Harry’s hand, but Harry pulled back.

“Shouldn’t I wait, until all the detentions are over?” The worse it looked at the end of the week, the more likely Umbridge was to let him go. Snape scowled at him.

“I thought you didn’t want to bleed everywhere?”

“Yeah, I was hoping you might have a charm that would, y’know, heal it just enough to scab over. At the end of the week I’ll put that dittany stuff over it and put a glamour on so Umbridge thinks it scarred.” It wasn’t a big deal. Still, Snape’s lips pursed.

"Remus would kill me if I let you walk out of here with a wound like that," he said flatly, though he made no move to grab Harry's hand. There was a brief staring competition, before Snape pinched the bridge of his nose in frustration. "Salazar save me from stubborn, idiot Gryffindors. Give me your hand."

"No dittany?" Harry checked warily, holding his hand out only after Snape nodded. He waved his wand over Harry's skin, murmuring two spells in quick succession.

"The first should stop the bleeding," Snape explained, watching as the cut quickly scabbed over, but didn't heal any further. "The second spell is one you'll need to learn — it removes the build-up of magic from the connection to the quill." Harry's nose wrinkled in confusion. "Blood Quills are for binding contracts — prolonged use can, in some cases, have the same effect as a magical vow."

The blood drained from Harry's face. "You mean it could make it impossible for me to lie?"

"Not impossible, but... uncomfortable. Misdirection and avoiding the truth will be fine — which, luckily, is more your usual method anyway — but outright lies will trigger the magic. Between those two spells, and the dittany when you're out of her clutches, there should be no lasting damage."

Harry watched as Snape succinctly demonstrated the second spell, then repeated it a couple times himself. "Good. Now, I will hold on to this," Snape said, brandishing the dittany, "and you will come here immediately after your final detention on Friday. Are we clear?"

"Yes, sir." Harry really didn't see what the big deal was about leaving the wound until Friday. He wouldn't let it get infected or anything.

"Good, now go to bed. I won't have you falling asleep in your cauldron tomorrow."

The poorly-hidden concern made something warm in Harry's chest, and he bid the man goodnight. "Oh, and I have this for you," he added before he could forget, digging the two-way mirror out of his pocket. "Could you get that back to Sirius, please?"

"He'll have it by the weekend," Snape assured. Harry grinned, then scurried from the professor's quarters, hurrying back up to Gryffindor Tower. He had a dream diary and six inches on the proper handling of bowtruckles to write before he could go to bed.

. . .

In Thursday's detention, the words stopped healing entirely after around three hours, blood dripping slowly down the back of Harry's hand. The sight of it made Umbridge grin sharply. Harry was just glad it meant he was free before nine, instead of at midnight.

As exhausted as he was, he still had homework to do when he returned to the common room, a glamour covering his hand so Neville wouldn't ask about the obvious cut. They seemed surprised to see him back so early.

“Maybe she’s starting to get sick of you,” Neville joked, and Harry managed a weak smile. He should be so lucky.

Ginny, being a fourth year with hardly a fraction of the homework the boys had, returned to the common room barely within curfew. She was smiling, and if Harry wasn’t mistaken there was a love bite on her neck. His stomach gave an uneasy twist when he looked at Neville.

“Better not let your brothers see that,” Harry warned her quietly, tapping his own neck pointedly. She flushed as scarlet as her hair.

“Shit. I told him— shit.” Her brown eyes flicked guiltily to Neville. “I’m gonna go.” She disappeared up to her dorm before either of them could say anything. Eventually, Neville sighed.

“It’s fine,” he said, though his voice was hollow. “She’d tell me if— if things have changed.”

Harry’s heart clenched in sympathy, and he squeezed Neville’s knee. “She’ll come around.” He hoped.

“Whatever.” Neville’s face shuttered, and he raised a privacy ward around them. “We had a study group meeting while you were in detention, by the way. I passed on your notes. You should see the stack Susan has — it’s almost as tall as she is!”

Harry listened intently as Neville relayed the events of the heirs meeting. “We’re going to lay low for now. There’s not much we can do yet, anyway. Even Cassius — his uncle won’t let him take the seat, even though he’s seventeen.” Harry grimaced; he’d only ever heard awful things about Lord Warrington.

“Is he, y’know...” Harry tapped his left forearm pointedly, and Neville shook his head.

“Not yet. After graduation, apparently. If he can’t get out of it by then.”

“I’ll think of a way.” Harry refused to see any of his friends forced to let that monster brand them. He knew from Snape how awful it was to have, and how much he regretted the decision. “How are the Slytherins?” The house as a whole had locked up tight, hardly even looking at anyone not wearing green and silver.

“Blaise is keeping an ear out for anyone looking to get out of the Dark,” Neville relayed. “The others, too, but I guess Blaise is the figurehead for it. I don’t know — there was a lot of Slytherin double-talk that I didn’t really understand, but Malfoy said they had the in-house stuff covered. We just know not to expect any of them at larger study groups.”

That was a shame, but it was inevitable. “Hopefully we can change things, for the younger years if not our own.”

This made Neville grin. “Parkinson said they’ve been telling the firsties that it’s a mark of Slytherin cunning to manipulate Ravenclaws and Hufflepuffs into helping you with your homework,” he told Harry. “Might not be the greatest way to start friendships, but, well.”

“Slytherins,” Harry said with a nod, as if that explained everything. “Brilliant.” That young, homework help would soon turn into casual conversation; they’d be genuine friends before they knew what hit them.

Neville gave an enormous yawn, blushing. “Sorry. I just— it’s been a long week.”

“Tell me about it,” Harry agreed vehemently. “You should go to bed. I’m gonna be up another hour or two finishing this, but at least one of us should get some sleep.” He was determined to catch up on all his homework, not just the stuff that was due the next day — if he could get up to date now, he wouldn’t have an even bigger load over the weekend. He could catch up on sleep then — and, hopefully, see his boyfriend.

With a little more convincing, Neville agreed to leave Harry to it, and stumbled drowsily off to the dormitory stairs. Harry turned back to his homework, drawing on all his focus. He wouldn’t let Umbridge and her foul detentions mess up the start of his fifth year.

.-. .

Harry was no stranger to exhaustion, and hardly let it affect him as Friday dragged on, as grey and rainy as the rest of the week had been. The end was in sight, and he focused on that.

Luckily for the Gryffindors, the rain had passed by five o’clock. Harry could sort-of see the quidditch pitch from his seat at the desk in Umbridge’s office — not well enough to make out individuals, but he could see each hopeful keeper fly. He kept an absent eye on the proceedings when he was sure Umbridge wasn’t looking his way. By this point he hardly even noticed the pain in his hand, settling into the same headspace that had served him so well at the Dursleys when he’d been given an endless chore list right after a painful beating.

At last, it was over, and Umbridge surveyed her work, taking great satisfaction in eyeing the deep-cut words on his hand.

As she looked it over, Harry’s scar burned — he couldn’t help but flinch at the abrupt pain, but it was enough for Umbridge’s smile to widen. “Yes, I think I’ve made my point. You may go, Mr Potter.”

Harry didn’t need telling twice. As promised, he headed down to Snape’s, his mind still on the ache in his scar. What was Voldemort up to? His emotions didn’t usually creep through to Harry like that, not while Harry maintained his Occlumency shields.

He pushed it from his mind; whatever it was, there was little he could do.

Snape was waiting for him, and he directed Harry into a chair while he gathered the dittany and the gauze, carefully tending to the cursed wound. “I would quite like to kill that woman,” the Slytherin said evenly, making Harry look up in surprise.

“That makes two of us,” he agreed after a beat. “But also I would quite like to see her face when Susan and her aunt make Fudge regret even thinking about entering the world of politics. And when she’s given undeniable proof that Voldemort’s back.”

From the look on Snape's face, he would still find murder more satisfying.

"I suppose with all these detentions you haven't had time to work on your studies from the summer?"

Harry scoffed. "I've barely had time to do my bloody homework. This first week back really has been ridiculous." Snape's lips twitched in amusement. Bastard. "I'm going to spend some time on my animagus form on Sunday, if I can. Wandless magic is getting a bit harder to practice in my dorm, now I'm up to the bigger spells. And, well, I can hardly work on my duelling by myself." Or the darker spells Snape had taught him for battle purposes.

"The Dark Lord is being remarkably... restrained, for now," Snape said. "With luck, this will allow you to take a little more time with your training. Get your classwork under control. Should things... escalate, we will adjust as needed."

Harry nodded, though part of him itched at having yet another part of his life he could do nothing but wait through. With the Triwizard Tournament the year before, it had felt like everything was moving so quickly. On the contrary, he could already tell fifth year was going to drag.

Snape didn't keep him long, healing up his hand and then watching as Harry cast a suitable glamour to mimic a scar. Afterwards, Harry made his way up to Gryffindor Tower, keen to see the results of the quidditch tryouts. The team was gathered by the fire, and Angelina approached him with a dark-haired third year girl Harry vaguely recognised. "Harry, meet our new keeper," she introduced proudly. "This is Vicky Frobisher."

"Nice to meet you," Harry said, shaking her hand. "Welcome to the team." He wondered which of the hopefuls she'd been, whether he'd seen her fly from Umbridge's office.

Her return smile was a little shy. "Thanks, I'm really excited to play with all of you!" She glanced at Angelina, then hurried off to a small cluster of other third years, who had goblets of butterbeer from Merlin only knew where.

It was then that Harry saw the storm cloud in the form of Ron Weasley, scowling at them from across the room. When he looked back at Angelina, her gaze was knowing. "He tried out," she said quietly. "He wasn't bad — I almost thought about giving him the position. Vicky's in a million different clubs and societies, I wasn't sure if she'd have enough time for the team too. But his attitude really isn't what this team needs, and Vicky flew better as well. I figured if I can deal with you in detention half the time, I can deal with her occasionally missing practice for Charms club," she added wryly.

"I appreciate the assumption that I'll get more detentions," Harry said, making her laugh.

"Prove me wrong, then," she challenged, sticking her tongue out. "I am sorry if it makes Ron even more pissed at you, though. He seems to think you and the twins poisoned me against him or some shit. As if I'd listen to any of your opinions," she joked.

The news wasn't surprising, but it still made Harry sigh. "He's pissed at me anyway, can't make it much worse." He was getting pretty good at avoiding Ron Weasley. "And I really am “Sorry about missing tryouts.”

“It’s fine,” Angelina waved him off. “We’ve got practice at two tomorrow, so you can make it up to me then.”

“Deal.” Harry grinned at her, then turned his gaze longingly towards the dormitory staircase. If he could go to bed now, it would be the first time all week he’d slept before midnight.

“Go on. You look knackered,” Angelina said, giving him a gentle shove towards the stairs. “I want you on top form tomorrow!”

“Aye, captain!”

Dean and Seamus were the only ones in the room, and Seamus eyed Harry suspiciously. Harry ignored him, grabbing his pyjamas and heading to the bathroom, determined to take a nice long shower and then pass out.

Chapter End Notes

So many comments screaming at Harry for not telling anyone. Friends, have a little faith in me :P

Chapter 51

Despite his wish for a restful weekend, Harry naturally woke at the usual time on Saturday morning. While it was tempting to roll over and go back to sleep, he didn't want to risk oversleeping and being groggy the rest of the day.

He promised himself an afternoon nap, and dressed quietly so as not to disturb his still-sleeping dorm-mates. Grabbing his writing supplies, he headed down to the common room. It was nice, being around while everything was still quiet and calm. The first week back had been so hectic, he'd almost forgotten what a peaceful Hogwarts felt like.

He settled himself in his favourite armchair by the fire, set out his parchment and ink, and began to write.

Dear Bill and Charlie,

Hope you don't mind me writing to both of you together. Just thought I'd check in, see how things are going back where you are. Hope all is well at Gringotts/the dragon reserve!

OWL year has started off with a ridiculous amount of homework, and I hate you both for insisting it wouldn't be that bad. Of course, it would have been more manageable if the new DADA professor (Umbridge, if you haven't heard already) didn't put me in detention til midnight every night this week. It's a new record for me, getting so many detentions this early in the term! All I did was question the logic in the Ministry refusing to let us use spells in DADA class, when we'll need them to pass exams. I'm innocent, I tell you!

Anyway, I'm all done with that, so hopefully it'll be a while before she finds a reason to give me more. She will find one eventually, though — as I'm sure you're aware, the Ministry isn't thrilled that I'm warning everyone about Voldemort, because it means people might actually expect them to do something about it, instead of just pretending it's all fine.

If either of you have any tips for surviving the homework situation, I'm all ears. All the rest of my extra-curriculars are going fine — we have a new keeper, so quidditch practice starts back up today — but I'm still busier than I expected to be. It's going to be a long year!

Give everyone my love,

Harry

That was vague enough that it wouldn't look suspicious, should someone like Mrs Weasley accidentally come across it. Not that he didn't trust the older Weasley boys, but he knew how nosy certain people in the Order could be.

His next letter took a little longer to compose, though it was shorter.

Dear Fleur,

How's the internship going? More importantly, how was your date with Bill the other week? He didn't tell me anything in the summer, just that you'd agreed to go out with him. I need details!

Being back at school is keeping me busy; I'm sure you remember what fifth year is like. I'm glad the tournament was last year — if I'd had to deal with that on top of OWL preparation, I would have exploded! I have no idea how you and Viktor both managed to do the tournament on top of your NEWTs.

I know you're hoping for juicy Hogwarts gossip, but either it's too early in the year or I am out of the loop, because other than the eternal debate over whether I'm a lunatic or not thanks to the Prophet, nothing really interesting is going on. Our new DADA teacher is awful, but that's nothing new. At least this one is actually who she says she is.

Looking forward to hearing from you,

Harry

He still wasn't quite as secure in his friendship with the French witch, and writing to her felt awkward at times. Things had been much easier when she was at Hogwarts and he could socialise with her as part of the group — they didn't actually know each other that well, even now, but the tournament was the kind of experience that bonded people in a way that was different to friendship. Especially with the way it ended. Besides, as she was now Bill's girlfriend, Harry was keen to keep up correspondence.

Finally, he wrote his last letter of the bunch.

Dear Viktor,

How are you doing? Your season has started up now, right? What's it like being on a league team as well as the national one? I bet you're really busy with training!

I've got my first house quidditch practice of the year later today, and I'm so excited to get back on my broom. I really want to try out that dive you were telling me about in your last letter, though I don't know how my captain will feel about it. She already thinks I'm too reckless.

I managed to figure out how to get the European Quidditch League commentary in English on my Wireless, so I'll try and keep up with your matches. It'll be a good break from the enormous amount of homework I have!

What else have you been up to since I last wrote?

Good luck in your next match,

Harry

Again, that friendship was new and a little unsteady, but at least they had the common ground of quidditch to fall back on. Viktor was much more verbose on paper than he was in person, his dry sense of humour sneaking out the more Harry got to know him.

There wasn't anyone else outside of the castle that he could think to write to — he'd speak to Sirius when Snape got the mirror back to him, and possibly Remus, too. Although Tonks had made him promise to write...

Quickly, he scrawled out a short note to her, asking how things were going and only complaining a little bit about Umbridge. He wasn't sure what else to say; there was a lot she didn't know, and a lot he wasn't sure he could trust her with. But she was family, of a sort, and Harry was happy to work on getting to know her.

With four letters sealed and ready to send, Harry left the common room and set off towards the Owlery. Hedwig was waiting for him, and he stroked her head softly, affixing the letters for the Weasley brothers and Tonks — they were likely to be delivered at the same place. She took off, and Harry quickly used a couple of school owls for the letters to Fleur and Viktor, choosing a stout-looking eagle owl for the trip all the way to Bulgaria.

Just as he carried it to the window, the Owlery door opened. It was Cho, who halted in surprise. "Oh. I didn't think anyone else would be up here this early."

"I wanted to get it out of the way," Harry said with a shrug. Cho had a parcel in her hands, and Harry helped her secure it to the leg of a large brown owl.

"It's my mum's birthday," she said by way of explanation, then blushed. "I should've sent it yesterday, actually, but I forgot until about five minutes ago. It's been a bit of a week." Harry hummed in sympathy. "Ooh, yeah, not as bad as yours, though," she agreed ruefully. "Are you all done with detentions now?"

"For now," Harry confirmed. Cho's lips twisted in a scowl.

"She's foul," she muttered. "The way she talks about... about what happened. The things she says about you, and Cedric, and Dumbledore. I hate her."

"Try not to let her get to you."

Cho snorted. "Bit rich, coming from you." Harry ran a hand through his hair, not denying it.

"Rather me than anyone else."

For some reason, that made Cho's dark eyes soften sadly. Before she could say anything, the door slammed open abruptly.

"Aha!" Filch crowed in delight, pointing one gnarled finger at Harry. "There you are. I've had a tip-off that you're planning to place a massive order for dungbombs."

Harry shared a bewildered look with Cho. "Says who?"

"I have my sources," Filch scowled. "Whatever you're sending, hand it over."

"Can't. I sent it already."

The caretaker's expression turned thunderous. "What?" He scanned Harry suspiciously. "How do I know you aren't hiding it in your pockets?"

Harry turned out the pockets of his jeans, revealing nothing more than a sweet wrapper.

"I saw him send it," Cho declared, meeting Filch's gaze. "It didn't look like an order form, though. Just a normal letter."

The caretaker didn't seem convinced, but he left after a half-muttered threat about blaming Harry for even the slightest hint of dungbomb. When he was gone, Cho shook her head. "That was weird." She paused. "You weren't ordering dungbombs, were you?"

"Of course not. I've got the twins for that."

Cho giggled, then sobered. "I reckon someone wants to read your mail," she remarked. A cold sensation dripped down Harry's spine. There was one person that it would be assumed he was writing to — one person the Ministry wanted very much to get their hands on.

"I think you might be right," he agreed grimly.

He was going to have to be a lot more careful with his post, in future.

.-. .

Cho and Harry parted ways at the base of the Owlery stairs, and Harry wandered down to get some breakfast, mentally arranging his day. He was quite happy to leave all the homework he'd been set the day before until Sunday — and was applauding himself for having done all the rest of it during the week, even if it meant a few hours less sleep. His Saturday could be all about enjoyment — Quidditch, time with friends, and if he was lucky an evening with Draco.

Neville was sat alone at the Gryffindor table, which made Harry frown. He scanned the room, eyes landing on a head of long red hair, over at the Ravenclaw table. Ginny was sat with Michael Corner, which wasn't unusual — but they had their hands clasped on the tabletop.

That was new.

It also explained the morose expression on his friend's face. "You alright?" Harry asked, squeezing onto the bench beside Neville. The boy blinked, then followed Harry's gaze.

"I'm fine," he said shortly. "They're dating, now. Officially."

There was no need to ask who 'they' were. Harry winced. "And... how do you feel about that?"

The smile Neville gave in return was almost painful to look at. "I'm fine. Happy for them, even." He stabbed viciously at the yolk of his fried egg, watching it ooze over his plate.

"...Right." Harry continued to watch him warily for a few moments. If Neville didn't want to talk about it, Harry wouldn't force him, but... God, he did not understand what the pair of them were doing.

He wasn't sure he could sit back and watch Draco date someone else, no matter how much he loved him, how many promises that he'd come back to Harry at the end of it. But of course, this was Neville, so he'd never say anything. He still hadn't quite figured out how to stand up for himself.

Harry sighed, and reached for the bacon. It wasn't his business, he reminded himself. If they wanted his opinion, they'd ask for it.

"What are you up to today?" he asked, wishing Neville had sat on the other side of the table, so they weren't staring directly at the Ravenclaw table.

"Meeting with Susan and the rest after breakfast. If you're up for it," Neville added, eyebrows drawn together.

"Sounds perfect."

"Great. Then homework, I guess. Though Professor Sprout was telling me about this new delivery of these hybrid venomous tentacula plants she just got — they sound really interesting — so I might go down and have a look, if she'll let me." Neville brightened at the idea of spending time in the greenhouses, and Harry smiled; just the thing to take his mind off Ginny.

"I've got quidditch practice at two. Suppose I'll do homework after."

"How about I go to the greenhouses while you're at quidditch, then we meet back up to do homework together? If— if you want to, that is." Neville looked hesitant, and Harry wondered how long it was going to take the other boy to realise that he was Harry's best friend, of course he wanted to do homework together.

"Sounds like a plan to me." He leaned in closer, dropping his voice. "I'll probably be, ah, out this evening, though, if you know what I mean." He hadn't checked with Draco yet, but he couldn't see his boyfriend having objections.

Neville looked confused for a moment, then grinned with the realisation, wiggling his eyebrows. "All night?" he asked softly. Harry choked on his toast.

"No!" he hissed, blushing brightly. "Not— we aren't there yet." He was not going to get into that with Neville, certainly not in the middle of the Great Hall. "An hour or two after curfew, tops." As much as he loved Draco, he was still severely lacking in sleep, and didn't want to be out too late.

Neville was still smirking, but he didn't say anything more on the subject. Not even when they left breakfast to go to the empty classroom Susan had told Neville to meet at, and Draco was already there. Harry smiled at him, hoping he wasn't blushing as he dropped into the seat beside the blond. "Morning."

“Morning, Scarhead,” Draco greeted, voice just edging into fondness. His knee bumped Harry’s under the table, and Harry felt a piece of parchment brush his fingertips. He grabbed it quickly, stuffing it in his pocket.

Susan herself was the last to arrive, though she looked pleased to see them all there. “Good. This won’t take long, I know we’ve all got a shit-ton of homework.”

“You all have no idea,” Cassius muttered ominously, in all his seventh year wisdom. Susan ignored him, taking her seat.

“So, we’re all agreed that Umbridge is a Ministry spy, yes?” she declared, making Harry snort.

“Got that bit, yeah. Can’t tell if she’s here to keep an eye on me or Dumbledore most, though.”

“Why can’t it be both?” Daphne pointed out. “Fudge has always hated how Dumbledore runs this school like it’s entirely separate from the Ministry. He’ll want to get this place to conform, and you along with it.”

The very idea made all of them grimace. A Ministry-approved Hogwarts would be a very dull thing indeed.

“Do we need to worry that much?” Ernie remarked, leaning back in his chair. “Every other Defence professor that’s had it out for Harry has ended up dead — no offence, of course,” he added sheepishly. “But why don’t we just let nature take its course?”

Harry wasn’t sure how to feel about his previous years being described as nature taking its course.

“The professors don’t end up dead until the last few weeks of the year,” Padma pointed out. “There’s a lot of damage she can do before then.”

“Are you asking me to hurry it up?” Harry asked, entirely deadpan. Draco snorted quietly at his side.

“If you wouldn’t mind,” he drawled, eyes flashing. “As long as she’s here, we’re at an impasse. Now that Fudge is interim Chief Warlock, he’s going to be even more worried about losing control of the Wizengamot. Not that we can do much until we’re of age, but if he gets even a hint that we’re all planning on taking our seats this early, well — he can’t even be happy about Dumbledore losing his proxy seats, because they’ll be going to you.”

“I agree with you. But that doesn’t mean I’m going to kill Umbridge,” Harry said mildly.

“Shame,” Draco replied in a similar tone.

“Sometimes I wonder what the rest of the school would think if they saw you two like this,” Parvati said, shaking her head. “But I don’t think any of them are ready for it.”

Harry and Draco shared an amused look — if only they could see what the pair of them were like among family.

“The point is,” Susan said somewhat impatiently, “we can talk about laws we want to change all we like, but without our family heads on board, we’re useless. What we can do, however, is make the Ministry regret trying to interfere in our school.”

A stab of fear went through Harry at the prospect of all his friends getting detentions with that awful quill. “Surely if she’s here to get Dumbledore out, we should leave her to it?”

“That certainly wouldn’t hurt, but it’s not just Dumbledore she wants out. It’s anyone and anything who doesn’t fit her standards,” Susan replied coldly. “You know what her voting record is like, Harry. She’d ban anyone with an ounce of creature blood from the school if she could.”

“She said the most awful things about Professor Flitwick the other day,” Anthony Goldstein said, angry on behalf of his Housemaster. “He’s the best Charms Master in the country, and she doesn’t think he’s fit to teach!”

“But what can we do, though?” The quiet words came from Neville, on Harry’s other side. “Realistically, what can we do that isn’t going to make everything worse? She’s already shown she’s happy to give detention to anyone who stands up to her.”

“We don’t all need to be quite so brazen as Potter,” Millicent Bulstrode drawled. “Umbridge is a control freak. She wants order. All we have to do is make her realise it’s a lot harder to control a castle full of teenagers than she seems to think.” A smirk slid across her features. “Socialising with other houses. Running in the corridors, messy uniforms, late homework. Behave for all the teachers except her. We get enough people doing it, she won’t be able to put all of us in detention.”

“Of course, when Millie says we, she means you,” Pansy piped up. “It’s not worth the risk of our parents finding out if we were to join in this rebellion.”

They all knew that the Death Eaters were trying their best to infiltrate the Ministry and ingratiate themselves to Fudge, so of course their children couldn’t be seen going against Umbridge’s word.

“We’ll hide in plain sight,” Padma agreed. “Keep up our study groups, make sure it doesn’t look like the Wizengamot heirs are banding together — be so obvious she can’t possibly think there’s something wrong. And if she tries to restrict things, well — we’ve already had plenty of experience reading laws and regulations in search of loopholes, after Susan’s little summer project.” The smile that crossed her face was positively devious in its innocence. “We’ll follow her word to the letter.”

“If it makes the Ministry angrier at Dumbledore, all the better,” Parvati agreed with her twin. Susan hummed thoughtfully.

“I’m talking to Aunt Amelia about it, trying to see if there’s a way to get her removed. After what Harry said about her teaching qualifications, we’re trying to see if that can be used against her, but it looks like Fudge pulled an awful lot of strings to get her where she is.”

Harry didn’t doubt that; especially if Fudge had condoned the Blood Quill. Suddenly, he remembered his run-in with Filch, and frowned. “Be careful what you put in writing,” he warned. “Filch tried to read my mail this morning — said he’d been told I was ordering a load of dungbombs. I’d already sent it off, but... if Umbridge was the one who sent him, it might not just be my letters she’s after.” She could be after Sirius — or she could just be looking for more information to use to slander Harry. He didn’t want to take the chance that she might go after someone else, too.

They all looked horrified by the idea, promising to be careful.

“So we just wait until she makes her move, and then the chaos begins?” Cassius asked.

“Normal students until our freedom is threatened?”

Harry mulled the idea over in his head, grinning slowly. Millicent was right.

Hogwarts was a big castle, and Umbridge would soon learn that she couldn’t possible control all of it.

.-.-.-.

Harry was practically skipping by the time he made it down to the quidditch pitch, Firebolt slung over his shoulder. His whole body vibrated with the need to get up in the air — the month at Grimmauld was the longest he’d gone without flying since the summer before his third year.

He arrived before the rest of the team, and amused himself by flying laps, getting progressively faster and turning tighter until he was practically doing a backflip to change direction. A sharp whistle caught his attention, and he looked down to see Angelina and the others stood in the middle of the pitch. He landed, a breathless grin on his face.

“All warmed up?” Alicia teased, tossing the quaffle his way. “Captain says we’re passing. Spread out.”

Harry offered a jaunty salute, speeding off to the other end of the pitch. He ended up between Fred and their new keeper, who had a determined set to her jaw. The quaffle started making its rounds, and Harry was pleased to see Frobisher seemed to be able to handle it fairly well.

“I wanted to try out last year,” she said, raising her voice so Harry could hear despite the distance. He tossed the quaffle her way, impressed when she leaned far back on her broom to catch it. “But there was that whole tournament thing. At least it’s given me an extra year to practice.”

‘That whole tournament thing’, as if she wasn’t describing the most horrifying series of events in Harry’s young life.

“Angelina said you’re in a load of other clubs,” he commented. He hadn’t had much interaction with any third years before now. Half the time he sort-of forgot the younger students existed.

"Charms club, Arithmancy society, Debate club, and last year some of the Ravenclaws in my year started a book club, but that's more of an informal thing," she relayed, tossing the quaffle hard to Alicia. Harry was caught off guard when the ball then came his way, but managed to catch it with his fingertips, passing it on to George across the circle.

"Blimey," he remarked. "I didn't even know half those things existed."

Vicky laughed. "Guess you've always been a bit busy with other stuff." That was an understatement if Harry had ever heard one. "My mum warned me about you, y'know." Harry's heart sank, wondering if he was in for another lecture about his sanity like Seamus had, but then he realised the girl was grinning. "She said you were trouble, but at least you paid well for it."

Abruptly, Harry realised why her name was so familiar. "Your mum is my lawyer," he said, eyes widening at the connection. Vicky grinned wider, nodding. "Wow. Didn't realise she had a daughter at the school." No wonder she'd been so keen to get Skeeter off Hogwarts grounds.

"I'll tell her you say hi," Vicky replied.

"Please do. Though I hope she won't be offended when I say I really hope I don't need a lawyer this year."

That made the girl laugh so much she almost missed the quaffle, but a quick dive and a barrel-roll had the ball secured.

"Right, I think that's enough of a warm-up," Angelina announced, looking very satisfied with her choice of keeper. "Fred, George, get your bats and let the bludgers out. We're gonna put the newbie through her paces."

Harry glanced to Vicky, wondering if she was going to get nervous. On the contrary, she looked excited by the challenge. She shot off to hover in front of the goal hoops, braced for impact, no hesitation whatsoever.

Suddenly, Harry was feeling very good about their chances for the cup that year.

... .

The quidditch team played right up until dinner time, and would've played even longer if they weren't so starving. It felt good, being back in the air, and while Harry wasn't as involved with the main plays, being a seeker, he could see that Vicky was going to fit in just fine. They didn't get the snitch out — Angelina had no doubt in his ability to catch it, and wanted him focused more on the team — so Harry's job was to essentially be as annoying as possible, trying to distract and disrupt the chasers and keeper. It was fun, and he was beaming as he walked with George up towards the castle; Fred had hung back in the changing rooms with Angelina, and Harry and George had no intention of waiting for them to finish.

“You doing alright, kid?” George asked, slinging an arm around Harry’s shoulders. Harry leaned into him, still smiling.

“Better now I’ve flown.” The redhead hummed knowingly. “I’ll be even better after tonight.”

George wiggled his eyebrows. “Post-curfew plans, eh?” Harry blushed, but nodded. “Catch me before you go; I’ve got some potions questions for your brainiac beau.”

“Will do. Though don’t expect any answers tonight.”

“Course not,” George agreed, smirking. “He’ll be too busy snogging your face off.”

Harry’s silence was an answer in itself.

“Ron’s not giving you too much trouble, is he?”

Harry shook his head. “He’s actually left me alone more than I expected. I don’t know if he’s just given up trying to do what Dumbledore wants, or if Dumbledore thinks I’m having some kind of teenage angst rebellion and will come crawling back to them in a month or two, but other than a few remarks, they’ve both been fine.”

Hermione seemed to take it as a personal offence that Harry was excelling in classes. He’d been the only one other than her to complete the Vanishing spell in class, and he’d actually beaten her to the punch in Charms. She had been studying even more diligently than usual, from what he’d seen.

“Glad to hear it. I live in hope that a bit of time alone will make him get his head out of his arse, but he might just be a lost cause.” George shook his head sadly. Harry frowned; it had to be hard, watching your little brother act in such a way.

“Lots of people are idiots when they’re fifteen,” he said. “Maybe he’ll come around eventually.”

“Maybe. Until then, we’ve got plenty of products to test on him.” George smirked mischievously. “Business is booming, and it’s all thanks to you.”

“You two are the ones with the brains,” Harry insisted. “I just invested in talent.”

That actually brought a blush to George’s freckled face, and he ruffled Harry’s hair. “We owe you, big time.”

“No you don’t,” Harry waved him off, “you’re family.”

George pulled him closer, smacking a loud kiss to his cheek. Harry groaned, wiping at the slobber-mark exaggeratedly. “Go pester Lee,” he mock-grumbled, turning through the doorway to the Great Hall. George laughed, but obediently disappeared.

As he headed to his table, Harry couldn’t help but glance across the room in the direction of the Slytherin table, where Draco was holding court in the centre of a cluster of fifth and sixth year Slytherins. His hair was mussed, and the sleeves of his dark green button-down were rolled up to his elbows.

Harry almost tripped over his own feet, eyes so fixed on the curve of Draco's wrist, the line of his forearm.

He blushed, tearing his gaze away, heat filling his veins.

The note Draco had passed in the heirs meeting asked him to meet at eight. Those three hours were going to crawl by.

. . .

Sitting in the unused classroom Draco had selected, Harry watched the little dot on the Marauder's Map labelled Draco Malfoy as it steadily made its way up from the dungeons. He'd already checked they were clear — Umbridge was in what Harry assumed was her personal quarters, and the only teacher out on evening patrol was Sprout, who was two floors up. There were prefects out, but Draco was one too; Harry wasn't worried about him getting caught.

He put the map away when the dot reached the corridor outside, and was grinning when the door slid open. Draco immediately locked and warded it with his wand, while Harry jumped to his feet.

"Merlin, I've been waiting all day for this," he declared, tugging Draco into a kiss. Draco's hands landed on his hips, steadyng him.

"It's been far too long," the Slytherin agreed, smile soft. "I'm glad I had that mirror of yours, the last half of summer. I... I don't know what I would've done without it." Harry tensed at the reminder of the guests in Draco's home, pulling his boyfriend closer.

With a few Cushioning charms, they got comfortably cuddled up in the back corner, Harry leaning against the wall while Draco tucked himself against Harry's chest. "Can you stay at the school over Christmas?" he asked, tangling Draco's fingers with his own.

"Probably. Even Father will agree that the atmosphere at home isn't really conducive to studying. And of course, I must do well on my OWLs, or I'll disgrace the family name." The bitterness in his tone made Harry frown, kissing his temple.

"You're going to do better on your OWLs than your father could even dream of doing," he insisted.

"I hope so," Draco sighed. "I suppose you'll be spending Yule break with Sirius?"

"Maybe. I rarely get to decide these things." Perhaps he would be allowed to go back to Grimmauld for the holidays. If the Weasleys were going too. If Dumbledore wasn't pissed off with Harry by then. "I wish we could all spend it at Seren Du."

The idea of a family Christmas — a proper one, in their real home, with Draco and his mother there too — made Harry's chest clench painfully.

“We will one day.”

Harry sighed, squeezing Draco’s hand, then raised it up to his lips. He pressed a kiss to the side of his wrist — the sight that had been so distracting at dinner.

“What?” Draco remarked, looking up in confusion. Harry just smiled.

“I like your wrists. Your arms,” he said, trailing his fingers up the silk-soft forearm. “This whole sleeves-rolled-up thing is a good look for you.”

Draco smirked, and the next thing Harry knew his boyfriend was sat up, straddling his lap. “You like me looking all disheveled, do you?” A wicked light entered his eyes. Harry hummed, letting his hands rest on Draco’s waist.

“Yeah. But it’s better when I know I’m the one who made you that way.”

They kissed, lips parting eagerly, and though Harry could feel that both of them were hard, he felt no pressure to do anything about it. His mind flashed back to their conversation on his birthday — they had plenty of time to figure all that out, there was no need to rush things.

Though he wouldn’t mind seeing Draco with his shirt off again.

Tentatively, he set his fingers on the first button of the blond’s shirt, toying with it before he popped it open. Draco’s eyes were hot with want when he broke the kiss, both hands in Harry’s hair. “Go on,” he urged, then kissed him again. A moan rose in Harry’s throat. With that permission, he slowly undid the rest of the buttons, eventually pushing the soft shirt back off Draco’s shoulders, revealing endless creamy skin. Harry’s breath hitched at the sight, and as Draco pulled his arms out of the sleeves, Harry ran a hand over the blond’s shoulder. There was more muscle there than he remembered, though his lithe frame was deceptive. His body was starting to look less like a teenager’s, more like a man’s.

“You’re so gorgeous,” Harry murmured in awe, watching the blush travel all the way down Draco’s neck and chest. For someone who projected such a cocky demeanour, Draco still struggled to take an earnest compliment.

“Says the boy with annoyingly perfect abs,” he retorted breathlessly, tugging Harry’s t-shirt up to stare at the abs in question. It was Harry’s turn to blush — he had spent so much of his life not thinking about how his body looked, aware of how scrawny and awkward he was. Now that Snape’s nutrient potions had corrected the damage done by the Dursleys, Harry wasn’t used to having a body to be proud of. A body others admired. As long as they didn’t see the scars.

He didn’t fight Draco pulling his shirt all the way over his head, setting his glasses aside when they tangled in the fabric. “Salazar,” the blond sighed, sitting back against Harry’s thighs to take in the sight. “Not a hint of that weedy little third year I started fancying, is there?”

Harry grinned, stealing a kiss, skin sparking with electricity when it pressed them closer together at the crotch. “D’you still fancy me, then?” he asked teasingly, arching his neck as Draco dropped his head to mouth at his shoulder.

“Mm, a bit, yeah,” he murmured, sucking a dark bruise on Harry’s collarbone, safe where his uniform would cover.

“That’s good,” Harry sighed. “I fancy you, too, a bit.” His back pressed against the cold stone wall as Draco adjusted himself, getting in a better position to attack Harry’s neck. It was the most glorious torture, and Harry never wanted it to end.

“I’m glad half the school thinks you’re a lunatic,” Draco said, once he was done leaving his mark. Harry raised a bemused eyebrow. “Means they’re too busy calling you crazy to realise how fucking hot you got over the summer. I’ll be hexing people all over the place once they finally figure it out.”

Harry ducked his head to hide his blush, kissing Draco’s sternum. “Doubt it,” he muttered. Draco was only saying that because he was Harry’s boyfriend. He was positively plain compared to someone like Blaise, or Justin Finch-Fletchley, or Draco himself. There were plenty of other boys in their year for people to thirst after.

“I know you’re half-blind without those glasses, Potter, but surely even you see it,” Draco teased softly, fingers sliding up Harry’s chest.

“I don’t, but I’ll take your word for it,” Harry replied. “As long as you think I’m hot, that’s all I care about.” He didn’t want anyone else looking at him like that, not when he had Draco.

“Just don’t come crying to me when all the bent boys in school start chasing after you,” Draco joked, cupping Harry’s chin to kiss him deeper. “I’ll be too busy cursing their dicks to fall off.”

That startled a laugh out of Harry, and he shook his head, grinning up at his ridiculous boyfriend. God, he was so in love.

Maybe he’d tell him that, one day soon.

Chapter 52

After an excellent weekend, Harry was smiling as he made his way to breakfast on Monday. He'd played quidditch; made out with his boyfriend; finished all his homework and finally spoken to Sirius. His godfather had the mirror back, and Harry was satisfied he was doing okay by himself — apparently Mr and Mrs Weasley had moved back to the Burrow now the kids were at school, so it was easier for Sirius to spend more time at Seren Du.

Harry's good mood died as soon as he saw the front page of the Prophet.

Susan grabbed him on his way to the Gryffindor table, redirecting him to Hufflepuff instead, and as soon as he sat down she thrust the newspaper in his direction. Reading the headline made his heart sink. "Oh, she didn't."

"She did." Susan's glare was enough that Harry was surprised the paper didn't burst into flames.

Umbridge had made herself 'Hogwarts High Inquisitor'. Which, Harry learned as he read the article, basically meant she could create whatever school rules she wanted, and decide which teachers were deemed suitable for their positions.

"Look," Susan urged, pointing to the very end of the article. 'Wizengamot elders Griselda Marchbanks and Tiberius Ogden have resigned in protest'.

"Resigned?" Harry echoed quietly. "What does that even mean?" How could someone resign from a hereditary seat?

"They've given their seats to Dumbledore by proxy," Susan explained, a sour look on her face. "As a gesture of support."

Harry's stomach squirmed. While he was all for thumbing noses up at the Ministry, he didn't want Dumbledore to get more power in the process. "Great." That was two more seats they'd have to try and wrestle out of Dumbledore's control. Worse; two seats they were currently unaware of the heirs for. "Marchbanks is the Tremblay seat, right?" he checked, and Susan nodded.

Tremblay and Ogden were both lines who had not made any public record of their family trees in the last century. Neither Marchbanks nor Ogden had kids that anyone knew of, and both of them were somewhat elderly.

If anything happened to them while Dumbledore held their seats, it would be nigh on impossible to reclaim them from the headmaster.

"Mr Potter." Harry straightened up, turning to see Umbridge stood in front of him, eyes cold. Her gaze darted down to the paper in his hand for a moment, and a tiny, smug smile crossed her lips. Harry hated her. "Might I ask what you're doing?"

“...Having breakfast?” Harry replied, confused. Her smile tightened.

“This is the Hufflepuff table. You are a Gryffindor.”

Oh. It was like Dumbledore all over again — the entire hall was filled with students at the wrong house table, and yet Harry was clearly the problem.

“Susan and I were discussing the latest Prophet articles. The Ministry does approve of students taking an interest in current events, I hope?”

Beside him, Susan was still as a statue, watching as Umbridge’s eyes narrowed.

“Ten points from Gryffindor, Mr Potter,” she declared sweetly. “Back to your table, please.”

Susan placed a discreet hand on his arm before he could argue, shooting him a warning look with the tiniest shake of her head. Harry held back a sigh. “Yes, Professor.” He gave Susan her paper back, and got to his feet, heading to sit with Neville at Gryffindor. He was scowling by the time he sat down. “I hate that bitch,” he muttered. Neville hummed in agreement.

“Brace yourself. She’ll only get worse from here,” he warned sadly. Harry’s jaw clenched — if she wanted to play games, he could play.

He had half the students of Hogwarts on his side, after all.

.-. .

Another Hell Monday began, thankfully without Umbridge’s interference in History of Magic. In that class, Harry sat in the back with Susan, mostly watching her silently get angrier and angrier about the whole situation. When he wrote her a note asking if she had a plan, she just scowled at him.

It was all too tempting to use Potions as an opportunity to let out his anger, but Harry didn’t want to push Snape too far; if anyone noticed he was being even slightly more lenient with Harry than usual, there would be questions. As it was, there was a spiky red ‘D’ on his Moonstone essay, even though Harry knew it was of at least A quality, if not E.

He grumbled about it for show, and made a few remarks that got points docked by the stern professor, but Harry wasn’t worried about it. He was doing well in his other classes, he could make those points back easy.

He had hoped Divination might be a bit of a reprieve from his bad mood, since Parvati and Lavender had promised to help him out with his dream diary — that hope deflated very quickly, when the trapdoor opened just as Trelawney was handing out copies of The Dream Oracle, and a familiar squat figure appeared through it. “Good afternoon, Professor Trelawney,” Umbridge greeted cheerfully.

Beside Harry, Lavender’s grip on her quill tightened so much the stem snapped, dripping ink onto the tablecloth. Parvati was trembling with rage.

Harry wordlessly vanished the mess, before either of the teachers could notice. “Easy,” he warned the girls under his breath, watching Umbridge take up a position at the front of the class, clipboard in hand.

Professor Trelawney was not one of Harry’s favourite teachers — indeed, considering she was the Seer who made the prophecy that resulted in the death of his parents, Harry would be perfectly happy to never see her again in his life — but even he had sympathy for her, being inspected by Umbridge. It was clear the woman thought that Divination was a load of rubbish; and, indeed, that Trelawney was a fraud.

If looks could kill, Umbridge would be dead twice over from the glares Parvati and Lavender were sending her way. The two had almost entirely given up on their dream interpretation, shamelessly listening in as Umbridge harassed Trelawney about giving her a prediction. “That’s not how the Sight works, you hag,” Lavender whispered venomously.

Hands trembling and eyes even wider than usual behind her glasses, Trelawney stuttered out her usual go-to prediction; grave danger. Which, honestly, seeing as Umbridge was a DADA teacher at Hogwarts, probably wasn’t too far off the mark. Especially if she carried on the way she was going — Lavender Brown would murder the woman herself.

Harry was only half surprised when Trelawney came his way, snatching up his dream diary to begin interpreting them; naturally, each one heralded a gruesome and painful death. After every prediction, Trelawney’s eyes flickered hopefully to Umbridge — as if predicting the death of the student she was known to hate the most would score the Seer some brownie points.

Harry couldn’t really fault her for trying.

Sadly, it did not seem to impress the toad-like woman, and as the bell rang Umbridge stared Trelawney down, promising to be in touch with the results of her inspection soon, then daintily clambered down the ladder.

Somehow, she still managed to beat all of them back to her own classroom for their next lesson. Harry studied her carefully, smirking when he saw the telltale distortion of glamour magic around her cheeks, the slight heaving of her chest — had she run all the way there, just so she could be waiting at her desk in an attempt to look imposing?

He hoped someone had seen her.

The two Gryffindor girls were still fuming from Divination, so Harry left them to it, taking his usual seat beside Neville. It wasn’t a surprise when Umbridge set them to read chapter two — nor was it much of one when Hermione threw her hand in the air, and announced that she had read the entire book, and she had Opinions.

She might be an annoying little spy for Dumbledore, but her dedication to learning in this particular instance was proving deeply entertaining for Harry, even as his anger at Umbridge grew with every word out of the foul woman’s mouth.

"I am here to teach you using a Ministry-approved method that does not invite students to give their opinion on matters about which they understand very little," Umbridge said nastily, looking far more pleased about shutting down a sixteen year-old girl than a grown adult should. Harry snorted quietly — after two summers with Remus Lupin, he would bet that he understood far more about jinxes and their classification than both Umbridge and Hermione combined. But he wouldn't speak up. He was trying to be good.

"Your previous teachers may have allowed you more license, but as none of them — perhaps save Professor Quirrell — would have passed a Ministry inspection—“

"Professor Lupin has a Mastery in Defence as awarded by the International Society of Defensive Magics," Harry burst out; the slight against his beloved godfather was one step too far on his already frayed temper. "He was more qualified to teach this class than you'll ever be. Professor Quirrell, on the other hand, had Voldemort sticking out of the back of his head — but sure, maybe the Ministry would approve of that."

Umbridge stared him dead in the eye, nostrils flaring with fury. Harry heard Neville let out a quiet, resigned, "Harry, no," but it was too late.

"I think another week's detention would do you some good, Mr Potter," Umbridge told him. He didn't flinch.

It was worth it.

.-. .

"I can't believe you accused the Ministry of being on You-Know-Who's side," Neville hissed as soon as they were free of the classroom.

"She was the one who said Quirrell would pass inspection!" Harry retorted. His friend shot him a deadpan look — that wasn't an excuse, and they both knew it. "I couldn't just sit there and let her talk shit about Remus like that."

"You defending him is only going to make it worse, you know that."

Harry was saved having to reply by the sight of Hannah Abbott sidling up to Parvati ahead of them, whispering something in the girl's ear and hurrying along the corridor. As she passed, she gave Harry and Neville a pointed look and a tiny nod.

"Right now?" Neville murmured, and Hannah nodded again, then kept walking.

Harry heard Parvati say something to Lavender about needing to go to the loo before dinner, promising to catch up. He and Neville casually detoured away from the flow of students all heading down to the Great Hall — and Harry led the way into a passageway that would take them to just outside the classroom Susan liked to meet in.

"This is the worst timing," he grumbled, checking his watch — he had to be in Umbridge's office at five — but he wasn't going to skip the meeting. Umbridge had only been High Inquisitor for a day, and the whole atmosphere of the school had changed.

People were scared of her, now. And Harry wouldn't stand for that.

The Hufflepuffs had been as diligent as their house animal; all the heirs were gathered in short order, all looking disgruntled. "I can't be here long," Harry warned. "I've got another detention with Umbridge at five, and I really want to make sure I eat something." If he was going to be shedding blood all night, he didn't want to give her the satisfaction of him passing out.

"Again?" Ernie asked incredulously.

"You need to learn to keep your mouth shut, Potter," Pansy drawled. "Though, out of interest — what did you mean about Quirrell having the Dark Lord on the back of his head?"

All eyes whipped to Harry, and he waved them off. "Long story, I'll tell you another time." Of course, most of his end-of-year adventures had been a total mystery to the rest of the school. "What did you need us for, Susan?"

"This whole High Inquisitor shit changes things. I take it we've all had at least one inspected lesson?" Everyone but Sullivan nodded. "Well, it's clear she's out for blood."

"She was awful to Professor Trelawney," Parvati huffed.

"Forget Trelawney," Cassius dismissed. "She pulled out a measuring tape on Flitwick."

Harry sucked in a sharp breath — how dare she??

"Now she's got the power, she can add any rule she likes to the Hogwarts Charter, as long as Fudge signs off on it," Susan explained to the grim-faced group. "We can't let it stop us, but we have to be careful."

"You read the paper," Anthony piped up, "she's here to get Dumbledore out. That's what she's going to focus on."

"Yes, but she wants him out because she thinks he gives students too much freedom," Susan spat. "She'll curtail any freedoms she can, to try and make the headmaster angry."

"Like actually using magic in classes," Padma muttered derisively. That reminded Harry of something Sirius had said, on the mirror the night before.

"I heard from — a friend," he stuttered evasively, "outside Hogwarts, who says Fudge doesn't want us using magic in Defence class because he thinks Dumbledore is training students up as his own personal army, to take over the Ministry."

At first thought, it sounded like something straight out of the Quibbler. But Harry could see the words settle in the minds of his fellow heirs with a heavy resonance.

"How in Merlin's name did we end up with such an absolute moron in charge of our country?" Susan sighed in despair, head in her hands. Harry grimaced in sympathy.

Dumbledore running the school meant people left it oblivious and complacent; oblivious and complacent people naturally voted in oblivious and complacent leaders.

No wonder it had been so easy for the Dark to thrive.

“We’re all going to fail our OWLs,” Padma moaned, voice trembling. “I’ll never get into the Warding Academy without at least an E in Defence!”

“Why don’t you get Harry to teach you,” Blaise suggested quietly. When Harry looked at him, the tall boy was smirking. “In fact, why don’t we all get Harry to teach us. Not just how to pass our exams. Fudge might have trifle for brains, but... becoming an army to take down the Ministry sounds rather fun, doesn’t it?”

Harry blinked incredulously. “You... you want me to what?”

“It’s not a bad idea, actually,” Hannah said, looking thoughtful.

“I’m not training you all up to storm the Ministry!” Harry protested — how would he even go about that?

“No, that’s my job,” Susan replied with an aggressive grin. “But you’ve been saying since last year that the fight is coming, and now You-Know-Who’s back... we ought to be prepared. We’re all targets, as heirs. We need to know how to defend ourselves.”

Harry could hardly believe what he was hearing. “I’m just a fifth year. I don’t know anything.” Sure, he’d been training with Snape and Remus and Sirius over the summers, but... half of that wasn’t anything he could teach students.

“You’ve faced the Dark Lord more than anyone else who’s still alive,” Draco reminded him gently. His silver eyes were earnest as he locked gazes with Harry. “You know what it’s like. The fact that you duelled him and lived, last year...” He trailed off, shaking his head.

“You’ve always been the best at Defence. And I know you — you know more combat spells than any other student in this school, I guarantee it.” His lips curled at the edges, a challenging smirk. “If nothing else, think how peeved Granger will be when we all get better OWL results than her.”

Harry snorted despite himself — that last point was very tempting.

Susan was right, though he hated to admit it. They were all targets, and Voldemort had already proven that he didn’t care whether someone was a student or not before he killed them. The idea of any of his friends being caught in a fight and unable to defend themselves, when Harry had the chance to help... it made his stomach turn to lead.

“Fine,” he agreed. “But if we’re doing this, it’s not just us. We’re not the only targets — muggleborns and half-bloods, he’ll go after all of them. They need to be able to defend themselves, too.”

“The more people involved, the higher the chance of Umbridge finding out,” Anthony warned dubiously.

"We'll only ask those we can trust. Half the school thinks I'm a lying madman anyway, they won't be interested. But... it's a thought." He looked at his watch, then cursed. "I need to go. Think it over, get back to me. I'll brainstorm some ways to keep it all secret."

He threw a hasty wave over his shoulder to cut off any protests, sprinting from the room. That would give them something other than Umbridge to talk about, at least.

There was barely time for him to throw together a hasty roast beef sandwich when he reached the Great Hall, scoffing it down while speed-walking to Umbridge's office and trying his best not to choke. He arrived just in time, took half a minute to compose himself, and walked into the office. As before, the desk with its lace doily had the Blood Quill and some parchment lying on it, and Umbridge sat at her own desk, smiling with daggers in her eyes. "You know what to do," she told him, gesturing to the empty seat.

Harry sat down, and began to write. The second he felt the pain on the back of his hand, he let the glamour drop; it wouldn't do if the fake scar didn't re-open like Umbridge anticipated. It hadn't healed entirely — Snape had warned him it would take weeks, even with the dittany — and the pain was worse than ever as the skin split open, blood welling up and dripping down his hand.

He didn't flinch, didn't falter, didn't make a sound. Satisfaction burned within him — it had to be so galling for Umbridge, to watch him be entirely unbothered by the torture she was putting him through.

She didn't know he'd spent his entire childhood being trained to do all sorts of tasks without showing pain. If he hadn't so much as sniffled when Vernon had sent him to school with three broken fingers at the age of eight, a little cut on the back of his hand wasn't going to do it.

Hours passed. At around ten, Umbridge beckoned him over, inspecting his hand. A frown crossed her lips. "Not quite as much of a permanent reminder as I'd hoped," she muttered. "No matter. By the end of this week, I'm sure we'll get there."

She dismissed him with a saccharine smile, and Harry strolled away breezily. Only when he was alone did he use the spells Snape had taught him, cleaning off the blood dried to his skin.

Really, she was losing her touch already, letting him go just an hour after curfew. The loss of homework time was more of a punishment than the pain could ever be.

.-. .

Angelina caught up to him at breakfast the next morning, a foreboding look on her face. "George told me you got another week's detention."

"I'm sorry," he told her, grimacing. "I just—"

"Couldn't help yourself, could you?" she snapped, then faltered. "Harry, I know it's hard. I know she's got it out for you. But, please, for my sake, can you try and keep a hold of your temper? We'll never win the Quidditch cup if my star player is always in detention!"

She said this just as McGonagall happened to be walking past the Gryffindor table. The grey-haired witch froze, turning on her heel to stare down Harry. “Did I hear correctly?” she said, raising an eyebrow. “More detention, Potter?”

“Another week with Professor Umbridge,” he confirmed meekly. McGonagall’s lips thinned.

“After the conversation we had last week?”

“She said unsavoury things about Professor Lupin,” Harry argued, jutting his chin defiantly. Her expression softened for a moment, but it didn’t last long.

“I think we both know that Professor Lupin would not want you to go to the trouble of arguing on his behalf,” McGonagall said shortly. “Especially against someone whose opinion he values so little.”

That addition, a quieter remark than the beginning of her sentence, made Harry grin. “Of course, Professor. Won’t happen again.” She was right, naturally; Remus wouldn’t want Harry to waste his breath on Umbridge. She was just so infuriating.

“See that it doesn’t,” was his housemistress’ terse reply, before she carried on up to the head table.

Angelina looked taken-aback by the conversation — perhaps at McGonagall’s blatant, if quiet, disregard for her fellow teacher. “Well,” she stuttered, frowning at Harry once more. “You’re missing Thursday practice, but there’ll be another one on Saturday. You’re lucky I know how good you are, Potter.”

“I really am sorry.”

Angelina waved off his excuses, giving him one last stink-eye before heading back to sit with the twins.

After his little exchange with McGonagall at breakfast, Harry was quietly delighted when he walked in to Transfiguration later that morning to see Umbridge settled in the corner of the classroom, while McGonagall greeted her students as if entirely unaware of the intrusion.

What followed was perhaps the most entertaining Transfiguration lesson of Harry’s life. McGonagall was absolutely masterful in her curt, bone-dry take downs of Umbridge’s every interruption; Harry was impressed by her even temper, and even more impressed by the way she made Umbridge look like she’d been slapped in the face on multiple occasions. She made a point of listing all her qualifications and accolades — of which there were many — and briefly caught Harry’s eye as she did so, gaze shining with well-hidden amusement.

She had heard the specifics of his criticisms of Umbridge, then.

It was beautiful to watch; there was no teacher in the school more qualified, competent or accomplished than Professor McGonagall, and even Umbridge knew it. Even more, McGonagall had been both Transfiguration teacher and Head of Gryffindor for such a long time, there would be absolute outrage from the general public if she were to be ousted by the Ministry. A lot of ex-Gryffindors went into Ministry jobs, after all.

“Well,” Umbridge said somewhat weakly, after a well-placed stab at her own teaching prowess. “You’ve certainly been at this for quite a while. One might even say, too long.” She giggled girlishly. “We wouldn’t want standards to drop with complacency, after all.” A devious light entered Umbridge’s eyes. “Perhaps a demonstration from one of your students? Just to make sure you aren’t losing your touch.”

McGonagall’s nostrils flared. “If you had been paying attention, you would have noticed the students have all been practicing their spellwork for the entirety of our conversation, Dolores,” she bit out. That just made Umbridge smile wider.

“Then they won’t mind doing it for me one more time.” She turned to face the class, eyes sliding right past Hermione as the girl confidently raised her hand. Harry knew what was coming long before she said it. “Mr Potter, perhaps?”

McGonagall gave him a look, and Harry let his lips flicker in the barest of smiles. A year or two ago, this might have spelled disaster, but not now — now, Harry was quickly rising to the top of his class in most subjects. Transfiguration was no exception.

“May I have a new mouse, please, Professor?” he requested, the epitome of a model student.

“Lost your first one, Mr Potter?” Umbridge remarked snidely, but was ignored; McGonagall fished a brand new mouse out of the box on her desk, setting it down in front of Harry. There was a warning in her eyes not to let her down, but Harry wasn’t phased.

He raised his wand, spoke the incantation clearly, and flicked his wrist.

Instantly, the mouse vanished entirely.

“Very good, Potter. Five points to Gryffindor,” McGonagall awarded with a decisive nod. She turned back to Umbridge, whose face was once again turning that Vernon-Dursley-colour. “Does that satisfy your curiosity, Dolores?”

Umbridge let out a quiet huff, and went back to scrawling notes on her clipboard, right up until the bell rang.

Harry wasn’t sure what felt better — the absolute outrage Umbridge showed at Harry being a competent wizard, or the indignant expression Hermione wore; on her desk, beside the still-wriggling tail of Ron’s half-vanished mouse, was one single mouse paw.

.-. .

Friday night, Umbridge kept Harry in detention until half past eleven; she seemed determined to do as much damage as possible before she had to let him go once more.

“This should do for now,” she declared in satisfaction, once she’d inspected his hand. “I do hope you have finally learned your lesson, Mr Potter.”

Harry just nodded, bidding her goodnight, and head down to the dungeons.

To his combined surprise and trepidation, Snape was not alone in his quarters.

“I’m going to kill her,” Remus growled, eyes glowing bright with the wolf as he cradled Harry’s hand between his own. “How dare she harm my cub like this.”

“Moony, I’m fine,” Harry assured soothingly. “This is nothing, really.” It was going to scar, he could tell, even with Snape’s attention. But it could just join the other scars on his body.

He wondered what Umbridge might think if he showed her all the marks his uncle had left on him, if he told her she had something in common with muggles — that the muggle methods were more effective, really, so she had best up her game.

“It’s not nothing, this is illegal!” Remus argued. Snape set a hand on his shoulder, and the man slumped wearily. “I don’t want you getting any more detentions trying to defend me, Harry. I love that you’re willing to fight for me like that, but really, she isn’t worth it.”

“It wasn’t just for defending you,” Harry said, trying not to squirm as Snape rubbed dittany onto the bleeding wound. “It was mostly for pointing out that Quirrell was possessed by Voldemort.”

“Also not a worthy cause,” Snape pointed out flatly. “For Salazar’s sake, Potter — do us all a favour and learn to keep your mouth shut.”

“If I’m in detention, she doesn’t have the time for anyone else,” he retorted stubbornly. As far as he knew, Umbridge only had one Blood Quill.

“You are not responsible for the entire damned school!” Snape hissed. “How long will it take for us to knock out that senseless drivel Albus has been filling your head with?”

“Please, cub,” Remus tried earnestly. “I worry about you enough as it is, with Dumbledore so close to you. Don’t give me another thing to go grey over.” The attempt at a joke was weak, but it made guilt squirm in Harry’s stomach.

“I just... I hate her, so much. She’s putting so many people in danger with her ridiculous Ministry-approved curriculum.”

“But that isn’t something you’re going to fix by getting detention with her every night,” came Remus’ response. When Snape pulled back from Harry’s mostly-healed hand, the werewolf swooped in for a hug. “Let her do what she came here to do — make life difficult for Dumbledore. We all know it’s temporary. As soon as the Dark Lord goes public again, Fudge and Umbridge will lose all credibility, and she’ll be out on her arse.”

Harry pursed his lips. “That’s relying an awful lot on Voldemort to make a move.” He eyed the adults suspiciously, gaze dropping to Snape’s forearm. “What do you know that I don’t?”

“Very little, actually,” Remus assured. “Just that Voldemort is clearly going after the prophecy. You saw what happened to Podmore in the paper, I assume?”

“Imperius?” he presumed, and Remus nodded.

“We think so. They’re certainly trying quite hard to get into the Department of Mysteries — luckily, the Unspeakables are one of the few genuinely competent departments of the lot.”

“I wish my connection with him was more useful,” Harry grumbled. “I’m trying to block off my end the best I can, but with the dreams... I don’t know if he’s not holding meetings or just purposefully keeping me out of them, but all I’m getting from him is this bloody endless corridor with a locked door.”

Snape’s spine stiffened. “May I take a look?”

Harry nodded, and dark eyes met his. He forced himself to relax as he felt the intrusion, pushing his dreams to the forefront of his thoughts. Snape didn’t linger, and when Harry blinked away, the man was scowling. “That’s the Department of Mysteries,” he confirmed. “He’s trying to get you curious.”

“Does he think I’d have any better luck at breaking in than he would?” Harry muttered, rolling his eyes. At least now he knew why his dreams were so repetitive. Suddenly, his blood went cold. “If he’s giving me these dreams on purpose, do you think he knows? That I’m a horcrux?” Worse; did he know that Harry was aware that he was a horcrux?

Snape’s face was grave, but he shook his head. “I doubt it. There is little to no information on a human vessel for a horcrux — furthermore, given what happened the night— the night you got that scar, I doubt him splitting his soul was intentional. Likely the magical backlash was enough to splinter off a piece, since it was already so fragile from the previous horcrux rituals. He likely just thinks it is some magical residue from the failed killing curse.” A grim smile crossed his thin lips. “I may not be privy to as many of his plans as Lucius Malfoy, but I am the one the Dark Lord comes to for difficult and obscure magical research. If he were looking into the possibility, I would know.”

Harry tried to be soothed by the confidence in the man’s tone, but he still felt cold.

At least his hand didn’t hurt so much anymore.

Chapter 53

With the heirs study group keeping a low profile since Umbridge's new appointment, Harry spent his Saturday morning with Neville, Luna and Ginny — the weather wasn't quite good enough to be outside, but it wasn't raining, so with some warming charms and a privacy ward they managed to make a cosy little spot for themselves under a tree by the lake. Harry and Neville had both brought homework with them, though Harry wasn't particularly enthusiastic about his — Friday's DADA class had ended with Umbridge setting them an essay on the defensive theories outlined in chapter two of Slinkhard's book, and it was such utter garbage he was having trouble holding his tongue.

"Have you thought any more about what Susan said, Harry?" Neville asked him. It took a few moments for Harry to realise what he was referring to — and he sent a cautious glance towards the two fourth year girls. Of course, if they did start a secret defence club, Luna and Ginny would absolutely want to be part of it.

"A bit." Harry enjoyed daydreaming about it during his detentions, thinking up increasingly outlandish ways to annoy Umbridge without her even realising. "It's a good idea — though I'm still not sure I'm the best person to be teaching it. And we'll have to be careful. If Umbridge catches us..."

"What are you two talking about? What did Susan say?" Ginny pressed. Setting his parchment aside, Harry told her about the idea for the study group — framing it as a conversation with some of the Hufflepuffs, rather than a secret meeting of Wizengamot heirs — and her brown eyes lit up with glee. "That's brilliant. Oh, please say you'll do it, Harry! I'm dying of boredom in Umbridge's classes."

"It does sound like fun," Luna agreed. "I think you'll be a great teacher, Harry."

"Thanks, Luna." Harry smiled at the blonde girl. "I'm certainly game for the idea. I'm just wondering how we'll pull it off. The number of people who might end up getting involved... It'll be hard to hide a group that size." Even if the publicly-dark-aligned Slytherins couldn't risk being present, that was still eleven heirs, plus anyone they deemed trustworthy — Ginny and Luna, the twins, the Gryffindor chasers, Cho Chang. And those were just the people Harry might want to invite.

"Hogwarts is massive, though," Neville pointed out, looking up at the castle towering over them. "There's bound to be somewhere we can hide a study group. Especially with all the privacy wards you know, Harry."

"It's not like it's a History of Magic group, though — Defence needs space for people to move about. If I'm teaching people how to survive in a real fight, they need to be able to get up and dodge." Duelling and defence were very physical forms of magic. They might be able to cram enough people into an empty classroom, but if Harry had to have people take turns to try their hand at spells it would take forever to teach them anything useful.

"Why don't you ask the castle for help?" Luna suggested dreamily. Ginny sniggered.

"Don't know if it quite works that way, Lu," she replied. "Would be nice, though." Then she made a face of disgust. "There's always the Chamber of Secrets, I suppose. It's certainly big enough. And hidden enough." She didn't seem thrilled by the suggestion. Harry shuddered.

"And full of basilisk corpse," he reminded her.

"Oh, yeah." She shrugged. "Maybe you can split the group into smaller groups. Do it by year, or something."

That sounded like an enormous time commitment to Harry, and he said as much. "I know I said I'd try and stop getting detentions, but I still have homework to do," he pointed out. A frustrated sigh escaped his lips. "We'll sort something out. Maybe. It's a nice idea, at any rate."

He reluctantly went back to his essay, tapping his quill against his lower lip in thought. Luna's words, ridiculous though they sounded, stuck in his head.

He was Slytherin's heir; the castle's magic had helped him out plenty of times last year, avoiding Crouch and such. Always small things, but there was definitely some sort of sentient presence there.

...Asking couldn't hurt, right?

.-.-.

That night, once the rest of his dorm-mates were asleep, Harry snuck out beneath his invisibility cloak, Marauder's Map in his pocket just in case. Stood unseen in the corridor outside the tower entrance, he closed his eyes, and reached with his magic.

It was hard, but after an evening spent meditating in search of his animagus form, the magic came easier than it might have done otherwise. He stretched it towards the ambient magic of the castle, one thought echoing in his mind.

I need a place we can all learn. Help me, help the students.

He stood there for several minutes, magic thrumming, feeling like a bit of an idiot as he silently begged the castle for help. He let out a long breath, disappointedly letting his magic fade — and then there was a nudge.

He froze. Another nudge; a familiar feeling, the castle's magic reaching back, urging him. A grin split his face, his breathless laugh echoing in the empty corridor. "Show me," he whispered, focusing on that nudge.

The magic pulled, and he followed.

It didn't tug him towards the main staircase, like he anticipated. Instead, Harry followed the pull through the winding corridors of the seventh floor, keeping his footsteps quiet and a careful eye on the map, just in case. He didn't pay much attention to where it was leading him, focused so hard on not losing the feel of the magic.

Eventually the pull stopped quite abruptly, and Harry looked around. He was in one of the corridors between Ravenclaw Tower and the North Tower, home only to a pair of disused classrooms and a boys' bathroom.

And a door, which Harry had never seen before.

It was right in the middle of the wall, bold as brass, and yet Harry was quite sure it hadn't existed the last time he'd walked that corridor. The castle's magic was encouraging as he reached out to open it.

The room he found had his mouth agape. It was perfect.

The room was easily twice the size of an ordinary Defence classroom, the walls lined with bookshelves. Harry recognised a lot of the titles — both from the school library, and from the library at Seren Du. In one corner was a pile of soft-looking cushions, while another held a trio of mannequin-like figures; duelling practice dummies. One wall was taken up by an enormous mirror, perfect for someone to watch their own duelling form as they attempted spells.

"This is amazing," Harry breathed in awe. "What is this place?"

The castle's magic, so much stronger in this room, was suddenly wiggling into his mind. Room of Requirement, it said, barely a whisper. This was followed by a brief flash of an image, like a memory; Harry himself pacing up and down three times in front of the blank wall, and then the door appeared. Suddenly, he knew how it worked — this room could give him anything.

A grin playing at his lips, he narrowed his gaze in concentration. A squashy sofa, identical to his favourite one in the library at home, appeared in the centre of the room. Harry laughed, throwing himself down on it.

This was incredible. A room that could change and cater to his every desire, that could hide away the door once they were all inside — even better, it was several floors up from Umbridge's office, in a part of the castle hardly anyone bothered to think about.

A thought popped into his head, and his joy faltered. It would be easy to access for the Gryffindors and Ravenclaws, but it was a long way to travel for the two houses in the lower half of the school. Not that Harry expected many Slytherins, but there would be at least a few. The Hufflepuffs especially had no reason to be up so high in the castle; it would be tricky for them to get back to their common room without getting caught.

As he thought that, a door suddenly appeared opposite him, sprouting between two bookshelves. Warily, Harry approached it.

It opened up not in the seventh floor corridor, but in a narrow staircase. Harry followed it all the way to the bottom — perhaps two or three floors — and emerged from behind a tapestry of Helga Hufflepuff.

Twenty feet down the corridor from where he knew the entrance to the Hufflepuff common room was.

He gaped again, slipping back behind the tapestry and hurrying up the stairs. The room was exactly as he'd left it, but for three more doors, each engraved with a house crest. Harry knew that were he to follow them, he would find himself not far from each house common room.

"Amazing," he said again, beaming.

It was everything he could possibly need to keep his friends safe. "And other people can use this room too?" There was a vague affirmative feeling in his mind. Harry hummed. This room was incredible, that was for sure — it was also clearly one of the best kept secrets in Hogwarts. And in this room it would be all too easy to assume they were safe. It would just take one untrustworthy person to let the location slip — if not to Umbridge, then bragging to a friend, or wanting the room for their own personal use — and everything would be ruined.

There had to be a way to make sure their secret was kept safe. To make sure this room wouldn't be misused.

But this was an excellent start.

"Thank you," he declared vehemently, feeling the castle's magic warm and happy in his chest. It made him smile. "You don't like Umbridge sticking her nose in any more than the rest of us, do you?"

A feeling of strong dislike, followed by a hint of mischief. Harry laughed, suddenly flooded with a huge wave of confidence.

If the castle itself didn't like Umbridge, she didn't stand a chance.

.-. .

Harry felt like he was walking on air the next morning, his smile so bright that Neville gave him weird looks over breakfast. Harry refused to explain anything, just grinning and eating his scrambled eggs.

He had to look into a few things, and he didn't want to get anyone's hopes up before his plan was fully formed. If they were going to do this, it would be done properly.

Neville quickly begged off to go spend time in the greenhouses — which, Harry wondered, might have had something to do with Ginny practically sitting in Michael Corner's lap over at the Ravenclaw table — so Harry was left to his own devices. That sounded like a perfect Sunday to him; he could finish off his Potions homework, get in a little animagus practice, and maybe if he was lucky find the time to sneak away with Draco for a while.

With that plan in mind, Harry went up to grab his books from his dorm, then made his way to the library; the homework Snape had set required them to cross-reference some research in books other than the set text.

Since most of his free time had been taken up by detentions since he'd arrived at school, Harry had hardly spent any time in the library so far. Compared to the endless hours of the year before, it felt strangely unfamiliar when he walked in. Madam Pince eyed him warily, but didn't say anything.

He made his way towards the Potions section of the library, a smile tugging at his lips when he saw half a dozen clusters of students gathered around tables, all from mixed houses, all studying diligently together. His friends had promised they would keep the study groups going, and it looked like they had succeeded.

A familiar head of copper curls caught his eye, and he peered into one of the darker corners to see Susan sat with Justin Finch-Fletchley, both of them gesticulating wildly as they spoke soundlessly — under a privacy ward, clearly.

Unsure if he was intruding, Harry edged closer. Luckily, when Susan spotted him, she grinned. A wave of her wand had the ward coming down. "Hiya, Harry."

"Hey, guys." On the table, he spotted one of the enormous law books Susan had had all the heirs searching through over the summer. One dark eyebrow rose. "You two look busy."

Justin's gaze was wary, and he hunched his shoulders a little as if to cover the notes on the table. Susan waved him off. "It's fine, Harry's with us," she assured. She raised the ward once more, pulling out the chair beside her. Harry sat.

"What are you up to? I thought this stuff was... private?" Not for anyone outside their group, he thought, watching as Susan lit up with a devious grin.

"Harry, did you know Justin's dad works for the muggle government?" she said. Harry blinked, perplexed.

"I didn't, no." He knew the Hufflepuff was a muggleborn, but that was the extent of it.

"He's an MP," Justin supplied proudly. "Labour, not Tory."

The only bit of muggle politics Harry knew was that Uncle Vernon was a staunch Tory supporter, so he assumed Justin's dad being in the opposite party meant he was probably a fairly solid bloke.

"Justin has been teaching me a bit about how the muggle government works," Susan continued. "With their elections for the governing seats as well as their Prime Minister. It's fascinating, really."

"I'm sure it is," Harry agreed mildly. It wasn't a topic he'd ever been particularly interested in. "What are you plotting, Bones?" He knew that look on her face all too well by now.

"Me? Plotting?" She feigned innocence, and even Justin laughed. "Okay. So, the Wizengamot is great — or, at least, it will be, once we've sorted it all out," she said, waving a hand dismissively like that was a simple task. "But it's still so very... pureblood. And obviously, we need to uphold wizarding traditions and culture — half the problems we're having is that things are being suppressed so as not to offend muggleborns who don't understand it. But that doesn't mean that they shouldn't get to have a say in how things are run, just because they don't have magical parents."

"If the purebloods are the only ones with power to make legal changes, we risk going too far in the other direction," Justin explained. "Forcing the muggleborns and half-bloods to abandon any trace of their muggle heritage. Or worse, removing them entirely from the muggle world, like the Americans used to do — Obliviating their parents and stealing them away, banning people from interacting with muggles, all that rot."

"That's definitely not what we want." Harry couldn't imagine how bad things might get if the pureblood supremacists felt even more validated than they were already.

"Exactly. And the muggles have some really great technology and stuff that we could do with adapting — you know how I feel about pens, Harry," Susan added with a rueful smile.

"We're already dangerously unaware of modern muggle society; the last thing we need is to be separated even further. Not while the muggles are working on all those surveillance cameras and stuff. So," she said, patting her law book, "Justin and I have been talking about how we can adjust the Wizengamot to make it more representative of the community. We can't get rid of any of the existing seats — except the five that have totally died out — not without causing an absolute riot. So my plan is to add more seats, that are a bit like the muggle ones. People run for office, get elected to join the Wizengamot, if they've a mind for that sort of thing. New-bloods, half-bloods, muggleborns — even creatures, maybe, one day. If we can get the law to allow it."

Justin puffed out his chest. "I'm as much of a politician as my father is, and I'll be damned if I'm going to let being a muggleborn keep me out of the profession." There was a challenge in his voice, his blue eyes daring Harry to argue.

"I think that's a brilliant idea," Harry enthused. "You're right that it's not fair to keep all the power in pureblood hands. Do you really think you can make it happen?"

Susan reached over, patting the back of his hand in a fondly patronising manner. "Chief Warlock by the time I'm thirty, remember?" she said. "I'll get it done."

Harry absolutely believed her.

"Well, you know where I'm at if you need me to throw my weight around. I get enough grief for being the Boy-Who-Lived, might as well use the name for good," he joked. Opposite him, Justin's pale cheeks flushed faintly; the curly-haired boy was no doubt remembering the way he'd treated Harry after the Chamber of Secrets debacle.

Wishing the pair luck, Harry left them to it — Susan was a girl on a mission, and he had far too many missions of his own to get sucked into that aspect of her crusade as well.

He had Potions homework to complete.

.-. .

Through some stroke of luck, the dormitory was empty after lunch — the perfect chance for Harry to get in a little animagus practice. He spelled and warded the drapes around his bed, made sure his meditation stone was under his pillow, and closed his eyes.

It was getting easier and easier every time, to reach for that place within him where the fox slept. The animal's body was so familiar now, as familiar as his own — he felt so close.

He would get it before Christmas, he was sure of it. His wandless magic had come on in leaps and bounds over the past year; this was just like that.

Harry felt a strange sensation over the backs of his hands and arms, and opened his eyes. Immediately, he was hit with a wave of astonishment — where he had once had regular human hands, he was now staring at two front paws, the dark red fur trailing all the way up almost to his elbows. He stared at his new paws, flexing the sharp claws and the short toes, feeling the way the pads of his feet felt on his bedsheets. A laugh bubbled up from his chest.

"I hope I can undo that before dinner," he said to himself, closing his eyes to concentrate once more.

It would be really awkward to explain away if he couldn't.

.-. .

Ever since the High Inquisitor announcement, the students of Hogwarts had wondered what Umbridge's first move would be to bring the school to order.

On Monday morning, they got their answer.

There was a crowd outside the Great Hall at breakfast, and Harry frowned — one of the huge double doors was closed, and it had a large piece of parchment pinned to the front. He squeezed his way past some chattering second year Ravenclaws, trying to get a good look. When he drew close enough to read it, his heart sank like a stone to his gut.

EDUCATIONAL DECREE NUMBER TWENTY-THREE

By Order of the Hogwarts High Inquisitor,

All students are to remain seated at their assigned house tables during every meal.

Failure to comply with this rule will result in loss of house points, detentions, and/or other necessary punishments as decided by the High Inquisitor, Dolores Jane Umbridge.

At the bottom was an enormous Ministry seal, with two signatures below it; Umbridge, and Fudge.

"That's ridiculous!" Ginny complained loudly beside him. "Why can't we sit where we want?"

Harry wondered how much of this rule was down to him. Still, the joke was on Umbridge — if she was implementing this new decree to try and get at Dumbledore, she clearly hadn't noticed the headmaster hated the inter-house mixing just as much as she did. Indeed, the man looked quite jovial up at the head table, happily spreading jam on a slice of toast.

It made Harry's stomach turn, to see rows of only red-lined robes at the Gryffindor table. Everyone looked disgruntled, picking morosely at their meals and muttering to each other in annoyance, sending longing looks at friends on other tables. It was funny how this would have been a perfectly ordinary thing in Harry's first or second or even third year; while a few people might occasionally join a friend elsewhere, the majority of students stuck to their own houses.

How quickly things could change.

The only person more pleased than Dumbledore was Umbridge, who was surveying the students with smug glee. Just for a moment, Harry was so very tempted to send a wandless, wordless hex in her direction. No one would even know it was him.

Knowing her vendetta, he'd probably get blamed regardless.

Not nearly as hungry as he had been before he'd read the announcement, Harry reached for some scrambled egg, nibbling on a corner of toast. And that's when he saw it.

Over at the Ravenclaw table, Cho was sat the wrong way on the bench. Her back to the table and her plate in her lap, she grinned at the boy sat at the Hufflepuff table opposite her. Patrick, Cedric's best friend.

Harry watched as Patrick turned around, raised his eyebrows, then grinned. Suddenly, he was swinging his legs over the bench, copying Cho's position; plate in his lap, sat facing Cho, conversing happily as if there were an invisible table between them.

A hush fell over the hall. Then, Parvati Patil shuffled down the bench at the Gryffindor table, until she was sat opposite her twin sister. They copied Cho and Patrick, resting their plates on their knees, facing away from their own tables. Across the room, a Hufflepuff fourth year turned around to face the Slytherin table, and was met by a Slytherin third year. One by one, students swivelled around on their benches, facing whoever happened to be sat opposite them. Students who had never spoken before started up cheerful conversation, reaching back to add food to their plates. Harry shifted around to face the Ravenclaw table, and found himself staring at one of their chasers whose name he couldn't remember for the life of him. The boy grinned. "Think you're ready for the first match of the season, Potter?" he asked, challenge in his eyes.

Not every student moved. Plenty stayed put, and obviously those on the far sides of the Gryffindor and Slytherin tables had nothing but a wall at their backs. But it was enough — the hall filled with chatter, the bright energy returning to the room at large. Up at the staff table, Sprout was beaming widely, and Flitwick looked so proud Harry thought he might faint.

Umbridge, on the other hand, was spitting feathers. "ENOUGH!" she screeched, chair scraping on stone as she stood abruptly. "This is— all of you, sit properly! This is most inappropriate, put your plates back on the tables! Five points from each of you, every student facing the wrong way!” Immediately, the stones in all four house point hourglasses began to fly upwards. Slytherin lost fewer than the rest, but the other three houses were so even it made little difference to the overall scores. Umbridge stormed down the aisle between Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw, careful not to trip over the legs of all the students sat incorrectly, until she was stood in front of Cho. “Detention, Miss Chang. My office, five o’clock this evening.”

Cho’s eyes hardened. “Yes, Professor,” she replied, smiling unrepentantly. Umbridge huffed, and kept walking, all the way out of the Great Hall.

A flood of excited murmurs started up, even as people swung their legs back over the benches to sit properly. They were all wide-eyed and grinning, flushed with exhilaration.

To them, it felt like a victory. But Harry’s eyes were on Cho, being congratulated by Patrick for her ballsy move, and his stomach felt like it was full of lead.

.-. .

Harry waited outside Umbridge’s office that night, under the invisibility cloak, watching the door with anger in his blood. Cho had entered at five on the dot, and it was eight, now.

Thankfully, by half past the door opened; Cho walked out, cradling her right hand, cheeks flushed but no tears in her eyes. As soon as the door shut behind her, Harry stuffed the cloak in his bag and stepped from the shadows, calling her name softly. She jumped, whipping around.

“Harry.” Her eyes went wide, her lower lip trembling. “Harry, she—“

“I know,” he said softly, sympathetic. “Come here.” He reached gently for her hand, first doing the Healing charm Snape had taught him, then the spell to drain the magic. After only one detention, the words were faint, but Harry could just about make them out.

I will not be disruptive.

“I’ll teach you the spells tomorrow, if you come find me,” he promised. “In case she gets you again. Or anyone else.”

“She did that to you, too? Every night?” Cho looked utterly horrified, and Harry attempted a reassuring smile.

“I’ve had worse. Look, see, it’s basically healed.” He showed her the back of his hand, where the words I must not tell lies stood out pale pink against his dark skin.

“That’s awful,” Cho breathed. “She just sat there, watching me cut myself over and over — I tried not to cry, I didn’t want to give her the satisfaction, I—“ The dam broke, and with a quiet sob, tears began to spill from her brown eyes. Harry pulled her into a tight hug, letting her cry on his shoulder.

“You did so well,” he soothed. “Brave as a Gryffindor, you are.” That earned a weak laugh. Eventually, she pulled back, wiping her face with the sleeve of her jumper.

“Tomorrow after dinner, in the library?” she suggested, only the hint of a wobble to her voice. “Whatever those spells you used were, they helped a lot — it feels better already. I want to know them, in case she gets anyone else I know.” Then she smiled shakily. “In case I get another one.”

“Cho, you don’t have to—“

“Don’t,” she cut him off sharply. “Don’t tell me what to do, Harry Potter. I made my choice this morning, and I’d do the same again. You aren’t the only one who hates that hag. Let people make their own choices.” She blinked away a few more tears. “Like Cedric made his choice, to stand with you.”

Well, when she put it like that, there was nothing he could say. “I’ll meet you there,” he promised. “Let me walk you back upstairs.”

Cho didn’t argue, and the pair of them walked side by side, completely silent but for Cho’s occasional sniffles. At the top of the staircase, Harry gave her one last tight hug before they parted ways. On the way back to Gryffindor Tower, rage burned deep within him.

Dolores Umbridge was going to regret the day she decided to take on Hogwarts.

.-.-.

Tuesdays were awkward, lunch break splitting Harry’s double Transfiguration period right in half. He went straight to the Tower from class to exchange his books, then wolfed down a meal, giving Snape an intent look that the man couldn’t possibly ignore. He waited for the tiniest nod, then left the hall, ignoring Neville’s confusion.

Despite the small rebellion of Monday morning, everyone was sat at the correct house table. By the way some of the older Ravenclaws looked at him, Cho had told a few people what detentions with Umbridge entailed.

They eyed him with respect, that he had endured two weeks of it so stoically, but their gazes made Harry feel sick.

It was much better when people didn’t know.

He beat Snape to the man’s office, but only by a minute. The Potions Master strolled in, locking and warding the door in his wake. “What?” he snapped irritably. Harry just smirked.

“Hypothetically,” he began, dragging out the words.

Snape’s eyes raised skyward. “Merlin help me.”

Ignoring the mutter, Harry continued. “If I were to need a way to secure the secrecy of a group of people — say, thirty-odd students of varying age and house — in order to hypothetically lead a secret Defence Against the Dark Arts study group right under Umbridge’s nose, do you have any suggestions for how I might go about doing that? Hypothetically.”

The stare Snape gave him was utterly unimpressed.

“Explain.”

Harry told him about Blaise and Susan’s idea, and the secret room the castle had shown him. “I’m just worried about people talking about it too much and letting it slip to someone they shouldn’t. Both the group itself, and the room in particular. They need to stay secret.”

Snape looked like he would very much like to go and investigate the Room of Requirement for himself. “Will any Slytherins be involved?”

“Some will,” Harry assured. “Some would like to but can’t, like Draco. But hopefully enough will join that they can take what they learn and teach it to those who can’t.” Blaise and Daphne would be able to pass on information to those who couldn’t be seen so publicly on Harry’s side.

The Slytherin’s lips pursed, something like approval in his eyes. “This is reckless, and very likely to get you expelled,” he pointed out evenly.

“I know, but I’m willing to take that risk.” If he could teach even a handful of students enough to protect themselves before Umbridge shut him down, it would be worth it.

“Just like your bloody mother,” Snape grumbled, making Harry beam. That was the biggest compliment the man could offer him, and they both knew it. “There’s a spell — more of a ritual, really. A combination of incantation and potion, soaked into a piece of parchment; it’s borderline dark, used by old families to keep contracts secure. Anyone who signs the parchment will not be able to discuss the contents of the parchment with anyone whose name is not also present.”

“What will it do to them if they try?” Harry asked warily, not wanting to cause any pain or potential disfigurement. He’d heard all sorts of horror stories from Sirius about magical contract breach.

“Wipe their memory of everything related to the terms of the contract. They won’t remember what they signed, who else signed it, any of the details — if yours is regarding your meetings, they won’t remember attending any once they break their oath.”

Harry shuddered, imagining having a huge chunk of his memory just gone. “Bit drastic.”

“Need I remind you what you are risking?” Snape pointed out sharply. “I believe that is far more reasonable a consequence than what Umbridge will do to you if you are discovered.”

“Fair point,” Harry conceded. “And I suppose if everyone’s trustworthy, it won’t be a problem.” If Snape was suggesting it, it was likely the best option. “Is it magic I can do under school wards?” The last thing he wanted was Dumbledore finding out.

“No. Give me ten days to brew the potion, and I’ll do the magic for you at home. The contract will need to be written before it’s soaked, so make sure you have everything covered.”

Harry grinned; even Snape thought of Seren Du as home, by now. “I can handle that, after all the laws I’ve read for Susan.” He was pretty confident he could write a contract without any loopholes.

“Then bring me the contract on Saturday. I’ll take care of the rest,” Snape assured, before pinching the bridge of his nose in frustration. “I’m not sure if Remus will be proud or disappointed that I’m aiding in your rule-breaking.”

A laugh burst from Harry’s throat. “It’s to piss off Umbridge, he’ll be delighted.” Sirius, too, would think it a fantastic idea.

Snape didn’t look entirely convinced, but he agreed all the same, then sent Harry off to Transfiguration, warning him to stay out of trouble for the next week.

“Really, it’s like he’s never met me,” Harry murmured to himself with a shake of his head, hands in his pockets as he walked. He couldn’t keep the grin off his face — his plan was all coming together.

. . .

Sadly, his good mood only lasted as far as the end of lessons. After Herbology, Harry was walking across the grounds back to the castle with Neville and Hannah when a small white blob appeared in the sky, moving jerkily in Harry’s direction. Harry froze, heart leaping to his throat — it was Hedwig, and she was hurt.

The snowy owl flew awkwardly towards him, one wing set at a strange angle, a crumpled letter tight in her grasp. Instead of landing on Harry’s outstretched arm, she missed, flying with a soft thump straight into his chest.

“Sweet Helga!” Hannah exclaimed, hand flying to her mouth. “Is that your owl?”

“Is she okay?” Neville asked urgently. Harry ran gentle fingers over the malformed wing, heart clenching when Hedwig flinched visibly.

“I don’t know. I think it might be broken.” He eased the letter out of her claws. It was a thick one, still sealed, though that didn’t mean much with magic. When he looked, there was blood speckling the envelope. Panic flooded him — but there was no blood matting Hedwig’s white feathers.

There was, however, blood on her talons.

“I need to get her to Grubbly-Plank,” Harry said, looking up in the direction of Hagrid’s cabin. The woman may teach outside, but she lived in the castle, as far as he knew. To his relief, he could see her walking up from the edge of the forest.

Not waiting for Neville and Hannah, Harry tore off in her direction. “Professor! Professor!” She turned at his call, brow furrowing.

“Potter? What is it? What’ve you got there?”

"It's my owl, Professor." He skidded to a halt in front of her. "She's hurt. Her wing—"

"Yes, I see." Grubbly-Plank's frown deepened, and she studied Hedwig carefully. "Looks like she's been attacked. Odd; the animals around here are used to owls, they tend to leave them alone. Especially a larger one like this."

Harry could think of one thing that might have reason to attack Hedwig, and it wasn't an animal. "Can you help her?"

"I should be able to get her back to rights, if you leave her with me for a few days," the professor assured. "Seems like a fairly straightforward wing dislocation."

That sounded painful, and Harry stroked Hedwig's head. She cooed feebly, butting into his hand. "You'll be alright, girl," he promised, carefully handing her over to Grubbly-Plank, careful not to touch her damaged wing. Her eyes were sad, and it broke his heart. "It'll all be better soon."

"I'll take good care of her, Potter," Grubbly-Plank assured, her usually brusque manner softening in the face of his care for the owl.

"Thank you, Professor. She's— Hedwig means a lot to me." She was his very first friend in the world. He wasn't sure what he'd do without her.

Grubbly-Plank nodded in assurance, then set off towards the castle at a brisk pace; hopefully to take Hedwig somewhere to set her wing. Harry watched her go, feeling like she was taking part of him with her.

He wished Hagrid would come back. Grubbly-Plank was perfectly competent, he was sure, but... Hagrid was the one who had given him Hedwig in the first place. He knew how important she was.

He looked down at the crumpled letter in his hands. It was Bill's writing, on the front. Perhaps that was why the letter was still unopened; the curse-breaker took privacy very seriously. His magic was all over the parchment, though it dissipated when Harry broke the seal.

There were four pieces of parchment inside. Bill, Charlie, Tonks and Fleur. Harry's stomach churned.

Thank Merlin Bill had warded the letter — that particular combination of people, all coming from the same place, could have been very suspect. That was before he even got to the potential contents of the letters.

He pocketed them, jogging back towards Neville and Hannah, his heart heavy.

If Umbridge had damaged Hedwig in any kind of permanent way, Harry would end her.

.-.-.-.

Remus sipped at the large mug of hot chocolate Ceri had given him, smiling at the sight of Sirius sprawled in front of the fire. It was a rare evening they could both get away, and they were making the most of it.

Suddenly, Sirius tensed. "Snape's here," he announced, scrambling into a sitting position. Remus' eyes widened, but before he could ask further, the living room door opened and the man himself strode in. He was still dressed in his teaching robes, obviously come straight from dinner.

"What's happened?" Remus asked, fearing the worst. Severus rarely left the castle on weekdays, just in case he was needed.

"That brat," the Slytherin declared, and Remus let himself relax; he sounded annoyed, not worried or angry, that was okay.

On the floor, Sirius snorted. "What's he done now?"

Severus sank down on the sofa beside Remus, waving off the offer of a sip of hot chocolate. "Your godson," he told the pair of them, dark eyes narrowed, "has decided, at the behest of his peers, to begin teaching his own underground Defence Against the Dark Arts club. Apparently, several of his year mates worried about their ability to pass their OWLs under Umbridge's instruction — and their ability to face what may greet them outside of Hogwarts' walls."

A slow grin crossed Remus' lips; there was pride in that tone, buried under annoyance, and dare he say it, even fondness. Severus couldn't fool him, not for a second.

"That's my boy!" Sirius crowed in delight. Gently, Remus bumped his shoulder against Severus'.

"I think you've got at least some claim to his actions, after the last two summers." Severus had put in more time instructing Harry than either him or Sirius combined. No doubt it was that knowledge which gave Harry the confidence to teach his peers.

"Absolutely not," Severus groused. "I've got enough on my plate with Draco deciding to date the bloody Chosen One right under the Dark Lord's nose. Potter is all your responsibility."

But the fondness was still there — Sirius might not recognise it, but Remus did, and it made something warm settle in his chest. Hiding his smile with his mug, he leaned against Severus' side. Having him close in the middle of the week was a nice surprise, one he would take full advantage of, no matter how many childish faces Sirius pulled.

"If you say so," he placated, pressing a brief kiss to the Slytherin's sharp jaw. "Tell us what our boy has got himself into now, then."

Severus could deny it all he wanted, but he couldn't hide it from his partner. Harry was as much his as he was Remus', by now. And that was exactly how it should be.

Chapter 54

Chapter Notes

The boys are getting bolder ;) And things are starting to get a little more interesting~

October had arrived by the time the contract was ready to be signed. Miraculously, Harry managed to stay entirely detention-free for the whole two weeks — Umbridge had seemingly gotten bored of trying to provoke him in class, instead letting them sit and mindlessly read a chapter at a time of Slinkhard's book. All of them wondered what she would do when they ran out of chapters.

Hedwig had made a full recovery, and Harry was now sending his letters to Grimmauld Place by Ceri, who would pass them on to Remus. The others seemed confused at first, but after a quick lie about Harry befriending a Hogwarts house elf — entirely believable, after the Dobby situation — they quickly accepted this new, more secure form of communication. Not that they had much of importance to talk about; Bill and his team were still working on the horcrux situation, and he and Charlie were quietly preparing to take over their family seats, but no one wanted to make any drastic moves with Umbridge so firmly ensconced in Hogwarts. They were wary of causing Fudge to have a complete breakdown and do something he couldn't take back.

Still, it was nice to hear about the more mundane things; Bill and Fleur's relationship, Charlie's dragons. He was getting to know Tonks better, too, through letters. She had a similar sort of humour to Sirius, though the Hufflepuff in her definitely shone through. She was dating someone as well, but Harry had yet to figure it out, and Tonks was taking far too much joy in keeping it secret.

His letter from Viktor returned, not on the school owl, but on the razor-clawed hunting falcon that was the Bulgarian's personal mail carrier. He mentioned having heard from Fleur that Harry had mail difficulties, and promised his falcon would not let anyone steal his burden. Looking at the bird's wickedly sharp beak, Harry almost hoped Umbridge would try.

Still, though school seemed to be business as usual — Umbridge's attempts at control aside — word spread very discreetly around certain people, and on the first Hogsmeade weekend of the year, Harry was up early and sneaking across the dew-soaked grass to a clearing just inside the tree-line of the Forbidden Forest, where Hagrid used to teach lessons that required a bit of tree coverage. He was under his invisibility cloak, with Neville pressed close behind him.

Harry could have called everyone to gather at the Room of Requirement, but he didn't want to reveal the secret of the room until everyone had signed the contract. So, after a little brainstorming with his friends, the forest had been decided as their best bet for a meeting.

He hadn't expected there to be quite so many people.

He and Neville ditched the cloak once they were covered by the trees, circling round to approach from a different angle. A few people were already there, but more were appearing in drips and drabs — the heirs, of course; Ginny, with Michael Corner, Terry Boot and Mandy Brocklehurst; the rest of the Gryffindor quidditch team; Cho, with a couple of Ravenclaw friends, closely followed by Cedric's three Hufflepuff dorm-mates; the Creevey brothers; Luna, surprisingly accompanied by a couple of Slytherin fourth-years. More and more people began to arrive, and by the time the flow of students stopped, Harry counted nearly forty of them.

Merlin.

He cleared his throat, suddenly nervous. Beside him, Neville gave a discreet thumbs-up.
"Right, then. Thanks for coming, everyone; I promise I'll make it quick. You all know why we're here, I assume."

A crowd of faces grinned back at him. "To show Umbridge who's boss!" one person chirped, earning several whoops.

"To learn to fight You-Know-Who and his followers," Luna called out. A prominent silence followed.

"Yes, to both of those things," Harry said, heart hammering against his ribs. "I won't claim to be an expert, and I honestly don't care if you think I'm mad or not. If you're here for some war stories, you can bugger off."

"Why should we believe you if you won't tell us what happened?"

It took a second for Harry to locate the owner of that voice; one of the three Hufflepuff fifth year boys that Harry didn't really interact with, Zacharias Smith. The blond was sneering at Harry, looking skeptical.

"I never said I won't tell you, I said I'm not here to share stories right now," Harry retorted irritably. "Quite frankly, I don't fancy standing around in this forest any longer than I have to be. The acromantulas don't like me."

There were a few weak giggles from people who thought he was joking, and wary glances at the forest proper from the rest. "Voldemort is back. That's a fact; whether you believe it or not, it won't change. I don't know what he's up to right now, but just because he's been quiet for all of a few months doesn't mean he'll stay that way. War is coming, and we'll need all the capable wands we can get."

He noticed a few wary glances directed at the small cluster of Slytherins in the group, and it made him huff. "If you believe someone's house is an indicator of their moral alignment, leave now. The Slytherins are here on my invitation. I trust them — if that's not good enough for you, that's not my problem." Blaise flashed a smile his way. Harry felt a pang of regret in his chest, that Draco couldn't be stood with him.

"I can't guarantee anything. I've not even taken my OWLs yet, so I can't promise you'll pass them. But we can all agree that sitting around reading bloody Slinkhard books while Umbridge tells us to shut up and trust Fudge isn't going to get anyone very far."

"Hear, hear!" George crowed.

"I've faced Voldemort, in some form or another, four times, and lived to tell the tale. Which I will do, sometime when I'm not taking up valuable Hogsmeade time. I can't promise I can teach you to fight him, but I can teach you everything I do know. I can tell you what it's like to stare death in the face, but I can't show you how it feels. But, if you work hard, then you should know enough spells to hopefully come out the other side the first time you discover what it feels like for yourself."

His voice was hard, and every single person in the crowd was captivated. "This has to be secret. Umbridge can't hear about what we're doing here. None of the teachers can." He reached into his jacket pocket, pulling out the roll of spelled parchment. "Everyone who wants to learn needs to sign this, before I tell you where we're going to meet. It'll help us keep the secret. You won't like what happens to you if you try and spill the beans, once you've signed."

That sent a wave of unease through the crowd. "I won't force you, but I also won't teach you if you don't. I'll be expelled if Umbridge knows I'm doing this, or worse. I refuse to put my neck out for anyone who doesn't trust me."

"I'll sign," Susan called out, stepping forward. Harry transfigured a branch into a short, somewhat stubby-looking table. As soon as he set the contract down on it, Susan pulled a quill from her bag. Naturally, she read the contract carefully, but by the end of it she was scrawling her name with a flourish. "Nicely worded, Harry," she complimented, making him grin.

Right behind her, Neville signed, not even bothering to read the contract — which made sense, since he'd helped Harry write it.

The twins were next, and they too didn't stop to read it. When Harry raised an eyebrow, they grinned at him. "We trust you!" they declared in unison, George passing his quill to Lee so he could sign too.

One by one, every single one of them signed their name on the contract — even Zacharias Smith, though he made a face as he did so. Once the last person had signed, Harry reached for it.

"Hang on, Potter; you didn't sign it," Zacharias called. Harry resisted the urge to roll his eyes — who had brought him??

"If we want to add any future members, I need to be able to tell them about it, don't I?" he pointed out patiently. "All the rest of you will be able to do is tell them to come talk to me. Besides, I'm the one with most to lose out of this; I'm not likely to go to Umbridge about it."

“Don’t be a tosser, Smith,” Fred complained. “We’ve got to have one person able to talk about the group, as a failsafe.”

“In case someone hexes your scrawny arse to smithereens and we need to ask Pomfrey to put you back together again,” George added, eyes alight. Smith paled, gulping.

“Right. Of course. Yeah.”

No one else seemed to have a problem, so Harry pocketed the contract, planning on getting it somewhere safe as soon as possible. “Great. First meeting will be Thursday at seven. Meet on the seventh floor, the door opposite the tapestry of the trolls doing ballet.”

Several people exchanged dubious glances. “Harry, there isn’t a door opposite that tapestry,” Cho pointed out in her quiet Scottish burr. Harry smirked.

“There will be.”

.-.

The meeting ended without fanfare, everyone keen to get down to Hogsmeade and enjoy the remainder of their weekend. Harry walked along the forest’s edge with Neville and Luna, headed in the direction of the village.

“That went well, I think,” he said, once they were out of earshot of the rest.

“You were great, Harry,” Neville enthused, clapping him on the back. “I can’t wait to see this room of yours.”

Harry hadn’t taken Neville to the Room of Requirement yet, wanting his friend to be as surprised as everyone else. “It’s brilliant, you’ll love it.” And that reminded him. “Thanks for the tip, by the way, Luna.”

She smiled back dreamily, bobbing her head. “Glad I could help.”

Neville looked at them both in confusion, but didn’t question it. Perhaps he’d forgotten about that conversation, weeks ago now. Or perhaps he, too, knew what it was like to feel the castle’s magic.

.-.-.

That evening after curfew, Harry was slipping into an empty classroom on the third floor — empty, that was, aside from a lone Slytherin.

Draco smiled at him, beckoning him over for a kiss. “How did your secret rebellion meeting go, then?” he asked, only a little mulish. Harry kissed him a second time.

“Don’t be jealous,” he teased. “It went well, actually. Everyone who showed up signed the contract.” Draco was the only one who knew the truth of the contract; even Neville didn’t know what it would do, just that it was enchanted.

“Good. With any luck, that’ll keep Umbridge out of it. And Dumbledore.” The headmaster would probably be a fan of going against the Ministry, but he wouldn’t like the Slytherin inclusion — nor would he like that Harry was in charge. Another rebellion from his Golden Boy, after all.

“Dumbledore has hardly even looked at me all term,” Harry remarked with a shrug. “Starting to wonder if he’s actually feeling threatened by Umbridge.” After the way Harry had acted in the summer, and his continued spurning of Ron and Hermione, Harry thought for sure the headmaster would try and lure him back onto the ‘correct’ path sometime soon. But, on the contrary, the old man was practically ignoring Harry!

“Don’t look a gift horse in the mouth,” Draco said, and Harry hummed in agreement. “So who showed up? How many Slytherins did you have?” He gently shoved Harry into a chair as he peppered him with questions, and Harry chuckled.

“Way more people than I expected. And again, more than expected. Blaise and Daphne were the only ones from our year, but there were some younger ones.” None of the sixth or seventh year Slytherins were secure enough to do something as bold as support Harry Potter, even if they might have wanted to.

“What are you going to teach them first?”

“Disarming charms, and Shield charms. Start with the basics,” Harry said. His first lesson curriculum was already mostly-planned in his head. He didn’t want to start out with anything too intimidating or difficult, especially since there were third years in the mix. Besides, for all Umbridge’s hateful poison, she was right about one thing; their DADA education had been inconsistent at best. Knowledge was likely to be patchy, and Harry wanted to see where everyone was at before he started delving into the more dangerous magic.

“Oh. That’s boring,” Draco pouted. Harry couldn’t resist kissing the pushed-out lip, nipping at it playfully.

“Sorry I’m not going straight into teaching them spell-chains,” he teased. “Got to make sure they won’t curse their own eyebrows off, first.”

Draco hummed, shuffling his chair closer. “You’ll let me know when you start on the more... interesting magic, of course?”

“Promise,” Harry assured, squeezing his knee. “You might not be able to come to meetings, but I’ll keep you in the loop.” Green eyes darkened. “Just means I’ll have to go over it with you, privately.”

“Ooh, one-on-one lessons,” Draco drawled, leaning forward with dancing eyes. “Will there be rewards for hard work, Professor? ”

The breathy purr sent a pulse of want straight through Harry’s core, and he swallowed as his throat suddenly became dry. “You’re the prefect, of the two of us,” he pointed out, a little hoarse. “You’re the one who can give house points. I suppose I’ll have to think up something else, instead.”

Draco moved quickly, sliding off his chair and straddling Harry's lap. The chair groaned ominously under the weight of both of them, but held, and Harry let his hands fall to the blond's hips. "Careful you don't tip us back," Harry warned. "You'll have a hell of a time explaining to Pomfrey why you found me in a classroom with my skull split open at this time of night."

Draco scoffed, threading his fingers through Harry's hair, cradling the back of his skull gently. "Have a little faith, Scarhead," he murmured. "There's spells for that sort of thing."

Arching up for a kiss, Harry hummed, shoulders relaxing with the pleasure that flooded him. All the day's stress, the anxiety about the meeting; it all melted away when Draco kissed him.

His hands started to wander; first up the blond's firm chest, then down, settling on his thighs, fingers teasing at the inside seam of his trousers. Draco let out a strangled whimper when Harry's fingertips danced too close to the bulge pressing against his fly. "Don't tease, Potter," he gasped. Harry, suddenly feeling bold, looked up to meet lust-blown eyes.

"Not teasing," he assured, heart pounding. "Can I...?" He let his fingers move to the buckle of Draco's belt, his intentions clear.

The Slytherin sucked in a sharp breath, going tense.

"We don't have to," Harry hurried to say, moving his hands back. "No pressure. But if you want it, I'd—" He was cut off by lips pressing firmly to his. Then;

"Please."

He swallowed hard. Okay, then.

He unhooked the belt buckle, and slowly, with shaking hands, undid each button of the boy's fly. His trousers parted, revealing grey silk underwear, tented in a very obvious way, a growing wet spot on the front.

Harry could hardly breathe as he reached with reverent fingers, peeling down the waistband. Draco shifted to assist, until his underwear and trousers were pushed down to mid-thigh, his cock standing proudly at attention between their stomachs.

A quiet, keening noise wrenched from Harry's throat. He'd never seen an erection other than his own before, and the illustrations in the book George gave him. He hadn't expected to be so painfully aroused just by the sight of it. Slowly, he wrapped his hand around the hot length, giving it an experimental squeeze. Draco's breath hitched, his hands tightening on Harry's shoulders.

"Potter, I swear to fuck," he bit out, face absolutely wrecked, lips swollen from Harry's earlier attention. He was beautifully flushed, and not for the first time Harry was hit by how fucking lucky he was to call this boy his.

Using a handy bit of silent, wandless magic to lubricate his palm, Harry got to work, determined to bring Draco to pieces.

Harry's own hardness was pressing against the fly of his jeans, against the inner curve of Draco's thigh — but he didn't care about himself, not when Draco was right there, sat in his lap, giving tiny bucks of his hips in time with Harry's hand movements. His head was thrown back, quiet moans falling from his lips, one hand gripping Harry's shoulder for dear life while the other tangled in his hair, just the right side of painful.

"Ohh," Draco sighed, lurching forward for a fierce kiss. "Come on, Harry. Faster."

Harry did as bid, glancing down in fascination to watch the reddened head of Draco's cock beneath his fingers. It was so different to doing this to himself, in the privacy of his four-poster bed.

For a moment, he got a mental image of Draco splayed out on Gryffindor-red sheets, naked and flushed and Harry's, and he almost came in his own jeans. He moved his hand faster, trying to figure out what made Draco moan louder, loving the tiny sounds he made with every thrust into Harry's palm.

"Fuck, close," was all the warning Harry got, before suddenly Draco's spine arched and he came with a shout, spurting hot over Harry's hand and both their laps. As he did, he pressed down hard in Harry's lap, and Harry was gone, sparks exploding behind his eyelids as he followed his boyfriend into orgasm.

And then the chair broke.

Only an instinctive wandless Cushioning charm saved Harry a very painful landing, as the legs of the old chair gave out, sending them both tipping backwards to the stone floor. Harry ended up on his back, Draco sprawled on top of him, his spent cock and the sticky mess pinned between them.

Harry looked up, meeting Draco's bewildered grey eyes, still hazy with lust. A beat, and they both burst out laughing. "Fucking Merlin," Draco groaned, shaking his head. "That's not how I wanted that to go."

"At least it happened after you came," Harry pointed out, blushing as he looked down at the mess of his hand, and both their shirts.

The pink flush rose on Draco's cheeks again. "Yeah. That was... thank you." He kissed Harry softly, suddenly shy. "Do you want me to..."

"No need," Harry assured. Draco frowned.

"Yeah, s'pose the chair was a bit of a mood killer."

Cheeks hot, Harry shook his head. "No — well, yes, but — I, uh, already. When you did. I." He stuttered helplessly, while Draco was wide-eyed.

“You... Just from me...?” Harry nodded. “Wow. Okay.” The Gryffindor ducked his head, but Draco caught him by the chin, kissing him again. “I’ll just have to do you next time, then.” Those words sent a shiver down Harry’s spine, his teenage libido making a valiant attempt at starting a second go already.

“Only if you want to,” he insisted all the same. “I did that because I wanted it, not because I expected anything in return.”

“Yes, but seeing as you enjoyed it so much,” Draco drawled, gaze intent, “I’d quite like to see what all the fuss is about.”

“Oh.” Well. That was alright, then.

As sticky became unpleasant, Harry did a Cleaning charm on the pair of them, helping Draco right his clothing. They stayed where they were, sprawled on the floor, Harry gazing up adoringly at Draco. But the moment was gone, and both of them burst into giggles.

“Can’t believe we broke the fucking chair,” Harry spluttered, laughing into the curve of Draco’s throat. The blond snorted in a very undignified manner that he’d never allow in front of anyone other than Harry.

“Thank Merlin for Silencing charms, is all I can say,” he replied. “That crash would’ve woken half the castle.”

Harry winced — yes, thank Merlin for Silencing charms, indeed.

.-.-.-.

Harry hated Mondays.

Not only because his class schedule on a Monday was positively soul destroying, but Umbridge always seemed to drop a new bombshell on a Monday morning. This was no exception; a new Educational Decree was posted on the notice board in every common room, declaring that all extra-curricular clubs, teams and societies required permission from the High Inquisitor to continue. Reading it made Harry’s heart stop.

“She knows,” he murmured, dread filling his voice. Ginny shook her head.

“She can’t. It’s too soon.” Harry raised a pointed brow. “Maybe she overheard someone talking about the meeting in the forest; someone who didn’t go. Not everyone who was told about the idea actually showed up.”

Harry could hardly fathom there being more people who might have liked the idea, but he would take Ginny’s word for it.

“We’ll see.” If someone who had signed the contract had talked, he would know soon.

A few people sent him worried looks at breakfast, their questions clear, but Harry just tilted his head in the barest of nods; they were still on. Umbridge might have banned them, but she couldn’t catch them.

“This is awful!” Angelina moaned, head in her hands.

“We’ll be fine, Angie. She won’t find our practice room,” Harry assured, surprised she was so wound up about the defence club. She looked up, gaze furious.

“I don’t care about that! Quidditch, Harry! The notice said all teams needed permission.”

Harry’s jaw dropped. “What? But— that’s ridiculous! She can’t ban us from quidditch!”

“She can, and she will, so don’t you dare do anything else to upset her, alright? No more detentions.” The look in her eye was every bit as ferocious as Oliver Wood had been in his captaincy, and Harry nodded quickly.

“Yes, captain,” he said obediently.

“Good boy.” Then she was off, no doubt hunting down Fred and George to warn them of the same; they’d pulled a few pranks on Umbridge, and Harry knew they’d earned a detention each for it — he’d taught them the spells to heal their hands.

First the house tables, now the clubs; Harry wasn’t beginning to wonder if Dumbledore and the Ministry had more in common than any of them thought.

.-. .

History of Magic went by Umbridge-free, which Harry was actually quite disappointed by. It would have been amusing, watching Umbridge try and interrogate the ghost professor, while Binns blithely continued lecturing, entirely unaware what year it was or that he was even deceased. Truthfully, if there was one professor he’d support Umbridge getting rid of, it was that one.

Things got interesting in Potions, though. When the Gryffindor contingent arrived at the classroom, Draco was outside, bragging about how easily the Slytherin team was given permission to continue playing. Several loud remarks about whether the Gryffindors would be so lucky made it easy for Harry to bare his teeth and snarl, continuing their public vendetta.

It was good that there were so many other things going on this year, or someone might have noticed that Harry Potter and Draco Malfoy really weren’t trying as hard to fight each other as they usually did.

Snape interrupted their posturing, docking Gryffindor points and urging them all into the classroom. He looked extra surly, and Harry realised why as soon as he sat at his bench.

Umbridge was in the corner, perched on a stool, ever-present clipboard balanced on her knees.

“Oh, blimey,” Neville yelped under his breath.

“Why is she always in our classes? Doesn’t she have her own to teach?” Harry remarked in a whisper. He’d only heard of two other occasions Umbridge had inspected a class that was not one of his. Was she really so desperate to see him fail, that she was stalking him around his lessons?

She was starting to replace Fake-Moody as ‘creepiest DADA professor’ in Harry’s mental ranking.

“As you can see, we have a guest this morning,” Snape drawled, and Harry was sure only he and Draco saw the well-hidden contempt in the man’s gaze as he looked at Umbridge.

It was going to be one hell of a lesson.

Despite straining his ears to try and hear Umbridge questioning Snape, Harry did his best to try and brew his Strengthening Solution properly, as well as keep an eye on Neville. Admittedly, the other Gryffindor was getting better in Potions with Harry’s quiet encouragement, but the nerves of having both Snape and Umbridge observing the lesson were clearly throwing him off.

Harry just hoped Snape wasn’t feeling extra vindictive towards him. A few times, the Slytherin had vanished Harry’s perfectly good potion for some perceived flaw, giving him a zero for the class — and, in private, offering a proper criticism and grade. It was necessary to keep up the public animosity, and as it wouldn’t mess with Harry’s OWL grade he didn’t really care, but— he really hoped Snape didn’t do that in front of Umbridge. If the man could offer no other support, he could at least do that.

Umbridge seemed very interested in what Snape did before teaching, as if he were going to respond to her prying with a blow-by-blow recount of his Death Eater days. All it did was give him the chance to quietly brag about being the youngest Potions Master in a century, sneer at her for questioning his curriculum, and offer for her to direct her complaints at the ICW if she wished to change what appeared on the OWL exam syllabus. Through it all, Harry was trying his best to hold in his laughter. Snape was having far too much fun tearing Umbridge to pieces.

Perhaps a pensieve memory of the class could be his Christmas present to Remus.

“Despite applying for the Defence Against the Dark Arts position every year, you have been refused the appointment repeatedly. Do you care to suggest why Professor Dumbledore will not allow you the position?”

Someone from the Slytherin side of the room sucked in a sharp breath; Harry wasn’t the only one eavesdropping.

“I suggest you ask him yourself,” Snape drawled, unperturbed. “Though I would imagine it has something to do with the lack of suitably qualified Potions Masters in Britain. Defence Against the Dark Arts is a much more... forgiving subject to teach.”

Umbridge smiled, a little confused, like she wasn’t sure if she’d just been complimented or insulted. Harry couldn’t breathe, he was so close to laughing.

When it came time for Umbridge to speak to the students about the teacher under inspection, the pink-clad woman paused, eyeing the class, considering her dilemma.

Did she speak to the Slytherins, who would only sing the praises of their Housemaster? Or did she go to the Gryffindors, and risk further infuriating the one teacher in the school who seemed to hate Harry Potter as much as she did?

Harry was not surprised when she chose the Slytherin side of the room, quietly sidling up to Pansy.

Snape passed their desk, sneering at the bubbling tar-like substance in Neville's cauldron, before surveying the oily grey substance in Harry's; an entirely adequate Strengthening Solution, ready to cool. Harry looked up at him imploringly, mentally begging him not to vanish it.

A long moment passed, before Snape simply huffed. "You will have to do better than that, Mr Potter, if you want even a chance of a passing OWL grade. And five points from Gryffindor for interfering with Longbottom's work."

Harry just nodded; that was as much as he could hope for, under the circumstances.

.-.

With Gryffindor quidditch practice cancelled while Umbridge considered things, Harry found himself at a loose end for the evening. He had homework, of course, but the idea of going and sitting in the common room to try and do it made his head pound. Gryffindor territory was not exactly conducive to focus and learning.

Just as he was mentally debating between the library or an abandoned classroom, Hannah appeared, tugging on his sleeve. "Come study with us," she urged. He raised an eyebrow, and she smiled. "Actual studying. It's been a while."

She had a point, and when Harry entered their usual empty classroom — now warded to the gills, to keep Umbridge out — most of the heirs were gathered, their books spread out over the desks, clustered by subject. Neville was already there, getting Divination help from Parvati, who seemed to take Trelawney's probation as a personal call to make sure every one of them got as high a grade as possible.

It was nice, not having the conversation be about Umbridge, or the Wizengamot, or anything serious — just all of them studying together, like they had last year.

"Hey, does anyone mind if I put my Wireless on?" Harry asked, pulling the device from his bag. "Not too loud, I swear. But Puddlemere are playing." Their keeper had been injured in the last game, and while reports said he was fine to play, Harry was quietly hoping Oliver might get subbed on. His ex-captain hadn't taken to the field yet this season, but from the chatter going on, the Puddlemere main keeper wasn't quite up to scratch, and there was a chance Oliver could make his way to the main team for good, if he played well when he was able.

"Hey, set it up over here," Cassius urged, making room on his side of the table for Harry to join him. No one seemed to object, so Harry did, tuning the Wireless to the right station and pulling out his DADA homework. It was just the kind of mindless drivel he could complete while listening to quidditch.

"It's Puddlemere United versus the Ballycastle Bats, and the snitch is off!"

The quiet commentary was soothing as he worked; much nicer than the chaos of Gryffindor Tower. Puddlemere were playing well, too. At least to start, they were.

"Perkins shoots, and — oh, that's a nasty hit! Puddlemere keeper Nicholas Hornby takes a bludger to the side right as Perkins scores another for the Bats. Puddlemere's captain has called for a time out; Hornby is not a pretty sight, ladies and gents, and — yes, that's it, with a round of quite spectacular projectile vomiting, Hornby is escorted from the pitch by the medics. On flies Oliver Wood, heading to goals, and play is resumed."

Harry straightened up, essay abandoned in favour of the quidditch. Beside him, Cassius' quill had gone still, the Slytherin's head cocked intently towards the Wireless.

"Bats are in fine form tonight, but Puddlemere are not taking it lying down. Puddlemere chasers have possession, heading it up the pitch — and Perkins steals the quaffle! She's headed for another goal, tearing down the pitch, passes to Gladwell, back to Perkins — what a spectacular block from reserve keeper Oliver Wood! Puddlemere back in possession."

"Yes, Ollie!" Cassius hissed quietly, the faintest grin tugging at his lips. Harry eyed him strangely.

"You and Oliver kept in touch?" he asked, keeping his voice pitched low so as not to disturb the others. Cassius' eyes widened, and the faintest blush touched his olive cheeks.

"Some," he dismissed evasively. "But I was a Puddlemere fan before he signed with them."

That didn't quite excuse Cassius' excitement at Oliver specifically — nor the tiny, pleased smile he got when the commentators talked about how well Oliver was performing for his first game of the season.

Harry continued to watch him, suspicion growing.

Interesting.

. . .

His evenings blessedly free of detention, and less-blessedly free of quidditch practice, Harry decided to undertake a little adventure that had been lingering in the back of his mind since before he'd discovered the Room of Requirement.

Invisibility cloak and Marauder's Map in use, Harry left the Tower after curfew, and headed for the second floor.

If Myrtle was present in her bathroom, she didn't pop out to say hello, even when Harry removed his cloak. He wasn't sad about that — it meant there was no witnesses when he stared at the tiny snake engraved on the tap, and hissed. "Open."

The yawning entrance to the Chamber of Secrets revealed itself. The blast of stale, decaying air made Harry wrinkle his nose, directing a Cleaning charm at the pipe.

Without delay, he clambered over the edge, and slid down.

The first section of the Chamber was just as disgusting as Harry remembered, littered with small animal skeletons and scraps of snakeskin. Performing a Bubblehead charm on himself to keep out the smell, Harry forged onwards, pushing past the insistent press of memories from his second year.

The hole that he and Ron had dug for him and Ginny to escape through, in the pile of rubble caused by Lockhart's failed Obliviation, might have fit twelve year-old Harry but certainly would not fit fifteen year-old Harry. A flick of his wand and an astonishingly overpowered Repairing charm fixed that, the magic rushing eagerly through Harry, reminding him of how little opportunity he'd had to truly stretch his magical core.

That was why he was down here. Partly, anyway. He could have used the Room of Requirement, but... he wanted a place that was outside the student wards, where he could use as much magic as he wanted and not risk getting caught by the wrong person.

As he grew closer to adulthood, his magic grew stronger, his connection to his family magics much deeper. He was noticing it in classes; spells came easily, and if anything he was having to worry about them being overpowered rather than under. When conjuring in Charms, he'd almost conjured a dozen pillows instead of the requisite two. If Umbridge had allowed them to use spells in class, he likely would have had to worry about injuring one of his classmates.

And that's why he had to train. If he was going to be teaching his friends, he didn't want to hurt anyone. He wanted to grow his magical core, but he needed to control it.

His heart was beating hummingbird-quick when he stepped into the enormous main chamber, laying eyes on the basilisk for the first time in two and a half years.

It was... really quite large.

He hadn't had the chance to properly appreciate it back then, given the basilisk was trying to eat him, but it had to be at least sixty feet long. Harry edged closer, expecting the smell of rotting meat, frowning when it didn't hit his nostrils. The basilisk was astonishingly well preserved; he'd expected it to be little more than a pile of putrid flesh and sagging scales by now. Was it magic, keeping it in tact? Or something else? Something that clearly didn't work on all the rodents and other creatures that died in the bowels of the Chamber.

With a little cleaning and some proper lighting, the Chamber really could be very impressive. It was impressive already, but mostly in a creepy dungeon lair kind of way, with the pool of stagnant water in the corner, and the centuries of grime built up.

And the basilisk corpse. That wasn't great for the atmosphere.

Harry looked around the enormous room, at the huge statue of Salazar himself, still with his jaw wide open for the snake to pass through.

What was it all for?

Surely he hadn't built such a massive chamber just to house his pet snake and his own ego? Especially since the snake seemed to have a space of its own past the statue guardian.

It wasn't like he would be entertaining anyone down here; why make it the size of a grand ballroom?

Harry walked up to the walls, looking for any more markings, or signs. Mostly, he saw snakes. Snake-shaped torch holders on the walls, snakes carved into columns, snakes engraved on the walls. The man really, really liked snakes.

"Show me your secrets," he groaned — or he tried to, at least, but with his eyes on the snake carvings the words naturally came out in Parseltongue.

And the bricks in the wall began to move.

Rolling away from each other like the entrance to Diagon Alley, the wall soon revealed an arched entrance. Harry gaped, stepping inside.

It was an office. Clearly untouched for a very long time, though surprisingly dust-free. One wall was entirely bookshelves, while another held shelves of potions ingredients, jars of odd substances and labelled wooden boxes. An ornate wooden desk sat off to one side, while a small sitting area filled the other half of the office.

"Well, now," a voice hissed, making the hair on the back of Harry's neck stand on end. "It's been quite some time since I had a visitor. Who might you be, then?"

Slowly, Harry turned, until he was facing an enormous portrait on one wall.

A portrait of a man who looked an awful lot like Salazar Slytherin himself.

Chapter 55

Chapter Notes

Here we are at the halfway point! Still plenty more fic to come~

Harry's jaw dropped, and he continued to stare at the portrait. The man, dressed in a very old-fashioned dark green robe, with long black hair and skin much the same shade as Harry's, crossed his arms over his narrow chest and stared back.

"Are you daft, lad?"

He was speaking Parseltongue. That shouldn't have been a surprise, given who it was, but Harry had only heard one person speak the language before and it was under very different circumstances.

"I'm sorry," he replied, having to look at the painted snake wrapped around Slytherin's shoulders to make sure he didn't speak English. "I wasn't expecting you. My name is Harry. Harry Potter." A pause. "I'm your heir."

"Potter, eh?" Slytherin said, raising one imperious eyebrow. "A strong family, good line. Though I don't recall our main lines combining — is it a recent tie? I confess, it's been so long since my last visitor, I rather thought the Slytherin line had died out."

A sudden, awful thought hit Harry. "When was your last visitor? Was it a boy named Tom Riddle?" Surely if Voldemort had found Salazar Slytherin himself, he wouldn't have left the portrait under the school. Nor all of these books, most of which looked as old as Hogwarts itself.

"Riddle? No, no. It was a Gaunt lad, I forget the first name. Quite some time ago, now. Seventeen-something, maybe early eighteen hundreds."

Harry wasn't ready for the punch of relief that hit him, his knees buckling for a moment.

"Should I know the name Tom Riddle? What year is it now, anyway?"

"Nineteen ninety-five," Harry relayed, watching the painted man's eyes widen. He swore, in a language that wasn't English but wasn't not English, shaking his head.

"Good lord. What happened? The knowledge is supposed to pass down the line!"

Harry gave a heavy sigh, Scourgifying the sofa before taking a seat.

He hadn't anticipated spending his evening relaying recent history to the thousand-year-old painting of Salazar Slytherin, and yet.

He was Harry Potter, after all.

.-.-.

It took over an hour, explaining to Slytherin what he knew — which, admittedly, wasn't much. He knew nothing of the original Slytherin line, just that it culminated in Tom Riddle, who was childless. That led to an explanation of how Harry had ended up the conquering heir of the Slytherin line, and everything that came after.

He'd never spoken so much continuous Parseltongue in his life before, and his lips and tongue felt weird by the time he finished. Slytherin's heavy brow was furrowed. "Well," he hissed eventually, stroking at the short black beard on his chin. He looked to be in his fifties or so; painted long before his death, evidently. "That is quite the tale. I can assure you, this Tom Riddle never found his way into my private office as you have."

Harry let out a breath of relief, then a startled laugh.

How arrogant of Riddle, to find this Chamber, and the basilisk, and think he had discovered everything.

"I, uh, I'm sorry I killed your snake," he said sheepishly. Slytherin's lips pursed.

"A tragic event, but necessary. It is a shame my poor girl ended up so lonely she could not recognise a true heir, but I do not blame you, child." Then he smiled, expression warm and entirely unlike anything Harry expected to see from the famed dark wizard.

He remembered what the goblins had told him before his third year, about how Salazar's father was the one who did the terrible magic, but history had confused the two. "I have so many questions," he admitted, running a hand through his hair.

"I would be happy to answer them for you, lad," Slytherin assured. "But perhaps another time. You have given me a lot to think about."

Harry looked at his watch, and winced at the late hour. "Yes, I should get back to Gryffindor Tower. But I will come back, when I can."

Slytherin chuckled. "To think, my heir, in Gryffindor!" He shook his head, amused. "Perhaps you making your home there is the most Slytherin act of all — a cunning man disguises himself in plain sight."

That was definitely a compliment, and Harry preened slightly.

"Speak to the snake on the wall three columns to the left of my office," Slytherin advised, "Behind it is a passage that will take you up towards Gryffindor Tower."

"There are multiple entrances?" Harry asked, surprised. "Other than the bathroom?"

Salazar sneered. “Of course! Did you truly think I would only have one entrance — and that it would be in a lavatory?” He looked entirely disgusted by the concept. “I built this chamber as the last defence for the students, should we become over-run with Witchfinders. There are entrances all over the castle, in case of emergency. If you look, you will notice the carvings. As my heir, Hogwarts will guide you.”

The words echoed in Harry’s head, a million questions sparking. The Chamber had been built for protection! Not as a secret lair to plot the death of all muggleborns. No wonder it was so large, if it was designed to house the whole population of Hogwarts through a siege. There had to be dozens of passages to explore!

But it was late, and he had to get back to bed. “Thank you. I’ll be back soon,” he promised, offering the painting a short bow on his way out. A quick hiss had the stone wall returning; there was no sign of the office entrance, but for the tiny snake scratched on the surface.

“Holy shit,” Harry muttered, wild-eyed. He had just had a conversation with Salazar Slytherin.

His body was tired, but his mind and magic were buzzing. He hadn’t done what he had come down to do, thanks to that unexpected detour. He needed to shed some energy, fast.

Harry looked around the room, at the dirt and detritus filling the expansive space.

He might not be able to do anything about the basilisk corpse, but he could practice his cleaning charms.

Twenty minutes and an exhaustive amount of magic later, Harry felt much calmer, and the Chamber was on its way to being habitable. It would take many more visits to get it properly clean, but Harry was pleased with his progress. Now it was time for bed, if he could possibly sleep with all the new information circling his brain.

Heading for the section of wall Slytherin had suggested, Harry hissed to the snake, and the passageway revealed itself.

Like with the main entrance in the bathroom, it sealed itself once Harry was through it. He was left in a pitch black stairwell, and quickly conjured a ball of light to float ahead of him.

There was certainly magic in the passageway, as the number of stairs did not equate to the actual distance between the Chamber and Gryffindor Tower. Sure enough, he emerged from a blank section of wall only a few feet to the left of the Fat Lady’s portrait. When he turned back to study it, safely covered by his invisibility cloak, there was the tiniest little snake scratched into the stone.

Well, then.

That was unexpected.

....

Harry thought about it for a long time, but ultimately he decided not to tell anyone about Slytherin's office. Not even Draco. Not yet, anyway — not until he'd had a bit more time to process things, and to investigate the room's contents. The way Slytherin had talked, it was supposed to be a room only for those of the Slytherin blood and family. He didn't want to risk upsetting the portrait by bringing a stranger to the office.

Besides that, he had bigger things to worry about — the first Defence Club meeting had arrived.

Harry arrived at the Room of Requirement a good twenty minutes early, determined to make sure everything was in place and ready. The doors offering passages to the house common rooms were there, he had plenty of cushions in case people got a little rough with their Disarming charms, and there was enough space for — hopefully — everyone to practice at the same time.

As the clock on the wall ticked closer to seven, the nerves started to rear their head. Harry paced anxiously, wand in hand, wishing he'd asked Neville or someone to come wait with him. Someone to calm him down, assure him he could handle it.

You'll be fine, Potter, his inner voice insisted, sounding remarkably like Draco. Thinking of the blond made Harry think of the last time they'd met up, and as such he had a slightly dazed smile on his face when the door opened and the first group of people arrived.

"Wow," Ginny said in awe, looking around the room. "This is brilliant, Harry!" She was not, as Harry might have expected, with Michael and the usual Ravenclaw entourage. Instead she was with Neville and Luna, who were both equally impressed.

Soon, Harry could hardly keep up with all the people flooding in, arriving in pairs and threes and hopefully having been discreet on their way up. They were all astounded by the room, murmuring about how they'd never seen anything like it in Hogwarts before.

"That door definitely didn't exist when I walked up here the other day," Cho remarked, making Harry grin.

"Sometimes if you ask nicely, Hogwarts provides," he replied in an appropriately mysterious tone.

At last, everyone was safely inside, and Harry shot a small firework from his wand to get their attention. "Right, then. Thanks for coming, everyone. I thought we'd start off with something simple today, just to get to know each other. How do you all feel about Disarming charms?"

There was a brief silence. Then, "What use is a Disarming charm against You-Know-Who?" Of course, Zacharias Smith had some opinions. Harry was going to find whoever invited that prick, and he was going to put itching powder in all of their school robes.

"It saved my life last June," Harry answered without missing a beat.

"It's a second year spell." Zacharias still wasn't impressed. Harry smirked, eyes flashing.

“Go on, then.”

The Hufflepuff froze. “What?”

“Disarm me,” Harry challenged. “It’s a second year spell. You’re a fifth year. Should be easy, right?”

Suddenly, Zacharias was not quite so confident. Harry heard the Weasley twins snigger.

“It might be basic, but there’s a reason it’s taught so early. If you can get your opponent’s wand away from them, you’ve ended the fight.” Unless they were capable of wandless magic, but that was fairly uncommon. “Of course, it’s a fairly easy spell to block, too, but it’s worth trying if you can get your opponent off guard.”

Everyone was listening intently, and Harry kept going. “Pair up, take turns disarming each other. If you find the spell itself easy, practice trying to block it, or resist it. It’s all a matter of willpower — someone else wants your wand, you want to keep your wand. You have to make your will stronger than their magic.” There were enough sixth and seventh years in the group that he expected at least some of the group would find this first lesson simple. “In a fight, your opponent isn’t going to wait for you to be ready before they start casting spells. They’re not going to politely take turns. You have to be ready to react to anything. It’s not just about knowing lots of spells, or complicated magic. That’s flashy competition stuff. I’m teaching you to survive a life or death, no rules, anything goes fight.”

Had Harry been watching himself, he would’ve realised how much he was channelling Severus Snape — which, considering Snape had been the one to teach him such things, only made sense. He was pacing in front of his gathered students, a serious look on his face. They needed to understand that real life was not like school.

“So give it a try, and we’ll see how it goes. Then, if it goes well, maybe I’ll tell you all about the time I disarmed Voldemort,” he added with a wink, sending a ripple of shock through the group.

He didn’t mind talking about bits and pieces of his past, if it helped people understand what was coming for them. What it was like to face the Dark. Besides, many of these people were Cedric’s friends, his classmates — they deserved a better explanation than the bullshit Dumbledore had given them.

He clapped his hands together, and immediately everyone scrambled into action.

.-

Harry was disappointed, but not surprised, to see how many people struggled with a simple Expelliarmus. Despite Zacharias Smith’s derision over the second year spell, it seemed many people had not brushed up on it in quite a while. Even the people who could successfully cast the charm were doing so with exaggerated wand movements or wide open weak spots, giving their opponent plenty of time to figure out what they were doing and respond in turn.

After observing for a few minutes, Harry shot up another firework, grabbing their attention. “Okay, not bad,” he said, rolling up his shirtsleeves. “But certainly room for improvement.” He surveyed the group, wondering who might be best for a little demonstration. “George, can I borrow you for a minute?”

The redhead grinned, happily strolling to face Harry. “I’m going to disarm you, and I want you to try and resist me.”

George nodded, face set determinedly. In an instant, Harry’s wand was raised, a spell was spoken — and George’s wand was flying into his hand. The redhead blinked, shocked. “Blimey, Harry.”

Harry couldn’t stifle his smirk as he handed the boy his wand back. “Did everyone see that?”

“See what? That was bloody quick!” Lee Jordan called out, to several nods of agreement. Harry’s smirk widened.

“Exactly. In here, you’re not trying to show off your perfect wand movements or your excellent pronunciation. Hell, if you can manage it, wordless magic is much better in a fight.” To demonstrate, he disarmed George silently; this time, the redhead just looked amused.

“You all know the proper form, that much is obvious. But you have to mean it. Intent goes a long way with magic. The stronger your intent, the less effort you need to put in with the movement and incantation. And the smaller your movement, the more you’ll keep your opponent off guard. They can’t defend against something they don’t see coming. And if a well-placed Expelliarmus is your first spell, it could well be the only one you need.”

He could see in their eyes, the slowly dawning understanding. He grinned. “Keep going. Anyone who finds it easy, do what you can to make it harder. Just watch out for the people around you.” The room might be big enough, but there was still risk of disaster from a wide-flying spell.

The room was soon full of shouted incantations, and Harry walked around the pairs of students, offering advice and corrections. “Try and bring that elbow in a bit tighter,” he said to Ernie, who was giving his wand an extra wide flourish when he cast. A few times, Harry would repeat the spell himself — slower than his instinct, but still quicker than most in the room — to show someone what it looked like.

Slowly, he began to see improvement. People who before had been miscasting entirely or failing to put enough power behind it were now sending their opponent’s wands soaring. People who had cast well enough at the beginning of the lesson were stepping up their game, trying to dodge or defend against it. He saw Angelina with a vicelike grip on her own wand, while Alicia tried her best to magically wrench it from her grasp.

“If you’ve got the hang of it, practice directing their wand back to you,” he called over the din, putting a little Sonorus magic in his throat to make himself heard. “If you can get their wand away from them, great. If you can get it in your own hand, even better.” Sending the wand flying was nice, but came with the risk of them being able to run and grab it, or summon it back. “In a real Death Eater fight, I’d be telling you to get your hands on their wand and snap it.”

That seemed to shock a number of people. “Snap someone else’s wand?” Parvati asked, horrified. Harry nodded.

“Not necessarily every time. But if they’re shooting Unforgivables, you don’t want to risk them getting their wand back and continuing the fight. Wands can be replaced, lives can’t.” His expression was grim, but he saw several hard-eyed nods of understanding at his words. He would bet at least half the people in the room had lost a family member in the first war against Voldemort.

If his training could save even one life, Harry would consider himself successful.

—

That evening, still riding high on the exhilaration of a successful first lesson, Harry got comfortable in his bed and called Sirius on the mirror.

“There’s my little freedom fighter,” his godfather greeted, grinning. “How’d it go?”

Harry gushed about the meeting, proudly declaring that by the end of the first session, every single one of them was able to disarm their opponent competently. “If they practice, they’ll all be great,” he enthused. “I’m going to do Shield charms next week, so they can take turns disarming and blocking. Might add in a Stinging hex to mix it up a bit.” He was well aware that most people had signed up to the club to learn spells for their exams, not to fight a war. He wanted to keep a good mix between real-life necessities and curriculum spells.

“Sounds great, pup. And how did they take the rest of it?” Sirius’ brow furrowed in concern, and Harry’s smile faltered.

Telling the huge group of people about the events of the graveyard had been... hard. “I think they believed me.” It was hard to tell, when most of them had just seemed too shocked and horrified to really respond. “I gave them something to think about, at any rate. And I gave them closure for Cedric. I hope.”

“You did the right thing, kiddo,” Sirius assured. Harry leaned back against his headboard, sighing.

“I hope so.” He didn’t want to seem like he was sensationalising Cedric’s death for credibility points. He just wanted people to know the truth. “Anyway, tell me about what you’ve been up to. How are things with the Order?”

Sirius scowled briefly. “Useless as always. Dumbledore’s got everyone taking shifts guarding the Department of Mysteries. And of course, whenever he’s here he takes great care to remind me that the best thing I can do is stay in the house.”

“Has he seemed suspicious to you? Of anything?” Harry was still worried about how little attention Dumbledore seemed to be paying to him these days. Was the headmaster truly just focused so much on Voldemort, or was there something bigger at play?

“He’s very interested in how often you write to me,” Sirius remarked. “I told him about Umbridge trying to steal your letters, though, said you’d decided not to risk it anymore. He wasn’t too pleased about that. Think he wants to know how you’re feeling.” He rolled his eyes.

“God forbid he just ask me,” Harry muttered derisively. Not that he would tell the truth if he did. “Feels like he’s forgotten I exist. It’s actually quite nice.” If the headmaster could keep ignoring Harry, that would be great. That felt like far too much to ask for, though.

Sirius told Harry about the most recent visit from Bill and Charlie, a grin on his face as he recounted their raucous game of exploding snap.

“I’m glad you’ve got more company,” Harry said, smiling. Sirius was a social creature; he needed people around him other than Remus and occasionally Snape. And the two eldest Weasleys were perfect for that. “You said Tonks has been around a fair bit, too?”

“Yeah, she tries to stop by a couple times a week. Asks for all the juicy stories of her mum as a teenager,” Sirius joked. Then, he grew a little more serious. “I think her and Kingsley would be willing to follow you over Dumbledore, y’know. Both of them are getting a bit fed up with Order meetings, and from what Tonks has said to me, Kingsley is still suspect of Dumbledore for not letting the guard interfere in you being locked in your room all summer.”

“You think we can trust them with the truth?” It would be good, having two aurors on his side, but it was a big risk to take.

“Maybe?” Sirius looked thoughtful. “Tonks certainly has the Black family loyalty. And Kingsley is the only one in the bloody Order who seems to accept that we aren’t getting through this war without a fight. Dumbledore’s got the rest thinking we can bring down Voldemort and his Death Eaters with the power of love or some shit, as if we’ve just got to band together and they’ll lay down their wands and come quietly.”

“That’s because Dumbledore’s hoping I’ll play sacrificial lamb and no one else will have to get hurt,” Harry pointed out, bitterness in his tone. Sirius’ gaze darkened.

“Over my dead body,” he growled. “Even if you do have to be the one to face Voldemort — when you’re ready, when his horcruxes are dealt with — everyone seems to forget that there’s a whole bunch of Death Eaters who will be happy to kill as many people as they can while your duel is going on.”

“We’ll deal with that when we get there,” Harry assured. “Hell, even if it’s only students on that battlefield, they’ll be the best damn battle-ready students this castle has seen.” He would make sure of that.

“Too right they will, with you in charge! That reminds me,” Sirius added, “Moony said he’s got a list of suggestions for you — some of his OWL and NEWT curriculum stuff, adapted a little bit. Y’know, a little less intense than the training you got.” The dog animagus’ lips twitched. “He’s handing it over to Severus, so it should find its way to you soon.”

“Brilliant.” Having Remus’ input on his teaching was invaluable. Sirius was right — the kind of training Harry had gone through in the summers was not exactly appropriate for the average Hogwarts student.

“Happy to help, kiddo.”

In some ways, Harry was glad Umbridge was such an incompetent teacher. He’d never have gained such a perfect way to prepare his peers for what was to come if she’d been decent.

.-.-.

Umbridge was still considering the necessity of the Gryffindor quidditch team by the weekend, so Harry was grounded — though, with the weather the way it was, he couldn’t be too devastated about that.

And he had the perfect idea for a rainy day activity.

Making an excuse to Neville about needing to do some stuff by himself — which still felt novel, being able to tell his best friend he was just ‘doing things’ and not needing to give every little detail — Harry snuck down to Snape’s private quarters, wearing some of Dudley’s better fitting cast-offs beneath his invisibility cloak.

“Hi. Are you busy today?” he chirped, once he was safely warded inside the living room. Snape eyed him warily.

“That very much depends,” was the drawled response.

“Well, I was just wondering. Basilisk parts are quite useful in potions, aren’t they? And quite rare?”

The sudden interest lighting Snape’s gaze almost made Harry laugh. “Explain.”

Harry told the Slytherin about his little late-night jaunt down to the chamber; leaving out the whole part about Salazar’s secret office.

“I wanted somewhere to work on magic without the school wards catching it. But the massive dead snake is a bit... off-putting. So, if you’re free, I thought you might like to come help me figure out what to do with it. Since Remus keeps telling me I need adult supervision for dangerous things.”

Dark eyes narrowed. “If you cared about adult supervision, you would have fetched me before you went down there alone,” Snape pointed out, sighing at Harry’s unrepentant grin. “Give me ten minutes.”

Harry sat on the sofa, waiting for Snape to change and gather the equipment for harvesting the remains. Ten minutes later, the tall man was ready to go, a bulging satchel slung over his shoulder.

Having already done some exploring, Harry led the professor to a small snake carving on the wall not too far from his quarters. With a hiss, they were safely ensconced in the passageway.

This one, too, was full of animal skeletons and moss, so Harry happily blasted it with cleaning charms as he walked.

“Everything is disgusting,” he warned, but Snape just hummed.

When they made it to the main Chamber, even the reserved Slytherin couldn’t hide his gasp. Harry stepped aside, letting Snape get the full view of the Chamber proper — and the huge dead snake within.

Snape slowly approached the basilisk, his wide eyes trailing over its immense size. “Jesus fucking Christ, Potter,” he breathed, and Harry almost tripped over his own feet; he had never heard Snape use such muggle swears in his life. “This thing was living under the castle the whole time?”

“I did tell you it was big,” Harry said, only for the man to round on him.

“Big? Big! This has to be at least sixty foot of deadly serpent!” Snape turned back to the basilisk, running a gentle hand over the scales. “In remarkably good condition, too, having been dead for several years.” He walked further up beside the body, finally coming to the mangled head.

“Fawkes clawed out its eyes,” Harry said with an unnecessary gesture to the bloody holes gauged in its face. “And if the brain is useful for anything, I don’t know what shape this one is in, because I sort-of stabbed it with a sword.” Here he pointed out the hole in the roof of the snake’s mouth. “Also there might still be venom in one of the fangs but the other one broke off in my arm.” It was still there, actually, lying on the stone floor next to the congealed black ink-spill from Riddle’s diary. “But whatever you can get from it that’s useful, you’re welcome to keep. I just want it out of here.”

Snape looked like he was about to faint. Whether that was at the idea of Harry facing the snake at twelve, or the concept of being allowed to harvest and keep the entire thing, he wasn’t sure.

“This snake; the Chamber?” Snape rounded on Harry, “these are the things you need adult supervision for.”

“In my defence, we did bring Lockhart. An attempt at supervision was made.”

From the look on Snape’s face, Lockhart absolutely did not count.

“This is millions of galleons just of scale alone!” Snape actually looked conflicted. “I can’t keep this, Potter. By all rights, this whole thing belongs to you. You could sell it for half the gold in Gringotts.”

“I don’t want half the gold in Gringotts,” Harry pointed out dryly. “I don’t want any of it. Except maybe enough scales for some battle armour, I do want that.” Over the summer, Tonks had shown him her dragon-hide battle armour, and Harry was incredibly jealous.

"You're just handing me a fortune in rare creature parts?" The Slytherin looked skeptical, and a little nauseous. "What do you want in return for such a gift."

"Buy Remus a decent pair of robes," came Harry's immediate response, a smile crossing his lips. "Seriously, Snape; take whatever you want. If it really makes you uncomfortable, just take the useful potions' ingredients and we can put the money from the scales in a vault for the school, or something." Once Dumbledore was long gone and unable to get his greedy hands on it, of course. "You're risking your neck and your job trying to keep me alive long enough to take down Voldemort. The least I can do is make sure you have plenty of money to live on if it all goes tits up."

The Potions Master shook his head, incredulous. "I could live a dozen lifetimes on the money from the fangs alone."

"Brilliant. Remus won't have to worry about keeping a job."

Harry was still grinning, even when Snape narrowed his gaze at him. "I know what you're doing, Potter," he declared. "Trying to sway me into accepting by using Remus. As if he would be any more likely to accept such a fortune from you."

"Then it's a good thing I'm giving it to you instead." Harry didn't back down. "We can argue all day if you want, but I've made my mind up. Whatever you can harvest, you can keep. I'll be over there practicing the Evaporation charm." He jerked a thumb at the pool of water, already on his way over. For a moment, he thought Snape might continue arguing — then there was a quiet sigh, and a call for Ceri.

The little elf appeared, and squeaked in fright at the sight of the snake. "Don't worry, it's dead," Snape assured her. "I'm going to skin it. I need you to bring me a large chest, something I can add an Expansion charm to."

Ceri nodded and vanished. From the other side of the chamber, Harry watched as Snape set down his satchel and began to remove various tools and jars from within. Then, to his surprise, the man shed his robe, revealing worn jeans and a threadbare black long-sleeve t-shirt. That was only for a moment, however — out of his satchel, he pulled a protective over-robe, shrugging it on.

Harry thought about offering to help. But, watching the way Snape began to cut into the snake's gums, carefully avoiding the sharp points of the fangs, he figured it was probably best left to the experts.

Knowing Harry's luck, he'd stab himself on another fang entirely by accident, and then where would they be?

.-. .

At last, with a bit of assistance from McGonagall, the Gryffindor quidditch team was given the High Inquisitor's permission to reform. Angelina was so delighted, she scheduled a practice for that evening, determined to make up for lost time.

Naturally, that day also heralded one of the worst storms they'd seen all term.

"Oh, Harry!" George called across the Gryffindor common room, he and Fred grabbing Harry by the shoulders. He had just come back from dinner, planning on taking a little time to work on his animagus form before practice.

"Darling, favouritest little brother of ours," Fred continued sweetly. Harry tugged free of their grasp, eyeing them suspiciously.

"What do you want?"

The pair grinned innocently. "Well, my brother and I are in a bit of a predicament," Fred drawled.

"A predicament that is going to make tonight's quidditch practice exceedingly uncomfortable."

Harry looked out the window, where the sky was practically black with clouds, rain pouring down in sheets. "More uncomfortable than it's already going to be?" he asked doubtfully. Both redehads nodded.

"We've been working on a new Snackbox, see," Fred started.

"Fever Fudge," George said. "It's working great, gets your temperature right up and everything, except..."

"Except it keeps giving us these huge, pus-filled boils, and we can't figure out how to, ah, fix that." Fred shifted uncomfortably. Harry frowned — he didn't see any boils.

"Boils that will make it quite difficult to sit on our brooms for two hours."

It took a moment for Harry to figure it out, but when it clicked he grimaced in horror. "Oh, fuck."

"Quite," Fred agreed. "Angelina is already quite unimpressed with that situation, I don't think she'll be any more forgiving if we bail on our first practice in ages because of it."

"We've tried every counter-spell and healing charm we can think of," George huffed. "Ointments, potions, the lot. If we can't get them to go down, we'll have to go to Pomfrey." Both redheads looked horrified at the idea of taking that particular predicament to the school mediwitch. Harry didn't blame them.

"Seeing as you're fast becoming the new brain-box of Gryffindor," Fred complimented, "and we know how much Moony worries about your continued health and safety—"

"We were hoping you might have some ideas?" George's brown eyes were hopeful. Harry stared at them.

"You want me to look at your arses?"

“Only if your boyfriend won’t get jealous,” George teased, wiggling his eyebrows.

“If they’re in as bad a shape as you say they are, I can’t see it being a problem,” Harry replied, deadpan. He frowned in thought; he did know quite a bit of healing magic now, after the three adults at Seren Du decided to cover all bases necessary for the occupational hazard of being Harry Potter.

“I’ll see what I can do,” Harry agreed, and was immediately tackled in a tight twin hug.

“Fantastic!” George slung an arm over his shoulders. “We thought we’d head down to the changing rooms early, if you’re willing? Probably the best place to, ah, get a good look in private.”

Harry sighed. “I’ll go get my stuff.”

The twins beamed at him, each kissing one of his cheeks. “Definitely our favourite little brother,” Fred declared firmly.

Across the common room, Ron scowled.

.-.-.-

Severus didn’t get the chance to see Remus until the weekend, when the werewolf flooed into his private quarters, immediately leaning in for a kiss. Severus relaxed into the embrace, a flicker of amusement within him as the greying man let his nose slide down Severus’ neck, scenting him quite blatantly. “Feeling possessive, are we?” he drawled. When Remus straightened up, his cheeks were flushed.

“It’s been two weeks,” he defended feebly.

The pair made themselves comfortable on the sofa, and Severus braced himself for what he was about to share with his partner. He could still hardly believe it himself.

“I promised you an explanation for why I did not visit last weekend,” he began, trepidation gathering. Remus frowned.

“You said something important came up.”

“I did,” Severus assented. “I… perhaps it would be best if I just show you.” He couldn’t quite find the words.

Remus’ frown grew puzzled, but he met Severus’ gaze without hesitation, his eyes warm and trusting. So trusting, Severus’ heart clenched. Would he ever get used to such a sight?

Pushing past his foolish flutter of emotion, he prodded out with his Legilimency, careful at first. As expected, the wolf reared to the forefront of Remus’ mind, growling protectively. Severus pressed no further, waiting for the mind to recognise his own.

Mate, came a quiet, satisfied rumble, and the wolf began to retreat. Not far, but far enough for Severus to offer up his own memory in Remus’ mind.

He started out at the beginning; Harry appearing at his quarters, dressed like a street urchin and looking entirely too pleased with himself. He let the memory play out, feeling Remus' sense of realisation dawn.

The memory continued; Severus preparing for Merlin only knew what — with a predictable surge of arousal in Remus' mind when the memory showed Severus changing into more appropriate clothes, something that left Severus equal parts amused and flattered — but as memory-Severus and memory-Harry stepped into the hidden passage down to the Chamber of Secrets, Remus' mind went quiet and still.

When they reached the basilisk, all Severus could feel was horror — his own, and his partner's.

He kept the memory going, long enough for Remus to see his cub's entirely too blasé attitude about facing the huge, deadly predator, only ending it when memory-Severus began the harvest. He pulled carefully out of Remus' mind, meeting glowing amber eyes.

"No wonder he hardly even blinked at fighting that dragon in the first task," was Remus' immediate response. He gripped Severus' hands tight. "It was so big, Severus. Those fangs..."

Severus made a noise of agreement. The bigger fangs had been the length of Severus' entire forearm.

To think, that idiot little Gryffindor, spelled to the gills with recklessness-inducing magic, had gone to face such a thing with only his useless sidekick and Gilderoy Bloody Lockhart for assistance.

Worse; from what Harry had told him, neither of the two even made it that far.

"There's a pensieve in the Potter family vaults," Remus said, apropos of nothing. "I know there is, because it used to belong to Monty. Next time Harry's at Gringotts, we are making him retrieve that pensieve, and we are sitting down and he is going to put in every memory of every ridiculous, foolhardy, terrifying thing that he has ever done. I can't take any more bloody surprises like that, Severus, I swear."

"You and me both," Severus agreed. He still didn't know the full details of what happened with Quirrell and the stone. Potter was remarkably evasive; like he knew none of them would approve of the situation.

"Thank Merlin the goblins broke the spells on him," Remus murmured, running a hand through his hair. "Can you imagine what he'd be like now if he was still under Dumbledore's influence?"

The thought made Severus scowl; Potter would very likely be the arrogant, idiotic little brat Severus had anticipated the day he'd started Hogwarts. The brat Dumbledore wanted Severus to see him as.

"I can't believe he just gave me the harvesting rights to that monstrosity," he muttered, incredulous. At that, Remus' smile softened.

"Generous to a fault, our cub," he mused fondly. His honey eyes grew teasing. "Once you're rich from it, you can take me out for a proper night on the town," he drawled lightly. "Muggle, of course." They couldn't risk being seen together anywhere magical, and they both knew it.

Severus smirked, bombarded with achingly fond memories of a time long-past. "Fish and chips on Brighton pier, two litre bottle of Strongbow, and that awful underground poetry bar?"

Remus laughed, the sound still fully capable of stopping Severus' heart. "Oh, you do know how to spoil a man," he declared, leaning in for a kiss. "It's not a poetry bar anymore, though. It's a drag club, I think. Or maybe a leather bar. Something queer and seedy."

Severus frowned. He supposed it was too much to ask for things to stay entirely the same, after sixteen years. "Hmm." He let one long arm curl around Remus' shoulders, pulling him close. "Could still be entertaining. Queer and seedy used to be right up your alley."

Remus snickered. "You never complained too much about any of those places," he reminded. His head came to rest on Severus' shoulder, and so Severus felt it when the man's whole body tensed. "Whatever it is, it'll have to wait a bit. Albus is sending me back to the werewolf packs."

Severus' hand curled tighter around the Gryffindor's bicep. "When?"

"I leave on Monday. Enough time to get settled before the next full. Should be back by Christmas at the latest."

The Slytherin sighed, letting his chin tilt down until his nose was buried in Remus' hair. Selfishly, he wanted to tell the werewolf not to go, that it wasn't worth it. But he couldn't bring Dumbledore's suspicion onto him like that. Besides, Severus was stuck at the school, under even tighter watch than usual with Umbridge sticking her nose in all over the place. He hardly saw Remus as it was.

One day, he promised himself, neither of them would be beholden to anyone but each other.

"I'm going to talk to the pack elders about Harry's offer," Remus piped up, one hand playing absently with a loose thread on the hem of Severus' shirt.

"So soon?"

"Better than letting them get swayed by Albus' pretty words," Remus pointed out. "Harry and his friends actually have a plan to back up their offer, rather than just a vague promise."

Severus knew that was the problem for the allied werewolf packs; it was all well and good Albus Dumbledore promising them equal rights, but when the man hadn't actually done anything to achieve that in decades — other than employ one singular werewolf, and allow him to be harassed from his post when the truth came out — his promises fell flat.

“Good luck, then, I suppose. Stay safe.” Come back to me.

Every time Remus went to the werewolves, Severus didn’t know which fear grew stronger — the fear of him getting into a dominance match he couldn’t win, or the fear of him deciding he belonged there after all.

Remus leaned up, kissing his cheek, gaze as knowing as ever. Severus never could hide from him for long. “I’ll be back in time for Christmas,” he vowed. “Harry can actually come home for this one. Well, Grimmauld.” Against Severus’ cheek, the werewolf’s nose wrinkled. “But close enough. I wouldn’t miss it.”

Severus hoped that would be the case.

Chapter 56

Now that the enormous basilisk corpse had been reduced to an expanded chest full of potion ingredients, a huge pile of snakeskin, and a mound of ash, Harry was keen to get down to Salazar Slytherin's office once more. He made his escape from the common room and hurried down the secret staircase, hissing at the office's snake guardian.

"Oh, good, you're back," Salazar hissed in greeting. Harry waved.

"I've been quite busy, sorry. School is hectic."

The painted founder chuckled. "That's what all students say. Come, sit; we have much to discuss, I think."

Harry did as asked, making himself comfortable on the sofa opposite the portrait. "Where do I even start?" He ran a hand through his already messy hair. He'd tried to think, over the last couple of weeks, what he might ask Slytherin now he had the chance. But there were so many questions, he couldn't prioritise any of them.

"Tell me about this Riddle fellow," Salazar requested, face hinting at a scowl. "It seems he has done quite a bit to mar the reputation of my line."

Harry wasn't sure Voldemort was the one entirely behind that, and he said as much, explaining what the current common view of Slytherin house was. That made Salazar's eyes darken, his hands clenched around the arms of the chair he was painted in.

"It seems you will have much work ahead of you, young heir — once you have destroyed this Dark Lord of yours, it is your family duty to bring the truth of the Slytherin name to light. I will tell you everything, in time, and together we shall repair my house's reputation."

That was a deal Harry was perfectly willing to make. Slytherin house deserved better. "Do the other founders have portraits hidden somewhere?" he hissed. "Or their own secret chambers?"

Salazar shook his head. "I was the paranoid one; I was put in charge of the subtle defences. The other three focused on their wards and traps. As for portraits... I was always telling them to sit for a painting. Godric kept insisting they would all have time later in life, and the girls didn't care enough to argue. They all died before they could be painted." He gave a sad, rueful smile. "I am the only one left."

His tone made Harry's heart clench. "I'm sorry." To be stuck in portrait form, entirely alone in a locked, hidden office... that was no way to exist.

"It is no matter," Salazar waved him off. "You have questions, lad. Ask away."

A million and one things jostled for space in Harry's mind, but there was one that rose to the forefront, far more important than any of the rest.

“Do you know anything about horcruxes?”

Immediately, Salazar’s expression grew thunderous. “The Slytherin family magics will not allow you to pervert yourself in such a way,” he said, a hissing snarl. Harry went wide-eyed.

“No, no, not for me! Voldemort — Tom Riddle — he has horcruxes. I need to know how to find and destroy them.” Salazar relaxed a little, though his upper lip was still curled.

“There’s... there’s a horcrux of his, inside me. I was hoping you might know how to get it out.”

Harry explained, raising his fringe to show his scar, telling Salazar of the goblins’ scans and their current search for a solution. “If I need to die to be rid of him, I’ll do it,” he said bluntly. “Obviously, I’d quite like a different option.”

“Indeed,” Salazar agreed, brow furrowed in thought. “It was not common, for horcruxes to be housed in a living vessel. Then again, it was not common for horcruxes to exist at all. But I encountered them a few times, in my travels.” He raised a hand, gesturing to the bookshelf on the opposite wall. “I believe there are a few books on the subject in my collection. Memory escapes me on the specifics, but you’re welcome to take a look.”

Harry looked at the expansive number of books that made up Salazar Slytherin’s private library.

It was going to be a long night.

. . .

He retreated from the Chamber a little after midnight, his eyes crossing behind his glasses from the strain of reading the ancient books. They were in surprisingly decent shape, but half of them weren’t even in English — at least, not any form of English Harry recognised. Even with Translation charms, it was slow work looking for any mention of horcruxes and soul magic.

Especially because he kept getting distracted reading about magic and theories that had fallen out of use in the last thousand years. It was fascinating.

One day, he promised, he would take Remus in there. Or at the very least, copy the books for him to read himself. Draco and Snape, too; all three of them were absolute nerds, and would probably commit murder for the chance to read such rare texts.

Harry snuck back into Gryffindor Tower, and was surprised to see Neville sat in the common room by the dying fire, hunched over the table with a couple of textbooks open, quill scribbling furiously. He looked up, wheat-blond hair falling into his eyes. “There you are!” he greeted quietly.

“Were you waiting up for me?” Harry asked guiltily. Neville shook his head.

“Nah, just forgot about Binns’ essay til about an hour ago,” he confessed sheepishly. “Where have you been?”

Harry sank down into the armchair, shaking his head. “Mate, you wouldn’t believe me if I told you.”

Some secrets were best kept to himself, for now.

.-.-.-.

The defence club — which, to avoid using the term ‘club’ around Umbridge’s keen ears, had begun to be referred to as ‘the Hogwarts Alliance’, HA for short, ‘Harry’s Army’ if people were feeling particularly cheeky — was rapidly becoming Harry’s favourite part of the week, just below spending time with Draco. His students were coming on in leaps and bounds, once they started to get their confidence in spellcasting. Harry had them working on Stunning charms now; a standard part of the OWL curriculum, but also a very handy spell to have in a fight.

He wasn’t training them to become killers. Not like Snape was training him. He just wanted them to be able to incapacitate their opponent, and escape the fight safely. Once they had those skills, he’d look at teaching them some more combative spells.

Everyone was taking it in turns to stun each other, cushions piled up on the floor to stop any major injuries. Some of them seemed to be enjoying the opportunity to hex each other far too much — especially Justin Finch-Fletchley, who was paired with Zacharias Smith.

“You’re all doing brilliantly,” Harry enthused, walking between the pairs with a spring in his step.

“Thanks, Professor Potter,” the twins chirped, winking. Harry’s cheeks reddened — they had started calling him that as a joke in the last meeting, but it was starting to catch on amongst the rest of them. Harry couldn’t deny the little spark of pleasure in his chest that burst each time someone said it.

Maybe he’d go into teaching, once he was done with his professional quidditch career. It was oddly satisfying, seeing people improve from lesson to lesson, watching their delight as they started to master spells they’d previously struggled with.

Neville was possibly Harry’s most improved student. The blond Gryffindor had started out incredibly nervous, stuttering his incantations and giving up before he’d even properly tried. With some coaching from Harry, he was really starting to find his stride. Privately, Harry wondered if the boy’s wand — his father’s wand — was the problem; Neville had magic, that much was clear, but the conduit was distorting things along the way. Neville wouldn’t hear a word about the possibility of replacing it, though. “Gran would kill me,” he kept insisting, so Harry let it be. For now, at least.

As Harry observed his classmates, he noticed that more than a few of them had reddened skin on the backs of their hands. He scowled to himself — how many detentions was Umbridge giving these days? Surely someone on staff had noticed? Other than Snape, of course, who couldn’t risk his reputation to say anything. Was everyone else hiding it, just like Harry had?

He looked around the room, a faint frown coming to his lips. The pairings were much the same as they always had been; the same people tended to drift together, much like they would in class.

A firework burst from his wand, and immediately the room fell silent. “This is going great,” Harry began, “but there’s something I’ve noticed. Look around a minute. What do you see?”

Everyone peered around the room, confused.

“We’re all fighting our friends,” Susan said eventually, eyes going wide. Harry nodded.

“I don’t blame you. It’s natural to want to practice these spells with someone who feels safe to you. But always working with the same people can make you too comfortable — you start to learn their tells, and their weaknesses, and you target them. Then, if you fight someone new, it’s harder to get a grip on their weaknesses. It’s not as big a deal now, since we aren’t really fighting each other,” he added, before anyone could protest, “but as things go on, it’ll become more obvious. Especially when we start working on fighting in groups. You get too used to the same person protecting you, you start to leave openings with the assumption they’ll cover it.”

He’d listened to a dozen lectures on the matter from Sirius, who apparently had taken personal offence to the Auror department always pairing the same people together for training, back when he’d been one of them.

“Everyone in here is on the same side,” Harry declared firmly. “You could end up fighting alongside any one of them. If you know their strengths, their fighting style — that’s a huge advantage. I want us to start changing up our pairings. Find someone you’ve never spoken to before; someone from a different year, a different house. Someone you don’t really know anything about. If we keep switching it up, it’ll keep things interesting.”

“You just want us all to be friends, Potter,” Daphne called, stood beside Blaise and the rest of the Slytherins in the room. Harry winked at her.

“I will neither confirm nor deny that,” he joked. “Seriously, guys. We’ve all been going to school together for years now, and yet I’m learning new things about all of you just from watching you work. And Daphne isn’t wrong — you might find your new best friend in this room, you just overlooked them because they wear a different coloured tie.”

He watched them, expectantly. At first, nobody moved. Then, slowly, the divides were crossed. Harry felt a swell of fondness in his chest as George Weasley strode across the room, offering his hand to Blaise Zabini. Susan walked up to Luna with a tentative smile; Cho bravely approached Angelina Johnson. One by one, people extended the hand of friendship to each other, and the room filled with noise once more as they resumed their spell practice. The atmosphere was different, this time; Harry could feel it. Everyone was a little more on their toes, keen-eyed — they were learning to spot the differences in each other’s movements, to look for their advantages. There was regular conversation, too; Patrick kept up a lively chat with Lavender Brown as the pair exchanged Stunning and Shield charms, trying to catch one another off guard. Harry smirked, seeing the way Lavender’s eyes trailed over the handsome older Hufflepuff, the way Patrick started to flourish his wand a little more, showing off for the pretty girl.

All kinds of bonds would be made, in this room, he could feel it.

His chest was bursting with pride as he continued the lesson, observing all the progress being made. Not for the first time, he wished the rest of the Slytherins could be there to share in it all, but it wasn't time for that yet. He had to make do with training Draco privately, and letting Blaise and Daphne pass the lessons on to their secret little group of Slytherins rebelling against the Dark and their parents.

It had taken a tricky little addendum to the contract, to allow the pair to talk about what they learned from Harry enough to be able to pass the knowledge on to others, but it was worth it.

Curfew approached, so Harry wound down the session, ready to carefully send people on their way. They left in small groups; some from the main door, others through the doors closer to the common rooms, trying to leave in intervals enough to not look suspicious. They had been lucky, so far; Umbridge seemed satisfied that her Educational Decree had stamped out any rebellion, and was focused more on inspecting the teachers again.

"Hey, Susan," Harry called, gesturing for the girl to stay back. She bid Hannah and Ernie goodbye, wandering over to Harry's side.

"What's up?"

Harry shook his head, waiting until the pair of them and Neville were the only ones left in the room. "I've been thinking," he finally said. "I think it's time I start properly gathering my case against Dumbledore."

Susan's eyes widened. "Why now?"

"He's ignoring me," Harry said. "I don't know why. Maybe with Umbridge about he's worried he'll be seen playing favourites. But he's leaving me alone, which means it's the perfect time for me to start the proceedings. I'm going to write to the goblins over Christmas, once I'm out of the castle." They still had the sample of magic from Harry's blocks and compulsions, not to mention the records of Dumbledore's unlawful access of Harry's vault.

"Okay. What do you need from me?" Harry could have kissed Susan for not asking any more questions.

"Nothing much, yet. Just thought I'd give you the heads up. Even if I have a case, I still can't do anything while Voldemort's at large." He wasn't stupid enough to rock the wizarding world by denouncing the leader of the light while the dark faction could stand to benefit from it. "I know your aunt has been gathering her own evidence, for things he's done at the Ministry — if you're going home for Yule, maybe you can let her know, so when I've got everything I can find I can coordinate with her on the rest."

A vindictive smile formed on Susan's face. "Sounds perfect. I'll pass a message along when I can. Y'know, add it to the list," she joked, winking.

“Brilliant.”

When she disappeared through the door to the Hufflepuff corridor, Neville turned to Harry.
“Are you sure about that? If he catches on before you’re ready...”

“I don’t know when I’ll be ready,” Harry admitted, “but knowing the way my life goes, it’ll be sooner than any of us anticipate. I want to make sure I don’t leave any chance for that meddling bastard to worm his way out of the consequences.”

If he didn’t have the measures in place to slap Dumbledore with an arrest and a trial that would absolutely destroy his reputation, ready to go as soon as Voldemort was defeated, Harry knew the old man would be right there to turn the crowd in his own favour — and paint Harry as the next Dark Lord, if necessary.

He was playing chess with the chessmaster himself, and he had to be several moves ahead.

.-.-.-.

Sirius shuffled down the corridor of Grimmauld Place, hands in the pockets of his cardigan. He was feeling cold, today — really, had been a little cold ever since Moony left for the werewolf packs. Merlin, he missed being able to feel sun on his face whenever he wanted.

He turned a corner, then paused. Tonks was stood at the top of the stairs, looking... quite different. Square shoulders, with an entirely flat chest and more masculine waistline. A more masculine jaw, too — similar to Sirius’ own, just without the stubble. And cobalt blue hair, shaved close at the sides and longer on top.

A suspicion began to appear in Sirius’ gut. He cleared his throat. “Is that my t-shirt?”

Tonks whipped around, looking down at the Guns N Roses insignia, offering up a guilty smile. “It was. But then I nicked it.” Voice a touch deeper. Nervous, too.

“I’ve been looking for that,” Sirius mock-grumbled. He raised an eyebrow at his younger cousin. “You feeling alright?”

Tonks’ cheeks went pink. “Yeah. Just. Y’know.” An awkward glance to the side. “Feeling a bit more masculine today.” This was followed by a strained laugh.

Sirius’ suspicion grew. “Fair enough. Changing pronouns?”

Tonks froze. Electric blue eyes widened. “You— Um. He is good. When I’m like this. Which isn’t often, but— sometimes.”

Sirius nodded, his suspicion confirmed. “Will do. Now, are you actually feeling alright? That was a nasty curse you caught last night.”

The whole reason Tonks was even at Grimmauld was because of a concussion sustained in a raid the night before. Kingsley had been worried enough to insist upon keeping his partner somewhere that was easy to supervise. Since Sirius — supposedly — never left Grimmauld, it had been the logical place.

Tonks grinned, the anxious tension flooding from his shoulders. “Oh, that, yeah. Doing just fine, promise. No more double vision or anything.”

Sirius eyed him over, looking for any trace of a lie. “Okay. I’d still prefer someone check you over, though.” Tonks couldn’t go to the Ministry medics; the raid had been Order business, not Auror.

“Charlie will be here in a little bit,” Tonks assured. Sirius ignored the tiny flop his belly gave at the news. Suddenly, Tonks frowned. “Are you sure you’re alright with — y’know. This.” He gestured to his very male body. Sirius rolled his eyes, slinging an arm around Tonks’ shoulders.

“Look, little cuz; I used to hang out with all sorts of people, back in the day. Gender fluidity is not a stranger to me.” Some of the social circles he’d run in between Hogwarts and Azkaban, the clubs he used to go to — Tonks would’ve fit right in. “Of course, you get to cheat and use your metamorph abilities when all my old mates had to settle for glamour and padding,” he teased, ruffling Tonks’ hair. He patted his cousin’s cheek playfully. “Still keeping the Black cheekbones, I see. Good choice.”

Tonks grinned back, and the next thing Sirius knew he was being bundled in a tight hug. Tonks was still shorter than him, his head tucked just under Sirius’ chin. “You’re the best,” he murmured vehemently. Worry grew in Sirius’ chest.

“Is your mum not alright with it?” He hadn’t thought Andi was the type to judge.

Tonks pulled back, shrugging. “She doesn’t mind, but she doesn’t really understand it. She just lets me do whatever.” He shoved his hands in his pockets. “I don’t tend to let myself have masculine days unless I know I’m in safe company. I sort of forgot you lived here, today; I woke up with my brain all scrambled and I needed to be a boy and that’s as far as I got.”

“Scrambled, huh?” Sirius narrowed his gaze. “Thought you said it was fine?”

“It is now,” Tonks hurried to assure. “Just wasn’t when I got up. But y’know; took a piss, splashed some water on my face, I’m all set.”

Yes, Sirius was definitely getting Charlie to check him out later. He’d recruit Kingsley, if he had to.

“Right. Well, consider this a safe place for any sort of gender expression, at least when I’m around. Moony, too.” He grimaced briefly. “Maybe not when Molly’s here.”

Tonks made a face. “Yeah, I learned that one years ago. Far too many invasive questions from her.” He shrugged, brightening up. “Charlie’s good, though, and Bill. They’ve known since we were kids.”

“Knew those two were solid blokes.” The two eldest Weasleys were quickly becoming great friends to Sirius, and he was glad to hear they had the right attitude about things. He shot Tonks a playful look. “And Kingsley?”

The metamorphmagus blushed brightly, but the grin that stole across his face spoke volumes. “He’s great,” he admitted. “Hardly even blinked, the first time. And— well,” he cut himself off abruptly, hair turning red with the force of his blush. “Never mind. But you don’t need to get all protective big cousin, not on that front.”

“Good.” Sirius liked Kingsley, he truly did, but he would absolutely hex the man into a puddle of goo if he messed around Sirius’ little cousin.

Which, admittedly, might be the reason Tonks hadn’t said anything about the relationship until Sirius had caught them kissing in the library a week ago.

He felt the wards twitch, and heard the sound of the front door open. “That’ll be the Weasley boys,” he said unnecessarily. He shot his cousin a sideways glance. “If you get paint on that t-shirt, I’ll never let you borrow any of my clothes ever again.”

The relieved smile on Tonks’ face made Sirius’ heart ache. “I’ll try my best. I do have my own boy clothes. Just not with me. And I was never any good at transfiguring clothing.”

“Ah, my dear cousin, that is my specialty,” Sirius boasted, winking. “Old Minnie will tell you herself. Once, I transfigured her an absolutely stunning dress, really brought out the murder in her eyes.”

Tonks burst out laughing, following Sirius down the stairs. He wondered how long his little cousin had kept his feelings bottled up — how much longer he would’ve continued to hide the truth if he hadn’t been addled by the concussion.

Sirius looked down at the drab robe he wore, his wardrobe limited by the things he had at Grimmauld to make it seem like he’d been on the run before moving in there. No wonder Tonks had not recognised him for the beacon of queer solidarity that he was! His eighteen year-old self would be appalled at his sartorial choices.

Making a mental note to do some owl-order shopping, Sirius looked down with a grin at the pair of redheads in the main hall. They smiled back, then their eyes slid past him, and two sets of eyebrows went up.

“Now there’s a face we haven’t seen in a while,” Charlie greeted, cheeks dimpling with the force of his smile. “I was getting worried about you, y’know.”

His blue eyes moved to Sirius, question clear, and Sirius put his hands on his hips. “You thought I would have a problem with it? Me?” he said, offended. “Clearly I’m losing my touch.” He shook his head, turning back to Tonks. “You and Kingsley were the ones who raided my old flat when I broke out of Azkaban; did you not find my skirts?” They had been in the wardrobe with the rest of his clothes, a good third of which had come from the ‘women’s’ section of the shops.

“Skirts?” The strangled yelp came from Charlie, and Sirius looked back just in time to see the dragon tamer’s eyes lift up from where they had very clearly been checking out Sirius’ legs. The animagus ignored the thrill down his spine, merely grinning.

“Gendered clothing is bullshit and I look fantastic in a mini-skirt,” Sirius informed the trio. “So no, I don’t give a fuck about Tonks’ gender identity, except to make sure he’s happy and feels welcome to present however the hell he wants in this house.” He shook his head, bewildered. “Merlin, how old and stuffy do you two think I am?” He knew Azkaban had aged him prematurely, but really?

“Our apologies,” Bill replied. He was smirking pointedly at his brother. “We won’t doubt you again. Now, I’ve got some good news for you. I’m pretty sure I’ve figured out how to get your charming mother off the wall for good.”

Sirius lit up excitedly. “Really?” Ever since the kids had left for school, he’d been slowly gutting and re-decorating the whole house — with Molly no longer trying to steamroll his every opinion, it was going much easier. He’d mainly stuck to the upstairs rooms so the rest of the Order wouldn’t notice, but now he was working on the more widely used parts of the house, and his mother’s portrait had been proving a very difficult sticking point.

“My supervisor promised me that if this spell doesn’t work, nothing will,” Bill assured. “So I brought a sledgehammer too, just in case. But first, neither of us have eaten lunch yet.”

“Oh, I see how it is,” Sirius drawled, keeping his voice low as they passed the portrait and headed to the kitchen. “Using me for my free food.”

“Absolutely,” Charlie confirmed, with a wink that sent Sirius’ nerves aflutter. Merlin, he was off his game, after twelve years in Azkaban. One handsome young redhead smiling at him and he was turning into a fifth-year Hufflepuff!

Bill made himself perfectly at home in the kitchen, pulling out salad and cold cuts for sandwiches. “Tonks, Sirius, you eating?”

“Please,” Tonks requested, sprawling gracelessly into a chair.

“Go on, then. Charlie, would you check his concussion, please?” Sirius requested, resolutely trying not to blush as he looked at the redhead. “He says he’s fine, but he also said he was too scrambled to pretend to be female this morning, so I don’t trust him.”

Charlie was immediately turning concerned eyes on his friend, who glared accusingly at Sirius. “Don’t give me that look; you promised you’d let Charlie look you over,” Sirius reminded.

With a sigh, Tonks relented, and Charlie soon had his wand out. From his work as a dragon tamer, he’d learned to deal with all sorts of medical maladies — you couldn’t always access a healer, if there was an angry dragon blocking your way.

“How long can the three of you stay?” Sirius asked, perching on the kitchen table with his feet on one of the chairs. “Getting the portrait down would be great, but I wanted to strip the wallpaper in all the hallways today, and a couple extra hands would be fab.” It looked much better now he’d taken down all the house elf heads, but there was definite room for improvement.

“Depends,” Charlie drawled. “What’s in it for us?”

Sirius hated the way that voice sent prickles of electricity across his skin. “You mean other than a free meal and the pleasure of my company?” he returned, trying to gather his best flirtatious voice, rusty as he was.

He had no idea why Charlie Weasley seemed so keen to flirt with him, but he was happy to rise to the challenge.

“I’ll let you join me in the delight of setting fire to Mum’s portrait, once it’s off the wall.”

“I’m in,” Tonks said immediately, beaming.

“Sounds fun,” Bill agreed, levitating a plate of sandwiches over. Charlie, evidently happy with Tonks’ health, leaned back in his chair, sparkling blue eyes meeting Sirius’.

“I never turn down a chance to play with fire,” he murmured, voice edged with challenge.

Sirius swallowed thickly.

That man was going to be the death of him.

.-.-.-.

If Harry had thought that the first couple of weeks of term were the teachers trying to scare them with an enormous workload into taking their OWLs seriously, he was sorely disappointed — it was edging closer to December, and the homework load had only gotten worse. Between quidditch practice, the HA, heirs meetings, and visiting Salazar, Harry was beginning to feel like an overstretched elastic band.

Draco, being the absolutely incredible boyfriend and paragon of all things wonderful that he was, had rectified this by outright kidnapping him from a corridor on his way back from dinner, yanking him into an empty classroom and warding the door. “It feels like it has been weeks since I last had a civil conversation with you that didn’t revolve around Defence practice or the Wizengamot,” he declared in irritation, casting Cushioning charms on the floor and manhandling Harry down. “I’m sick and tired of having to talk shit about you in public, and for once I don’t have prefect duties, and you’ve got a free evening, so we are going to stay in here until bloody curfew and pretend the rest of the world doesn’t exist.” The more he spoke, the more his anger drained into exhaustion, until he was on his knees and staring at Harry with plaintive grey eyes. “Please?”

Harry pulled him forward, cuddling him against his side, running a hand through the blond’s soft hair. “That sounds amazing.” It was wearing on him, too, only being able to speak to Draco if they were insulting each other. “Fuck, fifth year is hard.”

“It is,” Draco agreed, voice muffled by Harry’s jumper. “But it’d probably be easier if you weren’t moonlighting as a Defence teacher and attempting to bring down the Ministry.”

“Probably.” Harry kept playing with Draco’s hair. “Are prefect duties really getting to you?”

“Not by themselves,” Draco sighed. “But with everything else — the politics in Slytherin right now...” He trailed off, and Harry squeezed him tight for a minute. “I got another letter from Father today. Checking up on me, making sure I’m applying myself and forging the right connections.”

“Arsehole,” Harry muttered, kissing Draco’s hair. The blond hummed.

“Good news is, he’s agreed to let me stay for Yule.”

That was good news, though Harry knew it would just leave Draco in the castle worrying about his mother all of break.

“I think I’m just gonna sleep the whole three weeks,” Harry declared mutinously. “Here or at the Burrow or where Sirius is, I don’t care. As soon as classes are over, just point me to a bed, and wake me up when spring term starts.”

Draco craned his neck up, looking amused. “You’re not a bear, Potter. And foxes don’t hibernate.”

“This one could,” Harry insisted.

It was a moot point, of course. Whether he was at Hogwarts or Grimmauld, he had far too much to do to sleep the whole break away. Still, he could dream.

The pair lay together for a while, the only sound in the classroom their steady breathing. Harry began to wonder if Draco had fallen asleep, until he felt the Slytherin’s hand reach for his own, tangling their fingers together. Harry frowned when Draco’s thumb started to run over the ridged flesh of the scar from Umbridge’s detentions. Even with Snape’s help, it had left a permanent mark.

“Don’t,” he murmured, pulling his hand away.

“Does it still hurt?” Draco’s voice was worried. Harry shook his head.

“No, I just—“ He huffed, looking down at the pale marks on his skin. “You shouldn’t have to look at my scars.”

Draco propped himself up, one hand on Harry’s chest. His blond brows knitted together. “Your scars don’t bother me,” he insisted. “I mean, they do, because I want to pull that hag’s intestines out through her own mouth for inflicting that kind of pain on you,” his eyes flashed dangerously, “but I don’t think any less of you for it. Or any of the rest.” He looked at Harry earnestly. “Does that still bother you? Even now?”

Harry squirmed, unable to meet his boyfriend’s eyes. “I know they’re not pretty to look at,” he mumbled. It was easy for Draco to ignore them, when they met in dimly lit classrooms. It was easy for Harry to pretend they weren’t there.

“How many times to I have to tell you you’re gorgeous before you’ll believe me, Potter,” Draco sighed. He grabbed Harry’s hand again, bringing it up to press a kiss to the scarred words. “Scars and all. If they upset you that much, you should ask Uncle Sev for some Scar Remover; he has some that works well even on years-old scars. But don't you dare think for a second that they bother me."

"Only because I try not to let you see them," Harry muttered. Draco poked him hard in the chest.

"I've seen enough to think about you naked, and when I do, the scars are still there," he said bluntly. Harry's cheeks flamed.

"I—" Draco cut him off with a firm kiss.

"Trust me," he said, "the scars don't make you any less attractive. But even if you were hideous I'd still probably fancy you."

"Only probably?" Harry teased, ignoring the rest of the declaration before he dissolved from the embarrassment. Draco gave him a look that said he knew exactly what Harry was doing, and let it slide.

"Honestly, Potter, you should worry more about that hair of yours than the scars, I mean really, it's like you've never even seen a brush," he muttered, though he happily buried his hands in the tangled black mess. Harry snorted, pushing up and back until he was the one lying half on Draco, pillowled on the blond's narrow chest.

"Don't deserve you," he murmured, feeling those deft fingers scratching gently at his scalp.

"I'm a gift," Draco agreed breezily. A quiet laugh huffed out of Harry; truer words had never been spoken.

.-.-.-

When over half the members of the Hogwarts Alliance showed up with bleeding hands, Harry mentally revised his lesson plan. He waved his wand, rearranging the cushions on the floor until they were in a rough circle.

"Everyone take a seat," he requested. "If you'd be more comfortable in a proper chair, let me know, I'll conjure one."

They all seemed fine with the cushions, settling down and watching Harry curiously. He sat on a cushion of his own, glad to see that people hadn't automatically sat by their housemates and friends. His insistence on constantly mixing up partnerships was working.

"How many of you have had detention with Umbridge so far?" he asked, dread heavy in his voice.

Silence, in which many people shared uneasy glances. Then, slowly, hands began to rise. Harry cursed. Even little Dennis Creevey, the youngest person in the room, had his hand up. "That bitch," he muttered, then shook his head. "Okay. Today I'm going to teach you all a few spells. Some of you might know them — either because I've taught you, or someone else did," he looked at Cho, whose jaw was clenched, and she nodded shortly. She had shared the spells with the Ravenclaws. Good.

"First is a charm to drain the magical residue from the wound. Blood Quills are a magical object; even though the injury might look like it's healed over, magic still leaves its mark. If enough of that magic builds up, it can cause problems." He didn't want to scare anyone with the full explanation. "This charm should be cast after every detention. If you know anyone else who gets a detention, you can teach it to them, too."

He demonstrated the charm, and around the circle people began to copy him, wands pointed at their own hands, or their neighbour's.

"How do we know if it works?" Lavender asked, her wand pointed at Ginny's reddened hand.

"You can feel it," Ginny assured her. "It feels like there was something sticky on my hand, and it's gone now." Other people nodded, agreeing with her assessment. Harry was glad they could feel it — maybe it would help them feel any other magic cast on them. Just in case.

Next, he taught them a Healing charm, followed by a Numbing charm to apply before detentions so the Blood Quill wouldn't hurt as much. Harry had never needed that one himself; the pain wasn't even a blip on his radar.

They were all learning quickly, and Harry was wondering if he had time to go back to his original lesson plan, when Katie Bell cleared her throat. "Hey, Harry; would you teach us that privacy ward thing you're always putting up in the common room? The sound-muffling bubble one?"

Harry blinked at her; he hadn't realised people had noticed that.

"You can do privacy wards?"

"And proper Silencing charms?"

Immediately, a flurry of questions came Harry's way; everyone keen to know what other kinds of magic he could do. He raised his hands to get them to settle down. "I can teach you, yeah," he said, smiling a little bemusedly. "I'm sure some of you know similar versions, but we can all teach each other. I'm not the only one in this room who knows spells the other don't," he added ruefully.

It was an interesting meeting, sat in their circle like that; once Harry had taught his privacy spells, Fred had offered to teach them a Proximity charm he and George used to warn them if someone was coming close, when they were setting pranks. Soon, several people had their own contributions — Blaise even demonstrated a spell that Harry didn't know, to make something invisible to everyone except the person who had cast the spell.

Loads of them had little snippets of magic to share; things learned from parents, or older siblings, or out of random books. Not all of them were defence-based — Anthony Goldstein proudly shared a spell he used to soothe and stretch his hypermobile joints when they were painful, and all the quidditch players in the room were delighted by the results.

Curfew snuck up on them, the clock on the wall letting out a loud ringing noise, and Harry jumped. “Bloody hell. Guess we got a little carried away.” He stood, looking sheepish. “This was really brilliant, I’m so glad we did this. Before you all go, I’ve got something for you.”

He hurried over to his satchel, pulling out a black cloth bag. Up-ending it onto the table, a bunch of inkwells spilled out. “Everyone, take one of these,” he urged. “It’s an easier way to spread the word on when we’ll next meet.” Between three house teams worth of quidditch, and prefect duties for various members, it was hard for Harry to set a date too far in advance. “They’ve all got a Protean charm on them — look.” He picked one up and showed the bottom, which was a flat plate of silver metal. “I’ll mark on mine the date and time of the next meeting, and it’ll show up on yours. The ink will change colour, too, when I’ve updated it — to remind you to check it.”

“That’s a fancy bit of spellwork,” Cho teased, reaching for an inkwell.

Bashful, Harry shrugged. “A friend suggested it.” It had been Remus’ idea, and Sirius had taught him the Protean and Colour-Change charms through the mirror.

“Just don’t throw it away when the ink runs out,” George joked, picking up two and tossing one to his twin. “Cheers, Harry.”

Soon, the table was empty and the students were headed off to their common rooms, hurrying to make it within the generally accepted ten minute grace period post-curfew.

It was nice, Harry thought as he tidied the room up a bit, not to be the only one teaching all the time. Maybe he would encourage the others to share their knowledge more often.

Chapter 57

Winter had well and truly arrived, and with it, so had the Hogwarts quidditch season. To start things off with a bang, the first match of the year was Gryffindor versus Slytherin. A rivalry that seemed more tense than ever.

The whole Slytherin team were taking great pleasure in hexing the Gryffindor players in the hallways — or trying to, at least. After several weeks of HA meetings, the Gryffindors were light on their feet and quick on the draw; even Vicky Frobisher, their youngest member, had a speedy Shield charm these days.

Naturally, there were no repercussions to these attacks, even the ones that succeeded. Snape was practically encouraging them, and with Umbridge on the prowl no one else dared make much of a fuss. But the spells didn't bother Harry, nor did the whispered threats — he'd heard it all by this point.

Vicky seemed a little more wobbly at the constant taunts, but with the rest of the team at her back she soon learned to brush it off. "They're only doing this because they know we're better than them," Alicia told her one evening in the common room, when the team was gathered for a strategy meeting while a gale-force wind blew outside. "They can't beat us on skill, so they're trying to fake us out in the hopes we get sloppy."

"It's a bit sad, really," Angelina sighed, shaking her head. "Seventh years having to resort to threatening a third year girl just to try and win."

Vicky giggled, a little of the confidence returning to her eyes. Harry grinned at her.

Draco and Cassius, despite being the two actually decent human beings on the Slytherin team, had of course joined their teammates in the harassment like the good little future Death Eaters they were supposed to be. Harry probably wasn't supposed to find their attempts quite as funny as he did, though.

Especially as Draco seemed to have forgotten one tiny little detail.

The morning of the match was utterly freezing, but otherwise the weather was practically perfect quidditch conditions; still winds, no rain, and not too much glaring sunlight. Harry and the rest of the team headed down to the pitch after breakfast, in high spirits — it was going to be a good game, Harry could feel it.

Inside the changing rooms, they donned their robes and checked their broomsticks over, listening to the sounds of the steadily growing crowd in the stands outside. Harry glanced over at Vicky, who was getting a quiet pep talk from Angelina.

"How d'you think she'll do?" he asked Katie under his breath.

"I reckon she'll handle it," she replied, grinning. "It's hard, having our toughest match first, but she's done really well in training. She'll be fine." Then her grin faltered for the briefest second. "I hope she is, anyway; we're screwed if we have to replace her. The next best flier was Ron, and he was only good when no one was looking at him too closely."

Harry wrinkled his nose. Yes, he would rather not have Ron on the team; the redhead's attitude about quidditch since he hadn't made keeper had been appalling. He'd be absolutely insufferable if Angelina let him join now.

Vicky would be fine. He had faith in her.

If the points started looking rough, Harry would just make sure he caught the snitch quickly.

At last, it was time. Angelina gave a firm nod, and then they were striding out onto the pitch in single file. The Slytherins were already out there — which meant Harry got a perfect view of Draco's face when he saw Harry in his quidditch robes. And when he remembered the last time he'd seen him in his quidditch robes.

The blond's jaw tensed, his pale cheeks colouring as he tried valiantly not to react. Harry smirked at him, giving a fleeting wink. Draco's only response was a glare.

"What did you do to him?" George whispered in Harry's ear, amusement colouring his tone. The team captains shook hands, and Harry snickered.

"Tell you later."

As soon as the whistle blew, Draco was on his broom and speeding away from Harry. Harry took to the air, heart swooping in joy the way it always did when he flew. He did a quick lap, making sure to fly in front of Draco, bent low over the handle of his broom.

His boyfriend was going to kill him when the match was over.

Angelina might have belittled Slytherin's skill, but they had certainly brought their A game — both in ability, and in aggression. Crabbe and Goyle seemed to be focusing all their efforts on disrupting Harry with bludgers, while the chasers were barely following the acceptable contact rules in their determination to keep the quaffle.

Alicia scored early, but it was followed all too soon by a goal from Montague. Harry let his eyes move to Vicky, concerned, but if anything the third-year was just more determined not to repeat her mistake.

Harry left her to it, returning to his hunt for the snitch.

The quaffle flew from one end of the pitch to the other dozens of times, goals being scored and saved from both teams. The occasional glance at Draco showed the blond had not yet seen the snitch, and also was resolutely not looking at Harry. Harry smirked to himself.

And then he saw it.

As promised, he was ahead of Draco in the dive, though not by far enough that the Slytherin was looking at his backside. His hand was only inches behind Harry's, but Harry was faster, his hand wrapping securely around the little gold ball. Pulling out of the dive and lifting his hand triumphantly, Harry turned to offer Draco a quip about following him — and his vision went white as a bludger hit him hard in the side.

He fell off his broom, luckily only about five feet off the ground anyway, and managed to keep one hand wrapped around the Firebolt on his way down. He landed sort-of on his feet, knees buckling immediately as pain throbbed through his side. “Harry!”

“Are you alright?”

He raised a placating hand to the girls as they surrounded him, looking past them to see Crabbe in the air with his beater’s bat, looking smug and unrepentant — and the twins looking like they might kill him for it.

“I’m fine, I’m fine,” he insisted, and he wasn’t even lying. It would bruise, but it didn’t feel like there was any major damage. His body armour had caught the worst of it.

“He hit the bludger after the whistle went,” Angelina accused, glaring at Crabbe, who was already receiving a stern talking to by Madam Hooch.

Harry looked back at Draco, who was white-faced with fury — not, Harry suspected, about losing the game, but about Crabbe’s unsportsmanlike conduct. “I’m fine,” Harry said again, directing his words at his teammates while his eyes were still on his boyfriend.

The Slytherins in the crowd were heckling and booing, but it didn’t matter — Gryffindor had won. The rest of the team landed, Fred and George immediately crowding Vicky with praise, tweaking her ponytail and thumping her on the back proudly.

“That’s the hardest match done,” Katie declared happily. “We’ve got the cup in the bag this year!” They all whooped, and Harry did to, heading towards the changing room. He glanced over his shoulder, unsurprised to see Draco’s eyes still on him — no longer angry, but hot and intent.

A shiver ran down Harry’s spine, and he kept walking.

Angelina wasn’t satisfied until Harry pulled off his shirt and armour to prove there was nothing more than a light bruise. “It’ll be fine in a couple of days,” he insisted. “I don’t need to see Pomfrey.” He had bruise balm in his room, courtesy of Snape, and that would clear it right up.

“Leave the man alone, love,” Fred called jovially, “or I’ll start worrying about how desperate you are to keep his top off.”

Angelina rolled her eyes, throwing her wrist-guard at her boyfriend.

The twins, bless their devious hearts, seemed to notice that Harry was dragging his feet. They were in fine form, chattering away about the victory party, herding the girls out of the changing room and telling Harry not to take too long. George threw a salacious wink at him on his way out, and Harry felt himself go red.

Once he was sure he was the only one left in the changing rooms, he started to put his quidditch robes back on. He had a hunch.

And he was right — a few minutes later, he heard the door creak open. “That you, George?” Harry called loudly, a grin already on his face. The door shut, and a familiar voice muttered a Locking charm.

Draco rounded the corner, no longer wearing his own robe but still in the rest of his uniform, and he stalked across the room towards Harry. “You’ve got some nerve, Potter,” he muttered, grabbing him by the front of the robes. He paused. “Crabbe didn’t hurt you, did he?”

“Just a bruise,” Harry assured; a bruise he couldn’t even feel right now, considering the way all his blood was rushing to a very different part of his body. “Did you have a nice time watching my arse?” he asked cheekily.

Draco growled, pushing him back until Harry was up against the lockers, and the next thing he knew his mouth was being devoured.

Harry’s fingers tangled in the soft wool of Draco’s team jumper, pulling him close with a low moan. One of the blond’s legs was firm between Harry’s thighs, pressing up against his cock. He still smelled of sweat and leather, the intoxicating combination making Harry dizzy with lust.

“You look even fitter in these robes than you did last Christmas,” Draco groaned. “God, you little shit, you knew exactly what you were doing when you walked out on that pitch. Exactly what I was remembering.”

“This is better than outside the greenhouses,” Harry shot back. “Less likely to get caught.”

Draco’s eyes darkened when he pulled away, fingers running down the laces of Harry’s robe. “You’ll be late to your own victory party,” he said mock-sadly. Harry scoffed.

“This is a better victory party.”

“Still,” Draco said, undoing the laces slowly. “I should at least try and get you presentable. You’re all sweaty, it’s disgusting.”

Harry blinked — as if Draco wasn’t equally sweaty!

Then he saw where his boyfriend’s gaze was directed; not at Harry, but at the shower cubicles just past his shoulder. “Oh.” He swallowed, fire flooding his veins. “Yeah?”

They had never been naked together before. Trousers round their knees and shirts off, yes, but not actually, fully naked.

Draco pulled back, tugging his jumper over his head, leaving him in just his thin undershirt. “It’ll save time,” he drawled. “May as well get messy where it’s easier to clean up.”

Harry didn’t need more encouragement than that; he fumbled with his robes, pulling them off and hurrying to shed the rest of his layers.

Despite Harry's fantasies, there was hardly anything sexy about scrambling to get quidditch boots undone and awkwardly peeling off the skin-tight trousers with a prominent erection, but it didn't matter that both of them looked ridiculous; not when they were both finally, gloriously, naked. Draco grabbed him by the hand and led him into the closest shower cubicle, turning on the shower head. Without his glasses, Harry's vision was blurred, but he hardly cared when he could get his hands on Draco's arse, water running down both of them, making their skin slick and their hair flatten into their eyes.

Next thing Harry knew he was pinned to the wall in a bruising kiss, Draco's body flush against him, and holy hell that was the best feeling in the world, all that bare skin on bare skin. Harry didn't even care that the lights in the showers were so bright Draco could probably see every one of his scars, not when the blond was kissing his way down Harry's neck, one hand between them gripping both their lengths.

Draco was rarely so... dominant, and Harry was a little amazed at how much of a turn-on it was, having his boyfriend so desperate for him. Neither of them lasted long, Harry barely having the sense to drag Draco's mouth back up to his, tongues twining together as pleasure shot through his every nerve. He felt Draco gasp and shudder against him, then relax into Harry's frame, both of them propped up by the wall and on shaky legs.

Harry breathed harshly, water running into his eyes as he tried to gain his equilibrium. "We should make that a regular thing," he gasped, running a hand down Draco's bare back, over his backside. "Every Gryffindor/Slytherin match."

"Deal," Draco agreed, chest heaving. "Next time we use the Slytherin changing rooms."

"Only if you win," Harry teased in response. Even without his glasses, he could see Draco pout.

"See, you're going to have to go professional after school," Draco decided. "International, even. It's the only way my ego will cope with being beaten by you every bloody time."

Harry laughed, pushing off the wall when he thought his knees could keep him standing, pushing his wet hair off his forehead. "Yes, dear."

He looked down at Draco's belly, at his cock now limp between his legs. The mess had already washed off them, and Harry cursed his poor vision. "Not fair," he groused. "I'm half-blind even before there's water in my eyes. You can see me properly."

"I can, and I'm very much enjoying it," Draco confirmed, patting Harry's bum playfully. "Now budge over, you're blocking the soap."

For some reason, Harry's mind had not processed the part of showering with Draco where they would actually get clean. All his fantasies had fizzled out after the orgasms happened. Before he would have thought it to be awkward, scrubbing himself down beside the blond after what they'd just done, but it felt surprisingly nice. Easy. Harry washed Draco's hair, amusing himself by making it stick out at ridiculous angles when it was all lathered up, and Draco tenderly scrubbed the rapidly growing bruise on Harry's side, muttering under his breath about all the awful things he was going to do to Crabbe.

Harry hadn't expect to feel so comfortable being naked in front of another person.

They were quick in the showers, and when they stepped out Harry hurried to grab his glasses, wanting to properly admire Draco's nude form before the boy put on clothes. The Slytherin gave a ridiculous pose, flexing his muscles, and really it was obscene how much Harry's heart swelled with affection for the preening blond.

"I feel like such a cliché right now," Draco remarked, buttoning his trousers.

"What, snake in the lion's den?" Harry teased, sitting down to put his socks on.

"That, and being two opposing seekers fucking in the changing rooms. It's like something out of a trashy romance novel."

His casual use of the word fucking made Harry's cheeks heat. "Lots of experience with those types of books, have you?" he drawled to hide his embarrassment. Draco snorted.

"Mother likes them. She leaves them lying around sometimes — I got curious." His tone was defensive, making Harry wonder if there wasn't a little more than curiosity involved.

Suddenly he knew what he was getting Draco for Christmas.

"At least no one will question you having gone off for a sulk by yourself," Harry pointed out, shoving his feet into his boots. "I'm gonna get mobbed when I finally get up to Gryffindor." It was at least half an hour since the rest of the team had left the changing rooms. They were going to think he'd slipped and died in the shower or something.

"Tell them you were having a celebration of your own."

Harry snickered, reaching out to reel Draco in by the front of his cloak, kissing him firmly. "Not great for keeping this secret, that," he pointed out.

"You don't have to say it was me. Let the rumour mill do some work; they've all forgotten about your love life since the Quibbler article last year."

"I thought that was a good thing, seeing how unbearably jealous you get at even the suggestion that I might be with someone else," Harry argued lightly, running a hand through his boyfriend's still-damp hair. A faint blush rose on Draco's cheeks.

"I can't help that I'm possessive," he muttered abashedly.

"Don't worry, it's hot," Harry assured, smirking. For the boy in the cupboard that nobody wanted, having Draco get possessive made him feel all warm and fuzzy inside. The blond gave a cocky smirk.

"They'll think what they want to think. But if you don't get up there soon, they'll think the Slytherin team have kidnapped you for revenge."

"Not far off the mark," Harry teased, going in for one last kiss. "Best revenge ever."

Still, Draco was right, and the two boys had to part ways; Harry up to the castle, and Draco doubling back to the Slytherin changing rooms to gather his things.

Harry should have expected to be accosted by two red-headed devils as soon as he walked through the portrait hole.

“There he is!” Fred shouted, thrusting a bottle of butterbeer into Harry’s hand.

“Man of the hour!” George cried, offering a second bottle.

“Finishing his walk of shame—”

“Stride of pride!”

“Shut up, both of you,” Harry groaned, obediently necking back the first bottle.

“About time you showed up!” Ginny exclaimed. “Everyone, Harry’s back!”

A roar of celebration went up around the common room, and Harry was shoved into the centre of the fray. He couldn’t even be mad about the looks the twins were sending him, or even the way Neville — shy little Neville! — kept making quiet innuendos about snakes, not when everyone around him was so happy. And occasionally transforming into canaries, thanks to snacks provided by the twins. Harry let himself be jostled over to where the rest of the team were celebrating, one of his butterbeers having been claimed by Lavender on his way through. He felt like he was walking on air; they had won the quidditch match, he had seen his boyfriend naked, and the whole house was happy for the first time since Umbridge had arrived.

As he turned to watch Fred and Lee juggling empty bottles, he caught sight of something out the window.

There was smoke drifting from the chimney of Hagrid’s hut.

A face-splitting grin tugged at Harry’s cheeks; Hagrid was back!

It was truly an excellent day.

.-.-.-

With the party going on in Gryffindor for most of Saturday evening, Harry decided to go down and see Hagrid in the morning. Wrapped up in several layers with his charmed cloak from Sirius and Remus shielding him from the snow, he trudged down to the hut, knocking on the door.

Hagrid opened the door, smiling widely at the sight of Harry. Harry, on the other hand, stared at his friend in horror. “What the hell happened to you?”

“Nice to see you, too, ‘Arry,” Hagrid said reproachfully. Harry scoffed, stepping into the hut and hanging up his cloak, edging closer to the blazing fire. Hagrid’s face looked like he’d had a run-in with a meat grinder, one of his eyes puffy and swollen. The way he moved, ambling to fetch a mug while Fang bounded over to Harry, suggested he might have a broken rib or two.

Harry obligingly scratched the slobbery boarhound behind the ears. “You had an eventful trip, then?”

“Aye, it was certainly that,” Hagrid agreed, pouring two cups of tea and reaching up in the cupboard for the biscuit tin, only wincing a little. “Surprised you’re out here on your own. You still on the outs with Ron and Hermione?” He was frowning, which made the cuts on his face look even more gruesome.

“Yeah, that’s a pretty permanent thing by this point. Rough summer.”

If possible, Hagrid’s face got more upset. “I ‘eard what ‘appened to Dudley.” Harry’s shoulders tensed. It had been months since anyone had brought that up. “Kid might’ve bin a brat, but with parents like his ‘e didn’t have much of a choice. There was still plenty o’ growin’ up to do. No one deserves what ‘appened to him, least of all a boy his age.” His huge hand came down gently on Harry’s shoulder. “Still, lucky it weren’t worse, I s’pose. Could’a bin the whole town, with how long Dumbledore said it took fer the Aurors to show up.”

“Yeah.” Harry shrugged, desperately wanting to move the conversation along. Somehow it was harder coming from Hagrid, who had actually met Dudley. “You’ve seen Dumbledore since you got back, then?”

“Aye, soon as I got in last night.” Hagrid sipped his tea, frowning. “Had a visit from some Ministry lass, too. New Defence teacher, she called ‘erself. Umbridge. Said summat about inspectin’ teachers.” He shook his head, shaggy hair getting even more haphazard. “Got awful nosy about where I’d been all term.”

Harry’s stomach turned. “I bet she did,” he muttered. “You’ve got a lot to catch up on, Hagrid.”

“I’ll put some sausages on,” Hagrid declared. At Harry’s knee, Fang perked up at the word. “You can tell me all about it over breakfast.”

He looked to be in some serious pain as he moved, and just looking at him made Harry wince. “Is there nothing Pomfrey can do for you?” He knew giants, and therefore half-giants, were resistant to a lot of forms of magic. He wasn’t sure if that included healing spells, too.

“I’ll swing by and pick up some Bruise Balm at lunch,” Hagrid assured dismissively. “The rest’ll heal in its own time. Now, tell me more about this Umbridge woman.”

Harry explained what had happened since the beginning of the year; Umbridge’s speech at the welcoming feast, her appointment as High Inquisitor, the inspections and Trelawney’s probation. He carefully edged around the endless detentions, merely mentioning that she had it out for him and Dumbledore both. “She’s a blood purist,” Harry told him, “she made all these laws that made it impossible for Remus to get a job. And she’s been needling Professor Flitwick about his heritage since she got here.”

Hagrid's face twisted in dislike. "So she decided to come and welcome back the 'alf-giant professor, then?" he said knowingly. He fished the sausages out of the grill pan, pulling a loaf of bread out from a different cupboard. In short order, there was a pile of sausage sandwiches slathered in ketchup; Harry's mouth watered.

"She's got an agenda," Harry agreed. "Hate to say, getting rid of you is probably on it."

"Dumbledore won't let that 'appen,'" Hagrid insisted faithfully.

"She might not give him a choice." Harry hated the idea of Hagrid becoming collateral damage in the battle for dominance between Dumbledore and the Ministry. "Just promise me you'll be careful. No dragon eggs; no dangerous creatures in lessons. Nothing that'll let her use all those awful stereotypes about giants against you."

"Don't worry about me, 'Arry," Hagrid said. He didn't seem remotely concerned by the whole affair. "It'll be alrigh'." He gave a savage grin. "In't the first time I've played the Ministry's game."

That was exactly what Harry was worried about.

"Anyways, I'm surprised; you 'aven't even asked me where I been all this time!"

Harry blinked — of course, he wasn't supposed to know that Hagrid had been seeking giants. "Well, now we've got all the boring stuff out of the way, you can tell me," he declared, reaching for another sandwich.

From the injuries Hagrid was sporting, it was bound to be an interesting story.

.-. .

Between quidditch celebrations and his visit with Hagrid — which had ended, somewhat awkwardly, when Ron and Hermione appeared on Hagrid's doorstep, and Hagrid tried to get the three of them to sit and talk together — Harry was worryingly behind on his homework. Sunday night found him up in the common room long after the rest of the Tower had gone to bed, fast asleep with his face pressed against the pages of a book on goblin wars. Inside his head, he was travelling down a long, dark corridor.

He tried his best not to let the dream draw him in, but the corridor just kept stretching ahead of him, a tiny voice in his head whispering that he was so curious, that he needed to find out what was at the end. He reached for the door, and it sprung open, revealing a bright light and

—

Harry gasped awake, wand jumping into his hand as something touched his shoulder. He blinked into the darkness of the common room, heart stopping for a moment when huge green eyes blinked back.

"...Dobby?"

The elf was wearing a truly ludicrous amount of misshapen knitwear, a stack of lumpy hats piled atop his head. He looked wary; not his usual delight at seeing Harry.

“Harry Potter sir is shaking in his sleep,” he said. “Having bad dreams.” Then he paused, wringing his hands. “Dobby is still looking out for Harry Potter sir, even though he is having another elf doing that for him now.”

Harry’s sleep-fogged mind took a minute to catch up. “Another... oh. You mean Ceri?” A quick nod. “She isn’t really my elf. She’s my godfather’s. She just... helps.” He blinked again, watching the way Dobby seemed to shrink into himself. “Dobby, it doesn’t mean I’m not happy to see you. You’re still my friend.” He realised guiltily that he hadn’t seen the elf all term. “I’m sorry I haven’t been down to visit; I’ve been really busy lately.”

“Dobby knows,” the elf said with another nod, looking a bit brighter. “Dobby is seeing Harry Potter spending lots of time in the Come and Go Room.”

Confusion drifted through Harry’s brain. “You mean the Room of Requirement?” Surely Dobby couldn’t be referring to the Chamber, which was the only other place Harry had been frequenting.

“Another name for it, yes.” Dobby’s tennis-ball eyes stared up at him. “Harry Potter sir is truly not upset with Dobby?”

“What? No! Why would I be upset?”

Dobby wrung his hands anxiously. “Harry Potter sir is spending more time with Master Draco. Master Draco will tell Harry Potter sir that Dobby is a bad elf.”

Harry choked, red in the face at the insinuation that Dobby had been watching him and Draco meet up.

“No, no, Dobby; Draco isn’t like that at all! He—he isn’t like his father, I promise. And he doesn’t think you’re a bad elf.” Draco likely didn’t think of Dobby at all. “You can’t tell anyone that I talk to him, though. It’s a secret. His father would get very angry with Draco if he found out.”

Dobby’s eyes became fearful; he knew what happened when Lucius Malfoy got angry. “Dobby is keeping Harry Potter’s secrets. Dobby is a good elf.”

“A good friend,” Harry corrected, smiling when the small creature blushed. “And, look—I know Ceri is around. And she’s great. But she doesn’t look after me like you do. She hasn’t saved my life like you have.” Or endangered it like Dobby had, but the danger came from a place of caring. Suddenly, he was struck with a thought. “Listen, Dobby. You can say no if you want—I know you like working at Hogwarts, but... I’m too young for an elf of my own right now. I’m in school all the time, I don’t really need anything. But maybe, after I graduate... if you wanted to come with me, I would like that.”

The elf’s jaw dropped. “Harry Potter sir is asking Dobby to be his personal elf?” he breathed, awed.

“Only if you want to. I can’t promise you’d have much work to do. But I’ll pay you whatever wages you want. You can still be a free elf.” The idea of leaving Dobby at Hogwarts after everything he'd done for Harry, letting the elf think that Harry had just forgotten about him... it didn't sit right with him.

"Dobby... Dobby would like that, very much." He bit his lip. "But Dobby needs to think about Winky, too. She is still not happy being a Hogwarts elf."

"Of course." Well, there was only one real answer for that. "I don't think I'll have enough work for one elf, let alone two, but Winky can come if she wants, too."

Immediately, Harry had a pair of skinny arms wrapped around his legs. "Harry Potter sir is too kind!"

Harry Potter sir was very tired, and only vaguely aware of what he was doing, and would really like to finish his essay and go to bed. He patted the top of the tower of hats, gently disentangling the elf from his person. "It's two years away. Plenty of time to make a decision. But the offer is there."

Plenty of time for Harry to figure out what the hell he'd do with two house elves, too.

Draco would know what to do. He'd sort it out.

....

Despite — or perhaps because of — Hagrid's reassurance that he could handle Umbridge, Harry felt nothing but trepidation when that obnoxiously dainty little 'hem, hem' sounded while Hagrid was showing the class some thestrals.

The half-giant greeted her cheerfully; if Harry didn't know better, he'd say the man was entirely oblivious to what she clearly thought about him.

Then again, Harry supposed, Hagrid was probably used to people thinking certain things about him, and having to interact with them anyway.

His fists clenched at his sides as Umbridge spoke to Hagrid with slow, exaggerated words and near-comical hand gestures. Hagrid took it all on the chin, smile not even faltering.

"Are you aware," Umbridge continued, "that the Ministry of Magic classifies thestrals as dangerous?"

"Aye," Hagrid said, nodding genially. "They can be. But Hogwarts has had a permit for the thestrals to pull the carriages since about nineteen-fifty-summat. Only domesticated herd in Britain!" he declared proudly. Umbridge did not look nearly as impressed.

Things quickly went downhill as she began to walk amongst the students — it was clear that even if Hagrid had been an exemplary teacher, she had made her mind up about him. It didn't help that the Slytherins — Draco looking apologetically at Harry when no one else was watching — were on fine form, regaling Umbridge with all the dangerous things Hagrid had made them study, and how difficult it was to understand him.

Harry knew they didn't mean it, knew they were only spouting the same crap their parents said, the crap they were expected to say, but it still hurt to see Hagrid's smile get more and more tense with every remark.

He let out a tiny sigh of relief when Umbridge finally made her way back towards the castle, but the damage had been done. Hagrid was anxious, fumbling his words for the remainder of the lesson, and none of the students were properly paying attention. Which was a shame, because Harry was actually quite keen to learn more about thestrals.

"That was the worst inspection yet," Neville muttered when they were on the path back to the castle at the end of the lesson. Harry had tried to hang back for Hagrid, but Hermione had swooped right in and started lecturing him about all the things he needed to do to make sure Umbridge didn't fire him, so Harry left them to it.

"He's doomed," Harry agreed morosely. The only saving grace would be Dumbledore stepping in before Umbridge could do anything permanent.

For once, Harry was desperately praying that the headmaster would ignore the rules for his own benefit. Hogwarts wasn't Hogwarts without Hagrid.

.-.-.-.-

Remus' whole body ached as he apparated onto the lawn at Seren Du, the welcoming magic of the wards washing over him as he stepped through. "Ceri," he called, and the elf appeared at his side. "Would you please find Severus when he's next alone and tell him I'm back?"

All he wanted to do was take a nice long bath, and see his partner.

Thankfully, it wasn't long until he had both; Severus arrived at the manor while Remus was soaking in their obnoxiously large bathtub. He strode into the bathroom, still in his teaching robes, and something in Remus eased at the sight of him. "Hello, love. I've missed you."

With a wave of Severus' hand, all his buttons from collars to cuffs undid at the same time. "Are you injured?" the Slytherin asked, low voice flooded with concern. Remus shook his head, watching happily as the man stripped down to his skin.

"No, no; not unless being too damn old to spend a whole moon running through the woods counts as an injury," he joked. Severus rolled his eyes, stepping into the hot water. Remus made room for him, angling for a kiss.

"You're not old, you're thirty-five," Severus muttered. Remus laughed, resting his head on the man's bony shoulder, inhaling the lingering scent of potions' ingredients.

"I'm fine, honestly," he assured, letting his body curve against his partner's, muscles relaxing. "How are you? How are things at the school?" How's Harry, he wanted to ask, but from the look on Severus' face the question was implied regardless.

"Umbridge continues to terrorise the students and staff. Hagrid has returned, which has given her a new target." Remus winced, imagining how awful that woman was being to the poor man. “Potter led Gryffindor to victory at quidditch, and has only had four detentions with Umbridge since you left. And two detentions with me,” Severus added, smirking faintly.

“Two detentions I’m sure he absolutely deserved,” said Remus with a roll of his eyes.

“Naturally,” Severus agreed without hesitation. He reached back for the bottle of shampoo, tipping Remus’ head back and gently lathering his hair. Remus sighed, slowly going boneless at the ministrations. Merlin, Severus had such wonderful hands.

“Order done anything interesting?” he asked, though he cared less and less every passing second.

“Not even slightly. Were you successful?”

It took Remus a second to remember what Severus was talking about, lost in the sensation of the fingers massaging his scalp. “Hmm? Oh. Wolves. Well, they’re much more receptive to Harry than Dumbledore. Especially when I told them the only thing Harry wants them to do is not join Voldemort.” Albus, the idiot, was expecting the wolves to somehow fight for the light, put their lives on the line for wizards that would happily see them dead. “They like the idea of someone pack-adjacent being in power, promising them rights. I’ll write to Harry in the morning, let him know how it all went.” Remus tried valiantly not to drift into a complete puddle of goo, but it was hard now Severus’ hands had moved to his neck and shoulders.

“How’s Harry’s little club going?”

“I’ve not heard hide nor hair of it, so they’re succeeding at secrecy,” Severus replied. “I would imagine it’s going well, however; Potter looks far too smug for it to be failing.”

Remus chuckled softly, cracking one eye open to glance amusedly at his lover. “Don’t front, you’re proud of him.” It was written in the lines of his face, for someone like Remus, who was an expert at reading that particular map.

“I am pleased that finally someone is taking the protection and defence of the students seriously, and treating them with at least the hope that they may become capable adults. Even if that someone is Potter.”

That was Severus-talk for pride. He needn’t try so hard with Remus. “It does sound ridiculous at times,” he confessed. “I could hardly believe it myself when I began telling the werewolf elders that I would happily follow a fifteen year-old boy into both an all-out war and a political minefield.”

“It’s absurd,” Severus said. “Trusting a single teenager to succeed in thwarting the two most powerful wizards in magical Europe.”

“And yet,” Remus murmured, looking knowingly at Severus.

“And yet,” the man echoed, hand lingering at Remus’ jaw.

Watching Harry now was the most hopeful either of them had been about winning the war in their entire lives.

For once, they could believe that there was someone out there who could truly create a world worth fighting for.

Worth living for.

Chapter 58

Chapter Notes

CW for non-graphic mentions of child abuse

Harry and Neville were in the library one cold December evening, working on their Transfiguration homework and quietly discussing the upcoming Christmas holidays.

“I’ve no idea if I’m staying or not, to be honest,” Harry murmured. “I mean, obviously I want to spend it with Sirius. But I’ve not heard anything from anyone about it.” Ginny had mentioned that Ron had been told to invite Harry to the Burrow, but even the thought of having her and the more tolerable Weasley brothers around wasn’t quite enough for Harry to want to spend Christmas with Ron.

“Just get on the train when we all go to leave,” Neville told him, shrugging. “You know where it is. What can they do, send you back?”

Harry didn’t point out that it was entirely likely someone would force him to return to Hogwarts if it had been deemed safer for him to remain at the castle, but he didn’t voice that to Neville.

He reached to turn the page of the textbook he was referencing, and a shadow caught the corner of his gaze — he looked up, immediately tensing.

Theodore Nott was stood at the end of the aisle, watching them both.

Harry elbowed Neville, nodding in the Slytherin’s direction. Then he dropped their privacy ward, looking back at the boy as if daring him to make a move.

He hadn’t really spoken much to Nott, despite being in several classes with him. He was one of the students Draco had immediately written off as Death Eater spawn, in far too deep thanks to his father. The hair on the back of Harry’s neck prickled on end, his wand in his hand beneath the table. Pince would murder him if he started a duel in the library, but he wasn’t going to risk being defenceless.

“Can we help you?” he asked calmly. Nott’s response was a quiet, almost disbelieving laugh.

“Fuck, I hope so.”

That wasn’t the response Harry had expected. He blinked, but allowed the boy to walk closer. Nott set his wand on the table, a clear sign of truce. “I need your help, Potter,” he said, dark gaze as wary as a stray cat. “I— my father wants me Marked. This summer.”

“...And that’s not something you want?”

Nott’s face turned incredulous. “Of course not. I’ve seen the way that lunatic treats his followers.” Then he grew hesitant. “And—he’s wrong. The Dark Lord. He’s going to get us all killed.”

That was a surprise. Neville looked equally shocked, his quill slowly dripping ink onto his half-written essay.

“So you don’t want the Mark because you don’t like to bow?” Harry asked sharply. “Or because you don’t believe in torturing and killing muggleborns?”

“Both,” Nott said with a twist of a grimace. “Magical blood shouldn’t be spilt.”

“What about muggles?”

Nott flinched under Harry’s intense stare, looking like he might bolt. “Look, Potter, I’m trying here. I heard—I overheard Blaise talking to some other Slytherins, in the common room. He said there’s a way to avoid him without having to debase ourselves to Dumbledore.” His gaze turned cautious, hopeful. “He said you could offer sanctuary.”

Harry would have to have a word with Blaise Zabini about what exactly he was promising people on Harry’s behalf.

“I could,” Harry agreed slowly.

“Name your price and I’ll pay it,” came Nott’s immediate reply. “Money, connections, knowledge; whatever you want. If it’s in my power, it’s yours. Just please get me out of my father’s house by this summer. He—“

Nott met Harry’s gaze, and Harry’s heart sank. He recognised that wild-eyed, frantic sort of look.

It was the same look he saw in the mirror when he lived at the Dursleys.

“He hits you?” Harry asked urgently, and Nott’s lips turned down bitterly.

“Like a muggle? He’d never be so crass.” He laughed, and the sound was haunted. “My father likes a good old-fashioned Cruciatus curse. Really makes the punishment memorable.” He shook his head, dark hair falling carelessly into his eyes. “If I’m lucky, he’ll hex me into such a gibbering mess that I’m no use to the Dark Lord.” Then he froze, flinching, and looked at Neville. “I’m sorry, Longbottom. That was uncalled for.”

Beside Harry, Neville had gone chalk-white. He swallowed hard. “If Harry can’t offer you sanctuary, I will,” he said, surprising them both. “No—no-one should suffer that fate. Not even you.”

“I’ll sort something out,” Harry promised. Slowly, telegraphing his move quite obviously, he reached out to place a hand on Nott’s shoulder. “You’ll have a safe place to go by the summer. A place where your father and Voldemort can't get to you." Harry would have to write to the goblins and change around some of his plans, but it was doable.

The relief that flooded the Slytherin boy was visible, as he slumped in his chair like a ragdoll. "Thank you," he rasped. "What do you ask in return?"

"Nothing," Harry replied, shaking his head. "I don't help people because I want something. I help people because they need it."

That seemed an utterly foreign concept to Nott. Harry didn't hold it against him; even Draco still struggled with the idea. Slytherins just did not think that way. "I will, however, ask for your silence, and your loyalty. Not like him," he hastened to add, seeing the way the Slytherin tensed. "But if you're going to be on my side — or, at the very least, not on Voldemort's side — you're going to learn some things that would be absolutely dire for anyone else to discover. How's your Occlumency?"

"Impeccable," Nott responded immediately. "My father likes to rip my mind apart for any signs of wavering loyalty. I wouldn't have survived this long without solid shields."

His matter-of-fact tone made Harry's stomach turn. "Good. And — you're the heir to two Wizengamot seats, correct? Nott and Avery?"

"Harry, are you sure?" Neville hissed in alarm. "That's an awful lot of trust to put in him."

Harry nodded; he knew that. But he had a gut feeling that Nott was worth that trust.

If only he could ask Snape to test the boy without revealing the Potions Master's loyalty.

"I'll be eligible for both when I turn seventeen, yes. But my father holds them right now." Nott's eyes were calculating, looking between the two. "If it's political clout you're after, I can help." He smiled viciously. "If it requires my father to have an unfortunate and lethal accident, even better."

Harry wasn't quite sure what to do with all that bloodthirsty energy, but that was good to know. "Talk to Daphne Greengrass," he said eventually, thinking that the female Slytherin would be devious enough to spot if Nott was trying to play him. "Tell her I said she should think about bringing you to study group."

Nott blinked, looking perplexed. "If I do that, you'll give me sanctuary?"

"I'll give you sanctuary regardless," Harry promised. "This will just... help with some other things."

If he could be trusted, it would be worth having him on board. Two more seats would be an enormous help.

"Thank you." Nott reached over, clasping Harry's hand in both of his own. "I am in your debt, Heir Potter. Should I betray this trust, let Magic punish me as it must."

